So that, it cannot be infringed in order to produce economic and social advantages. 9.4 Characteristics of Rawlsian Justice ? Justice as fairness means certain principles that would result in just distribution in society. It is just as the procedure of distribution follows just principles. ? To make it workable, principles of liberty and equality should be coordinated as a basis to determine distribution of primary goods such as rights, liberties, income, wealth, opportunities, offices, welfare, etc. ? In order to get just principles, he assumes a situation of 'original position', NSOU ? CC-PS-03 88 like the state of nature in contract theory, in which people decide the principle of distribution. The purpose of the scheme of the original position is to set up a fair procedure so that all agreed principles will be just. In such situation men should not take advantage of social and natural circumstances for their own interests. ? In the 'original position' because men are not aware of their intelligence, skill or strength, social status or class and the principle of good. ? Under these circumstances, everyone acts behind the veil of ignorance to choose principles of justice. It is presupposed that the parties concerned do not know their place in society, their class position or social status, the economic, political and cultural conditions of their society, their idea of good and their fortune in the distribution of natural resources and capabilities, their intelligence and strength. Rawls assumes that people being rational decision makers will make rational choices and devise principles to achieve just distribution in society. ? Each individual in this situation will choose two principles: a) equality in assigning basic rights and duties to all and b) all social and economic inequalities would be so arranged that it results in compensating benefits for everyone including the least advantaged. At this stage, it would now be rational to ask what measure, deserts or merit, skills, talent or abilities, is the right basis to distribute rewards to all. Rawls thinks none else but needs should be the right criteria for equal distribution of primary goods and highest benefits to the least advantaged of the society. Skills and talents are, to a great extent, the product of 'naturally and socially acquired advantages' – either of natural endowment or fortunate family and social circumstances. Hence, in Rawls' opinion, it is illogical to reward an individual who due to his or her advantageous social or class position becomes skilled or capable person. 9.5 A Critique of Rawls Rawls's theory has been subjected to following criticisms. i) To the critics, his theory of justice is hardly contractarian because the choice of two principles in the 'original position', and under the 'veil of ignorance', is not a function of any contract. He draws the 'difference principles' or the 'maximin' rule to explain the justice. However, in an original position a NSOU ? CC-PS-03 89 person is ignorant of his status and needs. So it is hardly possible for him to bargain for primary social goods like liberty and opportunity, etc. Further, his proposed concept of veil of ignorance tends to destroy the possibility of having a real contract argument that can provide a defense of his two principles. ii) Ronald Dworkin argues the Difference Principle fails to deliver justice, since its formulation in terms of primary goods fails to recognize that those who are very unlucky, such as the severely ill or disabled, may need considerably greater shares of primary goods than others in order to achieve a reasonable life. Dworkin also argued that just economic distributions should be more responsive than the Difference Principle to the consequences of people's choices. iii) Robert Nozick argues that Rawls' theory cannot protect the liberty of an individual which man needs to determine what he should do with what belongs to him. As a supporter of minimal state and free individuals, Nozick argues that the individuals are not made to serve collective interests against his personal interests. He believes that justice begins and ends with the ownership of property. iv) Radical thinkers like C.B. Macpherson opines that Rawls starts his concept of justice with the acknowledgement that class division in terms of income and wealth is inevitable. It would further result in reduction of individual liberty through creating inequality of power in society. To Macpherson, Rawls' postulation that distributive justice is possible even within a class based society is seriously flawed because the poor and downtrodden people hardly enjoy freedom or get justice in such society. Besides, Rawls theory of justice tends to be culture-centric and relevant only to liberal-democratic society. Rawls' predilection for market is clearly visible in the pages of his writings. He maintains, "The ideal scheme sketched makes considerable use of market arrangements. It is only in this way, I believe, that the problem of distribution can be handled as a case of pure procedural justice." Macpherson, therefore, calls him 'revisionist liberal'. Norman Daniel also retorts that Rawls, writes a book on 'a theory of liberal democratic justice'. v) The Marxist thinkers like Richard Miller and Milton Fisk criticize Rawls on many counts. The concept of 'original position' suggests that man does not have any social milieu. So, his likings or so to say predilection does not have any social root. Besides, Rawls, as a man of liberal capitalist tradition, believes in inevitability of inequalities and it would continue forever as it is unsolvable. Man's endeavor to create a social system devoid of inequalities NSOU ? CC-PS-03 90 finds no support in his writings. Yet he develops a model based on equality. Further, the base factor of his theory is individual rationality which is nothing but an offshoot of liberal ideology. vi) Rawls believes that the second principle of justice, that is, the principle of greatest equal liberty, fair equality of opportunity and the difference principle, may be realized through a constitutional democracy. However, this argument has certain critical defects. It allows a greater inequality in the distribution of wealth and property. As a result, equality of economic, political and social opportunity for all cannot be ensured at all. Besides, constitutional democracy may encourage concentration of political power in a few hands that will use it for personal gains. However, Rawls prescribes constitutional guarantee of equal rights of participation in the political system to rectify this defect. vii) Amartya Sen observes that Rawls' theory of justice can be criticized from two major angles. Rawls is too much dependent on institutional arrangements, which is called transcendental institutionalism. It is nothing but speculative or hypothetical: his original position, for example, cannot include the plurality of human society. In other words, the concept of justice should be based on the realities of social life. Secondly, Rawls' idea of liberty is dichotomous: while liberty cannot be reduced to mere facility, excessive stress on liberty neglects the basic realities of human life, like hunger. Thirdly, perfect justice is overemphasized in Rawls theory. Sen thinks, that justice can be ensured only through rectification of injustice. Schopenhauer remarks "[ must include ways of judging how to reduce injustice and advance justice, rather than aiming only at the characterization of perfectly just societies."

This is the only way of treating equals equally. viii) Communitarians like Walzer, Sandel, McIntyre and others argue that Rawls ignores the basic values of community life. He religiously upholds the individual only and his liberty. Sandel rejects this lopsidedness and observes that 'shared self-understanding and affection' is the primal basis of just society. The identity of the individual and his/her pursuits in life and his/her political self are embedded in community values. 9.6 Conclusion In spite of these criticisms one can not deny the positive aspects of by Rawls an theory. He NSOU ? CC-PS-03 91 ? Initiates a path-breaking analysis of justice that has become the guiding principle of the egalitarians schools. He is indeed a great proponent of new egalitarianism. ? Develops analytic political thought consisting of experiment in metaphysical thinking with scientific rigour, pragmatic thinking like 'overlapping consensus'. ? Introduces a method, 'reflective equilibrium', of judging subjective and objective views of justice in such a way that stage of equilibrium can be achieved. ? Proposes for an admixture of constitutional rules, democratic order and market economy to build a humane and compassionate society for the betterment of the worst-off. ? Tries to combine leftist and right-liberalist agenda for constructing a just welfare society. ? Emerges as a new humane face of liberalism against utilitarian and communist campaigns. Simultaneously, Rawls is aware of the possibility of infringement of equal liberty by utilitarian principles of greatest good for greatest number. Principles of distributive justice are therefore best thought of as providing moral guidance for the political processes and structures that affect the distribution of benefits and burdens in societies, and this kind of moral guidance on distribution should be considered principles of distributive justice. It is as well an egalitarian theory of moral conduct that guides each and every individual in their mutual interaction. In 'Justice as Fairness: A Restatement', Rawls provides two basic principles of social justice, modified from his earlier work:i)

Social and economic inequalities are to satisfy two conditions: First, they are to be attached to offices and positions open to all under conditions of fair equality of opportunity, and second, they are to be to the greatest benefit of the least-advantaged members of society ( the difference principle). 9.7 Summing Up ? Distributive justice concerns with a fair distribution of resources. This distribution of resources follows the principles of equality, equity and the needs of people. NSOU ? CC-PS-03 92 ? Rawls argues against any differentiation on the basis of race, class, income or any other factors. ? Rawls's theory of justice is premised upon the need for equality. ? The basic principles of 'justice as fairness' are (a) the equality principles: '

It ensures that any departure from the principle of equality brings maximum benefit to the least advantaged. ? Rawls sets out his theory by placing individuals abstracted from their social and economic contexts behind what he calls the 'veil of ignorance'. Individuals behind this veil are unaware of who they are and what their interests, skills and needs are. They would have no particular vision of what constitutes a good life but would be interested in maximizing their primary goods. 9.8 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1) Elaborate the characteristics of Rawlsian theory of justice. 2) Discuss the principles of justice as visualized by Rawls. 3) Write an evaluative essay on Rawls' Distributive Justice. Define the concept of Global Justice. ? Describe how the idea of Global Justice developed. ? Differentiate between Global and International Justice. 10.2 Introduction The word justice indeed has wide or unfathomable philosophical implications. In a state, people often talk about just society, just order, or, to be specific, just human beings and a way of living entwined with justice. In reality, justice here implies certain geographical delimitations as it centers on the sovereign boundary and its inhabitants. The study of just world order implies an understanding of global justice. NSOU ? CC-PS-03 95 It is indeed an assiduous venture. However, the great men of all ages call for justice for the mankind and believe in cosmopolitanism – that is, all persons irrespective of any political boundary have moral values and all have moral obligations to each other. 10.3 Conceptualizing Global Justice Global justice simply pins on just world order, which is in reality a very complicated process. Yet, it tries to promote justice for the whole of mankind and its ecology – a widening of the scope of justice to the global level.

Although enlightened thinkers harp on global justice again and again, the state leaders and political theorists have left their slumber much later, from 1970s onwards, under pressure from different corners. More so, as the cry for a joint struggle of all is getting importance to create a just world. It endorses the moral value of the individual without considering their place of birth. Global justice concerns with the problems of global coexistence. In other words, global justice as an issue in political philosophy is concerned with the existing unfairness among the peoples of the world. For instance, global justice tries to show that violence and hunger are regularly meted out to the global poor of the so-called less developed countries. It further attempts to involve the citizens of the developed world to eradicate these problems as part of their moral commitment. Interestingly, the state leaders never treat individuals as morally equal, but the states have been regarded as the seat of morality. Charles Beitz (1975) observes that at present the questions of justice should not be delimited to the national level only and it is morally improper as well. The global institutions can act like the state-units. In a globalized world, these institutions can make laws, policies, and agreements and can collect taxes as well. It lays bare the narrowness of the national states in the globalized era. Thomas Pogge (1989), a German philosopher, also argues that global inequalities among the peoples call for a global approach to justice that can effectively counter these inequalities. Christian Barry raises the issue of unfair global institutional order which enriches elites in both developing and developed countries and continues the oppression and misery of the majority. In his opinion, ‘A fairly broad consensus has emerged about the characteristics of a minimally decent world. Indeed, during the past century, moral norms protecting the freedoms of the weak and vulnerable have become increasingly potent, condemning practices such as genocide, colonialism, autocracy, slavery, sexual violence against women, and economic structures that avoidably lead to widespread destitution. It is

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 96 also commonly held that our current world fails to meet these criteria. Even after a period of unprecedented opulence, more than 800 million people lack adequate nutrition and access to basic health services, and there are some 110 million child laborers under the age of 12, more than half of whom work in hazardous conditions.' Hence, when one starts to think of inequality and to raise questions of redistribution at the global level he/she is talking about global justice. In other words, it is an attempt to extend the discussion of social justice, which has traditionally assumed a politically bounded society, to the international level. So, global justice necessitates an assessment of the benefits and burdens of the structural relations and institutional arrangements that constitute and govern globalization. Besides, it can be interpreted 'as the way in which fundamental rights and duties are distributed globally and how the division of advantages and disadvantages from global 'cooperation,' 'competition,' 'engagements,' and 'activities,' 'events' and 'conditions' are determined'. There are diverse issues that tend to show the inevitability of global justice: global poverty,immigration (to affluent countries) and refugees, health, education, catastrophic anthropogenic climate change, unprecedented forms of terrorismand warfare,and yet critical dependence of the rich countries on the working class belonging to poor developing countries. All these developments further raise a series of questions such as: 'Is it ever permissible to engage in coercive military action for humanitarian purposes, such as to halt genocide or prevent large-scale violations of human rights? Can terrorism ever be justified? Should affluent developed countries open their borders more generously than they currently do to those from poor developing countries who would like to immigrate to them? Are our current global economic arrangements fair ones and if not, how should they be transformed? What responsibilities do we have to one another in a globalized, post-Westphalia world order? How should we allocate responsibilities for reducing global injustice in our world, such as in the case of distributing costs associated with addressing climate change?' The issues of global justice havetried to estimate the place and value of nationalism as well: 'Under what conditions should claims to national self-determination be granted substantial weight? When should self-determination yield to concern for protecting human rights? Are commitments to nationalism and global justice compatible? Is genuine democracy only possible at the state level or are there robust forms of democracy that are possible in a more globaized arena? How ideals of democracy are best incorporated into defensible global institutional arrangements? Is world justice possible without a world state?' All these questions are fundamental to basic principles of global justice. Political philosophers and state leaders must address these problems to secure justice for the peoples of the world.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 97 10.4 Global and International Justice Global justice is sometimes equated with internationalism. However, one should make a distinction between global and international justice. The major point of difference between these two concepts involves clarifying the entities among which justice is sought. In international justice, the nation or state is taken as the primary unit of concern and the focal point is justice among these actors. Contrarily, the basic theme of global justice theorists is not to seek justice between states or nations but justice among human beings living in these states. Global justice inquiries take individual human beings as the primary unit of concern and try to give an account of what fairness among such agents involves. There are a range of actions that cut across states or involve different agents, relationships, and structures that might be invisible in an inquiry seeking justice among states exclusively. In the opinion of political theorists, 'many different kinds of interactions are not circumscribed by state membership and yet can importantly affect human beings' most fundamental interests, so asking the question about what individual human beings owe one another often uncovers significant neglected features of relationships and structures that are of normative concern. Global justice analyses are not precluded from yielding state- level obligations; indeed, they typically do. However, they consider a wider array of possible agents and organizations that might have duties as well.' One advantage of global justice inquiries is that none is forced to take states as a fixed constraint and so one can judge a range of relevant relationships, capacities and roles that also constitute our interactions and might be relevant to how he/she ought to conceptualize global responsibilities. The continuous expansion of transnational actors, their rules and their systematic activities significantly influence the domestic life of the states. These developments explain the process of transition from international to global justice and the way for explanatory and moral theorizing. It is not only a terminological shift but it should be regarded as a sign of happenings across national borders unthinkable in the previous decades. It further points to the blurring of boundary of national and international realms. This on-going process again diminishes the traditional role of nation states as moral guardians of the inhabitants. So, in such a situation the decisions taken by state leaders cannot simply be decisions of that state as it might have been formulated under guidance of outside influences and it would have a cross border effect in practice. At the same time the prospect and challenges of a policy can be both 'global' and 'local' and the solution it prescribes may reflect common values and being guided by different designs and NSOU ? CC-PS-03 98 dynamics. So, creating a just society requires dexterous maneuvering of variety of actors and intertwined issues like, private and public, markets and power. On a different note, some scholars observe that global justice is both an aim and a concept including certain important legal elements within it. As an aim, it portrays a society in which political shortcomings and economic deficiencies tend to be overcome and greater justice, equality of opportunity and greater checks on power are upheld. So far as legal elements are concerned there should be a set of rules to uphold civil rights as well as maintenance of open markets and efficient sharing of resources including well-oiled infrastructures to interlink different layers of society. However, everything should be transparent and not beyond scrutiny.

10.5 Cosmopolitanism and Global Justice Global justice has an umbilical link with cosmopolitanism. While nationalists believe in sovereignty of a nation and its people, cosmopolitans instead give emphasis on global citizenship. It suggests that the earthlings have moral responsibility to ensure the wellbeing of citizens of the world. Following the Greek tradition, the Stoicism for example, cosmopolitans campaign for universal brotherhood and 'citizenship of the world'. The peoples of this world are relatives to each other barring the nature of detachment standing in between them.

Cosmopolitanism thus sticks to the multicultural identity of individuals and it implies certain responsibilities as well. As a member of the global community, he/ she has responsibility to other members of the same community – they are accountable to each other for creating a world, which would be habitable to all irrespective of creed, colour, class, caste and gender. So, they 'believe that all individual human beings have equal moral worth and that the strength of our moral obligations to others is not importantly diminished by national border'. Obligations to the world community are no less important than local obligations. In other words, one should not disregard the distant brotherhood in the name of nationhood. Tagore was an ardent supporter of such cosmopolitan views. Martha Nussbaum, a renowned scholar of this age, claims that allegiance 'to the worldwide community of human beings' should be the primary allegiance for all. 10.6 John Rawls and Global Justice John Rawls wrote 'A Theory of Justice' (1971) with reference to sovereign states. The international set-up consisting of state-units could not be a proper place for

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 99 application of distributive justice. However, 'The Law of Peoples' (1999), written by Rawls, gives strong impetus to develop different approaches to global justice. Charles Beitz and Thomas Pogge, for instance, observe that the reasoning of two Rawlsian principles, the difference principle and principle of fair equality and of opportunity, could easily be applied in a global context. Rawls disagrees and suggests that difference principle might be a better option for conceptualizing global justice. Before delving into the Rawls' concept of global justice, the word 'people' needs clarification. Rawls gives an inclusive view of people. A 'people' denotes a group of persons with common culture, tradition, and history and world views. They have a State or may not have State but still possess an exclusive identity of their own. So, Rawls conceptualizes people in a much broader sense in his discussion of global justice. This is indeed a positive step to justice for all peoples. He again uses a specific term 'well-ordered' peoples to define the nature of peoples of the world: the liberal peoples and 'decent non-liberal people. By decency he means (a) the social system should be based on peace and it respects others; (b) it has a system of law and idea of justice that protect basic human rights for all : right to life, right to liberty, right to personal property and right to formal equality ('the similar cases be treated similarly'); (c) to the legal professionals, judges and associates, law is an embodiment of justice enriched with common good and (d) there must be 'decent consultation hierarchy', that is, the decent human beings must be committed to the law of peoples. In accordance with this schema in mind, he tries to draw certain principles in The Law of Peoples and thinks all well-ordered peoples would follow it in their interactions. It certainly strengthens the base of global justice : Eight Principles of Interactions 1. Peoples are free and independent, and their freedom and independence are to be respected by other peoples. 2. Peoples are to observe treaties and undertakings. 3. Peoples are equal and are parties to the agreements that bind them. 4. Peoples are to observe a duty of a duty of non-intervention. 5. Peoples have the right to self-defense but no right to instigate war for reasons other than self-defense. 6. Peoples are to honour human rights. 7. Peoples are to observe certain specified restrictions in the conduct of war. 8. Peoples have a duty to assist other people living under unfavorable conditions that NSOU ? CC-PS-03 100 prevent their having a just or decent political and social regime. (

McKinon, 2009) He also hopes that both liberals and decent non-liberals will use these principles for interactions on a global scale. He feels that three organizations are also required to confirm mutual relations and realization of global justice: organization to secure fair trade among peoples, organization to facilitate peoples to borrow from cooperative banks and organization to play the role of a confederation of peoples, like UNO. For ensuring global justice in an unequal state-system, Rawls proposes the 'duty of assistance'. There is no doubt that the state-units of this globe are uneven in terms of development: while one is developed and strong the others are less developed and weak. Rawls observes, "I believe that the causes of the wealth of a people and the forms it takes lie in their political culture and in the religious, philosophical, and moral traditions that support the basic structure of their political and social institutions, as well as in the industriousness and cooperative talents of its members, all supported by their political virtue." So, to Rawls, it is as if a natural propensity found in some states but this 'lack of political and cultural traditions, the human capital and know-how, and, often, the material and technological resources needed to be well-ordered.' In such case, the well-ordered people should assist these "burdened societies" till their transformation into well-ordered societies. He further believes that the global difference principle cannot be applied across the states marked with different stages of development. In spite of this deft presentation of justice in the global context, Rawls views his Law of Peoples as a 'realistic utopia' (Kazakistan) – it is not real but reflection of a variety of real life: agreements and disagreements, for instance. He applies the 'original positions' in two stages. At first, the concerned peoples should conclude fair terms of cooperation to control the basic structure of society. In the second stage, the representatives of liberal peoples under the veil of ignorance (having no knowledge of their territory and power) enact the foreign policy of their choice that tolerates states like 'Kazakistan'. 10.7 Critique of Rawls View 'The Law of Peoples' is subject to certain criticisms. To the critics, Rawls' view suffers from serious ignorance, wrong presumption and grave failure. In fact, the main shortcomings of the liberal ideology and its world view debilitate the base logic of Rawls. Besides, the discourse, since its inception, embedded in The Law of Peoples faces dithering and doubts on the part of Rawls himself. In his view, there is no such thing as international distributive justice.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 101 The criticisms are : ? Rawls fails to understand the network of relationships among peoples, individuals and states in the world arena in its current dimensions. He thinks of states as independent units so they are qualified for the well-being of its people. In practice, states in this age are interdependent units and they influence each other by their deeds. ? Linking the levels of wealth and prosperity with the political culture and tradition, as Rawls does, cannot be a rationale to estimate the performance of states. The global economic order at present is controlled by powerful developed countries. It does naturally serve the interests of these wealthy states rather than the interests of the poverty-ridden states. The affluent states hardly do anything to remove the misery of poor developing countries. Thomas Pogge elaborates this point to a great extent. In his opinion, International agreements and institutions often jeopardize the interests of poor states in general and global justice in particular. He identifies, for example, two international protocols, international borrowing privilege and international resource privilege, for dissection. Internationally recognized legitimate government, in spite of its corrupt and anti-democratic practices, can a) borrow money on behalf of the country and repay the debts as per rules and b) dispose of country's resources through internationally recognized means. However, these privileges are beneficial only to the rulers of wealthy developed states and the rulers and elites of the non-affluent states. In fact, an unhealthy nexus has developed between these two ruling sections consisting of state elites, foreign rulers and business corporations. In either way, it imposes unjust world order on the worst off and wealthy states are benefiting from such injustice. ? Rawls wrongly assumes that political communities are bounded and separate communities. In the present international system, nothing will be a closed system – policy of the states may be reconstructed by international factors. Significant collective problems do have repercussions in the global arena. Decisions and actions of one state or few states may affect state-units. Infectious diseases like Covid-19, AIDS, SARS are global problems, which need global cooperation. ? The system of global cooperation in reality ensures domination and coercion. The states now in a sense have become global or transnational in terms of trade, production, labor, environmental pollution, scarce resources, institutions, treaties, technologies, migration, cooperation, culture and so on. Forst opines, NSOU ? CC-PS-03 102 "For once one takes the history and concrete character of these multiple relations into account, it is a euphemism to refer to them as 'cooperation' or 'interdependence' without further qualification, since such terms imply relations of reciprocity that are obviously absent. Rather, what emerges is a complex system of one-sided or largely coerced cooperation and dependency rather than interdependence. In other words, one sees a context of force and domination." This system should be transformed into a system of fair cooperation for attaining global justice. ? Rawls' notion of people is also criticized. He tries to understand people distinctively with reference to the boundaries of states. However, commonalities like shared history, ethnicity, culture and language may not match well with the state borders. National boundaries do not consist of single people and each individual may have multiple loyalties. ? There are other charges as well against Rawls' reasoning. Rawls denies more socio-economic equality like 'a higher standard of living' for people. In his view, the representatives of people are rather interested in the justice of domestic institutions. Factually, global inequality has a negative effect on these domestic institutions. As a matter of fact, peoples claim for equality not only at the domestic level but also on the global level. ? It is, again, not very clear why decent hierarchical societies will be content with an abridged list of human rights offered by Rawls. The liberals also may want more rights than those included in the Eight Principles. Further, it is also not justified to create a politically neutral Law of Peoples that has been taken to be accepted by liberals and non-liberals. ? According to some scholars, like Kuper, Rawls in the process of argument for pluralism of states denies essential pluralism of individuals. In other words, he is less sensitive to individuals within states. So, his greater emphasis on the rights of states paves the way for unequal treatment of citizens. ? Rawls also supports tolerance to unjust regimes in his Law of Peoples in the name of stability. Contrarily, his scheme fails to support cooperative arrangements and relations between peoples. So, he stands far away from the salient reality of global society. ? Rawls is also indifferent to democratic rights. Amartya Sen observes that non-democratic regimes adversely affect the well-being and human rights of the ruled. Sen further advocates that democracy and rights are not parts of Western culture alone, these are found in the cultures and traditions non-Western hemisphere of the globe.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 103 10.8 Evaluation of Global Justice As an idea Global Justice raises controversy. To some theorists, justice cannot be applicable in the global realm. David Miller (2007) suggests that sovereign borders are more important than cosmopolitan global justice. He argues that due to national differences on conceptions of what is 'good' or 'right', the applicability of global justice can be questioned. Further, principles of justice require a common history and culture that is not possible in global context. For Thomas Nagel (2005) and Michael Blake (2001), in absence of the backing of powerful global institutions having power over individuals and states, discussions about global principles of justice is a futile exercise. Iris Marion Young (2011) considers cosmopolitanism and global justice as a Western-centric ideals that does not have any universal appeal indeed. Objections are again raised against the moral approach to global justice: a) the global institutional framework cannot be unjust because its participants have consented to and b) it cannot be wrong for the governments of the rich countries to draw and impose the present global order because their primary responsibility is to their own people, not to peoples of other countries. However, these criticisms cannot diminish the importance of global justice. It has received significant attention from political philosophy in recent years due to the rise of globalization as well as the critical rise of poverty at the global level. Again, there are different conceptions of global justice like the causal and moral analysis of the global institutional order against the backdrop of its feasible and reachable alternatives. However, beyond these differences, global justice tries to analyze: how increasing incidence of violence and unbridled poverty, high rate of mortality and morbidity might be checked. In practice, these problems cannot be solved merely through better government behavior, internally and internationally, but more efficiently through global institutional reforms. Scholars observe, 'The importance of this global justice approach reaches well beyond philosophy. It is crucial for enabling ordinary citizens — in developed countries especially — to come to an adequate understanding of their moral situation and responsibilities. And it is very helpful also for pushing social scientists and development economists especially, to overcome their bias toward explanatory nationalism, their tendency to explain poverty and hunger exclusively in terms of causal factors that are domestic to the societies in which they occur.'

10.9 Conclusion Elimination of global injustice is an essential condition for the realisation of justice within the state. A state that is subjected to unequal and exploitative NSOU ? CC-PS-03 104 international trade and constrained by unjust policies of global institutions, can not institutionalize processes and institutions that deliver justice. If we concur with the view that democracy is based upon the assumption that all citizen possess equal moral worth, then persons whose moral status has been compromised by poverty illhealth and illiteracy, must approach the system as the bearer of a right that has been denied to them. 10.10 Summing Up ? Global justice draws the attention of political philosophers and theorists in the backdrop of increasing unfairness in the world in the second half of the 20th century. ? In fact, global issues like health, education, climate change, immigration, drug trafficking, terrorism, even the management of present pandemic force academics and political leaders to ponder over the inevitability of global justice. ? Global justice is often associated with international justice. But there are differences between the two concepts. In international justice the state is considered as the primary unit of concern in understanding justice, or to be specific, the just relations among the states. Global justice, however, gives emphasis on justice among human beings living in these state units. ? In his masterpiece, 'A Theory of Justice' John Rawls suggests that under controlled conditions rational human beings would choose basic principles of distributive justice. ? In 'The Law of peoples' Rawls promotes different approach to global justice. Rawls mentions the following principles for strengthening the base of global justice: 1) Freedom and independence are to be respected by other people. 2) People are to observe treatise; 3) People are equal; 4) People should follow the principle of intervention; 5) People have the right to self-defense; 6) People are to honour human rights; 7) People should follow some restrictions; 8) People should assist other people.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 108 11.2 Introduction Rights are considered vital to any civilization as they are the established pillars of every culture, tradition and society. We have witnessed the world getting engaged in various kinds of social conflicts which are all rooted in the claiming of individual and collective rights. According to the Stanford Encyclopaedia of Philosophy, "rights structure the form of governments, the content of laws and the shape of morality as it is currently perceived". Every lawful government and its constitution is obligated to serve its citizens and bestow them with different kinds of rights. Politics plays an important role in developing or recognizing the above rights. Political orientation or belief is an important determinant factor in understanding the concept of Rights. Rights about particular issues or particular groups, are often areas of special concern and they become critical when they come in conflict with each other. 11.3 Meaning In an organized society, the common purpose of living well brings individuals under a collective umbrella. This purpose is fulfilled only by the favourable conditions for the development of the personality of the human being. It is impossible to be good citizen in a society in which there is usually no opportunity to transform one's potentiality into reality. It is an indispensable prerequisite to have at least a few opportunities favourable to the realization of human personality. For example, it is not possible for a human being to develop his own personality without the freedom of expression. This recognition is essential to the wellbeing of the individual. The idea of rights is not a static idea. It is a dynamic concept with. For example, at the beginning of the industrial expansion, free use of the property rights of the people was recognized. But with its inherent evil effect, the expansion of the capitalist industry created a situation in which it was no longer possible to protect this free right. Then, in the middle of the twentieth century, the right of property in all the countries was restricted. Due to such a constant flux of social life, it is not possible to compose a perpetual list of rights. It is possible to have rights only in those states

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 109 where freedom and equality are present. Without freedom, it is not possible for people to protect their rights and interests. Only democratic system arising out of periodic elections and presence of alternative political parties can ensure human rights. Thus rights are the sum total of these conditions which ensure development of individual personality. But rights in its proper sense are never rights unless they are recognised by the state. Without equality, there will be discrimination. In that case the significance of the rights will be completely lost. Therefore, the level of entitlement is dependent on the nature of the political system. In a totalitarian state, where the distinction between the state and the administration is unclear and where there is hardly any political competition and bargaining, the right is left to the whims of the ruler. Such a state does not guarantee the real rights to its citizens. In a democratic state, the existence of alternative political parties, independent media, and democratic institutions such as the judiciary constitutional rights. 11.4 Features of Rights Some of the important features of rights that can be discussed are: 1) Rights are the means of personality development : The rights are all the conditions that a human being needs in order to enrich his personality. Rights are socially desirable conditions. 2) The concept of rights is socially dependent : Since people enjoy rights as social beings, they are obliged to observe fundamental rules of social life. In the process of enjoying rights individual must be aware of similar rights of others. 3) Rights are not always a state centric : Rights are an essential part of a person. What he will do for his survival depends entirely on himself.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 110 4) Rights are a legal concept : The main task of the state is to create conditions necessary for so that the development of individual personality. Bosanquet says a right is a claim recognized by society and enforced by the state. How citizens enjoy their rights depends entirely on state and state laws. 5) Rights are dynamic in nature: The concept of rights is not Fixed. Society is dynamic new issues are emerging. From this perspective rights have a tendency to grow. In the process of socio-economic development individuals raise new demands and these demands when recognised by the state become rights. Right to work, right to leisure, right to strike etc. are such rights. 6) Rights are not absolute. Rights are correlative with duties. 11.5 Historical Origin of Rights Though modern historians consider "Magna Carta" of 1521 as the historical beginning of human rights, but its real origin goes back to 539 B.C. when Cyrus, the great king of ancient Persia conquered the city of Babylon in order to free all slaves and asked them to choose their own religion and race. The idea of human rights quickly spread from Babylon to many nations especially in India, Greece and eventually Rome where the concept of natural law had significant influence. The Constitution of Medina (622 AD; Arabia) contained a number of rights for the Muslim, Jewish, camp followers and "believers" of Medina. Legal documents asserting individual rights, such as the Magna Carta (1215), the Petition of Right (1628), the US Constitution (1787), the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen (1789), and the US Bill of Rights (1791) are the written precursors to many rights individuals enjoy today. The Magna Carta, or "Great Charter," is arguably the most important historical development that led to the rule of constitutional law. In 1215, after King John of England violated a number of ancient laws and customs by which England was

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 111 governed, his subjects forced him to sign the Magna Carta. Among them was the right of the church to be free from governmental interference, the rights of all free citizens to own and inherit property and to be protected from excessive taxes. It established the right of widows who own property to choose not to remarry, and established principles of due process and equality before the law. It also contained provisions forbidding bribery and official misconduct. The Magna Carta was a crucial defining moment in the fight to attain freedom. Another breakthrough in the development of rights was the Petition of Right, adopted in 1628 by the English Parliament and sent to Charles I as a statement of civil liberties. It asserted four principles: 1. No taxes can be levied without consent of the Parliament. 2. No subject can be imprisoned without proper reason (reaffirmation of the right of habeas corpus). 3. No soldiers can be quartered in the dwelling house of the subjects. 4. Martial law can not be used in time of peace. In 1789, the people of France brought about the abolition of the absolute monarchy and set the stage for the establishment of the first French Republic. The Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen was adopted by the National Constituent Assembly.

The Declaration decrees that all inhabitants are to be guaranteed the rights of "liberty, property, security, and resistance to oppression." It viewed law as an "expression of the general will", intended to promote equality of rights and to forbid "only actions harmful to the society." By 1948, the United Nation under the dynamic chairmanship of Eleanor Roosevelt, a human rights winner in her own right and the United States delegate to the commission in the UN, prepared the draft of the document that became the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It was accepted by the United Nations on December 10, 1948. The Member States of the United Nations promised to work together to codify the declaration into a single document. As a result, many of these rights, in various forms, are part of the constitutional laws of democratic nations in the present day world.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 112 11.6 Theories of Rights There are compelling theories of rights offered by several theorists. 11.6.1 Theory of Natural Rights Natural rights are natural claims as they come as gifts of nature and are not dependent on any authority. These rights were available to individuals in the state of nature. This theory is mainly linked with two thinkers Hobbes and Locke, who were supported. by Spinoza, Jefferson and Blackstone. Later Rawls and Nozick employed this theory. Though Hobbes started as an individualist where he was promoting individual rights, however, he ended up being absolutist in the sense that he advocated surrendering all these rights as a necessary condition for the establishment of government. It was Locke who strongly championed the natural rights by recognising individuals right to resistance if the authority fails to protect individual right to life, liberty property. Two contemporary theorists Rawls and Nozick based their theory of rights on social contract and natural rights. For Rawls what is relevant for justice is the individual's means to pursue their own ends and to live whatever good life they choose for themselves. Nozick believes that individual rights especially property rights is derived from the principle of natural right of self ownership. 11.6.2 Utilitarianism According to the utilitarians, a just action relative to all other possible actions, maximises utility or "the good" . This is the utility principle. Utilitarianism is solely consequentialist; the justice or injustice of an action or state of affairs is determined exclusively by the consequences it brings about. If an action maximises utility, it is just. On this account, therefore, rights are purely instrumental. Utilitarian will honour a right if and only if it will lead to the maximisation of utility. This statement also indicates the limits of all rights. If the exercise of a particular will not maximise utility, the utilitarian is obligated to violate that person's rights for the sake of utility.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 113 11.6.3 Idealist Theory of Rights The idealistic, theory defines a right as that 'which is really necessary to the maintenance of material conditions essential to the development and perfection of human personality. In simple words, it means 'that without rights no man can become the best that he is capable of becoming. Thus, it is the right and duty of every human being to develop his potentiality. Hence, a right is a claim based on the rational will of man, and, for this reason they are first recognized by the society and then translated into law by the state.

Barker rightly says, "Human consciousness postulates liberty; liberty involves right; rights demand the state". Thus, the idealistic theory looks at rights from a highly moral point of view. Rights are rooted in the mind of man. They are powers granted to him by the community in order that he with others may realize a common good of which his good is an intrinsic part.

11.6.4 Theory of moral-legal rights Along with natural rights, moral recognition is equally important. This gets reflected in the ideas of Kant, Laski and Barker. This theory is concerned not only with the source but also the content of rights. Legal rights are concerned only with the recognition of states, whereas the moral rights are concerned with moral content.

- ? Kantianism Kant's political philosophy is concerned with the reciprocal acknowledgment in one another's valid claims to freedom of choice and action
- Kant's political morality is a morality of external legislation. Other's valid freedom claims restricts one's freedom of choice and action.
- ? Laski's Theory of Rights: Laski describes

SA

MA POLITICS SEM 2 Political theory 2.pdf (D118114893)

rights as "those conditions of social life without which no man can seek, in general, to be himself at his best".

Laski calls rights as conditions of social life. Right is a social concept and deeply linked with social life. The essentiality of rights is established by the fact that individuals claim them for the development of their best self. He places rights, individuals and state on the same board in the sense that they cannot be separated from each other and there is no antagonism between them. Laski recommends the long-cherished view that the state has a very important role to play in the realisation and, before that, recognition of human rights.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 114 Mere recognition, moreover, is not sufficient for the exercise of rights. The state must, through law and institutions, implement the rights. The most significant part of Laski's theory is the functional aspect of rights. It emphasizes on the relation between right and duty. He stated that Rights are correlative to functions. The functional theory emphasizes that an individual is entitled to claim rights only when he performs duty otherwise the claim or demand for right cannot be entertained.

- ? Barker's Theory of Right: Barker's view is theoretically similar to Laski. Though both are liberal philosophers, yet Barker has a clear bias to idealism. The main purpose of political organisation, called state, is to see that the personality of the individual gets ample scope for development. It is the duty of the state to guarantee and secure the conditions essential for that objective. These secured and guaranteed conditions are called rights. Individual's personality cannot develop automatically or under most adverse or antagonistic environment. Development of personality requires favourable conditions and these are to be guaranteed by the state through the enactment of law.
- Barker also discusses the moral aspect of rights. He says, that law of the state helps individuals to secure rights. But rights are claims and the origin is the individual himself. The individual is a moral person and it is his determination that he will develop his moral personality through the rights. His purpose is not to inflict any harm upon the society.

11.6.5 Theory of Historical Rights Historical Rights are individual and collective rights based on traditions, customs, which are based on historical and evolutionary grounds. Thinkers like Burke, Maine and MacIver believe that laws have historical roots based on usages and customs. For example, Magna Carta, Bill of Rights etc have a historical ground and eventually became legal rights. According to this theory, it is history which is the basis of rights. Rights are crystallization of customs and usages which in course of time become rights.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 115 11.7 Conclusion Thus in conclusion we can say that the specific enumeration of rights has differed greatly in different periods of history. In many cases, the system of rights promulgated by one group has come into sharp and bitter conflict with that of other groups. In the political sphere, it has been seen that a political right in one area has been recognised whereas the same right has been denied in another place. There are constitutional provisions which enshrine some legal rights whereas there are no mention of such rights in another state. Historically, we have witnessed many notions of rights as authoritarian and hierarchical, with different people granted different rights, and some having more rights than others. In contrast to this, the modern conceptions of rights have emphasized liberty and equality as among the most important aspects of rights, as upheld by the American and French Revolutions.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 119 12.1 Objective ? The basic objective of this unit is to acquaint students with different broad and the sub-categories of rights. 12.2 Introduction Rights are considered fundamental to any civilization as they are the established pillars of every culture, tradition and society. We have witnessed the world getting engaged in various kinds of social conflicts which are all rooted in the claiming of individual and collective rights. There are various kinds of rights, some are backed by law whereas others are morally established. Broadly speaking there are three kinds of rights – Natural, Moral and Legal-which have been elaborately discussed in the following sections. 12.3 Types of Right We shall now discuss the types of rights in detail. 12.3.1 Natural Rights Natural rights are those that goes beyond the boundaries of beliefs, laws, customs, and not related to any particular culture, tradition or government. Consequently, they are universal and inalienable and are closely related to the concept of natural laws. Many thinkers have faith in natural rights. They stated that people have inherent rights Natural rights are parts of human nature and reason. Supporters of this view maintain that an individual enters into society with certain basic rights and that no government can deny these rights. Critics argue that the concept of natural rights is unreal. Rights are the products of social living. These rights can be enjoyed only in a society. Rights have behind them the recognition of society as common claims for development, and that is why the state protects these rights.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 120 12.3.2 Moral Rights The basis of moral rights is individual's ethical consciousness and conscience. They are claims based on the moral code of the society. However, the state does not guarantee the enjoyment of these moral rights. Moral rights include parents claim to be looked after during old age by their sons and daughters. 12.3.3 Legal Rights The rights that a citizen enjoys are privileges recognized and authorized by the state. Each state makes laws to remedy any violation of legal rights. For example, in a state every citizen has a legitimate right to freedom of speech expression.. If a citizen interferes with the privilege of another citizen, the state will take necessary steps to enforce the rights. Legal rights can be divided into Civil and Political rights: 12.3.3.1 Civil Rights : Civil rights are those rights which ensure, a decent civil life for the individual. These rights are essential to a civilized life. All these rights ensure mental and spiritual development of the people. In most states these rights are embodied in a constitutional document, and in almost all modern states there is a detailed mechanism to protect citizens from the possibility of violation of civil rights by individuals or administrations. Freedom of speech and expression, freedom of association, right to property, right to contract are some important civil rights. Civil rights are indispensable condition for the development of the individual self. These rights are universal possession of the citizen. Modern states guarantee these rights to all without any discrimination on the ground of caste, class, creed, religion or sex. 12.3.3.1.A Right to Life : This right is the most basic claim in the sense that it is the basis of other rights. It is not possible to enjoy rights without of life. The right to life is intimately linked to the right to protection from any attack inside or external aggression. Every civilized state has a very comprehensive system to protect each of its members. The right to use force to defend one self against an attack also falls within this right. 12.3.3.1.B Right to Freedom : This right entitles every citizen to exercise his or her basic mental or physical NSOU ? CC-PS-03 121 ability without interruption or hindrance. This right includes freedom of speech and expression, assembly, association or union, movement, residence, to practice any occupation and freedom from arbitrary arrest. 12.3.3.1.C Right to Education : At present, a comprehensive and universal education plan is needed to understand the modern political institutions that are built upon complex industrial civilization. Without this understanding, it is not possible for an individual to play his role as a citizen. The right to education has been recognised as a fundamental right in every modern state. A right to free and compulsory primary education for all and an obligation to develop equitable access to secondary and higher education is necessary to create a free and open society. 12.3.3.1.D Property Rights : This right refers to the free enjoyment of property and its use. This right also includes the right to gift property to someone or to donate it by will. 12.3.3.1.E Right to Contract : According to this right, every citizen has the right to enter into an independent agreement with anyone else. This right is the basis of modern independent society. Under state laws both sides are bound by the terms of the contract. 12.3.3.1.F Right to Religion : At present, in secular states, the right of every citizen to practice any rituals and ceremonies of his choice is a fundamental right of every citizen. The state maintains neutrality on all matters of religion and leaves it to the wishes and preferences of the individual. 12.3.3.1.G Right to Freedom of Thought and Opinion : The right to think is the cornerstone of democracy. This fact has been proved by Socrates through his work and life experience. According to Professor Barry, this right is an essential prerequisite for mental and moral progress. This right is an indicator of the freedom of expression that once again sets the standard for freedom NSOU ? CC-PS-03 122 of speech and the media. Freedom of expression is essential for the development of human personality. 12.3.3.1.H Right to Freedom to Form Associations : Modern society seems like a net network of various associations. Groups or associations are the focal point of contemporary society. In the present social situation, it is not possible for an isolated individual to protect himself from attacks of various types of socio-political situations. With a handful of strongly organized groups, he can procure the collective power necessary to ensure his own security and clearly declare his personal views and needs. 12.3.3.1. I Right to Equality : All citizens are equal in the eyes of the law. This right prevents the state from discriminating between citizens on the basis of race, faith, caste, wealth or gender. 12.3.3.1.J Economic Rights : The nineteenth-century eminent socialist thinker Louis Blanc is perhaps the first person to claim constitutional recognition for the right to work. Since then the movement for recognition of this right continued to gain momentum in every state. But even after passing of so many years, this right has not been recognised in most states. 12.3.3.2 Political Rights : All rights which guarantee citizens' participation in the exercise of the sovereign power of the state, are regarded as political rights. The right to vote and the right to form political associations are two important political rights. The people choose the government through the exercise of political rights. Political rights are the cornerstone of democratic governance. Following are the basic political rights of citizen: ? Right to vote; ? The right to contest the election ? The right to public office and ? Right to form and join political associations

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 123 Positive Rights : Positive rights are rights that oblige other people or the state to do something for perfect enjoyment of our rights. For example the right to health, basic subsistence etc. positive rights impose obligation to do something. Negative Rights : Negative rights are rights that indicate non-interference from the society at large. For example, right to life, liberty, property etc. 12.4 Conclusion To summarize, rights are regarded as central to civilization, being observed as established pillars of society and culture. Natural rights are those that are not dependent on the laws or customs of any particular culture or government, and so are universal and inalienable. Natural rights cannot be repealed by human laws, though one can forfeit their enforcement through one's actions, such as by violating someone else's rights. On the other hand, NSOU ? CC-PS-03 126 13.2 Introduction It was once the case that rights were always associated with domestic legal and political systems. In the last half century a complex network of international law and practice has grown up around the idea that the individual possesses rights by virtue of being human. The philosophy of human rights addresses questions about the existence, content, nature and justification of human rights. 13.3 Meaning of Human Rights Human rights refer to inherent, universal rights of human beings regardless of jurisdiction, ethnicity, nationality or sex. These are rights to which people are entitled by virtue of being human. The idea of human rights originated from the philosophical idea of natural rights. Human rights are universal in the sense that they belong to all humans. They are fundamental in the sense that they are inalienable. 13.4 Features of Human Rights 1. Human Rights are Inalienable: Human rights are inherent rights of the individuals irrespective of their caste, creed, religion, sex and nationality. 2. Human Rights are essential and necessary: Human rights are needed to ensure the moral, physical, social and spiritual welfare of an individual. Human rights are also essential as they provide suitable conditions for material and moral upliftment of the people. 3. Human Rights are associated with human dignity. 4. Human Rights are irrevocable: Human rights are irrevocable as they cannot be taken away by any power or authority because these rights originate with the social nature of man in the society. They belong to a person simply because he is a human being. As such human rights are moral rights. 5. Human Rights are essential for the fulfilment of purpose of life: The phrase "human right" is applied to those conditions which are essential for the fulfilment of this purpose.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 127 6. Human Rights are Universal: Human rights are not the sole possession of any privileged class of people. Human rights are universal in nature, without exception. The values such as divinity, dignity and equality form the basis of these rights. 7. Human Rights are never absolute: Man is a social animal and he lives in a civic society, which always put certain limitations on the enjoyment of his rights and freedoms. Human rights as such are those limited powers or claims, which are contributory to the common good and which are recognized and guaranteed by the State, through its laws. As such each right has certain limitations. 8. Human Rights are Dynamic: Human rights are not stationary, they are dynamic. Human rights go on expanding with socio-economic, cultural and political developments. 9. Human Rights limits state power: Human rights imply that every individual has legitimate claims upon his or her society. So human rights limit the state's power. These may be in the form of negative restrictions on the powers of the State, preventing it from violating the inalienable freedoms of the individuals, or in the nature of demands on the State. 13.5 History of the development of the concept of Human Rights The origin of thinking about human rights can be traced to two features of medieval political and intellectual life: the doctrine of natural law and the political practice of extracting charter of liberties, Natural law generates universal rights and duties, while a charter confers local and particular liberties. Magna Carta came into effect in 1215 to protect human rights in England. Magna Carta still forms an important symbols of liberty today, often cited by politician and campaigners and is still held in great respect by the British and American legal communities. France's autocratic monarchy collapsed during the French Revolution of 1789. The new French bourgeoisie wanted to constitute a representative legislature by drafting a constitution In the Constituent Assembly a document was accepted which is known as Declaration of the Right of Man and Citizen.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 128 The 1789 Declaration, together with the 1215 Magna Carta, the 1689 English Bill of Rights, the 1776 US Declaration of Independence and the 1789 US Bill of Rights, inspired in large part the 1945 UN Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The 1789 declaration stated that rights are 'natural, inalienable and sacred'. The declaration mentioned the principle of popular sovereignty. It stated that all the citizens, being equal in the eyes of the law have equal access to all public dignities, places and employment according to their capacity and without distinction, other than that of their virtues and of their talents. Philosophers such as Locke, Rousseau, Thomas Paine, John Stuart Mill expanded on the theme of universality of rights during the 17th, 18th and 19th centuries. Mary Wollstonecraft in her book A Vindication of the Rights of Women contributed a in the achievement of women's rights. The US Declaration of Independence of 1776 states that all men have the right to life, liberty and pursuit of happiness. On the basis of this declaration American Bill of Rights was written. Following the American and French example of upholding human rights, other countries started adopting them in their respective countries namely Netherlands (1798), Sweden (1809), Spain (1812), Norway (1814), Belgium (1831), Siberia (1842) etc. The development and spread of socialism in the nineteenth century made the human rights concept more pervasive. In 1816-17, students from different universities in Germany were demanding freedom of expression and other freedoms. During that time, European women did not have voting rights. There was widespread discrimination between women and men. No European state recognized the right to form a trade union until the beginning of this century. Thus with the rise of human rights movement workers in Britain and France started demanding the right to form trade unions. In 1834, the London Working Association was formed and acquired the right to unite. In 1838, the working class of England submitted a proposal demanding some benefits for them. This is known as the Chartist movement. During the early twentieth century, International Labour Organization became prominent to protect workers from discrimination and adopted policies to protect and promote the rights of workers. It was only after the Declaration of International Human Rights that the human rights and civil rights movement gained popularity in various parts of the world. When the United NSOU ? CC-PS-03 129 States carried out the genocide in Vietnam in 1950s and 1960s, Amnesty International sent investigators to Vietnam to investigate. In addition to this organization, other Human Rights Organizations, such as Asia Watch, Human Rights Watch are playing important role in protecting human rights.

13.6 Theories of Human Rights

Following are some of the theories of human rights.

- ? Liberal theory of rights : Locke's advocacy of rights to life, liberty and property of individuals form the basis of the first generation rights for the citizens.
- ? Welfare theory of positive rights proposes rights which are social and economic in nature, which are concerned with the welfare of the people. They belong to the second generation rights.
- ? Cultural Relativist theory of rights and Multicultural theory of rights recognises the cultural specificity of the different societies and groups and of course their protection. Eg: advocacy of Asian values against western values.
- ? Communitarian theory of rights : Theorists like Michael Sandel, Charles Taylor, Walzer have argued that each individual develops an identity as a member of the community. Communitarians refuse to recognise independent rights of the individual.
- ? Feminist theory of rights : Feminists by criticising the mainstream human rights discourse, argue that the women's rights par se has been ignored and not recognised in the human discourse doctrine. The discourse reflects male domination and there are not enough spaces for women's issues.
- ? Marxian theory of rights : It is a known fact that Marx neither formulated a theory of state nor of rights. He believed that natural theory of rights is based on private property ownership which invariably are the rights of the bourgeoisie. Marxists believe that in a class divided society one class exploits the other through the instrument of state. As such rights belong only to one class – the dominant class.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 130 13.7 Globalization and Human Rights Globalization has adversely affected the human rights situation in different parts of the world. IMF structural adjustment policies led to hunger and riots in many countries. Even when the developing countries managed to eke out some growth, the benefits went disproportionately to the rich while the poor at the bottom facing even greater poverty. Globalization is not working for many of the world's poor. For millions of people globalization has not worked. Many have seen their jobs destroyed and their lives become more insecure. 13.8 Terrorism and Human Rights Terrorism is characterized, first and foremost, by the use of violence. Such violence includes hostage taking, hijacking, bombing and other indiscriminate attacks, usually targeting civilians. Such activities have endangered human rights everywhere on the other hand. Most of the countries that are prime targets of terrorism have introduced restrictions on the civil rights of their citizen in the name of homeland security. 13.9 Human Rights of Women and Children Human rights for women and children were first recognized at the International Human Rights Conference held in Vienna in 1993, The conference highlighted issues of violation of human rights within and outside the private domain. Subsequently, at the 5th International Women's Conference held in Beijing in 1996 it was decided that opportunities are needed to protect the future progress and empowerment of women, protection of the environment, protection of peace and harmony, the right to health and education. Human rights are women's rights," declared the then U.S. first lady Hillary Clinton at the 1995 Beijing Platform for Action, which set an agenda for women's empowerment and identified 12 critical areas of concern, where urgent action was needed to ensure greater equality and opportunities for women and children. It also laid out concrete proposals for countries to bring about sustainable and irreversible change. She added that "Women must enjoy the right to participate fully in the social and political lives of their countries if we want freedom and democracy to thrive and endure."

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 131 The Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action, confirms that the protection of human rights, and the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women is the first responsibility of governments. This focus was also endorsed through the adoption of CEDAW (1979), the U.N. Security Council resolution on "Women, Peace & Security" passed in 2000, and most recently with the adoption of the Sustainable Development Goals in 2015, which includes a standalone goal of gender equality and empowerment of women and girls. However, despite many conventions organized at the international and national level, the human rights of women have not been secured even today. Socio-economic discrimination against women exists everywhere. In the Indian constitution, women and men have been given equal rights. The state has declared various schemes and made laws for the development and protection of women. Gender discrimination is a major form of social inequality. Girl child is often considered as a burden on the family. This is because there is insufficient occupation for her, and dowry has to be given for her wedding. Foetal killing has been a crucial problem. A medical diagnostic process, called, amniocentesis, is misused by parents to select the sex of their child. This has resulted in the abortion of female foetuses. The misuse of this test has now resulted in banning of this test in India. Despite the enactment of laws, abortion of female foetuses both in urban and rural areas continues. There is a general disregard for the physical health and mental health of girls. The reason for this is gender discrimination. When the child is denied of proper nutrition and health care, the infant daughter grows up through neglect and apathy. As a result of this malnutrition, a huge number of mothers take high risk of life. At present, rape, trafficking of women and doing business with the women are increasing steadily in society and various laws have been enacted to stop these incidents. But this did not yield much result. In this male dominated society, women have entered the workplace to establish themselves. But in the workplace, women often become victim of sexual harassment. To eradicate socio-economic discrimination strong administrative measures need to be taken special emphasis should be laid on economic empowerment of the women.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 132 The struggle to establish women's human rights is not an isolated struggle. This is not a struggle against men. It is the struggle against the socio-economic circumstances that allows the exploitation of vulnerable section of the society. Unless social discrimination is brought to an end, economic discrimination against women will continue. Only through the collective struggle of women and men can all human rights be ensured. 13.10 Human Rights in India Human rights are vital for all round development of individuals. The Constitution of India makes provisions for basic rights also known as Fundamental Rights for its citizens as well as for aliens. The Supreme Court of India is the guarantor of the rights according to the Constitution. The court takes into account fundamental duties while interpreting the constitutional rights. In Indian constitution, Rights are classified mainly in three broad categories: (a) Civil (b) Political (c) Economic and Social. Fundamental Rights in India recognize certain civil rights. Certain Political and Economic and Social rights are recognized by other provisions in the Constitution. In Indian constitution, the Fundamental Rights are defined as the basic human rights of all citizens. These rights are defined in Part III of the Constitution. The demand for a declaration of fundamental rights arose from four factors : ? Lack of civil liberty in India during the British rule. ? Deplorable social conditions, particularly affecting the untouchables and women. ? Existence of different religious, linguistic, and ethnic groups encouraged and exploited by the Britishers. ? Exploitation of the tenants by the landlords. Fundamental Rights included article 14–32 are : ? Right to Equality ? Right to Freedom ? Right against Exploitation ? Right to Freedom of Religion ? Cultural and Educational Rights ? Right to constitutional remedies

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 133 13.11 Conclusion Globally the champions of human rights have most often been citizens, not government officials. In particular, nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) have played a cardinal role in focusing on human rights issues. For example, NGO activities following the 1995 United Nations Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing, China, drew unprecedented attention to serious violations of the human rights of women. NGOs such as Amnesty International, the Antislavery Society, the International Commission of Jurists, the International Working Group on Indigenous Affairs, Human Rights Watch, Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights, and Survivors International monitor the actions of governments and pm pressure on them to act according to human rights principles. Leaders from various countries over time have taken initiatives to build human rights frameworks like Abraham Lincoln, Franklin Roosevelt, Lyndon B. Johnson and Jimmy 'Carler, Nelson Mandela and Havel. Eleanor Roosevelt, took the oath of presenting to the world a universal framework which would be a guide for nations for fighting against the violation of human rights. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights is the result of that outstanding effort. 13.12 Summing Up ? Thus Human rights are moral principles or norms that describe certain standards of human behaviour and are regularly protected by municipal and international law. ? They are commonly understood as inalienable fundamental rights and which are "inherent in all human beings", regardless of their age, ethnic origin, location, language, religion, ethnicity, or any other status. ? They are applicable everywhere and at every time in the sense of being universal and they are equal in the sense of being the same for everyone. ? Many of the basic ideas that animated the human rights movement developed in the aftermath of the World War II, culminating in the adoption of the UDHR in Paris by the UN general Assembly in 1948. ? The true forerunner of human rights discourse was the concept of natural rights which appeared as part of the medieval tradition ? The modern human rights arguments emerged in the latter half of the 20th century, possibly as a reaction to slavery, torture, genocide and war crimes.

For the purpose of study their development has been divided into three generations. For a long time, the notion of different “generations” of human rights has established itself in human rights literature and teaching. The division of human rights into three generations was initially proposed in 1979

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 136 by the Czeck jurist Karel Vasak at the International Institute of Human Rights in Strasbourg. His theories have primarily been rooted in European law. 14.3 Vasak’s categorisation of Human Rights Vasak’s divisions follow the three watchwords of the French Revolution — Liberty, equality and fraternity. The three generations are also reflected in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which includes rights that are thought of as second generation as well as first generation ones, but it does not make the distinction in itself. It’s been over four decades since Karel Vasak introduced the three generations of rights. Although subject to severe criticism since the outset, his division of rights into generations has offered scholars, activists, and pundits a useful tool to organize the human rights discourse. Even critics of the concept itself, like Philip Alston, Jack Donnelly, or Hurst Hannum cannot deny its existence. There are questions regarding the validity of Vasak’s categorisation specially in the context of the end of the Cold War, the new challenges of democratization, new pressing problems like terrorism and migration etc. The first generation has a long history, dating back to the Magna Carta of 1297, United States Bill of Rights of 1791 and the Declaration of Rights of Man and of the Citizen of 1789. This category includes following rights — the right to life, freedom of speech, freedom of religion, right to fair trial, equality before the law, and other civil and political rights. The second generation rights was a product of the rapid industrialization and accompanying social and economic inequalities. In the wake of the emerging ideological confrontation after World War-II, the communist camp staunchly supported the economic, social, and cultural rights. These rights demand active state intervention. Hence, the first two generations of rights were included in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UN General Assembly 1948). While differentiating between the first and second generations of rights, Vasak contrasted the negative character of the former and the positive character of the latter. The third generation of human rights is the most recent and vague in content. Collective rights that belong to this group were mentioned in the Stockholm Declaration (UN General Assembly 1972), Rio Declaration (UN General Assembly 1992), and other international documents of declaratory character.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 137 Thus, Vasak’s differentiation between the three generations quite neatly fits into the three dichotomies based on the major approaches to human rights categorization: (1) negative (first generation) and positive (second and third generations), (2) individual (first and second generations) and collective (third generation), and (3) national (first and second generations) and international (third generation) liability as summarized in the following Table

Source: Karel Vasak, “Human Rights: A Thirty-Year Struggle: the Sustained Efforts to give Force of law to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights”, UNESCO Courier 30:11, Paris: United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization, November 1977. The rights of the “first generation” are the “classical” civil and political rights which have been formulated since the latter part of the 18th century, while rights of the “second generation” are linked to the economic, social and cultural rights. The first generation of human rights include, inter-alia, the prohibition of torture, justice- related rights (such as equality before the law, the presumption of innocence, fair trials, etc.), the right to the freedom of religion or belief, opinion, assembly and association, as well as the participation in the administration of public affairs and the right to vote. 14.4 Three Generations of Human Rights Three generations of human rights are discussed below: 14.4.1 First Generation of Human Rights : The Constitution of every state recognizes the rights that every person within the society enjoys in his or her fair, normal and disciplined way of living. Those rights are:

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 138 14.4.1.A Civil Rights The rights that people enjoy in civil and social life and for the full development of the personalities are called municipal rights. Municipal rights are an essential part of the democratic system. Among these rights are the right to life, the right to freedom, the right to security, the right to communication, the right to property, freedom of thought and expression, the right to be freed against slavery and exploitation, the right to freely worship and preach, the right to travel freely the right against, unlawfull arrest and detention. 14.4.1.B Political Rights Political rights provide opportunities for direct or indirect participation in state affairs. Particularly important among the political rights are the right to vote, the right to be elected, the right to express his political views freely, the right to have a fair trial in an independent and impartial court, the right to peacefully assemble and build an organization. First-generation human rights, sometimes called "blue" rights, deal essentially with liberty and participation in political life. They are fundamentally civil and political rights in nature: They serve negatively to protect the individual from excesses of the state intervention. First-generation rights include, among other things, the right to life, equality before the law, freedom of speech, religion, property rights, voting rights etc. Some of these rights date back to the Magna Carta of 1215 and the Rights of Englishmen, which were included in the English Bill of Rights in 1689. A more full set of first-generation human rights were declared in France by the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen in 1789, and by the US Bill of Right in 1791. They were given recognition in international law first by Articles 3 to 21 of the 1948 UDHR and later in the 1966 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. 14.4.2 Second Generation of Human Rights : The second generation of human rights include economic rights, social rights and cultural rights. These rights are as follows: 14.4.2.A Economic Rights The economic privileges of living in a democratic way through which people's lives are made happy, comfortable and secure are considered as economic rights. These economic rights include the right to work, the right to choose a workplace voluntarily, the right to a free and fair environment for work, the right to equal and NSOU ? CC-PS-03 139 fair remuneration for work, the right to organize workers union freely and to voluntarily participate in such unions, adequate food and clothing, the right to housing and the right to a decent living standard. 14.4.2.B Social Rights The conditions that give opportunity to citizens to participate as members of society and establish their own identity are considered as social rights. These rights include the right to education, the right to health, the right to be married, the right to form a family, the right to social protection and assistance in the case of unemployment, legality, old age, illness etc. Second-generation human rights are related to equality and began to be recognized by governments after World War II. They are fundamentally economic, social and cultural in nature. They guarantee different members of the citizenry equal conditions and treatment. Secondary rights would include rights to food, housing and health care, as well as social security and employment benefits. Like first-generation rights, they were also covered by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and further embodied in Articles 22 to 28 of the Universal Declaration, and the International Covenant. In the United States of America, President Roosevelt proposed aSecond Bill of Rights, covering much the same grounds, during his State of the Union Address on January 11, 1944. Today, many nations, states, or groups of nations have developed legally binding declarations guaranteeing comprehensive sets of human rights. Some states have enacted some of these economic rights, e.g. the state of New York has enshrined the right to free education. These rights are sometimes referred to as "red" rights. They impose upon the government the duty to respect and promote and fulfil them, but this depends on the availability of resources. The duty is imposed on the state because it controls its own resources. The duty of government is to implement these positive rights. 14.4.3 Third Generation of Human Rights The next significant evolution occurred with the advent of the "third generation" of human rights. These rights are nothing but group or collective rights, of society or peoples' rights, which were articulated in the second half of the 20th century. The third generation of human rights include: (i) economic development; (ii) self-determination; (iii) prosperity and peace; (iv)benefit from economic growth; (v) social harmony; (v) a healthy environment and health; (vi) participation in cultural heritage;

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 140 (vii) natural resources; (viii) inter-generational equity. The third generation of human rights are necessary for creating the appropriate conditions in society to provide first and second generation human rights. Right to Development The third-generation human rights are primarily related to the right to development, as a whole. The right to development was included in the UN General Assembly Resolution in 1986. Development rights are an integral part of human rights. Development here refers to the personal, political, social, economic and cultural development of the individual. The various components of development like the right to self-determination, the right to equality, regardless of gender, caste, creed, religion etc. contribute to the development and enjoyment of individual personality. Categorizations of these three generations of human rights should not be merely an academic distinction but should be fused together by all countries of the world. These rights were rooted in postcolonial discourses. Unlike the first and second generation, these newer rights cannot be understood as a reaction to colonialism. The hallmark of third generation rights, in contrast with first generation civil and political rights and second generation social, economic, and cultural rights, is that they involve global problems that no state or region of the world can solve alone. For this reason, third generation rights are often referred to as rights of "fraternity" or "solidarity". Article 22 of the African Charter on Human and People's Rights, signed in 1993, states that development rights are as important as other human rights. The first Vienna Conference was considered as an integral source of development of human rights. The primary responsibility of the states is to protect and promote the primary human rights of the community (eg food, education and health) and to maintain a decent standard of living. Thus, it can be said that development and human rights are intimately related to each other. Third-generation human rights are those rights that go beyond the mere civil and social, as expressed in many progressive documents of international law, including the 1972 Stockholm Declaration, the 1992 Rio Declaration on Environment and Development etc. Also known as Solidarity human rights, they are rights that try to go beyond the framework of individual rights to focus on collective concepts, such as community or people. These "green" rights cover the following broad spectrum of rights: ? Group and collective rights ? Right to self determination NSOU ? CC-PS-03 141 ? Right to economic and social development ? Right to healthy environment ? Right to natural resources ? Right to communicate ? Right to sustainability ? Right to uphold cultural heritage The African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights ensures many of these rights. 14.4.4 Fourth Generation Several analysts claim that a fourth generation of human rights is emerging, which would include rights that cannot be included in the third generation, first and second generation rights. These rights are related to technological development and information and communication technologies and cyberspace. However, the content of it is not clear. They normally take some rights from the third generation and include them in the fourth, such as the right to a healthy environment. Some analysts believe that the fourth generation human rights are related to new technologies while others prefer to talk about digital rights, where a new range of rights would be found, such as: ? The right to exist digitally ? The right to digital reputation ? Right to digital identity 14.5 Conclusion Maurice Cranston argued that scarcity means that supposed second-generation and third-generation rights are not really rights at all. If one person has a right, others have a duty to respect that right, but governments lack the resources necessary to fulfil the duties implied by citizens' supposed second- and third-generation rights. Various scholars have argued that second- and third-generation human rights serve as an attempt to cloak political goals, which the majority may well agree. In their opinion, calling socio-economic goods "rights" inherently creates a related concept of duties, so that other citizens have to be coerced by the government to give things to other people in order to ensure these new rights. NSOU ? CC-PS-03 142 Freedman also mentioned the need for rethinking the approach to the first- and second-generation rights as strictly negative and positive correspondingly. She argues that in the contemporary usage of the concept of human rights, demarcation between those positive and negative duties becomes increasingly blurred. Indeed, certain rights, like the right to a fair trial, fall to both categories since it simultaneously guarantees the individual right, and also requires the active state intervention for its practical implementation. 14.6 Summing Up ? Each generation of human rights evolved in response to specific threats. In the first wave, they were civil and political. ? In the second and third waves, they were economic, social, cultural and environmental. ? Today, fusion of material, biological and digital technologies raises existential questions about what it means to be human. The time is ripe for a fourth generation of human rights to emerge. 14.7 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1) What kinds of rights are envisioned under the three different generations of Human Rights? To exercise all these rights, it is essential for a citizen to perform certain duties towards the state. These rights and duties are interrelated. All these duties are clearly mentioned in each country's constitution. The democratic constitution of the United States has left the burden of determining these duties on the people.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 145 Although much attention has been paid to 'rights' in recent years, some consideration is now being given to 'duties' (or, as it has become more usual to call them, 'obligations'). The implicit assumption is that rights need to be balanced by duties. Historically, the left has been more anxious to stress rights; nowadays even the liberal left has focused on duties. In part this is a consequence of the development of the belief in 'civil society', the network of family, voluntary and informal groups and activities that underpin a decent society. This belief derives partly from a reaction to rampant individualism. Another source of this belief is the weaknesses of the former communist regimes of Eastern Europe, regimes in which there were no intermediate stages, no buffer, between the state and the individual. 15.3 Types of Duties or Obligations As with rights, the terms duties and obligations cover a number of rather different concepts, which may be summarised as follows: Moral Obligation Moral obligations imply duties people ought to perform because in some sense they owe such actions to God, to any other person or may be to themselves. Thus there is a moral obligation to speak the truth, to help others in need, to refrain from adultery, and so on. These obligations are not enforceable by law. However, they often become the basis of legal obligations. Legal Obligation Legal obligations mean duties one has perform do because they are enforceable in the courts, such as paying one's taxes and driving with a valid licence etc. Such obligations are closely linked to state sovereignty. Citizens and other individuals resident in the territory of a state are under an obligation to obey the laws of that state Civic Obligation Civic obligations are actions we should perform as a tribute to the rights we enjoy as part of a political community. For example, right to vote falls under our the civic obligation. Social Obligation Social obligations are an extension of civic obligations. They involve a broadly similar concept but have wider application. They include those obligations we owe to society that contribute to the general good. For example, upbringing one's children, NSOU ? CC-PS-03 146 providing them good education, livelihood, making them good citizens, introducing them into the culture of their society, and teaching them right and wrong etc. Such obligations can be discharged on a personal and an individual basis. Coercive Obligation Coercive Obligation arises due to coercion or force because of the absence of legitimate authority. However, in democratic set up the state also uses coercion for ensuring compliance of the individuals. Moral obligations are carried out mainly because of moral correctness, whereas coercive obligation comes out as a result of fear. Political Obligation This obligation denotes the relationship between. the states and the individuals residing in a nation state. It is a relationship where the state provides a set of rights for its citizens and in return the citizens acknowledge the authority of the state. These individuals become citizens of the state 15.4 Sources of Obligations By and large, obligations have proved less contentious than rights. Many supposed obligations seem little more than pious aspirations with which no one would quarrel. There are few campaigns, violent or otherwise, in defence of an extension of obligations. This is not, however, to say that there are no areas of dispute. The earliest basis for asserting the binding nature of obligation is the idea of contract which can be traced back to the biblical notion of the covenant of God with His people, who keep His laws in exchange for His protection. Consequently, there emerged various social contract theories which emerged in the seventeenth century. Thomas Hobbes and John Locke sought to explain the origins of government by reference to a state of nature, a situation of chaos caused by the absence of established authority. Hobbes and Locke established the basis for government and the obligation of the citizen to obey. In such situations, they argued, human beings established a 'contract' between the governed and the governors. This formed the basis for both rights and obligations of both parties. Hobbes, in Leviathan (1651), argued that in order to escape the barbarism of the 'state of nature', human beings voluntarily surrendered their freedom to an authority, a government, which subsequently had absolute claims on their obedience. As long as such a government provided security for the people, they were obliged to support it.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 147 A less totalitarian interpretation of the social contract was that of Locke. His state of nature was not one of instability and violence. In order to avoid such an unstable situation, in his Two Treatises of Government (1690), Locke argued that people entered into two contracts. The first was one in which individuals agreed to impose limits on themselves to form 'society'. The second was a contract between society and government by which government would be obeyed in exchange for its protection of natural rights. Both contracts form the basis of liberal ideas of politics and government. Conservatives instead have suggested that every individual owes a natural loyalty to his society, in much the same way as he bears a loyalty to his own family. Society and the family are natural rather than artificially contrived institutions and can therefore rightly lay claim to a natural obligation. A more pragmatic argument was extended by Bentham. A 'good' government will, in his words, pursue 'the greatest happiness of the greatest number'. This principle is called utilitarianism. Questions necessarily arise. Are obligations to society the same as obligations to the state? If not, what if there is a clash between the two? If we equate 'state' with 'nation' then much conflict might well occur. For example, Germany defeated France in 1940. The French government surrendered and ordered its armed forces to cease hostilities. Some Frenchmen, such as Charles de Gaulle, felt this as a betrayal of the French nation by the French state. In his view this betrayal absolved him of all loyalty to the (admittedly legal) government of Marshal Philippe Pétain that emerged after the fall of France. Indeed, de Gaulle and his followers believed that they had not only the right to continue the war, but a positive obligation to do so. Yet another question arises. Can the 'nation' be equated with 'society'? Or is there a global society that has an equal, if not superior, claim on loyalty? Other claimants to loyalty may also be considered: conscience, race, class, church, religious community, the environment, even the human race itself. All of these may, in certain circumstances, appear to have a greater claim than the state or nation. Even if it is admitted that the state has valid claims to obedience (and Marxists and anarchists explicitly reject such claims), what is the nature of that obedience? Is it simply observing the law or does it go beyond that to a positive and enthusiastic support of the regime? Totalitarian states, like Nazi Germany, clearly demanded unconditional obedience to the state. Liberal theorists have argued that there are limits to the obligations which the state can impose on people. They have proposed specific constitutional arrangements to give effect to these limitations. Liberals assume that the state's role in society is very largely to safeguard natural or human rights.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 148 A problem arises if the state does not, in fact, guarantee such rights. At what point does the bond of obedience dissolve? Is there a right of the citizens to rebel against, and even overthrow, such a government by force? This question has, of course, been of acute interest in the twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, but originally arose in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Locke argued that there was such a right and the argument was made explicit in the American Declaration of Independence (1776), which boldly asserted that when government degenerated into despotism 'it is the right of the people to alter it, and to institute a new government'. Even if it is accepted that there is such a right to revolt, difficult questions arise as to precisely what circumstances justify such a rebellion and whether there should be any constraints on the methods of the revolutionaries. As early as the thirteenth century Thomas Aquinas had laid down certain conditions for justified rebellion that were subsequently absorbed into the writings of other theorists.

15.5 Historical development of the concept of Political Obligation

In the Greek Period, Political Obligation was grounded in the very nature of human life. Aristotle proclaimed that state is a creation of nature and man is a political animal. For him state is the highest level of social organisation where individuals attain self sufficiency, and good life justifies obedience to the state. This is what political obligation meant in this period. However, there were political strifes within the society, and Aristotle even spoke of revolutions for cyclical changes in the forms of government. In Greek political theory there was no difference between the society and the state. In Rome Polybius and Cicero favoured the system of checks and balances within the state. Roman legal system, attempted to define the concept of political obligation. Power of the ruler was derived from law and every relationship within the state and sovereignty was determined by law. Political obligation in the feudal Europe was hierarchical where the lords stood at the top and granted land and other privileges, the vassals and the barons in return used to provide military and political support. At the bottom, were the serfs who had nothing to receive but only to work and render services. According to Laski and Barker, laws must be obeyed for the basic minimum of civilised existence, which cannot be unconditional. To command obedience, laws must satisfy the test of social justice.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 149 During the post renaissance period, the concept of political obligation took varied strands. Machiavelli in his The prince declared that the subjects are obliged to render all their allegiance. The idealists like Hegel recognise the state as the embodiment of reason and believed it to be the march of God on earth. As we don't disobey God, we should not disregard the state also. Marxists believe that the state in a capitalist system is simply an exploitative instrument, so the individual has right to resist. Neo Marxian theorist, Gramsci suggested that the states in the capitalist system exercise hegemony. The ruling class through various cultural and educational institutions like family, school, church etc generates consent in favour of the capitalist system.

15.6 Basic duties of Citizens

The main duties the citizens of the democratic countries have are :

- A. Loyalty to the State : This means that it is imperative for a citizen to stand by the state during times of danger. It is the duty of every citizen to help the state to protect its territorial sovereignty from foreign aggression and preserve internal peace and order.
- B. Regulation : In the representative democracy of the present era, the law is generally designed to protect the public welfare of the society. It is the duty of every citizen to obey the laws of his state.
- C. Honestly exercising franchise and holding office : The right to elect government in a democracy is vested with the people. Voting is therefore an essential component of the democratic system. The authority of the administration depends on the manner in which these rights are exercised.
- D. Payment of Tax : In the present century, state activity has really increased since the transformation of the "obedient state" into a "welfare state". At present, the government is obliged to provide various types of services. As a result, government spending has increased significantly. The enormous amount of money required to pay for the expenditure of the government in various sectors comes from taxes on the people and various goods.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 150 15.7 Reciprocity of rights and duties Man is a social by nature. The physical and mental needs of human life motivate people to live a group life. It is through a united and collaborative effort he strives to meet all these needs. People are transformed into separate entities and companionable entities. Spontaneously, "groups" emerge to meet different needs of human life. Among these groups the state occupies a pride of place. The development of all these groups, reflect much needed unity in human life. Therefore, it can be said that the creation of a mutual relationship between rights and duties is one of the main reasons for the success of social life. To enjoy rights collectively one should be able to perform duties towards the collective whole. The interrelationship between rights and duties can be explained from different perspectives. First, a citizen's need is to exercise his rights in such a way that he can contribute something to the prosperity of society. For example, the right to education is recognized in almost all advanced democratic states. But in essence, this right obliges the citizen to practice high civic virtues in the absence of which democracy cannot be truly successful. Secondly, the reality of the interdependence also entails the responsibility of each citizen to respect the rights of other citizens. For example, a citizen of India has the right to freedom of movement. As a consequence, it is the duty of the citizen not to interfere with the rights of any other citizen. Without mutual respect for the rights of the citizens, the society will face a chaotic situation where all rights will become meaningless. Third, a citizen has an obligation to perform certain duties to the state. According to Barker, rights cannot be regarded as rights unless they originate immediately from the State. Infact State is the immediate source of rights. A citizen is indebted to the state for granting certain essential privileges necessary for the development of his personality. Therefore, he is obliged to perform some necessary duties to the state. It is the duty of every citizen in a modern state to stand by the state in times of danger, obey the laws, pay taxes honestly, and, above all, actively participate in various state functions. 15.8 Conclusion Thus in conclusion we can say that membership of a state is compulsory, and no individual can have the opportunity to escape from this. However, the question naturally arises whether the individuals are always obligated to obey to the state and its

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 151 commands. There comes the issue of political obligation and right to resistance. We have in the above discussions seen the various grounds of obligation, starting from divine reason, legal binding, traditional norms, contractual nature etc. Whatever be the ground, being a decent citizen individuals are expected to obey the norms and laws of the state and the states are bound to serve the citizens, otherwise the citizens should have the right to resist and form a new government. 15.9 Summing Up ? Rights in some sense existed in the Middle Ages, although the idea of 'human rights' dates from the eighteenth century. ? Historically, there has been some debate on what exactly these rights consist of, while conservatives and socialists have, from different grounds, supported the liberal commitment to universal human rights. ? By the end of the nineteenth century it was widely agreed that a focus on 'individual' and 'negative rights' was inadequate to meet the social needs of the time. ? This led to the development of 'group' and 'social' rights. ? Obligations, or duties, to society and the state have received considerable attention in recent years, partly in an attempt to give them a sound philosophical underpinning and partly to establish what are the limits to the individual's duty to the state. 15.10 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1) What are the different sources of political obligation? 2) Discuss the main basis of political obligation in a democracy? 3) Explain the basic duties of the citizens? In other words, why should we obey the state and how can we justify its existence in our lives. A simple answer could be, following J. S. Mill, that life without restraint on behaviour of others would be of little or no worth and that ‘enforcement of restraint ‘without the state is mere wishful thinking. Judged in such terms, any further argument about its justification may seem idle. But the NSOU ? CC-PS-03 154 argument that we have no alternative to the state acts as a negative justification, we can’t think of anything better. The defenders of the state should have some more positive argument to offer, in order to show how the state can be justified in terms of some universally acknowledged moral reasoning. That is, we need an argument to show that we have a moral duty to obey the state.. Such arguments would also help us to understand when a particular state might lose its legitimacy as it happened in the past in the case of so many states and still happening in today’s world. In the same way one can say, following Max Weber, that the state possesses a monopoly of legitimate violence. The state accepts the responsibility of protecting everyone who resides within its border from illegitimate violence. Surely this is the only ground for which we grant the state the monopoly of legitimate violence and its existence in our lives can also be justified on the same ground. This argument is quite akin to that of Charles Tilly who said that every State functions by the logic of a crime syndicate. We give them tax as protection money on the condition that it would not attack us and protect us from external attack.. But the task of justifying the state is often said to be the task of showing that there are some universal political obligations. Universal obligation, in this sense, does not mean the duty to obey all the laws of the state at all times. Only a certain rather unpleasant kind of fanatic could believe that we are always morally obliged to do whatever is commanded by the laws of the state. The goal of justifying the state, the meaning of universal political obligations, in this case, is to show that, in principle, everyone within the territory of a state is morally bound to follow its laws and ethics. This justification is offered by different theories of political obligations. 16.3 Divine Right Theory of Political Obligation Divine Right Theory tried to justify absolute monarchy in Europe. It can be considered as the oldest theory of political obligation. It stems from a specific metaphysical framework in which a monarch is pre-ordained to inherit the crown before his birth. The divine right is considered a key element for legitimising many absolute monarchies in Europe. According to this theory a monarch is not accountable to any earthly authority. Thus the ground of political obligation in this theory is based on the idea that the subjects while obeying the orders of the king are actually

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 155 obeying the command of God who gives the king the authority to rule. As the right to rule is derived from divine authority, the monarch is not subject to the will of the people, the aristocracy or of any other estate of the realm. Outside Christianity also kings were often seen as either ruling with the backing of heavenly powers or perhaps even being divine beings themselves. Christian notion of divine right can be traced back in Bible. St. Paul, following St. Peter was of the view that subjects should be obedient to the powers that be as they are appointed by God. In the English speaking world, the theory of divine right is largely associated with the early Stuart reigns in Britain and the theology of clergy who held their tenure at the pleasure of James I, Charles I and Charles II. One of the first English texts supporting divine right of kings was written in 1597-98 by James I himself before his accession to the English throne. The overriding metaphor of James' book was that of a father's relation with his children : "Just as no misconduct on the part of a father can free his children from obedience to the parents, so no misgovernment on the part of a king can release his subjects from their allegiance. " In the mid seventeenth century, Sir Robert Filmer, a royalist, developed the idea of the right of the king on similar lines.. According to Filmer the king is the head of the state in the same sense the father is the head of the family. In his theory Adam was the first king and Charles I stood in the position of Adam in England, with absolute authority to rule. Later John Locke effectively refuted Filmer's argument in his First Treatise . In France, the chief theorist of divine right was Jacques-Benigne Bossuet, the bishop and court preacher to Louis XIV. Like Filmer, Boussuet also argued that the kings received their authority directly from God. Just as a father's authority is absolute in a family, so is the king's in a state. Louis XIV agreed to these aspects of Boussuet's view and claimed himself to be an absolute ruler, the so called Sun King. The Glorious Revolution of 1688 in England, the French Revolution and the American Revolution made this theory of Divine Right of the king insignificant in western political thought as an explanation of the basis of political obligation. 16.4 Consent as the basis of Political Obligation Individuals consent to the state lies behind the idea of the social contract theories propounded by Hobbes, Locke and Rousseau. If, somehow or other it can be shown NSOU ? CC-PS-03 156 that every individual has consented to the state, formed a contract with the state, or made a contract with each other to create the state, then the problem of finding the ground of political obligation appears to be solved. We would have shown how the state comes to have universal authority — authority over each of us — by showing that everyone has consented to that authority. Social contract theory then is an obvious and elegant solution to the problem of political obligation. It satisfies the twin demands of universalism— every person must be obligated— and voluntarism— political obligation can only come through consent. The idea of consent as the basis of political obligation was propounded strongly by John Locke who was refuting the argument of Sir. Robert Filmer who justified the absolute power of the contemporary kings as paternal inheritance from Adam, the father of mankind. Locke begins his argument by stating that that paternal authority should not be equated with political authority. A father's right over to command over his children is based on the supposed immaturity of the children, on their inability to decide as to what is best in their own interest This supposed immaturity allows a father's command to ignore the issues of the children's consent.. But for Locke since, unlike paternal authority, political authority is exercised over equals, over rational, mature individuals, it has to be based on consent. People's consent is then the basis of political power which Locke defines at the end of the first chapter of the Second Treatise. So for Locke political power power is a natural property of the individuals who are capable of exercising it and who, in fact, has a duty and right to exercise it. Tully calls this Lockean claim ' one of the major conceptual innovation in early modern European political thought. So rational, free individuals consent to transfer the political power to the governmental institutions making it government of ' of the demos, by the demos'. Thus 'consent' of the adult citizens becomes the basis of 'universal political obligation'. The idea of tacit consent is also related with political obligation. There are critics who raise doubt about the validity of the idea of contract as the ground for political obligation. First, where can we look for a social contract ? There is no evidence whatsoever of the historical validity of such contract. Second, even if we accept that there was such a contract in the past, it can hardly explain the political

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 157 obligation of the existing citizens. After all, no reasonable legal system allows one generation to make a contract which binds the succeeding generations. Here it might be replied that consent is given in a less obvious or explicit way. Consent, argues some critics, may be communicated via the ballot-box. In voting for the government we give it our consent. It is not wholly implausible that even those who vote against the government nevertheless indicate their consent to the system as a whole through voting . So voting is a way of tacit consenting. But perhaps the idea of tacit consent can be developed in more clear terms. In fact all the major contract theorists — Hobbes, Locke and Rousseau— rely in different ways on arguments based on tacit consent. Here the central argument is that by quietly enjoying the protection of the state one is giving it one’s tacit consent. And this is enough to bind an individual to the state. Thus even Locke who believed in express consent, famously argued :”

Every man that hath any Possession, or Enjoyment, of any part of the Dominions of any Government, doth thereby give his tacit consent, and is as far forth obliged to obedience to the laws of that Government...” . 16.5

Utilitarian Theory of Political Obligation The fundamental Idea of utilitarianism is that the morally correct act in any situation is that which brings about the highest possible total sum of utility. Utility is variously understood as happiness, pleasure, or the satisfaction of desires or preferences. For the purposes of this discussion it doesn’t matter which of these options we choose, so let us speak of maximization of happiness, for convenience. Put crudely, utilitarianism requires one to perform the action that will create more happiness, (less unhappiness) in the world than any other action available at the time. Consequently, the utilitarian can argue that we need a body of laws which will lead to an increase in happiness. This can be called indirect utilitarianism. The idea is that if we all reason directly in utilitarian terms things will go very badly. Hence we need to follow non-utilitarian reasoning— obey the laws- maximize happiness. So it is claimed that direct search for happiness both individually and socially, can be self-defeating. The best we can do is to set for ourselves other goals, or follow

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 158 other rules, in the hope or expectation that happiness will follow as a consequence. This is probably Bentham’s own real view: ‘taking the whole body (of people) together, it is their duty to obey only when it is in their interests’(Fragments on Government, 56). An extension of this passage provides several ideas: 1. Laws should be passed if, and only if, they contribute more to human happiness than any competing law (or absence of law) would do. 2. Laws should be obeyed because they are laws (and will be obeyed because disobedience means punishment), and should only be disobeyed to avoid disaster. 3. Laws should be repealed and replaced if they fail to serve the proper utilitarian function. Utilitarian message of political obligation now seems clear enough. The state as the provider and enforcer of a body of law, is justified if and only if it contributes to human happiness than any feasible competing arrangement. If we think in terms of a basic contrast between the state and the state of nature and we accept the arguments of the contract theorists— particularly those of Hobbes— the utilitarian argument seems convincing. In terms of contributing to general happiness, the state seems far more preferable to the state of nature. Judged in this sense the utilitarian justification of the state and political obligation seems to be complete. The argument itself is very simple. In essence it means: 1. The best society is one in which happiness is maximised. 2. The state promotes happiness better than the state of nature. 3. We have a moral duty to obey the state and its laws if it contributes to general happiness. 16.6 Idealist interpretation of Political Obligation Idealist theory of the State and the basis of obligation to it can be traced back to Greek philosophy, especially in the thought of Plato and Aristotle. In modern times idealist theory of political obligation was propounded mainly by German philosopher Hegel and English philosophers like T.H. Green and Bosanquet. Aristotle

the “ state comes into existence, originating in the bare needs of life and continuing its existence for the sake of a good life.”

He considered the state as the highest community embracing all the other within it. The state, in his opinion, is aimed 'at the highest good'. Plato also held a view almost on similar lines. The citizens, according to the Greek thinkers, could not think of a life outside, against or going against the state. As Aristotle famously said, 'man is by nature a political animal'. The state is natural. In other words, it is inherent in man's nature. Aristotle believed that through the state and the laws man attains his highest 'virtue' and perfection and becomes a citizen, capable of sharing in public activity and performing public duties. Thus political obligation to the state, in Greek thought, is based on the fact that man's emancipation lies in the polis, the city state. In modern times German philosopher Hegel can be considered one of the main proponents of idealist thought. Central to the Hegelian idea of the state is the Hegelian dictum that history is the progressive realisation of the idea of freedom. Hegel believed that individual freedom is embodied in the modern institutions of family, civil society and the state, since it is belonging to these institutions that makes up a person's life in modern society. For Hegel modern family is based on consent, whether the marriage comes through arrangements between the partners parents or whether it takes place because two individuals fall in love with each other, Hegel claimed that the subjective will of the two partners must be satisfied. In that sense modern family expresses the idea of individual freedom. If family is the first unit of social organisation, civil society comes next. It is the arena of social and economic interaction of individuals belonging to different families. Civil society was much wider than economy for Hegel. It is made up of at least four different systems or institutions : the system of needs, the administration of justice, the police and corporation. But Hegel was driven by the idea that civil society, in spite of being wider arena of human interaction, is also a sphere of conflict of particular interests of individuals. He even pointed to the possibility of an emergence of poverty and corruption as a consequence of the emergence of civil society. According to Neera Chandak, Hegel believed that the state with its bureaucracy can resolve these conflicts. Hegel called the bureaucracy the universal class because he believed that they could serve the common interests of the community. Thus in spite of the positive

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 160 role of family and civil society for the fulfilment of individual freedom, 'concrete freedom can only be realised through the state. The state as a political community is, in that sense, prior to other communities like family and civil society. Given that modern family and civil society are embodiments of freedom, the modern state, as their precondition, thus becomes the realisation of human freedom in the ultimate sense of the term. So political obligation to the state is based on the obvious fact that it is the realisation of freedom. Hegel glorified the role of the state to the extent that many critics find in his thought clear leanings to an absolute power, especiall in such statements like: 'The state is ' March of God on earth'. English philosopher T.H. Green offered new moral justification of obligation to state authority in his Idealist philosophy. Green famously said that 'citizenship only makes the moral man'. Green naturally led to the conclusion that for the fulfillment of man's moral possibilities the entire social environment comprising various institutions including political institutions are important. Although man's moral development is very much dependent on his personal efforts it is, indeed, facilitated by a set of external conditions regulated under the overriding goal of 'common good'. The state, according to Green, provides these external conditions. Actually man's rights are important external conditions for the development of his moral power and the state secures such conditions by guaranteeing these rights. The state is not the creator of these rights, for the source of these rights is the moral nature of man. Thus the state preserves the conditions for the sustenance of the freedom of the individual; it is essentially a moral freedom, that is not a freedom to pursue one's animal desires. It is what a moral being would like to be assured of for pursuing a moral goal. But a moral goal in essence is common good. Thus if an individual deviates from the path of common good, the state is justified in controlling his deviant behaviour and making necessary interventions. Freedom thus becomes positive freedom, not a negative one in the sense of 'absence of restraint' only. The state actions are thus meant to remove obstacles to the development of the individual, 'hindering hindrances'. Green in this way in his Idealist philosophy offered a new moral justification of obligation to the authority. There is a moral ground for obligation. The individual's duty to obey the state, is, in essence, a duty to the cause of his own moral development.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 161 16.7 Principle of Fairness as the basis of Political Obligation Whether or not individuals consent to the state, it can seem unfair of them to enjoy its benefits without also accepting the necessary burdens that help to produce those benefits 'in a joint enterprise'. So, it has been argued, anyone who gains an advantage from the state has a duty, following fairness, to obey its laws, to contribute taxes and so on. The principle underlying this view was explicitly formulated by the legal theorist and philosopher H.L. Hart. Hart's view is that this principle is, as it were, the 'rational core' of the doctrine of tacit consent.. Receiving benefits does indeed binds one to the state, but not because it is a way of tacitly consenting. Rather, the force of the argument is that it is unfair to reap the benefits of the state, unless one is prepared to shoulder one's share of burdens too. The benefits, of course, are security, and stability of living in a society which operates a system of enforced laws. The corresponding burdens are political obligations. John Rawls subsequently adopted this principle in an influential essay of his own, referring to the duty derived from the principle as the 'duty of fair play'(1964). What the principle of fair play holds, then, is that everyone who participates in a reasonably just, mutually beneficial cooperative practice— Hart's 'joint enterprise'— has an obligation to bear a fair share of burdens of the practice. This obligation is owed to the others who cooperate in the enterprise, for cooperation is what makes it possible for any Individual to enjoy the benefits of the practice Anyone who acts a free rider is acting wrongly, even if his or her shirking doesn't directly threaten the existence of the enterprise. Contemporary philosopher Robert Nozick in his famous work, 'Anarchy, State, and Utopia' refutes this argument of 'fair play' and claims that unsolicited benefits create no obligations to reciprocate. He presents an example in which the other members of the neighborhood have discovered a public address system, and decide to institute a scheme for public entertainment. Each person is assigned a day on which to broadcast— play records, tell jokes, sing, and so on— for the benefits of all. I have enjoyed 137 days of entertainment from others. On day 138 when my turn comes, do I have a duty to give up my day to entertain the rest. Nozick thinks that obviously I don't have any moral duty or obligation to do it, because I have not asked for it and may not enjoy all the programmes too.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 162 16.8 Conclusion While the different theories of political obligation may offer different interpretations of the ground for political obligation, only a blind, rigid supporter of state power would argue that there is no limit to political obligation whatsoever or that we are obliged to unconditionally obey any command of the state authority and its laws however oppressive they may seem. Thus there are possibilities of resistance to state power even in the divine right theory. If the kings had the divine right to rule, then the royal power must protect the interests of the subjects to get divine approval. If he goes against the divine will the subjects have the divine right to resist. In modern theory of political obligation, the right to resist perhaps is expressed in clear and strongest terms in John Locke's liberal philosophy. In the last two chapters of Second Treatise, titled 'Tyranny' and 'Of the Dissolution of Government', Locke argues repeatedly for the right of the people to rebel against a government which fails in preserving their life, liberty and possession. Apprehending that his argument giving so much importance to the right to resist may seem like a law-breaker's charter, giving birth to anarchy, Locke put the responsibility on the ruler. He says in categorical terms that a government or a prince, acting against the interests of the people puts 'himself into a state of war with his people' and so the government or the Prince is responsible for the disorder, not the resisting people. The roots of resistance is there even in the Utilitarian theory, even though Bentham referred to it with great caution : " It is then, we may say, and not till then, allowable to, if not incumbent on, every man, as well on the score of duty as of interest, to enter into measures of resistance; when, according to the best calculation he is able to make, the probable mischiefs of resistance (speaking with respect to the community in general) appear less to him than the probable mischiefs of submission. This, then, is to him, that is, to each man in particular, the juncture of resistance." Bentham perhaps tried to base the right to resist on a utilitarian basis, instead of one based on contract, but with the highest degree of caution. In contemporary philosophy one of the most influential thinkers, John Rawls also in his 'A Theory of Justice' discussed the possibility of non-violent, civil disobedience against the government under a 'nearly just society.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 163 16.9 Summing Up ? The concept of political obligation is related with the laws of the state. Citizens obey the laws of the state because as J.S. Mill argued that some sort of restraint on the behaviour of others is necessary. ? It is only the state which may resort to enforcement of restraint. The state accepts the responsibility of protecting everyone who resides within its territory. This is the reason for which we grant the state the monopoly of legitimate violence. ? Justification of the actions of the state thus leads to universal political obligations. ? The oldest theory of political obligation is the divine right theory. According to this theory King directly represents God. Political obligation is thus based on the idea that the subjects while obeying the order of the king are obeying the order of the God. Monarch is not accountable to the people because his right to rule is derived from divine authority. ? The idea of consent as the basis of political obligation found its valid ground in the social contract theories propounded by Hobbes, Locke and Rousseau. The state appears to have universal authority which emerges from the consent of the every individual. ? Further political obligation is also related with the idea of tacit consent. It is argued that consent may be given in a less obvious or explicit way. Voting is a way of tacit consent. ? Political obligation can also be explained through the concept of utilitarianism. ? We have a moral duty to obey the state and its laws if it contributes to general happiness. ? Concept of political obligation may be also explained from the viewpoint of idealist theory. In the modern era, idealist theory of political obligation was propounded by the German philosopher Hegel and English philosophers like T.H. Green and Bosanquet. According to Aristotle the state is aimed at the highest good. Aristotle argued that through the state and the laws man attains his highest NSOU ? CC-PS-03 164 virtue and perfection. In Greek thought political obligation is based on the fact that man's emancipation is only possible in the city state. Hegel is considered as the main exponent of idealist thought. Hegel was of the opinion that individual freedom is embodied in the modern institutions of family, civil society and the state. But instead of family and civil society, it is the state where concrete freedom can be realised. ? T.H. Green offered new moral justification of obligation to state authority in his Idealist philosophy. Man's moral development is very much dependent on his personal efforts which are facilitated by a set of external conditions. The state, according to Green, provides these external conditions. ? Political obligation may be also explained on the basis of the principle of 'fair play'. This principle was explicitly formulated by philosopher H.L. Hart. According to Hart receiving benefits binds one to the state. It is unfair for an individual to enjoy benefits from the state without accepting the necessary burdens that helps to produce these benefits. John Rawls explained this principle referring to the duty derived from the principle as the duty of fair play. ? However, exponents of fair play have faced serious criticisms Robert Nozick objects that the principle of fair play would allow others to place us under an obligation to them simply by conferring benefits on us. Further, fair play considerations apply only to co-operative schemes that produce benefits one may refuse. 16.10 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. NSOU ? CC-PS-03 167 parts of the world. While the movements of Gandhi and Martin Luther King Jr are often represented as the success of civil disobedience movement, it is equally important to refer to the non-violent movement against apartheid led by Nelson Mandela, the long movement against military rule in Myanmar led by Aung San Suu Kyi, the Solidarity movement in Poland led by Lech Walesa, the environmental movements emerging in India and different parts of the world as important chapters in this success story. It is pertinent, perhaps, to mention here how the teenage girl climate activist, Greta Thunberg, the new icon of the global fight against climate change, is described by some sections of the western media as 'Little Gandhi'.

17.3 The Idea of Civil Disobedience The idea of civil disobedience was introduced in modern Western political thought by Henry David Thoreau 150 years ago. Since that time civil disobedience has often been regarded as a mechanism of working democracy, one of the accepted ways of expressing citizens' disagreement with authorities and a minorities' disagreement with the majority. In his famous essay 'Civil Disobedience' published in 1849 Thoreau emphasized the fact that an individual has to be faithful to his or her conscience and do only what each believes to be right regardless of the demands of society or the laws made by the state. Thoreau, driven by his anarchist position, placed individual conscience above the political obligation to the state. Guided by this spirit Thoreau disobeyed the US government for acting immorally in upholding slavery and waging war against Mexico. Thoreau publicly condemned those acts and refused to pay taxes in protest. In July 1846 he was arrested. Thoreau's minor act of defiance led him to the conclusion that it was not enough to be against the unjust act of the government . A person of conscience had to act. ' Civil Disobedience' was , in fact, an activist manifesto. Thoreau argued that a government must end an unjust act to earn the moral right to collect taxes from the citizens. He declared in no certain terms that if the government of the day forced the citizens to participate in injustice by obeying unjust laws ' then people should break the laws ' even if they ended up in prison. "under a government which imprisons anyone unjustly" , he said, " the true place for a just man is also a prison." It is difficult to define 'Civil Disobedience'. In our time John Rawls in his path breaking book ' A Theory contrary to law usually done with the aim of bringing about a change in the law or policies of the government." 17.4

Origin of the concept Some commentators trace the origin of civil disobedience in the long and varied history of western thought. Thus one can find a faint expression of this idea in the Antigone theme in Greek dramas. In fact the long history of western civilization has always been a conflict between individual freedom and the political authority of the state which finds reflection in the idea of civil disobedience. Thus Socrates considered search for truth as the fundamental aim of human life. He believed that human life could flourish only within a society and it was the duty of the individual to obey the state. But under no circumstances he was ready to sacrifice his inner truth, his conscience at the altar of the state. He strongly believed that the state had no right to force the individual to act unjustly. The core idea involved here inspired the notion of civil disobedience. Some critics also trace the idea of civil disobedience in the liberal tradition of Europe especially in the political thought of thinkers like John Locke, Jeremy Bentham, and John Stuart Mill. Locke advocated the concept of the right to resistance - "people have a right to resume their original liberty and to establish a new government." He was convinced that people had the right to resist, the right to have civil disobedience to restore their rights to life, liberty and property, the three rights being included within the 'right to property'. Bentham also advocated that conscientious citizens have to 'enter into measures of resistance as a matter of duty as well as interest.'. But nowhere can one find the idea of civil disobedience in more clear terms as in the thought of Henry David Thoreau for whom civil laws that come into conflict with moral laws have no moral right to exist.

17.5 Gandhi and Civil Disobedience

Gandhi didn't read Thoreau's 'Civil Disobedience' when he first started the civil disobedience or Satyagraha when Transvaal passed a law in 1907 requiring the registration and fingerprinting of all Indians, giving the police the power to enter their houses to ensure registration of all the Indians. It was during his prison term that he came to know and read Thoreau's 'Civil Disobedience' Like Thoreau Gandhi believed that an individual NSOU ? CC-PS-03 169 is a moral agent taking a moral position on the question of obeying a state's law or an order. As moral beings, citizens had a duty to decide to whom they should give their loyalty and support and under what conditions. Their loyalty should not be taken for granted. When a law is just, they had a 'sacred duty' to give it their 'willing and spontaneous obedience'. But when it is unjust and morally unacceptable, they had the opposite duty to disobey it. They can't be forced to participate in the state's act of injustice and incur the moral responsibility for its consequences. Gandhi described civil disobedience as the doctrine of 'Satyagraha', or 'Truth Force'. For him the word 'civil' expresses the peaceful, courteous and 'civilized' nature of the resistance. Initially, Gandhi accepted the expression 'passive resistance' to refer to civil disobedience. But to him, it was not enough to resist injustice perpetrated by a state, but it is equally important to do it without any feeling of animosity. Gandhi's aim was to win over the enemy by what he called 'surgery of the soul'. Thus subsequently Gandhi discarded the term 'passive resistance' and decided to use the term 'satyagraha' which was, to him, devoid of any animosity, hatred and violent means. It is based on spiritual purity. Like Tolstoy Gandhi was opposed to all forms of violence in political actions. For him nonviolence (Ahimsa) and truth are inseparable. As Gandhi said: "Satyagraha largely appears to the public as Civil Disobedience or Civil Resistance. It is civil in the sense that it is not criminal. The lawbreaker..... openly and civilly breaks (unjust laws) and quietly suffers the penalty for their breach. And in order to register his protest against the actions of the lawgivers, it is open to him to withdraw his cooperation from the state by disobeying such other laws whose breach does not constitute moral turpitude. In my opinion the beauty and efficacy of Satyagraha are so great that it can be preached even to children." Gandhi strongly believed that, faced with injustice of the state, every individual has a birth right to start civil disobedience. He wrote in 1920: "I wish I could persuade everybody that civil disobedience is the inherent right of a citizen. He does not give it up without ceasing to be a man. Civil disobedience, therefore, becomes a sacred duty, when the state has become lawless, or which is the same thing, corrupt. And a citizen that barter with such a state, shares in corruption or lawlessness." In 1918, Gandhi used the civil disobedience movement in India during his campaign for the textile workers of Ahmedabad. The Salt Satyagraha of 1930, the civil disobedience movement for independence in 1930 and his fast unto death for the development of social conditions of the untouchables in 1939 are some of examples of civil disobedience led by Gandhi in NSOU ? CC-PS-03 170 India. Some of the other important civil disobedience movements of the last century are the movement against apartheid policies of South African Government in 1952, the American civil rights movement led by Martin Luther King Jr. from 1955 till his assassination in 1968, to mention a few.

17.6 Features of the Civil Disobedience Movement

It is not difficult to identify the features of civil disobedience after analysing Gandhi's views on the same. But most of the commentators refer to some features of civil disobedience which are as follows:

Conscientiousness: The first feature of civil disobedience is that it must be committed consciously, intentionally, with the civil disobedient breaching the law with seriousness, sincerity, and moral conviction. Through their disobedience, the civil disobedients try to draw attention to laws and policies that they believe require reassessment or rejection. Here it is important to mention that this civil disobedience can be both direct or indirect. Direct civil disobedience requires action carried out directly to violate a law which is challenged. But in the case of indirect civil disobedience the norm or law violated is not the one being challenged as in the case of sit-ins in public places when the traffic regulations are not the ones being challenged. In Rawls's view, in a nearly just society civil disobedients try to appeal to the majority to show that, in their considerate opinion, the principle of justice governing liberty and equality has not been respected by the policy makers. However critics point out inherent flaws in Rawls's arguments. Thus a whole range of legitimate values not reducible to justice or liberty and equality like transparency, stability, privacy integrity may motivate people to participate in civil disobedience. Moreover climate activists today in different parts of the world take resort to civil disobedience not for liberty, equality and justice referred to by Rawls. They also fight for a kind of justice, often described as climate justice, which is understood in a sense quite different from that of Rawls.

Publicity: Civil disobedience must be a public act. Performing a public act gives it a symbolic value and allows reaching widespread intended to raise public awareness of the case. This element of civil disobedience is highly endorsed by Rawls who argues that disobedience should never be covert and secretive, as this would defeat the very purpose

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 171 of civil disobedience which is intended to communicate with the people and seek their moral support against an unjust act of the state. As Hugo A. Bedau says that it is essential to the dissenters purpose that both the government and public should know what she intends to do. But publicity sometimes undermines the attempt to communicate through civil disobedience. If a person gives prior publicity to her intention to breach a law she gives both her opponents and the law enforcing agencies the opportunity to abort her effort to communicate. For this reason, unnoticed or covert disobedience is sometimes more effective than civil disobedience organized with prior notice or publicity. There are many examples like the animal rights activists releasing animals from research laboratories, peace movement activists reaching a Nuclear research site, environmental activists attacking a thermal Power plant or nuclear power plants in Europe. Such acts of civil disobedience, however, is followed by an open acknowledgement of the act and the reasons for doing it. Subsequent openness and publicity gives the action a moral legitimacy in the people's eyes, makes the much needed communication possible and offers the activists the opportunity to show their willingness to deal fairly with state authorities.

Nonviolence: For Gandhi civil disobedience by definition should be civil; that is it should be public and non-violent. The civil disobedient who, according to Gandhi, is a satyagrahi must convince the opponent the intensity of the satyagrahi's feeling and give him the last chance of negotiation. He championed the effectiveness of satyagraha in terms of the spiritual impact of suffering love. The satyagrahi's love for his opponent and moral nobility disarmed the latter, defused his feeling of anger and hatred and sends an appeal to his higher nature. A satyagrahi's uncomplaining suffering denied the opponent a sense of victory, mobilized the neutral public opinion creating the space for introspection and negotiation. Some theorists like John Rawls argue that civil disobedience by definition is non-violent. According to Rawls violent acts likely to injure are incompatible with civil disobedience as a mode of address. That is why, according to Rawls, Gandhi and Martin Luther King Jr represent, classic examples of non-violent direct action. However there are disputes regarding the centrality of non-violence to the concept of civil disobedience. First, there is a problem of specifying the appropriate notion of non-violence - whether some acts causing minor injuries should also be included in a conception of violence. Second, some non-violent and legal acts cause more harms to others than violent acts.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 172 A legal , peaceful strike by ambulance workers may cause more harm to the society than what can be done by some minor acts vandalism. Third, sometimes limited violence may heighten the communicative quality of civil disobedience by drawing attention to the dissenter's cause by emphasising her seriousness and frustration. Notwithstanding such criticisms, generally non-violence is preferable to violence in any act of civil disobedience. As a matter of prudence too, non-violence has less possibilities of antagonising potential allies and or confirming the antipathy of the opponent. Besides, non-violence does not distract the attention of the public, and denies authorities an excuse of resorting to violence against civil disobedients. That is why perhaps, the state authorities sometimes, by some acts of subversion, try to push the non-violent activists to the path of violence to get an excuse to make violent counter offensive. Another feature of civil disobedience, mentioned by some commentators, is that civil disobedience should be a collective action, not individual action .The movement must be carried out collectively to achieve success. However there are serious disputes regarding this feature of civil disobedience. It is not clear why an individual act of civil disobedience should not be brought under the rubric of Civil Disobedience. An important feature of civil disobedience is that the civil disobedient should take resort to an act of civil disobedience accepting the eventualities of a sanction . A fundamental difference between civil disobedience and ordinary crimes is the willingness of the offender to accept legal consequences. The willingness of the civil disobedients to accept punishment is taken not only as a mark of general fidelity to the law , but also a statement that they differ from ordinary offenders who , usually, does not want to make it known that she has violated the law and does not want to suffer from her unlawful action. Accepting punishment can have great strategic value as Martin Luther King Jr observed, ' If you confront a man who has been cruelly misusing you, and say " punish me, if you will; I do not deserve it, but I will accept it, so that the world will know that I am right and you are wrong", then you wield a powerful and just weapon.' Judging by these criteria of civil disobedience, it is difficult to describe even David Thoreau as a civil disobedient, for neither did he give publicity to his act of disobedience of not paying taxes as mark of protest against the state nor was his act was a collective one. In our time when teenage climate activist Geta Thunberg started her act of civil

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 173 disobedience by her sit-ins with a placard in her hands, she was a lonely climate crusader going almost unnoticed initially. Another problem of civil disobedience is its efficacy under a cruelly authoritarian regime. Rawls also says that this instrument of struggle can get success in a nearly 'just society'. Perhaps the people of Myanmar trying to fight the authoritarian military regime in their country recently has learnt this bitter truth. 17.7 Conclusion ? In today's world, the environmental and climate activists are exploring in their innovative ways the wide significance of civil disobedience, focused as they are on the most pressing problem of the present world- sustainability due to climate change. ? Greenpeace movement, the movements of 'Extinction Rebellion', or Fridays for Future (the school strike for climate under the inspiration of Geta Thunberg) are some of the leading movements of our time as more people participate in their civil disobedience actions to save our mother planet. ? Unlike all the previous Civil disobedience movements , these are innovative in the sense that these activists have helped to reach an international consensus (their cause being backed by science) and they make use of new propaganda techniques by wide use of internet and social networking sites. Here lies the relevance of the Civil Disobedience movement in the 21 st century as a tool of protest when the mankind are confronting massive injustice. 17.8 Summing Up ? The concept of cultural relativism, its meaning and implications ? Relations between cultural relativism and multiculturalism 18.2 Introduction We live in a fast changing world society. People belonging to various cultures are increasingly coming into contact with each other. In today's world cultural differences are more prevalent than cultural Universals. In this context the interaction among people with distinct culture can be positive or negative depending on the degree of sensitivity and respect people have for other cultural groups. These two types of responses are related to the two important concepts- ethnocentrism and cultural relativism. Negative responses towards others cultural groups arise out of ethnocentrism, while positive responses are the results of a culturally relativist approach. Cultures often vary greatly in their ethical concepts of right and wrong. Cultural relativism, the theory that what is morally right and wrong depends only on one's culture, attempts to address the difference in ethical standards across cultures. It is a heuristic device of fundamental importance because it calls attention to the importance of all possible variant forms and conditions. However, the principle of cultural relativism is not without its flaws.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 176 18.3 Cultural Relativism : Meaning and basic principles In anthropology, cultural relativism is traditionally traced back to American anthropologist Franz Boas. Boas articulated the idea that civilization is relative and the meaning of particular ideas and conception should be understood in the local context. The idea was later developed by his students. Cultural relativism is the idea that each culture is to be evaluated on the basis of its own values and norms of behavior and not on the basis of those of another culture. According to Melville Herskovits, Boas's student, the basic principle out of which cultural relativism emerged is "judgments are based on experience and experience is interpreted by each individual in terms of his or her own enculturation" Cultural relativism was in part a response to western ethnocentrism. Social and cultural anthropology reacted against this by committing itself to salvage distinct forms of life from a process of global westernization. Cultural relativism was initially elaborated as a methodological concept. In his work, Boas used the concept of culture against the racist views of 19th century scholars and their evolutionary representation of primitive peoples. He rejected the idea of ranking primitive peoples ethnocentrically in relation to modern societies. He envisaged culture as a totality. In this view culture is a Universe, a vast field in which we and our civilization occupy only one place of many. This was a departure from ethnocentricity toward relativity. Boas rejected the idea of the universal standards of comparison promoted by the theory of evolution and in the process paved the way for the eventual emergence of cultural relativism. This theoretical and methodological approach inspired by German philosopher Herder allowed Boas to highlight the specificity, diversity and incommensurability of cultural systems. The popularization of cultural relativism after World War II was a reaction to such historical events as Nazism, colonialism, ethnocentrism and racism. In his book, Man and his works, Herskovits gave a concise statement of cultural relativism. For him every society has code of conduct, an ethical system a moral code, which the individual members hardly question. In philosophical terms, cultural relativism is a perspective which in recognizing the values set up by every society to guide its own life, puts emphasis on the dignity of social custom and on the need for tolerance of conventions even though they may differ from one's own. The philosophical perspective of cultural relativism enabled scholars to recognize the validity of every set of norms for the people whose lives are guided by them. For Herskovits, the epistemological function of anthropological research is to observe describe and analyze systems of value

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 177 and acknowledge the validity of specificities of distinctive moral regime even if these moral regimes are maintained to justify existing social inequalities. The political function of anthropological research is to reject ethnocentric accounts of the social world and to promote a tolerant attitude. 18.4 Critique of Cultural Relativism Classical cultural relativism has been debated by scholars for more than a half century. Today's consensus is that, classical cultural relativism has significant flaws. It tends to exaggerate the internal coherence of individual cultures. It overstates differences between societies and underplays the possibility of transcending these differences. It invites moral relativism and fosters hostility to comparative analysis. Critics have noted that proponents of classical cultural relativism are inclined to contradict their own core principle by criticizing the social institutions and practices of western societies when assessing non western societies. They have a tendency to serve as critic at home and conformist elsewhere. A major complaint against cultural relativism is that by explaining human thought and behavior exclusively with reference to particular cultures, it has marginalized the study of human nature in the broadest sense. The problem is that culture relativism is primarily directed to difference and hence it tends to underestimate the universals. These universals are treated as constants and therefore of limited utility in the interpretation of behavior in specific settings. Cultural relativism tends to view reality exclusively from its own narrow perspective. The basic premise of anthropology is that all experience is culturally mediated. All known reality is culturally determined. Once this basic assumption is granted then it follows that all modes of perception and all value judgment are also culturally determined. In this view culture constitutes a closed system and culture alone is autonomous and independent. All other modes of human experience and thought are dependent on culture for their own form and content. However, it is important to realize that culture is but one of the conditions of human experience. According to W. Kymlicka, cultural relativism violates one of our deepest shared understandings. For the cultural relativists, slavery is wrong if our society disapproves it. But this is not how most people understand slavery. People disapprove slavery because it is wrong. Further, it is difficult to identify shared understandings about different issues if only the voices of the vocal and powerful are taken into account and ignore the weak and the marginalized people.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 178 Despite its flaws cultural relativism is a set of ideas useful as an intellectual tool. The limits of its usefulness are determined by the problems at hand and the skill of the person who wields it. Cultural relativism's historical role in encouraging cross-cultural understanding cannot be ignored. This is what Herskovits and other Boasians intended when they articulated it. The simplicity of cultural relativism's basic principles acts as a useful brake on analytical complacency. Alasdair Macintyre acknowledges relativism's role as a check on conclusions that otherwise seem self-evident. In fact cultural relativism disciplines the imagination and prompts us to observe carefully while avoiding the temptation to take much for granted. Cultural relativism is not the same as ethical relativism. Cultural relativism has an exclusive cross-cultural reference. Cultural relativism, according to Herskovits, suggests that every society has its own moral code to guide members of that society. But these values are of worth to those who live by them; though they may differ from our own. Thus it raises the question of the validity of applying the criteria that guide the thinking of the people of one society to the standards of another. Ethical relativism raises the question of whether any standards can be drawn to direct individual conduct within any one society. Cultural relativism does not advocate ethical relativism. 18.5 Cultural Relativism and Multiculturalism Many critics of multiculturalism take for granted the assumption that ethical or cultural relativism is a constitutive element of the theory of multiculturalism. The question of ethical relativism arises most sharply in connection with the problem of the oppression of minorities within minorities. Many liberal and feminist critics raised the objection that the majority of a given cultural minority is able to abuse its collective rights in order to oppress the vulnerable members of that minority. Critics argue that the multicultural recognition of diversity appears to bring about an unavoidable dilemma between individual and collective rights. In emphasizing group rights multiculturalism presents itself as a form of cultural determinism that restricts individual's freedom of choice. Thus multiculturalism indirectly limits the freedom of minority members. This becomes particularly evident when some cultural groups see individual freedom as a threat to their cultural identity and to the boundaries they have set up to protect it. By supporting cultural diversity multiculturalism does not break down cultural barriers. It reinforces those barriers and creates suspicion and hostility between minority groups and between them and members of the majority.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 179 Critics assert that multicultural recognition is inherently limited in two interrelated ways. First, it aims to protect diversity irrespective of cultural practices. The anthropological debate on culture suggests that instead of focusing on culture as an abstract set of values we should focus on cultural practices. From this perspective emphasis should be put on practices which create conditions within which diverse ways of living can peacefully coexist. Second, multiculturalism wants to protect minority cultures as if they were immutable, while at the same time demands dramatic changes in the majority culture. Multicultural policies aim at promoting a democratic pluralist integration not on the basis of reciprocal respect but on the basis of toleration. Historically this kind of reciprocity has made possible the co-existence of different cultures in many countries. Relativist view that cultures and values are incommensurable does not provide the best foundation for the acknowledgement of cultural rights. For the view of incommensurability of cultural values can be abused to defend practices that marginalize, degrade or harm people. If cultures are incommensurable, then no neutral standards are available by which different cultural claims can be assessed and measured. Multiculturalists employ three distinct strategies to meet this objection. According to Charles Taylor, the hypothesis that the various ways of being human are ultimately incommensurable is possible, but it is doubtful. He draws attention to the risk of relativism and warns that cultural openness while necessary for understanding other cultures and tradition, should not lead to the questioning of the very idea of truth in human affairs. For him it is wrong to believe that accepting cultural differences necessitates abandoning allegiance to truth. Bhikhu Parekh contests moral relativism on the ground of "minimum universalism" or "pluralist universalism", conceived as a middle ground between relativism on the one hand and moral monism on the other. According to him, relativism mistakenly ignores cross culturally shared human properties which give rise to some basic norms of human well-being common and valid to all societies. He argues that culture do not exist in a vacuum. They are embedded in and limited by the universally shared features of human existence. He contends that cultural relativists mistakenly believe that a culture is a tightly integrated and self-contained whole and determines its members. In the similar vein, Margaret Moore observes that radical cultural and moral relativism does not necessarily follow from the recognition of multiple cultural values. She argues that it might not be possible to produce a full-scale ranking of diverse human values, but it might be possible to identify what is morally evil. It is possible to acknowledge that there are certain evils like cruelty, human suffering- that any moral system should recognize and prohibit.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 180 18.6 Conclusion Foregoing analysis suggests that the thesis of incommensurability of cultures and values which usually underlines the position of cultural relativism is debatable. This in turn appears to support the view that it is possible to identify certain cultures as more valuable than others and to discredit moral relativism as an inappropriate foundation of multiculturalism. The reason for this is that it can tolerate some cultural practices that are unacceptable in terms of basic minimum human functioning. 18.7 Summing Up ? In the early 20th century American anthropologist Franz Boas used the concept of culture against the racist views of 19th century scholars. ? Cultural relativism was in part a response to western ethnocentrism. ? It is based on the idea that a person's beliefs, values and practices should be explained based on person's own culture. ? Critics argue that cultural relativism overstate differences between societies and under plays universals. ? For some critics multiculturalism in emphasizing group rights presents itself as a form of cultural determinism. ? However multi cultural theorist, such as, Charles Taylor, Bhikhu Parekh and Margaret Moore argue that relativism ignores cross cultural shared human properties. 18.8 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. 19.2 Introduction Individual liberty was deeply cherished by the advocates of liberal democracy since the beginning of its journey in Europe. Locke put liberty at the centre of European politics - the rights to life, liberty and property being the three inalienable, natural rights. Rousseau considered freedom an essential attribute of being human. Liberty of thought, expression and action was central to Mill's idea of democracy.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 183 From the seventeenth century the concept of equality along with liberty was placed at the core of democratic theory. Once civil and political liberties were granted to persons of all classes, colour and gender were no longer the basis of excluding people from the political sphere, thinking about differences took a new turn undergoing changes that brought new challenges to liberal democratic theory and practice. Social differences began to reassert themselves without accompanying fear of legitimising discrimination. In the changed scenario the focus was shifted to cultural differences. Liberal democracies had to negotiate these new claims of cultural differences. Previously race, religion, and gender were based for unequal treatment to be meted out to different people. Now, cultural differences between communities, with their distinctive ways of life, values, norms, dress codes were viewed positively. Instead of indicators of stratification, they became so many markers of identity, self-respect, self-esteem demanding recognition from the society and the state. The celebration of cultural differences seemed to fit into the concept of liberty, not so was, perhaps, the case with the idea of equality. Both liberty and the idea of cultural differences fostered the idea of diversity. By contrast, the idea of cultural differences comes into conflict with the idea of equality as understood previously in democratic theory. In fact the proponents of multiculturalism were critical of the principle of formal equality on the ground that it leads to the erasure of all cultural differences treating and categorising every member of the nation state as citizen only, camouflaging the homogenising cultural bias of the nation state. Multiculturalism can be described as the central feature of the world we live in now. Whether we accept or reject the fact of cultural differences in the modern state, we simply can't wish away the reality of multiculturalism. Strangely, however, for a long time it was ignored in the western world despite decades of struggle by black Americans for full political inclusion, the confederalism adopted by several European states to accommodate linguistic and religious diversity and the multicultural policies pursued by Australia and Canada in the 1970s, to mention a few. While in the 1980s the communitarian writers championed the culture-friendly virtues of solidarity, togetherness and belonging, it was never spelt out which communities— cultural or otherwise—was being referred to. It was only the context of the liberal - communitarian debate in the 1990s that communitarianism transformed itself to a broader debate about how to accommodate cultural and ethnic claims within the framework of liberal democracy. In this context Will Kymlicka's Liberalism, Community and Culture broke new ground.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 184 Theories of democracy, justice, freedom, equality are abstract theories which often do not help us to address the issues of the right to have a particular dress code of persons belonging to a particular community, hate speech against a particular community, the cultural rights of the immigrants. These are all concrete questions, culture-specific questions. It is not that we can accommodate the multicultural reality in the existing theories of democracy, justice, freedom and equality, because often these theories are formulated in a culture-blind way. So the challenge of multiculturalism demands a reformulation and redefinition of these theories.

19.3 Bhiku Parekh's analysis of the forms of cultural diversity and multicultural rights Bhiku Parekh analyses four major forms of cultural diversity and consequent forms of multicultural rights. First, the indigenous peoples, such as the Amerindians, the Maoris, the Australian aborigines, the Inuits and others like them, want to preserve their distinct and largely pre modern ways of life. Although they once enjoyed independence which they lost to the white colonizers, they do not generally want to form themselves into independent states. Their claim is generally restricted to the demand to retain their land, cultures and traditional ways of life within the framework of the existing states. Sometimes they demand the right to have special representation in the legislatures. Secondly, there are territorially concentrated and politically self-conscious communities that want to preserve their distinct languages and cultures, if possible within the existing states, if not by achieving independence from the existing states. The French speaking people in Quebec, the Basques, the Catalonians in Spain, the Tamils in Sri Lanka, the Muslims in Kashmir fall within this category. Unlike the first group they are not opposed to wider society's modern ways of life and socio-economic, political aspirations. But they have a distinct linguistic and cultural identity which, they think, they can't preserve within the framework of the traditional federal state granting them administrative autonomy. Thirdly, there are immigrants, ethnic minorities and religious communities who, unlike the first two groups, neither demand to be left alone nor seek political autonomy. They, generally, seek the cultural space to retain and transmit their ways of life. Finally the demand for recognition and cultural diversity may also come from groups of men and women sharing in common a self-chosen life-style — like NSOU ? CC-PS-03 185 the gays, lesbians and other groups of people opting for unconventional ways of living. Such groups demand not only toleration, but respect for what they consider their unconventional practices. They are not distinct ethnic groups, their ways of life are not radically different from the mainstream of society. But have developed a kind of subculture with their unconventional life practices within the shared framework of common culture.

19.4 Core themes of multiculturalism Four themes are identified by Andrew Heywood as the core themes of multiculturalism — Post-colonialism, Identity and Culture, Minority Rights, Diversity. Postcolonialism: Postcolonialism gave a fillip to multiculturalism by challenging the cultural hegemony of the west and legitimising nonwestern cultural practices, traditions and political ideas. Edward Said's path-breaking work 'Orientalism' is often considered the most influential text of postcolonialism. Frantz Fanon's theory of imperialism analysed the psychological dimension of colonial subjugation. To Edward Said Orientalism is a sign of Europe-Atlantic power over the Orient which produces a body of knowledge creating a stereotype of the 'Orient'. In his words Orientalism is 'system of knowledge about the Orient, an accepted grid for filtering through the Orient into Western consciousness.' Taking the cue from Gramsci's idea of hegemony, Edward Said considers Orientalism 'the hegemony of European ideas about the Orient, themselves reiterating the European superiority over Oriental backwardness', usually overriding the possibility of an independent, authentic voice on this matter. Postcolonialism made some important contributions to the movement of multiculturalism. Firstly, by challenging the Eurocentric worldviews it gave a distinctive space to non-western cultures, ideas, religions and philosophies and encouraged their broader reassessment. Secondly, it brought to the fore the political importance of different varying cultures getting free from the bias of Eurocentrism and colonial legacy.

19.5 Identity and Culture Needless to say that multiculturalism is a kind of identity politics in the face of the challenges coming from the homogenising culture of the modern nation state or the dominant culture of the majority community. So it is the result of a sense of perceived injustice and driven by that perception it tries to strengthen the sense of collective identity of the members and the commonality of their shared life

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 186 experiences. Identity in this sense connects the personal to the social and considers the individual 'embedded' in a cultural, social, institutional or ideological context. Multiculturalism, in other words is rooted in a communitarian view of human nature, as against the liberal idea of 'disengaged', 'unencumbered' self. Communitarian theorists like Alistair MacIntyre and Michael Sandel point out the rootless atomism of liberal individualism. Canadian philosopher, Charles Taylor developed the idea of 'politics of recognition' explicitly built on the communitarian view of personal identity. Arguing for a model of liberal society that can include important collective goals, Taylor distinguishes between the crucial liberties central to any liberal society and the less critical rights and opportunities that may be overridden. The pro-French policies of Quebec are such a collective goal. The goal here is not just to sustain, but actively create a community of French speakers into the indefinite future. Taylor argues that individuals require, not just respect, but recognition, they need to be objects of others' positive attitudes. Taylor distinguishes between two modes of being in late modernity— autonomy and authenticity. While autonomy is the seed bed in which modern rational, disengaged self has grown, authenticity invokes alternative Romantic tradition of spontaneity, uniqueness and difference. There is a certain way of life that is my way. These two traditions are not opposite, but divergent. Taylor, however interprets authenticity not just in an individual sense, but also in a collective sense: cultures too have their own authentic essences which need recognition. Minority rights and Will Kymlicka : Kymlicka's Multicultural Citizenship wants to defend cultural protection along liberal lines. He distinguishes between cultural contexts, as media that provide meaning, orientation, identity, belonging and cultural options within that context. With that distinction Kymlicka tries to advance two divergent arguments. Cultures are a necessary frame of human action; hence there is a loss if one's cultural context begins to erode. This is justice argument, and it says that each person has the right to a secure cultural context, not just any context, but his/her own. The freedom argument says that people are free autonomous choosers, and what they choose between are different cultural options. Unitary optionless contexts, like seamless webs of shared values, would leave cultural members without liberal choices. Both these arguments ultimately lead to multiculturalism. Kymlicka distinguishes between national minorities and ethnic groups to advance different kinds of cultural rights. The national minorities are incipient nations who themselves incorporated into a larger multinational state. Examples include the aboriginal peoples in Canada and Australia, Maori in New Zealand and the various multinational groups that comprise multinational states like Switzerland and Belgium. Ethnic groups, on the other hand, are formed largely as a result of immigration.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 187 This category includes the diverse groups of migrants found in the USA, Canada and Australia, countries with highest rates of immigration, as well as the Turks in Germany, the immigrants from the Commonwealth countries in the UK, for example. The point of such distinction is to refer to the hierarchy of cultural rights required for different cultural minorities. The national minorities require the rights to special representation and devolved self-government, although in some cases it may extend to the right to secession and, therefore, to sovereign independence. The ethnic groups, formed mainly by the immigrants, on the other hand require rights to express their cultural distinctiveness through certain exemptions and privileges. This may include, for instance, legal exemptions of Jews and Muslims from animal slaughtering, the exemptions of Muslim girls from school dress codes. Kymlicka also emphasizes the need for special representation of minorities and disadvantaged groups in education and in senior positions in political and public life. Kymlicka supported 'reverse or positive discrimination as the only way of ensuring full and equal participation of minorities, which consequently guarantees public policies reflecting the interests of all groups and people, not merely those of the dominant groups. Judged from this perspective, multiculturalism goes against the principle of formal equality by granting preferential rights and privileges to certain groups to compensate for past injustice or present disadvantages, and thus associated with the principle of so-called, 'affirmative action', followed in many democracies. 19.6 Diversity Diversity lies at the core of multiculturalism. It is, however, different from conflict or lack of cohesion as feared by the nationalists. On the contrary multiculturalism is driven by the assumption that diversity and unity can coexist and the two should be combined to build multicultural citizenship and political cohesion. Diversity and respect for diversity can, in fact, act as an antidote to polarization in society. Multiculturalists believe that diversity is not only desirable, but should be celebrated. Diversity builds a vibrant society in which a variety of life-styles, cultural practices, traditions and beliefs enriches the overall health of the society. Multiculturalism, in this sense, is akin to ecologism, in drawing links between diversity and systemic health. Cultural diversity benefits the society in the same way that biodiversity benefits an ecosystem. Besides, respect for diversity promotes cross-cultural exchanges and fosters cross-cultural tolerance required for a healthy democracy. While all forms of multiculturalism propose a political vision which claims to reconcile diversity with civic cohesion, there is no unanimity about the nature of

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 188 society and polity they want to build up based on these core multicultural values. In other words, there is no agreement amongst the multiculturalists about how the liberal state should respond to their demands ,how they should go in positively endorsing cultural diversity in state policies. Andrew Heywood classifies three shades of multiculturalist answers or three models of multiculturalism: Liberal Multiculturalism , Cosmopolitan Multiculturalism, Pluralist Multiculturalism. 19.7 Liberal Multiculturalism Multiculturalism is often considered a threat to liberal values. But since the 1970s liberal thinkers have tried to address this issue of cultural diversity and developed a form of liberal multiculturalism . Central to this liberal multiculturalism is the idea of toleration and a desire to uphold the freedom of choice in moral sphere especially in matters relating to specific cultural and religious traditions. The cornerstone of this kind of liberal multiculturalism is the central importance of individual autonomy in cultural and religious sphere, the liberal state being considered 'neutral' to moral, cultural, religious choice of the citizens. However 'liberal toleration', is not morally neutral where a question of individual freedom and autonomy is involved. Liberal multiculturalism, thus, can't accommodate 'deep diversity' and often is not willing to accept cultural practices like arranged marriages and female dress codes as markers of a community's cultural identity. To the liberal multiculturalists an individual's freedom of choice gets precedence over the cultural rights of a community. They would, rather, like to confine the the community's cultural rights to the private sphere, while the public sphere is to remain an arena of shared civic allegiances . They would propose a kind of citizenship devoid of any cultural identity leading to a kind of civic nationalism which is compatible with multiculturalism. According to Heywood hyphenated expression like 'African- Americans', 'Polish-Americans', 'German-Americans' prevalent in the USA reflects this approach which emphasizes inclusion , rather than diversity, in the public sphere. In other words, liberal multiculturalism regards liberal 'democracy' as a preeminent value to be protected at any cost. Bhikhu Parekh calls it Assimilationist Liberalism which argues that the liberal state is a custodian of a way of life centered on the values of autonomy,, freedom of choice and independent thought. Minority ways of life, based on different set of values deny their members this freedom of choice threatening the integrity of liberal way of life. Assimilationist liberalism, in other words, insists on the importance of common citizenship, social cohesion and a shared system of meaning, the limit to a society's ability to tolerate cultural diversity. But

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 189 Bhikhu Parekh points out flaws in such line of argument. The liberalism, Parekh argues, values cultural diversity and pluralism on moral and epistemological grounds. As a liberal one would accept the fact that cultural diversity increases the range of available options,expands one's imagination and enriches life. Since this is so, a liberal can't privilege the liberal way of life, conduct an assimilationist campaign against all opposing values, projecting liberal way of life as the last word of human wisdom. 19.8 Cosmopolitan Multiculturalism Theorists like Jeremy Waldron equates multiculturalism with cosmopolitanism which enables an individual to accept and learn from multicultural values and ideas, not confined to any national borders. In other words, cosmopolitan multiculturalism celebrates diversity on the ground that each culture can learn from other cultures and it widens the possibility of individual self-development and enrichment in a world of wider cultural opportunities and options.. It can lead to even cultural hybridization and result in a pick -and - mix multiculturalism in which people may eat Italian food, practice Yoga, enjoy African songs, all at the same time. Culture, in this perspective , is fluid and changing perhaps like changing consumer choices. A multicultural society thus becomes a melting pot of different ideas, values and traditions. Bhikhu Parekh calls it ' cultural laissez-faire'. John Gray is one of the eading proponents of this approach. Extending the liberal principles of choice and competition to the realm of culture, proponents of this approach insist that every individual should be free to choose his or her way of life in a fair competition between several of them. Like the proponents of laissez-faire economy, Gray wants the state to eschew all the social, cultural or economic goals and confine itself to creating conducive conditions for individual choice.. As Bhikhu Parekh beautifully observes, such a line of argument proposes that culturally unattached individuals should be given the right to freely choose their ways of life in a kind of cultural supermarket. Such a view, as Parekh says, misunderstands both the individual, who is by nature, a cultural being, and culture which cannot be chosen in the manner of material goods. 19.9 Pluralist Multiculturalism Pluralism accommodates 'deep diversity ', thereby placing diversity on a firmer basis than does liberalism. Isaiah Berlin ,going beyond the liberal idea of toleration, NSOU ? CC-PS-03 190 proposes the idea of 'value pluralism' which allows space for disagreement over the ultimate ends of life, as it is not possible to establish the superiority of one value system over another. However Berlin's adherence to the core idea of liberalism is indicated by his belief that only a society that respects individual liberty can accommodate value pluralism. One of the leading proponents of an alternative basis for pluralism is Bhikhu Parekh. Parekh argues that human beings are cultural beings. As self-reflective beings they develop distinct cultures in the context of their natural and social experiences. Although all human beings share some common attributes which are species-driven, they are also structured and constituted and developed differently in different cultural settings. In this sense all human beings are culturally embedded. As cultures are human creations, respect for human beings demands respect for their cultures too. Cultural diversity is valuable not because it expands our choices of the ways of life in a 'cultural supermarket', but because it deepens our self-knowledge and helps us to borrow whatever is attractive in other cultures, integrating them into our own. Cultural diversity, then, is, to borrow an expression from Taylor, a collective good. It both gives the individual a sense of identity and rootedness while at the same time creating possibilities for enriching dialogues between different cultures. Such diversity, however, can't be protected and safeguarded by a policy of cultural laissez-faire. Since it is a 'collective' or 'public good', it cannot be left to the vagaries of the market. On the contrary, it needs the state's active role for its promotion and protection. The state can promote and sustain cultural diversity in different ways like providing public funds for teaching of minority languages, cultures, religions and so on. It can pursue group-related welfare policies, it can patronize minority religious and cultural functions, can even encourage self-governance for some minority communities.

19.10 Conclusion Multiculturalism has been criticised from different standpoints. Making a fierce attack on the liberal state's policies of positive discrimination John Gray has observed that by a dialectic twist of its own inner logic the response of dominant liberalism to the threat of cultural homogeneity has given birth to a new form of cultural imperialism, in which the remnants of overwhelmed traditions are preserved as spectacles for public consumption and subsidized ghettos. There are liberals who argue that the so-called fundamental or core values of their society are not negotiable. Thus customs and practices incompatible with these core values may rightly be NSOU ? CC-PS-03 191 banned. Bhikhu Parekh would argue that the idea of fundamental or core values is itself problematic and too elusive to be of much use. To talk of some core values is to reify those values and that can lead to another kind of cultural homogeneity. In spite of all the criticisms, it can be said that 'multiculturalism', to different degrees, has been accepted by almost all the major democracies of the world in principled liberalism. and in state policies. Herein, perhaps, lies its importance.

19.11 Summing Up ? Multiculturalism is a central feature of the present day world. Its proponents argue that the principle of formal equality reflects the homogenizing cultural bias of the nation state. ? Core themes of multiculturalism include identity and culture, minority rights, diversity and post colonialism. ? Liberal multiculturalism emphasizes individual autonomy in cultural and religious sphere. ? Cosmopolitan multiculturalism celebrate cultural diversity as it widens the possibility of individual self development. ? Pluralist multiculturalism lays emphasis on deep diversity. Berlin proposes the idea of value pluralism. Bhiku Parekh justifies cultural diversity because it deepens our self knowledge and helps us to borrow whatever is attractive in other cultures.

The fact of diversity is evident everywhere in our social world. Individuals express different preferences and judgments on the question of ways of organizing their personal and collective lives. Since the 1960s attitudes to personal morality have undergone profound changes. In the contemporary world the advent of multiculturalism has seen widespread moral religious and ethnic diversity. This has made toleration a pressing issue both socially and globally. The idea that nations are based on a single culture is untenable now. Increasing diversity in the social world has provoked ideological debate between the liberals and the conservatives. While liberals are seen as supporter of toleration and diversity, conservatives are portrayed as defenders of authoritative values and a common culture.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 194 20.3 Meaning of Toleration Toleration is a much misunderstood concept. In everyday language it is often taken to mean a willingness to leave alone, with little understanding of the motives that lie behind such an attitude. In this sense, toleration implies inaction, a refusal to interfere or willingness to bear with something. Toleration as a political value, however, refers to a specific form of inaction based on moral reasoning and a particular set of circumstances. Toleration does not mean permissiveness, blind indifference or willing indulgence. According to Andrew Heywood, toleration means forbearance, a willingness to accept form of behavior or beliefs of which one disapproves or simply dislike. Toleration in other words, is not morally neutral; it only applies to circumstances where there is disagreement with the views or action of others, combined with a deliberate refusal to act to prevent them. In this interpretation toleration is a principled unwillingness to impose one's views upon others, even when there is a clear capacity to do so. Toleration may be negative or positive. For the individual, the capacity to choose one's own moral beliefs, cultural practices and way of life, notwithstanding the disapproval of these by others, is an essential condition of freedom and self- development. This can be seen as negative toleration which justifies at least a live and let-live multiculturalism. On the other hand toleration, in its positive sense, by promoting diversity, contributes to the vigour and health of society and ensures progress by stimulating debate, argument and discussion. Thus toleration is both an ethical ideal and a social principle. On the one hand It represents the goal of individual autonomy, on the other hand, it establishes a set of rules concerning interpersonal behavior. 20.4 Liberalism and Toleration

Liberals envisage a tolerant inclusive society populated by people adhering to a variety of belief systems.

The distinguishing characteristics of liberal social ethic is willingness to accept moral, cultural and political diversity. In fact, diversity can be said to be rooted in the principle of liberalism and the assumption that human beings are separate and distinct creatures. To be precise, liberal support for diversity has more commonly been associated with toleration. Liberals justify toleration in at least three different ways:

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 195 Liberal support for toleration first emerged in the 17 th century in the writings of John Milton and John Locke to justify religious freedom. In a Letter concerning Toleration Locke asserted that the primary task of the government is to protect life, liberty and property and it has no right to interfere in matters related to individual conscience. He defended toleration on rational grounds. He believed that truth will come out of free competition among ideas and beliefs and therefore must be left to individual self. Religious truth cannot be taught and it should not be imposed by government. Individual, being rational, should be left to decide their own actions. Liberal argument is based on the assumption that most forms of intolerance originate from ignorance and prejudice and hence will crumble in the face of rational analysis. The second ground for justifying toleration is individual autonomy. Individuals are held to be independent and self-determining creatures John Stuart Mill expressed this view in his book On Liberty. For Mill autonomy is an essential condition for any form of personal development. Intolerance and the consequent restriction of the range of individual choice leads to the sacrifice of the entire moral courage of the human mind. Mill developed his famous "harm principle", the belief that individual freedom can be rightfully constrained only in order to prevent harm to others. Mill was particularly fearful of the threat to autonomy posed by the spread of democracy and by the consequent tyranny of the majority. In his judgment the power of majority would promote dull conformity and encourage individuals to submit their rational faculties to the popular prejudice of the day. The third justification for toleration is that it is good for the society as well as the individual. Mill argued that political, cultural and moral diversity will ensure free competition among rival ideas and doctrines and in the process good ideas will displace the bad one and truth will conquer falsehood. However Mill admitted that debate, discussion and argument will be continuous because no absolute truth can ever be established. Hence social progress demands the scrupulous maintenance of toleration to ensure free market of ideas. 20.5 Limits of Toleration In a pluralist society different faiths and culture co-exist and there is likely to be friction and offence. One group's festivities might seem like an attack on another group. As values and philosophies compete in the marketplace of ideas, the competition will often seem disrespectful as each group tries to discredit its opponents. It is not easy to define the duty of mutual toleration under these circumstances or to sustain the distinction between harm and offence that a pluralist society requires. However, the line between public and private on the one hand and NSOU ? CC-PS-03 196 individual ethics and cultural observance on the other is always going to be an issue. In a pluralist society a religion may have its own values with a distinctive bearing on the problems of social life. It may impose particular obligation on its members which may or may not be compatible with the society's broader social arrangements. According to

Andrew Heywood liberal toleration extends only to views values and practice that are themselves tolerant. It tolerates ideas and actions that are compatible with individual freedom and autonomy. Liberals cannot accommodate "deep diversity" advocated by some multiculturalists. Emphasis on autonomy means that liberals usually place individual rights above the rights of cultural, religious or ethnic groups. Liberals have been critical of the indoctrination of children and restriction on members access to rival views and alternative lifestyle. Liberals do not assume that societies are stable if they are based on shared values and common culture. They often insist that moral and cultural diversity should be confined to private life and should not be allowed to intrude into the public sphere. Liberals usually support moral and cultural diversity operating within the context of a shared citizenship. According to Heywood liberal democracy is taken to be the sole legitimate political system. Because it ensures that government is based on the consent of the people and it provides guarantees for individual freedom and toleration. Liberals may therefore be willing to ban fascist or militant fundamentalist groups that try to overthrow liberal democracy.

20.6 Toleration and Neutrality

Disapproval is essential to the idea of toleration. Absence of disapproval might suggest political neutrality. However liberal democracy with which toleration is associated does not presuppose a neutral state. Neutrality is thought to be incompatible with toleration for the simple reason that in so far as a state or government or body of citizens remains neutral, it refrains from taking either an approving or disapproving stance on the matter at hand. In so far as it refrains from disapproval it cannot engage in toleration. Thus neutrality precludes toleration. It is not neutrality that gives birth to toleration on the contrary it is a particular sort of commitment to toleration that creates a case for neutrality John Rawls's political liberalism makes it abundantly clear. Rawls's political liberalism is designed for a society whose members adhere to diverse and conflicting comprehensive doctrines and to different and conflicting conceptions of the good rooted in those doctrines. In so far as people recognize NSOU ? CC-PS-03 197 the "burdens of judgment" they will recognize that at least some of the doctrines of others are reasonable even though they believe them to be mistaken. Rawls's aim is to find a just way of providing for that reasonable pluralism. He aims to discover political arrangements that would regulate fairly lives of people who profess different and conflicting conceptions of the good. He does so by drawing upon certain ideas that he takes to be fundamental to the public culture of a democratic society. It is a society of a fair scheme of cooperation and of persons as free and equal. These ideas he takes to be independent of any particular conceptions of the good, so that he is not drawing on any particular conception of the good in deriving principles and institutions that will regulate the lives of people who possess different conception of the good. Through reasoning he arrives at his celebrated two principle of justice. More generally he arrives at an order of things in which citizens may not use political power either to advance their own conception of the good or to discriminate against the rival conception of others. Rawlsian citizen will not draw upon particular con- ception of the good and will remain politically neutral. They are not only citizens but also full fledged persons possessing different and conflicting comprehensive doctrines. In the absence of Rawls's political conception of justice they would have ample reason to impose their conceptions of the good upon one another. The insti- tutional constraints that Rawlsian individuals have to observe as political actors are grounded in the principle that it is unjust for citizens to use political power to impose their rival conceptions upon one another. Rawlsian citizens manifest their commitment to toleration through their commitment to political arrangement that are designed neither to favour their own conception of the good nor to disadvantage the rival conception of other's. For Rawls liberalism seeks to establish the condi- tions in which people in groups can pursue the good life as each defines it, but it does not prescribe or try to promote any particular values. This enables liberalism to coexist with a wide variety of political, moral and cultural beliefs. Liberalism stands for openness and self-determination. It is also characterized by a powerful moral thrust. Recognizing this Rawls argues that differences within society have to take place within an "over-lapping" consensus or what citizens could agree on despite the other matters that divide them. At the heart of this consensus are the values of autonomy, freedom and equality. Rawls believes that it is unreasonable to challenge or reject these values.

20.7 Conclusion

Modern societies are increasingly becoming diverse and this diversity is affecting matters of personal morality as well as religious principles and cultural practices.

PREFACE In a bid to standardize higher education in the country, the University Grants Commission (UGC) has introduced Choice Based Credit System (CBCS) based on five types of courses viz. core, generic, discipline specific general elective, ability and skill enhancement for graduate students of all programmes at Honours level. This brings in the semester pattern, which finds efficacy in sync with credit system, credit transfer, comprehensive continuous assessments and a graded pattern of evaluation. The objective is to offer learners ample flexibility of choose from a wide gamut of courses, as also to provide them lateral mobility between various educational institutions in the country where they can carry their acquired credits. I am happy to note that the University has been recently accredited by National Assessment and Accreditation Council of India (NAAC) with grade "A". UGC (Open and Distance Learning Programmes and Online Programmes) Regulations, 2020 have mandated compliance with CBCS for U. G. programmes for all the HEIs in this mode. Welcoming this paradigm shift in higher education, Netaji Subhas Open University (NSOU) has resolved to adopt CBCS from the academic session 2021-22 at the Under Graduate Degree Programme level. The present syllabus, framed in the spirit of syllabi recommended by UGC, lays due stress on all aspects envisaged in the curricular framework of the apex body on higher education. It will be imparted to learners over the six semesters of the Programme. Self Learning Materials (SLMs) are the mainstay of Student Support Services (SSS) of an Open University. From a logistic point of view, NSOU has embarked upon CBCS presently with SLMs in English/Bengali. Eventually, the English version SLMs will be translated into Bengali too, for the benefit of learners. As always, all of our teaching faculties contributed in this process. In addition to this we have also requisitioned the services of best academics in each domain in preparation of the new SLMs. I am sure they will be of commendable academic support. We look forward to proactive feedback from all stakeholders who will participate in the teaching-learning based on these study materials. It has been a very challenging task well executed, and I congratulate all concerned in the preparation of these SLMs. I wish the venture a grand success.

The working of a system of 10 NSOU • CC-PS-04 representative government largely depends on the nature of political parties operating in a state. They provide a link between state and society by articulating and aggregating societal interest. In India political parties have played a crucial role in the process of political transformation. The interaction of the modern state and traditional society in India has been facilitated by the political parties. The increasing political consciousness and spirit of nationalism, development of means of transport and communication and spread of education gave birth to political parties in India in the pre independence period. The educated upper middle class gave birth to Indian National Congress and other political parties like Muslim League, Hindu Mahasabha, Socialist party, Communist party of India and the Forward Block. In the post-independence period many political parties have come into existence and the Indian party system has evolved from one party dominance to multy party system. The Indian party system is distinctive, showing major difference with its European and American counterparts. It has many paradoxical features like combining of western and modern form of bureaucratic organization and participatory policies like combining of participatory politics with indigenous practices and institutions. The social heterogeneity of India has added to the complexity of the Indian party system. In last few years major transformation have taken place in India’s party system. At the center of change in the party system is the rise of the BJP and decline of the congress. 1.3 Evolution of the Party System in India The origin of party system in India can be traced to the formation of India National Congress in 1885. As a matter of expediency, the British had started experimenting with limited self-rule in issues of minor importance such as municipal administration by the 1880s. This formed part of the British strategy of ruling India with the help of Indian intermediaries. The Indian National Congress was set up in 1885 by Sir Alan Octavian Hume, a retired British civil servant, in order to present

Indian interests to the British crown in a systematic and organized manner. The Congress soon became the leading voice of the growing middle class and the liberal professions, demanding more jobs under the colonial government and greater political participation. The successive acts of the British Parliament in 1909, 1919, 1935 extended the franchise and brought in increasing number of Indian into the scope of party politics.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 11 However, periods of extension of franchise and cooperation between colonial rule and elected representatives were combined with ruthless suppression and imprisonment of political leaders. The Congress party itself was often divided in its opinion between collaboration with colonial rule and radical resistance to it in order to fight for full and immediate independence. Gandhi brought these two strands together in its strategy of non-violent, non-cooperation and built a powerful mass movement. By the 1930s, however the national movement was spilt once again on the issue of religion. The majority of Muslims under the leadership of the Muslim League started agitating for an independent homeland for the Muslims of the subcontinent. As a result, when independence finally arrived in 1947, British India was partitioned into India and Pakistan. The Congress party under Nehru inherited power in India. This brief historical background partly explains the relative ease with which India developed electoral democracy and a competitive party system. Although the partition of British India into independent India and Pakistan was marked by unprecedented communal violence, parliamentary democracy subsequently became part of the political culture of post-independence India because of the continuity of the institution of state, political parties and election. 1.4 Phases of Evolution The party system of contemporary India is the result of the six decades of growth under British rule prior to independence. Its institutional base has been considerably reinforced with the political mobilization of society in the course of the last seven decades. It is a complex system characterized by the presence of the Congress Party, the emergence of Bharatiya Janata Party as the ruling party at the center with absolute majority in the Lok Sabha, in the last two successive general elections, presence of elected communist government at the regional level and the occasional lapse into authoritarian rule. The picture becomes much clear if we divide evolution of India’s party system in the post-independence period into following phases. 1. First phase from 1947 to 1967 2. Second phase from 1967 to 1977 3. Third phase from 1977 to 1984

12 NSOU • CC-PS-04 4. Fourth phase from 1984 to 2014 5. Fifth phase from 2014 onwards 1.4.1 First phase (1947-1967) The first phase was characterized by the dominance of the Congress party at the centre and the state level. This phase may be called "the congress system" in Rajni Kothari's terms. Parties of the left and right routinely took part in elections which were by and large free and fair. However, the fragmented character of the opposition and the combination of the first-past-the-post system of voting in single member constituencies systematically resulted in a Congress party majority in the legislature. The main ideological doctrine of the Congress Party such as secularism, democratic socialism, and non-alignment constituted the main parameters of the policy process during this period. The opposition parties were present as active players in the parliament and in national politics but their role were restricted to influencing policy rather than making policy. The social background of the Congress leadership and its important role in the winning of the country's independence played a key role in winning it a dominant position in Indian politics. However, the most important factor was the efficient functioning of the party organization that ensured survival of Congress dominance. Because of its control of state power Congress Party effectively distribute resources among citizens in exchange for their political support. In this phase, India had a party system characterized by dominance along with competition but without any change in the position of the ruling and opposition parties. The opposition parties could not prevent Congress party winning majority of states in the union and state legislatures. According to Rajni Kothari, in this phase there was a competitive party system in which the political parties play dissimilar role. He described Congress party as a party of consensus and opposition parties as parties of pressure. There has been a plurality of parties in this phase but that did not make the Indian Party System multi party phenomenon. It reflects rather an environment of multi-party situation with the Congress, despite the rise and fall in its electoral support, remaining a dominant single party. 1.4.2 Second phase (1967-1977) The second phase is characterized by a dramatic shift from one party dominance NSOU • CC-PS-04 13 to multi party system. It extended from 1967 to congress party's defeat at the general elections of 1977. In the 1967 election congress lost power in nine states. The setback suffered by the Congress party indicated the vulnerability of the centrist Congress to broad electoral coalition of the left and right. The election marked the trend of political fragmentation sharply. The Congress vote was dropped by about 5 percent. It had managed to win only 54 percent of the Lok Sabha seats. In the previous parliament it had 74 percent of the seats in the Lok Sabha. In as many as nine states non-congress government came to power. These opposition coalitions became the basis of the beginning of a multi-party system. There was a clear shift from "monopoly to competition in India's politics. Before 1967 competition and bargaining took place largely within Congress. This was now brought into the realm of interparty conflict. In the aftermath of the 1967 general election centre-state relations became an important issue in interparty bargaining and conflict. State level Congress leader became powerful after Nehru's death. Morris-jones observed that but for the careful handling of the situation by the union Home Minister Y. B. Charan center-state conflict did not assumesserious character. An important development in the party system after 1967 was the phenomenon of defection. There were incidents of defection both from the Congress and into the Congress. The trend became more pronounced as the conflict between the syndicate and the Mrs.Indira Gandhi grew to a point of no return and finally leading to a split in 1969. Defection from the Congress led to a fall of Congress governments in three states. However, parties to the far right and left kept their organization intact through centralization, discipline and ideological consistency. The split of the Congress party in 1969 into the Congress (R) and Congress (O) impacted Indian political system in a big way. The faction led by Indira Gandhi brought about radical changes in the programme of the centrist Congress party. A number of new, left leaning policies like nationalization of banks, abolition of the special privileges of Indian Princes and closer ties with the communists were reinforced with a more forceful populist leadership style. These policies brought the party great electoral success in 1971 election but led to the corrosion of its organizational links with the electorate. Mrs. Gandhi initiated personalized and centralized decision making process both in the party and government and in the process weakened the democratic institutions.

14 NSOU • CC-PS-04 Congress, under India Gandhi's forceful leadership turned its new policy of radical populist leadership into its main asset. Its initial success in the 1971 election was further reinforced in the assembly elections of 1972 when India Gandhi transformed India's successful intervention in the liberation war in East Pakistan into the electoral platform of the Congress party. But the radical rhetoric rebounded on the party when industrial workers, railways employees and students started political agitation. The culmination of this period of unrest was the imposition of national emergency in 1975. During emergency free assembly, freedom of information and movement was drastically curtailed. General elections were postponed and the term of the Lok Sabha was extended. In fact emergency was a response to the challenges to Mrs. Gandhi rule. Elections were announced in 1977. 1.4.3 Third phase (1977-1984) 1977 election ushered in a new phase in the evolution of the party system in India. The period from 1977 to 1984 was characterized by intense conflict and rough felling among political parties. The period also witnessed decay and fragmentation within political parties. From the late 1960s Indian electorate at all levels displayed increasing political consciousness. There were rising aspirations coupled with the expectation that politicians should be responsive to the demand of the people. But the political institutions did not have adequate capacity to cope with societal pressure. This was largely due to Mrs. India Gandhi's authoritarian mode of functioning and consequent deinstitutionalization. This situation according to James Manor, brought about five changes in the Indian Party system. First since the state assembly election of 1972 incumbent government's inability to respond to societal demands became more and more pronounced. Second change was the decline in confidence in the efficiency of the state as an agent of constructive social action. Third, with the growing inability of the political institutions to respond positively to the societal demands, divergence between society and state became apparent. Politicians increasingly resorted to vote bank politics rousing primordial sentiments. Fourth, difference between many political parties in terms of their social bases both at the national and state level was becoming unclear. In this situation it was necessary on the part of the political parties to develop close links with social bases of manageable size.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 15 The last change was the growth of regionalism and emergence of regional parties in different parts of India. This is attributed to excessive centralization of power during Mrs. Gandhi's prime-ministership. Third phase in the evolution of party system in India began in the backdrop of the above changes. This phase was characterized by more or less free competition among political parties, fragmentation within political parties, personalized control of parties, growing incidence of defection and realignment political parties. The general election of 1977 ushered in a new period in Indian politics. The defeat of the congress led by India Gandhi and the formation of the first non- Congress Janata government led many scholars to believe that parliamentary democracy in India had matured and a two party system or close to it was on the process. However, the Janata party which held power between March 1977 to July 1979 was in fact a coalition of opposition parties united by their opposition to the Congress led by Mrs. Gandhi. It was a coalition of opposition groups including Jana sangh, Bharatiya Lok Dal, The Socialist Party, the old Congress and the Congress for democracy led by Jagjivan Ram. These five constituents of the Janata Party were a diverse lot having different ideological position, social base and leadership. They were often in conflict with each other. As a result the Janata Party government disintegrated in mid 1979 and many constituents broke away from the party. The Congress split for the second time in 1978 and Congress (I) led by Mrs. Gandhi appeared. The period witnessed fragmentation of existing parties and formation of new parties reflecting the personal ambition of the political leaders. Congress (I) took advantage of the strong popular reaction against friction and disunity in the opposition camp and it rode back to power in 1980. In fact the 1980 Lok Sabha election was a critical verdict on Janata Party's failure to salvage its mandate. Anti-Congress parties were in disarray and failed to make any common cause. This trend persisted till 1984. Mrs. India Gandhi's assassination on 31 October 1984 created a huge sympathy wave and Congress (I) achieved massive electoral victory. The situation made opposition unity more difficult to achieve. This phase is also characterized by acute instability in the party system. With the sudden demise of Mrs. India Gandhi political situation had changed fundamentally. The legislative majority won by the Congress (I) were not used to implement the 16 NSOU • CC-PS-04 radical policy promised by Mrs. Gandhi. This made the government weak and in the long run party's huge support drained away. Congress (I) organization declined rapidly under both Mrs. Gandhi and her son Rajiv Gandhi. This period also witnessed expansion of support for the Communist parties, Bharatiya Lok Dal and Bharatiya Janata Party. The Congress (I) that emerged as a strong party at the centre could not command same position in states also. The fact remains that from the late 1980s, the party has found itself hard-pressed to command support for its broad centrist and secular appeal in the face of a serious challenge from political formation such as the BJP, Samajwadi Party, BSP and regional parties like TDP, DMK, and AIADMK. Congress (I) leaders adopted the policy of all out confrontation in which the opposition parties were attacked as anti-national forces. After the defeat of the party in the southern states of Karnataka and Andhra Pradesh in January 1983 Congress (I) leaders adopted the strategy of courting the Hindu majority in North India by generating communal sentiments. In fact, Congress (I). Leaders after 1985 gave up their former policy of arranging accommodation between social groups, sub cultures and regions and actually set them against one another. James Manor argued that in late 1984. India still had a multiparty system that permitted free competition, in which the Congress occupied a dominant position at the center and in many state assemblies. It was no longer a dominant party system without a trace of attention. Most elections at state and national level since 1972 have led to alterations. With the growing maturity and assertiveness of the Indian electorate reelection was increasingly difficult to achieve. 1.4.4 Fourth phase (1984-2014) Rajiv era did not alter the trend of political centralization within the Congress. Growing political dissention in the country and controversies of Bofors kick back formed the background of 1989 general election. The Congress (I) was defeated securing only 197 seats in the Lok Sabha. The 1989 election results were not just another repeat of the broad front anti-Congressism of the Janata Party kind, but signified a more far reaching shift in the party system. Congress (I) secured 39.5 percent vote and got 197 seats against the National Front Coalition supported by the BJP and left parties. The change in the party system is rooted in the shifts in party organizational strengths and support bases at the state level and in India's political decline of the Congress and the rise of the BJP and regional parties. Prior to 1989, the BJP and its predecessor the Bharatiya Janata Party had never exceeded 10 percent of the vote or 35 seats nationally. Except in 1977 when it won 99 of the 295 seats won by the Janata Party. Since then its rise has been steady in terms of both vote and seat shares. In 1989-91, the BJP contested alone with a communally polarizing platform against the backdrop of the Babri Masjid agitation of the late 1980s, the upper caste backlash against the National Front Governments decision to implement the Mandal Commission recommendations for reservation of government jobs for backward classes and the Rath Yatra launched by L. K. Advani and the communal violence that followed. Its vote share rose to 20.1 percent and its own 120 seats. It won UP and Gujrat elections and did well in MP, HP and Rajasthan, winning over 40 percent votes in each.

The NDA lost control of the government in the election of April-May 2004, and was defeated by the united progressive Alliance (UPA) led by Congress. The Congress emerged as the single largest party with 145 seats and the UPA secured 222 seats. The major change was that the Congress party decided to adopt coalition strategy. The NDA consisted of 13 parties and the Congress led UPA consisted 19 parties. Again in 2009 UPA coalition defeated the depleted NDA by a much greater margin with the Congress winning 206 seats on its own and 263 with its allies. This phase witnessed a process of bipolar coalition in many states Congress- BJP, Congress-Left, and Congress-regional parties. This process contributed to the fragmentation of the party system at the national level and a potential bipolar consolidation of a Congress led alliance versus a BJP led one. This phase is further characterized by the democratic upsurge among the underprivileged. The creation of over the years. Frequent party splits, merger and counter splits led to a significant increase in the number of parties.

In the seven general election held in 1989, 1991, 1996, 1998, 1999, 2004, and 2009 no party achieved majority. All these elections showed decline in the position of national parties and growth of regional parties. This phase in party politics is characterized by the emergence of two broad coalitions NDA AND UPA, in which two national parties, BJP and Congress, act as central pillars. Balveer Arrora describes this competitive multiparty system as "bi-nodal". According to him there is a trend towards federalization of the party system in this process. 1.4.5 Fifth phase-2014 onwards 2014 general election held in an atmosphere surcharged with serious allegation of scam involving the constituents of the UPA Government, its helplessness and powerlessness and inefficiencies. Very often smaller parties in UPA held the Congress leadership hostage, as they pressed their own agenda and their own interests over government policy. Threats of withdrawal of support hung like the sword of Damocles over the leadership. The constant threat of destabilization led to policy paralysis and sudden change of decision. Dual centers of power within the Congress party impacted the poll scenario in BJP'S favour. Ministers preferred to report to party president Mrs. Sonia Gandhi than to Prime Minister Manmohan Singh which led to the loss of moral authority of the latter. There was wide spread anger against a non-performing and corrupt system. This became evident when Anna Hazare went on fast in Delhi in 2010. People in large number thronged the space where he was fasting and expressed their anger at large scale corruption, unemployment, inflation and rising prices. Mr Narendra Modi exploited this situation and emerged as a national leader on a platform of stability and a thorough shake up of the system. This agenda appealed to the people across casts and classes for its promise to end dithering, compromises and policy paralysis. Results of the 2014 general election were quite startling. The BJP secured 282 seats on its own. Victory of the BJP and defeat of the non-BJP parties was so complete that a viable opposition which is integral and critical component of parliamentary democracy has been completely wiped out. In order to qualify for the stature of an officially recognized opposition in the 543 member house a party has to secure 10 percent of the total seats. The Congress, with 44 seats simply does not qualify, nor does any other party.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 19 For the first time in India's electoral history a non-Congress party has come into power on its own. Significantly a political party won a majority for the first time in thirty years since 1984. Election results show that the image of a charismatic leader looms larger than his or her party. Narendra Modi has caught the imagination of Indians across class and caste. The most remarkable aspect of the 2014 election was the bringing back of the one party dominant system which was once used to describe the hegemony of the Congress Party and the lack of opposition. The new one party dominant system, according to Neera Chandhoke, is dramatically different from the original one. The BJP unlike the Congress is a cadre based party and subscribes to a distinct ideology. It is also headed by the powerful figure of Prime Minister Narendra Modi whose image looms larger than the party and his colleagues. In the states the BJP was in power in Madhya Pradesh, Chattishgarh and Rajasthan. It secured majority in alliance with Shivsena in Maharashtra, similarly it made spectacular success in Uttar Pradesh, Uttarakhand, Himachal Pradesh, Jharkhand, Tripura and Assam assembly elections. It made significant inroads in the North Eastern states as well. In Jammu and Kashmir, it came to power in alliance with PDP. However, four of India's five Southern states- Andhra Pradesh, Telengana, Tamil Nadu and Kerala have eluded the BJP. But in the assembly elections held in Madhya Pradesh, Chattisgarh and Rajasthan immediately before 2019 election BJP was defeated and Congress came to power. 2019 general election was held in an atmosphere plagued by the problems of economic slowdown, Joblessness has risen to a record high, farm incomes have gone down and industrial production was slumped, many Indian were hit hard by demonetization and there were complaints about a poorly designed and complicated GST. However, NDA surprised the entire nations by winning 352 seats out of the 543 seats, where BJP alone bagged 303 seats Congress secured 40 seats only. In a way 2019 election results was a continuation of the 2014 Lok Sabha election result at the national level. Narendra Modi made this election all about himself. A combination of nationalistic rhetoric, subtle religious polarization and a slew of welfare programme helped Narendra Modi to register second successive win. He also exploited national security as a vote getter. While 2019 Lok Sabha election results indicated one party dominance at the national level, Assembly elections held in late 2019 and early 2020 in Maharashtra, Jharkhand and Delhi BJP lost power, indicating a counter trend towards federalization of the party system at the state level.

complexity is the social heterogeneity that has made it impossible for a single set of parties to emerge across the country.

The Indian party system has evolved from one party dominance to multi party system. From 1947 to 1967 Congress was voted time and again with an overwhelming parliamentary majority. Dominance by a single party coexisted with inter-party competition. The opposition parties had little prospect of replacing Congress. The success of the Congress was attributed to the elaborate party structure and extensive patronage networks. However, the above structure began to crumble as the Congress electoral fortunes deteriorated after 1967. Political change from 1967 to 1977 increased party competition. Opposition parties formed coalition government in several states. The Congress split in 1969 brought about significant changes in the party system. In the 1971 elections India Gandhi faced a united opposition but it won with a majority of 346 seats. However, the country faced serious problems like inflation, acute food shortage, and massive unemployment which led to series of opposition led agitation. After considerable unrest India Gandhi imposed a national emergency. The emergency threatened liberal institution and created the perception that a crisis of regime had occurred. The 1977 elections ushered in a new era in the party system, creating new opportunities for the opposition parties. This period witnessed an intensification of conflict and competition between political parties. This period was characterized by acute instability in the party system. After Indira Gandhi's assassination political scenario changed in a significant way, under both Indira Gandhi and her son Rajiv, the organizational decline of the Congress became evident. From the late 1980s it was confronted with serious challenge from BJP, Samajwadi party and BSP. New regional parties have strengthened their position at the expense of the Congress. By the late 1980s there was a political vacuum in Indian politics. Dedicated to a redefinition of nationalism the BJP began to fill the vacuum created by the decline of the Congress.

Rajni Kothari coined the phrase "one party dominant system to describe Indian party politics". For almost two decades after independence, the Congress which had led the freedom struggle in the country, controlled central as well as the state governments, Kothari formulated a new conceptual category, the "Congress system" to characterize India's party system. From 1947 to 1967 Indian National Congress dominated a competitive multiparty system. Dominance of the Congress co-existed with inter-party competition, but the opposition parties did not present any credible alternative to the Congress. Elaborate party structure and extensive patronage networks ensured dominance of the Congress Party.

24 NSOU • CC-PS-04 However, in the late 1960s the System was in crisis with deterioration of Congress electoral fortunes. Growing democratization of traditional power relations throughout society, inability of the Congress to maintain the political bases of its coalition, personalized and centralized character of government and the party eventually led to the collapse of the Congress system. 2.3 Basic features and working of the Congress System Rajni Kothari in his politics in India (1970) made a persuasive analysis of the Indian political system largely from structural functional perspective. He identified the dynamic core of the system of political institution in India in the Congress party which acted as a party of consensus. In this model opposition parties are parties of pressure. The whole system worked through the dominance of the Congress. In Kothari's formulation, the features of the Congress system are : (a) an open and competitive party system; (b) existence of multiple opposition parties that cannot provide an alternative to the government. However, they can put pressure on government to do certain things; (c) Responsiveness of the system to changes in public opinion and presence of a democratic authority which is open to continuous pressures both from within the ruling party and from outside; (d) an electoral network of faction at every level of political and governmental activity and a system of co-ordination between various levels; (e) absorption of the very basis of opposition and dissent and neutralizing important sources of cleavage and disaffection. Since the 1920s the Congress brought together a number of interests and identity groups to forge a broad coalition. The party leadership was; however, dependent upon a network of influential men, large landowners, the middle peasants, industrialists, professional classes, castes, religious communities, women and youth organizations, workers and peasants. This network mediated the relationship between the Congress leaders and the rank and file of the party on the one hand and competing views on the other. The network enabled the high command of the party to control popular upsurges that had been launched under its leadership. Decades of organizational political activity by the Congress in the nationalist movement in different parts of the country accounted for the dominance of the Congress. According to Kothari the Congress was an umbrella party encompassing all the major sections and interests of society and in the process acquired legitimacy. After independence the inherent composite character of the Congress was

NSOU • CC-PS-04 25 preserved by the accommodation of diverse social interests, and through a continuous search for dynamic equilibrium in the context of internal competition among shifting political coalition within the party. In the first two decades after independence assertions by the subaltern classes were mediated and controlled by powerful leaders who owned land, labour and capital. One important features of this arrangement was reliance on state leaders. Provincial party units enjoyed large degree of autonomy. They were largely financially independent, raising their own party funds for running the organization or fighting elections. The influence and autonomy of the state units in the Congress Party structure was shown most clearly in 1964 when Nehru's successor was effectively chosen by Kamraj as party president in association with the Chief Ministers and party presidents of the state units. National leaders relied on state leaders to manage contentious issues in their own regions such as the formation of linguistic states in the 1950s and 1960s. Congress system, according to Kothari, exhibited certain key features in its operation in its heyday. First, the Congress after coming to power gave a constructive and primary role to government and politics in the development of society. Second, the power of the central authority was made primary criteria of national survival. Third, legitimacy became the primary issue of politics and this in turn gave to the ruling party and government symbolic value of great importance. Fourth, the Congress by virtue of its control over the government enjoyed monopoly of patronage and had control over economic power and resources. This made it difficult for the opposition parties to compete with it, Fifth, the Congress with its elaborate organizational structure from the central to the grass roots level created broad avenues of political participation. This factor explained Congress Party's ability to absorb groups and movements outside the party and prevent other parties from gaining strength. The Congress had large number of skilled managers at different levels of party organization who were able to arrange bargain between important social groups and to knit together the varied regions and subcultures of the sub-continent. In Kothari's account the Congress has developed over the year's conciliation machinery at various levels to mediate in factional conflicts and maintain the intricate balance on which the Congress system is based. The federal like structures of the party enabled the decentralization of power as well as control. The dominant position of the Congress was further secured by the policy of neutralizing some important sources of conflict and discontent in the country. Thus abolition of Zamindari system, linguistic reorganization of states, organizing labour

26 NSOU • CC-PS-04 union along with framing protective labour laws, granting of special privileges to weaker sections of the society etc, all this went a long way to neutralize potential sources of political discontent. All these measures formed part of the Congress strategy to secure legitimacy on the one hand and modernization on the other. The Indian National Congress was unique in dominating a competitive multi- party system. Most accounts of the Congress Party from 1947 to 1964 emphasize the role of Jawaharlal Nehru in the construction of modern India in which the state would take over charge of economic development and nation building activities with an appeal to the ideas of socialism, secularism, federalism and democracy. Under Nehru’s leadership, the party was built upon the nationalist legacy in three ways : its development of a party organizations, its accommodation of diverse interests, and its relationship with other parties. Dominance by a single party co-existed with inter- party competition. By virtue of its elaborate party structure and patronage networks Congress party was able to appeal to the vast middle ground of interests and values. Its image as the party that won independence and popularity of leaders like Gandhi and Nehru as well as the presence of a large number of influential provincial leaders contributed to the success of the Congress system. Thus Rajni Kothari identified the dynamic core of the system of political institution in India in the Congress Party. The whole system worked through the dominance of the Congress. According to Kothari Congress system developed its character in response to a historical environment. However, that environment underwent drastic change in the late 1960s and early 1970s. The socio economic and demographic context of the Indian polity changed beyond recognition. The intense political mobilization of new groups and subgroups led to the development of more differentiated identities and source of political cleavage. Citizens were searching avenues for effective participation and exhibited maturity to evaluate and make choices. In his essay the Congress system revisited : A decennial view (1974) Rajni Kothari observed that the Congress system was confronted with serious challenges both from its own field of operation and from without. The composition of the Congress has changed considerably. Similarly, the structure of the opposition has undergone important changes. Many new elements have entered the federal axis of the system and the world environment in which Indian polity has to operate has undergone fundamental changes. Kothari argued that despite all these changes, the Congress system on the whole remained intact. It has survived major shifts in the environment and continued to be identified by reference to certain major features. According to him it was a logical necessity for a certain historical situation.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 27 Kothari’s model has been criticized from different perspectives. Critics argued that Kothari overvalued the consensual character of the Indian political system. He overestimated the autonomy of the elite and took far too gradualist view of social and political change. The rise of radical oppositional movement in the 1970s and increasing use of repressive apparatus of the state and declaration of emergency, were clearly indicators that went beyond the consensual model of the Congress system. 2.4 Crisis and breakdown of the Congress System to destroy its viability both as a party of governance and an instrument for resolving conflict. The practice of inner party democracy and presence of political leaders with solid social support at the state and district levels helped Congress to achieve hegemonic position. The 1967 election ushered in major changes in the structure of the political system. Reviewing his model in 1970 Rajni Kothari observed that the overwhelming dominance of the Indian National Congress had started to be eroded after the third general election. Following Sino-Indian border conflict of 1962 Nehru's leadership became subject of criticism from within Congress as well as from without. The politics of the two successors witnessed the increasing fragmentation of the Congress High Command. The intense conflict over the allocation of party tickets for the 1967 elections resulted in major defections from the party in some states. Consensus maintaining mechanism became paralyzed. The absence of an overpowering leader in the image of a Nehru made the working of the congress system difficult. NSOU • CC-PS-04 Over the years the situation has undergone radical changes. The institutionalization of democracy has produced unforeseen results. In the late 1960s and the 1970s the Congress system imploded. From the 1980s, Kothari himself developed entirely different frameworks for presenting empirical and normative account of Indian politics. He admitted that the Congress system while providing

The legitimacy of the electoral democracy gradually eroded over the years and the Congress party has become a party to moneyed and mafia interest. a sort of consensus based primarily on elite accommodation. The system primarily worked because of its nearness to the mobilization of the national movement and the relation of implicit trust between the Congress leadership and the masses. The reasons for the breakdown of the Congress system can be attributed to the political changes that occurred during Indira Gandhi's tenure of office. Indira Gandhi in the face of increasing opposition strength rejected the principle of consensus in favour of the majoritarian principle.

Her intense desire for personal power and manipulative politics resulted in the suspension of democracy within the congress party. Under her regime Congress Party's roots withered and governance became less institutionalized, more personalized and centralized. Many commentators argue that the erosion of institutional arrangements was ultimately bound up with the deinstitutionalization of the Congress Party and the emergence of genuinely pluralist politics in the post 1977 period. In the 1970s, the Congress party atrophied organizationally. In the 1971 election, Mrs. Gandhi appealed to the national electorate across regions, castes, religion, and gender on the populist platform of removal of poverty. The federal nature of decision making within the party yielded to a highly centralized form of policy making under a charismatic leader. The party degenerated into a band of courtiers. In the process it lost its capacity either to represent or arbitrate between plural and conflicting views. The mass-based party that mobilized millions of Indians in the cause of national independence has lost its appeal to the people at large. After becoming unquestioned leader of the ruling party Indira Gandhi changed the mediatory form of politics into a plebiscitary one. The 1967 election showed that NSOU • CC-PS-04 29 the powerful regional Congress leaders of the earlier period were no longer reliable vote gatherers. By separating parliamentary election from state assembly elections and by relying on the much higher rates of voter participation, Congress party turned the general elections into a plebiscite on the leadership of Indira Gandhi. The most important reasons for the breakdown of the Congress system is the inability of the party to maintain political bases of its coalition, especially the loyalty of the socially backward groups. From the late 1980s the party has found it difficult to gather support for its policy in the face of serious challenge from political formation with sectarian appeals and social bases, such as the BJP, BSP and the Samajwadi Party. New parties representing the backward castes are regionally concentrated and have gained strength at the expense of the Congress. Since the late 1980s the party has failed to generate popular leadership capable of accommodating diverse interests. India Gandhi and her son Rajiv Gandhi sought to build coalitions around their own personalities. In the process, the Congress became a leader-dependent force that adhered to the charismatic appeal of the Nehru-Gandhi family. The decision of the dynastic leader was the decision of the party. This largely contributed to the erosion of its social base in the country side. Mobilization through populist slogans did not work. Another explanation for the breakdown of the Congress system is the growth in political consciousness and assertion of newly prosperous and newly mobilized section of the electorate. They are primarily intermediate and backward caste peasants in the Green Revolution areas of the North India. These castes had not been part of the core base of the Congress in the northern belt and had not been granted a position of commensurate influence in the party power structure. Still another explanation is the growing politicization of communal and caste cleavages. This has led to the collapse of the Congress Party in states like UP and Bihar where such politicization led to the gravitation of huge number of electorate Schedule casts, other backward casts and Muslims and upper castes to communal and caste based parties as the BJP, BSP, SP AND RJD. 2.5 Conclusion Rajni Kothari in his politics in India (1970) identified the dynamic core of the system of political institution in India in the Congress Party. The whole system 30 NSOU • CC-PS-04 worked through the dominance of the Congress. It was a differentiated system operating along the organizational structure of the party but connected at each level with the parallel structure of government. It allowed the dominance of a political centre as well as dissent from the margins. In this model opposition parties function as dissident Congress groups. It emphasized coalition building and consensus making at each level and in the process securing legitimacy of the system as a whole. Kothari defined it as the "Congress system"

The system continued almost uninterrupted till the 1967 election when non- Congress governments came to power in several states.

In fact, the 1967 elections were a severe blow to the Congress. The period immediately before and after the elections had seen a tremendous weakening of its internal strength. There was constant dissension and bitter conflict at different levels of the party organizations, rampant factionalism and large scale defection from the party. The reasons for the breakdown from the Congress system can be attributed to the political changes that took place during Indira Gandhi tenure of office. Under her leadership Congress became strongly centralized with power flowing directly from the central high command. In the face of increasing opposition Mrs. Gandhi rejected the principle of consensus. Her autocratic control of the Congress quickly undermined the organization. The deinstitutionalization of the Congress Party was a major contributor to the erosion of the Congress system. The party lost its capacity to maintain the political bases of its coalition.

2.6 Summing Up • Rajni Kothari identified the dynamic core of the system of political institutions in India in the Congress Party. • The whole system worked through the dominance of Congress. • The system continued almost uninterrupted till the 1967 election. • The reason for the breakdown from the Congress system can be attributed to the political changes that took place during Indira Gandhi's tenure of office.

A coalition government is formed when a number of political

NSOU • CC-PS-04 33 parties agree to join hands on common platform by keeping aside their broad differences. In a parliamentary democracy coalitions arise primarily as a result of political compulsion. It might result from radical, communal, economic, social or political conflicts. It may also be formed due to emergency. Politics in India has been going through dramatic transformations. With the active participation of hitherto marginalized groups in the political processes Indian democracy has acquired a mass character. The earlier party system is changing rapidly, as are political equation and in the process a new era of coalition politics has begun. A dominant-party system has given way to a multi-party system and coalition governments. Exigency of situation rather than ideological purity has dictated formation of coalition. Parties with distinct ideologies are inclined to form coalition with the object of challenging a common foe. One important aspects of coalition politics in India is the formidable presence of regional parties, which sometimes hold the key to the very survival of the coalition. 3.3 Evolution of coalition politics first phase 1960s and early 1970s The evolution of political alliances began in the immediate pre-1967 period inspired by the socialist ideologue, Ram Monohar Lohia. Anti Congress sentiment constituted the basis of alliance formation. Lohia firmly believed that ideological difference notwithstanding, continued alliance among non-Congress parties would bring them closer. Despite his doubts about the feasibility of cohesion among anti- Congress parties, he argued that alliance among anti-Congress parties a clear crack in the Congress base in the regions. It also reflects the beginning of a significant process whereby regional parties were united on the basis of distinctly regional interests that the congress failed to represent properly. The non-Congress governments that came to power in nine states ushered in a new era by replacing the Congress governments in the province. Except Tamil Nadu where the DMK secured an absolute majority, governments 34 NSOU • CC-PS-04 in other states were formed through coalition. In order to keep the coalition going, a common minimum programme was adopted that avoided, as far as possible, contentious issues. However, the coalitions are not stable, primarily because there was no ideological cohesiveness among the constituents of the coalition. Neither did they have programmatic uniformity. In Bihar, a Samyukta Vidhayak Dal mid-term poll results in West-Bengal, Uttar Pradesh, Bihar and Punjab were an expression of a new wave in Indian politics. The defeat of the Congress indicated its failure to accommodate the possibility of an alternative structure of power on the basis of political expediency rather than ideology. In West Bengal United Front consisting of fourteen parties came to power. The experiment was unique in the sense that the left parties the CPI, CPI(M), Forward Bloc and RSP joined with dissident Congressmen which formed the Bangla Congress. The United Front definitely ushered in a new era of coalition in state politics. However, the internal feud among its constituents, particularly the unbridgeable gulf between the CPI and CPI(M) disrupted the normal functioning of the UF government. its role in the freedom movement and achievements during the Nehru era. Although anti- Congressism brought the opposition parties to the centre-stage of Indian politics, it failed to ensure stability of coalition governments. There was no ideological policy which could hold together these alliances and hence their instability. 36 NSOU • CC-PS-04 3.4 Second phase' the Janata Experiment The next phase in the evolution of alliance was the unification of the partners in the Samtukka Vidhayak Dal in the context of protest movement led by Jay Prakash Narayan in 1974-75. In 1974, the Charan Singh led BKD merged with the SSP, Swatantra Party, Utkal Congress and three minor parties to form the Bharatiya Lok Dal. The formation of the Janata party in 1977 with the merger of the Jana Sangh BLD, Congress(o) and the socialist party, and the CFD indicated experiment of coalition at the national level. It was a hurriedly formed coalition of parties to fight a suddenly called election after the emergency. Other opposition parties such as the CPI(M), DMK and Akali Dal agreed to join hands with the Janata Party in order to give a straight fight to the Congress. Janata Party won 330 seats, while the Congress secured 154 seats. The establishment of the first non-Congress Janata government was a major turning point in Indian politics. It proved that anti-Congressism can be an alternative strategy for gaining political power. With the breakdown of the Congress system the period of coalition politics seemed to have begun at the national level. The regional parties began to assert themselves in such a way as to become the controlling factors in the mainstream national politics.

However, the euphoria of victory of the Janata Party was short-lived. There was individual bickering within the Janata party government apart from personal rivalry. Conflict erupted with the Jana Sangh over dual membership, which led to a serious crisis when both the BLD and socialist decided to leave the coalition. The Janata government disintegrated in mid-1979, and many of the elements that formed it splintered. The significance of the Janata experiment lied in breaking the long lasting one party domination and forge a national alternative to the Congress. The disintegration of the Janata Party in 1979 brought the congress back to power at the centre in 1980. The process of broad anti-Congress front formation received a big blow. However, it continued in certain states like Haryana, where the Lok Dal and the BJP formed an electoral alliance to defeat the Congress in 1987.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 37 3.5 The National Front Experiment With the formation of the Janata Dal in 1988 alliance formation process entered a new phase. Expelled Congressman V. P. Singh along with his supporters merged with the Lok Dal of Ajit Singh and Devi Lal in North India and with the Janata Party of R. K. Hegde in Karnataka. This was an attempt to build a broad anti-Congress informal coalition for seat adjustment for the 1989 elections. The strategy for opposition unity was a three stage process. The first was the unity of the centrist, non-Congress secular parties. The second was the formation of a National Front of all non-left parties, regional and national. The third stage was about seat adjustments with the left parties and the Bharatiya Janata Party. This was a two level alliance. The first was a formal coalition between the National Front, three regional parties, TDP, DMK and AGP and The Congress Socialists. The second level was a more informal seat adjustment between the National Front and BJP on the one hand and the left parties on the other. The National front stopped short of a 1977 style merger. It was not a purely power seeking opportunities coalition ignoring ideological differences. The National Front Coalition was a new departure in three senses. First, it did not try to unify very different parties but put together a coalition of distinct parties based on common manifesto. Second it brought in the regional parties like the DMK, the TDP and AGP and the Left parties. Third, it also marked the beginning of interstate alliances of parties where parties do not compete on each other's turf. However, the loose alliance put together by the National Front BJP-Left in 1989-90 did not last long because of ideological incompatibility. This indicated the unsustainability of a broad anti-Congress coalition unless the constituent parties moderate their extreme ideological differences. 3.6 Coalition Experiment in the 1990s The intensification of competitive politics has changed the party system from being a rivalry between national parties into one between alliances and coalition of national and state parties. The nineties have witnessed a succession of minority or coalition governments. The 1991 election saw a three-cornered contest with roughly the same electoral alliances contesting, namely the National Front comprising the Janata Dal, regional 38 NSOU • CC-PS-04 and left parties versus the BJP and the Congress, with the Samajwadi Janata Party of Chandrashekhar as a minor fourth side. BJP contested alone and did not have any seat adjustment with the Janata Dal. In 1996 the same three-cornered battle resulted in a broad front, post election coalition government of United Front. The United Front owed its birth to the Congress, which agreed to extend support to contain BJP in the aftermath of the 1996 national poll. With an informal alliance between the Janata Dal, the Samajwadi Party in Uttar Pradesh, CPI, CPI(M) and other smaller Left parties, the United Front succeeded in forming the government at the centre. After the poll several regional parties like Telegu Desam Party, DMK AND Tamil Manila Congress as well as Asom Gana Parishad joined the United front. Deve Gowda led United Front Government had to rely on congress support for survival as it did not have majority to defend it in the Lok Sabha. The constituents of the United Front were united neither in terms of an ideology nor in terms of attitude. Except for the ideologically well-knit CPI (M), none of the constituents seemed to be as committed in their opposition to the Congress and the BJP. For the DMK, TDP and the Janata Dal(United) BJP did not appear to be as formidable foe as it was earlier primarily because it has watered down its ideological goal due to electoral compulsion. 3.7 The National Democratic Alliance (1999-2004) The BJP-led National Democratic Alliance is a unique experiment with no parallel in India's political history. Although it owed its growth to anti-Congress sentiments, it nevertheless demonstrated pragmatism by accommodating the regional parties holding different political views. By providing a durable national coalition the NDA legitimized coalition politics, NDA was a coalition of 24 constituents. It nevertheless formed a government that brought political stability despite the occasional crisis. Many commentators and scholars held the view that Indian politics has entered the age of coalition and single party rule has become a thing of the past. The national parties have shown their inability to represent diverse interests and opinions in a multicultural society. The 1999 election is a defining moment in India's political history. After the 1984 national poll, four consecutive elections failed to produce a clear majority for any political party or alliance. After almost more than a decade a pre-poll alliance, NSOU • CC-PS-04 39 the NDA, formed a government at the centre with absolute majority. The coalition involving the regional parties has strengthened the federal character of the national polity. BJP, the dominant partner in the NDA coalition, was no longer restricted to the North India. It was able to win seats in coalition with other parties in Orissa, Andhra Pradesh, West Bengal and Tamil Nadu. The NDA was a consensual coalition in which a common agenda was prepared with input from all the partners. It avoided contentious issues, which in turn cemented the bond among the partners to such an extent that it was never fragile despite the inherent tensions. The coalition consciously championed regional issues. It was asserted that the NDA represents both national interests and regional aspirations. The increasing importance of the regional parties is largely attributed to a process of growing democratizations, involving the hitherto neglected section of Indian society. The intense politicization of the different sections of Indian society over the years have made the one-party dominant model irrelevant.

3.8 The United Progressive Alliance (2004-2014) The 2004 Lok Sabha elections was similar to the 1999 Lok Sabha elections in that both the national parties, the Congress and the BJP failed to secure a majority on their own. The poll results led many scholars and commentators to conclude that India is surely in the age of coalition. The Congress and its allies won a majority in the 2004 Lok Sabha poll, while the BJP led NDA suffered electoral reverses in most states. Unlike the NDA partners who came together before the poll, the UPA was constituted only after the elections results were announced. These alliances are governed by the exigencies of circumstances despite reservations; the Congress accepted the principle of coalition as an appropriate strategy to gain electoral dividends. The fact that the Congress won only 145 seats of 417 contested clearly indicates the importance of the allies for obtaining a majority in the Lok Sabha. The regional parties are driven by pragmatic political considerations. Thus the Janata Dal (U) aligned with the BJP led NDA despite its socialist leanings. Similarly, the DMK, the erstwhile partner with NDA endorsed an alliance with the Congress. The regional parties have received the importance of an electoral pact with a national party to enable them to play crucial role at the national level. In fact, the coalition era has redefined their role in Indian politics and they cannot be ignored as their numerical support remains crucial for government formation at the centre. The crucial importance of the regional parties in the national coalition indicates that the states no longer remain mere constituent of the national policy, but also have become powerful political actors in the formation of the government. State specific issues have assumed importance in national election. This has opened the possibility of bringing politics closer to the people. 2004 and 2009 Lok Sabha elections results confirmed that without coalescing with smaller parties, national parties are unable to form government. In this new political configuration, the BJP and the Congress are forced to look after allies to capture power at the centre.

One of the factors that contributed to the rise of these smaller parties is the breakdown of the Congress and its failure to represent diverse social and economic interests at the grass roots. 3.9 Lok Sabha election in 2014 and return of the one party dominant system The 2014 election gave BJP a majority in parliament and has brought back the one party dominant system that was once used to describe the hegemony of the Congress party and the lack of an opposition. The election was held in an atmosphere characterized by serious allegation of scams involving the partners of the UPA. The BJP led NDA made this along with policy paralysis in the government, terrorism, national security and development main issues of the election. Election results ushered in a new era in the evolution of the multi party election politics in India. BJP won 282 seats on its own and with its allies it secured 336 seats in the Lok Sabha. The Congress won just 44 seats and with its allies took up just 60 seats in the lower house. After 1989 many scholars and commentators observed that henceforth India would be governed by coalition. The two national parties, the Congress and the BJP would never be able to secure a majority on their own. The era of coalition politics had brought to the forefront the political agenda of regional parties. In alliance with either of the two national parties, these parties managed to wield considerable influence. However, the election results represent impatience and discontent with coalition politics at the centre. Very often, smaller parties in the coalition held the Congress

NSOU • CC-PS-04 41 leadership hostage. Threats of withdrawal of support hung like the sword of Damocles over the leadership. The DMK, for example, withdrew its ministers from UPA-II government because A.Raja, who belonged to the party, was convicted in the telecoms scam. The constant threat of destabilizations led to policy paralysis and abrupt reversal of decisions. In the middle of policy paralysis Mr. Narendra Modi emerged as a national leader on a platform of stability. This agenda appealed to the people across caste and classes because it promised to amend endless compromises, reversal of decisions and no decisions. The defeat of the caste based parties in the election illustrates sheer impatience with narrow agenda and a focus on hand-outs such as more quotas for this or that caste. Caste and its petty hierarchies have not gone away. But India seems to have entered a new phase of politics. In the 2019 Lok Sabha elections NDA surprised the entire nation by winning 352 out of 543 seats, where BJP alone secured 303 seats. Thus the wheel has turned full circle, with one party dominating national politics and a fragmented opposition that cannot offer alternatives. One party dominant system has returned to Indian politics, but in new form. BJP is nothing like the Congress in its heyday, i.e. a loosely knit coalition of different interest groups bargaining with each other within the party organizations.

3.10 Conclusion Party politics in India has been going through dramatic changes, the earlier party system is changing rapidly, as are political equations. A dominant party system and majority governments have given way to a multi-party system and coalition governments. What seems crucial in this process is not ideological purity, but the exigency of the situation, where the former seems to be a liability rather than an asset. Parties with clearly defined ideologies are now inclined to form coalition with the object of challenging a common enemy. Significant in this configuration is the powerful presence of regional parties that hold the key to the very survival of the coalition. The evolution of political alliances began in 1967, with the formation of coalition governments of political parties opposed to the Congress. Despite being short-lived, non-Congress governments that came to power in 1967 in as many as nine states created history by replacing the Congress party in the provinces. The state level experiment of coalition was tried at the centre in 1977. The Janata Party was when national elections were announced after the emergency. It was a hurriedly formed coalition to fight a suddenly called election. It did not last long because of ideological differences among the partners of the coalition. The Janata Party disintegrated in 1979. The nineties have witnessed a succession of coalition governments. The governments formed in 1989, 1990, 1991, 1996, 1998, 1999, 2004 and 2009 were coalition of several political parties. The minority coalition in 1989 and in 1996 were toppled when their supporters outside the government, the BJP and the Congress withdrew support, whereas the 1998 coalition government fell after AIADMK, a partner of the coalition withdrew support. Coalition in India is likely to be unstable, unless the constituents agree on a common minimum programme. The NDA was drawn on this and its stability was largely due to the common minimum programme avoiding contentious issues. In 2004 the non-NDA constituents formed United Progressive Alliance. The Congress party which was not so much enthusiastic about electoral pacts with other endorsed the idea of forming strategic regional alliance to gain a majority in parliament. The Congress and its allies won a majority in the 2004 Lok Sabha poll. The succession of coalition governments since the 1990s led many scholars and commentators to observe that India is surely in the era at coalition. A single party majority does not seem possible any longer. However, the 2014 Lok Sabha election has brought back the one party dominant system. 2019 Lok Sabha election further confirmed the trend.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 45 4.2 Introduction The growth of regionalism in India is generally attributed to her cultural diversity. Political theorists view regionalism as a complex of political, economic and cultural phenomena. It is an articulation of growing political consciousness, increasing competition for scarce resources, feeling of relative deprivation arising from policies and programmes of the central government. Besides, there is cultural anxiety among ethnic groups over language status and ethnic balance. In recognition of the country's diversity, the constitution of India provides for a federal structure of government. The constitution also makes provision for the reorganization of states. However, the centralizing tendency inherent in the Indian federal system has created center-state conflict over different issues. Thus a significant aspect of the issue of regionalism has been the dialectic of centralization and decentralization. Since the 1950s India has witnessed the rise and assertion of regional and state based political parties. Issues of ethnicity and the axes of social cleavage have played significant role in the transformation of party politics of India in recent times.

4.3 Regionalism in the Indian perspective

Regionalism is a contested construction. It has been analysed as an offshoot of asymmetrical centre. State relation; as a product of widening gulf between developed and backward regions; as a manifestation of conflict between political elites; as an outgrowth of compulsions of electoral politics or as expressions of increasing competitiveness among different states in a liberalizing economy. Regionalism, according to Rashiduddin Khan, expresses the plurality of Indian society. Socio cultural diversity of India cannot be adequately explained in terms of nationality or ethnicity. The regions of India have their own social, cultural, historical, linguistic, economic and political specification. However, the role of ethnicity in the regional movements in Tamilnadu, Jharkhand, Gorkhland, Assam and Meghalaya cannot be ignored. Similarly, most of the ethnic groups in the North East and Kashmiri Muslims perceive themselves as distinct nationalities and this runs counter to the India's nation building project. Thus while some regional movements aim to achieve greater autonomy of the states, others seek to resist imposition of a monolithic national unity.

46 NSOU • CC-PS-04 In this connection it would be pertinent to refer to the phenomenon of nativism in India. Nativism indicates conflict between the migrants and the sons of the soil. In Myron Wiener's formulation nativism is a form of ethnic identity that seeks to exclude migrants from residing and working in a territory which they consider to be their own homeland. Presence of large migrants from outside, cultural differences between the migrants and the local inhabitants, high level of unemployment among the locals, are some of the reasons for the growth of nativist movement in India.

4.4 Growth and development of regionalism in India

Regionalism in India is a complex of political, economic and ethnic phenomena. Its origin can be traced back to the national liberation movement. The pan Indian national identity could not replace regional identities but grew along with them. In the course national liberation movement pan Indian and regional consciousness appeared simultaneously. The former was based on pan Indian homogeneity of culture. the latter was built upon relevant region's distinctive homogeneity. Demarcation of state boundaries on the basis of administrative convenience played an important role in stimulating regional consciousness. However regional forces remained largely dormant as they were not well organized and all important goal of the national movement was to achieve freedom from British rule. The exceptions were the Dravida and the Akali movements. The establishment and role of the Justice party in Chennai and to a lesser extent, of Akali Dal in Punjab, are examples of emerging regionalism in India. After independence there are a few major landmarks in the development or regionalism

1. Independent India adopted democratic form of government. Its main aim was nation building on principles of democracy, secularism, national unity and social justice. All parts of the country wanted a fair deal in nation building and started competing with each other for their development.
2. Princely states were integrated into the Indian union. Small states were integrated with big states. However, people continued to nurse loyalties to old territorial units.
3. Reorganisation of states on linguistic basis played a vital role in the development of regionalism. New states were created, for example, Bombay was divided into Gujrat and Maharashtra, Punjab into Punjab and Haryana.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 47 But these states were not created entirely on linguistic basis. Many other Factors like ethnic-cum-economic considerations led to the construction of Nagaland, Meghalaya, Manipur, Tripura, Jharkhand, Haryana, Punjab and Chattisgarh and Telangana. Language-cum-cultural factors created Maharashtra, Gujrat and Uttarakhand. Historical and political factors are responsible for UP and Bihar, integration of princely states and need for viable groupings gave birth to Madhya Pradesh and Rajasthan; language and social distinctiveness led to the creation of Tamil Nadu, Kerala, Mysore, Bengal and Orissa. Thus it was language, ethnicity, culture and religion that became the basis of the formation of regional identity in India. Marxist writer attribute regionalization of Indian polity to the rise of the rich landed peasantry in the aftermath of the great revolution. The widening of electoral democracy in terms of increased participation of the marginalized rural social groups further consolidated the power of this class. Besides intensifying centre-state conflicts, the emergence of this new class also led to the growth of inter-regional tensions. This is primarily because the peripheral sub-regions felt neglected both economically and politically. This partly explain the construction of regional identity in Kutch, saurashtra, Marathwada, Vidarbha, Telangana and Uttarakhand. The feeling of being treated as peripheries was accentuated by the fact that most of the sub-regions were rich in terms of minerals and natural resources, We may also refer to the assertion of the different dialect communities in the bigger states of the Hindi heartland of India like Bundelkhand, Purvanchal and Harit Pradesh in UP and Mithilanchal in Bihar. Reference may be made to the political and administrative basis of regionalism in India although politics as such does not create regionalism. It only accentuates regionalism. Politicians take advantage of the situation of regional discontent and unrest. They convert it into movements for strengthening their individual support bases. Thus fighting within congress gave rise to Telengana agitation. Regional political parties like TDP (Andhra Pradesh), DMK (Tamil Nadu), Akali Dal (Punjab), AGP (Assam) have been surviving because of regional sentiments. 4.5 Regionalization of National Politics The increasing role of regional parties in national politics has been referred to as regionalization of national politics. Since the 1990s, the crucial arena of democratic competition has shifted to the regional states. According to Sushil Kulkarni, regional

48 NSOU • CC-PS-04 politics has been reinvigorated by a combination of perceived opportunities and threats. First, although the constitution does not give important fiscal and economic power to the states, in recent years real economic powers have begun to flow to them. One reason is that central government has preferred to pass to state governments the responsibilities of liberalizing the economy. Second the regional parties have effectively used the opportunities arising from the decline of the Congress Party. For example, the powers to legislate politics of affirmative action lie with State government. Regional parties based on caste have made it a power tool to get electoral dividend. Third, the fear that the Hindu nationalist forces might form government at the centre and impose a singular definition of Indian identity has led to the development of stronger regional opposition. This has resulted in intense competition for control of the state government. The increasing role of regional parties in national politics is often interpreted as a force tending towards the disintegration of the Indian union. But in India, regional parties are not even all regionalist in the sense of representing demands for cultural autonomy or grievances against the Indian state. The earlier phase of secessionist sentiment has largely receded, with the exception of Kashmir. The emerging politics of the region is not isolationist, nor does it seek to withdraw from the centre. Regional parties increasingly share the same political space as national parties irrespective of their agendas. They are electoral allies of national parties and participate in coalition governments at the centre. Yet they have rarely questioned the economic agenda of the central government, even though many states may have faced a fiscal crisis as a result of all those policies. Instead, regional parties prefer getting financial deals for their states, in exchange for political support to the government at the centre. Since 1989, India has been governed by coalition of various sorts, grouped mainly around the congress and the BJP. The 2009 elections further consolidated a two-coalition system. These coalition governments at the centre have forced regional parties to become involved in national issues, even as they work to extract benefits for their own kind. 4.6 Regional Political Parties Most of the regional political parties barring National Conference of Jammu and state or which represent the interest of particular linguistic, regional, ethnic or cultural groups

are known as regional parties. India has a large number of regional parties. 4.6.1 DMK and AIADMK The DMK and AIADMK are the two regional parties of Tamil Nadu and have become the main contenders for power in the state. Since the first World War the Dravidian movement has played crucial role in the Populous southern Indian state of Tamil Nadu. It began with exclusionary ethnic appeals. Self Respect Association was the first mass organization of the Dravidians. It was later renamed the Dravidians Kazhagam (DK), which had small pockets of influence during the interwar period through appeals to Tamil speakers. It claimed that Tamils were descendants of a Dravidian race, distinct from the Aryans from whom the North and South Indian Brahmin were said to have been descended. It held Brahminical Hinduism and religion as being the source of all oppression and articulated its atheism through breaking idols and abusing deities. DK demanded secession and opposed the constitutional guarantee of freedom of religious belief and practice. It argued that free religious practice implies official acceptance of the caste discrimination intrinsic to Hinduism. In 1949 there was a split in the DK and a new party was born known as Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam (DMK). In the beginning DMK wanted to achieve an independent South Indian Dravidian state comprising Tamil Nadu, Andhra Pradesh, Karnataka and Travancore-Cochin. Subsequently it was obliged to change its position and accepted constituent status of Tamil Nadu as an integral part of India. However, It did not abandon its anti-Hindi and anti-north position. It demanded greater autonomy to the states. Right from 60s it has been demanding amendments to the constitution so as to give them more autonomy. It has also demanded the abolition of the post of Governors and abrogation of art. 356. Like DK, DMK is also an anti-Brahmin Party. It stands for social reforms and its members have to take a pledge that they will remain agnostic. It stands for keeping alive with cultural identity of the Tamil people. Right from its origin it has propagated the legacy of Tamil culture and has been laying emphasis on the Tamil history literature and art.

50 NSOU • CC-PS-04 In 1967 there was a split in the party, The faction led by M. Karunanidhi remained as DMK while the faction led by M.G. Ramachandran became All India Anna Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam. The constitution of AIADMK is almost the same as that of the DMK with the exception that its members are obliged to profess agnosticism. It stands for maintaining cultural identity of the people of Tamil Nadu. It takes pride in Tamil history, language, culture, literature, art and architecture. The prefix All India indicated that its canvas is wider than DMK, although it remains basically a regional party. 4.6.2 Asom Gana Parishad (AGP) AsomGanaParishad was formed on 15th August 1985. Assam agitation against illegal infiltration of foreigners from Bangladesh constituted the background for its formation. The party has been complaining against infiltration of illegal migrants from neighboring Bangladesh apprehending that it is changing the demographic, social and economic complexion of the state. It has been demanding detection of all illegal migrants, deletion of their names from the country's electoral rolls and their deportation. The aims and objectives of the party include building up a truly progressive and egalitarian society based on political equality, economic development and social justice. It demands more powers for the state on the basis of truly federal structure. It seeks to strengthen the foundation of the local economy by proper utilization of natural resources of the state and provide full protection to the interests of local people in matters of employment of all kinds. Its declared objective is to ensure amity and harmony among all section of the people and to take all steps for the upliftment of all indigenous language and cultures. 4.6.3 Telegu Desam Party (TDP) The Telegu Desham party is another regional party active in the Southern states of Andhra Pradesh and Telangana. The party follows a pro-Telegu ideology. The formation of the party was motivated by its resolve to fight Congress hegemony at the centre and in the state by emphasizing on the telegu regional pride. It declares itself as a party of Farmers, backward castes and middle class people. In the economic sphere it has followed liberal policy that has been s pro-business and pro- development party.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 51 4.6.4 Shiv Sena The Shiv Sena was formed in 1966 in Bombay. The party has been championing the economic interests of Maharashtra since its formation. It sought to arouse parochial sentiment by claiming that outsiders were usurping local jobs. It emerged primarily as a son-of-soil movement and made Maharashtra centric politics its front priority. It demands preferential treatment for Marathis over migrants from other parts of India. The party is known for its anti-communist position. It preaches a version of patriotism that demonizes Muslims as anti-national. From its formation the Shiv Sena has shown its readiness to use violence as a method of political action. Simultaneously the party organizes various popular programmes like providing services in local areas and slums to get the support of the Maratha speaking male youth. In the mid-1980s, the party has reordered its agenda to emphasize the themes of Hindu nationalism. The Shiv Sena chief, Bal Thackeray urged his followers to take up a holy war. It sponsored Hindu festival and celebration which over the years have become more expensive and elaborate.

4.6.5 The Akali Dal The Shiromani Akali Dal is a regional party based on the religious sentiments of the Sikh community. It emerged as a result of the Sikh's resolve to fight against the domination of British patronized Gurudwara chiefs. Right from the days of Mughal rule there developed a feeling of deprivation among the Sikh's. Sikh's had always strived to keep their identity separate from the rest of the population. In the pre-independence period Akalis under the leadership of Master Tara Singh demanded a separate Khalistan for Sikhs. After partition, the Akali Dal was divided into two factions under the leadership of Master Tara Singh and Sant Fateh Singh. In the struggle between their two factions, Fatah Singh Faction became dominant, subsequently the group led by Tara Singh merged with the dominant factions. In the post-independence period Akalis have a history of division and unity. The anti-center position of the Akalis led them to pass Anandpur-Sahib Resolution, which demanded a separate and independent Sikh state. Terrorism in Punjab was to a large extent inspired by Anandpur Sahib Resolution. In the preamble to the resolution, it was stated that the Indian constitution was a clever design made by the Hindu Congress to subjugate the Sikhs. The resolution put emphasis on the separate cultural identity of the Sikhs. It is significant that even liberal Akalis had not been able to denounce this resolution. Subsequently militancy to a great extent has declined in the state. In 1997 Punjab election Akalis in alliance with BJP scored a thumping majority in Punjab assembly. It also participated in the BJP led coalition government at the centre.

4.7 Conclusion Regionalism is one of the major forces shaping the nature and texture of Indian politics. It is a multidimensional phenomenon. Its bases are geographical, historical, cultural, economic and social. The general factors behind the growth of regionalism are the cultural, ethnic and linguistic diversity of India. It found expression in the formation of Political parties. Sometimes it has taken a communal shape like Akalis in Punjab and National conference in Jammu and Kashmir. Some regional parties have emerged to protect the separate cultural identity of the region. DMK and following difference with CPI regarding party line. The party wanted to bring about a new form of government called "peoples Democracy". The ideological goal of the party is to organize a people's democratic revolution under the leadership of the working class. In the economic sphere the party promised total liquidation of, land-lordism, cancellation of debts of the peasants, equitable distribution food to the people of rural and urban area and state trading in food grains. Other economic programme of the party include: increasing minimum wages, for agricultural workers, ensuring equal wage for women agricultural workers, strict enforcement of the minimum wage, social security measures such as pensions, accident compensation with central funding, effect a substantial increase in public expenditure on the rural sector, provide cheap institutional credit to the agriculture sector. On industrial policy CPI(M) suggested preservation of economic independence and self-reliance. The party also pleaded for reversal of IMF-World Bank dictated economic policy, simplification of the regulatory system and strengthen regulatory bodies to prevent corruption. The party is against wholesale privatization of public sector. Party promised to give priority to the manufacturing sector to create employment opportunities, encourage small and medium enterprise in labour intensive sector, protect domestic industries, prohibit FDI in retail trade, and implement GST only after ensuring a higher rate for the states so as to partially correct the present fiscal balance, drive to unearth black money. CPI(M) advocated the need to make elementary education a fundamental right and universalize secondary school education. Party also promised to regulate private higher education institution. On health related issues the party promised to increase public expenditure on health, regulate the private healthcare sector, ensure uninterrupted supply of all medicine free of cost in all public health centre. On the issue of women empowerment, the party promised to pass Women Reservation Bill, ensure equal pay for women worker, adopt social security measures for working women.

62 NSOU • CC-PS-04 The party promised to provide larger funds for the upliftment and welfare of the SCs/STs. It also favoured reservation in the private sector for SCs and STs. It was also in favour of providing reservation to the backward minorities through legislation and making Minorities Commission a statutory body. Like all other national parties CPI(M) promised to frame an environmental policy integrating environmental concern with the needs of economic development, makes the system and promises of environmental clearance effective, check pollution of rivers and other water bodies. Regarding the energy sector CPI(M) promised to review energy and telecom policies in tune with the interest of self-reliant national development, to reverse the trend towards privatizing power production and distribution. Regarding Jammu and Kashmir the party suggested maximum autonomy for Jammu and Kashmir by keeping Article 370 of the constitution intact and advocated for strong steps to be taken to prevent excesses by security forces. On RamJanmabhumi issue CPI(M) like CPI pleaded for separating religion from politics, resolution of the controversy through negotiation and preserving the status quo of religious places. On the issue of terrorism and internal security the party pleaded for revamping the intelligence machinery and better coordination between security and intelligence agencies, amendment of the unlawful activities act to remove draconian provision like detention without trial for 180 days. Regarding foreign policy and defense CPI(M) advocated continued dialogue with Pakistan to resolve all outstanding issues, promote people to people contact, sever military and security ties with Israel, build relations with Bangladesh, settle Teesta waters agreement and revise Indo-US nuclear agreement. The party pleaded for not renewing defense framework agreement with the U.S., create a national security apparatus, demilitarization of the cyber space, building indigenous capacity to protect Indian interest and telecommunication networks.

5.7 Conclusion Policy and programmatic statements are central features of political parties. National political parties in India have put on record their political ideas and goals in their party programme. On the eve of election each party issues its manifesto, NSOU • CC-PS-04 63 outlining its basic beliefs, assessment of situation and approach to different problems and issues. Each party spells out its distinct ideology. Political parties in India try to get electoral support not only through their image but also through articulation of concrete policy proposals. There is a remarkable degree of similarities in approach to most of the social, economic and political problems by the national political parties. In the context of political issues, all the national parties expressed their commitment to uphold the constitutional provisions relating to secularism. All the parties advocated the need to check corruption by setting up an independent, impartial commission at the centre and the states. In Jammu and Kashmir national parties differed in their approach. On economic issues all national parties favoured planning as an approach to the various aspect of national life. It was only BJP which advocated abolishing planning commission. All the political parties were in favour of abolition of the Zamindari system, although there were differences in the means to be adopted. On industrial policy in the post liberalization phase, national parties differed in their approach. All major national parties pleaded for redefining the role of the public sector. CPI(M) and CPI, however, were against wholesale privatization of the public sector. Since the 1970s issues relating to environment, climate change, consumer protection, human rights, black money, gender, corruption in public life, terrorism and security concerns and water have been given pronounced emphasis in the manifesto of the national parties.

5.8 Summing Up • Programmatic statements and policies are central features of political parties. • Political parties in India have been classified into three categories; registered parties, recognized state parties and recognized national parties. • At present, there are six recognized national parties.

Unit - 6 □ Voting Behaviour in India-Overview Structure 6.1 Objectives 6.2 Introduction 6.3 Meaning and importance of voting behaviour 6.4 Different approaches to study voting behaviour 6.5 Studies of voting behaviour in India 6.6 Conclusion 6.7 Summing Up 6.8 Probable Questions 6.9 Further Reading 6.1 Objectives This unit will help the learners to : • understand the meaning and importance to study voting behaviour. • recognise social cleavages influencing voting behaviour. • find the sustenance of democracy in a diversified society. 6.2 Introduction In a democratic country citizen uses voting as a means for communicating his endorsement or objection to governmental decisions, policies and programmes of various political parties. Voting behaviour refers to actions and inactions of citizens in respect of participating in the elections that take place at the local, regional, or national level. Here most important Questions arise that how people decide and why they opt for candidate or party? Voting Behaviour is thus a study of factors influencing voters to vote for one party or candidate. It not simply examines only data, records, past political events and shifts and swings, but it also deals with

68 NSOU • CC-PS-04 psychological aspects such as voters' perception, emotion, motivation etc. This unit discusses the meaning, importance, and significance of voting behaviour in the Indian context. 6.3 Meaning and importance of voting behaviour Voting Behaviour is concerned with the way people vote and with the reasons why they vote so. Now a further question arises about the pattern of voting of the citizens There is difference between the West and India. West is more homogeneous and India is diverse and heterogeneous. Regions are marked by different kinds of political orientations and participations. Factors influencing voters also differ from region to region. So, it is difficult to find out factors determining voting behaviour in India. Also, in the west, due to long development of democracy and more open society, people show their choice and express why they vote to a particular candidate or party. In India, on the flipside, voters are more conservative in showing reasons why they support one candidate or party. Thus, voting behaviour researches are more conclusive in West than in India. However, the study of determinants of electoral behaviour constitutes a very significant area of empirical study. An empirical study of the determinants which inspire and influence the voters to exercise his right to vote in favour or against a particular candidate is influenced by different factors such as gender, race and pressure groups in invoking religious and communal factors, the influence of money or charismatic personality of a leader. 6.4 Different approaches to study voting behaviour Different approaches are instrumental in explaining voting behaviour. These are known as structural, ecological, rational and socio-psychological. 1. Structural or socio-psychological approach emphasises on the relationship between individual and social structure. It explains the voting behaviour in a social context. This approach gives importance on the party identification and become very popular in United States in 1950 and 1960s. 2. Ecological approach relates voting behaviour to the characteristic features of a geographical area (word, constituency, state etc). 3. Rational choice approach maintains that political choice is made by individual's rational calculation of self interest. So when one votes, one

NSOU • CC-PS-04 69 votes for something. This approach analyses voting behaviour as the outcome of cost-benefit calculations by the individual. This voting behaviour model denies the concept that voting behaviour of an individual is firmly related to his /her class affiliation or class socialization. 4. Socio-psychological approach takes up social and psychological variables like caste, religion, gender etc, in explaining voting behaviour. 6.5 Studies of voting behaviour in India Study of voting behavior is firmly related to the study of electoral politics. This study of voting behavior of the people is known as psephology. Basic objectives of the subject is to understand the behavior of the voters at the time of elections. The study of determinants of voting behavior constitutes a very significant part in academic arena. These determinants like caste, class, religion, money, language etc. influence the voters to exercise their right to vote in favor or against a particular candidate. On the question of understanding voting behavior of a particular voter leads to the questions as why a voter prefers a particular candidate or a particular party in the election. Researchers must find out the factors which influence voters to choose a particular candidate. These factors may include economic, social or political. After independence, some studies were carried out on voting behavior, but these studies lack modern techniques. Gradually, quality of studying voting behavior has been improved. In the latter period, Some political scientists like Rajni Kothari, Myron Wiener and Pranoy Roy initiated some systematic studies on determinants of voting behavior. From 1990 onwards some research scholars also carried out election studies. Study of voting behavior has now become a central attraction for the academicians and journalists. For the last few years researchers have started to use survey sophisticated methods which have proved more scientific. Presently, many scholars, journalists, political scientists, and sociologists are now engaged in studying the determinants of voting behavior. 6.6 Conclusion From the above discussion we may conclude that voting is the main form of political participation in a democratic system. The study of voting behaviour emphasizes primarily on explaining who votes and how they vote. The analysis of

70 NSOU • CC-PS-04 the voting patterns invariably focuses on the determinants of why people vote and how they arrive at the decisions they make. Researchers have pointed out the influence of political factors such as issues, political programmes, electoral campaigns, party loyalty and voter's feelings about candidates etc. The will of the people is expressed through voting and therefore, all undemocratic and unfair means like manipulating and rigging need to be avoided. 6.7 Summing Up • Voting' is one of the most used terms in contemporary age of democratic politics. In democratic system, each adult citizen uses 'voting' as a means of expressing his approval or disapproval of government decisions, policies and programmes, the policies and programmes of various political parties and qualities of candidate who are engaged in struggle to get the status of being the representatives of people. • Voting behaviour is not confined to the examination of voting statistics, records and computation of electoral shifts and swings. It also involves an analysis of individual psychological processes (perception, emotion, and motivation) and their relation to political action as well as of institutional patterns, such as the communication process and their impact on elections. It also involves an analysis of individual psychological processes (perception, emotion, and motivation) and their relation to political action as well as of institutional patterns, such as communication process and their impact on elections. The voting behaviour has recently been expanded in the meaning and is taken as one major and broad area of study. • Various approaches like structural, ecological, social-psychological and rational-choice are instrumental in studying voting behaviour. • Voting behaviour of the people have been studied in India from time to time. In India, political scientists, sociologists, anthropologists, media houses and political parties have carried out election studies. In the beginning, particularly in 1950s these studies were not technically very sound. From 1960s systematic study of voting was started with application of improved technique and method. Several Political Scientists, Anthropologists, Sociologists, Psychologists have led research work on voting behaviour. Findings of these

NSOU ● CC-PS-04 71 studies are published in national and international academic journals, books and print media which help in understanding the maturity of democracy and about the reasons for that. 6.8 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. 74 NSOU ● CC-PS-04 ● to realise the role of caste as an important determinant of voting behaviour. ● to explain why caste politics exists in India. 7.2 Introduction Caste is among the most researched determinant in studies of voting behaviour. It has become one of the most effective determinants of voting behaviour in elections in the post-Independent India. Electoral politics is identified with creating support base and mobilising support in present structure. Caste structure provides ready organisation of people through which politics may be organised. Rajni Kothari in his Caste in Indian Politics argues that the questions are what form does caste take under the impact of politics and what form does politics take in caste ridden society? Politics is competitive enterprise, and so its main target is to achieve power by manipulating clusters of people living together in a community following same social norms and practices. Caste structure provides this organised cluster to be utilised by politics. Conversely, castes also want to assert themselves and their identity through politics and dominate over others. Thus, politics and caste come closer what Kothari calls Politicisation of Caste. 7.3 Meaning and importance of caste in Indian politics Caste is endogamous kinship group and is based on ascriptive status. Once born in a group he must remain same. Status and position of a person is fixed according to his caste. Each caste has different social attributes, rituals, practices, and traditional occupation as a particular social identity. Each caste has different social identity. Caste is vertical and horizontal stratification of Indian society. It is known as Varna as four Varnas are functionally determined. They are Brahmin, Khatriya, Baishya and Sudra. There are also the undercasts, the Pancham or Dalit. With modernisation and various social and political movements, it was believed that caste-based hierarchy will wither away. But caste never disappeared. No social system disappeared in that way. Rather a collective sentiment, an emotion and feeling of caste solidarity appeared. With modernisation, horizontal consolidation of caste took place. When politics looked to caste for mobilising support, castes too used politics for their gains. Initially after independence, the caste structure was polarised between upper and lower caste. Later, castes became more fragmented and inter-caste competition

NSOU • CC-PS-04 75 accelerated. A process of politicisation of caste gathered momentum. After independence the polarisation of castes took shape in the form of Brahmin and Non- Brahmin castes as seen in Tamilnadu and Maharashtra. In Andhra it was between Kamma and Reddi and in Gujrat between Brahmin versus Patidars. This phase of polarisation was followed by a stage of fragmentation which was a product of political competition. Later the inter- caste competition became intra-cast creating different cleavages. Caste groups, caste federations or any kind of caste agglomeration may play dominant role in politics. On the one hand, established political parties vied for support of dominant or powerful castes in different regions, and, on the other, caste-based parties appeared to voice their demands. It is difficult to say how far politics uses caste or caste uses politics. Though it has been observed by Lloyed and Susanne Rudolph that the institutions of castes have undergone modification because of modernisation of political system. Competition among different castes began for achieving political power. This took place horizontally while vertical solidarity had been weakened. In various parts in India, caste became dominant factor in politics, both in case of political recruitment and in voting. Castes determine Voting Behaviour in many parts of Northern and Southern India. Castes become major avenue to power and to ordinary voter or the collective, it appears, that they will reap much benefits if their caste captures power. Caste based politics and voting behaviour are seen protests against the dominance of upper castes. Especially power can relieve lower, dominated castes from torture and exploitations of upper castes. Thus, caste associations acted as pressure groups to secure upward mobility and benefits. Traditional caste functions are losing grounds. Mainly it happened among Nadar caste in South India. 7.4 Caste Loyalty Different caste groups show their loyalties to different political parties and their ideologies. People inherit a particular caste due to birth in the same caste and grow up as a member of a specific caste cluster. They belong to either one of the high castes or other backward castes or scheduled castes and scheduled tribes. From his/ her childhood a person gradually adopts caste values and caste interests. These caste values and caste interests play a major role in socialisation and consequently his political thinking, awareness, and participation. Naturally a separate identity based on caste politics shape the personality of the concerned person. some political parties have an immediate caste basis whereas others indirectly exercise caste as a basis.

76 NSOU • CC-PS-04 Identity based politics becomes the hall mark in states like UP, Bihar, MP, and Southern states. STs, SCs and OBCs play important role in influencing the voting behaviour. So, on many occasions people voted a person who belonged to his/her particular caste as Jadavs opted for a Jadav candidate. In UP the Bahujan Samajbadi Party 's support base is hailed from dominant dalits and a section of Muslim and Samajbadi Party (SP) was constituted by Jadavs and Muslims. BSP enjoyed massive support from dalits. In 2017 State election BSP got 22% votes and in 2019 it got 19.3% votes. For capturing power the party appealed to Brahmins and other sections of society in 2006. 7.5 Political Parties and Caste The politicization of caste and casteism in politics has been a well- known reality of Indian political system. The caste-based mobilisation is one of the most important tools of voter mobilisation for all political parties today in India. We find political parties in the length and breadth of the country from the far East to the West and from North to down South. All parties in India draw up a poll strategy on the basis of the constituency's caste profile. Messages in the election are tailored in a way to suit the dominant caste present there and ideological coherence is often sacrificed. Political parties take caste into consideration while formulating their manifestos, programmes and agendas. Caste also makes an impact in policy making of the parties. while nominating a candidate for contesting election, political parties often consider caste of the candidate. Morris Jones thus rightly points out, " Politics is more important for caste and caste is more important for politics than before". The concept of caste has become an astonishing matter since 1990s due to Mondal Commission which was introduced by the VP Sing government giving reservation to the OBCs in the central institution and rise of the parties such as the BSP, the SP and the RJD in north India. These parties have been identified with Dalits, OBCs or the peasant classes. Prior to their rise, the Congress party represented a coalition of various castes. Emergence of these parties underlined the significance of the marginalized castes playing decisive role in electoral politics. Their rise also increased competition among different castes. However, the basic demand of the dalits is to remove all types of discriminations and implementation of the principle of equality in every corner of the nation. Dalits are against upper caste domination and in favour of equality. From Ambedkar to present, they are in favour of NSOU • CC-PS-04 77 annihilation of caste. They have their own organisations and they oppose upper caste domination parties. They also protest using Dalit vote bank policy by upper caste parties. In 1984 Bahujan Samajbadi Party was established as Dalit party and came to power. Dalits are very much motivated by their identity and Dalit voters are influenced and guided by Dalit interest. They vote for Dalit candidates. Though lately there is a change in goal and policy of BSP. BSP now is not guided simply by caste arithmetic and emphasising on coalition of interests. But when issues become dominant like economic development, dalits support issues and upper caste parties as it happened when BSP suffered huge defeat in 2019 Lok Sabha election. However, caste plays important and dominant role in Voting Behaviour.

7.6 Caste Politics in different states in India After independence caste added a new dimension at the local and state level politics in India. Caste politics has been firmly entrenched in several states in India like Bihar, Uttarpradesh, Kerala, Karnataka, Andhrapradesh, Tamilnadu, Maharashtra, Punjab, Haryana and Rajashthan. Following analysis reveals as to what extent caste has exercised its influence in the working of the state politics.

7.6.1 Bihar In comparison to other states of India, Bihar is far ahead in respect dominancy of caste over politics. In Bihar, there is always a conflict between the forward castes and backward castes. A popular message in Bihar is “you don’t cast your vote in Bihar you vote your caste”. In the first few decades after independence the upper caste dominates Bihar politics. After abolition of Zamindari system backward castes began to emerge as a determinant factor in state politics. As the upper castes started to be weakened, Yadavs, Kummis and Koeri started to play a major role in Bihar politics. Caste politics has strengthen its position from 1990s after Mondal commission’s report came into limelight. In Bihar, many political parties gradually have emerged on the basis of castes i.e, Rastriya Janata Dal, Samata Party, Lok Janashakti Party and Samajwadi Party. Major problem in Bihar politics is that none of the parties is in a position to get an absolute majority due to casteism as none of the parties has the capacity to mobilize good proportion of votes of their castes. Small parties form alliance with other parties just to increase vote percentage from various castes. Caste not only plays a major part in loksabha or vidhansabha election

78 NSOU • CC-PS-04 but also in Pachayat election. However, it is observed that most of the Yadavs vote for RJD and upper castes for NDA (National Democratic Alliance).

7.6.2 Uttarpradesh Caste plays a major role in Uttarpradesh politics. It is very much active in the districts of Meerut, Aligarh and Kanpur. Congress played a dominant role in UP politics for a long period. It was in 1989 that big national parties and the upper caste lost their influence in UP and Bihar. Kanshi Ram, the founder of the Bahujan Samaj Party (BSP), emerged with a slogan, “Vote hamara, raj tumhara – nahi chalega, nahi chalega (Our vote, you rule, will not happen, will not happen)”.This slogan succeeded in uniting the backward castes and dalits. As a result, Bahujan Samaj party has appeared as the saviour of the traditionally lower caste known as Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes. BSP holds a strong position in U.P.and after Kashiram BSP supremo Mayawati has become immensely popular among the backward castes, Scheduled castes, Scheduled Tribes as well as Dalit Chamar (leather worker). Prior to Mayawati, Mulayam Sing yadav on the basis of caste has become a prominent leader of U.P. He ruled the state as Chief Minister for three non consecutive terms. In U.P. upper castes account 20 per cent, Dalits 20 percent, Muslims 20 per cent and other backward castes 40 per cent of the total votes. In 2017 Assembly elections both Samajwadi Party and Bahujan Samaj Party have lost their influence on the backward castes and Dalits where as BJP successfully placed itself in a political space among the castes and sub castes unsatisfied with and abhorrent to the hegemony of the intermediaries such as the Yadav among the OBCs and Yatav among the Dalits. It is a well known fact that BJP has a strong base among the upper castes in U.P. In the 2019 Loksabha election BJP breached the non Yadav vote bank among the other backward classes and successfully obtained support of Kurmi and Mauryas. BJP’s strategy to expand the idea of ‘Samagra Hindutva which seeks to integrate OBCs and Scheduled Castes within the Hindutva fold won the heart of the backward castes and Dalits.

7.6.3 Maharashtra Castes have always been a part of Maharashtra politics. In Maharashtra, three groups of castes namely Maratha, Maha and Brahamins dominate the caste politics of Maharashtra. These three groups of caste comprise 47 percent of the Hindu population. Traditionally Marathas support the Congress party, lately it is closed to

NSOU • CC-PS-04 79 National Congress Party. Hindu Dalits are divided between Congress, BJP and Shiv Sena. Mahar castes are largely with Congress and factions of Republican party of India. BJP has become a prominent force by organising Mali, Dhugar, Vanjari and Maratha communities in 2019 Assembly election. 7.6.4 Karnataka Elections in Karnataka means equations and two communities - Lingayats and Vokkaligas - who have influenced the poll scenario for more than three decades. Caste and religion have played a bigger role than any other factor in selection of candidates and their winnability, despite lack of leadership, statesmanship, qualifications or the ability to nurture their constituencies. Even national parties like BJP and Congress have followed the tradition of caste politics in Karnataka, while JD(S), being a party of the Vokkaligas, has played the caste card cleverly. The leaders of the three parties select candidates keeping in mind the dominant role of the two communities. Whether Lok Sabha or Assembly poll candidates are selected on caste basis — depending on the percentage of Vokkaliga or Lingayat voters (or Kuruba in some) in a particular constituency. If North Karnataka is regarded as the Lingayat heartland, Old Mysore is the Vokkaliga bastion. So, both BJP and Congress have been fielding either Lingayats or Vokkaligas in both these regions. 7.6.5 Kerala In Kerala religion and caste play a major role in shaping the voting behaviour of the people. After inclusion of Travancore-Cochin Princely states in Indian union Kerala came up as the biggest Malayalam speaking state dominated by the Hindus. Hindus are divided into Brahmins (Mostly Namboodripads) and Nanyars and Ezhavas(a backward class). The majority of the Ezhava community has always been the support base of Communist Party of India (Marxists). The Kerala Pulayar Maha Sabha (KPMS) which represents the Dalit Pulya Community traditionally support CPM The New Indian Express, 2nd April 2021—‘Kerala Elections : Caste groups keep major fronts guessing days before polls’. It is to be noted that Ezhavas constitute 20% of the population. Dalit which constitutes 10% of the population massively supported the Left Democratic Front in 2021 Assembly Election. In 2016 election 51% or half Dalits voted for the LDF. Recently held 2021 Assembly Election Dalit votes for LDF obtained 69% Dalit votes. On the other hand, Nairs and other upper castes favoured Congress led United Democratic Front. (UDF) This is

80 NSOU • CC-PS-04 the only community where LDF did not perform well. (Kerala Assembly Elections | A shift in social basis of voting, Sreyas Sardesai (The Hindu-May 06, 2021). 7.6.6 Haryana For decades politics of Haryana has been dominated by Jats a land owning community which forms about 25 to 30 percent of the state’s population. Previously, three Chief Minister’s namely Bansilal, Omprakash Choutala and Bhupinder Sing Hooda were Jats who openly followed pro Jat approach in several matters. It is alleged by the other communities that Jats were benefitted by the proactive government assistance. There was a certain disenchantment among the other backward classes (OBC)and Scheduled Castes (SC) in Haryana. In a state that riddled with caste politics, BJP set out to break free of Jat Identity politics. In Haryana, the OBCs ,the SCs and Brahmins constituted majority population and BJP targeted all such non Jat votes. BJP nominated non Jats candidates in Jat majority areas and non Brahmin candidates in Brahmin dominated regions. This political experiment of BJP yielded positive results in 2014 Lok Sabha election and the party won 7 out of 10 seats. In 2019 Assembly election BJP followed the same strategy and appeared as the single largest party. BJP formed the government in a post poll alliance with the Jananayak Janata Party and seven Independents. 7.6.7 Punjab Punjab has the highest population density of scheduled castes (SC) almost 32%. On the other hand, Jat –Sikh Population is estimated to be around 20%. Irrespective of the party, Shiromoni Akali Dal (SAD) or Congress, Punjab always had a Jat-Sikh Chief Minister since 1977. This discloses the caste equation and its political importance in Punjab. Jat-Sikhs are the single largest caste in Punjab which comprises one fifth of the total population. But, in spite of being one-third of the population, Scheduled Castes are scattered into different communities like Adhi Dharmic Ravidassia and Valmiki Mazhabis—remain sharply divided socially as well as politically. Their politics remain as divided as their caste. Though Bahujan Samaj Party (BSP) has a strong Dalit identity, in Punjab its support base largely remain confined to one caste Adidharmi Ravidassia. Even as party founder late Kanshi Ram tried to bring the two communities on the same fold politically, but he could not really succeed. In fact, these are the reasons for which SCs and OBCs are less dominant in Punjab politics where as Jat- Sikhs play a prominent role in the political

NSOU • CC-PS-04 81 affairs of the state. In 2019 Lok Sabha election Congress improved its vote share among Hindu OBCs ; within this caste group, the party's vote share raised from 34% in 2014 to 61% in 2019. Hindu upper castes favoured SAD—BJP alliance and the alliance has received 55% of votes. Caste divide was also appeared among Sikh-Jat voters. Sikhs, particularly Jat Sikhs, who traditionally voted for the SAD, this time tilted towards others. Close to two out of five (37%) Jat Sikhs in 2019 voted for the congress, which was 14% higher than in the 2014 Lok Sabha election.

7.6.8 Rajasthan Caste plays a very prominent role in the politics of Rajasthan. In the state of Rajasthan Scheduled Caste population is 18 %, Scheduled Tribe 13%, Jats 12%, Gujjars and Rajputs 9% each, Brahmins and Meena 7% each. The party which desires to capture power in the state must try to win the favour of OBCs along with other caste groups. It is surprising that while political parties focus their campaigns on public welfare schemes, candidates for election are selected on the basis of caste. North of Rajasthan is Jat dominated where as Meenas and Gujjars have a strong influence in South. The Hadoti (South East of Rajasthan) region is dominated by the Brahmins, Bania and Jats. The Western part of Rajasthan is dominated by Jats and Rajputs. The central region has a higher proportion of Muslims, Meena, Jats and Rajputs. In Rajasthan 89% are Hindus 9 % Muslims and 2% belong to other religions. In Rajasthan, BJP has traditionally been popular among traders, Rajputs and OBCs, where as Congress among Brahmins, Jats, Muslims Gujjars, SC and ST communities. 2018 Assembly election was a contest between Gujjars versus Meenas and Rajputs versus Jats. This can be judged from the fact that they have a history of traditional rivalry. However Congress became successful to create a coalition of caste groups and revive the traditional vote bank within its fold. It is thus clear that the party which is able to obtain the majority support of Rajputs, Gujjar, Jat, Meena and succeeds in creating a broad more acceptable social alliance will get the majority seats in the election. Congress did so and ultimately captured power in 2018 Assembly election.

7.6.9. Tamil Nadu Tamil Nadu has made impressive development in the different fields like education, healthcare, infrastructural facilities and socio-political mobility among diverse sections of society. But it is no exception to caste politics. Caste groups and

82 NSOU • CC-PS-04 caste associations immensely influence political parties including Dravidian parties. Many districts and transport corporations have been named after the leaders of the caste groups exposing the role of the caste organizations. 2011 census report reveals that Tamil Nadu has a 7.2 core population of which 68 % are OBCs, 20 % are SCs, 1 percent are STs and the rest are upper castes. Hindus are 88% (which includes SCs and STs). Muslims close to 6% and Christians form another 6%. A significant portion of the 6% Christian population belongs to Dalits. Different caste groups are scattered in the several parts of the state. Gounder community forms between 12% to 15% of the total population of the state resides in the western part of the state. The mukkulathor community, constituting around 10% of the population wields considerable influence in the Southern and central districts of the state. Another dominant caste in the northern part of the state is the vanniyaars who constitute around 12% of the population. Dalit constitutes 20% of the state population, the highest for any caste group. Dalit population is seen across the state highly concentrated in the Kongu region, Chennai and Vizhuppuram, Vellore, Tiruvannamalai and the delta districts. Traditionally, the AIADMK has a strong support from upper castes, Vanniyaars, Dalits, Gounders and Thevars. On the other hand, DMK has followers in Vellalars, Mudhaliyaars, Udaiyaars, Nadars, Naidus and Muslims. However, the emergence of MDMK (Marumalarchi Dravida Munnerta Kazhagam) and DMDK (Desiya Murpokku Dravida Kazhagam) has provided these communities with additional options. An unprecedented mobilisation is taking place among intermediary castes in Tamil Nadu to hold political, and economic power as usual. Dalits and marginalised people on the other hand, are demanding equal footing in political, economic and other spheres. In recently held Assembly election (2021) DMK led alliance secured two thirds majority and it is pertinent to look at the caste calculus. Post poll survey reveals that the support of the Dalits, minorities and upper castes led to the DMK alliance win. Majority of the dominant backward castes favoured DMK led alliance where as AIADMK alliance owned only a lukewarm support. In South Tamil Nadu, a majority of the Thevar vote (55%) went in favour of the AIADMK alliance where as Nadars, the Devendra Velalars and Christians favoured DMK-led coalition. In respect of the North zone AIADMK, along with the Pattali Makkal Katchi (PMK) obtained a majority (54%) of Vanniyaar voters. Parts of northern Tamil Nadu observed a polarisation of Mudaliar and Vanniyaar votes in AIADMK alliance's favour. But this could not be regarded as a sweep in favour of AIADMK because DMK coalition

NSOU • CC-PS-04 83 secured at least 4 out of every 10 votes. Major area of gain for the DMK-led coalition in North came from Dalit vote and offset the loss of the Vanniyar and Mudaliar support. In the West, the Gounder voted for AIADMK (.59%). But here, the support of the Arunthathiyar Dalits for DMK alliance was 68%. Dalit votes for DMK thus raised to 21%. Interestingly, all of the gains came from at the expense of AIADMK and other parties. But many activists have accused the AIADMK and DMK for maintaining silence on atrocities against Dalits. It is alleged that these parties remain silent on caste issues, fearing backlash from the intermediate or dominant caste population during elections.

7.6.10 Andhrapradesh Caste plays a major role in electoral politics of Andhrapradesh . The two politically dominant communities active in the state politics are Reddy and Kammas. Though Kammas and Reddys are about 6 and 10 per cent respectively of the state's population, they are economically and politically powerful. A majority of the state's chief ministers were from these castes. Caste composition in Andhrapradesh Assembly has undergone a drastic change for the last sixty years. There were good number of representation from the communities like Velamas, Brahmins and Kshatriyas in the Andhrapradesh Assembly. This has come down compared to 1952–1978 and 1983–2014. There were 69 Brahmin MLAs between 1952–1978 and the strength came down to 6 during 1983– 2014. Further, there were 74 Khatriya MLAs in 1952–1978 which decreased to 68 during 1983–2014. These representations have been replaced to a great extent by other communities like Kamma, Reddy and Backward communities and marginally by Vysays and Velamas. Traditionally, Scheduled castes and minorities always support congress party and its leaders which has now been replaced by the YSR Congress (Yuva Sramika Ryth Congress). I Backward castes used to support the TDP (Telugu Deham Party) which always had a Kamma leadership. However, of late, Jagan Mohan Reddy had been trying hard woo members of these communities and break into the Naidu vote bank. Aanother important caste in Andhrapradesh, is Kapus who call themselves as other backward castes and are equivalent to Kurmis or Bhumihars in North India. Kapus are economically and socially strong among backward classes and dominant in region of the Godavari delta. Kapus were a traditional vote bank of Congress. But it shifted its allegiance to TDP in the Assembly election 2014. In the Assembly 84 NSOU • CC-PS-04 election of 2019 Kapus favoured YSR Congress. It is alleged that what seems to have contributed to the TDP's downfall is erosion of its Kama base and not being able to obtain the confidence of Kapus despite promising them backward class status. Further in 2019 Assembly election YSR CONGRESS did well not only among the Reddy but also among the Dalits, Voters from the poor economic class, young persons and farmers supported YSRCongress. political power for furthering the interests of the caste groups.

Due consideration is given to the caste of a person at the time of recruitment to political offices. Caste factor plays a major role in the process of ministry making and the allocation of portfolios. 7.7 Conclusion In election studies in India, caste has become parameter of assessing the level of democracy. Some scholars have argued that increasing participation of various castes, especially the low caste, Dalits and OBCs are indicative of democratic upsurge or a silent revolution in India. Politicisation of caste has made caste an agent of democratic aspiration for the weaker sections. Despite adoption of democratic values which conceive of a society free from casteism caste continues to characterise politics in India and voting factor populace. 7.8 Summing Up • Caste is regarded as

After studying this unit Learners would be able to :

- understand the meaning and importance of class.
- analyse class as a determinant of voting behaviour.
- realise the relationship between class and politics.

8.2 Introduction India's social structure is stratified along class lines. Historically, the British rule and its economic policies generated forces which created the basis for the emergence of classes and strata hitherto unknown in Indian society : the capitalists (individual, commercial and financial), working class living on wages in industrial and commercial establishments, and the English-educated middle classes (lawyers, doctors, professors, 88 NSOU • CC-PS-04 journalists, managers and clerks) in urban areas; Zamindars, large-estate owners, peasant proprietors divided into upper, middle and lower strata, absentee landlords, tenants and sub tenants, agricultural laborers, modern money lenders. A notable aspect of this formation is that there was inter caste economic collusion and highly politicized inter-caste consolidation. After independence, the attempt of the national government to industrialize the country on a capitalist basis-public and private-and to transform the backward village communities into a viable prosperous sector of the national economy has led to the reshuffling of the class structure. Some new classes or strata have emerged. Inter-class and intra-class relations have assumed new dimension but in the countryside, class relations are very often mediated through castes or jatis. By using the criteria of ownership of property in the means of production as well as occupation income and status these principal classes may be described as : (1) the bourgeoisie comprising top industrial and business houses (2) the middle class which includes professionals and urban intellectuals (3) lower middle class comprising small traders and shop keepers, middle level employees, clerks and medium level professionals, (4) working class in the urban areas (skilled manual workers, semi-skilled and unskilled workers) (5) peasantry which constitute largest class. But in spite of existing of such classes in India, class identity and class consciousness in true sense of the terms have not yet developed. This is due to underdeveloped capitalist economy and presence of primordial group identities like caste, religion and ethnicity as the bases of political action. 8.3 Meaning and importance of class The concept of class is very much related with the economic position of a group of people. In other words, classes are groups of people who share common interests. A class according to Marx will always view its own interests and will give priority to the interests and when doing this a conflict with another opposing class becomes inevitable. Hence consciousness, conflict and struggle are inevitably connected with the idea of class. Class has been defined by Lenin in relation to means of production in a particular society and the society is divided between class of owners of means of production and the non-owners. Mainly, classes occupy different positions in society depending on their possessions of wealth, Capital, Labour, Knowledge etc. Classes are different by their own interests. So capitalist class is concerned with the interest of capital and more profit. The workers are concerned with more wages and NSOU • CC-PS-04 89 better living. The middle class always wishes to reap more benefits from government. So, when they vote they are guided by their own interest. Workers, Peasants are more consolidated and Middle class is fragmented.

8.4 Class as a determinant of voting behaviour Concept of class is relevant in studying voting behaviour. It is argued that political slogan plays an important role in determining the voting behaviour. In 1971 Lok Sabha election Congress raised the slogan of "Garibi Hatao" which drew attention of the middle and poor classes people and they favoured Congress immensely. Till 1960s Congress won parliament election at a stretch due to its adoption of social welfare schemes which benefitted lower middle and downtrodden classes. In West Bengal, Tripura and Kerala Left parties followed economic policies which gave relief to the workers and peasants of these states. These policies determined voter's behaviour and led to the historical presence of left parties in power for a period thirty-four years in West Bengal. Trinamul Congress in West Bengal Assembly election 2021 created a landslide victory due to its adoption of a slew of welfare policies for the marginalised people. All these policies followed by the T.M.C are related to economic issues encompassing almost every major aspect of life ranging from food, shelter, education and health in Bengal. Government schemes like Kanyasree, Rupasree, Sabujasathi, Jubasree, Macanteen became very popular among the people belonging to poor class who extremely favoured Trinamool Congress in the recently held Assembly election.

8.5 Relationship between class and politics in India In India elections are often fought on economic issues. Political parties attempted to satisfy several classes through different policies the industrialists, traders, and commercial sector – in one word the bourgeoisie always influence and put pressure on government for their own benefits. They support such parties who have pro- industry, business, and traders' interests in their agenda. The Corporate World favours neo-liberal reforms. The associations like ASSOCHAM and FICCI look after interests of capital and pressurise the government to that direction. Here voters vote in favour of non-left pro-bourgeois party. On the other hand the middle class is more concerned with economic development and civic amenities. Middle class voters are 90 NSOU • CC-PS-04 guided by issues apart from allegiance to any particular political party. Party and Media play important role in shaping voting behaviour in urban areas. In rural areas Rich Peasants and Middle Peasants are concerned with more benefits from State, while landless labourers and poor masses are concerned with issues like poverty alleviation and rural development. Like Caste, Class may also be a determining factor in Voting Behaviour. It has been debated among Political Scientists whether Class plays any important role in Indian democracy and also whether it is important in determining voting behaviour? we have seen class-based politics in 1950s, 1960s and in 1970s in many parts of the country. But class politics and class movements were only possible in the heydays of Left and Socialist ideological politics. In India, workers were united by and through Trade Unions and peasants by Kishan Sabhas. They played important role in organising voters in urban and rural areas along with different Left Parties fighting elections. Voters, as supporters and sympathisers of Left Parties, usually voted in favour of them from ideological constraint. Left ideology attracted many voters both from urban educated class, the intelligentsia, and the rural peasantry. From late 1990s onward, Left influence gradually declined. This happened with decline of organised labour and rise of workers in informal sectors. After decline and fall of Soviet Russia and in the phase of Globalisation Left bastion everywhere has been weakened. Left parties lost earlier ideological appeals. So, class factor becomes weaker in determining voting behaviour. Politics is a market place and classes are bargaining for their benefits. As a result, we find right, and upper caste parties gather so much support of these classes to come to power in 2014 and 2019 Lok Sabha Elections.

8.6 Conclusion Recently, a debate has arisen in the academic field on the question of importance of class in Indian politics. It is argued by a group of scholars that class has lost its relevance in determining the voting behaviour of the Indian people. It is advocated that co-relation between class and voting has become fuzzier to-day and notion of class has been eclipsed by caste. It is true that caste does constitute a very important factor in Indian politics, but caste does not alone matter in all elections. Class is very much alive and working in Indian politics. It would not be very surprising to say that class continues to affect our society and it surely matters in politics.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 91 8.7 Summing Up • Class came into existence in India due to economic policies of the British rulers. These classes were capitalists, working class and English educated middle classes. Indian industrialists remained aloof from the national movement for a long time due to fear of losing concessions from the British raj. Gradually, after receiving assurance from the nationalist leaders for operating business with freedom in independent India capitalists supported freedom movement. • After independence, national economy led to the reshuffling of the class structure. New principal classes emerged. These classes are (a) the bourgeoisie the middle class which includes professionals and urban intellectuals (b) lower middle-class (c) working class in the urban areas (d) peasantry which constitute largest class. But yet in India concept of class identity and class consciousness have not developed. This is due to underdeveloped capitalist economy and presence of primordial group identities like caste, religion and ethnicity as the bases of political action. • The historical conflict between capital and labour is yet to emerge as the principal determining factor in Indian politics. In spite of all these arguments, in India elections are fought on class-based politics. In recently held elections several parties both at the national and state level adopted social welfare policies to gain the support of the middle and poor classes people. 8.8 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. After studying this unit Learners would be able to : • explain the meaning and importance of gender. • realise Gender as a determinant of voting behaviour. • understand relationship between gender and politics in India. 9.2 Introduction In a patriarchal society like ours we lack gender equality. So everywhere in India women are dominated and constrained by men in different forms. It becomes more ruthless in traditional society with established culture strengthening the perpetuation of patriarchy. It becomes difficult for women to come out and raise their independent voice. So, in most of the cases, especially in rural and backward areas their verdict is dictated by men in their families or by leaders in village communities. once a decision is made by the family, any challenge to that

94 NSOU • CC-PS-04 decision is taken as a challenge to culture, family and their values. If women protest, they become victim of violence. 0.3 Meaning and importance of Gender Gender refers to social and cultural differences between males and females. It also denotes a range of identities. So, Gender is a social construction. It is different from Sex. Sex is biological difference between male and female. But by Gender we mean social and cultural attributes in a particular society. Gender varies from society to society and can change over time. So, Gender in 21st Century is clearly different and distinguished from 19th century by their existence role and initiatives in society. Women are much independent and more resistant to patriarchal domination. 9.4 Gender bias and electoral participation of women The term gender bias is often used in respect of voting behaviour at the time of election. This in true sense of the term means women's participation in voting. Many research studies have been carried out on gender bias in political participation by analysing women voter turn out in Indian democracy. There is a dramatic increase in women participation in the elections since the 1990s, while men has remained more or less same. It would be pertinent to mention here that election can provide the best possible opportunity to ensure that women's voices are listened, their concerns are addressed and their potential contributions to maintain peace and tranquillity in democracy are maximized. However, There is a steady and a sharp decline in the gender bias in voting over time. In particular, we find that the sex ratio of voters (the number of women voters to every 1000 men voters) increased very impressively from 715 in the 1960s to 883 in the 2000s. According to a information published by Election Commission of India in 2011 and 2016 states particularly Assam, Bihar, Orissa, Kerala, West Bengal and Tamil Nadu have shown immense improvement in women's participation in voting. In 2019, Surprisingly, women's turn out in all these states exceeded than men. This reveals the fact that women are voluntarily exercising their constitutional right of adult suffrage across the states in India is testimony to the rise of self-empowerment of women to secure their fundamental right to freedom of expression. Woman's role in electoral participation has become so significant that political parties adopt welfare programmes and NSOU • CC-PS-04 95 policies which directly benefit women. These programmes include welfare schemes for women like scholarship for girls, better safety, reservation for women in government jobs, prohibition on alcohol, and subsidised water and electricity. Delhi's women voters play a major role in the Aam Aadmi Party's landslide victory in the 2020 Assembly elections. According to Lokniti CSDS survey (Centre for the study of Developing Societies) women voted to a great extent in favour of Aam Aadmi Party than their male counter parts 60% and 40% respectively .It was this massive gender gap that gave the party an enormous lead of 25 percentage points over the BJP among the women voters. The AAP government has adopted several welfare schemes to woo the female electorates like raise of gender budget at 8.6% in 2018- 2019 much higher than the union government, free bus ride for women, water and electricity bill subsidies etc. BJP and its allies were also successful to improve their image and performance among the women voters in 2019 Loksabha election in comparison to 2014 by implementing the schemes like Ujjwala, Beti bachao, Beti Padhao, Jan Dhan, Such Bharat toilets. In Bihar Assembly election held from 28th October to 7th November 2020 women voters led to the victory of the National Democratic Alliance. In 166 constituencies where the women's turn out was more than the men's turn out, the BJP-JDU won 92 seats and other smaller constituents won 7 seats. In other words, 99 seats went in favour of the NDA where the women's turn out exceeded men's turn out. In Bihar, National Democratic Alliance (NDA) obtained 37.26% votes polled and came to power with a narrow victory with 125 seats. Nitish's pro-women policies like 50% reservation for women in Panchayats, the bicycle scheme, benefits for girl students till graduation, 35% reservation for women in government jobs, the state and Central government's direct cash benefit schemes, liquor prohibition have created a major impact upon the women. Most interestingly, it is observed in recent years that women are taking part in voting process in large numbers in comparison to previous years. Electoral participation among rural women has risen by nearly 13 percentage point s between 1971 and 2014. Another enchanted fact is that women are not only stepping out more to vote, ,their voting preferences are no longer in line with those of their families or communities. The view of the younger women has been drastically changed, they are more educated than their mothers and do not accept the collective decisions of their village or head of the family or social group to caste vote for a given candidate or party. A survey was carried out by Lokniti-Centre for the Study of Developing

96 NSOU • CC-PS-04 Society (CSDS) on 5,000 first time young female voters (between the ages of 18-22) in February 2019. This survey revealed that a little more than three out of five women opined that they would participate in voting process without being influenced by their families. The whole scenario indicates that women are much more politically conscious than before and very firm to cast their votes according to their own choice. Many women voters now believe that their vote matters in the formation of the government. It is thus clear that women are a voting block in their own right. Further, rise of women voters in the rural areas reveals the fact that women are now very much interested in politics. 9.5 Relationship between gender and politics Participation of women in politics is highly important for their empowerment. Definitely, they are making inroads into formal politics. Though we have seen some very dominant and efficient women leaders in the form of Indira Gandhi, Mayawati and Jayalalitha, but still women participation in Lok Sabha is not worth mentioning. The participation of women as political leaders is not only low in India but around the world. As of now, only 24% of the global legislative members constitute women. And India, out of 193 countries, stands on 150th position in having the total percentage of women as legislators. In the lower house, women constitute 12.6% of total members and in the upper house, they constitute 11.5% of total members. What is more surprising is the fact that the least developing countries like Bangladesh stand in a better position than developed and developing countries like India in giving leadership to women. State wise turn out of women in 2004 election to Lok Sabha shows that 43.9% women participated, and it was much lower than 1999. In 1999 73.2% women participated. In 1962 Lok Sabha election 22 women were elected and in 2009 only 59 were elected. No of women MLAs in West Bengal were 6 in 1971 and 35 in 2011. No of women members in leading parties in West Bengal show that the INC had 200,000, BJP 168,000 and CPIM had 25,440. But no of women participating in highest decision making in same year in leading parties in West Bengal shows that INC had 80, BJP 11 and CPIM had 85. It is no doubt participation of women is increasing in different states, but still much hurdle women face to participate in the political process. They don't find equal space to ventilate their opinions and

NSOU • CC-PS-04 97 decisions. Only in 1993, in 73 rd and 75 th Constitutional Amendments provided for one-third representation of women in Local Government. Rather women in numbers participate in social movements in Civil Society. Left, Right and Centrist parties have women organisations. Now more women are coming up as supporters of these parties. Left parties always had women participation. Gradually, Congress and BJP are getting more women workers. But still males dominate in politics and in major decision making. Even women are elected at Panchayat level, they cannot work independently. Their voice and demands are thwarted by male counterparts. 9.6 Conclusion Gender inequality is very much persisting in India. Women are considered to have monetary value and to be the property of male family members in a patriarchal society like India. Men control much of the lives of women, including social relationships. Thus, from the very beginning after birth a woman is growing up under the supervision of the head of the family who is a male person. She could not express her personal choice or opinion. Her every aspect of life is controlled by the members of the family as well as leaders of the society. Several measures have been taken by the government, but the mindset of the male persons more or less remain unchanged. 9.7 Summing Up • Women in India as elsewhere are subject to gender bias and male domination. India belongs to a patriarchal society. This society has traditionally left the protection of women up to the arbitrary wishes of men who act as their guardians. According to the norms of the patriarchal society women have no rights to decide, once a decision is made by male member/ members of the family any opposition to that decision is taken as a challenge to protect the values of the family. • Participation of women in the political process have been increased and definitely they are making inroads into formal politics. As a result women are participating into power structure. But obviously it is not so impressive even after almost 75 years of our independence. Though we have seen very

98 NSOU • CC-PS-04 dominant and efficient women leaders in our country but still women participation in Lok Sabha is not worth mentioning. There have been several efforts made for higher inclusion of women in the political leadership, but till the men are not sensitized and the social and institutional barriers are not shattered, there is still a long road ahead for their representation. 9.8 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. NSOU • CC-PS-04 101 10.2 Introduction Religion is a particular system of faith and worship. There is a belief in every religion that a superpower controls human life and nature. It refers to particular socio-cultural system of behaviours, practices, world view, texts, morals, ethics and organisations. Religion is viewed as a form of orientation to the secular world in the sense that it is a source of knowledge, values and norms of a society. It advocates an ideology a system of thought, located in the domain of the sacred. In the name of religion people become united. So, in case of voting this appeals much. The concept of politics is not as complicated as that of religion. It is generally accepted that politics is a set of activities that are associated with making decisions in groups or other forms of power relations between individuals. In other words, political activities are those which are geared towards the attainment, acquisition maintenance and consolidation of power. Political activities also include those which use symbols and metaphors of the sacred domain and gain ends that are not religious. These are directed towards creating religious effects which is a definite striving for power. Since religion is considered as a dominant factor in people's lives, it emerges as an influential factor in politics too. 10.3 Understanding religion and politics Religion and politics are concepts that represent two different and interdependent subsystems of society. Social scientist Peter Berger defines religion as a "set of beliefs that connects the individual to a community and in turn to a sense of being or purpose that transcends the individual mundane." The concept of politics denominates the regulative power to make collectively binding decisions, allocate resources, and solve social problems. Religion mobilizes religious sensibilities of people with a view to get their support to capture power; while politics uses intrigue, diplomacy, and makes attempt to win public opinion either democratically, if the system allows it, or usurps power with the assistance of army. Religion often claims that it derives power from the divine authority and therefore its mission is holy. Its basic goal is to motivate people for reform of the society under the spiritual guidance. On the contrary, politics develops its policy for the needs and requirements of society. Through the interpretation of history Social Scientists reveal three models

102 NSOU • CC-PS-04 related to religion and politics. Firstly, When religion and politics both unite with each other in an attempt to monopolize political power, it is regarded as integration and sharing model. In the second model, politics after subduing and overpowering religion, uses it for its interest. Here, religion plays subservient role to politics. In the third model, both come into conflict with each other that subsequently lead their separation. In this model they appear as rivals and compete to struggle for domination. Research shows that neither secularism nor modernity has been successful in minimization of importance of religion in the modern world; so, politics and religion have been in continuous interaction. 10.4 Religion and Politics in India—A Historical Overview In India throughout its history, it is observed that religion has been used for the achievement of political goals and aspirations. In our country religion always served politics and in the same way politics has also served religion. Here, it is pertinent to say that religion has failed to detach itself from politics. Thus, one finds politicisation of religion in some manifest or latent form at all stages of our history. Historically interaction between religion and politics is noticed in four phases. First phase extended from Indus valley civilization to advent of Islam, the second phase from the advent of Islam to the India mutiny of 1857, the third from 1857 to Indian independence in 1947, and the fourth is 1947 onwards. While there was close interplay between religion and politics during all these phases, the nature, the intensity, and the dynamics of this interaction was different during each of these phases. The sacred and secular perspectives have been inextricably interwoven in precolonial India. Indian society has witnessed continuous changes affecting the political system, occupational structures, culture, and religion. Religions in India have been the prime source of tension, innovation and even modernization. The use of religious idioms has been important in initiating change in India, particularly in political and reform movements. The beginning of the nineteenth century has been marked by several social reform movements. We may refer some of this political and social reform movements. Though the British rule brought about far reaching changes in administration, transport, communication, and economy, it also disrupted traditional social ties and fragmented culture. It was at this point of time that Raja Rammohan Roy in Bengal, Dayananda Saraswathi in the North, Jyoti Rao Phule in Maharashtra introduced

NSOU • CC-PS-04 103 reforms in education and socio religious pursuits and provided a perspective on national life. They drew upon Indian tradition as well as western knowledge. They were inspired by the rationalist and the liberal doctrines. They used the western methods of organization in sponsoring schools and colleges for men and women. Their aim was to raise the national consciousness in terms of culture. These reform movements led to a mass awakening which paved the way for the political arousal in the twentieth century. In the initial stages the struggle for independence was a product of educated middle classes in Bengal, Punjab, Maharashtra and Tamilnadu. In addition to liberal education a religious upsurge stimulated the youth to participate in the freedom struggle. In Maharashtra, Bal Ganghadhar Tilak revived on a large scale the Ganapati puja which then served as venue for political meetings. In Bengal Rash Bihari Basu, Bipin Chandra Pal and their associates used religious symbols centred around the Durga puja to develop a political consciousness. Apart from these socio religious plays in these and other provinces of India conveyed political messages to the public. During the national independence movement Gandhiji used the Hindi notion of Ram Rajya to unify, integrate and mobilise most of the Indian population. 10.5 Role of religion in electoral politics in post-independence India In post-independence India communalism has strengthen its position due to electoral politics including nomination of the candidates, campaigning, communal representation and so on. Almost all political parties are, in one way or the other, guilty of using religion-related issues for narrow political gains. This is perhaps because religion is a source of identity and a bonding factor in the lives of people, mainly in developing societies like India.' This is why religion becomes a very important factor in electoral politics. According to a prominent writer 'Caste, religious and linguistic communities remained as the most effective factors in political mobilization in India even after decades of the successful experiment of electoral democracy.'

Hence, many candidates of various parties use communal strategies and tactics. After independence Congress ruled the country almost twenty-five years at a stretch with a secular outlook. But between 1970n and 1990 congress faced greater opposition. By the mid-1990s the multiparty competition was emerged. Several regional parties came up which challenged the hegemony of the Congress party.

104 NSOU • CC-PS-04 Religion thus becomes instrumental in the hands of the opposition of congress in electoral politics. Therefore, Indian election studies have mentioned the demise of the so-called "Congress system" in India, and the rise of communal voting patterns based on caste and religion. Here, some cases of the electoral function of religion during post-independence are mentioned. 10.5.1 Religion and vote bank politics The term vote bank is often used in electoral politics in India. Vote bank politics is the practice of creating and maintaining vote banks through divisive policies, it encourages voters to cast votes on the basis of narrow communal considerations and self interest of certain groups, often against their better judgement. Vote bank politics is used as a tool to invoke regional and religious prejudices among the people of India. Congress among Muslims and Bharatiya Janata Party among Hindus have left no stone unturned to create vote banks. Religious places are often used for political propaganda. Religious sentiments of the people are also exploited for political mileage. Through Aajodhya movement BJP succeeded to consolidate Hindu votes and ultimately increased its seats in parliament from 2 in 1984 to 182 in the year 1999. 10.5.2 Use of religion in Electoral Politics of Jana Sangh and Janata Party Bharatiya Jana Sangha was established in 1951 as the political wing of the Rashtriya Swayam Sevak Sangha. The party strongly propagated Hindu nationalism. Jana Sangh in Delhi made cow protection an election issue so that the followers of the Goraksha movement should have voted for Jana Sangh candidates. The RSS had mobilized large number of Hindu saints in 1967 and they had demonstrated in Delhi in support of their demand for a ban on 'cow slaughter' in India. Janata Party supported the rights of minorities and religious freedom to gain minorities 'favour so that it could attract some Muslims. For example, its manifesto for elections 1984 contained that the state government or the administration should not intervene with the exercise of religious freedom or engage in or permit propaganda against any element of the religious heritage of any religious group. The autonomy of the minority educational institution should be fully guarded against undue and motivated interference by the administration. 10.5.3 Religion and electoral politics of Congress-I Under article 25 of the Indian constitution every citizen has the right to profess, practice and propagate their religion. But it is very much difficult to implement the NSOU • CC-PS-04 105 constitutional ideals into practice in a society as complex as India. However our politicians drove away from this path. They mix religion and politics with vengeance and forget the traditional values. The political role of Congress in early eighties was exploitation of religious sentiments to win over certain sections of Indian society. Indira Gandhi appeared as the protector of the minority particularly Muslims and the community had become a vote bank for congress party. Muslims helped Indira Gandhi to defeat the grand alliance in the decisive 1971 elections to the Lok Sabha. They left congress during the emergency and this was a contributory factor in her debacle in 1977. In his study of the 1980 election, Myron Weiner estimated that in constituencies with substantial Muslim populations

the Congress vote in-creased from 29 per cent in 1977 to 38 per cent in 1980. "

Without their [minorities'] support, Congress could not have won in 1980, and with their support Congress probably would have won in 1977". However, secularism in India began to face challenges with the revival and strengthening of religion-leaning political parties in the country. The Congress started to follow pro Hindu strategies. Indira Gandhi drew Hindu religious figures into the limelight through her patronage of religious institutions. Congress party during the leadership of Rajiv Gandhi and P. V. Narasimha Rao made compromises with militant Hindu organizations on Temple and Mosque controversies. Opening of temple locks, permitting the brick laying ceremony for the Ram temple, promising Ram Rajya if Congress won the 1989 elections and so on dictated by this thinking. 10.5.4 Hindutva as an Electoral Agenda of BJP The BJP advocates Hindutva (Hinduism or Hinduness) as an ideology that sought to define Indian culture in terms of Hindu values, and it was highly critical of the secular policies and practices of the Indian National Congress (Congress Party).

A significantly powerful section of Bharatiya Janata Party think that Hindi language and political support to the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) are fundamental elements of a true Indian identity. From the very beginning BJP is following Hindutva identity politics, it has acquired a claim to appropriate enormous resources including icons, deities myths and symbols related to the great epic narrative of Hinduism. While propagating Ram as a mega religious icon, it is engaging with new, micro local religious cultural icons of various smaller marginalised communities. The great traditions are being used to create larger political narratives. The heterogeneity of Hindu culture has been reinterpreted to provide new meanings.

For instance, the campaign to interpret the 106 NSOU • CC-PS-04 local history of Arunachal Pradesh in Hindu religious terms has created an influence among the people of this region. The memories of Bali, Sugriva, Parashuram and Sita are being recreated to associate tribal communities with the broader Hinduvta fold. In fact Bjp raises Hinduvta issues not only because it is a fundamentalist party but also to make an appeal to Hindus to vote. 10.5.5 BJP and Ajodhya Issue BJP had used the Ramjanambhoomi controversy as a powerful religious symbol to create a sense of unity among the different Hindu castes and it has succeeded in this venture. The Ram Janmabhoomi movement is directly linked to the political rise of the BJP—from a mere two Lok Sabha seats in 1984 to 85 seats in 1989. BJP raised Ajodhya issue for political gain and had its reverberations across the country. It used all the devices for political use of Ram and drew up a plan to construct Ram Mandir. The demolition of the Babri mosque in the pilgrimage town of Ajodhya enhanced 'the support of the BJP among Hindus and was followed by intensified efforts on the part of its leadership to consolidate the Hindu vote with a view to capturing power in the next elections. Ultimately it captured 182 seats in 1999 Loksabha election. 10.6 Conclusion In the Preamble to the Indian Constitution, it is stated that our state is a secular state. But religion plays a very significant role in Indian politics and as a result it becomes an important determinant of political behaviour in general and voting behaviour in particular. There are parties like Muslim League, BJP and Shiv Sena who deliberately use religion to win over elections. Extreme right and even liberal parties take recourse to religion to catch votes. Even INC in 1984 election appealed for national integration with Hindu overtone. In 2006 Babri Masjid was demolished., The aggressive Hindutva phase began by attacking "pseudo secularism' of Congress. We find that almost all parties except the Lefts use religion to impress voters. This religious undertone among right liberal parties and religious overtone among extreme right parties and organisations are clearly visible. This open vindication of secularism has started a new phase in Indian politics different from earlier liberal phase. Role of religion in politics becomes stronger and it plays now more dominant and determining role in Voting Behaviour.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 107 10.7 Summing Up • Religion is an important social structure in most societies, and it has influence among the masses which is historical and is also used in politics and has not been separate from it. In India, although the level of coexistence and tolerance has by far enhanced, in the domain of politics, religion still is important, because of its social basis among the masses. • Political parties and political leaders often use religion which create an impact on the voting behaviour of the masses. In a country like India, religious ties and beliefs are so strong that parties try to reap benefits from it. From 2014 onward we find a clear majoritarian turn in Indian politics with manifestation of overall domination of religion. • BJP has started wooing Hindus to come to power. This open vindication of Secularism has started a new phase in Indian politics different from earlier liberal phase. Role of religion in politics becomes stronger and it plays now more dominant and determining role in Voting Behaviour. It is easy to convince voters by appealing to their religion. Also, this overshadows grave economic and social problems. So, religion becomes major determinant in Voting Behaviour in a traditional country like ours as well as the best weapon in the hands of ruling elites to conceal the truth. 10.8 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. Secession (derived from the Latin term secession) is the withdrawal of a group from a larger entity, especially a political entity, but also from any organization, union or military alliance. Threats of secession

112 NSOU • CC-PS-04 can be a strategy for achieving more limited goals. It is therefore a process which commences, once a group proclaims the act of secession (example- declaration of independence). It could involve a violent or peaceful process, but these do not change the nature of the outcome, which is the creation of a new state or entity– independent from the group or territory it seceded from. Whether a government is democratic or authoritarian does not determine its attitude towards secession. Democratic India and authoritarian China both reject plebiscite as an instrument to decide the claims of regions to nationhood. Their positions vis-à-vis such claims are based on legal and historical arguments, and not on the wishes of the people living in the region. Politicians uncertain of popular support might be more inclined to pursue an aggressively nationalistic agenda, and view all regional claims as threats to national unity. International factors are important in determining the success or failure of a region's claim to nationhood. Successful secessions do not occur only because of regional movements. Changes in the international environment play a decisive role. In South Asia, this became apparent in 1971 when India intervened in Bangladesh's liberation struggle and ensured its success. Changes in the international institutional environment have in recent years made available attractive alternatives to state- shattering forms of self-determination. 11.3 Politics of Secession in India India is a land of continental dimension in which diversities abound. The varied ethno communities– linguistic, religious, tribal groups and cultural-are mostly regionally concentrated. Regionalism generally refers to the assertion of distinct identities and interests of the ethno communities living in specific geographical areas of the nation. Regionalism in India is however a complicated problem and the problem is compounded by the existence of sub-regions within regions. There are about 60 sub-cultures and sub-regions marked by their homogeneity and sub-national identity within the framework of seven natural regions of India. The makers of the new Indian state, probably was aware of the dilemma of building a nation-state in a plural society, explicitly rejected language or religion or any other ethnic criterion for reorganisation of the provinces and the princely states. Instead they devised an overarching political arrangement in the form of a non- unitary state called the Indian Union consisting of several provincial states organised NSOU • CC-PS-04 113 on the principle of federalism. During the early years of Jawaharlal Nehru's premiership, the policy-makers approached the question of national unity and legitimacy of power of the Indian state through the Constitution imbued with unitary power and inspired by a centralising ethic. But within five years of adoption of the Constitution the national government had to reorganise the provincial states into language-based states to satisfy the growing aspiration of major linguistic groups, living by and large within identifiable regions. Later on, more states have been created. The most often cited example of 'language devotion' is the instance of Tamil regionalism, which engendered the Tamil regional narrative with powerful notions of community and homeland. The movement gained momentum in the 1950s and the 1960s. But subsequently the demand for a separate Dravida Nadu became more moderate, and eventually the theme of independence disappeared altogether. Tamil speakers acquired a state of their own and regional political parties – offshoots of the Dravidian movement – which continuously formed the state government in Tamil Nadu since 1967. However, since the closing decade of the 70's there has been a resurgence of regionalism which is manifested in new unrest, in movements for protection of language and cultural distinctiveness, particularly within a number of states; for greater state autonomy; for the formation of new states or autonomous regions; and for reservation in education and employment for 'sons of the soil'. This is expressed in the growth of regional parties and regionalisation of national parties.

Regional consciousness is a phenomenon of the era of mass politics which has increased political consciousness through expanding political participation. The forces of nationalisation and centralisation – embedded in the federal state structure of our Constitution have reinforced in the states, particularly in the non-Hindu states, a consciousness of their distinct cultural identity. Such consciousness is nourished by increased competition for a share in the national cake which is aggravated by slow economic growth, by widening regional and sub-regional economic and social disparities, and the sense of relative deprivation they engender. The claims of various regionally-concentrated ethno communities, or of those that are widely dispersed all over India, have a solid regionally concentrated core, which get rooted in secular economic interests. These interests when articulated in the language of ethnicity; becomes a demand for political autonomy or a separate state for fulfilling the aspirations of the ethnic groups involved. For the politicised ethnicities both these 114 NSOU • CC-PS-04 demands are linked, although they emphasise more on culture (as in Assam) or religion (as in Punjab) as a rhetoric than economy. Thus has arisen the complicated phenomenon of regionalism and sub-regionalism, giving birth to political parties, more parochial in their affiliations than nation-wide parties. Politics of regionalism and ethnicity is partly explained by India's regional/ cultural diversity. It is also a response-cum-reaction to the excesses of the homogenizing trend of the Indian state. The drive towards greater centralisation and personalisation of power by Prime Minister Indira Gandhi and Rajiv Gandhi and the gradual disintegration of the Congress-dominated system and the increased intervention by the Centre in states, particularly run by non-Congress parties, have led to the assertion of regionalism which manifests itself through opposition to Congress – in regional parties like the Akali Dal in Punjab, DMK and AIDMK in Tamil Nadu, Telegu Desam in Andhra Pradesh and in demands by all non-Congress parties for greater regional autonomy, revision of centre-state relations and the regionalisation of state politics and party system. In 1980s regionalism, as it expresses itself culturally in the demand for greater state autonomy, had led to the North-South dichotomy. Regional aspirations have however been manifested in different ways and for different reasons and continue to persist in some parts of the country. Political aspirations of Sikhs in Punjab and the tribal people in the north eastern region have been fulfilled through a prolonged and violent process. But several issues specific to these ethno communities have been neglected for long, creating problems for the central government. In the tribal regions of north east problems have been severe because of the incursions of non-tribals into tribal lands as the Indian state has used its powers, for economic development, to penetrate into tribal territories and has, in the process, become identified with those who have long been engaged in appropriating tribal lands and rights. Tribals – economically, culturally and politically threatened, have responded with violence. The formation of tribal states has also left some boundary disputes not being resolved. The National Socialist Council of Nagaland had been carrying on terrorist activities for a long time for greater Nagaland through unification of Naga-inhabited areas of Nagaland's neighbouring states. In Tripura the influx of Bengali refugees has shifted the ethnic balance and reduced the tribals to a minority. Efforts to protect tribal land and culture led to the formation of Tripura Upajati Autonomous Council. However, short of real powers,

NSOU • CC-PS-04 115 this Council failed to fulfil the aspiration of the tribals. In Manipur and Meghalaya, student-led agitation against 'foreigners' Bengalis and Nepalese – have taken their lead from Assam. The Asom Gana (People's) ethno community which has entrenched itself in Assam state after a protracted ethno communal struggle in recent years has a distinctive feature of its own. It is trying to disenfranchise and deport as foreigners, Bengali-speaking settlers from Bangladesh who have declared Asomiya to be their mother tongue. The Asom Gana Parishad virtually banished the Congress party from Assam with its slogan 'Assam for the Assamese', has been outflanked in the cause of Assamese provincialism by an armed secessionist movement of Assamese Hindus, the United Liberation Front of Assam (ULFA) which was troublesome enough to invite the intervention of the Indian army. However, from the turbulent waters of the Assamese provincialism there emerged yet another, unrelated ethnic demand of armed Bodo tribesmen for their own 'Bodoland' state. Furthermore, the Bengali-speaking Cachar district also seek their separate identity. In Punjab too, the Sikh sub-nationalist aspired to establish Sikhistan in the pre-independence years and Khalistan in the post-independence period, in which the Punjabi Hindu community was required to acknowledge Sikh ideology and social and political supremacy of the Sikhs. This resulted in a prolonged struggle to get a Sikh majority state, which culminated with the formation of two separate states; Sikh majority Punjab and Hindu majority Haryana. However agitation continued over the sharing of river water, common capital (Chandigarh) and demarcation of territories. This led to a crisis due to the Centre's delay and insensitivity, the cynical political manipulation by the Congress and factionalism in the Akali Dal to remain in power in the state, strengthened the hands of the extremists; Sant Jarnail Singh Bhindrawal being their 'godfather', who went on a killing spree for the realisation of Khalistan, an independent Sikh nation state. The abrogation of the Rajiv-Longowal accord, the killing of Sikhs in 1984 in Delhi after the assassination of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi by two of her Sikh guards and elsewhere gave the Sikhs a minority consciousness they never possessed. The Central government might have eliminated extremism from Punjab, yet political problem of Punjab in which Sikhs were excluded from power still looms in the horizon. The cultural distinctiveness, economic and social disparities that nourish regionalism at the state level are found within a number of states. The problem of Nepali speaking Gorkha ethno community settled in North Bengal can be highlighted here. They had migrated from Nepal to work as tea cultivation workers to become

116 NSOU • CC-PS-04 majority. Partly encouraged by the Congress government in the Centre they agitated for a separate 'Gorkhaland' state, in which they would constitute the majority. Under the leadership of Subash Ghising and his party Gorkha National Liberation Front the hills were in fire in the 1980's. The movement could be stalled with the formation of autonomous Darjeeling Gorkha Hill Council, however it gained impetus once again, under one time follower of the predecessor – Bimal Gurung, from the beginning of the 21st century. Formation of yet another autonomous council failed to fulfil the aspiration of the Gorkhas. The tribals of the Chota Nagpur Plateau also launched a movement to form a separate state in which they would become the majority. This resulted in the formation of an autonomous council, which failed to satisfy the tribals, which resulted in the formation of a separate state of Jharkhand in the year 2000 (by dividing Bihar). With heightened political consciousness and increased competition for jobs and education opportunities, movements for separate statehood or for autonomous regions within a state also exist in different parts of India. Some examples of these kind of movements are in the Vidarbha region of Maharashtra, Chattisgarh in Madhya Pradesh, Telangana in Andhra Pradesh and Uttarakhand in northern hills of Uttar Pradesh. These movements have led to the creation of Uttaranchal and Chattisgarh as states, as the millennium was coming to a close. Telangana gained the status of statehood in the year 2014. Nativism, another variety of ethnic regionalism, has arisen in regions where culturally distinct migrants from outside the states are seen as re-blocking employment and education opportunities for the locals. Its first manifestation was the Shiv Sena which emerged in the 60's in Mumbai, followed by Kannada Chaluvaligars in Bangalore and then in Assam which grew in the 1970s. The nativist movements demanded that the 'sons of soil' of a particular state should be given overwhelming preference in jobs and other economic opportunities over the migrants. The Shiv Sena organised the frustrated educated lower-middle class Maharashtrians in Mumbai and started violent movement along fascist lines against the South Indians accusing them for taking away jobs. Shiv Sena succeeded because of the peculiar demographic profile of Mumbai where approximately 43% of the population are Maharashtrians but they are proportionately less represented than the South Indians (8%) in white collar jobs. Shiv Sena however could not swing the youths in other metropolitan areas of Maharashtra because these areas did not share the same demographic structure as that of Mumbai. The Assam agitation was also nativist as the Assam

NSOU • CC-PS-04 117 Students Union targeted first the Bengalis and then the Bangladeshi refugees. The demographic and occupational profiles of Assam led to the emergence of such movements. Many of the states have enacted laws and adopted practices providing preferences for jobs and educational opportunities on the basis of local residence without reference to Parliament which alone has the constitutional authority to enact such laws. The mulki (meaning natives) in the Telengana region of Andhra Pradesh in the late 60's and early 70's triggered the demand for a separate Telengana state, was also nativist in character. The three nativist movements, despite differences in their regional, linguistic and urban/rural context, have origins in the discontent arising from frustrated aspirations or perceived limited life-chances among groups whose members seek desirable positions in the modern middle class sector of the economy. Thus, secessionist movements in India is multi-dimensional phenomenon which has manifested in various forms and has provided the dynamics in Indian politics. These are hard facts in the Indian political scene.

11.4 Accommodation as a State Policy

During the early years after independence—following the partition and the merger of what were native states during British colonial rule – India's provinces and their boundaries seemed incoherent. There was an unmistakable provisional quality to those borders. The provinces were classified into parts A, B, and C states: colonial era provinces, former native states or groups of native states and a third mixed category of smaller territories. It was generally expected that these units would be reorganised. During India's anti-colonial resistance, the Indian National Congress had committed itself to a postcolonial political order of linguistically defined regions. As far back as 1922, it began organizing the branches of the movement not along the colonial structure of presidencies and provinces, but along language lines. In 1928 a committee headed by Motilal Nehru outlined a vision of a future polity organized into linguistic states. But after independence, the Congress rejected linguistic reorganization despite its previous commitment to it. Under the leadership of Jawaharlal Nehru, the post-Independence Congress was initially unwilling to bring these identities into the decision-making process at the centre and politicise them, fearing that it might threaten the unity of the fledgling new nation. However, the Constituent Assembly had left the task of reorganizing state boundaries to future Parliaments, giving it unlimited powers to take on the task. Eventually, pushed by powerful political pressures from below, Nehru reversed his position on linguistic reorganization because of electoral considerations.

118 NSOU • CC-PS-04 Alfred Stepan's Arguing Comparative Politics, puts Indian federalism in a very different context from the literatures on comparative federalism. Distinguishing between 'holding together' and 'coming together' federations, he argues that US style 'demos constraining' federalism is unsuitable for a 'robustly politically multinational' country like India. Requirements of supermajorities – the support of two-thirds of state legislatures for constitutional amendments – make the United States an extreme outlier on the demos-constraining end of federation and far from the norm. Stephen showers praise on Article 3 of the Indian Constitution, which allows Parliament to create new states and redraw state boundaries with a simple majority, barely consulting the relevant state. This is unthinkable in a 'coming together' federation, which must be 'demos constraining' in order to protect state rights. Stephen praised the way India's political classes used the Constitution's demos-enabling feature. He marvels at the 'relatively consensual manner' in which 'most of the boundaries of the states in India were redrawn between 1956 and 1966, and later a process of creating new tribal states in the North-east was begun.' The demos-enabling features of Indian federalism, Stephen believes, explain 'the survival of India as the world's largest multi-cultural, multi-national democracy.' This feature has 'allowed the majority at the centre, to respond to majority demands from states for greater linguistic and cultural autonomy.' Had India been a unitary state, 'neither the majority, nor the minorities, would have had this constitutional flexibility available to them.' By the 1960's, it appears that a few discernible rules, albeit not formally articulated, had emerged in the Indian Central governments approach to regional demands. Such demands had to first, stop short of secession; second, groups making demands had to be linguistically or culturally defined – and not defined by religion; third, be backed by popular support; and fourth, be acceptable to linguistic minorities when it is a matter of breaking up a multilingual state. However, there were expectations; and in any case these rules were not applied to the two later waves of reorganization. The special regional dispensation of small and financially dependent states in the northeast India, for instance, was the product of a national security- driven policy process in a border region inhabited by many minority groups. The considerations were also very different when the states of Jharkhand, Chhattisgarh, and Uttaranchal were created in 2000. While the demands were old, the interests of political parties in the highly competitive political environment of the period pushed the process. According to one scholar, the fact that no trans-border regional NSOU • CC-PS-04 119 community was invoked and there was no perceived national security threats facilitated the process. 'Ethnic communities in the three new states,' writes Maya Chadda, 'were not connected with foreign enemies or cross border nationalities, unlike in Punjab, Kashmir and Assam.' To her, this latest wave of state reorganization illustrates the value of flexibility that the Constitution gives to the Parliament. The Constitution, she points out approvingly, 'said little about the kind of federal units the Indian Union was to have, or the basis on which they would be created, i.e., geography, demography, administrative convenience, language, or culture. That decision was left entirely to the wisdom of the Parliament.' The argument for holding together federation being demos enabling is based on the idea of reconciling diversity of policymaking efficacy. However, efficacy can sometimes be in conflict with legitimacy. This idea of divided sovereignty and citizens with dual allegiance – to the national and regional political communities – is central to the federal vision of a legitimate political order. Federalism, as a political principle understood as an aggregate of politically organized territories is arguably the opposite of nation-state. In that sense federation building, and not nation building, is the appropriate project for India. The relative success of the first wave of state reorganization in India was because it was built on the principle of 'security for territorially concentrated linguistic groups' and dual, but complementary allegiances. However, later reorganizations, including 'the belated recognition of a Punjabi state,' were not based on the same principle. A Punjabi Punjab was not acknowledged till 1966, when Haryana was separated from Punjab, because the demand came from a religiously defined – and not a language-based group. Arguably, the decisions and non-decisions of India's central political elites, made possible by the demos-enabling features of Indian federalism, account also for some and most serious regional challenges that India has faced. The persistent political turmoil in northeast India provides another example. The national security-driven process of making and breaking states has reinforced the idea of de facto ethnic homelands, in the imagination of both local activists and tacticians of conflict management, perpetuating a politics of violent displacement and ethnic cleansing.

11.5 Conclusion

In the history of postcolonial India, a number of regional or ethnonational movements have turned into armed independence movements. Confrontations between 120 NSOU • CC-PS-04 security forces and militant regionalist have been deadly. Civilians have paid a heavy price, accounting for serious blots in India's human rights record. Yet, India has also been relatively successful in taming these aspirations. The best-known success story is the Dravidian movement of the 1960s. India's success is explained this way: virtually all the strategic decisions facing multinational India, the rejection of unitary state, the acceptance of multiple but complementary political identities, the spreading of regional languages and the maintenance of English as a link language, the maintenance of polity-wide careers, the constitutional espousal of equal distance and respect for all religions, and the creation of mutually beneficial alliances between polity-wide and regional parties, India made choices and alliances, especially in South India, that increased the chances of peaceful democracy in a potentially conflictual setting. Regional or self-determination-movements in India are said to have followed an inverse 'U' curve. Heightened mobilization of group identities are followed by negotiations, and eventually such movements decline as exhaustion sets in, some leaders are repressed, others are co-opted, and a modicum of genuine power sharing and mutual accommodation between the movement and the central state authorities is reached. The different trajectories of the Tamil, Sikh, and Kashmiri movements the first being accommodated, and the latter two turning into violent confrontations between the state and militant regionalists – is the result of changes in the level of institutionalization of the Indian state, and a sense of security of leaders at the helm.

11.6 Summing Up

- Secession is a state shattering form of self-determination.
- It is withdrawal of a group from a larger entity, especially a political one, but also from any organization, union or military alliance.
- In India there are about 60 sub cultures and sub-regions marked by their homogeneity and sub-national identity within the framework of seven natural regions.
- During the initial years the policy-makers approached the question of national unity and legitimacy of power of the Indian state through the Constitution - imbued with unitary power and inspired by a centralizing ethic.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 121 • But within five years of adoption of the Constitution the national government had to reorganize the provincial states on the basis of language to satisfy the growing aspiration of major linguistic groups. • Sine the closing decade of the 70's there has been a resurgence of regionalism which is manifested by new unrests, in movements for protection of language and cultural distinctiveness, particularly within a number of states. • Indian government accommodated these secessionist tendencies by adopting a policy of federation building and not nation building. 11.7 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. 124 NSOU • CC-PS-04 set out in the middle of the twentieth century, to create an economically developed and socially just society. Democracy was of course the legacy of the freedom movement and the animating spirit of the Constitution adopted in 1949; it found prominent mention in its Preamble. The federal structure of the state - an imperative in view of the large size and huge population of the country and its regional diversities - was also laid out in great detail in the Constitution. Socialism and secularism did not find direct mention despite the efforts of many members to have them written into it. B. R. Ambedkar, the presiding deity as it were of the drafting committee, considered it unwise to constitutionally bind the future generations to a socio-economic agenda that may have to be changed with the passage of time. As for secularism, the liberty of 'belief, faith and worship', inscribed in the Preamble and spelled out in a number of clauses in the chapter of fundamental rights was obviously considered adequate enough for the word secularism also not to be mentioned in the Constitution. But, with rising communal hostility between different religious groups, the word 'secularism' was incorporated into the Indian Constitution by the 42 nd Amendment in 1976.

12.3 Meaning of Secularism

Secularism is a Western ideal, a gift of the European enlightenment of the 18th century. It was born out of a long struggle between the Church and the state, which culminated in the triumph of state supremacy over all mundane affairs. A state by definition became secular, concerned with the affairs of the world, not bound by a religious prescription or rule. The religious realm was separated from the secular realm. Secularism which has been spawned over three centuries in the Western World has its intellectual anchorage in rationalism, scientific temper and universal humanism, and expresses itself in essentially in non-religious modes of thought and action. Secularism is defined as pertaining to things non-spiritual, having no concern with religious or spiritual matters, anything which is distinct, opposed to spiritual or ecclesiastical. It is also defined as an attempt to establish an autonomous sphere of knowledge free from supernatural presuppositions. But, it should be pointed out that there is no precise or formal definition of secularism. There is much ambiguity in regard to interpretation of this term.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 125

12.4 Western concept of Secularism

Much of the ambiguity that attends these debates can be traced to the fact that scholars tend to employ two different interpretations of secularism as a hinge for their respective critiques/defence of the concept. These two meanings are that of secularism as the separation of state and religion, and secularism as equality of all religions. The first interpretation holds that (a) that the state shall not concern itself with religious beliefs, practices and institutions; (b) that the state shall not be associated with a particular religion; (c) that the state shall permit freedom of conscience, belief and religion for all its citizens; and (d) that the state shall not discriminate between citizens on the basis of their religious beliefs. This understanding of secularism comes to us from the history of Western Europe, during the course of which the domain of state policy and that of religion was separated. In particular it has come to us from the United States, in the formulation of President Thomas Jefferson that a 'wall of separation' exists between the state and religion. Jefferson in effect referred to the First Amendment to the Constitution of the US. The established clause to the First Amendment prohibits the establishment of a national religion by the Congress, and prohibits preference for one religion over another. The second part of the clause, known as the 'Free Exercise Clause', states that the Congress cannot prohibit the free exercise of religion. The freedom to believe is part of the general grant of freedom to expression, assembly and association. The second interpretation of secularism, as detailed below, was generated in and through the Indian historical experience; that the state shall treat all religious groups equally.

12.5 Historical Evolution of Secularism in India

In India, however, matters are different. Few would contest that religious sensibilities dominate individual and collective lives to some extent. Politicization of religious identities has inexorably propelled religion into the public sphere. By the 1920's, at the very time when Mahatma Gandhi set out to forge a major mass movement that could take on colonialism, the politicization of religious identities, whether in the form of the Muslim League or that of the Hindu Mahasabha, could have hampered the project of building a pan - Indian freedom struggle. Mahatma Gandhi looked for a principle that could bind people who subscribed to different faiths together, and which could weld them into a mass movement. The principle he

126 NSOU • CC-PS-04 found in the doctrine of sarva dharma sambhava, which can be read as 'equality of all religions' or 'all religions should be treated equally'. Given to Mahatma Gandhi's religiosity, the notion of sarva dharma sambhava was not only a pragmatic principle designed to bring people together, it was also a normative principle that recognized the value of religion in people's lives. On the other hand for Pandit Nehru, profoundly uneasy as he was with the kind of political passions that religious identities had the power to evoke, secularism meant something else altogether. Nehru's preferred notion of secularism was that of dharma nirpekshata, or that the state would not be moved by religious considerations in enacting policy. It is therefore not surprising that public debate on the issue has been polarized between those who subscribe to the Nehruvian meaning of secularism, and those who subscribe to the meaning that Gandhi gave to the concept. However, Pandit Nehru continued to believe that the state could abstract the domain of policymaking from that of religion is debatable. For, the recurrent communal riots which culminated in the frenzy of Partition proved that religious prejudices, more than religious sensibilities, had become a constituent feature of Indian politics. To ignore this would have been bad historical understanding as well as bad politics. In the process of coming to terms with this unpalatable reality of Indian politics, Pandit Nehru's understanding of secularism came much closer to the notion of sarva dharma sambhava. Nehru, who by that time had become India's first Prime Minister, made this clear on various occasions. First, secularism did not mean "a state where religion as such is discouraged. It means freedom of religion and conscience, including freedom for those who may have no religion." Second, for Nehru, the word secular was not opposed to religion. "It is perhaps not very easy even to find a good word for secular. Some people think that it means something opposed to religion. That obviously is not correct. What it means is that it is a state which honours all faiths equally and gives them equal opportunities; that, as a state, it does not allow itself to be attached to one faith or religion, which then becomes the state religion." For Nehru, the concept of the secular state thus carried three meanings : (a) freedom of religion or irreligion for all, (b) the state will honour all faiths equally, and (c) that the state shall not be attached to one faith or religion, which by that act becomes the state religion. The creed of secularism therefore discouraged fears that one group had the right to stamp the body politic with its ethos, even if it is a majority. Conversely, a religious group would not be disprivileged in any way even though it happens to be in a minority. In effect, the meaning that secularism acquired

NSOU • CC-PS-04 127 in the Indian context added one more dimension to the generic concept of secularism: not only the recognition of faith, but the equal treatment of all faiths. This understanding has been reinforced in various ways. Crossman and Kapur suggested that the notion that secularism means equal respect for all religions has come to dominate legal and political thought. The former Chief Justice of India P. B. Gajendragadkar, for instance, interpreted secularism as (a) the state does not owe loyalty to one religion; (b) it is not irreligious or anti-religious; (c) it gives equal freedom to all religions and (d) that the religion of the citizen has nothing to do in the matter of socio-economic problems. Justice Sawant emphasised that the state is enjoined to accord equal treatment to all religions and religious sects and denominations. Accordingly, the judges ruled that the destruction of the Babri mosque by a mob, which had been encouraged in this task by government and party officials, was a clear violation of the equal treatment principle. Secularism, ruled Justice Sawant, was a part of the basic structure and the soul of the Constitution, and could not be infringed in any way. For these reasons the court upheld the dismissal of four state governments ruled by the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), and the imposition of President's rule in these states. Though on other occasions the decision of the Court have proved controversial- such as the famous 1996 'Hindutva' judgement, where Justice Verma endorsed Hindutva as representing 'a way of life' in the subcontinent and therefore as not violative of secularism-on balance the Court has upheld the understanding of secularism as equal treatment of all religions. The matter, however, has not been settled, and we shall see, interpretations of secularism continue to swerve between the notion of secularism as the separation of state and religion, and the notion that secularism implies equal respect for all religions. Regrettably the communalization of society has been paralleled by the communalization of the polity. In 1984 the state came to be seen as complicit in the genocidal attacks on the Sikh minority. In 1992, not only was the Central government inactive when mobs demolished the Babri mosque both the central and the state governments failed to prevent massive riots, which, following the demolition, targeted members of both the communities. In 2002 in Gujarat, about 2000 Muslims were killed in a massive pogrom against the minority. The pogrom followed the death of a number of Hindus when a train compartment in which they were travelling was set on fire by a crowd of Muslims in Godhra station. The inability of the state

128 NSOU • CC-PS-04 to prevent communal riots and the role of the state officials in fomenting communalism, has necessarily caused a great deal of consternation and apprehension. Given the communalism in Indian society and the polity, it is not surprising that scholars wonder whether secularism is appropriate for the country at all. Ashis Nandy argued that since the modern state seeks to dominate individual and collective lives, it not only banishes rival ideologies such as religion to the periphery, it hierarchizes the two domains by typing religious affiliations as inferior ways of being. This impoverishes understanding within the modern public sphere as well as inhibits dialogue between the two spheres, which might otherwise have proved enriching for both. Second, because religious identities have been exiled to the metaphorical closet, they have come to be frozen in time. This in turn inhibits a dialogue within and between religions. But since religious identities constitute an endearing feature of humanity, Nandy seems to say, they must perforce make their appearance in the public sphere. This is made possible through the democratization of the polity. The problem is that religious identities, which are regarded as de trop by formal politics, make their appearance either in the form of religious instrumentalism, or religious fundamentalism. T. N. Madan is often lumped together with Nandy as anti-secularist. The four core arguments of Madan are as follows: it was possible to privatize religion in the West because developments internal to Christianity- such as the Reformation- facilitated the process. In South Asia, however, major religious tradition do not assume any radical antinomy between the sacred and the secular. Second, for the inhabitants of the region, religion as the doctrine of overarching ends is more important than any other social or cultural factor. This is because religion establishes the place of individuals in society, and because it gives meanings to their lives. It is both moral arrogance and political folly to impose the ideology of secularism on believers. On the contrary, these beliefs must be taken seriously, and the religious should be given the same place in the society as the non-religious. Third, the denial of legitimacy of religion in social and political life serves to provoke fanaticism or fundamentalism on the part of religious zealots. Fourth, tradition of religious pluralism can help us carry forward inter-religious harmony. For this, suggests Madan, we should see how Gandhi employed the resources of religious tolerance to promote inter-religious understanding. The Gandhian worldview also aids us in placing spiritually justified limitations on religious institutions and symbols in certain areas of collective life. In sum, the only way that secularism may succeed is if we take both religious and secularism seriously, and not reject the former as superstition and reduce the latter to a mask for communalism or mere expediency.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 129 12.6 Secularism and Minority Rights Matters came to a head in the mid- 1980's with the Shah Bano case. Shah Bano, an elderly woman who had been divorced by her husband, appealed to the High Court of Madhya Pradesh that her former husband pay her maintenance under Section 125 of the Criminal Procedure Code (CrPC). According to this section the former husband of a divorced women has to pay her maintenance if she is destitute, and if she possesses no means for her own survival for as long as she lives or until she remarries. The High Court ruled in favour of Shah Bano. However, Shah Bano's husband, Ahmed Khan, moved to the Supreme Court as an appellant on the ground that he was not obliged to pay his former wife maintenance beyond the traditional three-month period of iddat under Section 127(3) of the CrPC. On 23 April 1985, a Supreme Court Bench under Chief Justice Chandrachud confirmed the judgement of the MP High Court, and stated that Article 125 of the CrPC overrides all personal laws, and that it is uniformly applicable to all women. As expected, the leaders of the Muslim community and in particular the ulama opposed the judgement on the ground that it constituted a disregard for the personal laws of the Muslim community, which are based on the Shariat. They argued that since the Shariat is divinely sanctioned, it can neither be tampered with nor interpreted by the Court. The controversy snowballed into a major political problem as thousands of Muslims took to streets to demonstrate against the judgement. Ultimately Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's government, then in power at the Centre, bowed before the uproar. In February 1986, the government introduced a Bill in Parliament that sought to exempt Muslim women from the protection provided by Article 125 of the CrPC. The Muslim Women (Protection of Rights on Divorce) Bill in essence abrogated the limited right to maintenance under Section 125. The Bill was passed in Lok Sabha on 6 May and in Rajya Sabha on 8 May 1986. The passage of the Bill aroused massive demonstrations as liberal, Left and feminist sections, who considered the Bill regressive and violative of gender justice, mobilized against it. Oddly enough, the protestors shared a common ground with the Sangh Parivar, which attacked the Bill on the same basis. In fact, the Sangh Parivar argued even more vociferously than the feminists about the need to subordinate the personal laws of the minority to a Uniform Civil Code in order to secure basic rights for all women. Although it became increasingly clear that right-wing forces were less interested in gender justice than they were in subordinating minority identities to majoritarianism, the argument was persuasive for many right thinking Indians.

130 NSOU • CC-PS-04 In the process, defenders of secularism were laden with two more theoretical tasks: one to justify selective state intervention in religion and square this with secularism, and two, fit minority rights into the secular project. Four different kinds of arguments were offered to negotiate the challenge both to minority identities and to the rights of the members within the minority. Writing against the background of the demolition of the Babri mosque and the subsequent communal riots in 1994, Partha Chatterjee suggested that a better way to protect the minorities is through the establishment of the norm of toleration. But rather than look to the practices of everyday life to discover tolerance, he grounded the concept in the liberal precepts of autonomy and respect for persons, and extended the principle to cover group rights. He negotiated the problem that group rights pose to liberal democratic theory in the following way: provided a group gives reasons for what it does to its own members, it can refuse to give reasons for doing what it does in the public domain, or, that internal accountability or democracy validates the rights of the community over its own members. Chatterjee in effect moves away from the normative principles of secularism to another normative principle, that of democratic accountability within groups, in order to build in minority rights into the principle of toleration. Bhargava came to an understanding of why secularism necessarily involves differential treatment for different groups from another theoretical direction. He begins his argument by distinguishing between three kinds of secularism. The first kind, hyper-substantive secularism, seeks to bring about a separation between religion and the state in the name of a package of ultimate substantive values, for example autonomy, development, or reason. The second kind of secularism, ultra-procedural secularism, separates religion from the state in the name of purely impersonal, value-free, rational procedures and rules, such as bureaucratic and technocratic rationality. The third kind, and one that Bhargava clearly prefers over the other two is contextual secularism. Contextual secularism implies principled or non-sectarian distance, or non-absolutist separation between the state and religion. In other words, this avatar of secularism combines substantive values and procedures, without any commitment to the priority of either. Bhargava argues that contextual secularism, which is enshrined in the Constitution, enjoins the state to exclude religion for some purposes, as for instance in the decision to exclude separate religious electorates, and to include it for others, as, for example, in accepting personal laws. But contextual secularism, is always guided by non-sectarian principles, which are consistent with a set of values constitutive of a life of equal dignity for NSOU • CC-PS-04 131 all. Admittedly, in recent times sectarian considerations have become important, as Bhargava accepts, and religion has entered politics where it should not have been allowed to do so, and excluded when much could have been achieved by inclusion. Yet contextual secularism is the only appropriate form of secularism in India. In sum, secularism for Bhargava is (a) fully compatible with the defence of differentiated citizenship rights and (b) the secularity of the state does not necessitate strict intervention, non-interference or equidistance, but any or all of these as the case may be. Amartya Sen defends secularism as part of a more comprehensive idea, that of India as an integrally plural country made up of different religious beliefs, language groups, and divergent social practices. Secularism, he suggests, is part of a bigger project of recognizing this heterogeneity. Engaging with six strands of critiques against secularism, Sen argues that any re-examination of the difficult question relating to the principle of symmetrical treatment of different religious communities must arise within a commitment of secularism. 'Secularism is basically a demand for symmetric political treatment of different religious communities....Balanced political treatment can be achieved....in rather desperate ways.' Although Sen Accepts that this interpretation raises many questions that need to be explored, this by itself, he insists, does not contradict the overarching argument for secularism. Chandhoke suggested that secularism cannot be abstracted from the wider conceptual context to which it forms one part. It can only be understood as an intrinsic component of the historical, constitutional and political practices of democracy, freedom, equality, justice and rights. Secularism in other words, is not an autonomous concept. Therefore, in order to unravel the meaning of secularism, we should first try to unravel the implications of the attendant concepts that give it (secularism) meaning-equality, freedom and democracy. 12.7 Conclusion It can be concluded that the state should have twin objectives, first-protecting everybody's freedom of conscience (as provided for in the Constitution) and secondly, contrary to present practice, denying without exception financial assistance for the practice of religion. It should be remembered what M. K. Gandhi believed, that a religion that depends on state support for its existence does not deserve to exist. Thus would the policy of uniform treatment of all religious communities (sarva dharma sambhava) be truly implemented.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 135 13.2 Introduction The members of a society or community are divided into vertical or horizontal groups or clusters. They include factors like class, caste, race, religion, language, region and so forth. Religion in this sense constitutes the source of a major cleavage in most societies. It acquires special significance in Third World countries in general, and multireligious societies like India in particular for democratic system can hardly remain insulated from religious influence. The democratic political process is set in motion when some groups make a political demand upon the government. In order to strengthen their position in a competitive situation the group leaders engage in maximizing mass support behind their demands. It is at this point that religion intrudes into the sphere of politics. Given its wide appeal, political leaders often feel tempted to utilize religion as an effective instrument of mass mobilization. Communalization of politics is a by-product of politicization of religion. A large number of individuals tend to define their political identity in terms of their religious faiths, develop prejudices against those following different religious creed and claim material benefits and privileges on the basis of their faiths. When communal polarization becomes extreme, when the majority of the members of a society develop a communal outlook toward political question, when religious divisions tend to overlap political cleavages, a democratic political system is exposed to serious challenge. Communalism is a festering sore on the Indian body politic as it undermines the cherished ideal of secularism embedded in its constitution, threatens inter-community peace and harmony and thereby hinders the process of national integration.

13.3 Meaning of Communalism The term 'communalism' was coined by the British in the mid-nineteenth century to describe highly plural, multi-ethnic societies such as those of the Indian subcontinent and Malaya. In the present-day Indian context, it denotes an emphasis on the exclusiveness of a religious group or community, a feeling of superiority for 'us' (i.e. the community itself) and dislike for 'them' (other such groups) and prejudice and hostility towards other religious groups. Communal politics typically means mobilization which foments and feeds upon such antipathy. The challenge of communalism, involving separatism and violence, is a major threat to the Indian society and the functioning of the secular democratic polity. It

136 NSOU • CC-PS-04 adversely affects the whole process of nation-building. In India the word 'communalism' refers to the belief of a group of people that religion is their basic identity that differentiates them from another group of people professing a different religion and that their interests are opposed. Bipan Chandra writes: "the concept of communalism is based on the belief that religious distinction is the most important and fundamental distinction, and this distinction overrides all other distinctions. Since Hindus, Muslims and Sikhs are different religious entities, their social, economic, cultural and political interests are also dissimilar and divergent. As such, the loss of one religious group is the gain of another group and vice-versa. If a particular community seeks to better its social and economic interests, it is doing at the expense of the other". It is a zero-sum game. But adherence to a religious system is not communalism. On the other hand, using one religious community against other communities is communalism. Communalism is exploitation of religion, open or subtle, to further certain interests. Communalism exploits both religion and politics, and is born out of hatred or of a real or imaginary fear of the other communities in a plural society. Communalism is a hindrance to integration of multi-ethnic, multi-religious and multilingual societies like India. It is antithetical to secularism as a pattern of social existence. Communalism generates 'false consciousness' as it distorts the objective reality, the reality of class conflicts that are inherent in an unequal society, and by dividing people along religious lines it prevents the forging of unity among the working people in their struggle against exploitation, oppression and injustice.

13.4 Nature and Pattern of Communalism Communalism in India mainly refers to the Hindu-Muslim communal divide, often giving rise to communal riots, especially in north India where in some towns they have become an institutionalised feature, and increasing polarisation of communal hostilities and feeling and a great deepening of distrust between members of the two communities. Such relations between the two largest communities constitute a set of tension both in our society and in the functioning of the Indian state. From the mid 1920's localised conflicts, riots between Hindu and Muslim communities became ordinary, recurring events on the Indian political scene. The partition of the Indian subcontinent between India and Pakistan in 1947 was accompanied by a holocaust in Punjab and Bengal. The process of partition have not solved half-a-century of communal politics engineered by the British in collaboration with the most conservative and obscurantist elite of the Muslim community. In

NSOU • CC-PS-04 137 independent India communal riots have become regular and recurrent events, sometimes with low and sometimes with high intensity. Except for certain stray incidents, the situation during the first decade of independence raised hope. But the Jabbalpur riots in Madhya Pradesh followed by those in Aligarh and in other towns of Uttar Pradesh in 1961 signalled the beginning of a new phase of intercommunal animosities. In 1964 there were widespread communal riots in Bihar, West Bengal, Orissa and Madhya Pradesh. For three years there was quiet on the communal front and then the Ranchi riots spread to other towns in Bihar. This cycle continued till 1970, with riots spreading to Assam, Kashmir, Maharashtra, Uttar Pradesh, West Bengal, Bihar and Gujarat. There had been a total number of 1106 incidents. Then followed a downward trend in the period 1972-76, declining to 169 incidents from 521 incidents in 1972. But inter-communal violence registered an upward swing from 1977. Encouraged by increasingly militant, well-financed and ideologically oriented communal organisations, tension between Hindus and Muslims increased, particularly during the 1980's, and the incidence and destructiveness of communal riots reached its zenith in the 1990's. Shah Bano, a divorced woman from Indore, approached the judicial magistrate in 1973 for a maintenance allowance and the magistrate ordered Ahmed Khan, her estranged husband, to pay the same. Khan challenged the order in the Supreme Court on a plea that the Shariat does not require him to pay maintenance beyond the iddat (three months following the divorce). in 1986. However, this was followed by Justice H. N. Tilhari's Judgement in 1994, declaring triple talaqa unconstitutional. Again in 2017 the Indian Supreme Court deemed instant triple talaq unconstitutional and on 30 th July 2019, the Parliament of India declared the practice of Triple Talaq as illegal, unconstitutional and made it a punishable act from 1 st August 2019. The demolition of Babri Masjid in Ayodhya on 6 th December 1992, witnessed worst communal turmoil since independence. Incidents of rampant violence against Christian missionaries in Orissa, Madhya Pradesh and Gujrat, the mass slaughter of Muslims witnessed in Gujarat in 2002 for several months which was unleashed in the context of a heinous crime in Godhra marked the beginning of the 21 st century. has been described as the worst violence in Uttar Pradesh in recent history. 138

NSOU • CC-PS-04 The pattern of these riots are more or less similar all over India. Most riots begin with a minor incident-typically with a dispute over a Hindu procession near a mosque. Inflammatory speeches are made and a minor incident turns into a major riot. The pattern is familiar, from rumours to blood path. Enters the Government's coercive machinery, followed by accusations of police excesses and then another round of clashes often over a wider area. The situation becomes normal with time. 13.5 Factors responsible for growth of Communalism in India Communalism is a multi-dimensional phenomenon, and no single factor can furnish a comprehensive explanation of its genesis and evolution. Thus it is important to take note of several probable determinants suggested by different scholars- 13.5.1 Legacy of Pre-Partition politics Moin Shakir, among others, has argued that communalism of politics in post-independence India has been largely conditioned by the legacy and experiences of pre-partition times. The British rulers, guided by the time-tested dictum of 'divide and rule', played up rival social economic and political claims of Hindus, Muslims, tribals and the 'untouchables'. Introduction of 'separate electorate' on the basis of existing religious and caste divisions in Indian society further reinforced communal identities and differences among the subject population. Again, some of the Indian political groups and organizations appeared only too eager to swallow the bait dangled by the British rulers. Thus, the Muslim League, which instilled the fear of 'Hindu domination' in an independent India in the minds of Indian Muslims, had its befitting counterpart in the Hindu Mahasabha which committed itself to the ideal of building India into a Hindu Rashtra (Hindu state). Amidst it all, the Congress firmly stood its ground as the champion of secular nationalism, but then its approach to national unity was not altogether beyond question. It considered the various communities of India homogeneous and well-knit groups-ignoring the vertical divisions in terms of class, language and region. Naturally it regarded the communal leadership as the authentic spokesman of the community, and whenever it thought of involving the minority communities in national issues it turned towards Muslim, Christian and Sikh leaders and not to the masses of those communities. Thus the Congress approach to national unity was that of 'unity from above'. The close connection between several prominent leaders of the Hindu Mahasabha and the Congress also caused misgivings among the minorities as to its secular credentials.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 139 The anti-colonial struggle and movements in India also set a tradition of mixing religion with politics. Thus the early resistance against British power organized by the Wahabis, Farajis, Sannyasis, Pagalpanthis of Mymensingh, Birsa Bhagwan and so forth had an outwardly political character, but deeper down they represented the clash of religion and cultures. Again, religion had a key role in shaping both the liberal and extremist political traditions of modern India. The early liberal reformers looked for a new and invigorated religion as the foundation of a new kind of society and polity. The extremists sought to utilize the symbols and idioms of Hindu culture as the basis of political nationalism, although they hardly envisaged the divisive impact it could have on the minorities. Last of all, Gandhi made adroit use of religious idioms to reach, organize and unite the masses. But once again it had the unintended consequence of giving the communalists Hindus and Muslims alike - a pretext for justifying their own reactionary use of religion for divisive political purposes. These diverse forms of intermarriage between religion and politics during the pre-independence days undoubtedly exerted much influence on the post-independence political environment. 13.5.2 Economic interpretation of communalism The most popular economic explanation of communalism seeks to trace its origin and development to economic underdevelopment and scarcity and the economic aspirations of the petty bourgeois classes. Underdevelopment of the economy often leads to uneven development across communities. In the struggle over scarce resources the middle classes of a community perceive themselves to be locked in a stiff economic competition vis-à-vis their counterparts in a relatively prosperous community. In this situation the middle class elites of the community seek to strengthen their demand by mobilizing the support of the masses of the community. To achieve this end they formulate their grievances not in class terms but in terms of those of the community and add a few religious demands to the down-to-earth economic issues. In this way the economic rivalry between the petty bourgeois elites of two communities assumes the colour of a communal conflict. This explanation is particularly applicable to the development of Muslim communalism in pre-partition times which was rooted in the increasing competition among the urban middle classes in a situation of colonial stagnation for government jobs, educational placing and political positions in legislative councils and municipal bodies. Organizations such as the RSS, Hindu Mahasabha and the Muslim League were based preponderantly on the petty bourgeoisie. Similarly, this economic interpretation provides the key to explaining the militant assertion of Sikh communal identity in post-independence India. To follow Asghar Ali Engineer, the 'Green 140 NSOU • CC-PS-04 Revolution' of the 1960's produced enormous wealth, led to the emergence of an agrarian bourgeoisie in Punjab countryside and forced it into conflict with the Hindu industrial bourgeoisie of the state. This new found prosperity generated among the capitalist farmers the quite secular aspiration for having an ever-expanding share in economic development. They raised the demands for greater share of river waters, hydroelectric power and control over Chandigarh. However, it was felt that the quite predictable resistance to these demands from the entrenched Punjabi Hindu bourgeoisie could not be overcome unless the demands could be shown to enjoy the support of the Sikh community as a whole – rich and poor alike. Hence in order to mobilize the support of the wider Sikh population the Akali Dal, the party of the Sikh farmers, in addition to voicing the class demands of the Jat peasant proprietors, had to pose as the defender of the Sikh Panthas well. As a result, the Sikhs stood united behind these demands but this led to greater Hindu-Sikh polarization in Punjab and ultimately precipitated a communal conflagration in the state. On the other hand, Achin Vanaik contends that the most potent social force behind the rise of post-independence Hindu communalism (i.e. the aggressive assertion of a collective religious identity) has been the intermediate castes. In class terms, these intermediate castes comprise the agrarian bourgeoisie and the urban and the rural petty bourgeoisie. This assertion of Hindu conservatism has not been a reaction to economic and social failures. On the contrary, it is the consciously chosen cultural expression of a force which has enhanced its authority and is upwardly mobile on economic and political fronts. In independent India, the land-based intermediate castes have made considerable economic strides. These groups are now seeking to improve their status by adopting a larger 'Hindu' identity in keeping with their developing self-image as major social actors in modern India. Further rising prosperity has not reduced competition, social alienation or psychological insecurity among the urban middle class. The series of 'public' religio-cultural events and activities particularly the yagnas and yatras organized by the VHP had immense appeal to these sections. This urban petty bourgeoisie, Vanaik concludes, still provides the ideological and organizational leadership within the intermediate castes. But it is the "ruralisation" of Hindu communalism that constitutes the unique factor as far as growth of communal politics in independent India is concerned.

13.5.3 Decline of Political Institutions and Communalism

The systematic decimation of India's democratic institutions, according to Rajni Kothari, offers another clue to the rising tide of communalism in Indian politics since

NSOU • CC-PS-04 141 the 1970's. Till the mid-1960's, Kothari argues, the Indian polity represented a broadly pluralistic and federal structure that sought to accommodate as far as possible the socio-economic grievances of the various classes, communities and regions through parliamentary politics. But this system of governance was dealt a final blow under Indira Gandhi. Mrs. Gandhi, as is well known, suffered from an extreme insecurity about power partly traceable to her precarious position within the party when she first assumed the prime minister's office. Hence her primary concern was to devise a strategy for survival in the seat of power which in turn, had two aspects that produced unwholesome consequences for India's democracy. First, elections were converted into an instrument of maintaining status quo rather than of change. They were reduced to a mere number game - a mode of demonstrating mass support for the leader. Questions of issues and ideologies were driven to the background and communal principle of mobilization became quite handy in manipulating the numbers. Secondly, the political class decided to gradually do away with the democratic structures and institutions of mass mobilization - like local party units, voluntary organizations and the press - and take recourse to making direct appeal to the millions. The institutional vacuum led to depoliticization of the people and decline in the citizens' involvement in politics. Nevertheless the catchy slogans of 'Garibi Hatao (abolish poverty) helped build up a supportive coalition of Muslims, the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes, some depressed castes and large parts of south India behind Mrs. Gandhi's Congress which saw it to a massive victory in the parliamentary elections of 1971 and the Assembly elections of 1972. But the results of 1977 election - in which the Congress received a drubbing - proved beyond doubt the hollowness of the promise of Garibi Hatao had been thoroughly exposed and the above coalition had come unstuck. During the second phase of her premiership in the 1980's, Mrs. Gandhi noted with concern that even the southern states which staunchly backed the Congress during the Janata wave of 1977 began slipping away from its grip. Desperate and disconcerted, the party was looking for a new social base as well as new slogan to mobilize it. This support base was found in the Hindi/Hindu heartland in North India - in the urbanized middle and lower middle classes and the masses at large. And the slogan it coined was that of threat to India's territorial integrity-proved by Sikh terrorism in Punjab and Pakistani machinations across the border - a clever ploy indeed to play upon the sentiments of the Hindu multitudes of the so called 'cowbelt'. Mrs. Gandhi did not live to reap the fruits of this electoral strategy but it contributed in no small measure to Rajiv Gandhi's thumping victory in the Lok Sabha elections of 1984. Thus, it was the Congress (I) under Mrs. Gandhi-who never missed an opportunity

142 NSOU • CC-PS-04 to swear by secularism - that Kothari holds primarily responsible for deliberately destroying India's democratic political fabric and resorting to communal idiom of politics and particularly for pandering to the Hindu majority for political gain. True, the benefits of the activation of the Hindu vote bank were later cornered by the BJP in an even bigger way, but it has to be kept in mind that the process of communalization of the Indian polity in the 1980's was set in motion by the decline and degeneration of the Congress party. 13.5.4 The Indian Version of Secularism and the problem of Communalism Partha Chatterjee believes that secularism as preached and practiced in independent India has in its own way stoked the fire of communalism in the country. Secularism as enshrined in the Constitution of India admittedly has an 'Indian' character in that the state has been allowed to intervene in religious matters to achieve the 'modernist' purpose of socio-religious reform. But today, according to Chatterjee, it gives rise to the very real possibility of "the Hindu right locating itself quite firmly within the domain of the modernizing state" and using "the arguments for 'interventionist secularization' to promote intolerance and violence against minorities." Though the term 'secularism' has been inserted in the preamble to the Indian Constitution only in 1976 (vide the 42 nd amendment), the intention of the founding fathers to build a secular state in India was never in doubt. Thus the Constitution (Articles 25 and 26) guarantees freedom of religion. However, all these rights are qualified by the state's prerogative to regulate any financial, economic, political or other secular activities which may be associated with religious practice, to provide for social welfare and reform to throw open Hindu religious institutions to all sections of Hindus, especially to the Dalits. By invoking this limit to the principle of liberty, the Indian state has carried out extensive reform of Hindu Personal law and of the administration of Hindu temples. The Hindu code Bill was enacted in 1955, and the Indian parliament went through the immensely complicated local and sectarian variations of Hindu law and laid down a single code of personal law for all Hindu citizens. Many of its provisions involved gross departure from traditional brahmanical principles. Of course, Chatterjee contends, the liberal democratic doctrine of freedom of religion does recognize that this right would be limited by other basic human rights. Thus, for instance, it would be perfectly justified for the state to deny that human sacrifice constitutes permissible religious practice. But it does not admit of any attempt on the part of the state to limit the liberty principle by engaging in

NSOU • CC-PS-04 143 interpretation of religious doctrine. For many in India criticize this move since they do not want any official of the state to become an interpreter of Hindu religion, quoting and expounding Sanskrit scriptures in defence of the bills. It was also pointed out that the use of state legislation to bring about reforms only in the religion of the majority was creating a serious anomaly in the very notion of equal citizenship. In this context Chatterjee draws our attention to the live possibility that the arguments for state intervention in religious affairs in the interest of social reform or secularization can very well be hijacked by the Sangh combine for narrow, sectarian political profit. 13.6 Conclusion It follows from the above analysis that gross political abuse of religion, rise of "competitive communalism" among the major communities and the threat of the emergence of a Hindu state have proved to be the bane of India's secular democratic polity. Scholars and activists have suggested and adopted various approaches and strategies for combating the communal virus. For example, the crusaders for socialist transformation assert that struggle for eradication of communalism is bound up with the question of liberation of the masses from capitalist oppression and hence should be launched from an allied platform of the struggle for socialism. Bipan Chandra has called for waging an ideological war against communalism (i.e. to fight the communalist ideology at the level of ideas) which implies the strategy of de-communalizing the people at all levels. This approach has much in common with Achin Vanaik's plea for contesting communalism at the level of the civil society and Ashutosh Varshney's emphasis on citizen initiative especially through building integrated civic structures. Rajni Kothari on the other hand, feels that the right answer to the communal menace lies in grassroots politics and the movements for democratic rights carried on through various non-party formations. Finally Randhir Singh stresses that the struggle for secularism must seriously consider the social role of religion, that the liberating aspects of religion should be carefully separated from its irrationalities which exposes it to manipulation in the interest of the ruling classes and that this positive side of religion should be astutely utilized in unmasking the forces of communalism. These approaches are divergent and none of them promises any instantaneous success in banishing communalism from our society. Yet they agree on one point: all of them represent the bold face of secularism. They keep the hope alive that, in the foreseeable future, the narrow, divisive and sectarian politics of communalism will not be allowed to triumph as the dormant idiom of India's political landscape.

Power relationships are built into the very structure of society, characterised by the existence of castes and classes having divergent interests-cooperating, competing and even conflicting. The state acts as a central institution in the political system, which means a body of rules and practices, within NSOU • CC-PS-04 147 which political activities occur i.e., struggle for power amongst groups, classes and castes in relation to their own interests and to the general regulation and orientation of life. There are also other groups based on religion and ethnicity which are also occasionally engaged in struggle for power, but caste constitute the most important group determining the basic pattern of politics in India. Robert W. Stern stated that, "caste is the warp and woof of Indian civilization and India's civilization is the warp and woof of caste." Caste is the basic unit of social stratification in traditional rural India, the effective social grouping. Arising in Vedic times it has come down to the present through centuries of adaptation, proliferation, internal schisms, competitions, collusions and combinations. Caste, the term originally used by the Portugese, refers to endogamous groups which in Sanskrit, are called jatis. Castes are, to quote Andre Beteille, "hierarchically ranked groups or categories based on hereditary membership which maintain their social identity by strict rules of endogamy." Each caste is usually associated with more or less distinct ritual status in the hierarchical system based on the concepts of purity and pollution, i.e., each caste is considered inferior to those above it and superior to those below it primarily in terms of purity/pollution, though the position which caste occupies in the local hierarchy is not clear.

14.3 Features of the Caste System The caste system rests on the hierarchical positioning of different caste groups. It is some what pyramidal in structure. At the apex of the pyramidal structure can be found the highest caste - the Brahmins. At the lowest end of the pyramid are multiple untouchable castes. In between these two caste groups, arranged at different levels of hierarchy, many other caste groups. Since the position of caste is in relation to the caste system, any effort to understand caste must rest on an understanding of the caste system. The notion of difference amongst the castes underlines the caste system. There is no scientific basis of this notion, and it is totally antithetic to the idea of democracy, yet this system has become virtually synonymous with Indian society. There are differences of opinion and different theories regarding the time of origin of the caste system as well as the factors that led to its emergence. But then, it may be said that most probably the system emerged from time of the Rigvedic period. According to some, ethnic differences led to the system, while some others claimed that division of labour was at the root of stratification. Still others considered

148 NSOU • CC-PS-04 class considerations were responsible for the emergence of the system. In view of certain analysts, however, not one but several factors were accountable for the origin of this system. Let us now discuss some of the main features of the caste system. (i) Segmental division of society : The society is divided into various small social groups called castes. Each of these castes is a well-developed social group, the membership of which is determined by the consideration of birth.

Children belongs to the caste of their parents. Caste membership is an indisputable and unalterable fact by which a man's position in the social structure is determined. The membership of an individual does not undergo any change even if changes in his status, occupation, education, wealth etc. takes place. Since membership is normally life long, there is practically no social mobility. However as pointed out by M. N. Srinivas, a low-caste has been able in a generation or two, to raise itself in the hierarchy, after acquiring economic and political power, by adopting the Brahmanic customs and ways - through a process of sanskritization. (ii) Hierarchy : Hierarchy is a ladder of command in which the lower rungs are encompassed in the higher ones in regular succession. The castes teach us a fundamental social principle of hierarchy. Castes form a hierarchy, being arranged in an order of superiority and inferiority.

At the top of this hierarchy is the Brahmin caste and at the bottom is the untouchables. In between are the intermediate castes, the relative position of which are not always clear.

As such disputes among the members of these castes over the social precedence of their respective castes are not very uncommon. Hierarchy is viewed as the principle by which the elements of a whole are ranked in relation to the whole, it being understood that in the majority of societies it is religion which provides the view of the whole. Hence, ranking assumes religious dimension. (iii) Endogamy : The most fundamental characteristics of the caste system is endogamy. All the thinkers are of the opinion that endogamy is the chief characteristic of caste, i.e. the members of a caste or sub-caste should marry within their own caste or sub-caste. The violation of the rule of endogamy would mean ostracism and loss of caste. (

iv) Hereditary status : Generally speaking the membership of a caste is determined by birth and the man acquires the status of a caste in which he NSOU • CC-PS-04 149 is born. In this connection, Ketkar has written that the caste is limited to only those persons who are born as the members of that caste. Thus membership in the caste is hereditary and one's membership does not undergo any change even if change takes place in his status, occupation, education and wealth etc. (v) Hereditary occupation : The traditional caste system is characterised by hereditary occupation. Members of a particular caste are expected to follow the occupation meant for the caste. Traditionally a Brahmin was allowed to function as a priest. In some cases the name of the caste is dependent upon the very occupation, as for instance, Napita (barber), Dhobi, Mochi, Mali, etc. (vi) Restriction on food and drink : There are rules for example, what sort of food or drink can be accepted by a person and from what castes.

Usually a caste would not accept cooked food from any other caste that stands lower than itself in the social scale.

A person belonging to a higher caste believes that he gets polluted even by the shadow of a person belonging to the low caste or by accepting food or drink from him. (vii) Cultural differences : Since each caste has its own set of rules and regulations with regard to endogamy, pollution-purity, occupational specialization, each caste develops its own subculture since the behaviour of an individual is governed by the requirements of his caste. The doctrine says that it is better for a person to follow the 'dharma' (religious obligation) of his own caste, no matter how low, than the 'dharma' of another caste, no matter how illustrious. The result has been different 'style of life' for different castes. Hence castes are to quote Prof.Gharya, "small and complete worlds in themselves, marked off definitely from one another, though subsisting within the larger group." (viii) Social Segregation : Social segregation is an aspect of caste differentiation. According to Ghurye; "segregation of individual castes or a group of castes in village is most obvious mark of civil privileges and disabilities, and it has prevailed in a more or less definite form all over India." Segregation is more severe in South India than in the North. In some parts of the country such as in the Marathi, Telegu and Kanarese speaking regions, it is only the impure castes that are segregated and made to live on the outskirts of the villages. In the Tamil and Malayalam regions, very frequently different castes occupy distinctly different quarters or sometime the village is divided 150 NSOU • CC-PS-04 into three parts, the first part is occupied by the dominate caste or by the Brahmins, second part is allotted to the Shudras and the third is reserved for the untouchables. (ix) The concept of pollution : The concept of pollution plays a crucial part in maintaining the required distance between different castes. "A high caste may not touch a low caste man, let alone accept cooked food and water from him. Where the two castes involved belong to either extreme of the hierarchy, the lower caste man may be required to keep a minimum distance between himself and the high caste man." The pollution distance varies from caste to caste and from place to place. (x)

a governing body or board called Jatipanchayat. These Panchayats in different regions and castes are named in a particular fashion such as Kuldriya in Madhya Pradesh and Jokhila in South Rajasthan.

Some of the offences dealt by it are adultery, violation of any prescribed taboos, the killing of sacred animals (the cow), insulting a Brahmin and the punishment awarded are out casting, fines, feasts to be given to the caste men etc. (xii)

Taboo : Another important characteristics of the caste system is the taboo (prohibition) by which the superior castes try to preserve their ceremonial purity and endeavour to neutralize the potentialities for evils believed to exist in every person. These potentialities are supposed to be more active and harmful to others during certain crises of life.

14.4 Caste and Class The relationship between caste and class and between both categories and other group identities is a complex one in India's highly stratified and pluralist social system. As all observers of India have noted, Indians have cross-cutting, multiple identities. A member of the Yadav caste may be a landlord, a cultivating peasant NSOU • CC-PS-04 151 proprietor, a tenant, or an agricultural labourer. An untouchable may be Hindu, Christian, Buddhist, Sikh or Muslim. Jatis usually are bounded by linguistic region, so castes generally share a linguistic and regional identity. Which identity is politically salient can vary over time. In the 1950s and 1960s, for example, supporters of the linguistic reorganization of states attempted to build regional identities and third to minimize caste identities. In the early 1970s Prime Minister Indira Gandhi won popular support and attracted the left with a campaign to eliminate poverty and to emphasize class-based issues. And in the 1990s Hindu nationalists attempted to forge a national identity based on Hindu culture and played down caste and regional identities. Politicians pick and choose which identity they want to use as the basis for political and social mobilization. Whichever identity they emphasize, the rhetoric is invariably one of "social justice" and equality. All the group identity-based movements demand greater equality, but they each have a different conception of what it is that needs to be equalized. For caste-based movements, it is their place in the social hierarchy. Though caste leaders often employ a rhetoric that seems similar to a class-based rhetoric, caste and class are not the same. It might be otherwise if all the members of the same caste engaged in the same traditional occupation, and there would have been little or no difference in property ownership, education, wealth and income. But the reality is that castes have become economically more differentiated. Many members of castes classified as OBCs have become economically better off as a consequence of the zamindari abolition legislation which transferred property ownership from the zamindars to peasant proprietors in Northern India. The Green Revolution also differentially benefited members of the same castes since those with land gained from the introduction of high-yielding varieties and subsidized fertilizers, water and electricity, while agricultural labourers belonging to the same castes did not reap these benefits. But class differences are also developing within the scheduled castes as some individuals reap the benefits of preferential access to education and employment in government service. None the less, caste solidarity overshadows class differences. Lower-caste political leaders have been particularly effective at creating a loyal following by symbolic appeals to caste solidarity and opposition to forward castes. Violent attacks by the higher castes, the desecration of statues of lower-caste leaders, real or imagined insults, and high-caste opposition to reservations, all help lower-caste political leaders blur intracaste class divisions by appeals to caste solidarity. Caste political leaders argue that by organizing along caste lines the entire community

152 NSOU • CC-PS-04 will gain material benefits and social respect. Caste once an instrument for the maintenance of hierarchy is paradoxically seen as a vehicle for egalitarianism between castes, though not within them. One can argue that both class and ethnic identities are social contracts or alternatively they both have their basis in some “objective” reality, and it is hard to distinguish one from the other in this regard. We can say that individuals everywhere have class or ethnic group identities or both, these identities are often fluid and contested, they do not rest on something “real” or at least measurable and observable (e.g., occupation, income, language, religion), these identities may or may not generate conflict, but are often the basis for political action, and that people who are unhappy with their lot may express their discontent by organizing themselves (or being organized by others) along any of these identities. Caste has been a far more potent form of social identity and political action in India than class, notwithstanding the history of kisan (agricultural and farming) movements and trade unions. India now has a plethora of caste-based educational institutions, caste associations, and caste-based political parties. Indeed, it is the kisan agitations that have proven to be episodic and less institutionalized than caste movements. Caste-based movements are based not only (if at all) on material demands but on demands for respect from others. They thus have a hard edge to them, for unlike other forms of ethnic identity they cannot be based on pride, but must emphasize their antipathy to those castes that fail to grant them respect and often continue to torment them.

14.5 Constitutional System, Politics and Caste Under the constitutional law of independent India, caste based discrimination is prohibited. All citizens, irrespective of their religion or caste, are equally entitled to constitutionally guaranteed fundamental rights. Every adult citizen has the right to vote and can also be a candidate for an election. The prohibition on untouchability is one of the fundamental rights. These apart, there are special constitutional provisions to help the members of the untouchable castes to overcome their age-old social disabilities and exclusion. Resting on these constitutional provisions many laws have also been enacted. As a result certain improvement in the condition of the oppressed castes has taken place but it has not led to the abolition of the caste system or caste oppression. Many people continue to be victims of untouchability and caste violence.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 153 In the political sphere caste identity is extremely important. On the one hand, there is an effort to hold on to the existing socio-economic layout and the lower castes trying to change it or challenge it. Much of this socio-economic struggle is undertaken politically in the political space. Parliamentary democracy being largely dependent on votes that is numbers, and caste identity being vital in the moulding of collective group decisions, different political parties try to build up their own respective caste-based vote banks. In 1953 and 1979 two backward class commissions were appointed in India to identify the ‘Other Backward Classes’. The first commission was headed by Kaka Kalekar, the second by B. P. Mandal. The commissions mainly attempted to find the roots of class conflict and socio economic disparity of caste groups. The first commission had submitted its report in 1955 and the second in 1980. Neither of the commissions could deny the links between backwardness and position in the caste hierarchy. The government did not accept the recommendations of the first commission. After a long time the second commission was appointed. The constitution itself had provided for the appointment of this sort of commissions. The second commission, i.e., the Mandal Commission, identified 52% of India’s population as backward. Different groups of people were included in this category. A large section comprised of low castes; apart from them some other castes and sections of the Muslim population were also included. For the advancement of this section of population, the Mandal Commission made a variety of recommendations. These included reservation in the field of jobs. However, keeping in mind a fifty percent ceiling on reservation imposed by the judiciary, the commission recommended 27% reservation for the OBCs. Incidentally, it may be mentioned that already there was reservation for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes of 15% and 7.5% respectively. With the addition of the 27% reservation for the OBCs the total quantum of reservation stood at 49.5%. In 1990 the central government decided to partially implement the Mandal Commission recommendations. The decision evoked sharp debates. A caste-wise polarization took place between those for and against it. The Other Backward Classes or OBCs became much more conscious and organized than before. Moreover, despite the existence of differences, disagreements and conflicts, a degree of shared feeling developed between them and the Scheduled Castes and tribes. Reservation was not granted on the basis of religion in the central educational institutions at the national level, although reservation was extended to religious minorities in some states. The Tamil Nadu government had allotted 3.5% of seats,

154 NSOU • CC-PS-04 each to Muslims and Christians, thereby altering the OBC reservation. The government of Andhra Pradesh introduced a law enabling 4% reservations for Muslims in 2004. Kerala Public Service Commission had a quota of 6% reservation for Muslims. The Central government too provided for reservation of socially and economically backward section of the Muslim population in line of the Andhra Pradesh government, especially after the Sachar Committee report, which highlighted the plight of Indian Muslims, who in some regions were more backward than the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes. From the 1980's in particular, in different parts of the country the low and middle castes began gaining importance. This became all the more evident since the decade of the 1990s. Along-side middle caste leaders like Lalu Prasad Yadav, Mulayam Singh and Nitish Kumar, we have witnessed the rise of a dalit leader, Mayawati in Indian politics. 14.6 Conclusion Perhaps there is an indication that no initiative is being taken for eradication of caste or gradual lessening of its importance in the public sphere in India. Instead, in recent times, greater thrust is being laid on caste-based political mobilization in every arena of the statecraft. The spirited endorsement of the Mandal Commission by a large number of "Backwards" is an indication of the fact that reservation for the Scheduled Castes and Tribes has met with demonstrable success, no matter how limited the spread of beneficiaries may have been. Thus, caste remains a major arbiter in contemporary Indian politics. 14.7 Summing Up • Caste constitutes the most important group determining the basic pattern of politics in India. • The caste system rests on the hierarchical positioning of different caste groups - it is somewhat pyramidal in structure. • Several factors are accountable for the origin of this system. • The relationship between caste and class is a complex one in India's highly stratified and pluralist social system - caste has been a far more potent form of social identity and political action in India than class. • Under the constitutional law of independent India, caste-based discrimination is prohibited - special constitutional provisions also help the members of the untouchable caste to overcome their age-old social disabilities and exclusion. • In 1953 and 1979 two backward class commissions were appointed in India to identify the Other Backward Classes. 14.8 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. 15.2 Introduction More than one hundred years of social reform movements, public pronouncements by political leaders, constitutional declarations, and legislation have undermined the ideological basis of caste in India. No political parties, and no political leaders, no intellectuals support the idea that caste is part of a natural moral order based upon

158 NSOU • CC-PS-04 hierarchy and sustained by endogamous consanguinity and rules of commensality, the caste is occupationally linked and hereditary, that each caste (jati) embodies its own code for conduct (dharma), and that low-caste membership is the consequence of transgressions in one's previous life. There is no public opposition to the preamble to the constitution of India which calls for "equality of status and of opportunity" or to the constitutional provisions that prohibit

and call for equality of opportunity for all citizens in matters relating to employment or appointment to any office. Indian scholars and social reformers have argued that there is a long history of opposition to the ideology of caste within and outside the Hindu tradition. Long before colonial rule, it is said, Buddhism and Virasaivism frontally attacked Brahminical supremacy, while the Bhakti devotional movements undermined the Brahminical emphasis on scriptures, knowledge and rituals as the only means to salvation. Throughout the nineteenth and the early part of the twentieth centuries religious reform movements not only sought to undermine Brahminism but attacked the ideological foundation of caste. Opposition to caste came from both the highest and the lowest castes. In the nineteenth century the Brahmo Samaj, founded by a Bengali Brahmin, Ram Mohan Roy, rejected caste and the concept of transmigration. In the 1920's a non-Brahmin, anti-Brahmin, anti- caste movement, known as the Self Respect movement (later, the Justice Party), emerged as a major political force in South India. The scheduled caste leader, B. R. Ambedkar, created the Scheduled Caste Federation (later the Republic Party) which called for the removal of barriers and greater economic and political opportunities for the untouchables. India's nationalist leaders of all political persuasions opposed the caste system and called for the creation of a more egalitarian social order. Even those who defended Hinduism from its Western Christian critics, such as Dayananda Sarasvati, the founder of the Arya Samaj in 1875 called for a return to the Vedas including the belief in the consequence of former deeds (karma) and transmigration, did not support caste. There were some orthodox movements, such as the Sanatan Dharma Sabha and Ram Rajya Parishad, founded by Swami Karapatri in 1948, issued an election manifesto in India's national parliamentary elections in 1952 promising to provide untouchables with "high posts" in the management of the sanitation departments and leather and hides trades – traditional occupations for outcaste Hindus – and called for a return to the "blessed days of Lord Rama's reign", but the party was ignored by the English-language press and intelligentsia. The pre-independence Hindu nationalists who wrote of "Hindu rashtra" and "Hindutva" - Madhav Golwalker, Veer

NSOU • CC-PS-04 159 D Savarkar, Keshev Hedgewar, founders and leaders of the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh – did not support the caste system, nor does the contemporary Hindu nationalist party, the Bharatiya Janata Party. Perhaps no other society in recent history has known inequality so gross, so long preserved or so ideologically well entrenched. In the traditional civilizations of Islam or China, the ideal if not always the practice of equality had an honourable and often commanding place in the culture. But in India the notion that men should remain in the same occupation and station of life as their forefathers was enshrined in religious precepts and social custom. While life was not as immobile as theory prescribed, and from time to time revolts against the dominance of Brahmins and other high castes broke out, the idea of social equality never became as widespread in Hinduism as it did in other great traditions. The principle of equality implied a revolutionary transformation in India. The nationalist elite that took power in 1947 wrote a constitution that contained the full panoply of democratic institutions – parliament and legislatures, elections, universal suffrage, freedom of assembly, freedom of press, legal rights – all based on the principle of equal political rights. Equality was to be achieved in part through democratic institutions and procedures, particularly universal suffrage without a literacy requirement, equality before law, legislation banning discrimination, and through the establishment of a system of reservations that would guarantee representation to members of scheduled castes and tribes. Equality was also to be achieved through socialist planning, broadly understood as an activist state that would do what the elite believed the market could not do in a developing country – accelerate investment and growth that would ultimately benefit all social classes. Equality of opportunity, they said, would come through universal and compulsory elementary education and an expanded system of higher education. The nationalist elite did not promise a classless society, but they did offer a promise of a casteless society in which a social status would not be based upon hereditary social rankings and individuals would not be denied opportunities because of their birth.

15.3 The Rise of Caste Politics The revolutionary transformation did not of course take place. Caste as an ideology may be (almost, but not quite) moribund, but as a lived-in social reality it is very much alive. The demise of orthodoxy, right beliefs, has not meant the demise of orthopraxy, right practice. Castes remain endogamous. Lower castes, especially 160 NSOU • CC-PS-04 members of scheduled castes, remain badly treated by those of higher castes. But the gap between beliefs and practices is the source of tension and change. The lower castes no longer accept their position in the social hierarchy, no longer assume that their lower economic status and the lack of respect from members of the higher castes are a “given” in their social existence. But the movement for change is not a struggle to end caste; it is to use caste as an instrument for social change. Caste is not disappearing, nor is “casteism” – the political use of caste – for what is emerging in India is a social and political system which institutionalizes and transforms but does not abolish caste. Politicization of caste takes place in three ways. The different ways can be identified as :

15.3.1 Political Co-optation The political elite which assumed power in 1947 was drawn from the upper castes: disproportionately Brahmins, Rajputs, Kayasthas, Bhumihars, Vaishyas and other “forward castes.” Members of these castes were in every respect privileged. They dominated the colleges and universities, the senior civil service in the state and central governments, and the higher ranks of the military and the police. The key institutions that shaped political power, social status and economic privilege in India – the nationalist movement, the educational system, the bureaucracy and the system of land ownership – were largely in their hands. The senior leaders of all of India’s political parties – even those on the left – were recruited from the higher castes, were often educated abroad, and with few exceptions came from families that were well placed. Several factors mitigated against the perpetuation of political power by the higher castes. One critical factor was the mobilization of the lower castes by the Indian National Congress.

Before independence the British warned that independence would mean the subordination of the lower and middle castes to the upper castes who dominated the nationalist movement. E. V. Ramaswami Naicker, leader of the non-Brahmin movement in Madras, and B. R. Ambedkar, national leader of the scheduled castes, were hostile to the nationalists whom they regarded as representing the interests of the upper castes. From the early 1920's onward, Congress set out to win the support of all social strata. The Congress leadership was predominantly high caste, but by the late 1930's many of the presidents of the district and taluka Congress committees were drawn from the lower and middle castes. By the 1950's many of these individuals moved into positions of political power in the state governments. In India's first parliamentary elections in 1951-2, three opposition

NSOU • CC-PS-04 161 parties sought support from the lower castes – the Peasants' and the Workers' Party in Bombay, the Dravida Kazhagam (DK) in Madras, and the Scheduled Caste Federation – but Congress defeated all three by a strategy of incorporating elites from their would-be supporters. The capacity of the Congress Party to incorporate members of the middle castes and the scheduled castes – much less so far the other backward castes – was strengthened by intra-party factionalism and rivalries among members of the upper castes. As party leaders from the upper castes competed with one another for positions within the party and for seats in parliament and the legislative assemblies, they set out to broaden their own base by recruiting new members. The result of interparty factionalism, as well as competition between political parties, was to induce party leaders to mobilize caste leaders at the local level and to create vote banks. These recruitment efforts brought into the elite structure social groups that were previously excluded from the political process. The process was a slow one and not uniform throughout India. In UP, for example, the upper-caste Congress leadership won the support of the scheduled castes and the Muslims, but failed to attract the middle castes – notably the Jats – or the backward caste peasantry. Congress was not alone in seeking to mobilize supporters along caste lines. In North India the Praja Socialist Party, following the lead of their strategist and leading theoretician, Ram Manohar Lohia, set out to mobilize the backward castes, while Charan Singh, a Jat, a former Congressman, and an articulate spokesman for the peasant proprietor class, brought large number of members of the middle and backward castes into his political party, the Bharatiya Kranti Dal (BKD). In both UP and Bihar, the opposition parties proved to be particularly skilful in undermining the electoral strength of the Congress Party by building a coalition of the middle and the lower castes, then pulling in large numbers of Muslims alarmed by the growth of the Bharatiya Janata Party. In both states, non-Brahmin, non-upper-caste elites took power, first the Jats, then the Yadavs, and by the latter part of the 1990's UP had a Dalit Chief Minister. By the 1990's two new lower-caste political parties, the Samajwadi Party and the Bahujan Samaj Party, were part of the governing coalitions in UP and Bihar. In South India the mobilization of the non-Brahmin castes was earlier than in the north. In neither Karnataka nor in Tamil Nadu were the non-Brahmin movements seeking radical change, but rather aimed to gain greater power in administration and 162 NSOU • CC-PS-04 in elected local bodies and state legislatures. In Karnataka, the Kaligas and the Lingayats became the political base of the ruling Congress Party. Devraj Urs, the paramount Congress leader in Karnataka in the 1970's, broadened the social base of the party by appealing to the more disadvantaged backward castes and scheduled castes. In Tamil Nadu the Dravidian movement was committed to the destruction of the caste system but, in practice it used caste as a means of political mobilization and ultimately increased the political importance of caste. Though Congress initially succeeded in gaining the support of non-Brahmin elites, the Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam (DMK), an offshoot of the Dravida Kazhagam, was ultimately able to win control of the state, largely by transforming its anti-Brahmin ideology into an anti-northern Tamil nationalism, a strategy which could be adopted by a regionally based political party but which was obviously not possible for the nationally oriented Congress Party in Tamil Nadu. Indian politics became the arena within which group identities were sharpened, and individuals sought material benefits through group membership. Factions and parties were often based upon these identities, and leaders vied with one another by appealing to these "fissiparous" tendencies. Thus the competitive democratic system provided mechanisms for the incorporation of groups and elites that had previously been excluded from political power.

15.3.2 Political Mobilization A second factor in the rising political consciousness and organization of the lower castes was the widespread rejection of the ideological foundations of India's hierarchical social order. Once caste lost its moral legitimacy the upper castes no longer had the moral authority and the political will to stand in the way of lower castes who sought greater political power, access to education, and social respect. The destruction of the ideology underlying caste politicized the scheduled castes and other backward castes. With the erosion of the moral basis of caste, the self-imposed barrier to protest by the lower castes, that is, their acceptance of their place in the hierarchy, was also eroded. Some middle and lower castes sought equality with the upper castes through the process of Sanskritization, that is, by emulating the orthopraxy of the higher castes, but, paradoxically, at the same time proclaimed their status as backward castes and demanded greater political power. Activists among the scheduled castes called themselves Dalits, literally "oppressed" or "grounded down." They rejected what they regarded as M. K. Gandhi's paternalistic call for the abolition of untouchability but supported the varnashram (varnashram), and called NSOU • CC-PS-04 163 instead for the mobilization from below of the untouchables. Many Dalits followed B. R. Ambedkar's call to leave the Hindu fold and become Buddhists. In the mid-1970's the Dalit launched a series of political campaigns aimed at improving their economic and social status.

In the 1989 parliamentary elections, the newly formed Bahujan Samaj Party (BSP), under the Dalit leader, Kanshi Ram, built a coalition of “oppressed” groups, Muslims, scheduled castes, and other backward castes. In 1995 the BSP joined with other parties to form a government in UP, with a Dalit woman, Mayawati, as chief minister. Her tenure was short, but in 1997 Mayawati returned as chief minister in an unusual (and also short-lived) coalition with the Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party. Seventy years after independence, the chief ministers of most of India’s states were non-Brahmins, some from the middle castes, but many drawn from the backward castes. The chief minister of UP was a scheduled caste woman. Members of the Yadav, Kurmi, and other OBC’s were prominent figures in the politics of UP and Bihar, India’s most populous states. In August 1997, a half-century after independence, India elected K. R. Narayanan, a member of a scheduled caste, as the country’s president.

15.3.3 Caste Reservation

A third factor that facilitated the rise to political power of the lower castes was the Indian system of affirmative action known as reservations. The system of reservation was initially put in place by the British over the objection of the nationalist movement, but in time it was embraced by Congress and virtually by all political parties in India. The pre-independence nationalist leadership supported the liberal notion of one man, one vote and no representation along communal lines and opposed the British proposal for communal electorates under which Muslims, Christians and Sikhs could only vote for candidates of their own community. Congress nationalists, led by Gokhale, ultimately agreed to separate electorates for Muslims, but balked when the British sought to create separate electorates for the scheduled castes. Gandhi was particularly adamant in his opposition and began a threatened death fast that ended in the “Poona Pact” of 1932 which provided for proportional representation for scheduled castes, but not separate electorates. The reservation provision was subsequently incorporated into the Indian constitution, along with a constitutional commitment to ensure more adequate representation of the scheduled castes in government service, though no quota was established. There is a tension between, on the one hand, the goal of a casteless society in 164 NSOU • CC-PS-04 which the individual is the unit of public policy and, on the other, the concept of reservations for scheduled castes and tribes with the group as the unit of public policy. However there was a consensus that two groups were so disadvantaged that they ought to be beneficiaries of a system of affirmative action. One was the scheduled castes, comprising about 15.7 percent of the population. The other was the scheduled tribes, 7.7 percent of the population. The Indian Constitution also contained a provision that special benefits could also be provided to other backward communities; it did not specify who these other communities were or what the benefits might be. The other backward classes (OBCs) or, as they were sometimes designated, the socially and educationally backward classes (SEBCs), were conceived basically in terms of caste. According to most estimates, the OBCs constitute about half of the Indian population, so that along with the scheduled castes and tribes they form about three-quarters of the country’s population. The OBCs are highly differentiated in terms of their income, occupation, and education, and for this reason many who supported reservation for the scheduled castes and tribes opposed giving benefits to those who belong to the OBCs. The reservation provisions were not without controversy. India’s left intellectuals and left parties were not advocates of caste-based policies. They argued instead that a more egalitarian social order could be built through property redistribution and the expansion of the public sector. Land reform, they argued, was the key to equality, since caste was sustained by unequal property relations which permitted the upper castes to maintain their social, political, and economic dominance. Some Marxist theorists argued that caste and ethnic identities were epiphenomena created by the ruling classes to prevent the rise of class consciousness. The false consciousness could be overcome by fundamental structural changes in the economic order, and through the efforts of the left to instruct the masses as to what constituted their class interests. The caste system could be smashed, not through an attack against orthodoxy, or ameliorative measures such as reservations, but through changing the mode of production. The post-independence government was committed to reservation. The government set a quota for scheduled castes and scheduled tribes for all government appointments, including representation in the public sector. Quotas were established for admission into elite educational institutions such as medical schools and the national universities. A national commission was appointed to consider whether reservation should be granted to the “other backward classes.” Though the commission recommended reservations in government service and education, the chairman, Kaka

NSOU • CC-PS-04 165 Kalelkar, declared his opposition and the recommendations were not acted upon. None the less, several state governments – most notably Karnataka – did extend reservations to other backward classes. In 1979 the government of India appointed another commission, known after its chairman as the Mandal Commission, to consider the proposal for extending reservations to the OBCs. The Mandal Commission, like its predecessor, defined backward classes in caste rather than class terms, enumerating specific castes as “backward” by virtue of their social as well as their economic status. Given the material benefits from reservations, there was considerable lobbying to be classified as backward since, unlike the socially defined and widely accepted category of untouchables, there was no agreement as to which castes were backward. The commission drew up a list of some 400 castes they classified as “backward,” most of whom belonged to the labouring or shudravarna. The principles implicitly put forth by Mandal Commission and previous commissions that recommended reservations for the backward classes were : (1) that caste membership rather than individual class characteristics should determine the beneficiaries; (2) low social ranking in the caste system rather than average per capita income or other economic criteria should be the principle consideration for inclusion on the OBC list; (3) religious and linguistic groups, no matter what their economic condition, should not qualify for inclusion in the backward category; and (4) reservations should be in the public sector, including college admissions, government employment, and, for the scheduled castes and tribes, seats in legislative bodies. The central premise of the Mandal Commission was that India should proceed from an ideology that rested upon hereditary hierarchy to an ideology that emphasized equality of outcomes – not quality of opportunity. Though the government approved the recommendations of the Mandal Commission, no action was taken at the time and reservations at the national level remained limited to the scheduled castes and tribes. The central government’s policy continued to be one of balancing a commitment to equal rights for all with special benefits to some. In August 1990, Prime Minister V. P. Singh, then the leader of a fragile coalition non-Congress government in need of solidifying his electoral base, announced that 27 percent of central government positions would be set aside for other backward classes in addition to the 22 percent set aside for the scheduled castes and tribes. The 400 castes enumerated in the Mandal Commission report were to be given reservations. But, the government’s announcement triggered large-scale violence across northern 166 NSOU • CC-PS-04 India, especially in the universities. Though many of the opponents of reservations did so because they were excluded, there was also a growing sense that a moral injustice was being committed and the government had extended the benefits for political reasons. Though the country was divided, none of the major political parties openly opposed V. P. Singh’s reservation policy. It was widely understood, however, that the leaders and members of the Bharatiya Janata Party regarded caste reservations for the OBC’s as a policy that divided Hindu society and weakened it against its Muslim adversaries. So many groups within the electorate now benefit from reservations that a policy reversal is politically unlikely. Once a system of group preferences was introduced, leaders of political parties regarded support for preferences as a strategy for winning political support.

15.4 Conclusion

To recapitulate, the political mobilization of the lower castes, their increasing incorporation into the Indian political system, and their rising political power can be attributed to the demise in the ideological legitimacy of caste among the upper castes; the inclusive character of the Indian National Congress as a mass-based political movement; the intrafactional conflicts within the post-independence Congress; the Congress strategy of building vote banks among the scheduled castes and tribes, the Muslims, and the middle and upper castes; the counter-strategy of the non- Congress opposition parties to win support among the other backward castes and to build their own caste-based alliances; the system of reservations which provided opportunities for access to higher education, administration, and elected bodies to members of the scheduled castes and tribes; and finally the extension of reservations to hundreds of other backward castes. The increasing political clout of the lower castes should also be seen in the context of an increase in social mobility. The abolition of the zamindari system and land redistribution plus the introduction of the Green Revolution improved the economic position of many lower-caste tenants who gained title to land; the expansion of the system of mass education, though very limited, along with the system of reservations, enabled some individuals to obtain employment which brought them into the middle class. However, the low public investment in primary and secondary schools, the country’s slow economic growth, and the limited 172 NSOU • CC-PS-04 16.1 Objectives On reading this unit, the learners will be able to : • define the meaning of affirmative action. • present a broad overview of the status of women in India. • identify the status of women in ancient India. • highlight women’s position during the British Rule and Freedom Movement in India. • enumerate the provisions in the Constitution of India regarding women’s equality. • describe women Political Participation in the democratic institution and structures. • explain the growing problems of violence against women and its solutions. 16.2 Introduction Women constitute roughly half of the world’s population. According to the United Nation’s The Population Reference Bureau, 2004, in its data sheet, it revealed that out of 3209 million women living in the world, the share of India is 531.9 millions. This amounts to nearly half of India’s total population. As per India’s Census 2001, the ratio of females per thousand males was 933 and in the Census Report of 2011, the number of women for every 1000 men came down to 914. Different statistics shows that this half of humanity possesses 1/100th of the world’s property. Nearly 70 percent of the women live below the poverty line. Two thirds of them are illiterate. According to Human Development Report 1995, “poverty has a woman face. Of the 1.3 billion people in poverty, 70 per cent are women”. Taking the economy as a whole, Indian women perform two-thirds of the work, but earn only one-tenth of the income. Women do have unequal access to land and property rights; where as nearly 89 per cent of the women earn their livelihood from agriculture. Compared to male members, women have low life expectancy at birth, low educational attainment and low income and gender disparities. In 2005, women made up twelve percent of the World’s Parliamentarians, while India at that time was only 8 per cent, though the 15 th Lok Shaba represents 10 per cent women members.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 173 Studies on Indian women in politics, in aggregate, indicate that women in Indian society have been deprived of fundamental social, economic and political rights. The social hierarchies and inequalities that exist in Indian society have deterred the women for centuries from playing an active role in the societal functions including participation in political institutions. Women constituting half the population of our country have been an integral part of our social structure mainly due to their contribution to the socio-economic spheres of life. Notwithstanding the fact, women in India face discrimination and exclusion because of the gender bias of the prevalent patriarchal values of Indian society. As man started believing everything under his control taming the most furious and deadly animals with force and technology and using them for its own benefits, so he similarly, enslaved women and the tool he used was the ideology of patriarchy. This recounts us Simon de Beauvoir’s statement that “one is not born, but rather becomes a woman”. So, patriarchy is a socio-cultural construction in which a false consciousness makes women to accept all forms of oppression, discrimination and exploitation. The dominant patriarchy has denied women equality of status and opportunities in the socio-economic and political spheres. Rural Indian women are still treated as “object” of development rather than the “subject” of development.

KASHINATH.WOMEN STUDY.2015.doc (D15890935)

The involvement of women in the development process and political decision making process has been advocated by social and political thinkers. The Report of the Committee on Status of Women in Indian Women, 1974, a significant document on the socio-economic conditions of Indian women, says that though political participation of women in the political process has created a space but their ability to produce impact on the political process has been negligible because of the inadequate attention paid to their political education and mobilization by both political parties and women’s organization. Parties have tended to see women voters as appendages of the males. Among women, leadership among women has become diffused and diverse with sharp contradictions with regard to inequalities that affect the status of women in every sphere – social, economic and political. Historically, in India, women have been praised greatly in the literature and religion as ‘Devi’ or ‘Shakti’ or ‘ardhangini’ and a portion of man. This finds expression in the famous epic in The Mahabharata glorifying them as the “light of the house, mother of the universe and supporter of the earth and all its forests”. In ancient India, women used to participate equally along with men in the religious rituals. So women were equal to men. But with the advent of Muslim rule, mediaeval India witnessed steady dependency of women on men. The Islamic custom of 174 NSOU • CC-PS-04 'purdah' (veiling of women) had created the two worlds – public and private world with women confined to the latter. Virtually, Indian women lost their earlier status and were at lowest ebb. In the colonial era, the British rule hardly intervened the socio-religious spheres. Their mission was economic rather than social and political. Despite the civilizing missions, many inhuman social evils were carried out in the name of custom, culture and tradition. 'Sati', the tradition of widow immolation was one of it. Society conspired to inherit the widow from her husband's property. Though reformers like Ram Mohan Roy, Swami Dayanand Saraswati and Iswar Chandra Vidyasagar tried their best to cleanse the society and elevate the status of women to a considerable height, the women had a little role in it. The Britishers along with the Indian reformers brought the brutal practices against women on the margin in society. The British rule, in order to raise the status of Indian women gave birth to a number of socio-religious reforms in the country. The Indian women's concern for political equality emerged during the national movement in which women, especially from the upper strata of the society, actively participated, but their participations were not directed against the traditional patriarchal system as such. However, women during the freedom struggle, raised the issue of representation in politics as early as 1917 along with the demand for universal adult franchise. By 1935, under the Government of India Act, all women over 21 could vote provided they fulfilled the conditions of property and education. In the post independence period, though the affirmative concept bearing welfare, development and empowerment/reservation relating to the status of women with the principle of 'Gender Equity and Equality' had been constitutionalised in free India and through other legislation to uplift their status. Yet politics proved to be a very inhospitable terrain for women and continues to be the male bastion into which the entry of women is severely restricted. In contemporary India, women have been experiencing derivation, brutality and exploitation in different situations and most importantly, at the hands of the persons whom they trust more. Society as a whole has still not accepted women is being equal to men and crimes or abuses against women are on the rise. For that change, the society's age-old deep rooted mindset needs to be changed through social conditioning and sensitization programmes.

In a heterogeneous society, there are multiple identities among people, culture

NSOU • CC-PS-04 175 and community. Because of the multiple identities in such a society, there is also a presence of inequality prevalent in the multiplicity of identities. To ensure equality in any unequal society, there is need to create a ground for level-playing so that huge disparities do not exist. The affirmative action is a response to secure equal rights in a differentiated society to reduce disparity. The entire idea of affirmative action is about recognizing the fact that in society everyone is not equal, some groups or people need support in the form of affirmative action from the state in various ways putting the disadvantaged groups or people in an equal footing with the rest of the competing groups. Thus, affirmative action is a policy in which an individual's color, race, sex, religion or natural origin are taken into account to increase opportunities provided to an under-represented part of society. Affirmative action seeks to overturn historical trends of discrimination against an individual's identity by providing assistance to groups identified as subject to past or present discrimination in areas of education, employment and representation. Conditions of women in India have not been historically very good. Women are physically weaker than men and due to this fact they have been exploited, oppressed and under-privileged. Due to such continuous unfavourable treatment, the social status of women has become really degraded. It is argued that "neither growth nor strong market orientation alone reduces or eliminates inter-group disparity and discrimination". Therefore, affirmative action becomes essential in a differential society such as that in India. Originally, the overall affirmative policy in India was nameless; the various measures that embodied it were referred to as 'reservation', 'special treatment' or 'preferential treatment' or 'concessions'. But most of those terms have referred to this policy but these have no connection with the wider principle or goal. In the 1950s, Professor Alexandronicz proposed 'positive discrimination' and Marc Galanter proposed 'compensatory discrimination'. There were also other terms as 'benign discrimination' and 'reverse discrimination' 'empowerment' etc. Many writers and judges have used it treating them as synonyms. The term, 'affirmative action' came to be in use in the early 1980s, borrowed from the United States. In India, the term was used in the case of disadvantaged section of the population. The women are naturally a weaker sex was first acknowledged by U S Supreme Court in the case of Muller vs. Oregon, 1908. In this case, U S Supreme Court observed that due to physical structure and performance of maternal functions, 176 NSOU • CC-PS-04 women are at a disadvantage in the society and thus it is society's responsibility to implement favourable laws to bring them on the same level as men. The makers of the Indian Constitution also understood this fact and have provided several provisions for elevating the status of women and giving them a level playing field. 16.4 Status of Women in India The low position of women in society is as old as patriarchy. Women constituting half the population of our country have been an integral part of our social structure principally due to their contribution to the socio-economic spheres of life. Notwithstanding the fact, women in India have been discriminated because of the gender bias of the prevalent patriarchal values of Indian society. The dominant patriarchy has denied women equality of status and opportunities in the socio-economic and political spheres. There is a famous phrase coined by Simon de Beauvoir that "one is not born a woman but becomes one". The phrase underscores the point of dividing mankind on the basis of gender as 'man' and 'women'. Such distinction has both psychological and physiological aspects. In most societies, biological differences are translated into socially institutionalised roles and positions. To simply speak, society takes up the task of converting a biological male into a man and a biological female into a woman by prescribing masculine and feminine qualities to them respectively. Society has over the ages evolved beliefs, ideas, values and expectations through which children right from a very tender age, internalize the traits of masculinity or femininity in their behavior, attitude and roles they take up. So, gender is a cultural construction transmitted from generation to generation through the process of socialization. It has nothing to do with one's biology, rather the qualities of being masculine or feminine and its root of these differences lies in one's culture. Thus, society becomes the field of the domination of men over women. Patriarchy refers to this male domination and female's acceptance of internalization of that dominance. Patriarchy is in fact, a 'male rule'. It is a system of social structures and practices, in which men dominate, oppress and exploit women. Most of the institutions of the society are patriarchal in nature, whether it is the state, religion, educational institutions, family or the media. The ideology of patriarchy is so deep rooted in our society that all kinds of violence and women subjugation are a reality. In a heterogeneous society, like India, divided on caste, language, religion, community etc., such domination and subjugation take place in various forms and

NSOU • CC-PS-04 177 manifestations. Violence against women is one of the innumerable incidents which have kept them as an excluded category from political participation and socio-economic developmental process. The discrimination and exclusion of the women from the mainstream of life have created the world of a man and a woman dividing into two halves, forming many pairs of binary opposites. It is a world of body versus mind, nature versus culture, emotion versus reason, and private versus public. These dichotomies stand in chain to each other that shape the culturally constituted roles for men and women. This dichotomy is perpetuated by patriarchy itself. The culturally constituted roles for men and women reflect in the following social, political and economic areas. 1. A woman's existence centers on her body. She is destined to gratify man. She is to bear and rear children. Motherhood which is socially constructed has been imposed upon women. She has been made appendage of man, a parasite, a domestic animal, a pleasure resort. Our culture with its patriarchal ideology has been exploiting women in the name of motherhood. Women also suffer from various stigmas due to her body. Simon de Beauvoir says that menstruation interrupts a woman's routine, putting her in a stigmatized state, involving various restrictions on her activities and her social contacts. Simon concludes that "the female is more enslaved to the species than the male, her animality is more manifest". 2. The male-dominated society and culture prescribe that dominance is the male temperament and subordination of the women. Women are assigned domestic service whereas men are the natural proprietors of religion, politics and other realms of cultural thought. 3. The Private/Public dialogue further extends to another dichotomy of the world of men and women. In a gender-hierarchically society, the private sphere popularly known as the domestic sphere has no economic, political or historical significance. The private sphere needs to be nourished with understanding, cooperation, care, selflessness and of course, bundles of emotions. On the other hand, the public sphere is a competitive world which requires being aggressive, reasonable and ambitions with no trace of emotions. This is because emotions are the greatest hindrance to the profit-making motive of the public sphere. Therefore, women who are in charge of the private sphere, stand in a subordinate position to men. The value of 178 NSOU • CC-PS-04 the labour put in household is never estimated; rather it is branded as useless, whereas the man in the public sphere is given more importance. Besides, the state has also closed its eyes to the gross injustice, taking place within the four walls of the domestic sphere, calling it 'personal'. This has resulted in the growing rates of wife-beating, dowry deaths and marital rapes and molestation of young girls by other male relatives. This is why feminists have blown the clarion call, "Personal is Political". Things get even worse with working women. 4. Women subjugation starts at family. The tradition of 'Stridhan' got transformed into dowry. Dowry became a nightmare for parents. Daughters became a burden to their parents. Birth of a daughter in a family is still despised. Daughters are 'Parayaadhan'. One fine morning, they would be married into another family with a substantial amount of dowry. Therefore, daughters are looked down upon. As she grows up, she is married off. Her education is stopped if at all she is studying. Once married she has reached the destination of her life. She starts another life again. It can be seen that in a family it is the womenfolk who fight among themselves. The mother-in-law is the greatest enemy of the daughter-in-law and daughters are deprived of many facilities that a son has access to. Thus, patriarchy in alliance with other institutions in the society formed a vicious circle of deprivation. The traditional way of thinking upholds the man as the 'breadwinner' and the woman as the 'bread maker'. They have also been labeled as the fountainhead of affection and care, but in return, they are not reciprocated with such love and attention. They are required to maintain silence to all kinds of injustice else she would be branded as a 'bad woman'. Things get extremely difficult for women who are working outside home because they have to bear the double burden of domestic work as well as work-place. The facts mentioned above signal that "the scales of world's equality are out of balance. The side marked 'women' is weighed down with responsibility, while the side marked 'men' rides high with power.....". So, violence against women is the manifestation of historically unequal power relations between men and women. Women's increasing demand for freedom and equality still meets with violent resistance from conservative social forces reinforced by neo-liberal policies and socio-economic processes. The incidence of violence against women has intensified and become more pervasive in the recent past. It has taken on more brutal forms, like NSOU • CC-PS-04 179 the deaths of the Delhi Gang rape victim and the suicide of the 17 year-old victim in Chandigarh. The recent even in Unnao in U.P. and Hyderabad points to the heinous acts of violence against women in recent times.

16.5 Status of Women in Ancient India From ancient to modern period, women's conditions – socially, politically and economically, has not remained same and it kept changing with times. In ancient India, women were having equal status with men; in early Vedic period, they were very educated and the women scholars like Gargi, Moitroyi, Lopamudra, contributed many hymns to Rig-Veda. Not only the scholarship was the hall mark of the Vedic women, friendly behavior with her husband earned her much reputation in society. But with the coming of famous treatise of Manu i.e. Manusmriti, this bright picture of the Hindu women was dimmed and the status of women was relegated to a subordinate position to man. All kinds of discriminatory practices started to take form such as child marriage, devadasi pratha, nagar vandhu system, sathi pratha etc. Women's socio-political rights were curtailed and they were made fully dependent upon the male members of family. Their right to education, right to work and right to decide for themselves were taken away. Like the women of the Vedic age, the women of epic period also enjoyed an honorable status. The classical epics of India; 'Ramayana' and 'Mahabharata' used to treat women with great honour. 'Sita' of 'Ramayana' and 'Draupadi' of 'Mahabharata' represent two different aspects of feminine ethos in ancient India. The period of Medieval India has been depicted as a dark period of Indian history. This period was a disappointing phase as far as the status of women was concerned. With the firm grip of Brahmanism in society after the death of Harshavardhan, her freedom was curtailed, reducing the status of women to that of an appendage of man. The revival of 'Sati', the prohibition of remarriage, the spread of 'Purdah' and the greater prevalence of polygamy made her position very bad. Though the 'Bhakti' movement gave a new life to women, but in the economic structure of the society women continued to hold low status.

16.6 Status of Women during British Rule The establishment of British Rule made metamorphic changes in the Indian social system. Along with the advent of Western ideas, education was one of the field

180 NSOU • CC-PS-04 to which the British attached special importance. In fact, it is the British rule which provided for equal opportunities in education to women in India. The British in collaboration with the 19th century social reformers, attempts were made to do away with the evils like child marriage, 'Sati' system, 'Devadasi' system, 'Purdah' system, prohibition of widow remarriage etc. The important forces which were responsible for the betterment of status of women during the British period were a change in the attitudes and values and stress on quality of life and individual freedom. The great reformers like Raja Ram Mohan Roy, Iswar Chandra Vidyasagar, Maharshi Karve, Jyotiba Phule, Dayanand Saraswati, Swami Vivekananda, Dedabhai Naorji, Gopal Krishna Gokhale, Mahatma Gandhi and others played pioneering role. The women leaders like Sister Nivedita, Anne Besant, Sarojini Naidu, and Ramabai Ranade. Toru Datta, Kamalabai Chattopadhyaya, Swarna Kumari Devi, Raj Kumari, Amrit Kaur and so on are of immense importance. Thus, in order to raise the status of women, the British rule led to number of socio-religious reforms in the country.

16.7 Women in the Freedom Movement

The Indian women participated in the freedom movement as good partners of their male counterparts for the recognition of their identity in the political sphere. Women took the challenge of standing peacefully against the atrocities of the British forces. The peaceful protest of Mahatma Gandhi not only trained a large number of women in Satyagraha and Ahimsa but also made them committed that participation became a necessity for the success of struggle against British might. Swadeshi Movement could not have succeeded without help of women. The year of 1914 witnessed the beginning of the First World War. During this period, women had started taking interest in civil and political matters concerning India. Annie Besant and Sarojini Naidu took part in the movement. Annie Besant prepared the ground for Home League agitation (1914-1915) in which women played a prominent part. During the Baroda Satyagraha of 1923-24 and the Bardoli Satyagraha of 1928, the participation and support of women was memorable. In the 'no tax campaign' and the Dandi March, the saga of women' heroic participation was overwhelming.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 181 As early as 1917, the Indian women raised the issue of representation in politics which meant a demand for universal adult franchise. By 1929 women had the right to vote on the basis of wifehood, property and education. Apart from the participation of women, during the freedom movement, various social legislations also played important role in uplifting the status of women. These legislations were related to marriage, property rights and employment opportunities under the Government. The prevention of Sati Act 1829, The Widow Remarriage Act, 1856, The Special Marriage Act, 1872, The Child Marriage Restraint Act, 1929, The Married Women's Property Act, 1874 and the Hindu Women's Right to Property Act, 1939 were passed.

16.8 Post-Independent Period : Women and the Constitution of India

During the freedom Movement, almost all the leaders of the freedom struggle were of the view that women should be given equal status in the free India and all types of discriminatory practices must stop. And for that to happen, the founding fathers of the constitution thought to include such affirmative action and policies in the provisions of the constitution of India that would help eliminate age-ole exploitative customs and traditions and also such provisions which would help in empowering women socially, economically and politically. The status of Indian women has radically changed since independence. India's constitution makers and our founding fathers were very determined to provide equal rights to both women and men. The constitution of India is one of the finest documents in the world. It provides provisions to secure equality in general and gender equality in particular. The adoption of the constitution on 26th November, 1949 and its coming into force on 26th January, 1950 can be considered as a remarkable achievement with regard to emancipation and empowerment of women. Various articles in the constitution, several laws, legislations, policies and institutional reforms have been enacted to carry out the gender action plan for the development of women.

Preamble : The preamble to the constitution of India assures justice, social, economic and political; equality of status and opportunity and dignity to the individual. Thus, it treats both men and women equal.

182 NSOU • CC-PS-04 Fundamental Rights : The policy of women empowerment is well documented in the Fundamental Rights in our constitution. For instance, Article 14 ensures to women the right to equality. Article 15(1) specifically prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex. Article 15(3) empowers the state to take affirmative actions in favor of women. The purpose of Article 15(3) is to eliminate the socio-economic backwardness of women and to empower them in such a manner as to bring about effective equality between men and women. Similarly, Article 15(1) and 15(2) prevents the state from making any discriminatory law on the basis of gender alone. Article 16 provides for equality of opportunity for all citizens in matters relating to employment or appointment to any office. Article 21 of the constitution states "No person shall be deprived of his life or personal liberty except according to the procedure established by law". This article is the backbone for the protection and promotion of women rights. For example, the apex court in a series of cases held that right to life enshrined in Article 21 meaning something more than survival or animal existence. (State of Maharashtra v. Chandrabhan, 1983). It included the right to live with human dignity. This article has been interpreted over the years to provide speedy trial, especially in cases of rape, free legal aid, health care, education, protection of insane persons. Article 21(A) provides right to free and compulsory education to the children of both sexes, looking into the socio-economic set up of the Indian society it can be said that the girl child will be more benefited from this act. The state in pursuance of the above provision has enacted the Suppression of Immoral Traffic in women Act, 1956 which has been recently amended, is known as the PITA. Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act, 1976, the indecent representation of Women (Prohibition) Act, 1986 etc. are the milestone in ensuring the dignity of Indian Women. Sexual harassment at workplace is a violation of Article 21 of the constitution. This verdict was made by the apex court of the country in the case of Vishaka v. State of Rajasthan and laid down detailed direction and guidelines on the subject which are to be strictly observed by all employees, public or private. Right to life is now recognized as a basic human right. It has to be read in consonance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948, the Declaration on the elimination of violence against women and the Declaration and Covenants of Civil and Political Rights and the covenants of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights to which India is a party having ratified them. Article 21 also states that rape violates the right of women.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 183 For centuries, women have been humiliated, exploited, tortured and harassed in all walks of life- physically, mentally and sexually. To safeguard and protect women against exploitation, Article 23(1) of the constitution prohibits traffic in human beings and beggar and other similar form of forced labour. "Traffic in human beings" means selling and buying human beings as slaves and also includes traffic in women and children for immoral or other purposes. In pursuance of this Article, the state of Andhra Pradesh abolished the Devadasis (Prohibition and Dedication) Act, 1988. These rights being fundamental are justifiable in court and the Government is obliged to follow the same. 16.9 Role of Directive Principles of State Policy in Protecting the Rights of Women Although the Directive Principles of State Policy are not enforceable by the Court, they are fundamental principle for guidance to the various organs of the state. However, in recent time, judiciary has broadened the concept of directive principles and given a wider definition to them. Article 39, provides that the citizens, men and women, equally have the right to an adequate means of livelihood; that there is equal pay for equal work for both men and women; that the health and strength of workers, men and women, are not abused and that citizens are not forced by economic necessity to enter a vocation unsuited to their age and strength. In furtherance of these principles, suitable provisions have been included in various Labour Laws passed from time to time e.g. the Equal Remuneration Act, 1976, the Factories Act, 1948, the Mines Act, 1952 and several other statutes. In this regard, various international Labour Conventions and recommendations of International Labour Organization (ILO) have been kept in view. Article 42 provides that the state is to make provision for securing just and humane conditions of work and for maternity relief.

The cumulative effect of these articles is that “the state is under obligation to provide suitable legislation to ensure just and humane conditions in various industries and maternity benefits to women”.

Other Constitutional Provisions Though 73 rd and 74 th constitutional amendments of 1993, a milestone in the history of India have been achieved not only in the sphere of decentralisation but it paved the way for empowering the poor people as well as women. With this amendment, women were given 33.33 per cent reservation in seats at different levels of elections in local governance i.e. Panchayat, Block and Municipality elections. It also reserved no less than one-third of seats of Chairpersons at any level for women. Many commentators remarked that in the light of the marginalisation of women in Indian polity, reservation of one-third seats for women at this level marks a significant turning point giving voices to the “emerging millions” who constitute nearly half of the population. But the constitution 81 st Amendment Bill was introduced in the Parliament way back in 1996 to reserve one-third of seats for women in Parliament and state legislatures. But the fate of the bill is still pending. The Bill in its current form envisages reserving 181 seats out of 543 in the Parliament for women. Securing 33% reservation for women in opening the doors of opportunity for political empowerment to almost 50% of our population has been a dream for many visionaries in India. If the Bill gets cleared it will go a long way in ensuring political equality through active participation of women from both urban and rural areas. In this respect, affirmative action would help women to get their fair place in the political bodies to right the wrong and change the societal imbalance. Apart from those constitutional provisions for women’s cause, Indian plan documents emphasised on women issues or welfare. The Second Five Year Plan 1956-61, recognised special needs of women workers such as maternity benefit and facilities for their children. It also suggested the implementation of the principle of NSOU • CC-PS-04 185 equal play for equal work and training to women in order to enable them to complete for better paid jobs. The fifth plan 1974-79 overlapped with the UN International Decade for women (1976-85) and for the first time there was a shift in the approach from women 'welfare' to 'development'. But the concept of women's development received recognition as a specific development sector for the first time in the Sixth Plan (1980-85) in which a separate chapter on 'Women and Development' was provided. The plan conceived of a multi-pronged strategy for women's development including: employment and economic independence; education; access to health care and family planning; support services to meet practical gender needs; and the creation of an enabling policy and institutional and legal environment. In the Seventh Plan (1985-90) emphasis was shifted again from 'development' to 'empowerment' of women. Consequently, in 2001, National Policy for Women Empowerment was adopted (1) To create an environment so that women feel involved in the making of economic and social policies (2) To give equal share in social, economic and political aspects (3) To remove discriminations against women by enacting various laws and (4) To encourage equal treatment of women in the society. It may be mentioned that the year 2001 was declared as The Year of Women empowerment. After conferring some positive discriminatory policies in the constitution, steps were taken to reform the laws which were violating the right to equality on the ground of sex. The Hindu Code Bill was brought before the Parliament. In 1955 and 1956, it was decided to pass the Bill in piecemeal and four enactments viz. the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, the Hindu Succession Act, 1956, the Hindu Adoption and Maintenance Act, 1956, the Hindu Minority and Guardianship Act, 1956 were passed. The object of these enactments was to bring about a change in status and position of Hindu Women and put them at par with men in the matrimonial home. Several Acts were also passed for the improving of the conditions of women from time to time. These are: (1) Dowry Prohibition Act, 1961. (2) Contract Labour Act 1970 as well as Factories Act, 1948, provides that women cannot be employed in the night between 9 p.m. to 6 a.m. Women cannot be required to work more than 9 hours. (3) Equal Remuneration Act, 1976. (4) The Indecent Representation of Women (Prohibition) Act, 1986. (5) The commission of Sati (Prevention) Act, 1987 (6) Protection of women from Domestic Violence Act, 2005 (7) Maternity Benefit Act, 1961 (8) Child Marriage Prohibition Act, 1929 (9) The Medical Termination of Pregnancy Act, 1971 (10) The Preconception and Prenatal Diagnostic Techniques (Regulation and Prevention of Misuse) Act, 1994 (11) The sexual harassment of women at workplace (Prevention, Protection) Act, 2013.

The Ministry of Women and Child Development is the nodal agency for all matters pertaining to welfare, development and empowerment of women. It has evolved schemes and programmes for their benefit. These schemes are spread across a very wide spectrum such as women's need for shelter, security, safety, legal aid, justice, information, maternal health, food, nutrition etc. as well as their need for economic sustenance through skill development, education and access to credit and marketing. Besides the above legislations, The Indian Penal Code, 1860, the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 and Indian Evidence Act, 1872 along with other 54 major legislations are in existence to protect and promote women rights. The lives of millions of women worldwide are affected by violence. During the Fourth World Conference September, 1995 on women in Beijing, the Governments declared that "violence against women constitutes a violation of basic human rights and is an obstacle to the achievement of the objectives of peace, equality and development". But the alarming global dimensions of female-targeted violence were not explicitly acknowledged by the international community until the UN Convention on Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against women (CEDAW) in 1993.

Now UN in its specialised organs has been making efforts towards ending violence against women. India has set up in pursuance of the protection of Human Rights Act of 1993, the National Human Rights Commission. It deals with the backlog of women cases for violation of their human rights. As a watchdog of women's issue, the National Commission for Women (New) was formed to monitor the Government's non-implementation of laws enacted to provide protection to women. It is a statutory body concerned with advising the Government on all policy matters affecting women. The constitution of India guarantees to women equality in all spheres, besides making special provision for them. Progressive legislations by successive governments have sought to undo the injustice of the past. And yet, even today there is a great big gap between her 'de jure' and 'de facto' status. In India, the census report reveals that female population has been steadily declining since 1901. The data on sex composition are not only a demographic characteristics but sex ratio is an important social indicator of prevailing equity

188 NSOU • CC-PS-04 between males and females in a society at a given point of time. In India, the sex- ratio of the human population can be seen from Table – 1. Table – 1 Sex – Ratio of Females Years No. of Females per thousand Percentage of Decline/Increase Males 1901 972 ——— 1911 964 0.82 (–) 1921 955 0.93 (–) 1931 950 0.52 (–) 1941 945 0.53 (–) 1951 946 0.10 (+) 1961 9412 0.53 (–) 1971 930 1.17 (–) 1981 934 0.43 (+) 1991 927 0.75 (–) 2001 933 0.64 (+) 2011 943 1.07 (+) Source : Census of India – 2011. Table–1 point out that the sex-ratio has been falling almost continuously since 1901. However, except the sex-ratio in 1981, 2001 and 2011 recorded a marginal increase, otherwise, from 1901 to 2001, the female population has decreased (from 972 to 933). Though India's 2001 and 2011 censuses show increase of female sex- ratio from 933 to 943 per 1000 males, it is far below the world average of 986 and much lesser than that of the advanced countries like the US (1029), Japan (1041) and the developing countries like Brazil (1025) and Indonesia (1004). The reasons for declining sex-ratio of females are accounted for differential mortality between males and females, sex selective migration and manifestation of patriarchal ideology resulting in discriminatory treatment towards females. The pre- natal tests to eliminate unwanted girls link the persistence of difference between males and females sex-ratio. The mortality rate among females across all ages was

NSOU • CC-PS-04 189 6.2 and that among male was 7.1 in 2014. But in the same year, the infant mortality rate (IMR) of females was 40 while that of males was 37. The rate of decline in the IMR of females was faster than that of IMR among males. The urban mothers received 1.27 times more medical attention at the time of delivery as compared to rural mothers (urban 93.2%, rural 73.2%). Due to medical health facilities the life expectancy for females was 69.6 years and for males was 66.4 year during the period 2010-2014 depicting higher life expectancy of females as compared to males. Despite higher life expectancy of females, in society they are still discriminated as more than 70,000 fetuses were killed through medical tests and a considerable number of women dying before they attain the age of 40, higher than that of males. 16.12 Literacy and Education Despite constitutional provisions and legislations, as per Census 2011, the literacy rate at all India level was 72.98% and the literacy rate for females and males are 64.63% and 80.9% respectively. Adult education rate of females and males in the age of 15+ years at the all-India level was 76% and that among males were 78.8% and females was 59.3%. Rural-urban gap existed in adult literacy for both females and males. In rural areas was 50.6% vis-a-vis 76.9% in urban areas whereas for males the same in rural areas was 74.1% vis-a-vis 88.3% in urban areas. So, it appears that in adult literacy rate, females are lagging behind males, though in the Gross Enrolment Ratio during 2014-15 at primary level females are more ahead than their male counterpart. The enrolment of females and males at the primary level is 101.4 and 98.9 respectively, at middle class level the corresponding figures are 95.3 and 87.7 and at the secondary level, the status was at 65.8 and 63.8 respectively. The number of females per 100 males in University education in major disciplines was highest in Medicine (90.9), followed by Arts (86), Science (72.7), Commerce (67.3) and Engineering and Technical (40.3). In spite of this change in the trend towards higher literacy rate among women, some other problems have cropped up. There are regional differences. In states like Kerala, Karnataka and Maharashtra, high rate of women education are found to be satisfactory, whereas in states like Bihar, Orissa, Madhya Pradesh, women education rate is not optimistic. In higher, middle and high schools a substantial increase was reported but as per data furnished by the Ministry of Education, New Delhi, a significant drop outs occurred between the age group of 6 – 14 years among women/ females in middle and high schools.

190 NSOU • CC-PS-04 16.13 Women Participation in Economy It is true that relatively a large number of women are entering the employment sector. In 2011, the Workforce Participation Rate at all-India level was 25.51% for female and 53.26% for males. While there was no rural-urban gap for males (53%), but there was considerable rural-urban gap for females-rural 30%, urban 15.4%. The 6th Economic Census (2013-14) showed that 21.49% of the rural establishments are owned by females and 18.29% of the workers employed in establishments are females. As per 2011 census, in 2011-12, the rural work force participation rate for females 24.8 and 54.3 for males in rural areas. Whereas such female and male figure in urban areas stood at 14.7 and 54.6 respectively. Thus, it reveals the fact that majority of women who are ready to work are not finding work. Despite their commendable service in various fields, they are still marginalised and discriminated. As a result they are now engaged in agriculture and unorganised sector in large number. 16.14 Political Participation of Women Women’s participation in the political process is critical both to the strengthening of democracy and to their struggle against oppression. The Government of India has declared the year 2001 as the year for the Empowerment of Women but the struggle to reach the stage is yet to be fulfilled. Empowerment contains the word ‘Power’. The control of power leads to control over resources and control of ideology. So, the entry of a large number of women into decision making process can rapidly change the existing situation. The involvement of women at different levels is bound to have positive impact on public policy. Women issues will be transformed into societal issues. The most critical role for women will be to resist inequality and injustice not merely for women, but for all.

Our constitution gives equal rights to women. They are participating in the election process as voters, as candidates contesting election, in deliberations in state assemblies and national parliament and holding public offices at different levels. Yet, politics proved to be very inhospitable terrain for women and continues to be the male bastion into which the entry of women is severely restricted. The question of reservation of seats was left to the National Perspective Plan for women to take up. It recognised that political participation of women is severely restricted and suggested that a 30% quota for women be introduced at all levels of

NSOU • CC-PS-04 191 elective bodies. The entire issue took on a political hue as it became a moot point whether the introduction of reservation at the level of Panchayats and urban local bodies was really meant to give increased representation to women or a populist measure aiming to create women’s constituency at a time when the Congress Party needed to resurrect its image. These doubts notwithstanding, the 73 rd and 74 th Amendments to the Indian Constitution in 1992 and 1993 which provided for 33% reservation for women in Panchayats and urban local bodies. These amendments as a strategy of affirmative action served as a major breakthrough towards ensuring women’s equal access and increased participation in political power structures. Political participation and grassroots democracy have been strengthened considerably by the 73 rd and 74 th Constitutional Amendments that have created new democratic institutions for local governance. The last 20 or more years of Panchayati raj in India have seen many women go from strength to strength in terms of their political participations. Of the 28 lakh elected Panchayat representatives, around 10 lakh or 46% up to 2016 are estimated to be women. Women have, however, not found adequate representation in the Lok Sabha. The percentage of elected women Lok Sabha members has not exceeded 12%. Table- 2 shows representation of women in Lok Sabha since 1952. Table-2 shows that representation of women in Lok Sabha works out to only 36.87 and average percentage of women representation in Lok Sabha is not more than 6.91 per cent. The presence of women in the Upper House (Rajya Sabha) has been slightly higher over-all probably due to indirect elections and nomination of some women members. It was highest in 1990 at 15.5% and shows a declining trend thereafter. It is significant to note that the Deputy Chairperson of the Rajya Sabha at least for more than 25 years has been a woman, yet women face increasing competition from male politicians for nomination. The highest number of women contestants has been merely 636 in 2014, while the number of male contestants has always been on the increase, the highest being 13,353 in 1996. Yet, it is interesting to note that the percentage of winners among women has consistently been more than that of the men, notwithstanding the fact that more often the losing seats are offered to women candidates by the respective political parties. For instance, in 1996, only 3.8% of male candidates won in comparison to 6.7% of female candidates. Likewise, the percentage of winners was 11.2% for men and 15.7% for women in 1998, 12.3% and 17.3% in 1999, 6.44% and 10.61% in 2009 and 6.39% and 9.74% respectively in 2014 (16th Lok Sabha). The representation of women in the Union Council of Ministers between 1985 and 2014 as shown in Table-5 is dismal. The data show that women have remained underrepresented in the Council of Ministers. Since Independence, India had so far 15 Women Chief Ministers and 23 women Governors. Only one woman served as President of India but no women as Vice-President. In 2015, the share of women judges in Supreme Court was 4% (1 out of 26) and it was 10% (54 out of 517) considering all High Courts in India. The scenario of women representation at the State Legislature Assemblies in different states of India is far from satisfactory. There are a few instances of women holding portfolios of finance, industry etc. And are relegated them to 'women specific' departments. 196 NSOU • CC-PS-04 The Table–6 reveals that the highest percentage of women in Legislative Assemblies has been in West Bengal 13.92% in 2016 followed by Madhya Pradesh, Haryana and Andhra Pradesh, 13.00, 10.00 and 9.2 respectively. The lowest or zero percentage of women in Legislative Assembly is in Nagaland in 2013. The lack of adequate representation of women in State Legislative Assemblies in India except a few states is not up to the expectation considering their position in population. Thus, it is seen that despite constitutional guarantee of equality, women still are not equal with men. The sphere of politics is still dominated by men. The success of affirmative policies taken to ensure women’s position and dignity in society is still a distant dream. 16.15 New Problems of Women The age-old problems of Indian Women such as child marriage, ‘Sati’ system, Prohibition on widow remarriage, ‘Purdah’ system, and ‘Devadasi’ system have almost disappeared. But their disappearance have now given place for some other problems of modern times such as atrocities against women, rape, dowry, harassment of women, sexual harassment and death, immoral traffic, torture, sexual harassment of employed women etc. Despite draconian legislations in favour of women, these problems have made it difficult for women to lead an equal life with men. There has been a constant increase in the violence against women and hardly a day passes without reports in the newspapers. Violence on women creates harmful physical and emotional impact on the victims leading to the death of the victim. According to the National Crime Records Bureau (NCRB), the crimes against women rose from 3,793 per million in 2016 to 3,886 per million in 2017. This means, 100 more crimes took place per million people in 2017 compared to previous year. Though crimes such as murders and rapes have somewhat come down, other forms of violence are on the rise. The states like Karnataka, Kerala, Tamil Nadu, Punjab and West Bengal showed a decrease in crime rates, but in other states such as Uttar Pradesh with 16.8% share of country’s female population has reported nearly 10.9% of total crimes committed against women at all India level, by registering 35,527 cases. Delhi UT has reported the highest crime rate 184.3% compared to 56.3% at all India level during the year 2015, followed by Assam 148.2%, Telangana 83.1%, Odisha 81.9%, Rajasthan 81.5%, Haryana 75.7% and West Bengal 73.4%. The fastest rate of growth of crimes among all states in India is Delhi as it shows 11,500 crimes reported per million. Crime head-wise cases committed against women can be summarised in the Table–7 below :

NSOU • CC-PS-04 197 Table–7 Year wise Status of Crimes Committed against Women Crime Head 2014 2015 2016 %share in % increase in 2016 last one year Rape 36735 34651 38947 11% 125 Kidnapping & 57311 59277 64519 19% 09% Abduction Cruelty by Husband 122877 113403 110378 33% –3% & Relatives Dowry Death 10050 9894 9683 3% –2% Assault on Women 82235 82422 84746 25% 3% with intent to outrage her modesty Insult to the modesty 9735 8685 7305 2% –16% of Women Total Crime against 337922 327394 338954 100% 4% Women Source – NCRB – 2016. Table–7 shows that more or less crime against women in some forms or other has been on the increase. The brutal rape and murder of the veterinary doctor in Hyderabad followed by killing of four rapists in a Police encounter has stirred the conscience of the nation. In July 2019, a young woman who accused Uttar Pradesh Lawmaker Kuldeep Singh Sengar of raping her in 2017 is a blot on the nation. Similarly in December 5, 2019, a 23 year old rape victim is set ablaze by a gang of men in Unnao district in UP has seriously disturbed the public mind in the country. Though after the 2012 Nirbhaya Case in Delhi, in an effort to assuage mounting public anger, the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 2013 was passed by Parliament containing stringent provisions of punishment for rape and further, the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 2018 provided death penalty for the rapists, unfortunately, the stringent legal provisions did not reduce the incidence of rape in the country. In India, it is also a fact that a large number of rape cases are either unreported or unregistered. The delay in court cases has proved to be counter-productive. Consequently, there is now a growing demand for setting up special courts for trial of rape cases and other violence against women.

198 NSOU • CC-PS-04 So, it may be reiterated that side by side with the constitutional and legal provisions, social awakening as well as the consistent and honest efforts on the part of people's representatives and social leaders are required to persuade people to accept new challenges and situations giving women a respectable and meaningful social status. In this direction, building of powerful women organisations from the national to the grassroots level is of imperative necessity to protect their rights and opportunities in India. 16.16 Conclusion In our patriarchal society, the beliefs that women have secondary status and they play inconsequential role, are mainly responsible for the low status of women. In the past, women could enjoy equal status with men. But over the years, the status of women has been reduced to the appendages of men. Despite constituting almost 50% of the total population, women have always been subjected to inequality, discrimination, exploitation, subjugation and in many cases inhuman treatment at the hands of men. In independent India, various constitutional and legislative measures have been adopted to provide women equal status in society. But instead of improving their status, they are still under represented in the political structures of India. In modern times, women have been facing the increasing incidences of violence. This violence against women has to be perceived from a multi-dimensional perspective. In order to mitigate this social evil, the constitutional guarantee and legislative measures are not enough. The creation of suitable awareness among women is disappointing in this respect. To curb violence against women, the investigating machinery, criminal justice system, welfare and voluntary organisations and above all the general public should play effective and concerted role. There is urgency to change our values and belief system including the attitude like that woman is the asset of a man. In this task, the women organisations and movements can to a great extent go a long way in establishing balance between men and women in India. 16.17 Summing Up • Women's welfare has become the focal point in the development programme NSOU • CC-PS-04 199 in India. While women have made significant advances in many societies, still women's concerns are given second priority almost everywhere. Women represent 50 per cent of the world adult population and a third of official labour force, they perform nearly two thirds of all working hours, receive only a tenth of world income and own less than one per cent of the world property. • In India, despite developmental planning and special status accorded through affirmative action, there has not been a substantial qualitative improvement in the large majority of women living particularly in rural areas. Moreover, women in fact, continue to remain invisible and marginalized in decision- making bodies, leading to lack of a feminist perspective in political decision- making. 16.18 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. Discuss the salient features of the status of women in India. 2. Describe the affirmative policies as enshrined in the Constitution of India. 3. Examine the major Legislative measures in combating the violence against women. Long Questions : 1. Explain the Political Participation and representation of Women in India. 2. Analyse the major causes of violence against women. 3. Identify the role of the Directive Principles of State Policy in protecting rights of women. Short Questions : 1. Introduction Social structure in India is undeniably the most stratified society in the world. In this social stratification, there exists the differentiation of the population into hierarchically superimposed classes manifested in the existence of upper and lower layers. The basis and essence of stratification are construed by an unequal distribution of rights and privileges, duties and responsibilities, social values and privation, social power and influences among the members of society. The caste, kinship, occupational groups, factory and administrative structures that constitute distinctive fields of social interaction reflect the structural realities. Innumerable particularities of values, customs and cultures are underlying the structural realities and form their basis. The real picture of social stratification of India is very complex. In these complexities, apart from class, caste as an important social institution is predominant in social structure. Despite modernization, urbanization and industrialization, physical labour and intellectual work are decided by the accident of birth. The upper caste avoids labour work and receives all the authority upon the production created by the lower caste menial work. Instead of breaking down, caste still persists in the process of continuity and change in India. The caste system, apart from birth, is based on the concepts of purity and pollution, superior and inferior position. It is associated with religion. Four varnas are described in the religion. Moreover, caste is completely a psychological concept having no scientific base. Yet, caste has emerged as the dreadful denomination of socio-political mobilization in post-colonial Indian society. According to the Indian Marxist thinkers, the institution of class did not exist prior to the British rule.

Hence, caste is a pre-class institution of exploitation and administration in India. With the colonial regime, two modes of production, that of caste and class, came to co-exist with each other. But ever since the issue of Mandal Commission reservations in governmental jobs for the OBCS, it came to the national agenda in 1989. Since then it has left an impact on the evolution of national politics. For Marxist or a Communist, the two modes of production or a mechanical distinction between caste and class is not only a vulgar simplification but divorced from the present day Indian reality.

The caste

204 NSOU • CC-PS-04 stratification of our society is something that has come down to us from centuries. Despite all the refinement and changes within castes and between castes that have taken place over the years, the basic structure in society so far as the oppression of the dalits or the backward castes is concerned remains. It is within this social stratification that class formation is taking place. Capitalism is still developing in India and the process of the development of society divided into modern capitalist classes, is taking shape constantly within the existing caste stratification. The question is, therefore, not one of class versus caste. It is the formation of classes under modern capitalism within the inherited caste structure. To a large extent, the most exploited classes in our society constitute the most socially oppressed castes. And to that extent, the struggle against class exploitation and the struggle against social oppression complement each other. With the advent of modernization under the British rule, particularly the railways and western education, many including Karl Marx, had thought that the old order would crumble paving the way for a class division of modern society. However, this did not happen as envisaged. It was so because it was not in the interest of the colonial rule to transform Indian society. Its interest lay in exploiting the Indian people and its economy on the basis of their backwardness. This required keeping the rural land relations intact, in class terms, modifying them only to advance colonial revenue collections without disturbing the economic or social relations. The British also required that a powerful indigenous Indian capitalist class does not arise. The result was an alliance with the feudal landlords for its political survival and the superimposition of minimum modern capitalist relations on the existing feudal land relations which sustained the caste system. At Independence, all these currents put together had created a situation where the tasks of democratic revolution- chiefly the agrarian revolution remained unfulfilled under the bourgeois leadership of the freedom struggle that compromised with landlordism. The process gets manifested in a concrete expression in post-independent India. The Indian bourgeoisie in order to capture state power compromised with imperialism on the one hand and compromised with landlordism and semi-feudal forces on the other. Thus, instead of sweeping away the feudal and semi-feudal land relations along with the anti-colonial and anti-imperialist struggle, the ruling classes perpetuated these relations including caste structure and institutions. Consequently, the centrality of caste as an agent of politics and its dominant role in Indian socio-political life have neither been removed nor firmly challenged. Rather, recognition of caste through affirmative policies as a socio-political change

NSOU • CC-PS-04 205 by the Mandal Commission and caste-centric socio-political movements of the 1980s and 1990s, such as Dalit and Backward class movements have not only enlivened new debates in India, but have reinforced a caste-centric public-political life, giving it a modern value and a secular purpose. But the demands and recognition of backward classes for reservation was partly an expression of upwardly mobile lower cultivators' efforts to challenge the literate upper castes or what may be called as challenge to the upper classes in India. Whatever may be the fact, it is clear that class has yet to become a reality as in advanced capitalist societies, the basis of mobilization because of the underdeveloped capitalist economy and importance of primordial group identities like caste, religion and ethnicity as the bases of political action.

17.3 Conceptualizing Class : Interlinkages of Caste and Class

The word 'class' refers to economic divisions in society. It is derived from Latin word 'classis'. Class refers to a set of phenomena with common attributes. It connotes a set of shared economic, political and cultural attributes. Both Sociology and Economics normally use the term to refer to certain kind of shared characteristics which are essentially economic. Marxists, Weberians and many Sociologists are of the opinion that foundations of class lie in the economic realm. But Karl Marx and Max Weber are widely recognized as the most influential commentators on class. Karl Marx's interpretation of 'class' is useful because he scientifically analyzed the economic basis of classes and the antagonistic relations between them. He defines classes in terms of their relation to the means of production. He divides the society into two broad categories: the capitalist and the proletariat. Capitalists are the owner of the means of production and the proletariat work for wage or salary. They possess only labour power. Thus, Marx's concept of social classes is basically in terms of the system of production. On the basis of the idea of Marx about class, the theory of class conflict/ struggle had been evolved and lies at the core of the Marxian critique of the capitalist mode of production and the ultimate demise of the capitalist societies. In the strict Marxian parlance, class is understood as a group of people standing in a common relationship to the means of production. Ordinarily, the ownership of wealth along with the particular type of occupation are seen to be the two major components on which the various classes in the society are differentiated.

206 NSOU • CC-PS-04 Applying this notion of class in the historical perspective, Lenin defines classes 'as large groups of people which differ from each other (1) By the place they occupy in a historically determined system of social production; (2) By their relation to the means of production; (3) By their role in the social organization of labour, and consequently, (4) By the dimensions and mode of acquiring the share of social wealth'. In Marxian perspective, class is defined absolutely in terms of its relation to the economic parameters prevailing in the society. Marx claims that the class which owns the means of production can determine the character of a society. Though classes are defined by their common economic position, an essential condition for the existence of a class, according to Marx, is that there must be an element of class consciousness an elementary sense of common interest and shared opposition to other classes. A class may exist 'in itself' without being a class 'for itself'. Marx clarifies that a class which has come into being but is not yet conscious of its fundamental interests is a class in itself. When it becomes aware of its real community of interest manifesting in practice and organizes itself, it is then a class for itself. This subjective dimension of class is very important, for, as Marx wrote in the 18th Brumaire, the vast mass of peasants living in similar conditions but without entering into manifold relations with one another do not form a class. Without class consciousness a class has no more than a potential existence. In fine, to be class the 'objective' common economic situation must be supplemented by 'subjective' class consciousness of common interest in order to wage a common battle against other common special interests which are antagonistic. Thus, the individual is born into a particular class, just as he is born into a particular caste. The position upon a person is forced by birth in the caste system. In the class system, an individual in his life time may rise and fall in the class hierarchy. He may acquire upper or lower position with a particular economic or occupational role. There is a possibility for upward mobility for an individual in the class system which is not so in the caste system. Max Weber, a German Sociologist, built his theory of class on Marx's analysis, but he modified and elaborated it. He accepts Marx's view that economic relations form the basis of class. But Weber conceptualized class as a product of the economic relations in society being conditioned by the factors like 'status' and 'party' (power+ prestige) in society. Status refers to the differences between social groups in the social honour or prestige they are given by others. Status groups are groups of people sharing a

NSOU • CC-PS-04 207 similar status, e.g. doctors, teachers, castes and sub-castes in traditional Hindu society. Possession of wealth normally tends to confer high status, but they are exceptions. Weber cites the case of the newly rich businessman who does not possess the education or culture but commands high status. Whereas class is objectively given, status depends on people's subjective evaluation of social differences. Classes derive from economic factors associated with property and earnings, status are governed by differences in 'styles of life' groups follow. In short, status groups are stratified according to the principles of their consumption of goods as represented by special 'styles of life'. If the above conceptualizations of class as an economic group and caste as a status group as provided by Marx and Weber are used, it could hardly capture the social reality in India. While Sociologists and political scientists consider both class and caste to be important in the Indian social system, they do not however, share similar views regarding their similarities, dissimilarities and mutual interlinks. Some scholars have the view that castes contain class within it and vice-versa. To unravel these caste-class connections or their distinctiveness it requires a glance at the logic of the viewpoints of the social scientists produced in India on the issue. The social scientists are not unanimous as to whether caste and class are synonymous or distinct entities. In pre-Mandal phase, caste-class relations were dominated by tradition and modernity characterized by exclusiveness of caste and class and fusion of caste and class. Those who believed in the dichotomy of tradition and modernity and tended to subscribe to cultural perspectives of caste, highlighted its uniqueness and favoured the exclusiveness of caste and class while others argued that caste and class belong to different social realities. They explained caste as a unique traditional phenomenon of Indian society and class as a universal phenomenon of modern society. Caste is portrayed as a backward social institution whereas class belongs to advanced industrial societies. Since tradition and modernity are perceived as mutually exclusive, caste and class maintain a distinct reality. They also pointed out that caste as a cultural practice maintains dominant ideas and values, such as pollution and purity, rules of social intercourse and endogamy while class linking itself to the ideology of individualism, competition and equality, put caste and class into polar opposites. Such scholars also considered caste as a closed and rigid system, whereas class is perceived as open and flexible. Therefore, in the caste system units of ranking are groups, status is ascribed and there is legitimacy of ritual hierarchy. In a class system, the units of rankings are individuals; status is achieved and legitimized through material achievements.

208 NSOU • CC-PS-04 Andre Beteille found caste-class convergence in his studies citing the fact that caste riots are often pronounced class conflicts between upper castes/class and lower castes/class. Caste conflicts, particularly attacks on landless low-caste labourers and their counterattacks, not only in feudal, backward and economically less developed states such as Bihar, but even more in modern capitalistically developed states like Punjab, Gujarat and Maharashtra, created reasons to believe that underlying factor behind such caste conflicts is the summation and articulation of class interests. So, these scholars view that tendency among the western scholars to locate class in Indian society at par with the early industrial society is meaningless. Clear polarization of classes, however, is not evident in the agrarian society in India. To a large extent, caste and class thus represent the same structural reality. Since caste incorporates class and class incorporates caste, they are overlapping with each other. Neither the caste view alone, and nor the class view on its own can explain the entire gamut of India's social reality.

17.4 Class Structure in India

Along with the traditional caste system, India's social structure is stratified along class lines. Historically, the British rule and its economic policies such as the introduction of new type of land tenure and a few machine-based industries to serve the interests of the Empire generated forces which created the basis for the emergence of new classes and strata hitherto unknown in Indian society: the capitalists included in it individuals, commercial and financial, working class living on wages in industrial and commercial establishments, and the English-educated middle classes such as lawyers, doctors, professors, journalists, managers and clerks in urban areas; zamindars, large estate owners, peasant proprietors divided into upper, middle and lower strata, absentee landlords, tenants and sub-tenants, agricultural labourers and money-lenders in the rural areas. The Indian working class, on the other hand, came to be formed by pauperized peasants and ruined village artisans. The process of self-organization of the workers was retarded for a long time mainly because of their cultural backwardness and caste and communal divisions. Nevertheless, during the first two decades, the workers developed trade union consciousness which was reflected in a series of strikes in a number of industrial centers for the fulfillment of their demands, even in the face of government repression. The most notable event, for example, was the working class strikes in Bombay and other industrial centers to protest against the infamous Rowlatt Act which ushered in the working class entry into the nationalist movement. The working class organization and consciousness reached a new stage with the entry of the communists and socialists. Since Independence, the attempt of the national government to industrialize the country on a capitalist basis with public and private sectors and to transform the backward village communities into a viable prosperous sector of the national economy had led to the reshuffling of the class structure. Changes occurred in the hierarchy of classes created during the British Raj. In the changes, some old classes were eliminated while some had been deeply entrenched and some new classes emerged. Inter-class and intra-class relations assumed a new dimension, especially it was found in the countryside. Class relations were very often mediated and determined through castes or jatis. On the basis of the criteria of the ownership of property in the means of production as well as occupation, income and status, the principal classes that are found today in India are : (i) the bourgeoisie comprising top industrial and business houses who have substantial holding of productive wealth but constitute only a small percentage of the total population (0.7%); (ii) the middle class which includes professionals and urban intellectuals including politicians, managers and other higher salaried executives in modern industry and commerce; (iii) lower middle class comprising small traders and shopkeepers, middle-level employees in government and public and private sectors, clerks and medium-level professionals; and (iv) working class (skilled manual workers, semi-skilled and unskilled manual workers) in the urban areas. But the peasantry constitutes by far the largest class. The peasantry are, however a highly heterogeneous social class comprising mainly (i) capitalist farmers or rich peasants who look upon agriculture as a business enterprise-the rural bourgeoisie; (ii) middle peasants who own or lease land which is operated by family labour as well as wage labour; (iii) poor peasants who often have to work as part-time labourers or share croppers; and (iv) landless peasants the rural proletariat. The landless peasants constitute a large segment of the agricultural population.

17.5 The Interplay of Caste and Class in Power Structure and Politics in India

The principal classes in our society, as mentioned above, have differential

210 NSOU • CC-PS-04 access to power and to understand the relation between caste and class and political system, it is required to examine the nature of the distribution of power in the wider political system and the nature of class-caste entry into politics. In Pursuit of Lakshmi, Rudolph and Rudolph have argued that India has a 'weak-strong state' and the Indian economy has its 'rich-poor quality'. Consequently, 'the historic adversaries of class politics, capital and labour, are politically marginal and the centrality of the political process is captured by the state'. Private capitalism in India depends on the state for its profits as well as for its security because the private sector is overshadowed by the public sector which occupies the economy's 'commanding heights'. So, the private capital does not have a strong public voice. No political party except the Swantra party opposed the Congress's project of a 'Socialistic pattern of society', because it was the Swantra party alone who favoured the private capital. This explanation assumes the autonomy or relative autonomy of the state and its leadership at Independence who are seen as not the creature of a dominant class, but acting relatively independently, from a powerful state and political base in adopting an economic development strategy they preferred. Class polarization between wage workers on the one hand and capitalist farmers in India's massive agriculture sector and rural society on the other, is constrained by the leading role played in production and politics by small-scale, self-employed 'bullock capitalists', cultivators who benefited from land reforms and the 'green revolution' and who rely more on family labour and their own human capital than on wage workers and machines. The bullock capitalists opposed both industrial capital (state and private) and urban workers in the name of remunerative prices and better terms of trade between the countryside and the city. Under such a situation, the Congress party which has been the principal aggregative force played centrist role- in amalgamating caste and class forces. Thus, the green revolution vastly expanded agricultural production generating surplus helping some parts of Northern India' whereas the vast stretches of many Indian states remained underdeveloped and poverty-stricken with the persistence of semi-feudal relations in agriculture. Hence, the bulk of the poor who are not only landless peasants and unorganized workers but also the SCs, backward classes and STs, remained marginalized and sidelined from the power structure and politics in India. The Marxist scholar, Pranab Bardhan, denied the existence of a single dominant NSOU • CC-PS-04 211 class in India's political system. He, instead, emphasizes multi-class hegemony. In his view, there are three dominant or 'proprietary' classes whose common interests and conflicts of interests have influenced the state policies since Independence. The three classes are the industrial bourgeoisie, and urban professional class and the rural hegemonic class of rich farmers. The professional class comprises primarily civilian and military and public bureaucracy personnel. Together these three classes constitute the dominant class coalition, though it is an uneasy coalition. The conflict of interests among them tends to pull in different directions but none of them is individually strong enough to dominate the process of resource allocation. Consequently, this had led to the proliferation of subsidies and grants to placate of them with the consequent reduction in available surplus for public capital formation. Bardhan further views that the system of bargaining and patronage dispensation fostered corruption, waste and mismanagement and this led to fiscal and management crisis. The dominance of the three classes in course of time began to weaken as the conflict of interests among the three classes began to sharpen so as to separate the rural rich farmers from the urban industrial and professional classes. Achin Vanaik in supporting the Bardhan's understanding of the dominant coalition, points out that there is a problem in considering the professionals as a class because their interests are linked to the expansion and consolidation of structures of education and administration. He argues that they have no interests that really unify them other than in their quest for more jobs. The dominant coalition is, therefore, not a stable fixture. Sudipta Kaviraj also discussed theme of ruling class coalition, but emphasized how in countries like India, reproduction of capital depends critically on the state. Kaviraj insists that the bureaucratic elite should not be seen as a category subservient to the bourgeoisie. In fact, he points out that this class provides the political intelligence to the bourgeoisie. Thus, the conflicts between the ruling class who are fully shielded by the state which did enjoy a considerable degree of relative autonomy and the subordinate classes comprising certain organized and urban working class segments of which did enjoy support mainly through trade union organizations, from political forces in the communist movement, socialist parties and even the Congress party has not produced 'class politics' in the traditional sense though the hiatus between the haves and have nots has increased. This is not only because of the centrality of the Indian state in the nation's political economy which has allowed enough space for the ruling classes to prosper but at the same time, has gained the allegiance or passive support of the

212 NSOU • CC-PS-04 majority of the governed, making some compromises while protecting the vital interests of the ruling classes. There are also serious weaknesses of the left forces, the working class movement and disorganized poor peasantry and the agricultural labourers. The Communist parties except a few radical groups in scattered rural pockets in Bihar and Andhra Pradesh have tended to become reformist, though they have not eliminated from their party programmes the explicit reference to the conflict of class interests and the achievement of socialism as their final goal. The Communists particularly the CPI(M), for the most part have retained their political support in three small states of the Indian Union; they had to adapt themselves to the new economic and social circumstances, resulting ultimately in the decline of the working class movement relative to the burgeoning growth of the middle classes which have come to be seen as a crucial factor in electoral politics; the increased assertion of caste and community as the modern political and economic idiom in national politics. All these processes and factors have retarded the development of a distinctive class consciousness in the working class and the diminution of its role in politics while the national bourgeoisie with a clearly class political orientation and its increased power accumulated under the protective umbrella of mixed economy has become more and more assertive in determining the politics of the state. Over the decades, the organized working class has experienced unrelenting pressure from industry and government alike, while the leadership of the communist trade unions has failed to withstand the pressure of fragmentation and deep-running structural changes of the labour force. These phenomena lead to the fact that the working class consciousness has been a casualty of political divisions within the communist movement as well as between the communists and the Congress. Ideologically, the two Communist parties are committed to class analysis of society but the analysis has proved less and less susceptible to realization as they are bent upon sustaining themselves as a political party in a competitive political system rather than as a social movement engaged primarily in class-based mobilization. The left and Democratic Fronts in West Bengal, Kerala and Tripura became, in reality, a coalition for winning power like other coalitions. The Communists' newly felt enchantment with electoral politics as a part of the 'war of position' have catapulted them to parliamentarianism which Gramsci regarded as the only way forward in capitalist democracies. On the other hand, the ideology and class character of the new agrarian relations in the countryside that have emerged in the post-independence period is varied from NSOU • CC-PS-04 213 region to region, state to state which according to Andre Beteille, because of the complex hierarchical rural society in which the interests of the farmers are overlaid with various kinds of cleavages of caste. Firstly, in every region, there are groups of landed castes who control most of the land, the primary productive asset, and other economic resources and who are also politically powerful. Secondly, these caste groups constitute politically, solidarity groups in relation to other castes whether of the elite. Lower or untouchable status. Thirdly, these relatively solidarity caste groups do often compete among themselves for access to scarce resources and political power. Fourthly, the untouchable castes, the Dalits- standing at the lowest rung of the caste hierarchy-form the largest number of the landless and wage labourers and being mostly unorganized are vulnerable to attack by the landed caste- men and their caste senas (armed goons). Within three decades after Independence, there has been a gradual shift of political power from the landlords and upper peasants of the traditionally dominant castes to peasant cultivators of the middle castes. The principal political struggle until the mid- 1960s was concentrated between the upper and middle peasantry. While consolidating their power, the middle peasant castes formed an alliance from below by sharecroppers and landless labourers, most of whom are dalits (scheduled castes). This has signified the potential for agrarian conflicts. During 1966-71 and onwards such potential conflicts have manifested in two aspects. Firstly, the struggle involving land claims and harvest shares occurred in pockets of Andhra Pradesh, West Bengal (the uprising in the Naxalbari sub-division of Darjeeling district) in 1967 and some other 'Naxalite' inspired incidents in small areas in Andhra, Bihar, Tamil Nadu and Kerala, of which the uprising in Srikakulam in Andhra Pradesh was the largest. Secondly, by the late 1970s and 1980s, the dynamics of power process had acquired a new pattern. Class and caste forces had evolved their own methods of manipulating liberal democratic politics. The oppressed social groups had acquired greater awareness of their democratic rights. So, during the 1980s and 1990s, there was a reassertion of upper class and upper caste power on the one hand, and regrouping of backward classes, tribals and dalits, on the other hand. The demand by 'backward classes' for reservation of posts in government services and seats in educational institutions was the expression of upwardly mobile lower caste cultivators' efforts to challenge the literate upper castes. But the salience of class as a tool of political mobilization declined significantly as drastic economic reforms by way of liberalization and privatization diluted the state-based modes of working class politics and as a new politics of cultural difference began to find a new and vigorous reception in the polity.

214 NSOU • CC-PS-04 The rise of the BJP and the intensification of the caste-based mobilizations did not markedly alter the class character of the Indian state. In a sense, it relegated class issues to the back burner since masses started to respond to communal and group-based identity articulations as never before in the past. The new age of capitalism underway in India since 1991 however did not produce a rightist onslaught from the Right in the more classical economic sense. This corroborates to the relevance of Rudolph's theses regarding the nature of class politics in India being based on a broad centrist consensus. From the foregoing analysis, it is evident that class does not play an important role in politics in the country. It means that class has not yet become, as in advanced capitalist societies, the basis of Indian party politics, because of the underdeveloped capitalist economy and importance of primordial group identities like caste, religion and ethnicity as the basis of political action.

17.6 The Indian Constitution and the Affirmative Action Policies : Mandal Commission

While the earlier discussion on caste-class relations was based by the theory of social stratification, recently the caste-class discourse has been triggered by the state policy of affirmative action or positive discrimination for socially and educationally backward classes relegating tradition-modernity paradigm of analysis to dysfunctional due to consequences of increasing political instability, political fission, proliferation of parties, rise of dalits and backward classes and their socio-political assertion in the 1980s and 1990s. Because, it may be noted that in the years following independence, the traditional upper castes continued to rule in most parts of India. Until 1977, upper castes continued to hold prominent elected positions in Uttar Pradesh. Until 1962, as many as 63% of ruling Congress members of the Legislative Assembly came from elite castes. Soon, however, traditional peasant castes such as Ahirs, Kurmis, Koeri, Lodh Rajputs, and Jats began to dominate the political scene of northern India. In the southern state of Tamil Nadu, the Vanniyars and Thevars became assertive, and in Karnataka, control was wrested in the mid-1950s from the traditional rural elite within the Congress party by the Vokkaligas and Lingayats. In the North Indian Hindi speaking belt, upper caste members of parliament fell below 50% for the first time in 1977. The challenge to the established Congress was mounted in Uttar Pradesh rather effectively in the late 1960s by a coalition of peasant castes led by Charan Singh. In Bihar also, there was a significant decline of upper caste members of the Legislative Assembly after 1977.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 215 In Bihar and Uttar Pradesh, Yadav caste gained a great degree of salience. In Uttar Pradesh, the Samajwadi party is headed by Maulayam Sing Yadav and in Bihar; the Rashtriya Janata Dal had Lalu Prasad Yadav at its helm. The decline of the traditional elite castes in Indian politics has been a fact giving rise to peasant castes as 'bullock capitalists' who challenged the hegemony of the traditional Kshatriya castes such as the Rajputs and Bhumiya. These peasant castes constitute 34% of the population but control about 51% of land. The political emergence of these bullock capitalists coincides with the emergence of the backward class movement in large parts of India. According to Srinivas, the bullock capitalists are small owners of land, yet they exercise considerable political power in contemporary India. The factors behind the emergence of the OBCs in post-independence India is that though the Green Revolution vastly expanded agricultural production generating surplus, but there were vast stretches of poverty, deprivation and inequalities, affecting mainly the bulk of the poor, landless poor peasants and unorganized worker along with the scheduled caste, backward classes and schedule tribes who were suffering more and more from poverty. These developments intensified the contradictions in the societies and further weakened the capacity of the polity to cope with challenges of economic development on the one hand and demands of emerging social groups on the other. Hence in the 1980s, India experienced a democratic upsurge of dalits, adivasis, women, peasants and regional identity groups. It is in this situation; the dynamics of power process had acquired a new pattern. Class and caste forces had evolved their own methods of manipulating liberal democratic politics. At the same time, the oppressed social groups had acquired greater awareness of their democratic rights of the Constitutional provisions facilitating regrouping of backward classes, tribals and dalits. The demand by backward classes for reservation of posts in government services and seats in educational institutions was an expression of upwardly mobile lower caste cultivators' efforts to challenge the literate upper classes. These backward classes are now known as Other Backward Classes (OBCs) and in general comprise largely peasant and other agrarian communities. These castes are not untouchables but are considered backward as they lack a culture of learning on account of their lowly peasant status. In recognition of this fact, the Constitution of India recommended that the state intervene and help these communities by legislating some measures that would break the cycle of poverty and backwardness. The 216 NSOU • CC-PS-04 Constitution provided clear policies of positive discrimination and reservation for the SCs; it did not do so in the case of backward castes. It only expressed an intention of intervening in some form and left it at that in meeting the growing tension posed by them.

In pursuance of Article 340 of the Constitution, the kalelkar Commission was set up in 1953, but it could not come to any satisfactory conclusion about who should be legitimately considered as OBCs.

Even the Nehru government declined to accept the recommendations of the commission, arguing that the basis of classification should not be caste. Thereafter, following the ouster of Indira Gandhi government, the Janata party came to power. To deliver, what they called, as 'social justice', they formed the Second Backward Commission headed by B. P. Mandal in 1980, known as Mandal Commission and it promptly came up with a long list of 3743 backward castes on the basis of social, economic and educational backwardness, allotting 27% reservation for them other than SCs and STs, in educational and government jobs. Like its predecessor, Mandal Commission defined backwardness on the basis of caste rather than class terms. The Commission argued, 'caste is also the class of citizens and if the caste as a whole is socially and educationally backward, reservation can be made in favour of such a caste'.

The Mandal Commission's recommendations were implemented in 1990 by the then Prime Minister V. P. Singh.

The implementation set off a furore of protests resulting in Pan-Indian caste polarization for and against reservation. With the general recommendation, the Commission proposed the following overall scheme of reservation for OBCs : 1.

MATCHING BLOCK 120/167

Candidates belonging to OBC recruited on the basis of merit in an open competition should not be adjusted against their reservation quota of 27 per cent. 2.

The above reservation should also be made available to promotion at all levels. 3. Reserved quota remaining unfulfilled should be carried forward for a period of three years and dereserved thereafter. 4. Relaxation in the upper age limit for direct recruitment should be extended to the candidates of OBC in the same manner as presently done in respect of SCs and STs. 5. A roster system for each category of posts should be adopted by the concerned authorities in the same manner done in respect of SCs and STs.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 217 These recommendations in total are applicable in all recruitment to public sector undertakings, both under the central and state governments as well as to nationalized banks. All private sector undertakings which have received financial assistance from the government should recruit personnel on the aforesaid basis. All universities and affiliated colleges should also be covered by the above scheme of reservation. In this connection, it is worth mentioning that in no case, the reservation should extend 50 per cent as per the Supreme Court judgment in 1963 in Balaji case. But with the reservation for economically weaker section (EWS), the total reservation it now stands at 59.5 per cent.

subject to the exclusion of socially- advanced persons/sections (creamy layer) from amongst the OBCs. The Court also directed to evolve criteria for identification of this creamy layer. In response to the Court directives, the Government appointed a committee which suggested the rules of exclusion involving doctors, engineers, chartered accountants, actors, consultants, media professionals, writers, bureaucrats, defence officers of colonel and equivalent rank or higher court and supreme court judges and all central and state government class A and B officials as creamy layers. In August 2017, NDA government has raised from Rs. 6 lakhs a year to Rs. 8 lakh ceiling as creamy layer in financial terms. 17.7 Constitutional Provisions and OBCs The Constitution of India guarantees protection from social injustice and all forms of exploitation empowering the state to make provisions for reservation through proactive mechanism with a view to accelerate the development of the oppressed sections. Article 14 states equality before law. The state shall no deny to any person equality before law or equal protection of the law within the territory of India. The principle of equality is the essence of democracy. Equality before law implies the absence of any discrimination without rational basis. Equal protection of laws would mean that among equals, the law should be equal. Reasonable classification of the citizens is permissible. The exclusion of creamy layer in Backward Class is not to be treated violation of the provision. The state can treat the creamy layer on par with the forward classes and is not entitled to benefits of reservation. So, the equality that is contemplated under Article 14 is equality among equals but not unequal.

Article 16(4) : "Nothing in this Article shall prevent the state from making any provision for the reservation of appointments or posts in favour of any backward class of citizens which, in the opinion of the state, is not adequately represented in the services under the state". Article 340 of the Constitution provides "that the President may by order appoint a Commission to investigate the conditions of socially and educationally backward classes". The Directive Principles of State Policy as enshrined in part IV of the Constitution enjoy a very high place in the constitutional scheme and it is in the framework of the socio-economic structure envisaged in the Directive Principles that the Fundamental Rights are intended to operate. It is only then they become meaningful and significant for the millions of our poor people and deprived people who do not have even the bare necessities of life and who are living below the poverty level. The policy makers have underlined the need of educational and economic support for backward classes in order to reduce the disparity between them and the non- backward sections of the population. The welfare schemes are: (i) Pre-matric scholarship to the OBCs for studies in India : The aim of this scheme is to motivate the children of OBCs studying at pre-matric stage scholarships are awarded to students belonging to OBCs whose parent's/ guardian's income from all sources does not exceed to Rs. 44,500/- per annum.

represented the politics of caste assertion or the politics of identity

instead of class consciousness. So, caste has become the right to power. Sudipta Kaviraj has argued that caste groups instead of crumbling adapted themselves to the demands of parliamentary politics. It thus, created a democracy of castes in place of a hierarchy. Though there are Dalit millionaires who went into establishing the Dalit Chamber of Commerce and Industry (DICCI), a Dalit Chief Minister in U.P., yet we still encounter instances where violence and atrocities are perpetrated on the basis of caste. We still witness that jobs that are largely considered inhumanlike manual and scavenging or sweepers have a definite caste pattern. According to the National Crime Records Bureau (NCRB), U.P. represents the highest number of crimes against Dalits and low castes as per its report in 2015. Naked parading of Dalit and NSOU • CC-PS-04 223 low caste women still comes to light from time to time. Along with the rising violence and rape against the SCs and STs, similar rising trend is also evident with regard to rape cases against the OBCs. Although SCs / Dalits including OBCs are unable to confront the upper castes, even they fear to register protests with the police to ensure their legal protection. They are sometimes divided among themselves on sub-caste lines. It is also worth mentioning that they are landless and depend on the very castes that violate their rights to earn livelihood. Gopal Guru is of the opinion that dalit and obc issues make only a token appearance in the election manifestos of leading political parties and when they get inducted into a political hierarchy, he is given an unimportant portfolio like the Ministry of Social Welfare. In educational institutions low caste students are normally assigned to Dalit guides. Thus, these students are denied access to the larger teaching community. Similarly, Dalit teachers are denied access to general students. In the case of representation of OBCs in parliament is not satisfactory in relation to the proportion of their population. The OBCs representation in parliament in 1989 in the Lok Sabha was 11 percent; it jumped to 20 per cent and continued to grow in the Post- Mandal phase accounting for 26 per cent. The 2009 General Election again marked decline to 18 per cent. In 2014 Lok Sabha election, it shot up to 20 per cent only. Representation of the OBCs in the Central Services is less as compared to the percentage of reservation for them. Though the Union Minister of State for Personnel said in the Lok Sabha that representation of the OBCs as on January 1, 2012 was 16.55 per cent and this has increased to 21.57 per cent as on January 1, 2016, but it is far less than their percentage of reservation. The Union Minister, Jitendra Singh further said that 10 ministries and departments having more than 90 per cent of the employees in the Central government, including PSU banks and financial institutions, out of the 92,589 backlog vacancies for SC, STs and OBCs, 63,876 vacancies remained unfilled as on January 1, last year. The Times of India on December 26, 2015 reports that more than two decades after the Mandal Commission Report which mandates 27% reservation for OBCs, less than 12 per cent of employees of Central government ministries, departments and statutory bodies are from OBCs as on January 1, 2015. The Ministry of Human Resources, which is a major employer of group Some employees like professors in IITs and other central educational institutions. Going by the data available, under the group A, B, C and D categories of employees, out of 79,483 posts, there are only 9,040 OBCs in the staff.

224 NSOU • CC-PS-04 A closer look at the data indicates that there is not a single OBC grade A officer in the President's Secretariat, less than 9 per cent of the 651 Union Public Service Commission (UPSC) staff is from the OBC category. The Higher Education Department employs only 5 per cent OBC in grade A officers and 10 per cent OBC staff. Out of 41 grade A posts in the Department of Scientific and Industrial Research, there is only one OBC officer. The candidates from SCs, STs and OBCs are still heavily underrepresented in Government jobs despite reservation. At the high ranks, the situation is more acute. In fact, the situation is that 95.2% professors, 92.9% associate professors and 66.27% assistant professors are from general category in Central Universities. OBCs form only 14.38 as assistant professors in higher education. Among the non-teaching staff, only 10.17% are from OBC category. As many as 76% belong to the general category in this segment. In the Cabinet Secretariat, 80% posts are occupied by the general category; there are no OBCs in this segment. The representation of OBCs is worst in Indian Railways, India's biggest employer. It shows that there are 8% among officers of group A and B. SCs, STs and OBCs are underrepresented. All in all, it may be said that in the higher echelons, the higher castes or upper castes continue to dominate. Even the political leadership and governmental power is totally usurped by the upper castes and despite more than 50% of population, the OBCs could not get power in proportion to their population. Since political parties are under the control of upper castes, they invariably allot party tickets to upper castes and tend to ignore the interests of OBCs and other depressed castes.

17.10 Conclusion Caste and class are viewed as the two most significant dimensions of social stratification. They are considered as closely related, almost inseparably, basic processes of social life. But caste and class are not synonymous. They differ from each other. Caste is the evolution of centuries' old system in India as a unique traditional phenomenon of Indian society and class as a universal phenomenon of modern society. For a Marxist and a Communist, the two modes of production or a mechanical distinction between them is not only a vulgar simplification but divorced from the present day Indian reality.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 225 Caste has gone through various refinements and changes from the traditional stratificatory system of the idea of ritual purity and impurity and hierarchical structure to social identity caused by India's liberal democratic state and the institutions of competitive, representational democracy. As a result, the hierarchically ordered strata of the traditional caste system now function as horizontal groups, competing and cooperating with one another for the new economic and political power released in society through the process of modernization of its economy and democratization of its political institutions. The form of consciousness is also changing subjectively in terms of community consciousness. The sense of belonging to a high or a low status in ritual hierarchy is gradually fading away, augmenting in the process to identity claims. In the villages too, the traditional social relationships are being refined in economic terms. The 'green revolution' and with the increasing role of the state and other outside agencies in the food production and distribution system of a village, the social organization has substantively changed. From the system of ritual status hierarchy, it is becoming an economic organization. The stratificatory system as it functions in India today can, therefore, no longer be characterized as a hierarchy of ritual statuses. The ritual status system has disintegrated and castes as individual self-conscious communities continue to survive. Consequently, the discourse of caste and class represents same structural reality where domination and subjugation, surplus and exploitation, privileges and deprivations are universally found in caste and class. The question is, therefore, not one of class versus caste. It is the formation of classes in the weak capitalism in India within the inherited caste structure. The contemporary discourse on caste, class and politics in India has been liberated from the straitjacket debate of modernization vs. traditionalization and dichotomous vs. dynamic relations, the centrality of caste as an agent of politics and its dominant role in Indian socio-political life have neither been removed nor firmly challenged. Rather, recognition of caste as an instrument of socio-political change by the Mandal Commission and caste-centric public-political movements of the 1980s and 1990s, such as Dalit and Backward class movements have not only enlivened new debates in India, but have reinforced a caste-centric public-political life, giving it a modern value and a secular purpose. Hence, the contemporary discourse is deeply interested in investigating the changing landscape of socio-political life as a result of the political assertion of Dalits and Backward classes and its overall impact on Indian politics.

226 NSOU • CC-PS-04 While the pre-Mandal discourse on caste-class relations was framed by the theory of social stratification, the recent debates have been triggered by the State policy of positive discrimination for socially and educationally backward classes. 17.11 Summing Up • Social structure in India is the most stratified society in the world. In this stratification, there exists the differentiation of the population into hierarchically superimposed classes manifested in the existence of upper and lower layers. Apart from class, caste as an important social institution is predominant in this social structure persisting in the process of continuity and change in India. According to the Indian Marxist thinkers, the institution of class did not exist prior to the British rule. Hence, caste is a pre-class institution of exploitation and administration in India. With the colonial regime, two modes of production, that of caste and class, came to co-exist with each other. It is within this social stratification that class formation is taking place as capitalism is still developing in India. The question is therefore, not one of class versus caste. It is the formation of classes under modern capitalism within the inherited caste structure. To a large extent, the most exploited classes in our society constitute the most socially oppressed castes. And to that extent, the struggle against class exploitation and the struggle against social oppression complement each other. • The centrality of caste as an agent of politics and its dominant role in Indian socio-political life got recognition by the Mandal Commission through affirmative action. In this respect, it may be mentioned that the demands and recognition of backward classes for reservation was partly an expression of lower cultivators' efforts to challenge the literate upper castes or what may be called as challenge to the upper classes in India. It is clear that class has yet to become as in advanced capitalist societies, the basis of mobilization because of the underdeveloped capitalist economy and importance of primordial group identities like caste, religion and ethnicity as the bases of political action. 17.12 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. 18.2 Introduction In the twenty-first century, the conservation, protection and improvement of human environment are major issues all over the world. Human world consists of both physical environment and biological environment. Physical environment covers land, water and air. Biological environment includes plants, animals and other organisms. Both physical and biological (biotic and a biotic) are interdependent. Industrialization, urbanization, explosion of population, over-exploitation of resources, disruption of natural ecological balances, destruction of a multitude of animal and plant species for economic reasons are the factors which have contributed to environmental deterioration. One country's degradation of environment deteriorates the global environment for all the countries. As a result, the problem of environmental pollution has acquired international dimension and India is no exception to it. It is not to be out of context to point out the fact that alongside advances in civilizations, there is disjuncture in set of relationships between men and nature. This disjuncture is manifested through considerable downgrading the quality of basic natural resources like air, land and water and other supportive life systems like forests, marine resources and the like. Some scholars have described the current

NSOU • CC-PS-04 231 conditions within environment and its potential directions as truly alarming and counter-productive to the advancement of human race. They are using such terms as 'crisis', 'disasters', 'irreparable losses' etc. to highlight the situation. But it is to be noted that the setbacks conceived and perceived in the arena of environment are not left unanswered or unchallenged. All over the world, the people at the local levels and beyond it or larger entity who have been directly victimized by depletion of natural resources like water, fuel, fodder etc. are organizing themselves to raise voices against the menace. There are instances of people's movements in all parts of the world for articulation of their demand for restoration of status quo and total abandonment of the capricious ways of modernization. In this emerging, ever-increasing battle of the common masses in urban and rural areas, a new paradigm of environmental management discourse is on the anvil to focus or envisage a new global economy where industry, society and ecology do not vie with each other in mutual hostility, rather it ushers in the ethos of human development essentialising the philosophy of sustainable society based on a balance between economic growth and ecological protection. There is no denying the fact that the degradation of our environment is linked with the development process and ignorance of men/people about retaining the ecological balance. It is essential to environmentalise the development issues with a world-view that man is not above nature. Such a strategy of balance between economy and ecology for the protection of environment is a broader road map to meeting the needs of the present without jeopardizing the ability of the future generation to meet their own needs. It may be mentioned that various efforts aimed at protection of environment have been a recent phenomenon. Systematically, in the 1970s and by the end of 1980s, the Stockholm Declaration of 1972 and the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) held at Rio de Janeiro in June 1992, especially the "Agenda 21" sparked off the growing concern for the degradation of environment worldwide. It made a significant progress in arousing sensitivity towards environment and its protection, placing the concept of sustainable development at the centre. As a consequence of these declarations, in India the Environment Protection Act of 1986 brought more effective environmental legislation. Accordingly, Indian Parliament inserted two Articles, 48A and 51A(g) in the Constitution of India in 1976 as the affirmative measures to protect and improve the environment. 'The Right to Life' contained in Article - 21 of the Constitution of India include the right to clean and human environment.

232 NSOU • CC-PS-04 Apart from the constitutional mandate to protect and improve the environment, there are a plenty of legislations on the subject as the preventive measures or policies for environmental protection programme. These Governmental Policies are meant to act as safeguards for ensuring the life and dignity of the people in India. The Supreme Court's path-breaking initiatives have also led to setting new paradigms in environmental protection in India. Likewise the issue of environmental degradation has caught the attentions of agencies like media, NGOs, Social activists demanding for just and equitable development without undermining the natural support system.

18.3 Meaning of Environment

The word 'environment' is derived from the French Word 'environner', which means 'to encircle' or to surround. The most suitable definition of environment is as follows: "It is the sum total of water, air and land and the interrelationships that exist among them with human beings, other living organisms and materials". The geographical meaning of environment is that "It is a combination of living and non-living things and their mutual interaction with each other which leads to an eco-system". The environment encompasses all living and non-living things occurring naturally on earth. The Supreme Court of India defined environment as "Environment" 'related to the surroundings, but obviously, that is a concept which is relatable to whatever object it is, which is surrounded. Environment is a polycentric and multifaceted problem affecting the human existence'. Thus, environment is the sum total of all conditions and influences that affect the development and life of all organisms on earth. The crisis of environment engenders when in the sum total of all conditions and influences are in disequilibrium causing harmful effects on the living and non-living objects. Environmental degradation implies disequilibrium or imbalance or pollution or decrease in the quality of environment resulting in deleterious effects on the living and non-living objects.

18.4 Man and Environment

The earth provided the right environment – pure air, pure water, pure land, Carbon dioxide which in presence of strong sunlight helped the development of the living world consisting of plants, animals and man. Nature through its own cycles

NSOU • CC-PS-04 233 has readily helped in the evolution of life forms. These natural cycles – water cycles, oxygen cycles, nitrogen cycle, carbon cycle etc. are conducted in harmony with nature, but over the years this equilibrium was disrupted by man as he tried to improve his life style with the help of science and technology and as population grew beyond control which increased the need for more and more food, water and shelter. Man's greed and needs led to exploitation of natural resources which caused environmental degradation and world-wide crisis threatening human survival. Primitive man looked at nature with wonder and awe because of its terrible forces as manifested from time to time as lightning, thunder, cyclone, volcanic eruption, flash flood, landslides etc. In order to tide over the terrible forces and man's constant efforts for better living standards, he developed science and technology over the years. The Industrial Revolution of 1780 was a landmark in the history of human civilization. It started with the invention of steam engine in England. By 1840, England was transformed from an agricultural country into a predominantly Industrial one. The Industrial Revolution along with colonial rule made Britain the most prosperous country in the world in the 19th century. With the development of science and technology man continued to plunder natural resources and pollute the environment. He destroyed forest, degraded lands, threw toxic wastes into rivers and seas and also harmful gases into the atmosphere. The continuous load of pollutants into the environment brought about changes in it which ultimately backfired into series of disasters from time to time. Our earth called mother is the most precious gift of the universe. It is the sustenance of 'nature' that is a key to the development of the future of mankind. It is the duty and responsibility of each one of us to protect nature. The degradation of our environment is linked with the development process and the ignorance of people about retaining the ecological balance. It is, therefore, essential to environmentalise the developmental issues with a world-view that man is not above nature. This leads to the recognition of the fact that a balance between ecology and economy based on a win-win strategy or a synergy between development and environmental protection may be a broader roadmap to meeting the needs of the present without jeopardizing the ability of the future generation to meet their own needs.

18.5 Philosophy of Development

It is a fact that behind every great success of the world economy, science and technology, there is a crime, crime against nature. We are proud of our large scale

234 NSOU • CC-PS-04 hydropower, industrialization, urbanization, scientific inventions, but they tell tales of environmental as well as social disasters; indigenous folk are displaced, bio-diversity is destroyed, acid is released out of flooded soil and pollution; all these poison the eco-system. Similar is the tale of the 'miracle' crop varieties introduced in Asia or of the large grazing projects of Africa financed by the international lending agencies, such projects crowd out wild life, diminish the diversity of traditional crops and destroy local markets. We, thus, mean growth, economic growth at the expense of earth's natural systems. Such a philosophy betrays our greed underneath the façade of apparent prosperity. It also betrays our lack of vision – the vision without which we perish. What is ignored is a Grim Paradox inherent in the situation; that every phase of economic prosperity at the cost of the Earth's supportive systems releases subversive forces that bring in poverty. There is even a greater paradox, as the economy grows, ecological systems suffer severe jolts, growth thus involves decaying; it might even mean dying, contamination of water resources, pollution, deforestation, desertification, soil erosion, extinction of various species, acid rain, lethal storm, global warming and ozone depletion etc. All these are only a few of the innumerable symptoms that indicate stress on the earth. They warn us against disaster and insecurity. Looking at the burgeoning global human population scenario, we will be witnessing an explosive situation. The world population 6 billion at present might have crossed 7 billion mark by 2015. The earth is, in fact, burdened and overburdened. The needs of this huge number of human beings cannot be supported by the earth's natural resources without degrading the quality of human life. And the hour of our faith on equitable distribution in the neo-liberal global economy is over. Now we think we have to go after growth. This 'greed'; it is called 'need' is without limit that leads to ironically degrading the environment by telling upon ecological system which by implication, upon our lives. The torture on environment implicates self-torture, even self-killing. The evidence of this torture is present everywhere, both in the biotic and the abiotic components of our environment. As Lester R. Brown observes, "our economic policies that have yielded the extraordinary results in the world economy are the same ones that destroying ecological support system". In the neo-liberal theories, growth implies yielding to market forces – a shift to the industrial economy where the nation state is likely to have minimal control. Intellectually and historically, the shift gained in force from the philosophies of Francis Bacon and John Locke as well as those of the Enlightens and the ethics of the protestants/puritans, all justifying nature-domination or nature exploitation by

NSOU • CC-PS-04 235 promoting their idea of 'progress' and upholding it apparently with the prospect of a future. Nature-domination can be traced further back to ecclesiastical teachings, where God is said to have created nature for man to use. So, the environmental degradation or ecological imbalance is due largely to this disposition long nourished through Christian traditions and tend support to the anthropocentricity of the philosophy of development which justified, still does, man's role in dominating everything around. But we ignore the common lesson that nature cannot be dominated, it can only be cooperated with. Nature domination risks being annihilated. The threat we have been experiencing now. It is not difficult to see that some of the threats foretell disaster. To get rid of the forthcoming disaster, then is 'Zero growth' recommendable? Or should we look back to the "golden days of yore in the manner of Rousseau, when man and nature were in ideal state without any ripple or murmur of discord? Perhaps, we cannot stop growth. On the contrary, we can no longer let suffer our earth to be flayed and tormented in the name of growth. Logically then; we need reconciliation. We need to broaden the goals of development by incorporating new mechanisms to prevent environmental degradation. It is recognized that ecology involves self- regulatory systems, provided our intervention does not go beyond the tolerable limits, and ensures the possibility of growth within natural limits. The economy based on market forces needs to be restructured in keeping with the principles of ecology. The economists and ecologists must work together to foster development without endangering the climate, air, water and forests. They should take responsible, eco-friendly decisions devising a way out to the establishment of an eco-economy imperative to anchor our mother earth from degradation/pollution/extinction.

18.6 North-South Debate In respect of sustainable development and eco-friendly environment, much discussion has been taken place, but to little effect. It involved the nation into a battle of arguments. The developing countries (South) argue that since the increasing carbon dioxide emission by the developed countries (North) overfills the space, theirs is largely the responsibility of space-evacuation or that since 25% of the world population consumes 85% of its wealth and produces 90% of the total wastes causing trouble so much so that the burden of space-evacuation should naturally fall on them. The developing countries are, on the other hand, blamed for the alarming increase in carbon emission for the growing population that generates negative externalities.

236 NSOU • CC-PS-04 The polemics thus advanced lead us to nowhere. It is not effective enough to deal with the knotty problem of global environmental pollution. What, then, is needed is to evolve a common mission working together for environmental security, if we are eager to avert any magnum extinction. The emission of green-house gases and global warming has to be reduced considerably; even if it be with a change in the pattern of industrial activity in any country, be that developed, underdeveloped or developing. As regards, the sharing of 'pollution space', a strategy has to be reinvented calculating needs on the basis of equality and justice along with the removal of structural imbalances in the global and national economy as well as the unequal terms of participation in the global economy.

18.7 The Global Environment Scenario According to the study of the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) published in 2016 under the title Global Environmental Outlook (GEO – 6), provided assessment of the environmental issues affecting each of the world's six regions: the Pan-European region, North America, Asia and the Pacific, West Asia, Latin America and the Caribbean and Africa. The assessments find a host of common environmental threats that are rapidly intensifying in many parts of the world. The study warns that "if the current trends continue and the world fails to enact solutions that improve current patterns of production and consumption.... The world environment will continue to decline". The study further reveals the fact that "there is still time to tackle many of the worst impacts of environmental change such as the damage to marine ecosystems and the rising level of air pollution which has become one of the world's most widespread environmental health risks". It also states that "Across the world, climate change, the loss of biodiversity, land degradation and water scarcity are growing problems that need to be urgently addressed if the world is to achieve the goals set out in 2030 Agenda for sustainable Development". The key findings on Latin America and the Caribbean (LAC) state that green house gas emissions are growing in the region as a result of urbanization, economic growth, energy consumption, land use changes and other factors. The emission of nitrogen oxide and carbon dioxide from agriculture increased by about 29% air pollution. The region's urban population increased by more than 35 million people between 2010 and 2015 in Mexico and expected to climb to a total of 567 million persons by 2015. More than 100 million people already live in areas where they are at risk from air pollution. The report notes that Andean Glaciers which provide vital

NSOU • CC-PS-04 237 water resources for millions of people are shrinking and an increase in the intensity and frequency of extreme weather events are affecting economics. As regards Asia and the Pacific regions, the report reveals that unprecedented economic growth, which has lifted millions out of poverty in Asia and the Pacific, is putting heavy pressure on ecosystems. Increasing unsustainable consumption patterns have led to worsening air pollution, water scarcity and waste generation, threatening human and environmental health. Increased demand for fossil fuels and natural resources – extensive agriculture, palm oil and rubber plantations aqua culture and the illegal trade in wildlife – are causing environmental degradation and biodiversity loss. The Asia-Pacific region continued to be the world's most disaster prone area, accounting for about 41% of all natural disasters over the last two decades occurred in this region causing 91% of the world's deaths attributable to natural disasters in the last century. The area witnessed the number of record-breaking rainfall events accounting for 56% over the 1981-2010 periods. By the 2070s the top Asian cities in terms of population exposure to coastal flooding will be Bangkok, Dhaka, Guangzhou, Kolkata, Mumbai and Shanghai, threatening hundreds of millions of people with displacement. It is estimated that about 30% of the population uses drinking water contaminated by sources of human and industrial wastes. Water related diseases and unsafe water contribute to 1.8 million deaths annually and 24.8 million disability- adjusted life years in the region. Uncontrolled dumping as the main waste disposal method in the region is also the major source of disease. In Mumbai, about 12% of total municipal solid waste is burned either openly on the street or in landfills that release carbon, dioxins and carcinogenic furans. Along with this, growing middle class and urbanization has also led to unhealthy, polluting and carbon-intensive lifestyles. The main driver for accelerating domestic material consumption is the expanding middle class from 21% in 1990 to 56% in 2008. The size of this class is projected to increase from 1.8 billion in 2009 to 4.9 billion in 2030 in Asia. In the case of West Asia, a rise in the amount of degraded land and the spread of desertification are the "most critical challenges", having profound economic and environmental impacts on the region, according to the UNEP report. West Asia is suffering from an increase in water demand, over exploitation of ground water resources and deteriorating water. Water demand in the region is 238 NSOU • CC-PS-04 increasing while water quality is deteriorating. Due to over-exploitation of ground water, only 4 out of 12 countries in West Asia are above the water scarcity limit of 1000 cubic meters per person per year. Continuous conflict and the mass displacement of people throughout the region are also triggering severe environmental impacts that are endangering the health of people. Heavy metals from explosive munitions and radiation from missiles have leached into the environment. The 2.97 million refugees in Lebanon, Jordan, Yemen and Iraq are placing an immense environmental burden producing about 1,440 tones of waste per day in 2015, overwhelming governments and increasing the risk of disease out-breaks. The air pollution, lack of access to safe water and adequate sanitation, climate change, exposure to hazardous chemicals and wastes and exposure to radiation became the top environmental risk factors. More than 229,500 people die prematurely each year because of this specific environmental risk and 8.24 million healthy life years are being lost. Every individual in this region is losing 17 days of life annually because of environmental risk factors. Almost 90% of municipal solid waste in West Asia is disposed of in landfills sites and leachate from these is contaminating scarce ground water resources. It is estimated that air pollution alone which has increased steadily over the past two decades was responsible for more than 70,000 premature deaths in 2010. In Africa, land degradation, air pollution and the provision of sanitation and safe drinking water are among the main problems of the continent. Indoor air pollution is responsible for 600,000 premature deaths every year in Africa. The continent's reliance on the use of bio-mass for cooking, lighting and heating means that 90% of the region's population is exposed to this health threat. More than half of the population in Sub-Saharan Africa still does not have any access to improved sanitation. African mega cities such as Cairo, Kinshasa and Lagos and emerging mega cities such as Dares Salaam, Johannesburg and Luanda face challenges from poor management of sanitation services. In Africa, land is the most prized asset for food production and economic development. But about 500,000 square meters of land in Africa is being degraded due to soil erosion, sanitization, pollution and deforestation. In North America, environmental conditions in the region relatively have improved due to policies and regulatory frameworks. However, environmental challenges have emerged recently. Climate change is generating impacts across the region. Aggressive hydrocarbon extraction methods bring increased emissions, water

NSOU • CC-PS-04 239 use and induced seismicity. The coastal and marine environment is under threat due to ocean acidification, Ocean Warming (ELNINO), sea level rise and new forms of marine debris. Despite environmental regulatory measures, 140 million people exposed to pollution. Apart from this, climate change is damaging the environment, human health and wellbeing and human security in the region. The Arctic adjacent to this region is experiencing a profound transformation impacting on North America and the world as a whole. The climate change, global warming has gripped the environmental condition adversely. The largest contributions to global glacier ice loss during the early 21 st century were from glaciers in Alaska, the Canadian Arctic and the periphery of the Greenland ice sheet. Together these areas account for more than 80% of the total ice loss. The melting of sea ice has also created new expanses of Open Ocean, allowing large population of phytoplankton to bloom and alter the marine food chain. 18.8 The Indian Environment Scenario As per United Nations Environment Programme Report in 2019, India, as the World No. 3 emitter of green house gas, tops after China and the United States. According to World Health Organization, India is also highly air-polluted country which is adversely affecting the life span of its citizens reducing Indian lives by over three years. Over half of its population lives in areas where fine particulate matter pollution is high. Of the world's top 20 polluted cities, 13 are in India compared to just three in China. Among the cities in India, Delhi and Kolkata are the highest polluted cities. Yale University's The Environment Performance Index, has bracketed India among "bottom performers" in terms of its air quality, water and sanitation. India lags behind Brazil, China, Russia and South Africa in this respect. The Ganga and Jamuna are ranked among the world's 10 most polluted rivers. Some 345 million gallons of raw sewage and 70 million gallons of industrial waste flows into the Ganges every day Diseases that have been caught bathing in the river include dysentery, jaundice and cholera even hepatitis amoebic dysentery. Mindless concretization of ground and green belts are destroying the green cover changing the land use and shrinking of natural conservation zones such as forests, waste lands, sanctuaries and ground water rechargeable areas in Aravallis and Wetlands in Delhi, Haryana, Rajasthan and Uttar Pradesh.

240 NSOU • CC-PS-04 According to report by the Centre for Science and Environment, a Delhi based NGO, say the decline in the country's overall environmental standards was because of river pollution, piling garbage in cities and increasingly toxic urban air. India is vulnerable to various environmental problems. An estimated 60% of cultivated land suffers from soil erosion, water logging and salinity. For about 4.7 to 12 billion tons of topsoil are lost annually from soil erosion. Exploitation of Ground Water has become problematic in the states of Haryana, Punjab and Uttar Pradesh. Forest area covers 19.4% of India's geography area (63.7 million hectares). Nearly half of the country's forest cover is found in the state of Madhya Pradesh (20.7%) and the seven states of the North East (25.7%). The Northeast is experiencing net forest loss. Forest cover is declining because of harvesting of fuel wood and the expansion of agricultural land. Along with these trends, increasing industrial and motor vehicle pollution output have led to temperature increase and declining intervals of drought recurrence in many areas. In West Bengal, due to massive mangrove loss, salinity in soil is increasing making it unfit for agriculture. Global warming is blamed for causing droughts, floods and water shortages. It could disrupt the monsoons and cause vital rains to disappear from some places. The Mahanadi, Narmada, Tapi, Cauvery, Krishna, Godavari and Ganges river deltas are threatened by rising sea levels caused by global warming. The Ganges delta and the cities of Mumbai, Madras and Calcutta are particularly vulnerable to sea level rise. Global warming is being blamed for melting glaciers. The Gangotri Glacier in India is retreating at a rate of 30 meters per year. The use of Ozone-layer – depleting chemicals in India and China threatens to cancel out their progress, damaging the environment considerably. These are a few facts out of innumerable environmental problems facing India. 18.9 Global Environmental Protection Measures Global inter-government action began with the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment in Stockholm in 1972. This led to the 'Stockholm Declaration' and an action plan with over 100 recommendations on environmental assessment, management and support measures. The Stockholm slogan was "only one Earth".

NSOU • CC-PS-04 241 The Environmental debate centered around the club of Rome Report on the 'Limits to Growth' and talk of economic development. The Report highlights the consequences of unrestrained growth and linkages between several global problems. The Post Stockholm Concerns for the environment continued to grow in view of the widespread deforestation, industrial pollution and environmental degradation. The ozone hole, the warming of the earth, increased carbon dioxide in the environment all added to the growing environmental concerns, especially the link between the environmental degradation and industrial development and growth. With this in mind the United Nations in 1983 established the "World Commission on the Environment and Development" and it is commonly referred to as the "Brandt Land Commission". The Commission in its Report "Our Common Future" in 1987 defined "sustainable Development" – a "development that meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generation to meet their own needs". Twenty years after Stockholm, the United Nations conference on Environment and Development was held in Rio de Janeiro in 1992, known as "The Earth Summit" or it was called the "Rio Declaration" which adopted an action plan of 40 chapters called Agenda 21 was adopted by over 100 Nations. Agenda 21 was geared towards achieving sustainable development in the 21st century. The 'Rio concept' follows : 1. Equal consideration of environment, society and economy; 2. Intergenerational solidarity keeping in mind the needs of the future generation; 3. A global consensus and political commitment at the national and international levels; 4. Improvement of the Non-Governmental Organizations (NGO); 5. Provides a blue print for the governments to attain a balance between the environment and the needs of the population; and 6. A Commission on Sustainable Development (CSD) was established to follow up the Rio agreements and it monitors the agreements of the Earth Summit at the local, national and international levels. As a follow up to the Rio agreements, several other conferences to focus on sustainable development were held in Barbados in 1994, "The World Summit on Social Development" in Copenhagen in 1995, "The Fourth World Conference on Women" in Beijing, 1995 and the "Second UN Conference on Human Settlements, 242 NSOU • CC-PS-04 Habitat II and Istanbul in 1996. In all these conferences, the focus was on following the Path of sustainable development and maintenance of ecosystem whether on land, water or air. The effort was an all inclusive development covering all sections of the population with a special focus on the vulnerable sections like women, children or the marginalized. A five year review of the progress of the 'Earth Summit' was held by the UN General Assembly in 1997. This was followed by a ten year review in 2002 by the World Summit on Sustainable Development held at Johannesburg, South Africa. It urged the Nations to make progress in the formulation and implementation strategies for sustainable development by 2005. In addition to those conferences, the Millennium Development Goals in 2000, Delhi Mandates in 2004, Kyoto Protocol in 2005, Montreal Protocol in 2007, Green Economy in 2008, Copenhagen Climate Negotiation in 2009, the G-20 Pittsburg Summit in 2009 and later at Durban 2011 and United Nations Climate Change Conference in Doha 2012 etc. were held to negotiate on world environmental problems and protection. The goals were to green the planet and to develop clean energy solution not at the cost of the future generations.

18.10 Affirmative Policies Pertaining to Environment in India : Constitutional, Legislative and Judicial Measures

The year of 1972 marked a revolution in the history of environmental management in India. It was the year in which a conference on Human Environment was held in Stockholm in response to the initiative of the United Nations. To implement the decision taken at the conference, the Indian Parliament introduced a landmark change in the field of environmental management. The then Prime Minister Mrs. Indira Gandhi in the first – International Conference on Human Environment at Stockholm in 1972 voiced deep concern about the degradation of the environment and eco-imbalances. She also emphasized that pollution, population and poverty are interrelated problems and there must be an integrated approach to deal with them. India being signatory of the Stockholm Declaration which is known as Magna Carta on human environment, the Indian Parliament passed the forty second amendment to the constitution in the year 1976 and incorporated specially two Articles relating to protection and improvement of environment. Article 48 A and 51 A(g) were inserted making state as well as the citizens, both under constitutional obligation to conserve, perceive, protect and improve the environment.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 243 Initially, the judiciary's response to the problems of the environment had been far from ideal and the courts outlook may be regarded as insensitive towards environmental issues and problems because of the unstable political scenario in the country in the wake of emergency rule., Till 1980s, not much contribution was made by the courts in preserving the environment, but one of the earliest cases which came to the Supreme Court, formed the foundation of judicial response. In Ratlam Municipality vs. Vardhich and A.I.R. 1980 S.C. 1623, Judge Krishalyer highlighted the need for environmental consciousness and elaborated the scope of the Criminal Law Concept of Public nuisance. In this case, the Supreme Court increased the range of section 133 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (CPC) to uphold a magistrate's order directing the municipality to carry out its duty towards residents. The municipality was ordered to remove the nuisance of open drains and of public refuse from nearby slum dwellers. The court observed that the non-availability of funds cannot be pleaded as ground for non-performance of municipality's statutory obligations. The case put forth the need of clean environment in all aspects. In early 1980s, Forest Conservation Act, 1980 and the Air (Prevention and Control of Pollution) Act were passed. But the authorities had shown reluctance to use their statutory power against the polluters which resulted in the acceleration of degradation of the environment. Therefore, the judiciary took the lead and played a key role in protecting and preserving the environment through its judicial pronouncements. The development of environmental jurisprudence in India through the innovative judicial decisions of the Supreme Court and the High Courts is a reaction towards the failure on the part of the Governmental agencies to effectively enforce the environmental laws. It needs to be pointed out that the new activist role of judicial policing over environmental issues triggered specially after the Bhopal Gas Leak Tragedy.

18.11 Constitutional Measures

The Indian constitution is amongst the few in the world that contains specific provisions on environment protection. In the Articles 48 A and 51 A(g) in the Constitution of India, the phrase 'Protect and Improve' environment are definitely the affirmative Government action to improve the quality of environment and not just to preserve the environment in its degraded form. Article 48 A reads as follows: "The state shall endeavor to protect and improve the environment and to safeguard the forest and wild life of the country". The amendment inserted Part VI A (Fundamental Duty) in the constitution which reads as follows :

244 NSOU • CC-PS-04 Article 51 A (g) "It shall be the duty of every citizen of India to protect and improve the natural environment including forests, lakes and wildlife and to have compassion for living creature". The cumulative effect of Articles 48 A and 51 A(g) binds the 'state' as well as the 'citizens' both under the constitutional obligation to conserve, perceive, protect and improve the environment. But, through Article 51 A (g), protection of environment was made a fundamental duty of all citizens. As a result, it is a fundamental duty of all citizens. As a result, reference to the environment has also been made in the Directive Principles of State Policy (Part –IV) as well as the Fundamental Rights (Part-III) of the constitution. The department of Environment was established in India in 1980 to ensure a healthy environment for the country. This later became the Ministry of Environment and Forests in 1985. Apart from the above constitutional provisions, the Article 'Right to life' contained in Article 21 of the Constitution of India includes the right to clean and human environment. It means that citizens have the right to live in a clean and healthy environment. It is a fundamental right. Following the constitutional mandate to protect and improve the environment, a plenty of legislations were passed on the subject. The relevant enactment are the water (Prevention and Central of P:ollution) Act, 1974, the Water Cess Act, 1977; the Air (Prevention and Control of Pollution) Act, 1981; the Environment (Protection) Act, 1986; Public Liability Insurance Act, 1991; the National Environmental Tribunal Act, 1995 and the National Environment Appellate Authority Act, 1997; the Wildlife (Protection) Act, 1972; the Forest (Conservation) Act, 1980 and The Noise Pollution (Regulation and Control) Rules, 2000; The Ozone Depleting Substances (Regulation and Control) Rules, 2000 etc. The Water Act 1974 provides for the Prevention and Control of Water Pollution and the maintaining or resorting of the unwholesome of water. The Act prohibits any poisonous, noxious or polluting matter from entering into any stream or well. The Act Provides for the formation of Central Pollution Control Board and the State Pollution Control Board. Both the Boards Constituted under the Water Act shall also perform the power and functions under the Air Act. Noise has been taken as air pollutant within the meaning of Air Act. Sound becomes noise when it causes annoyance or irritates. The use of crackers in marriages, religious ceremonies etc. cause not only noise pollution but also air pollution.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 245 Among the Acts, the Environment (Protection) Act, 1986 is an 'umbrella' legislation designed to provide a framework for Central Government coordination of the activities of various Central and State authorities established under previous laws, such as Water Act and Air Act. The Parliament passed the Public Liability Insurance Act, 1991 with a view to providing immediate relief to the persons affected by accident occurring while handling any hazardous substance and for matters connected therewith. The availability of immediate relief under this law would not prevent the victims to go to courts for claiming large compensation. For this purpose, The National Environment Tribunal Act, 1995 was enacted to provide for strict liability for damages arising out of accidents. The Wildlife (protection) Act, 1972 was enacted to provide for the protection of animals, birds and plants. The Act provides for State Wildlife Advisory Board to advise the State Government in formulation of the policy for protection and conservation of the wildlife and specified plants. The Forest (Conservation) Act, 1986 was passed to check deforestation of forests. It must be enforced strictly for the benefit of the general public. But it is clear that despite the constitutional mandate and elaborate legislations on environment, the enforcement of these legislations has been far from satisfactory. What is needed is the effective and efficient enforcement of both constitutional mandates and environmental legislations.

18.12 Judicial Activism for Environment Protection in India In recent years, there has been a sustained focus on the role played by the higher judiciary in devising and monitoring the implementation of measures of Pollution Control, conservation of forests and wildlife protection. Many of these judicial interventions have been triggered by persistent incoherence in policy making as well as the lack of capacity building amongst the executive agencies. Devices such as Public Interest Litigation (PIL), Public Trust Doctrine, and Polluter Pay Principles etc. have been prominently relied upon to tackle environmental problems. In addition to the statutory remedies such as under section 19 of the Environmental (Protection) Act, 1986, under area 133 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1973 and Section 268 for open irritation under IPC 1860, a Writ Petition can be filed under Article 32 in the Supreme Court of India or under Article 226 in the High Court. It may be mentioned 246 NSOU • CC-PS-04 here that the new activist role of judicial policing over environmental issues triggered specially after the Bhopal Gas leak tragedy. Besides the Article 32 and 226, the right of a person to pollution free environment is a part of basic jurisprudence of the land. Article 21 of the Constitution of India guarantees a fundamental right to life and personal liberty. The Supreme Court has interpreted the right to life and personal liberty to include the right to wholesome environment. The court through its various judgments has held that the mandate of right to life includes right to clean environment, drinking water and pollution free atmosphere.

18.13 Some Remarkable Principles and Doctrines Propounded by the Indian Judiciary

1. Doctrine of Absolute Liability : In the Bhopal case, the Union Carbide Corporation vs. Union of India, the Court held that where an enterprise is occupied with an inherently dangerous or a hazardous activity and harm results to anybody by virtue of a mishap in the operation of such dangerous poisonous gas, the enterprise is liable to repay everyone of the individuals who are affected by the accident. The risk factor is not subject to any exemptions. It needs to be mentioned that in 1984, Bhopal mass disaster took place due to 40 tons of deadly toxic Methyl Isocyanate Carbon (MIC) gas leaked into the atmosphere from Union Carbide's pesticide factory (U.S. based Company), causing 3500 casualties and injuring 200,000 people. Apart from this, M. C. Mehtra vs. Union of India is also a pointer to the threat of hazardous elements to the health of man by the Supreme Court justifying Article 21 of the Constitution.
2. Polluter Pays Principle : It means that "If anyone intentionally spoils the water of another Let him not only pay damages, but purify the stream or cistern which contains the water". Lately, this principle has become a very popular concept. The fundamental basis of the slogan is "If you make a mess, it is your duty to clean it up". In environmental law, it only supports a remedial method in repairing natural harm. But in International environmental law provides that the polluting party pays for the harm or damage done to the natural environment. In our country, the Supreme Court in Vellore Citizen's Welfare Forum vs. Union of India has declared that the polluter pays principle is an essential feature of the sustainable development. The remediation of NSOU • CC-PS-04 247 the damaged environment is part of the process of sustainable development and as such pollution is liable to pay the cost to the individual sufferers as well as the cost of reversing the damaged ecology. In this case, The Supreme Court further held that the pollution pay principle also means the 'Precautionary Principle' mandating the State Government to anticipate, prevent and attack the causes of environment degradation. Thus, this principle is closely associated with doctrine of sustainable development. Regarding the sustainable development, the court also dealt with the issue relating to the environment and development in the case of Rural Litigation and Entitlement Kendra Vs. State of UP and held that it is always to be remembered that the permanent assets of mankind are not intended to be exhausted in one generation.

3. Public Trust Doctrine : The Public Trust Doctrine rests on the Principle that certain resources like air, water, sea and the forests have such a great importance to people as a whole that it would be wholly unjustified to make them a subject of private ownership. The Doctrine imposes three kind of restrictions on the state: 1. The property must not be used for a Public purpose, it must be available for use by the General Public; 2. The property must not be sold; and 3. The property must be maintained for particular kind of uses such as navigation, recreation or fishery. In Bangalore Medical Trust Vs. B. S. Muddappa, the Supreme Court set aside the decision of the Bangalore Development Authority granting permission for converting the place reserved for Public Park for the establishment of a nursing home. The Court observed: "The Public interest on reservation and preservation of open spaces for parks and playgrounds cannot be sacrificed by leasing or selling such sites to private persons for conversion to some other use".

18.14 Public Interest Litigation Around 1980, the Indian Legal System, particularly the field of environmental law, underwent a sea-change in terms of discarding its traditional approach and it was marked by not only administrative and legislative activism but also judicial activism. 'Judicial Activism' refers to the active role played by the courts in India by adopting new creative and innovative interpretations of the constitutional rights

248 NSOU • CC-PS-04 expanding their ambit. This activism of the courts have been strengthened by the tool of Public Interest Litigation (PIL) which has enable the courts to entertain cases from public spirited individuals and NGOs active in the area of environmental protection. The concept 'the right to life' under Article 21 of the constitution gave the courts in India in making the expanded meaning of the term by playing active role. The ability to involve the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and the High Courts under Articles 32 and 226 is a remarkable step forward in providing protection for the environment The landmark judgments in protecting environment have come through the means of public interest litigation. The alarming air quality in Delhi and the surrounding region was heard by the Supreme Court highlighting the air pollution caused by vehicles by emitting dangerous smoke as a result of petrol and diesel. The result was pollution-related illness. The court ordered to ensure that the public transport vehicles playing on the roads of Delhi must use CNG as fuel. This could be realized through PIL (The Delhi Vehicular Pollution Case, 1985). Through the means of PIL, the Supreme Court has also undertaken the task of Pollution in the river Ganga (M.C.Mehta Vs. Union of India, Ganga Pollution Case, 1998). The Supreme Court in Bichhri Village Case, 1988 applied the 'Polluters Pays Principles' and asked the polluting industries to compensate for the environmental damage caused by it. It was also a PIL case. The Supreme has also undertaken the task of forest preservation very actively through the means of PIL in T. N. Godavarman Tirumulkpad Vs. Union of India, 1997. Mining License in forest area without proper approval by the Government is violative of the Forest (Conservation) Act. All ongoing activities under such invalid license must cease. The State Governments have to take necessary remedial measures, the Supreme Court added in its decisions. The fundamental right to water has evolved in India not through legislative action but through judicial interpretation. In Narmada BachaoAndolanvs. Union of India and others, the Supreme Court upheld that "Water is the basic need for the survival of human beings and is part of the right to life and human rights as enshrined in Article 21 of the Constitution. The order passed by the Supreme Court clearly demonstrates the failure of executive to ensure compliance with the forest laws of India.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 249 These PIL cases became examples for the many developing countries looking to India as a country where human rights championed by an independent judiciary in the area of environmental protection through PIL were the remarkable achievements. It shows the commitment of the courts in India towards the cause of environmental protection: The decisions of the courts have widened the scope of the right to life by reading into it, the right to a clean environment. Thus, the courts in India have lived up to the needs of the time and have made significant contributions in evolving new principles and remedies. In most cases, courts have issued directions to remind Government authorities of their responsibilities to protect the environment. The directions were given to local bodies, especially municipal authorities to remove garbage and waste for clean towns and cities. The Swachh Bharat Mission (Clean India Campaign) launched on Gandhi Jayanti, Oct. 2, 2014 is a point in this case as an example. The directives of the Supreme Court went to the extent of spreading environmental awareness and education as well as launching of environmental education at the School and College levels. In this connection, the court also directed every State Governments and Education Boards to take steps for environmental education. Finally, in order to cut down delays of judgments in courts which are hindering the implementation of environmental laws, the National Green Tribunal (NGT) was established on 18 th October, 2010 under the National Green Tribunal Act, 2010, for effective and expeditious disposal of cases relating to environmental protection and conservation of forests and other natural resources including enforcement of any legal rights and giving relief and compensation for damages to persons and property connected therewith. It is a specialized body equipped with the necessary expertise to handle environmental disputes involving multi-disciplinary issues. Initially, the NGT was proposed to be set up at five places of sitting and follow circuit procedure for making itself more accessible. New Delhi is the principle place of sitting of the Tribunal and Bhopal, Pune, Kolkata and Chennai are the other four places of sitting of the Tribunal Such courts may be vested with the jurisdiction to decide both criminal prosecution cases under the various environmental laws and civil cases for compensation to victims. The NGT consists of one judge and two experts from ecological and other sciences. The judge must be or has been a judge of the Supreme Court of India or Chief Justice of a High Court.

250 NSOU • CC-PS-04 18.15 Summary The earth is unique in the solar system in the sense that it is the only place that sustains life. But starting from the evolution of human being man has tried to achieve progress disregarding the sustainability of the earth. The concept of development has been equated with growth. Growth can bring money to individuals. It can ensure prosperity in terms infrastructure, transport, urbanization, industrialization fulfilling multi-dimensional needs. In fulfilling man's needs, man did not probe the linkages between development and environment. As a result, man's actions were having negative impact on the environment on a global scale leading to the degradation of ecological balance. The environmental degradation are now causing air pollution, deforestation, acid rain, Global Warming leading to climate change and other problems that are dangerous both to the earth and to ourselves. Today, the Conservation, Protection and improvement of human environment are major issues all over the world. Though numerous positive measures both at the global and local levels have been taken to tackle the environmental issues there is still a lack of its effective implementation. In India, it is evident, there are ample of constitutional and legislative provisions on environmental protection. But despite these rules and regulations, protection and preservation of the environment is still a pressing issue. Even the Courts in India have taken affirmative actions pertaining to environmental protection and preservation with phenomenal success. But mere legislations, rules and environmental activism by the judiciary would remain ineffective unless the people are awakened and political will is absent in its effective enforcement. In fact, what is needed is social awareness from below not from above. The protection of the environment and keeping ecological balance unaffected is a task which not only the Government but also every individual, association and cooperation must undertake. It is a social obligation and fundamental duty enshrined in Article 51 A (g) and Article 21 of the Constitution of India. 18.16 Summing Up • Environmental and ecological issue has assumed not only a national but global dimension today. The relationship between culture and nature has been punctuated with ecological degradation and crisis. The history of human civilization can be described as the history of ecological degradation and crisis.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 251 • The environmental degradation is anthropocentric. It is man's greed rather than need caused heightened adverse pressure on environment, generating ecological degradative shadows globally and putting man's existence in the world on the brink of extinction. The common lesson now is that nature cannot tamed and dominated it has to be nourished. Thought her care ample measures nationally and internationally for the preservation of environment but it is not enough. What actually needed is a war of awareness among the people to protect and keep ecological balance. 18.17 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. What do you mean by Environment? 19.2 Introduction Among the divisive forces which afflict India's national life, disrupt the bonds of unity among people and affect its development, caste is the major issue. It is India's most complex and unique system of social stratification. In this social stratification, the glaring practice of inequality has been the oppression and denial of rights on the basis of caste. It has evolved for thousand years in India. During the evolutionary course of history, reform movements such as Charuvaka, Buddhism, Bhakti etc. could not make a dent in its exploitative nature of the system of caste based on Brahminicalsupremacy. B. R. Ambedkar, being frustrated at the fate of repeated attempts to annihilate caste within the Hindu framework ultimately opted for mass conversion movement – "Dharma chakra Parivastan". Though his conversion also did not succeed much to undermine the social marker of caste. During colonial period, as a result some secular reform movements and with the progress of modernization brought by the colonial rulers themselves there started some process of emergence of consciousness among oppressed castes as also some changes in the caste system. Yet, no significant change occurred as the lower echelons in the Hindu social hierarchy of caste system were deprived of access of jobs or education. The upper castes, especially the Brahman cornered the most prestigious jobs and received the best education.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 255 In the Post-Colonial India, caste continues to remain significant though the members of the Constituent Assembly firmly believed that with democracy and modernization, it would lose its importance. Far from losing importance, caste continues to exert determining influence in Indian society. Not only is the caste most conspicuous marker of social privileges in India as an insulated system of ritual- status hierarchy embedded in the religions culture of India, caste is able to maintain its autonomy and stability of status hierarchy by accommodating the changes without losing its structural and cultural integrity as well. So, it still survives by bringing in the process of 'Casteisation of Politics' within the democratic matrix on the one hand, and political mobilization of caste groups by the Political Parties in competitive politics has made them a politically significant variable on the other. The process is one of politicization of castes. The singular impact of competitive democratic politics on the caste system is that it delegitimized the old hierarchical relations among castes, facilitating new horizontal power relations among them. In such a process, ever-increasing demand for justice for the numerically dominant caste especially the OBC caste brought fore the need for affirmative action which is known in India as reservation. Thus, almost all political parties in modern India in order to consolidate their support have aligned with one caste group or another. Caste has, therefore, become a significant criterion of electoral politics in contemporary India.

19.3 Meaning and Nature of Caste While caste reigns supreme in the innumerable classes and divisions encompassing all aspects of the life, no precise definition of caste is available. Scholars are not unanimous in arriving at a commonly acceptable definition. Even there is a lack of accurate distinction between 'Varna' and 'Jati'. The prevalence of different perspectives to the analysis of caste stratification leads the scholars to locate the precise place of caste very difficult in Indian society.

The word Caste originated from the Spanish and Portuguese word 'Casta' meaning 'race, lineage or breed' or 'a group having hereditary quality'. The term was applied to people of India by the Portuguese to denote 'jati' and 'Varna'. There are four 'Varnas'- Brahmin, Kshatriya, Vaishya, Sudra and about 4000 'Jati'. The Portuguese specifically denoted caste to 'Jati'. In this sense, castes are to quote Andre Beteille, "hierarchically ranked groups or categories based on hereditary membership which maintain their social identity by strict rules of endogamy". Each caste is usually associated with more or less distinct ritual status in the hierarchical 256 NSOU • CC-PS-04 system based on the concepts of purity and pollution, that is, each caste is considered inferior to those above it and superior to those below it primarily in terms of purity/ pollution. But as the concept of 'Jati' originates from the root word 'Jana' which implies taking birth, caste is thus concerned with birth. According to Anderson and Parker, "Caste is the extreme form of social class organization in which position of individuals in the status hierarchy is determined by decent and birth". Caste system is thus extremely elaborated and varied in its structure from area to area – so much so that it does not really constitute one 'system' at all, but a connected diversity of varying beliefs and cultural practices, though certain principles are shared by all the caste. As the 'Varna' system dividing into four Varnas may have existed in the stratificatory system in the past. In course of time, the fragmentation within them led to the emergence of hundreds of jatis. But Varna stratification had existed only at the level of theory, it was never a reality. The stratification that is prevailing is seen as jatis not of four varnas. Sometimes, both the concepts are used/ treated as synonymous, within the four-fold category of varna system, there is another group known as Ati-Sudra or untouchables, now categorized as backward castes or classes. Caste can now be defined as hereditary endogamous group, having common name, common traditional occupation, common culture, relatively rigid in matters of mobility, distinctiveness of status and forming a single homogenous community. A caste is a horizontal segmental division of society spread over a region, district or the whole state and also sometimes outside it. In the context of India, caste is not only a horizontal segmental division of society because various castes found in India are equal; there is an element of inequality prevalent in caste system originating particularly on the basis of inequality concept of Varna system. So, it can be apt to term caste system in India as vertical segmental division of the society also. Caste is closely related to the unequal distribution of power. It is not only a cultural system concerned with ideas and values but also a structural system concerned with domination and subjugation, privileges and deprivations, surplus and exploitation. From the above, it is evident that there are some features in the caste system. The 16th Century Portuguese visitor Duarte Barbosa provides an empirical account of caste. He identified the main features of the caste system: (a) as a hierarchy, with Brahmins at the top and 'untouchables' at the bottom; (b) as the practice of untouchability premised on the idea of 'pollution'; (c) as the existence of a plurality NSOU • CC-PS-04 257 of 'castes' separated from each other by endogamy, occupation and commensality; (d) as a system in which sanctions are applied to maintain customs and rules; and (e) as a relationship of caste with political organization. The distinctiveness in Barbosa's account of caste reveals the fact that he did not use the religions scriptures as the source of caste information. There is no reference to the Varna Theory of Caste in his narratives. He related the idea of pollution to the practice of untouchability and not to the functioning of the whole system. He saw caste not exclusively in ritual – status terms but also as a plurality of self-governing cultural communities.

19.4 Caste and Class Distinction Some scholars are of the view that castes are essentially class. The earlier ethnographers were interested in the question whether caste can be called class and whether they are interchangeable. Sociologists hold the view that caste and class are two distinct entities. The caste and class are the two forms of social stratification in India. Caste is a hierarchical division of society.

A sense of highness and lowness is associated with this gradation or ranking.

A class system on the other hand allows both exogamy and endogamy, permits mobility either up or down the system. Caste is a social category, whereas class is an economic category. Caste is based on ritual criterion whereas class is based on secular. Ritual criterion means it is based on religious myths, secular means non-religious criterion like economic, political and social criterion. While caste is hereditary, a class is non-hereditary in nature. Though caste and class are not identical; but can be an important ingredient to identify the backward class. So, unlike class, caste is the basic pillar of the Indian social system. Caste in India may be taken as an example of social hierarchical system which has been serving for long time in India as social institution. Caste is not only an institution that characterized the structure of social stratification; it represented the core of India. It was both an institution and an ideology. Institutionally, caste provided a framework for arranging and organizing social groups in terms of their statuses and positions in the social and economic system. As an ideology, caste was a system of values and ideas that legitimized and reinforced the existing structures of social inequality. It provided a world view around which a typical Hindu organized his/her life. Apart from being an institution that distinguished India from other societies, caste was an epitome of the traditional society, a 'closed system' where generation after generation 258 NSOU • CC-PS-04 of individuals did similar kinds of work and lived more or less similar kinds of lives. Louis Dumont who approached the Hindu Caste system from a structural perspective, subscribed the above view and he further defined caste in terms of pure and impure, especially the superiority of the pure over the impure. Dumont also referred to 'status' in caste society as a principle of social organization superior to power. According to him, "status encompassed power". So, individual's position in the hierarchy is determined by status. But caste hierarchy has never been static throughout history. Though the upper castes have successfully tried to improve their status, having improved economic condition, a dominant section of some of the lower castes including the groups which were at one time treated as untouchables imitated customs and norms of the upper caste; what M. N. Srinivas conceptualized it as the process of 'Sanskritisation'. Yet another change witnessed in the caste system is the process of de- sanskritisation. K. L. Sharma who worked in the villages of Rajasthan informs that the higher castes are giving up their Sanskrit values in order to have interaction with the lower castes. He gave evidence showing the fact that the Rajputs, Jats and Brahmins now do not hesitate to touch the untouchables or even to sharing smoking with them. Commenting on this nature of change being experienced in caste with the rise of non-Brahmin movements in Southern India, G. S. Ghurye had argued that the attack on hierarchy by such mobilization did not mean the end of caste. It is a new kind of collective sentiment, "the feeling of caste solidarity" which could be "truly described as caste patriotism".

19.5 Caste in Colonial India

The significant change in caste system took place after a "second discovery" of caste by the Europeans. The Western Orientalist scholars, The Christian Missionaries and the British administrators began in their different ways to make sense of this complex phenomenon. A new discourse placed by them marked an important departure from pre-colonial accounts of caste. This new discourse was the product of a historical encounter between India and Western (British) Colonial Rule. The changes that brought about in caste were the unintended consequences of colonial policies. The oriental scholars reconstructed caste on the basis of Hindu religious NSOU • CC-PS-04 259 scripture depicting it as the prism through which the colonial rulers began to see Indians and the whole of Indian society. To the British rulers, caste Hindus and untouchables and other low castes could hardly expect to work together as equals in a democratic political order as the former would maintain the rigidity of traditional hierarchies and caste discriminations which would prevent the poor and disadvantaged low castes from participating effectively in politics. Nevertheless, during the colonial period itself the existential realities of caste system began to be different from its typical ideal form. On the one hand, the traditional aspects of the caste system were getting changed and on the other hand, caste was acquiring new dimensions and functions – political. For administrative purpose, the British Government had brought a good deal of improvement in communication. The immediate effect of his, Writes Srinivas, was that it increased caste consciousness and inter-caste competition. This happened because now it was possible for the caste relations to outgrow its regional constraints and develop caste associations so as to bargain for some concessions from the British Government on the plea of backwardness in order to catch up with the advanced castes. Under such a situation, the colonial state assumed dual role: “that of a super-Brahmin who located and relocated disputed statuses of caste in the traditional hierarchy, and that of a just and modern ruler who wished to recognize the rights and aspirations of this weak and poor subjects”. Thus, colonialism was for instance, instrumental in ‘politicizing caste’ for its own ‘divide and rule’ strategy that was articulated through its well-calculated reservation scheme. The nationalist’s insistence on caste-based reservation had given the legitimacy which the colonial state needed to justify the scheme as beneficial to the peripheral majority who remained marginalized in the Hindu social hierarchy due to their birth in so-called lower castes. This scheme also helped the colonial state to protect its colonial political economy from incursion of the emerging nationalist movement. On the whole, the colonial regime not only introduced new terms of discourse on caste but also brought about some changes in the caste system itself. The most important among the changes was the formation of a new trans-local identity among lower castes collectively by forming caste association. Lloyd and Susanne Rudolph looked at the caste associations as agents of modernity in a traditional society like India. Rajni Kothari argued against the popular notion that democratic politics was helping traditional institutions like caste to resuscitate and reestablish their legitimacy. But this could lead to disintegrative tendencies that would disrupt the democratic and secular framework of Indian polity.

260 NSOU • CC-PS-04 Alongside the colonial dispensation of caste, during this period various socio- religious movements attacked the caste system. The social reformers like Raja Ram Mohan Roy, M. G. Ranade, Swami DayanandSaraswati and Jyoti Rao Phule etc. took up pioneering role through various organizations as well as the Rama Krishna Mission by Swami Vivekananda for abolishing caste system. However, these personalities and their movements could not succeed in removing the rigidity of the caste system in this period. 19.6 Caste in Independent India After independence many qualitative changes were introduced in the political system. The post-independence political leadership took a clear stand and position against giving caste any legitimate place in the political organizations of the new democratic nation. It was imagined that with the unfolding of the processes of industrialization, urbanization and modernization, the caste would disappear. But instead of disappearing; it was experiencing as a new ‘avatar’ in the democratic politics after India’s Independence. The changes that occurred in caste, especially after independence, amount to “de-ritualization of caste”. It means the delinking of caste from various forms of rituality which bounded it to a fixed status, an occupation, and rules of commensality and endogamy. Caste now survives as a kinship-based cultural community operating in a differently new emergent system of stratification. The modernization of India’s economy and the democratization of its political institutions have changed the hierarchically ordered strata of castes into a horizontal groups competing for power and control over resources in society. The feeling of belonging caste consciousness is expressed more in the nature of community consciousness rather than in hierarchical terms. This disintegrating system of traditional statuses into the new power system were created by elections, political parties and social policies – such as that of affirmative action of the state. Moreover, occupational structure based on traditional hereditary ritual status – pure and impure, undergoes changes due to income levels and life-styles. Along with this, the caste rules of commensality that is restrictions on accepting cooked food from members of other castes have become inoperative. The rules of endogamy have relaxed resulting in inter-caste marriage. Thus, the ideology and organization of the traditional caste system have become vastly eroded. This phenomenon is not only visible at the macro-level and urban

NSOU • CC-PS-04 261 areas, the rural areas are also subjected progressively to the same process. The traditional 'Jajmani' relationships which once regulated economic transactions between castes in social ritual terms, have been replaced by the relationships of employer- employee, of capital and wage labour. The consciousness created among members of the caste groups a perception of common political interest and modern status aspirations. The entire process is known as de-ritualization of caste system. 19.7 Politicization of Castes The deconstruction ideological foundation of India's hierarchical social order of caste politicized the Scheduled Castes and other backward castes. Some middle and lower castes sought equality with the upper castes. The compulsions of democratic system to mobilize the illiterate people particularly the poor and marginalized who had hitherto remained untouched by political processes, were politicized and began to participate in electoral politics. In this process, the universal adult voting rights is the most potent weapon of all in its hands. Due to the numerical strength castes got representation in decision making bodies and the strength of traditionally dominant castes was weakened. Political parties of all hues in modern India prefer to consolidate their support by aligning with one caste group or another. Therefore, the 'casteism in politics' is politicization of caste: By drawing the caste system into the web of organization, politics finds material for its articulation and moulds it into its own design. In making politics their sphere of activity, caste and kin groups get a chance to assert their identity and strive for positions. Caste has therefore become a significant criterion of electoral politics in contemporary India. Irawati Karve rightly points out that politician who enjoy privileged position aimed at perpetuating the operation of caste to seek sanction for their power in social system which possesses a great inequality in status, worldly goods and opportunities. In the rural context, 'Caste in Politics' has been the instrument of mobilization, a channel of communication, representation and leadership which links the electorate to the new democratic process. This inter-relationship frees the lower castes from exploitation and victimization by other castes. In this way, caste has provided 'substance of politics'. The resultant factor is that the meaning of caste itself has changed in the encounter between tradition and modernity. By creating conditions in which a caste's significance and power is beginning to depend on its numbers rather than on its ritual and social status and by encouraging egalitarian aspirations among its members, the caste association is exerting a liberating influence. In this sense,

262 NSOU • CC-PS-04 politicization of caste is creating a new cohesion which is making caste perform roles which are new and secular, based not on ascription but community outlook and aggregation of interest. Thus, politicization brought about some important changes in the "grammar of Indian politics". It shifted the democracy from the 'politics of ideology' to the 'politics of representation'. 19.8 Caste Reservations and The Indian Constitution In independent India, the affirmative actions significantly facilitated the rise to political power of the lower castes. This affirmative action is known as reservations. India gained her independence from the colonial rule of Great Britain in 1947. The new Indian state was modeled on British lines – a parliamentary democracy was established. Nehru and Ambedkar were both committed to the idea of an egalitarian India. These men were cognizant that a religion and caste-based would be contrary to egalitarian principles and would evoke discontent among the lower castes. Ambedkar expressed his view that "Anything you will build on the foundation of caste will crack and will never be a whole". The opening pages of the constitution, its preamble, envisaged a nation where the values of "equality, liberty and fraternity" would be supreme. Following the practices in democratic regimes of the western world, the Indian Constitution invented all legislative powers in Parliament and Legislative Assemblies in a federal system which was to be made up of elected representatives of the Indian people by strictly following the principle of universal adult franchise. While caste was decried by the middle class leaders of independent India, the mainstream Indian political leadership recognized the crippling impact that the working of the system over the centuries would have had on the subordinated sections of the Indian people and the implications of this ancient system on building a true democracy and individual citizenship. Against this backdrop, the Indian Constitution instituted certain legal and institutional measures in the Fundamental Rights and the Directive Principles to enable groups and communities of people who had been historically disadvantaged in the social system to participate in the game of democratic politics on equal terms. There will be no denying the fact that the positive effects the Indian policies and programmes of affirmative action have had in enabling the historically deprived

NSOU • CC-PS-04 263 sections of Indian people to participate in the economic and political life of the nation. India has also been successful in having been able to institutionalize a healthy system of democratic governance at different levels of its political system. While these achievements are no doubt commendable, they have not meant an end of caste in the social and political life of the nation. Caste has become politically more active institution today than it ever was in the past. The caste has got vibrancy largely due to the present electoral processes and competitive politics. This democratic and electoral experience has belied the hopes of the founders of modern nation. Though the Indian Political Scientists have defined the democratic process but the “deepening of democracy” questions have been raised as to the contradiction between the place of caste and democracy. The survival of caste clearly points out the flawed understanding of the reality of caste and that of the sociology of democratic politics. The Indian Constitution explicitly incorporates Compensatory Discrimination Politics in its different articles of the Fundamental Rights and the Directive Principles for the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes as well as socially and educationally backward classes in order to bring them into the mainstream and also to compensate them for centuries of discrimination. The key article 14 of the Constitution which guaranteed equality before law and equal protection of the law for all of India’s citizens, would aid in fulfilling the objectives of the democratic principles. But, the idea of reservation was accepted through provisions of fundamental rights for equality mainly in Article 15. Article 15(4) however, allows the state to make special provisions in the form of reservation for the advancement of both socially and educationally backward classes and those who are designated as scheduled castes or scheduled tribes. Correspondingly in Article 334 and 332 made guarantees in the form of reservations in legislatures, claims in services and posts in Article 335. Article 16(1) further provides equality of opportunity to all but adds that the state can make special provisions for SCs and STs [Article 16(4)]. Their interests are also taken care in the Directive Principles of state policy specifically in Article 38 and 46 which aim at securing social justice to the deprived sections of the population. Before 2019, the reservation was provided mainly on the basis of social and educational backwardness of castes. But after the 103rd Constitutional Amendment in 2019, economic backwardness is also considered, resulting in 10% reservation for economically weaker sections of the society, especially for the general people.

264 NSOU • CC-PS-04 Table–I Reservation Quota in India for Government Jobs Reservation Category Reservation Quota % Scheduled Tribe (ST) 7.5 Scheduled Caste (SC) 15 Other Backward Classes (OBC) 27 Economically Weaker Section* 10 Total 59.50% *103rd constitutional amendment. As seen from the above table, about 60% of seats are reserved in India for various sections like ST, SC, OBC and EWS (economically weaker section) with respect to Government jobs and Higher Education Institutions. 3% of seats are also reserved for differently abled persons across all categories. This means that only 40% of seats are available under merit. In the merit of seats, not only the general category candidates but all other categories like SC, ST, OBC and EWS can also compete (EWS in Articles 15(6) and 16(6).) Reservation is provided not only with respect to direct recruitment but also with respect to promotions for SC/ST category (Article 16(4A)). The constitution in Article 17 abolishes untouchability and forbids its practice in any form and obligates the state to make special provision for the betterment of the SCs and STs. The two most contentious issues in the application of Article 15(4), which is now also the case with Article 15(5) as well as Article 16(4) have been the question of identification of other backward classes and the extent or quantum of reservation because of the absence of any constitutional definition or exclusive method or agency for their designation. After three decades of independence for the lower castes of peasants, artisans, the untouchables and the tribals – these groups intermediate between the Scheduled Castes at the bottom and the Brahmins and Rajputs at the top, were vociferous in reserving their seats and sharing representation in political power. Their rise has radically altered India’s political texture in recent times. It was around the mid-1970s that upper caste hegemony over national politics began to be seriously challenged. This was largely due to the social policies of the state, particularly that

NSOU • CC-PS-04 265 of reservations (affirmative action). Despite tardy implementation, towards the end of the 1970s the reservation policy had created a small but significant section in each of the lower caste groups which had acquired education and economic power for land reforms and the Green revolution and which had entered the bureaucracy and other non-traditional occupations. In the process, a small but highly vocal political leadership emerged from among the lower castes. The process of second politicization of castes, however, came to a head at the beginning of the 1980s. In this connection, as per Article 340, the President of India, as per the constitutional order appointed a Commission to investigate the conditions of socially and educationally backward classes of citizens within the territory. The Commission's task is to identify the OBCs as well as recommend measures for their social and educational advancement.

19.9 The Commissions and Reservations Before the appointment of the Second Commission for Backward classes, the Government of India in 1953 appointed the First Backward Classes Commission headed by Kaka Saheb Kalekar, consisting of 11 members. The Commission used four criteria for identifying the OBCs: (a) Low social position in the traditional Caste hierarchy of Hindu Society; (b) Lack of general educational advancement; (c) inadequate representation in government services; and (d) inadequate representation in trade, commerce and industry. On the basis of those above criteria, the Kalelkar Commission identified 2399 castes/groups as backward classes. But there was difference of opinion among the members of the Commission. Finally, the Chairman himself repudiated the entire report in his covering letter to the President of India. The Government did not accept the recommendations.

19.10 The Mandal Commission As a result of development of agriculture, abolition of Zamindari system, introduction of electoral politics etc. some of the intermediate and lower castes have been becoming socially and politically important. In view of their numerical strength in some states they had been able to influence the election outcomes. Thus, in 1960s and 1970s their role in politics became significant. It was in view of this development

266 NSOU • CC-PS-04 that some state governments started accepting their demands for reservations to give them due share in government jobs. In December 1978, the Janata Government appointed the Second Backward Classes Commission headed by Bindhyeshwari Prasad Mandal; the former Chief Minister of Bihar. It had five other members. The Mandal Commission identified caste as the main denominator of backwardness. On the basis of state survey, the Commission suggested that OBCs forming 52% of country's population required special concession to correct the social imbalance. But The Supreme Court ruled that reservations cannot exceed 50% of the jobs. So, the commission reluctantly agreed to accept 27% jobs for the OBCs though they constituted more than half of India's population.

The 27% reservation for the OBCs also included educational institutions. In contrast with the Kalelkar Commission, which took into account economic variables among other criteria, the Mandal Commission Report changed the original philosophy of reservations by clearly identifying caste as the sole criterion for backwardness. Thus, the so-called Mandalised politics, a euphemism for the politicisation of lower castes has resulted in radically altering the social bases of politics in India. Scholars have described this phase as "deepening of democracy".

Recommending 'quota' for the OBCs, the report is broadly a scheme for 'affirmative action' for socially under-privileged sections of society. By deciding to implement the Mandal Commission Report, submitted to the Government of India in 1980, the V. P. Singh Government accepting it in 1990, attempted on August 7, 1990 to implement the Mandal Commission's recommendations relating to job reservation to the extent of 27%. This meant now that reservations in jobs were 22.5% for the SC and ST and 27% for other Backward Castes.

The Commission reminded the fact that candidates belonging to OBCs recruited on the basis of merit in an open competition should not be adjusted against their reservation quota of 27%.

In addition, the Commission also followed the Supreme Court judgement in 1963 in Balaji Case that total reservation should be less than 50%. Whatever the advantage caste-divided social structure. As a scheme striving to strike a balance between the privileged upper castes and the hitherto neglected OBCs, The Mandal Report deserves appreciation. December 2005, the Lok Sabha passed the 93rd Constitutional Amendment Act, 2005 rolling back the Supreme Court judgement by introducing a new clause into Article 15 to allow for reservations for SCs and STs as well as other backward classes in private unaided educational institutions other than minority institutions. In 2006, the United Progressive Alliance (UPA) Government agreed to introduce 27% reservations for OBCs in Central Government funded higher educational institutions like Indian Institute of Management, Indian Institute of Technology, All India Institute of Medical Sciences and Central Universities. The proposed design in fact is meant to introduce 27% 'quota' to all institutions of higher learning.

However, in the case of Indira Sawhney vs. Union of India, the Supreme Court on 16 November 1992 upheld 27% reservations subject to the exclusion of socially- advanced persons/sections (creamy layer) from amongst the OBCs. In a landmark judgement in April 2008, in the case of Ashoka Kumar Thakur vs. Union of India validating the 93rd Amendment Act, the Supreme Court endorsed the demand for reservation for the demographically preponderant OBCs in higher educational institutions by excluding 'the creamy layer'.

The political imperatives behind reservations are clear. What prompted the ruling parties to accept the 'mandalisation of politics' is possibly a well-calculated design aiming at mobilising the support of the OBCs elite.

OBC society, its wealth, relatively high education and hegemony in a majority of caste councils, became the most significant power-brokers in the Hindi heartland. So, the Mandal formula, designed to ensure social justice, is virtually a scheme for creating and sustaining a secure vote bank for the V. P. Singh – led National Front Government. The decision to implement the Mandal Commission Report is just another effort to effectively draw on caste sentiments for victory in elections. it is not strange that elections are calculated on caste basis, the candidates are nominated on caste ratio and as a consequence, patronage is to be distributed on caste basis and public policies are also tilted in favour of caste support base. Despite sharp criticisms and violent student agitation against the Mandal Commission Report, the formula deserves serious attention as it tries to correct the injustices of centuries inflicted on the downtrodden in the name of the discriminatory Varna system.

Being armed with the reservations, the categories of OBCs, SCs and STs have acquired a strong social and political content and surfaced as new social formations. They are now operating in politics with the self-consciousness of socio-economic groups. Not content with proxy reservation by the upper caste – middle class elites, they are viewing for political power for themselves. Politics has now become a contest for representation among horizontal power groups, representing social collectivities as identified by the policy of reservation. Whatever survived of the hierarchical dimension of the traditional stratificatory system in politics has thus effectively been horizontalised. So, the 'Mandalised Politics' by generating aspirations among the lower castes to attain 'middle class' status and life-styles, prevented the process of class polarisation in India. It would not be an exaggeration to point out the fact that the centre of gravity in Indian politics is now defined by 'quota politics'. The reservation through quota translates 'protective discrimination into reality. In contrast with 'affirmative action' practised in the US, it is the combination of quotas and lower eligibility criteria that defines protective discrimination in India. So, the Mandal

Commission was not merely a political statement, it also meaningfully redefined

the nationalist goal of a more equal and just society by empowering the disadvantaged and recognising the socially denigrated groups in addition to reduction of socio-economic disparities. 19.11 The Implementation of Reservation Policy In addition to constitutional provisions, the Government of India has pursued a two-pronged approach to narrowing the gap between the socio-economic status of the Scheduled Caste, Scheduled Tribes and other backward classes and the national average: one prong involves regulatory measures which ensure the various provisions to protect their rights and interests are adequately implemented, enforced and NSOU • CC-PS-04 269 monitored; the second focuses on increasing self-sufficiency of the caste populations through financial assistance for self-employment activities through development programmes to increase education and skills. The protective component of this strategy includes the enforcement of those legal provisions that make up the Protection of Civil Rights Acts, 1955 and the scheduled caste and scheduled tribe (Prevention and Atrocities) Act, 1989; of other State and Central Government laws; and of 'positive discrimination' through reservations in the areas of government employment and higher education. These protective measures are monitored by the National Commissions for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes set up pursuant to Article 338 of the Indian Constitution and entrusted with the responsibility to ensure the implementation of the safeguards and protection given to Scheduled Castes and tribes. The development measures for the educational, social and economic upliftment of Scheduled Castes are administered by the Ministry of Social Justice and Empowerment. There have been a lot of plans made for the empowerment and development of SCs and STs till now, but still a lot hard work has to be done in order to imagine for the equality on the ground. Despite a lot of plans, the people are not getting proper education, employment, health, sanitation facilities. Actually the problem is not that the development plans are lacking, but they are not properly implemented. It can also be seen that the various provisions of the Constitution and subsequent constitutional amendments and legislations that the government is trying to use reservation as a tool for the upliftment of backwardness. But now the question arises as to how far this tool of reservation has been successful in its aim. It may be admitted that reservations are an attempt, however, imperfect to equalise opportunity in the face of social structure that is antithetical to equality of opportunity. But reservations alone constitute insufficient remedy to the problem of caste discrimination in India as the reservations have in itself been subject to criticisms by various masses of people. But for about 70 years after Independence, India still remains one of the world's most inegalitarian societies. By some estimates, 350 million people – like nearly the whole population of India in 1947 – remain below the poverty. But if the current data are analysed, it would depict the picture different from the above estimates. Between 2004-2005 and 2011- 2012, more people among the deprived social classes – Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes and Other Backward classes (OBC) – were brought above the poverty line, compared to other segments of society as per data

270 NSOU • CC-PS-04 released by the Planning Commission. In 2004-05, more than half the SC and ST population in rural areas was below the poverty line. By 2011-12, poverty among SCs in rural areas fell 22% from 53.5% in 2004-05 to 31.5%. For SCs in urban areas, the fall was of 19% i.e. from 40.6% in 2004-05 to 21.7% in 2011-12. The following Table gives us an overall situation of social groups in India. Table-2 Poverty Ratio among the Social group (%) Rural 1993-94 2004-05 % 2011-12 % Scheduled Castes 62.4 53.5 – 8.9 31.5 22.0 OBC – 39.8 – 31.5 17.2 ST 65.9 62.3 – 3.6 45.5 17.0 Others – 27.1 – 15.5 11.6 All Population 50.1 41.8 – 8.3 25.7 16.1 Urban 1993-94 2004-05 % 2011-12 % Scheduled Castes 51.7 40.6 – 11.1 21.7 18.9 OBC – 30.6 – 15.4 15.2 ST 41.1 35.5 – 5.6 24.1 11.4 Others – 16.1 – 8.2 7.9 All Population 31.8 25.7 – 6.1 13.7 12.0 Source : Planning Commission. As regards in government employment or University admission is that the main beneficiaries of reservations are the children of Dalits or lower caste people who have previously won a place in society, thereby checking off the entry of the less advantaged. Both SCs and STs who initially benefited and uplifted themselves economically and socially are enjoying the maximum benefits of reservations. Those who are placed at a more disadvantaged position are failing in competition with the greater advantage in terms of education. Every member of an OBC, STs and SCs who works for government or studies at a University comes from this microscopic NSOU • CC-PS-04 271 minority. Reservations are thus an advantage of the tiny elite and to the educationally more backward castes it is a mirage. Consequently, reservations still do not reach down to lower 96% of the OBCs. As redistributive efforts, reservation policies have produced substantial development, but it has not spread evenly to the intended beneficiaries. The distribution of IAS (Indian Administrative Service) Officers by caste shows that among 3235 Hindu Officers, the largest single group is that of Brahmins at 37.6%. The second largest number is claimed by the Kayasthas at 13.3%. These two traditional literati castes together including Kshatriyas and Vaishyas make up 68% of the total. The Sudras by contrast are represented at a minimal level of 2%. But a significant change can be noticed in the Parliament with regard to its caste composition of the Lok Sabha. Not surprisingly, in the first three Lok Sabha, the upper castes constituted nearly 50% of the MPs. By the 14 th Lok Sabha, the percentage of upper castes had dropped to below 40%. In particular, the number of Brahmins who made up nearly a quarter of MPs in the first Parliament had declined dramatically to around 10% by 2004. This mirrors the trend of the decline in prominent Brahmin leaders in Indian politics and a concomitant rise in the influence of other upper castes, such as Thakurs and Rajputs. At same time, the percentage of other Backward Classes (OBCs) – a category that encompasses the lower castes but not the former untouchables or Scheduled Castes (SCs) – has progressively risen from 12% in the first Lok Sabha to around 25% in the 9 th Lok Sabha – a level at which it still remains. The doubling of the share of the OBCs in the Parliament was a result of the forces unleashed by the Mandal Commission Report recommending 27% reservations for the OBCs. The percentage of SCs and STs has however, remained fairly steady due to the system of reserved constituencies. The percentage of Muslims in the Parliament has consistently been lower than their share of the population, reaching a high of around 10% in the 7 th Lok Sabha before declining subsequently. In the current Lok Sabha, the share of Muslims in the Parliament is the lowest ever at 5%. (The above data have been from

In spite of some positive side of the affirmative benefits, many writings and instances suggest the negative sides of it. The atrocities on Dalits in various places of the country especially the killing of two Dalit children in Faridabad in UP on 20

272 NSOU • CC-PS-04 October, 2015, naked parading of Dalit women still comes to light from time to time. The age-old custom barring the Dalit women from entering the Sabarimala Mandir recently is an incident in this respect. In addition to it, violence against lower castes is perpetrated on purely caste basis. We still see that instances of inhuman jobs like manual scavenging or sweepers are being in practice on a definite caste pattern. According National Crime Records Bureau (NCRB) 2013, the total number of crimes committed against SCs is on the increase. 14,646 in 1991, 35,501 in 2001 and 33,594 in 2009 have happened in the country. The total number of reported cases of SCs being murdered by the Non-SCs rose from 493 in 1981 to 624 in 2009. A similar rising trend is evident with regard to rape cases as well. Although SCs/Dalits account for nearly 16% of the Indian population, they are too small in number to comfort the upper castes' oppression. In this respect, the Ranavir Sena, the upper caste army against the lower castes, may be mentioned. Despite improvements in some sectors of Indian political and administrative representation of the OBCs, it appears to be not up to the expectation. What the founding fathers of the Constitution envisaged to make India casteless and free from socio-economic disparities of the disadvantaged sections of the population through the affirmative action policies, the scenario is yet to be achieved fully. With the introduction of liberal market oriented policies, it is anticipated that the higher rate of economic growth and the expansion of employment opportunities that should provide some benefit for the lower classes/castes. But in the absence of a system of mass education and an adequate health care delivery system to rural areas and above all monitoring the poverty reduction programme, the most members of the lower castes would lack the human capital to enable them to take advantage of whatever opportunities the expanding economy provides. "Unless that is done, India would remain a ranked hierarchical social order but without the ideological legitimacy and social stability that undergirded the old social order. The paradox in India lies in the fact that old order has begun to disintegrate but new order has not yet risen".

19.12 Conclusion The discourse on the subject of caste and the affirmative politics for the amelioration of inequality highlights the fact that the caste groups instead of crumbling have adapted themselves well to the demands of the Parliamentary politics. Their participation in electoral politics also transformed the structural properties of NSOU • CC-PS-04 273 caste in one fundamental respect: it created a democracy of castes in place of a hierarchy. Thus, the democratic equality, the experience of participating in electoral politics, has mainly been translated as equality between caste groups, not among caste-less individuals. The notions of modernity and democracy that guided the visions of the nationalist leadership at the time of India's Independence from colonial rule, have been of little value as the caste and its removal through equalisation process have brought about the strengthening of caste and its polarisation in lieu of ending of caste. The preamble to the Constitution of India commits itself to secure justice, social, economic and political, equality of status and opportunity. But merely declaring that all citizens are free and equal was not sufficient and there was need to create a mechanism of law for achieving social change. It is really a paradoxical situation that on the one hand, constitution is having a foundation of social change; but on the other hand, India is hiding the real segregation, exploitation and other forms of abuse by not allowing further studies into the condition of backwardness. Despite a large body of legislations, the laws have benefitted few and still there are a large number of people who suffer from discrimination, social exclusion and oppression; the people are still besieged with the mind-sets of superiority and inferiority of caste. While equality in opportunity is being emphasised, gross inequalities have been produced by the forces of globalisation. Dalits, who are already at a disadvantage in an egalitarian social order, are bound to lose more when there is intervention from a free market which actually is not free in the true sense of the term.

all social, economic and political relationships for the individual. Caste is so tacitly and so completely accepted by all, including those most vocal in condemning it, that it is everywhere the unit of social action. It is also a major variable of the Indian political system assuming new functions like influencing politics and their role in political dynamics is gradually increasing. To put it in Kothari's words that 'it is not politics that gets caste ridden; it

The operation of competitive politics has drawn caste out of its a political context and given it a new status and identity. • Similarly, caste associations have contributed significantly to the communication, representation and leadership in politics, making bargaining and jockeying for power. Despite deritualization of caste system, it continuous to play enduring role in democratic politics in India. 19.14 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. Define Caste. In what respects is Caste a modern phenomenon? 2. Critically assess the impact of Caste on Indian Politics. 3. Describe the different provisions for caste reservations in the Constitution of India. Identify the criteria of the Mandal Commission's recommendation for reservation of the Other Backward Classes in India. 3. 20.2 Introduction The understanding of the nature of state requires a theoretical approach as to how the state acts and reacts within the relationship between state, power and social classes. In this pursuit, there exist two basic approaches to the study of the aspects: one is the Liberal and other is Marxists. Studies conducted within the liberal framework are primarily concerned with power, the role of pressure groups, the institutional elites and the influence of the decision-makers. Recently, however, a new focus has been made explicitly on the 'architectural role of state in society', its impact on social and political processes through its policies and the patterns of relationship evolved with various groups. The Marxist paradigm, on the other hand, takes serious note of the relationship of the state with the ongoing social process of reproduction and transformation. In addition to addressing itself to the nature and character of the state, the Marxists seek to identify the relationship of classes to the state within the matrix of the dynamics and contradictions of capitalism. They do so in order to unfold the dynamics of the social structure, mainly to explore the relations and interests which are promoted by the material force of the state power. The Marxists recognize the fact that the character of state denotes the societal contents of the state, especially the dominant classes in society. In a sense, therefore, class and state condition each other in class societies. Marxists emphasize the point that the state as such has no power; it is an institution where social power is concentrated and exercised. State activity is thus a process of intervention in a society affected by institutions which are a condensation of material power and the relations of power within society. There is no doubt, about the impact of the state on 278 NSOU • CC-PS-04 society, but such impact is done through the given modes of production and reproduction. Thus, the character and the nature of the state has to be understood by situating the state within the socio-historical context, the paradigm of state intervention and the changing character in state strategy in different periods. Notwithstanding the centrality of the concept of state, it cannot be discussed in isolation from the social context. Most formulations, especially on the Indian state, have often emphasized the primacy and independence of the political process. This is evident in the writings of Rajni Kothari. Likewise, Francine Frankel, Baldev Raj Nayar and Reinhard Bendix have highlighted the role of political initiative in development and transformation. It can be admitted that the Indian state has played an important role in socio-political change. At the same time, it is also evident that the state has faced major constraints in moving the process of modernization owing to the predominance of private control of productive resources which curbed both the scope and effectiveness in its intervention. It thus, necessitates to turn to a close examination of the nexus between the social forces and the state. This does not imply substituting the relative autonomy of the state as the potent organizational actors. The Marxist scholars like Hamza Alavi emphasized the mediatory role of the state apparatus in creating an autonomous space for it. The argument of state autonomy is buttressed by the fact that irrespective of an economy of socialism or capitalism, the demands of national security, modern technology and bureaucratic hierarchical 'steel frame' have contributed to the growth of state activity. In the case of India, Congress dominance for nearly four decades has helped to strengthen the political base for the emergence of a strong state. But it cannot be ignored the fact that Indian politics in the Nehru period and in later periods, was coalitional in the class sense, the political order prevailing then was based on a coalition of classes including the professional groups, the landlords and the rich peasants. It was this content of coalition rather than functional arrangement of political order operating as a loosely organized Congress coalition accommodating the pressures of the much smaller opposition at the periphery, which played a decisive part in influencing the structure of dominance and the strategy of governance and development. Thus, the modern Indian State, its performances, salience and its changing character/nature is vivid and complex. This complexity arises because of India's unique context. Though India emerged as an independent modern state from the NSOU • CC-PS-04 279 colonial rule and eventually adopted all the features of modern state, it departs from the archetypal western state. There was a considerable influence of the colonial state in shaping Indian State and its changing directions. Because, there are certain elements of the modern Indian state that were inherited from the colonial state as well as the discontinuities arising out of India's own context. The three dimensions of the modern Indian state—welfare, development and coercion—are marked by the features of both colonial and post-colonial developments. There have been some remarkable shifts in all these dimensions since 1990s due to the globalizing world. With the whole world going neo-liberal, Indian state has also to be a neo-liberal state. In this neo-liberal project, the Indian state has to make transition from the earlier ways to what may be called from 'plan to market'. The Indian state would witness a 'retreating state', shifting away from its welfare and development orientations.

20.3 The State in India

State is generally defined as a territorial form of political organization with territorial demarcation that is strictly legal and not natural. The state is a sovereign entity as it alone has the supreme powers within the territory and outside it. Apart from this, the state in India is no exception, but the Indian state is markedly different from the Western understanding of legal-formal structure. In terms of ideology and content, Indian state is a constitutional democratic state in which the idea of constitutionalism proceeded at a great pace establishing not only democratic but also federal, secular and welfare state. The constitutionalism limits the power of the state in order to prevent the abuse of state power. The Indian Constitution has provided a complex web of checks and balances to ensure accountability and responsibility of every public institution and public functionary. The constitutional democratic state in India is the exact example of Carl J. Friedrich's concept of constitutionalism. The foundational principles of the Indian state are enshrined in the Constitution adopted in 1950. The key institutions of the modern state—liberal democracy, universal adult franchise democratic decision-making and modern citizenship—are put in place. The Constitution also provided participatory parliamentary democracy to ensure popular control over the executive. The political executive is dependent on the verdict of the voters and it has to seek mandate to protect individual rights and freedoms. Thus, Indian state is a limited state as it is a consented organization committed to the development of a liberated

280 NSOU • CC-PS-04 individual as the goal of promoting individual personality and potentialities. Such a limited concept of the Indian state unlike the modern liberal state in Britain and USA is not based on authoritarianism. In India, the state's interference with the society or individual rights would amount to authoritarianism. India's journey to state-formation is different from the West. India's heterogeneous social composition, parochial practices and economic estrangement caused by the British rule had created an unprecedented situation. Under such a context, it was imperative for the emerging state to interfere in the socio-economic domains as a 'therapeutic agency' or simply an agency to heal the social wrongs. This intervention of state may be tantamount to authoritarianism, but though there is an obstacle to the state becoming authoritarian. Despite provisions of sanctioning the interference of the state in society, in India, the state is poised to maintain a balance between the individual and collective rights. The Western scholars are of the view that it is difficult to identify India as Nation-state because it comprises many nations rather than one. The term 'state' is a political construction signifying the political control. But the term 'nation-state' is a psychological construct implying commonality of cultures, religions, languages and symbols etc. In this aspect, India is not a homogenized state, nor has any effective homogenization project been undertaken. Moreover, nationalism during the colonial period was neither deep nor socially broad based. Anti-colonial movement could not emerge as the felt needs of the oppressed people; they evolved around a contest for power between the indigenous elite and the colonial state. The millions of people who struggled for Indian Independence were not motivated and mobilized on the basis of their actual consciousness of the real meanings of oppressive and exploitative foreign rule, but they were involved in some inter-elite conflict for the transfer of power. As a result, the nation-state, according to Partha Chatterjee, is in western mould. In the West, nationalism actually emerged as a homogenizing agency suppressing the other loyalties such as religion, culture and ethnicity in order to create a uniform political community. Given such a formation of the nation-states in the West, it was logical for the people like Winston Churchill or early nationalists to raise doubts on the potentiality of India to form a nation-state in the modern sense of the term and therefore its continuity. But this doubt was rooted mainly in Western understanding of nation-states. India, after seventy years later remaining as a unified nation has falsified the skeptical claims. India's working Constitutional democracy has survived more than

NSOU • CC-PS-04 281 six decades of its continuity of nation-state identity. India worked out and reworked its programmatic design of integrative capacity in accommodating the diverse cultures and identities through institutional means and constitutional provisions. Yet, the intellectuals belonging to the Right or Liberal traditions agree that nationalism has exhausted its potential of providing emotional satisfaction to its members, and the state systems created along with the development of nationalisms have outlived their utility to either provide national security or national economic development. If the real economic decision-makers are trans-nationalized or global capitalist corporations, then the political needs of the particular social groups which revolve around their identity can be met by community-based authority arrangements. The Indian nation-state should vacate spaces from the economic and productive spheres of social life and India as prison house of nationalities should allow a right of self-determination. Thus, India is an artificial construct, a mythical abstraction and something external to the vast majority of people living in the territorial boundaries of this country. From this standpoint, India is not a nation-state but one in the process of making.

20.4 The Modern State in India : Continuities and Changes

The Modern Indian State is the outcome of a mix of different experiences and practices inherited and continued with some significant features and elements of the colonial state systems and changes introduced at Independence. Suhas Palshikar treats the Indian state as the outcome of three inter-related factors colonial, constitutional and post-independence practices. The state intervention and the structural aspects of the colonial state were heavily incorporated in the new Indian state by Jawaharlal Nehru and Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel. For example, India inherited colonial police system, census, civil services, parliamentary system and the Government of India Act, 1935. Likewise, India discontinued with many colonial legacies such as communal electorates or proportional representation system etc. Among the legacies were the long experiences of British rule itself which extended more than two centuries and of various institutions, ideas and practices introduced by the British. Of particular importance at Independence was the Government of India Act of 1935, which was the framework of rule in independent India under which the country was governed and which included a responsible government for Indians in the provinces. A second legacy was that provided by the shared experiences of those Indians who participated in or identified with the 282 NSOU • CC-PS-04 nationalist movement and its great leaders. A third was the existing social order, the social structure and social conflicts which surrounded and influenced political movements, ideas and practices. Finally, there was the great body of traditions and cultural practices which preceded the British rule in a civilization of great depth, complexity, and diversity. In the evolution of India toward representative government, it dates back to the Indian Councils Act of 1861 and continued through the Morley-Minto Reforms of 1909, the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms of 1919 and finally the Government of India Act of 1935. At each of these reforms, the participation of Indians in the Central and State Legislatures and in the executive councils was increased and the franchise was extended to ever larger numbers of people. The other features of continuity included the adoption of a federal system of government with three legislative lists of powers to be exercised exclusively by the Union, States or concurrently, and a considerable degree of provincial autonomy with extensive powers left to the Centre, including Emergency powers which made it possible to convert the federal system into a unitary one. In several respects, however, the Constitution of India makes a sharp break with the British colonial past, though some British practices still persist. Firstly, the Constitution adopts in totality the Westminster form of parliamentary government rather than the mixed parliamentary bureaucratic authoritarian system which existed in India. Secondly, the Fundamental rights were included in the Constitution of India. Thirdly, the Constitution introduced universal adult franchise. Though the Constitution of India did not articulate any coherent conception of state, but a faint conception of state finds resonance in broader ideological goals enshrined in the Preamble of the constitution. The two ideals stand prominent in the Preamble---democracy and welfare state which create an expansive conception of state involving the positive role of the state. Such a positive role of the state, apart from upholding the individual rights and group rights as incorporated in the fundamental rights, would ensure social and economic democracy along with political democracy. This positive role of the state was necessitated in order to deal with a history of social maladies, social fragmentation, unequal social status that characterized the then India. There was a strong apprehension that an isolated state in a typical Western sense would create a superficial state incapable of dealing with the social wrongs. As India was the only country where political revolution had

NSOU • CC-PS-04 283 preceded social revolution. The Constitution enshrined in its Preamble such a state that would be able to interfere in the society to grapple with this problem democratically, not in the manner of authoritarian way. In this way, the state was assigned the task of bringing about what Granville Austin has termed a 'social revolution'. The resultant fact is that the Constitution of India envisaged a liberal state with a welfare orientation. This liberal state is an interventionist state as evident in the policies of affirmative actions, land reforms, planned development and so on. The Constitution also contains some unique features that reflect a departure from strict British parliamentary practices by introducing into the Charter of the country a program of social and economic reform. Most notable in this respect is the presence in the Constitution an interventionist document. This is the non-justiciable Directive Principles of State Policy. Earlier the Directive Principles emerged in the form of 'instruments of instruction' in the Act of 1935, in free India these principles were included to create an economic democracy in the otherwise poor country. The reason behind the introduction of the Directive Principles in the Constitution is that the framers of the Constitution understood the fact that fundamental rights were not enough, would be meaningless in a land where the mass of the people were extremely poor, illiterate, tied to traditions and exploited by merchants, moneylenders and landlords. It was feared that such rights might be used to protect the exploiters rather than the exploited. In a society based on hierarchy, caste inequality and blatant discrimination, equality of opportunity as existed in Britain and United States would not be enough to provide the means of enhancing the well-being of the poor. Instead, special measures would be required, such as reservation of places in representative institutions, government agencies, and public institutions for backward and disadvantaged classes and groups. There was a desire also not to merely protect the rights of the people, but to eliminate certain features of social practices, such as untouchability and beggar or forced labour, which were explicitly abolished in the Constitution. And finally, there was a desire to limit the role of private enterprise in India and freeing of the protection of private property provided in the Constitution which might prevent the Indian state from attaining the goals of economic justice, which some thought could be achieved through social ownership of the means of production, identified with state ownership. Though the Constitution recognized the right to hold property as a fundamental right, but also included in the Directive Principles stating to promote the common good and avoid excessive concentration of wealth.

284 NSOU • CC-PS-04 Those who argue that India's independence should not be seen as marking a great break with the past also point out to the preservation of such characteristic features of British autocratic rule as the Indian Civil Service (ICS), renamed as the Indian Administrative Service (IAS) at Independence. The small, enormously powerful, elite cadre of ICS officers was seen as the "steel frame" that had held the British Empire in India together. At Independence, the leaders of the country quite self consciously maintained the entire bureaucratic structure that evolved during the colonial times and was retained en masse through which the state was to exercise its powers as an executive agency. Along with this, army and police were also retained. But despite these structures, the modern Indian state broke with the past and adopted almost all features of the modern state. The Nehruvian state as is sometimes called was based on broader agreement or consensus among Nehru, Patel and Ambedkar. The conception of state emphasized nation-building through the instrument of modernity, secularism, rule of law, opportunity, dignity, minority rights etc. One of the vital facets of this modern state was the question as to how would Indian state act as a neutral agency keeping itself separate from society and how can it act as instrument of social change. It has been argued that it is the Indian national movement that influenced the neutrality and instrumentality of the emerging state. Two quarters of a century of thought and struggle over defining the Indian nation, over freeing the country from alien occupation, and over the desirable shape of the social and economic order in a future independent India had provided the nationalist leadership at Independence with a set of ideas and goals that helped to structure their responses to the question and problems of governing the newly independent country. At the top of their goals for everything else was an abiding faith in and determination to preserve the national unity and integrity of the country against all potential internal and external threats to it as the sine qua non. The very fact that this first priority was given importance as the centre of the dreams of the Congress nationalists, had to be sacrificed at independence itself, with the partition of the country reinforced the determination of the leaders never to make such a sacrifice again. This democratic struggle and determination of the leaders representing the popular will is seen to have acted as the elixir to play as a neutral agency or as a tool of instrument for bringing about socio-economic change and political development for the benefit of all. Such a neutral role of the Indian state changes as Indian state ventured into the period of globalization wherein the states have increasingly adopted neo-liberal policies.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 285 20.5 Debates On the Nature of State in India Scholars of political science are not unanimous about the essence of the nature of modern state in India. It has been approached in many ways. To begin with, the liberals usually prefer to prescribe the method of analysis to the constitution and the nature of government thereon. Though such an analysis may reflect the nature of the governmental system, but it is not to fully manifest the social basis of power and also the process of legitimization. Hence, a great deal of other aspects such as the material foundations of society which impinge the structure and process of governance are to be a missing. Therefore, while analyzing the constitution, its character is to be determined by examining the mode of production and by assessing which class or classes own and control the means of production. The basic criterion in which are the classes for whose benefit essentially the power is exercised to be indicated by the overall direction of state policy. This method is used by the traditional Marxian analysts Some writers believe that the state is not an instrument of class rule because there is a specific autonomy of the political structures from the economic institutions, of political power from economic power. But the Marxists believe that the state, however, independent it may have been politically from any given class but cannot in a class society rather, it remains the protector of an economically or socially dominant class. For an objective and proper analysis of the nature of modern Indian state, we have to take into considerations of the various aspects simultaneously. Prof. Rasheeduddin Khan writes about different conceptions of state in India by examining the constitution and the governmental structures and processes such as participatory parliamentary democratic state, welfare state, a cooperative commonwealth state, a socialistic (after 42 nd Amendment) socialist secular democratic state, soft state, a neo-liberal state, a bourgeois democracy and independent national democracy. Participatory parliamentary democratic state argument can be substantiated by understanding the formal features enshrined in the Constitution of India such as universal adult franchise, periodic elections, various competing political parties, representative institutions, responsible government etc. and the processes enunciated in the Constitution. The second, third and fourth ideals and terms are manifestations of which have been emphasized in the Preamble of the Constitution, Directive Principles of state policy and references can be drawn from the various types of

286 NSOU • CC-PS-04 policy legislations. The welfare state orientation had its heydays of Nehruvian state when the state was endowed with the interventionist role sought to ensure full employment, equalization of opportunities, sharing in the national welfare, and placing of financial burden on the privileged classes by governmental measures and administrative procedures. Cooperative commonwealth was the term formally incorporated into the Congress constitution as a proposed goal of independent India in the Avadi Congress session, 1955 where the means of production are to be under social ownership and control, production is progressively speeded up and there is equitable distribution of the national wealth. 'Soft state' is appellation given by Gunnar Myrdal and others like Francine R. Frankel and Lloyd I. Rudolph and Susanne H. Rudolph pointed out that democracy has not enabled the majority of poor people to grasp and organize themselves for utilizing political power to advance their own interests. In this regard, due to inability of the state to help in their mobilization he called Indian state as "the Soft State", by which he particularly meant a state that was so dominated by vested interests that it had failed to achieve its own ideas of creating a just and egalitarian society. Similarly, Rajni Kothari who initially eulogized the Indian state to have achieved the autonomy in dealing with the demands and pressures on a high degree of legitimacy and authority, an elaborate institutional edifice and the capacity to perform but his later views are that the Indian state has lost its autonomy to the narrow interests of the new-rich and its allies who control and manipulate it. This has resulted in the crumbling of the institutional edifice, criminalization of politics, and violence and repression by the state both in its internal functioning and its dealing with the people. Rajni Kothari further writes that the autonomy of state in its relationship to civil society has suffered a marked decline. The institutions of the state have got permeated by both the sources of money power—domestic and international, private and public and professional go-betweens including the bullies, who know how to extract how much and from whom and through what modalities. Some of these new operators function from within the state structure which in fact is the best indicator of the decline in the autonomy of the state. In line with Kothari, V.K.R.V. Rao pointed out that the state was a political alliance of the intermediate classes with the upper classes, resorting to socialist ideology to win mass support but issuing all levels of power to facilitate a type of capitalist development in the interest of a narrow section of Indian society. This leads us to the Marxist analysis of the Indian state which is an instrument in the hands of the ruling class and its primary function is to maintain and defend

NSOU • CC-PS-04 287 class domination. The Marxist analysis terms the state as bourgeois democracy and an independent national democracy. This terminology is used by the Communist parties and ideologues. They called the post-colonial Indian state as 'neo-colonial' till 1954, then 'bourgeois democratic State' between 1955 and 1969 and they began to call it 'Independent National Democracy' at its 1969 International Meeting of Communist and Workers' parties held at Moscow. According to the Communist party of India (CPI), the Indian state is the organ of class rule of the national bourgeoisie as a whole in which big bourgeoisie holds powerful influence. This rule has strong links with the landlords. The Communist Party of India (Marxist) characterizes Indian state as the organ of class rule of the bourgeoisie and the landlords, led by big bourgeoisie who are increasingly collaborating with the foreign finance capital in pursuit of the capitalist path of development. It needs to be mentioned here that during the colonial phase, the agrarian structure of India was shackled completely by colonial exploitation and plunder. The burden of land revenue imposed by the colonial state, and exploitation of the peasantry by the feudal, semi-feudal and landlord classes created a situation where productive forces and production relations in agriculture remained primitive based on manual labour and acute exploitation of the toiling masses. India was structurally linked with the world capitalist system; the impact of this linkage was economic and social disaster for the peasantry. In urban India, along with dominant colonial capital, the indigenous capitalist class gradually emerged on the shoulders and under the shadow of colonialism. The formation of these indigenous capitalist classes was different from the formation of the capitalist classes of western European capitalist countries, making it a specific capitalist class of a colony. Many opportunities to start capitalist enterprises opened up before traders, contractors, speculators and entrepreneurial families in the late 19th and 20th centuries, but every such opportunities were constrained by the presence of colonial capital and the role of the colonial state. The upshot of colonial development was marked by three important features : (1) the whole Indian society was linked with the world of capitalist system and subjected to exploitation because of structural linkages of the metropolis and the periphery. (2) Within India the linkages between the capitalist factory system and society was extremely weak. Manual labour was employed in agriculture but the millions of manual labourers in rural India gained nothing in terms of development of the productive forces from the development of the market. (3) The development

288 NSOU • CC-PS-04 of the indigenous bourgeoisie was constrained because of the presence of colonial capital and the colonial state. And India inherited all these features on the eve of independence and India has since been involved actively in building capitalism on the basis of such an inheritance. The anti-colonial national movement was concretized on the basis of multi-class platform led by the Indian National Congress. In spite of its multi-class character, a bloc of exploiting classes asserted itself very clearly when power was transferred to the Indians by the British. The social dialectics of pre-independence phase of development of India left a direct mark on the post-independence phase of development of the Indian state and society. Thus, this bloc of exploiting classes found itself in a central position in the State which emerged after the transfer of power. The post-independent state led by the professionals, bourgeoisie and landlords was active to set right the colonial distortion in the Indian economy by a large-scale intervention by the State for economic and social reconstruction. This is why the Communist Party of India (Marxist-Leninist) also contends that the Indian State is the state of big landlords and comprador-bureaucrat capitalism. Apart from this, the Post-colonial state of India now has to grapple with the challenges posed by socially traditional structures, especially from the organized religious groups which threaten its democratic and secular character. Thus, the state in India has to become an interventionist state to meet the challenges from classes, castes and religious social groups internally and imperialism externally. Another crucial aspect of the modern state in India as shown by Aejaz Ahmad Wani and Rupak Kumar is patriarchal in nature. The Indian Constitution puts women and men on the equal footing by guaranteeing all, adult franchise, right to freedom of speech and expression, life and liberty, right to equal opportunity etc. The Constitution to improve women's status in society adopted various Acts but the Indian State does not acknowledge any moral responsibility for the grave social injustices perpetrated by the traditional oppression of women and perpetuation of caste system. It ignores the wider issues of social exploitation inherent in the patriarchal mode of society. The notion that women constitute the weaker sex is a familiar aspect of patriarchal ideology and used to assign women subordinate roles in the social structure. The Indian State is still to provide a uniform civil code. From the foregoing discussion or debate it is evident that instead of becoming deterministic about the exact nature of state in India, we get a plethora of viewpoints on the nature of the state. These viewpoints appeared in different times and contexts in the trajectory of Indian State. To accredit Indian state's nomenclature as a particular state or nature of state is very difficult because of its changing nature in

NSOU • CC-PS-04 289 different periods. The assessment of the nature of Indian state depends on the political processes that give its shape and formation. Political processes in post-independent India have given different terrains in terms of policy formulation, legislation and implementation. Different governments have given primacy to different modes of policymaking in terms of caste, culture, religion and gender which shaped and reshaped many times in terms of identity politics, redistribution of resources, representation of various social groups and recognition of people across the country. One thread with which the changing nature of Indian state can be captured is to distinguish it into three categories, namely, the 'welfare dimensions of Indian State', 'Developmental dimensions of Indian State' and 'Coercive dimensions'. The advent of neo-liberal policies in 1991, retreat of state in the market and business affairs is popularly known as the 'rolling back' of the state, designating a 'neo-liberal nature of state'. 20.6 Welfare State in India Philosophically, welfare state is a system of government in which the responsibility of government is well-being of all citizens. At the time of independence, the Constitution makers were highly influenced by the feeling of social equality and welfare of the people. They incorporated such provisions in the Constitution of India guaranteeing equality of opportunity and equitable distribution of wealth along with the intention to provide a 'corrective mechanism and compensating for market-generated inequalities'. These were necessitated due to the acute poverty, dismal literacy rate, hunger, periodic famine, plundered masses etc bringing in socio-economic inequalities across the country. The Preamble of the Constitution reflects its form as a welfare state. Except the Preamble, there are so many other provisions in the Constitution which enable India to act as a welfare state. Firstly, the Fundamental Rights incorporated in the part 111 of the Constitution are essentially individual rights for the better development of their personality, but the welfare rights of citizens are included in the part iv of the Constitution of India in the Directive Principles of State Policy. This part 1V is the foundation of welfare state enumerated from Articles 36-51. However, these principles are neither enforceable nor binding on the State but are simply guidelines for the state which the state has to consider at the time of policy making. Since this part cannot be legally enforced by the courts, the entire matter is left on the whims of the state to follow it or not, proving thereby the welfare rights as hollow in its essence. In addition to it, 290 NSOU • CC-PS-04 according to Niraja Gopal Joyal, philosophy of state welfare in India is grounded in ideas of charity and benevolence unlike the idea of rights the West followed. So, in the case of India, welfare activities by states cannot be claimed as a right. It was viewed in terms of need; this is why the State launched welfare activities in the first two decades of independence on the need to alleviate poverty, malnutrition and hunger as an imperative for welfarism. Secondly, in a sense, Directive Principles epitomize the ideals, the aspirations, the sentiments, the precepts and the goals of our entire freedom movement. After independence, people looked towards the state for the fulfillment of the dreams of the people in eradicating their poverty and inequality as rights not on the basis of charity and benevolence. The state, though adopted a developmental thrust and welfare concerns to remove public wants, put on a need based conception of justice instead of rights and obligations. In this respect, Niraja Joyal further argues that rights enshrined in the chapter on Fundamental Rights are essentially the liberty rights enforceable at courts whereas welfare rights in the Directive Principles are non-justiciable. This disjuncture between liberty rights and welfare rights in the Constitution makes the welfare program me relegating to a secondary station. The intricacies of welfarist orientation of Indian state would be clear by looking into the two different components. First, India adopted social protection scheme or social safety net instead of right based social program. In this connection, Daves Kapur and P. Nangia argue that India has focused disproportionately on the social protection scheme in the last two decades i.e. since 1990s. By contrast, the basic public goods such as primary education, public health and water and sanitation have languished further. Partha Chatterjee shows that in the era of liberalization the large chunks of people are impoverishing in the country. Indian economy after liberalization is undergoing a process of primitive accumulation that is displacing peasants from lands and artisans from their means of livelihood. In this growing social crisis, the state has resorted to increased expenditure to enable people to meet their basic needs. This need-fulfilling social protection programs are like the Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Scheme (MGNREGS), Public Distribution System to all Below Poverty Line(BPL), National Social Assistance Program (NSAP) which provide immediate relief to the poor in case of life-cycle vulnerabilities such as old age and widowhood, Janani Suraksha Yojana (JSY), Accredited Social Health Activists (ASHAs), Rashtriya Swasthya Bima Yojana (RSBY), Aam Admi Bima Yojana (AABY), Non-Net Fellowship, Rajib Gandhi Fellowship, Integrated Child Development Services (ICDS) etc.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 291 Thus, in pre-liberalization period, social programs were a matter of charity as it was based on need-oriented selective in its approach to those who came under 'defined categories of disadvantage'. But in the post-liberalization era, citizens are demanding social protection programs as rights particularly by those who are losers of reforms. Though social protection programs as welfare activities of the state are noteworthy, but these welfare policies are not monitored and implemented properly, rather it has given an effective corruption and partials. Government hospitals are inadequately serviced due to crisis of management and faulty policies. After a decade of liberalization, the promise of economic growth with justice seems eternally postponed. It was 6.1 in 1990-91 the percentage of GDP and in 1994-95 it reduced to 4.6 percent. There is increasing inequality between the rich and the poor. Dalits and tribals are increasingly marginalized. Almost 265 million Indians live below poverty line. According to National Sample Survey Organization (NSSO) figures, the poverty figure for Orissa is 47.15%, Bihar 42.6%, Madhya Pradesh 37.43%, Sikkim 36.55% and Tripura 34.44%. The poverty alleviation programs have not reached the poor. According to the provisional figures of Census 2001, literacy rate has gone up to 65.38%, but at the same time nearly 25% of men and about 45% of women are illiterate. Government expenditure for education which was 2.75% of GDP in 1998/ 99 has declined or remained stagnant. Central and State Government expenditures on health at 1.11% of GDP in 1998/99. Actually, liberalization has betrayed the promises of poverty alleviation and social development have created only delusions of development. Instead of promoting and guaranteeing human rights, social justice and people's welfare, the State has abdicated and withdrawn from its welfare responsibilities. The ten years of reform facilitated the withering away of the welfare State 20.7

Developmental Dimension of State in India Developmental State is a term used by international political economy scholars to refer to the phenomenon of state-led macro-economic planning and development. Post-colonial Indian State began its journey by adopting rapid industrialization with social equity as the two primary objectives under the leadership of Nehru. Indian economy at the time of independence was mainly rural and agricultural in character with almost 85 per cent of the population living in rural areas depending upon

292 NSOU • CC-PS-04 agricultural activities. Around 70 per cent of the population was engaged in agriculture; even then India was not self-sufficient in food and raw materials for industry. The growth of the food grains output was negative. The colonial system perpetuated traditional technology in agriculture except in the case of few export-oriented commercial crops. The development of infrastructure through irrigation, roads, markets etc. was extremely limited. The intermediaries in agriculture, like zamindars and jagirdars, had grown in the colonial period in large parts of the country, denuding the investible resources and sapping the motivation of the actual tillers of the soil. So, the initial phase of independent India inherited a stagnant agriculture with a deficient infrastructure, traditional technology and out-moded and exploitative institutions. Under such a circumstances, any strategy for industrialization of a predominantly agrarian country with a heavy load of backwardness required direct intervention of the State. So, it also needed a link between the agriculture and industry. The development of agriculture was a necessity in order to provide raw materials for industry. All these ideas implied centralized economic planning and direct State intervention. At this period, under pressure from the Left in India for initiating radical land reforms as immediate measure in order to curb the monopoly capitalists, paved the way towards planned development. In order to rejuvenate the agricultural sector, land reforms measure was adopted and began implementing. But the land reform measures helped big landlords. It was merely a socialist rhetoric because it never took place in a radical manner, resulting thousands of tillers rendered landless. Except in four states of Jammu and Kashmir, Kerala, and Tripura and West Bengal land reforms failed despite socialism becoming the slogans for the Indian planners. India went for planned development since 1951 by constituting Planning Commission in 1950 which supervised the task of planning. It was Nehru's ambitious project influenced by the development strategy of erstwhile Communist USSR. The First Five Year Plan covered the period of 1951-1956 followed by the Second planning during 1956-1961 and Third plan from 1961-1966. Thus, until 2014, before the planning commission was dissolved, so far twelve Five Year Plans have been launched with some intermittent plan holidays; draught between 1966 and 1969 and regime change in 1990s. The First Five-Year Plan made a detailed analysis of the nature of India's development issues and laid emphasis on rural mass mobilization and land reforms. In this plan, radical steps such as redistribution of wealth and

NSOU • CC-PS-04 293 incomes were rejected. This plan was only successful as it yielded good harvests and made India food self-sufficient. The Second Five-Year Plan (1956-61) as also called Mahalanobis plan emphasized on rapid industrialization of heavy and basic industries and advocated for huge imports through foreign loans. The Industrial Policy of 1956 was based on the establishment of a 'Socialistic Pattern of Society' as the goal of economic policy. Similarly, the Third Five-Year plan was adopted when the Indian economy had entered in a 'take-off stage', a stage of 'self-reliant' and 'self-generating' economy. But, this plan failed miserably due to Chinese aggression, Indo-Pak war and severe draught. Along with the above phenomenon, the crisis of the path of economic development of India and the crisis of politics created new challenges for the political and administrative state functionaries who were expected to consolidate the Nehruvian model of economic development and social justice. The Report of the Government of India Committees clearly proved that the goals of development with social justice have not been achieved. On the contrary, the planning activity during the phase of 1947-1964 had resulted in concentration of economic power in a few hands and distributional aspects of economic growth had been a total failure. P. C. Mohalanobis Report of the committee on 'Distribution of Income and Levels of Living' (1964), especially its observations on 'Concentration of Economic Power', Report of the Monopolies Enquiry Commission (1965) and The Industrial Licensing Policy Inquiry Committee (1969) clearly suggested that all the stated goals of economic development for egalitarianism had been completely distorted. Related with the failure of the economic development of the Indian State, poverty in India persisted in spite of development growth. The trickle-down approach to economic development had been falsified in the Indian situation. In the context of failure of economic development, it is pertinent to note that Indian state had adopted the path of capitalist development. This capitalist development required a restructuring of agrarian social relations so that a national capitalist market could develop in unity between agriculture and industry. The State intervened in the restructuring of agrarian society with a view to changing the ownership pattern but the special factors linked to land ownership like caste, ethnicity and religiosity remained out of reach of state intervention. The reform, in fact, did not lead to the transfer of land to the tillers, marginal, small and medium farmers, share-croppers, tenants-at-will and landlords continued to constitute the agrarian power hierarchy. Thus, property relations remained unchanged and agrarian exploitation continued.

294 NSOU • CC-PS-04 The land oligarchy exercised their social and political power to retard and sabotage the implementation of land reforms mainly with a view to maintaining their property interests. On the other hand, in spite of the Monopoly and Restrictive Trade Practices Act, indigenous monopoly capitalism has been strengthened as a leading group of capitalist classes. The laboring classes because of their low economic status were surviving on the basis of non-economic authority structures based on caste, ethnicity, and religion and so on. Because of these characteristic weaknesses of the developing capitalist economy, the State is still struggling to integrate the society. A situation of states within a state still exists in India due to social challenges to the legitimacy authority of the state in the form of organized religions, castes and communities. As a result, Indian state became weak. With the advent of Indira Gandhi in 1971 after her father's demise in 1964, as the Prime Minister, a several changes took place due to mounting external pressure. The balance of payment crisis and a stagnant economy compelled her to make substantial policy level transformation such as devaluing the rupee which several economists and national industrialists were skeptical about it. Amidst of these situations, agriculture remained neglected. However, between 1965 and 1970, Green Revolution contributed a lot to the country's overall development and agriculture in particular. Despite this, Green Revolution only benefited the big farmers. Mrs. Gandhi after consolidating her political power in 1971 launched her programs of economic development through planning on the basis of her full control over bureaucracy and all critical institutions of governance. She came out with a industrial policy giving full faith on the public sector and the leading role of the state functionaries in the economic development of India. In the process, she curbed all private sector activities by strengthening MRTP Act (1969) and the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act (FERA), 1974 which restricted the maximum equity participation in the Indian Firm to 40 per cent and finally nationalization of banks. This period was described as 'license-permit-quota raj'. Gandhi in her second Government in 1980s initiated several pro-business policy reforms by withdrawing some constraints on big business. Gandhi declared labor movements, protests and gheraos illegal. All these measures antagonized the laboring classes. Since, Mrs. Gandhi turned her attention to the agrarian sector by accelerating the Green Revolution strategy of agricultural modernization which brought new social and political changes in the balance of forces in the country because a surplus generating peasantry had emerged due to the Green Revolution technology. These new strata of socially powerful agrarian class came into conflict with the social class coalition of dominant industrial, commercial and other powerful social groups.

NSOU • CC-PS-04 295 Mrs. Gandhi's strategy during the first half of 1980s abandoned the commitment to redistribution and recommitted herself to a 'growth first' model of development. This automatically tilted the policy in favour of big business by adopting pro-business strategy of State intervention. The shift in the development strategy has its repercussions on the political processes of the country. Gandhi, to win the majority poor, came up with the slogan of 'Garibi Hatao' adopting the socialistic rhetoric and at the same time started experimenting with various sorts of ethnic politics such as Sikh politics and Hindu chauvinist groups. The crisis situation emerged because socially disaffected masses lost their faith in the state as the state failed to fulfill its promises. The state-led and state-controlled path of economic and social development left out more than 350 million people in the country from any hope for the future. Social inequalities increased in India and many basic problems of the laboring classes remained unresolved and this led to social volatility in the country. During the regime of Rajiv Gandhi, the same path was followed by adopting growth first strategy, pro-business and anti-labor policies. He openly embraced two-faced approach flouting the Bombay Meeting of the AICC in 1985. He then harped on the Nehruvian legacy, the 1956 industrial policy and socialism. Apart from tinkering with the powers and functioning of the powerful regulatory, bureaucratic, administrative state of India, he took a few steps towards deregulating the Indian economy but all these efforts were half-hearted and the old arrangements remained intact. The problem of fiscal and balance of payment remained the same at all the time leading to the liberalization in 1991 through Structural Adjustment Programme and Washington consensus. The failure of developmental state in India led to the economic reform in 1991, making economy free from developmentalist state. The state-led capitalism transformed into market-led capitalism. The role of the state reduced to facilitate and regulate the market. The new economic reform made the state to 'retreat' from its role as a producer and investor to the 'rolling back' of the state in contrast to the earlier dirigistic developmental state. Liberalization signaled the breakup of the previous balance between dominant classes and the industrialist capitalists backed by state machinery. The political process under the liberalization witnessed quite other dimension of the nature of state as the rise of OBCs across the country forced the state to implement Mandal Commission recommendations. Along with the rise of the right wing Hindutva brigade and the abrupt riots across the northern Hindi belt in order to garner vote

296 NSOU • CC-PS-04 bank became a matter of concern in Indian politics. The discontent among different sections of people began questioning the government's motive of development. Thus, 'from plan to market' has become a guide to the functioning of the Indian state in tackling their problems of transition from state-led model of development to free market model for economic growth. 20.8 Coercive Dimension Modern State is essentially based on hegemonic apparatus to ensure its continuity and maintenance. Indian state is no exception in this respect. In politics, this hegemonic apparatus is bureaucracy, the police and the military used as a coercive power of the state which are meant for punitive measures against states, groups, and individuals in order to force them to maintain or desist from actions. According to Max Weber, the state is primarily an organization which can be said to be possessing the unshared and exclusive right to use or authorize physical force against citizens residing within its territory. This use of coercion is, however, supposed to be legitimate or legally sanctioned. The traditional instruments of coercion constituted and exercised by the modern state are army and police. In recent times, with the increasing rise of the terrorism and mass violence all over the state, various legally based security measures in the form of legislations have emerged in many states including India. Indian state continued to adopt the colonial coercive apparatus in the post-colonial period. There are several reasons for the inheritance of the colonial coercive apparatus in independent India. Firstly, the partition brought about unprecedented communal violence across the state. It provided an immediate context in maintaining the coercive apparatus. Secondly, immediately after independence, India saw the rising expectation of the people reflecting in the protests and demonstrations of 1950s and 1960s, thereby creating law and order problems. And thirdly, the insurgency in the North-East of India and Naxal struggles resulted in widespread violence. All these factors resulted in riots, protests, movements leading to internal disharmony and disturbances. This is why the Indian leaders thought it fit to inherit the colonial coercive apparatus and keep it unchanged in the volatile situation in post-independent India. The Indian rulers, instead of indianization of police services, kept it in toto in terms arrest, seizure and preventive detention. Certain sections of IPC such as

NSOU • CC-PS-04 297 sections 41 to 56 clearly highlight the colonial markings on it. It allows the police to arrest anyone without seeking a warrant on the pretext of reasonable suspicion. Likewise, 165 CPC empowers the police with the searching power on reasonable grounds. These arbitrary powers of the police have led to corruption and misuse of authority across the country on the basis of patronage and kinship. The important aspect of India's coercive apparatus is the number of coercive legislations such as Unlawful Activities (Prevention) Act, (UAPA) 1967, Terrorist and Disruptive Activities (Prevention) Act, 1985, Prevention of Terrorist Act (POTA) etc. that have evolved since Independence to deal with violence, terror, disruptive activities and so on. These are no less than the colonial coercive legislations. In those legislations contained controversial provisions such as arrests without warrants, extension of pre-trial remand period up to one year, stringent bail provisions, confession before police as credible evidences etc. During 1990s, the controversy around those laws aggravated when National Human Rights Commission conducted a fact-finding report which suggested that the Acts especially TADA was not only selectively used against Muslims and Sikhs, but also applied to tribal movements. Till 1994, about 76,166 persons were arrested as per this Act. While 18,708 had no charges at all, only four per cent were found guilty. Under popular protests, it lapsed in 1995. But the TADA enlivened in the form of POTA enacted in 2002. In the wake of 11 September attacks in USA and US declaration of 'war on terror', created a global consensus for the need of enhancing the security within the state and acting tough on terrorism. In India, the need was catapulted by 2001 Parliament attacks. In this backdrop, a new Act known as POTA was promulgated in 2002 as a part of international efforts to fight terrorism. Along with this, UAPA was amended in 2004 by bringing it closer to POTA and TADA. Again it was amended in 2008 in the backdrop of Mumbai terrorist attack. It was accompanied by a series of centralized laws such as Armed Forces (Special) Powers Act (AFSPA). Recently, in February 2012, the UPA government proposed to set up National Counter Terrorism Centre (NCTC) to bolster anti-terrorism regime. The NDA government in 2014 has sidelined this bill for now. These coercive legislations were created and aimed at dealing with particular situation but they persisted over time with more intensity. The gravest of all, these laws prefer coercion to democratic negotiation. Though all these laws serve the purpose in the short run but prove detrimental to the democratic credentials and

298 NSOU • CC-PS-04 future in the long run. Several studies have shown that these extraordinary laws very often dealt with harshly against struggle for rights imputing false charges against them in the name of national sovereignty, national security and national interest. 20.9 Conclusion In conclusion, it may be said that Indian state has a long journey with colonial markings after independence. In this journey, the post-colonial state in India has changed its character i.e. from welfare to developmental to coercive nature according to changing time and situations. While most of these markings such as welfare, developmentalism and coercive have persisted in one or other form, there have been additions and subtractions to it ever since independence. It is also evident that developmental and welfare orientation has changed over time especially with the Indian state moving towards the neo-liberal mode in the dawn of the 21st century. The coercive state apparatuses are not in tandem with the society-state relationship. In this connection, it may be identified that there are continuities and discontinuities of colonial and modern state features within Indian state structure. But to characterize the Indian state to any particular nature becomes difficult due to its changing nature. To cope with the political processes in different times, the state in India had to venture into different terrains in terms of policy formulation, legislation making and implementation in terms of caste, culture, religion and gender and also in terms of identity politics, redistribution of resources and representation of various groups and recognition of people across the country. Different governments have given primacy to different modes of policy making identifying and distinguishing the India state into three categories such as welfare, development and coercive state. 20.10 Summing Up • In sum, it is clear that Indian State has in its journey to post-colonial nation- building borne with clear colonial markings. While most of the markings such as coercive and developmentalism have persisted in one or the other form, there have been additions and modifications or a changing character ever since the Independence. • It is also clear that with the Indian State moving towards the neo-liberal orientation in the dawn of the 21st century, the developmental and welfare

[1] PREFACE In a bid to standardize higher education in the country, the University Grants Commission (UGC) has introduced Choice Based Credit System (CBCS) based on five types of courses viz. core, discipline specific / generic elective, ability and skill enhancement for graduate students of all programmes at Honours level. This brings in the semester pattern, which finds efficacy in sync with credit system, credit transfer, comprehensive and continuous assessments and a graded pattern of evaluation. The objective is to offer learners ample flexibility to choose from a wide gamut of courses, as also to provide them lateral mobility between various educational institutions in the country where they can carry their acquired credits. I am happy to note that the University has been recently accredited by National Assessment and Accreditation Council of India (NAAC) with grade "A". UGC (Open and Distance Learning Programmes and Online Programmes) Regulations, 2020 have mandated compliance with CBCS for U.G. programmes of all the HEIs in this mode. Welcoming this paradigm shift in higher education, Netaji Subhas Open University (NSOU) has resolved to adopt CBCS from the academic session 2021-22 at the Under Graduate Degree Programme level. The present syllabus, framed in the spirit of syllabi recommended by UGC, lays due stress on all aspects envisaged in the curricular framework of the apex body on higher education. It will be imparted to learners over the six semesters of the Programme. Self Learning Materials (SLMs) are the mainstay of Student Support Services (SSS) of an Open University. From a logistic point of view, NSOU has embarked upon CBCS presently with SLMs in English / Bengali. Eventually, the English version SLMs will be translated into Bengali too, for the benefit of learners. As always, all of our teaching faculties contributed in this process. In addition to this, we have also requisitioned the services of best academics in each domain in preparation of the new SLMs. I am sure they will be of commendable academic support. We look forward to proactive feedback from all stakeholders who will participate in the teaching-learning based on these study materials. It has been a very challenging task well executed, and I congratulate all concerned in the preparation of these SLMs. I wish the venture a grand success.
Prof. (Dr.) Subha Sankar Sarkar Vice-Chancellor

Unit 1 : Nationalist Approach to Indian Nationalism Structure 1.1 Objective 1.2 Introduction 1.3 The Nationalist Counterpoint to Colonial Historiography 1.4 Shortcomings of the Nationalist Approach 1.5 Conclusion 1.6 Summing Up 1.7 Probable Questions 1.8 Further Reading 1.1 Objective ? The present unit seeks to examine the salient features of the Nationalist school approach to Indian nationalism. ? It seeks to highlight how this approach provided a counterpoint to the Imperialist school ? The unit attempts a critical evaluation of the Nationalist approach with reference to its shortcomings. ? The unit ends with an overall assessment of the Nationalist school. 1.2 Introduction The Nationalist school was motivated by the urge to contribute to the growth of Nationalist feeling and unify people instead of magnifying religious, caste, linguistic and other differences and class differentiation. Colonial history stressed the division of Indians. Nationalist history was a reaction against the justificatory view of colonialism. The Imperialist view tried to impose stereotypes like James Mill, Elliot and Dawson on the colonial Indian subjects and the Nationalist historiography

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 10 endeavored to provide counter stereotypes to colonial historiography to uphold India's self-respect in the face of colonial denigration central to which, was the espousal of the civilizing mission of the British in India which was specifically intended to demonstrate conclusively, that historical experience proved that the Indians were unfit for self-rule. The colonial historians assiduously propagated the idea that the British saved India from anarchy. 1.3 The Nationalist Counterpoint to Colonial Historiography The recurring theme in the accounts of Imperialist historians, was that Indians lacked the feeling of nationality. Secondly, India lacked democratic tradition unlike Europe who enjoyed the rich heritage of Greece and Rome. Indian heritage in contrast, was one of despotism. Moreover, the Indians were destitute in moral character. Colonial historians paid a back handed compliment to India describing her as a land of philosophers and essentially a land of spiritual people who lacked political acumen and administrative capacity. The Nationalist reaction was propelled by the urge to assert the superiority of India over her western counterpart. Tara Chand averred that India was a nation in making since the 19th century. According to other historians, India was a nation since the ancient times. Cultural, economic and political unity as well as a sense of nationhood prevailed in pre-colonial India. The mainstream nationalists believed that nationalist ideals were introduced under western influence while others were convinced that they had evolved since the ancient times. The emphasis was on India's inclusive spirit and capacity for assimilation which gave her a national identity distinct from European nationalism. Countering the colonial notion of India's spirituality, they contended that it was a mark of India's distinction. They also posited India's rich heritage of moral values as opposed to the crass materialism of the west. The colonial emphasis on Indian spirituality was countered with the point that Indians displayed prowess in administration and statecraft. Many Nationalists compared Kautilya with Machiavelli and Bismarck. The allegation of despotic heritage of India was refuted on the basis of conclusive evidence that there was the strong presence of popular element of state and a political structure that approached modern democracies. India never had irresponsible and capricious government. R C Majumdar in Corporate Life in Ancient India showed that institutions which we are accustomed

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 11 to look upon as western growth, had also flourished in ancient India. The Nationalist school tried to prove the falsity of colonial narratives on the basis of existing historical sources. The exponents of this school, sought to drive home, the point that economic conditions in India produced disaffection among the Indian people. Here they emphasized on exploitation of agriculture, high profits in land, draining of capital etc. They also sought to project India's composite culture where Hindus and Muslims were not locked in a conflictual relationship. They intended to highlight the fact that the nationalist movement comprised all the classes and the whole country contradicted imperialism. 1.4 Shortcomings of the Nationalist Approach The Nationalist approach underplayed the inner contradictions of Indian society based on caste and class and also oppression and discrimination against women and tribes. Secondly, it had an upper class and male chauvinist socio- cultural bias. Thirdly, it was committed to blind glorification of the nationalist movement without any serious analysis of its character or constitutive elements. Moreover, their glorification of the ancient past tantamounted to the eulogy of Hindu culture. It has been contended from the Marxist perspective that the nationalist movement was a bourgeois nationalist movement in a colonial country but it was in an embryonic stage. Thus, in it, the duality of struggle and compromise with imperialism and feudalism was manifested. The leaders were conscious of the reality of servitude but they could not think of any radical means of emancipation. They put forward the demand for self-rule while adjusting with colonial administration. They often sided with the cause of peasants but were afraid of openly supporting peasant movements. The Nationalists were attracted towards the revolutionary ideas of Europe but ultimately abided by reformist ideas of Mill and Spencer. In view of the conflict between Tory and Whig in England, the Nationalists were under the illusion that they would be able to help India's advancement with the help of the Whigs. 1.5 Conclusion Despite all shortcomings, the significance of the nationalist school cannot be denied. It was

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 12 an idea centered approach as opposed to the colonial instrumental approach. The Nationalist historians set a high tradition of scholarship. They based their writings on hard research and were inspired by an unswerving commitment to truth. They meticulously authenticated their statements through footnotes. This made their propositions empirically sound and helped them advance understanding and interpretation of the past. They raised new questions, controversies and debates. The Nationalist historians also emphasized on the role of the common people as a major component of history writing. Their primary contribution was to create a sense of self-confidence, self-assertion and national pride as against the inferiority complex promoted by colonialists. Thus the Nationalists provided a spirited rebuff to the deliberate attempts by colonial historians to portray India in a darker light. 1.6 Summing Up ? Nationalist approach to Indian Nationalism emphasized on the growth of nationalist feeling and unity of the people irrespective of religion, caste, language class distinctions etc. This approach glorifies India's inclusive spirit and capacity for assimilation which gave rise to a national identity different from European nationalism. ? Nationalist approach has been criticized for its blindness to inner contradictions of Indian society based on caste, class and gender, its upper caste and male chauvinist bias and blind glorification of the Nationalist movement. 1.7 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions: 1. In 1888, Sir John Strachey told the

Cambridge Undergraduates, 'There is not, and never was an India, or even any country of India, no Indian nation, no people of India of which we hear so much that men of the Punjab, Bengal. North Western provinces and Madras, should ever feel that they belong to one great Indian nation, is impossible.'

Valentine Chirol reiterated this view emphasizing that whatever looked like an Indian nation, was the politicization of patron-client relations. Indian society developed along

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 15 the lines of traditional social formations rather than the modern category of a nation. The Namierist Cambridge School loosely called the neo-imperialist school, explored the social basis of Indian nationalism and their decided view was that the colonial past of India, was the history of collaboration and confrontation. The Britishers found that the Indians were competing amongst themselves for wealth, power and prestige. To consolidate British rule in India with a firm foothold, collaboration of a group of Indians was absolutely necessary which automatically ignited the hostility of other groups towards the Government. Local or regional opposition was finally converted into Indian nationalism through the dissemination of western ideas and creation of political and economic agencies on the western model. The Indian National Congress was a loose coalition. Namier said that 'Idealism and Idealist are misnomers.' Anil Seal echoed the same view saying that 'Ideology provides a good tool for fine carving, but it does not make big buildings.'

2.3 Imperialist Approach Scholars like David Kopf who wrote British Orientalism and Bengal Renaissance, Broomfield, author of Elite Conflict in a Plural Society, and others have tried to drive home the point that the nationalist upsurges in Bengal in the 19 th and 20 th centuries, cannot be called national awakening because they were nothing more than interest- based movements by the English educated middle-class, to acquire concessions. This class may be characterized as the class of Bhadrakok. This class consisted of those who shunned manual labor and who were dependent on land revenue and job and who maintained a distance from the poor masses. Broomfield has given his reasoned verdict that in the eyes of the poor, they were the representatives of the exploiting class and thus their movement was more anti people than anti British. Anil Seal in The Emergence of Indian Nationalism, has shown that cooperation with the Indians, was the foundation of British rule in India. In the first stage, the Indian Princes and later on the English educated opportunist community extended their hand of collaboration to the British. This class, he remarks in the same vein as Broomfield, was known as Bhadrakok who belonged to the upper castes and looked down upon those of the lower caste. They were land owners who thrived on the exploitation of peasants. They simply wanted to extract some concessions from the British and there was a wide hiatus between them and the masses. From a survey of contemporary government documents particularly in the context of the Partition of Bengal movement, it appears that the government officials treated the movement as one led by Bhadrakok class. The Sedition Committee report describes the revolutionary movement as a movement of this class. Government bureaucrats considered this movement with NSOU ? GE-PS-11 16 intense revulsion and Eric Stokes for instance in English Utilitarians in India, has tried to show that this class represented narrow self interest while the British government was like the patriarch of the teeming millions in India.

2.4 Criticism of the Imperialist Approach The eminent historian RC Mazumdar has countered the imperialist position saying that Indian nationalism must be explained in terms of national consciousness and national struggle against the exploitation and growing racialism of a colonial government. Prof. Butterfield has criticized Namier saying that 'human beings are carriers of ideas as well as repositories of vested interests.' Christopher Hill also remarked in the same vein that 'I do not believe that material conflicts are the only ones deserving serious analysis.' The Cambridge School took the mind and emotion out of the historical discourse and reduced national movement to what Tapan Raychaudhuri described as 'animal politics.' Revisionist Cambridge historians too do not admit this anymore. The greatest pitfall of this approach was that it ignored the inestimable sacrifice of the Indians for their motherland. Bipan Chandra has argued that Indian nationalism could not be understood without referring to the declassified concern of the Indian elite for the social and political uplift of the Indian society as a whole. Prof. Sumit Sarkar also says that the more fruitful way of looking at Indian nationalist leadership is a simultaneous study of its socio-economic roots and patriotic ideas which had a predominantly non-bourgeois social base. The Imperialist school treated the national movement in India as an instrument of and a cover for the struggle between various sections of the elite. They denied the legitimacy of the movement as one of the Indian people for the overthrow of imperialism and the establishment of an independent nation state.

Gallagher in particular, repudiated the idea that India was ever a nation at any time. According to him, a nation is defined as an aggregate of individuals, historically evolved, living within a given territory, having faith in a common heritage and culture, living or aspiring to live under a centralized government over the territory. The movements for national freedom are led by a group in the nation which has gained new strength owing to economic changes since the development of mercantile capitalism. Such movements may aim at getting a better deal for this class and group interests in a given society and is conducted in the name of national unity. Although national movements are primarily political in nature, they affect all major aspects of life of the people, cultural, economic and political. Applying this definition to India, one finds that far from being a nation, India is a sub-continent of many nations and other cultural groups. The aforesaid view completely denies colonial exploitation and under development and also any genuine anti imperialist feeling in those who fought against NSOU ? GE-PS-11 17 British colonial domination. Namier has been accused of taking the mind out of politics. Gopal says that the imperialist school has gone still further and taken not only the mind, but the decency, character, integrity and selfless commitment of the Indian national movement. It denies any active political role to the mass of common people who are treated as mere cannon fodder for the elite. The Imperialist school is so bitterly opposed to the middle class Bhadrlok because it was this class which created national consciousness in India. Though it was essentially bourgeois nationalism, yet its significance cannot be overlooked. It was they who raised questions about the character of colonialism and capitalism and also the reality of economic drain. Freedom without economic freedom was meaningless and the real face of economic exploitation of British colonialism had to be exposed. Dadabhai Naoroji's Poverty and Un-British Rule, Sakharam Ganesh Deuskar's Desher Katha and other works excoriated British rule for the drainage of India's resources. Their critique of Permanent Settlement and emphasis on peasant proprietorship was of far-reaching significance. Ramesh Chandra Dutta's The peasantry of Bengal, Bengal Ryots and other works on the subject did play a seminal role here. Though bourgeois nationalism was at its nascent stage, and the Bhadrlok class could not contrive any radical solution to the problem of national emancipation, yet the British ruling class was alarmed to see the first seeds of democratic, anti-feudal and anti-colonial consciousness germinating in the early movements and resorted to many draconian measures to crush them.

2.5 Conclusion The Imperialist approach to nationalism expounded by Anil Seal, Broomfield, Gallagher and others characterized the Indian national movement as one led by middle class Bhadrloks and which was actuated by self-interest alone. Since they themselves belonged to the exploiting class, they had no antipathy for British imperialism. This view was however nothing more than an attempt to rationalize British imperialism. It overlooked the fact that the national movement enkindled political consciousness for the first time which caused much consternation in the mind of the British rulers. They wanted the peasant class to remain mute spectators of the tale of oppression and exploitation. When there was peasant uprising, they ruthlessly exterminated the rebels. The imperialists calculatedly buttressed the hiatus between the educated middle class and the illiterate masses which was yet another example of its Divide and Rule policy.

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 18 2.6 Summing Up ? According to the Imperialist school, Indian nationalism was the making of a small minority of english educated people who were motivated by their own class interests. They were known as 'Bhadrlok' belonging to upper caste and land-owning class. ? Critics of the imperialist school are of the opinion that Indian nationalism should be analysed in terms of national consciousness and national struggle against the exploitation and growing racialism of a colonial government. According to Bipan Chandra, Indian nationalism cannot be understood without knowing the Indian elites concern for social and political uplift of the Indian society as a whole. Sumit Sarkar has emphasized on the sound economic roots and patriotic feelings of the elites coming from non-bourgeois social background in the main.

The unit seeks to provide a critical estimate of the Marxist approach 3.2 Introduction Influenced by the Soviet historian V. I Pavolv, the Marxist school in India was represented by R P Dutt. This school analyses the class character of the national movement and tries to explain it in terms of the colonial economy, rise of industrial capitalism and development of market society. It views the national movement as a class struggle between the working class fighting for their freedom both against the imperialists and the bourgeoisie and the bourgeois leadership of the national parties directing the movement to cater to their class interests and betraying the masses. This approach which was somewhat over deterministic, was modified later by leftists like S.N. Mukherjee and Bipan Chandra. Mukherjee points out the complexities and variegated layers of nationalism, the importance of caste along with class and the simultaneous use of a traditional as well as modern language of politics. Bipan Chandra and his colleagues in India's struggle for independence have presented the Marxist interpretation with a nationalist flavor and refused to accept it as only a

Unlike the Imperialist historians, Marxist historians emphasize on primary contradiction as well as the process of nation making and unlike the Nationalists, they take full note of the inner contradictions of the Indian society.

According to Soviet historians, the foundation of the Indian National Congress was inseparably connected with the rise of an indigenous capitalist society. According to the postulates of Economic Determinism, changes in the structure of economy produced new social relationships transforming society from a mere status based to contract based one and set in motion unprecedented large scale social mobility. The political struggle for freedom was a culmination of the social change which started in Bengal in the second half of the 18 th century and was the product of the disruption of the old economic and social order proceeding from the growth a market society. This was accompanied by the penetration of British trade in the interior of India and also British land settlements which made land a saleable and alienable commodity which helped in the growth of market economy. A new social class of traders, merchants the subordinate agent of the Company and private British traders, middle men and money lenders sprang up. As regards who were the progenitors of the Marxist approach it is held by some that it started with DD Kosambi's An Introduction to the Study of Indian History. Others believe that M. N Roy and R. P. Dutt for the first time attempted a Marxist analysis of Indian nationalism. Both tried to relate political structure and movements to the structures at the economic level. Politics was not considered an autonomous domain, but a part of the dynamic totality. Sudipto Kaviraj says that 'there was richer sensitivity about the non-political layers of the milieu in which politics goes on. 'Also, there was systematic understanding of history. Looking at history was not just a random collection of unrelated and largely inexplicable events but as a total sequence of socio-economic systems. Both Dutt and Ray emphasized on the intermingling of the economic and political process. Dutt observed that imperialism disturbed the normal process of transition from feudalism to capitalism in India. Imperialism retarded economic development and stalemated and complicated the process of transition which Daniel Thorner calls de-industrialization. Kaviraj considers R P Dutt a Marxist thinker of a higher order than M N Roy who called Moderates progressive and Extremists reactionary.

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 21 RP Dutt emphasized on the growth of modern industry in the second half of the 19 th century which led to the rise of the bourgeois class together with a new educated middle class of lawyers, administrators, teachers and journalists. The same view was echoed before and after independence by historians and sociologists and there occurred a gradual shift from bourgeoisie to intermediate groups comprising educated middle class, petty bourgeoisie and the intelligentsia. Sumit Sarkar did not accept the simplistic version of the class approach of R P Dutt. He contended that the five fold class analysis became the standard of Marxists namely feudal or semi-feudal landlords, rising bourgeoisie or Comprador, revolutionary proletariat, peasants with internal class divisions and finally the intelligentsia. Sarkar considered this absurd in his 'Marxian approaches to the study of Nationalism'. His point was that the attitude of the industrial bourgeoisie of Bombay and Gujarat, was lukewarm. Analyzing the character of the Swadeshi movement he said that many participants had link with land. Bipan Chandra ascribes the most important role in ideology formation to the intelligentsia. The problem, according to him, concerns the real nature of imperialism and how it contradicted the true interests of all the classes. As realization of this problem dawned on the classes, they propagated the anti-imperialist ideology which represented the common interests of all the classes. A R, Desai is of the view that with the growth of modern industries, new classes of modern bourgeoisie and a working class came into existence along with professional classes. The intelligentsia was drawn from professional classes developed before the industrial bourgeoisie and led the national movement in each phase. The Soviet Indologist N.M Goldberg distinguishes between the class base of the Moderates and the Extremists. He says that the native Capitalist class was weak and tied to foreign economic interests and was irresolute on the demand for independence while the petty bourgeoisie, who were behind the Extremist movement, were more forthright. V.J. Pavlovo in his study of urban Maharashtra in the late 19 th century, says that national bourgeoisie first developed in Bombay by accumulating capital in comprador activities associated with European merchant capital operating in overseas cotton trade and opium trade with China. 3.4 Conclusion R. actual detailed historical investigation of strategies, problems, ideology extent, forms of mass mobilization and tactical maneuvers. The noted Marxist Narahari Kaviraj is of the opinion that India took the first lesson of nationalism from Rammohan Roy in the 19 th century. The early Congress leaders like Dadabhai Naoroji were influenced by bourgeois reformist thought. This was true for the Extremist wing of the Congress as well. This was also the guiding principle behind the Gandhian movements. It is true that a parallel stream of uncompromising struggle like the peasant revolt of the 19 th century, Santhal rebellion, Indigo revolt etc was also a reality though they were limited to spontaneous outbursts. The Communists highlighted the legacy of uncompromising struggle but in doing so they did not either assign importance to the bourgeois nationalist mainstream movement or remained isolated from it branding it as reactionary. The Indian Communists followed the Comintern line and averred that since the bourgeois class was not the revolutionary force in India, the movements led by them could not be supported. They kept aloof from the Civil Disobedience movement of 1930 on the ground that a non-violent movement was not revolutionary. During the second world war, the Communists opposed the Quit India movement with an oversimplistic explanation of internationalism. It is true that the Gandhian movements were not revolutionary either from the point of view of agenda or method but it is wrong to say that anti-imperialist movement has to be revolutionary. The Gandhian non-violent movements exemplify the reformist face of anti-imperialist movement. The bourgeois nationalist movement attained recognition as the mainstream movement but it was marked by both struggle and compromise with imperialism. The Communists however remained isolated from the national movement and were unable to evolve the distinctive path of revolution in India. They should have joined the national movement and joined hands with millions of uncompromising people when the bourgeois movement stagnated and prepared for a greater movement. Instead of identifying themselves with the national movement, the Communists tried to build up a class- conscious peasant movement and an alternative front outside the vortex of the national movement. In the process they were isolated from the millions of workers, peasants and middle class who had joined the national movement. Blind imitation of the Comintern model atrophied the Communist capacity for nationalist action.

4.1 Objective ? The unit will focus on the postcolonial interpretation of Indian Nationalism. ? The unit intends to show how the Subaltern study represents a breakthrough in the historiography of Indian Nationalism. ? The unit attempts a critical estimate of the Subaltern approach.

4.2 Introduction In postcolonial studies and critical theory, the term subaltern designates and identifies colonial populations who are socially, politically and geographically excluded from the hierarchy of power of an imperial colony. The term subaltern and subaltern studies entered the vocabulary of postcolonial studies through the works of subaltern studies group of historians. In the closing decades of the 20th century, a new approach emerged with its own interpretation of modern Indian history and nationalism. This was the Subaltern school which began with the 1980s with the publication of the first volume of Subaltern Studies in 1982 which represented a radical departure in modern India historiography with a path breaking statement that 'The blinkered historiography of Indian Nationalism cannot explain the fact because it neglects the contribution made NSOU ? GE-PS-11 25 by the people on their own that is independently of the elite to the making and development of this nationalism.' The Subaltern historians emphasized that the Indian Subalterns inspired by their spontaneous and inherent rebel consciousness, often negative and marked by territoriality and peculiar modality, had always a parallel role in Indian politics. Gyan Prakash in his work Another Reason(1999) has further developed the Subaltern idea saying that and partially revised the same. According to him, 'There was no fundamental opposition between the inner sphere of the nation and its outer life as a nation state, the latter was the former's existence at another abstract level.' Broadly speaking, Subaltern means history from below. This school assumes that there was no homogeneity in the struggle of the Indian people against colonialism. They look at India in terms of plural identities. What made it methodologically attractive? The consolidation of the Subaltern approach can be explained at two levels. It was a successor of the Marxist approach but in a different perspective. The Marxist approach was critical of the Imperialist and Cambridge schools. This lent legitimacy to the Subaltern approach which used terms like class, revolution, etc. That was the scenario in the 70s when Marxism was dominant. The Subaltern school picked up the basic idea initiated by the Marxists that history of the freedom struggle is the history of the people. But what they rejected was, the concept of the Indian masses. History has to be interpreted as the history of the suppressed and the silenced. The emphasis here is on broken, fractured identities. Categories like class, nation etc. cannot articulate and embrace history This was the basic thrust of the Subaltern intervention. Voices not recognized in the mainstream understanding of history, must be resurrected. The Subaltern school was an offshoot of Marxism but took the steam out of it.

4.3 The Postcolonial Interpretations According to Ranajit Guha, the historiography of Indian nationalism has for a long time been dominated by elitism represented by colonial and bourgeois nationalists. All types of elitist history have one thing in common, that is the absence of the politics of the people from their accounts. Colonialists saw colonial rule as the fulfilment of a mission to enlighten the ignorant people. The Nationalists visualized protest activities as parts of the making of the nation state. The Marxist who subsumed the people's struggles under the progression towards revolution and the socialist way. The Subaltern theories launched a scathing attack on the existing peasant and tribal histories for considering peasant rebellions as purely spontaneous and unpremeditated affairs and ignoring the consciousness of the rebels themselves. They decried all accounts of rebellions starting from the immediate official reports to those written by

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 26 left radicals which were texts of counter insurgency, as they refused to recognize the agency of the people and acknowledge the insurgent as the subject of his own history. They failed to recognize the parallel subaltern domain of politics which was untrammelled by elite politics and which possessed independent self-governing dynamics. The Subaltern approach was rooted in pre-colonial popular political structures, but was not archaic. It had relatively greater depth compared to elite politics. Politics of the people was an autonomous domain. Its foundation lay in traditional organizations of the people like caste, kinship networks, tribal solidarity, territoriality, etc. People's mobilizations were horizontal, not vertical. Unlike the elitist approach which was legalistic and pacific, the Subaltern movements were relatively violent. The Subaltern historians were totally disenchanted with Congress nationalism and rejected the view that popular mobilization was the result of either economic condition or initiatives from the top. The domain of the subaltern was defined by perpetual resistance against the elite. It was characterized by a general unity clubbing together heterogeneous groups like tribe and peasantry, proletariat and occasionally middle classes as well. Charismatic leadership was no longer the main driving force but the people's interpretation of charisma was prominent in the subaltern discourse. Gyanendra Pandey in Peasant Revolt and Indian Nationalism contends that the peasant revolt in Awadh took place independent of the Non- Cooperation Movement. The peasant's understanding of the local power structure and alliance with colonial power was much more advanced than the Congress. Whenever the Congress became strong, it reduced peasant militancy. Stephen Henningham in Quit India in Bihar and Eastern UP refers to two parallel movements, the elite uprising led by the high-class rich peasants and small landlords who dominated the Congress and a subaltern rebellion of the poor low caste people of the region. Shahid Amin in Gandhi as Mahatma says that popular perceptions and actions were totally at variance with the Congress leadership's perception of Gandhi. Gandhi had a clear-cut philosophy of economy and politics. He urged the people to give up bad practices like drinking and gambling. Stories about him were circulated which ascribed magical powers to Gandhi and his name was used to reinforce and establish caste hierarchies and make debtors pay. David Hardiman has emphasized the independent politics of the subaltern classes whether Bhil movements in Eastern Gujarat or tribal assertion in South Gujarat. Sumit Sarkar in 'The conditions and nature of Subaltern Militancy' observes that the Non- Cooperation movement revealed a picture of masses overstripping leaders. Popular initiative alarmed leaders into calling a halt and subaltern groups formed an autonomous domain with collective mentality. The colonial or bourgeois nationalist ideology could not establish its hegemony over the subaltern domain. The Subaltern

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 27 school underwent revision and modification with the advent of Post-Modernism and Post-Colonialism. The autonomous subaltern consciousness was challenged by Partha Chatterjee who postulated the subalternity of the elite in Nationalist thought and the Colonial world. Developing his idea within the framework of Edward Said, he said that colonial power knowledge was irresistible. He considered the colonial elite as subaltern vis- a vis the imperialist rulers. For Partha Chatterjee, the formation of the national state was a paradigmatic view of passive revolution, in which a structurally weak but passive bourgeoisie sought to build the largest possible nationalist alliance against the political rule of the colonial power but it also entailed confronting the fundamental cultural problem overcoming the parochial traditionalism of the peasant's world view. Chatterjee traces the sequential development of the Indian nationalist ideology through the moment of departure, maneuver and arrival. These are embodied in the thought of Bankim Chandra Chatterjee, Gandhi and Nehru respectively. Throughout these three moments, the peasantry and its politics remained marginalized. This marginalization was institutionalized when Indian nationalism became a state ideology in and through the Nehruvian project of nation building where the life of the nation was subsumed under the life of the state. Chatterjee's point was that the elite- subaltern split was maintained through non-hegemonic coercion under colonialism while in the post-colonial state it was largely resolved through nationalism. Indian nationalism perpetuated a potent split between the two domains not through coercion but through an equally non-hegemonic ideology which meant the exclusion of the subaltern from hegemony itself, the marginalization of autonomous and authentic forms of subaltern self-activity and expression and the attempted absorption of subaltern activity within the nationalist narrative. Gayatri Chakraborty Spivak in Can Subalterns speak criticized the humanist viewpoint of the Subaltern school. According to her, subaltern is a native man or woman without a human agency defined by social status. Knowledge is never innocent and expresses the interests of its producers.

4.4 Critical Estimate of Postcolonial Interpretations

The Subaltern school looks at India in terms of plural identities but these are not necessarily tangible sources of historical analysis. It has been alleged by Vinay Bahl in Relevance or Irrelevance of Subaltern Studies. Claiming to rewrite history from the perspective of subaltern groups, it has deviated from its original intent and become entangled in Post Modern debates about difference. What is its politics? Whose interest does it serve? These questions have arisen and the Subaltern school has no coherent theory of how subjectivity and agency are constructed within a concrete historical context. The aim of the Subaltern school was to remove the top-down approach and NSOU ? GE-PS-11 28 replace it with the study of culture of the people. What is missing here, is how do the social order and institutions articulate in the formation of the subject. How is the link between social and psychic reality to be specified? It has omitted material culture in the form of clothes, food, living and working conditions, hunting technology, etc. How is material culture produced by the human agency in the process of social interaction? The subaltern school is incapable of answering these questions and also producing emancipatory politics for the masses. It has also been observed that the Subaltern school has insisted on an autonomous domain predicated on the perpetuity of rebellious action, but whether this action is positive or negative, is not its primary concern. What is primary, is spontaneity and internally located self- generating momentum. The renowned historian Sumit Sarkar criticizes it for its drift towards Post -Colonialism. In 'The Decline of the Subaltern in Subaltern Studies', and 'Orientalism Revisited' he says that intellectually it is an attempt to make the best of both the worlds., critiquing others for Teleology, Essentialism etc. while claiming a special immunity from doing the same oneself. It has also produced no spectacular results. The framework of analysis is too restrictive and ultimately the Subaltern approach has swung from its simple emphasis on subaltern autonomy to an even more simplistic thesis of western cultural domination.

4.5 Conclusion

The endless debate between the different approaches to Nationalism makes any formulation difficult. The question is whether the contradictions can be resolved. It should be acknowledged that nation building is a complex process of contestation, adjustment and accommodation of multiple responses. Ania Loomba is right in saying that in the plural society of India, nationalism was bound to have many voices, those of Class, Caste, Brahmins, Dalits, Hindus, Muslims, Men, Women, etc. The ethos of cultural nationalism in British India exemplified by the Epics Ramayana and Mahabharata, the Indian Classics, religious practices etc acted as a catalyst of cultural integration. The syncretic tradition of India represented by Chaitanya, Namdev, Kabir, Nanak etc harped on the fundamental unity of India. British rule was responsible for India's political integration through Road and Railway network, Posts and Telegraphs, Indian Civil Service, Coin and Currency etc. The European ideas of nationalism strengthened the concept of political nationalism during the freedom struggle. The Indian internalized this western input and this inculcated a spirit of patriotism which was visible throughout the anti-colonial movement. Bipan Chandra is of the view that modern Indian nationalism arose to meet the challenge of foreign domination. With the realization of all the Indian classes that

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 29 Indian backwardness was caused by British rule, the nationalist spirit was ignited. The peasants saw that they were depeasantized because of the land revenue settlements of the British who patronized their oppressors, the rapacious zamindars and the moneylenders. The Dalit tribals found themselves uprooted by the Forest Acts. The artisans and handicraftsmen got frustrated at the breakneck speed of deindustrialization which was the cornerstone of the Imperial industrial policy. Later on, in the 20 th century, the factory labourers, mine workers, and bonded plantation laborers found that the rulers apparently sympathized with them but ultimately sided with the capitalists. Even the Zamindars and Jotedars joined hands with the nationalists when extreme racialism of the British shocked them and their convergence with colonial interests gave way to divergence and awakened in them, a sense of self-respect. The western educated intelligentsia was also disenchanting. R C Dutt revealed the economic exploitation of India by the British in Economic History of India. In course of time, Capitalists shed their Comprador character and united to oppose colonial trade, tariff, fiscal and transport policies. They opposed European Capitalists and sought protection from a national government. In the 1940s, many Indian industrialists demanded that all British investments be repatriated. of the intrinsic nature of foreign imperialism and its harmful impact on the lives of the Indian people that a powerful anti-imperialist movement arose and developed in India. This movement was a national movement because it united people from different classes and sections of the society who sank their mutual differences to unite against the common enemy.' Considering all the approaches together, the Imperialist approach symbolizes motivated distortion by the British. The Marxist approach was not sufficient by itself to explain the phenomenon like Gandhi's popularity with the masses. Moreover, there are extra economic factors particularly cultural factor stated by Gramsci. The practitioners of fundamentalism are not actuated by economic motives alone. Patriotism has a world of its own which is beyond the comprehension of the Cambridge School. However, the point is whether the Congress movement succeeded in creating a Nation? Here lies the subaltern counter point. Sudipto Kaviraj in the 7 th volume of 'Subaltern Studies' writes that India, the objective reality of today's history, whose objectivity is tangible enough, is not an object of discovery but invention.' 4.6 Summing Up ? Post-colonial interpretation of Indian nationalism emerged in the closing decades of the 20th century. NSOU ? GE-PS-11 30 ? Subaltern school is an offshoot of the post-colonial approach to the study of Indian nationalism. ? The subaltern approach was rooted in the pre-colonial popular political structures. It had relatively greater depth compared to elite politics. ? In post-colonial theory, the term subaltern describes the lower social classes and other social groups displaced to the margins of a society. In an imperial colony a subaltern is a native man or woman without human agency as defined by his/ her social status. ? Post-colonial approach of nationalism has been criticised on the ground that it has no coherent theory of subjectivity and agency within a concrete historical context. 4.7 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions: 1. The present unit seeks to explicate the phenomena of nationalism in India with reference to the leading approaches to the study of Nationalism. ? It intends to emphasize on the views of the main proponents of nationalism. ? It ventures to place nationalism debates in comparative perspective by highlighting their areas of linkage and hiatus, continuity and discontinuity. 5.2 Introduction The subject of nationalism is one of bewildering complexity not only because of its various approaches and manifestations, but also because of the construction of the phenomenon and the role of the state and the people for making a New India since independence. The formation and concretization of nationalism was not the work of any particular group but the entire people of India including the peasants, laborers, women and subalterns. How the ideology of nationalism became integrated with the Indian scenario, can be perceived in the history of the freedom struggle and condition of nationalism after independence. It is difficult to provide uniform definitions of nationalism. In the historical context, it is an ideological movement aimed at attaining NSOU ? GE-PS-11 32 and maintaining the identity, unity and autonomy of a nation, united under a national banner. It is the most powerful ideology in the building and consolidation of nation state. However, if one looks at the various types of nationalism, one cannot fail to be struck by the fact that the sources of discontent can be related to factors like cultural identity, political discrimination, repression or economic deprivation. Here nationalism is a movement of minority groups which is a reaction to the policies of the Central Government. It is also a counter reaction either on the part of political authorities or threatened social groups. However, in most cases the state plays a key role in either manipulating or being the target of nationalist sentiments. 5.3 An evaluation on the study of nationalism in India Integration is to combine parts into a whole. When it comes to India, it means creation of an undivided unit. Some people confuse identity with nationhood. But is there anything as Oneness of India? Did it ever exist? Did India achieve at any stage of her history, a single empire? Attempts were made by Ashoka but they were abortive. Bharatvarsha in ancient literature, included the whole sub-continent. Kshitimohan Sen in 'Bharate Hindu Musalmaner-Jukta-sadhana' emphasized the point that an underlying unity created by language, religion and culture could be missed by superficial observers. Tagore also harped on the theme of India's infinite capacity of assimilation and integration. When Europeans went to America in 1492, there was no such assimilation and it was the same case with the Aborigines of Australia and Maoris of New Zealand. Kshitimohan Sen tries to drive home the point that there was an Indian identity. Many have claimed India as a nation while others have disputed it. The dictionary meaning of nation is a community of people of mainly common descent, history and culture. Nationalism refers to patriotic feelings. Stalin called it a historically evolved community. Walter Bagehot once said 'it is something we feel but cannot explain.' Benedict Anderson in Imagined Communities in 1983 said that they are all inventions which had in the past influenced the history of the world and still do so. Thus, we cannot ignore it. Partha Chatterjee in Nation and its Fragments refers to the view of Benedict Anderson that nations were not the determinate products of given sociological conditions such as language, race or religion they had been, in Europe and everywhere else in the

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 33 world, imagined into existence. He argued further that the historical experience of nationalism in Western Europe, America and Russia had supplied for all subsequent nationalisms, a set of modular forms from which, nationalist elites in Asia and Africa, had chosen the ones they liked. While acknowledging the influential role of Anderson's work in generating new theoretical ideas on nationalism, Chatterjee poses the question that if nationalisms in the rest of the world were to choose their imagined community from modular forms already made available to them by Europe and America, what do they have left to imagine. Chatterjee's contention is that this view is at variance with the evidence on anti colonial nationalism. The most creative results of nationalist imagination in Asia and Africa, are based not on identity but rather on a difference from the modular forms of national society propagated by the modern west. This difficulty arises from the tendency to take the claims of nationalism to be a political movement too literally and seriously. In this connection, Chatterjee says that any nationalist history would trace the beginning of Indian nationalism to the formation of the Indian National Congress in 1885. It would describe the preceding period as a period of preparation and the period prior to that, was one of social reform when colonial enlightenment was beginning to modernize the customs and institutions of a traditional society and the political spirit was still very much that of collaboration with the colonial regime. Thus, nationalism had not yet emerged. This would fall in line with Anderson's formulation and it is here that Chatterjee contends that the autobiography of nationalism is fundamentally flawed. His logic is that anti- colonial nationalism creates its own domain of sovereignty within colonial society well before it begins its political battle with the imperial power. It divides the domain of the world into material and spiritual. The former which is an outer domain, has economy, statecraft, science and technology as its constitutive elements while the latter, which is an inner domain, bears the marks of cultural identity. Nationalism declares the domain of the spiritual to be its sovereign territory and refuses any intervention of colonial state in this domain. The colonial state is kept out of the inner domain of national culture but it does not remain unchanged. It is here that nationalism tries to creatively fashion a modern, national culture which is nevertheless not western. In this domain, the nation is already sovereign even when the state is in the hands of the colonial power. In the Indian case, in the first phase of social reform the Indian reformers looked at the colonial authorities for state action to NSOU ? GE-PS-11 34 reform traditional institutions. In the second phase, there was strong resistance against intervention of the colonial State in the realm of national culture. This was already the period of nationalism. Explicating his point, Chatterjee says that the European criticism of Indian tradition as barbaric, was based largely on religious beliefs and practices particularly those related to the treatment of women. In the early phase of the social reform movement, the agency of the colonial power, had concentrated on the area as central to Indian tradition. The nationalists disputed the choice of agency. Unlike the earlier reformers, they were not prepared to allow the colonial state to legislate to reform the traditional society. Their point was that only the nation could have the right to intervene in respect of cultural identity.

5.4 Conclusion Indian nationalism is generally explained in terms of colonial modernization throughout post-Plassey and pre-independence period particularly in the nineteenth century. That nationalism had already germinated in the Indian mind through people's experience down the ages and the colonial rule played only a catalytic role which is a debated formulation which could be critiqued as a teleological model of Enlightenment history giving the contested and contingent nation, a false sense of unity. In the wide range of contradictory ideas, the only convergence on how Indians imagined their nation, is that it was definitely the colonial shock which stimulated their plural society with multiple diversity of region, language, religion, caste, ethnicity, etc. to forge a national unity either with geographical expressions within European type of statehood or with what Bayly calls a pre-existing sense of territoriality and territorial patriotism rationalized by indigenous moral and ethical texts. The process of nation-building is still however a matter of intense controversy and debate. Partha Chatterjee calls it a derivative discourse though somewhat different from the west. Asis Nandy also thinks that Indian nationalism grew up as a response to western imperialism. This substituted the model of universalism advocated by Tagore and Gandhi with the western model of nation state. The debate on Nationalism in India first started with the imperialism approach which called Indian nationalism a creation of a minority group of people with vested interests. This was contested by the Nationalist approach which emphasized on the

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 35 nationalist feeling and unity among people irrespective of religion, caste and other differences. The Marxist approach termed the Indian nationalism as capitalist nationalism. The post-colonial approach, put emphasis on the subaltern sections of society who were kept out of the Nationalist project. 5.5 Summing Up ? Nationalism is not the handiwork of a few people, it is the entire people of India including peasants, workers, women and the marginalized whose effort went into the making of nationalism in India against the backdrop of the British colonial rule. ? It is not easy to provide a uniform definition of nationalism. Historically, it is an ideological movement aimed at achieving and maintaining the identity, unity and autonomy of a nation united under a national banner. ? Kshitimohan Sen pointed out that nationalism in India resulted from an unity of the Indian people based on language, religion and culture. Rabindranath Tagore talked about Indian people’s great capability for assimilation and integration. ? According to Partha Chatterjee, in a colonial society, nationalism creates its own domain which can be divided into material and spiritual. Spiritual domain is nationalism’s sovereign territory. It resisted the colonial intervention in this domain although it allowed the state to intervene for reform of traditional institutions. 5.6 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions: 1. Closely related with nationalism is the idea of social justice and social reform which was influenced by the idea of conservatism or modernism in 19 th century. This unit tries to understand the various dimensions of social reform and conservatism in 19th century India. The direct and indirect consequences of British rule provided the material, moral and intellectual conditions for the development of national movement in India. This consciousness began to be clearly stated by the political NSOU ? GE-PS-11 40 associations formed after 1850, especially those that came into being in the 1870s and 1880s. The onset of the second stage was marked by the formation of sub-national groups and the growth of a new desire for unity between the scattered and culturally diverse social groups. Politically this was the period when the first glimmer of nationalism appeared on the subcontinent. 6.3 Nineteenth Century Nationalism in India : Some Trends The Indian national movement has a long history. As a matter of fact, it began with the Revolt of 1857. The Revolt had been called as Sepoy Mutiny, by the British people, but many Indians considered it as the first war of India’s Independence. However, the actual struggle for freedom began with the formation of the Indian National Congress (INC) in 1885. The period between the Revolt of 1857 till the formation of the INC in 1885 was marked by a rapid growth of national consciousness for political freedom. With the formation of INC the national struggle became an organized movement. The second half of the 19th century witnessed rapid growth of organized national movement in India. It arose to meet the challenge of foreign domination. Most of these were led by English-educated professionals such as lawyers. The more important ones were the Poona Sarvajanik Sabha, the Indian Association, the Madras Mahajan Sabha, the Bombay Presidency Association, and of course the Indian National Congress. The need for an all-India organisation of educated Indians had been felt since 1880, but the Ilbert Bill controversy deepened this desire. The Indian National Congress was established when 72 delegates from all over the country met at Bombay in December 1885. The early leadership – Dadabhai Naoroji, Pherozeshah Mehta, Badruddin Tyabji, W.C. Bonnerji, Surendranath Banerji, Romesh Chandra Dutt, S. Subramania Iyer, among others – was largely from Bombay and Calcutta. Naoroji, a businessman and publicist settled in London, and for some time member of the British Parliament, guided the younger nationalists. A retired British official, A.O. Hume, also played a part in bringing Indians from the various regions together leading to the formation of the Indian National Congress. 6.4 Reformism in Indian Nationalist Movement The Reformism movement is actually the social reform movements. The presence of the British in India, however, brought about a radical change in the entire social perspective. Apart from the introduction of the idea of equality based on a conception of the individual as a repository of values and rights, this contact with the West gave to India, for the first time, a doctrine of social progress – the belief that man can himself, through collective

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 41 action, change the structure of society. Reformism in India did not ordinarily mean, as it did in the West, a reorganisation of the entire structure of society with a view to the alleviation of the conditions of the underprivileged; rather, it meant the infusion into the existing social structure of newer ways of life and modes of behaviour. Generally such change was gradual and was initiated only by the upper classes. Social change in India was, for a very long time, based on the 'filtration theory' — the filtration of attitudes and modes of behaviour from the upper layers of society to the lower ones. It was only at the beginning of this century with the growth of organised reform groups. that the social basis of Hinduism, the caste system, came to be questioned. Various social service institutions took up the cause of the less fortunate groups in society and sought to lift India from the morass of caste tyranny. What was unique about the social reform movement initiated in the nineteenth century? Charles H. Heimsath in the book Indian Nationalism and Hindu Social Reform(1964) notes that even prior to the nineteenth century, there were movements aimed at reform especially in the field of religion. The entire Bhakti cult was in a way a revolt against orthodox Hinduism. However, this was more a negative or sannyasin-renunciative type of movement than one of positive social action. For all its spiritual egalitarian-ism, the Bhakti movement failed to cure the diseased condition of the Indian social system. Its appeal was more emotional than rational and individual salvation rather than social salvation was stressed. Even in the nineteenth century, one finds Bhakti-type movements, as in the Swami Narayana Sect and the Sanmargha Sangha of Mahatnia Ramalingam and in the immediate effects of Shri Ramakrishna's mystical preaching. Broadly considered, the uniqueness of the social reform movement in India lay in the inspiration, the ideas and the motivations of the reformers themselves. While earlier reformers were prompted by a love for the underdog, these modern reformers saw the incompatibility of particular practices with the total progress of society. Furthermore, in their attempt to 'rationalise' the Hindu religion, these reformers sought to distinguish the essential aspects of Hinduism from the nonessential ones, to separate the pristine religion from the subsequent accretions. Throughout the nineteenth century, one notices that the movement for social and religious reform and the political movement, though interacting, constituted separate and clearly distinguishable traditions and were together to lay the intellectual foundations for the emergence of nationalism. Heimsath, discussing the course of the social reform movement till the First World War, sees it as a three stage development. The first stage was marked by efforts on the part of individuals to order their personal lives in accordance with standards adopted from the West. The archetype of such individual revolt and reform was Raja Rammohan Roy. With the turn of the century, social reform came to mean a regeneration of the traditional spirit of the nation — regeneration founded on religious revival and cultural xenophobia. In his effort to attract the educated Bengalis of his time, Roy founded the Brahma Samaj — a monotheistic religious body that drew much from the Christian doctrines but which had as its avowed

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 42 purpose the restoration of the Hindu faith to its pristine purity. Even before the establishment of the Brahmo Samaj, however, Roy had initiated a social reform movement of the first order. Through a succession of polemical battles waged both during discussion in the Atmiya Sabha (later the Brahmo Samaj) and in the pages of the Samvad Kaumudi, Roy was able to enlist support for such reform measures as the abolition of 'sati' and 'kulinism' and the introduction of widow remarriage. With Roy began the rationalising of the Hindu tradition and the clearing of the underbrush of social evils. The thread was taken up by other enlightened individuals in Bengal, Bombay and Madras. In Bengal, Ishwarchandra Vidyasagar shattered the very core of orthodoxy by his monumental crusade for widow remarriage. In Bombay Vishnu Shastri Pandit sought governmental sanction for the same, while in Madras the cause was taken up by Viresa Lingam Pantulu with the formation of the Rajamundhry Social Reform Association. To mention some of the leading lights of the social reform movement in Western India, there was Balgangadhar Shastri Jam-bhekar, the founder of the Bombay Darpan and a prominent champion of social reform, the Gujaratis Mehtaji Mancharam and Narmada Shankar and that ebullient literary social critic Gopal Hari Deshmukh Tokahitwadi. On the practical level, there was Jyotiba Phule, an ardent reformer and social worker, and Karsondas Mulji of the Maharaja Libel case fame. Even the Prarthana Samaj, formed in 1867 devoted itself to the reconstruction of Hinduism along more rational lines. An important characteristic of the activities of the reformers of Western India was their conscious effort to imbue public opinion with their rationalism. As against the dramatic unconventionality of the Bengali Reformers, in Bombay there was no complete break with traditional society; rather what was sought was a practical adjustment of religious convictions and social behaviour toward a more open and egalitarian basis. Totally different was the impact of Swami Dayanand and the early Arya Samaj on Northern India. Dayanand combined in himself several paradoxical elements. Extremely conservative in his thought and beliefs, sometimes to the point of obscurantism, yet astonishingly revolutionary in his attitudes and actions, Dayanand typifies a complex reaction to Western influence. Rejecting the existing caste basis of society, the inferior status of women and the system of child marriages, he called for a vigorous programme of social reform aimed not so much at westernising the Hindu religion as in reviving the glory of the Vedic religion. What Dayanand sought was not to help individuals attain personal salvation by isolating themselves from society; he was interested in the salvation of society by means of individual self-assertion and the amelioration of social evils. Of considerable relevance was the effect of Dayanand's militant spiritualism upon the emergence and development of extremist nationalism in India. By bringing the dynamism of the past to vivify the modern mould, Dayanand blazed the trail for the extremists in two significant respects: (1) His own deep-rooted xenophobia was carried on to the subsequent generations and served to inspire the militant anti-British

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 43 temper of extremist politics at the turn of the century. (2) Connected to this was Dayanand's idea that history could be interpreted in order to justify social action. This attitude was closely followed by Tilak in his interpretation of the Gceta and Savarkar in his interpretation of the 'Indian War of Independence'. What developed as Indian nationalism, Heimsath says, was actually a myth based on consciously propagated ideas and one which was more a product of the personal preferences of the so-called nationalists than an enunciation of social realities. He believes that once this was done, through a process of rationalisation, an attempt was made to relate this myth to shared religious, linguistic and geographic identifications. In short, the author suggests that there was nothing spontaneous about the appearance of nationalism in India; it was consciously and carefully contrived by an eminent company of intellectuals. One of the most urgent questions the nationalist movement faced in its very early stages, was whether social reform should precede political reform or vice versa. The earlier moderates tried to bypass this problem by assigning social reform to private action on the local level, while political reform was considered on the national level and through public discussion. The Indian National Congress deliberately kept aloof from social questions. However it was Ranade who sought to give national recognition to the social reform movement, by attaching the National Social Conference to the Indian National Congress as its counterpart. The National Social Conference itself was soon to split into two distinct schools. On the one side, there was the Ranade-Telang school which adhered to the doctrine of "progress along the line of least resistance". According to them, reformers must "flow with the tide of social change". For Telang, this meant a greater emphasis upon political reform, which he felt was easier to achieve in his day. This approach sought to effect change only in "constructive channels" and rarely sought to undermine the foundations of Hindu society. The opposite school of reform, led by Chandavarkar and the Madras reformers (particularly the Hindu and the Social Reformer) called for a vigorous campaign of social reform, Chandavarkar appealed to men and women to act from a free conscience and stand up against social evils. Such divergences naturally affected the overall efficacy of the movement for social reform. This was further vitiated by the fact that the social reformers themselves failed to live up to their high precepts. They yielded in the face of precisely those elements against which they should. have stood up (Ranades 'praya-schita', his second marriage to a child of eleven; Raghunatha Rao's reluctance to attend the marriage of a widow, etc). It is against this background that one sees the strength of Tilak's insistence that social reform should be completely set aside and that the all important task was that of invigorating the political movement. The early moderate nationalists tried to define a new India in terms of categories derived from European political and social experiences. These efforts failed in as much as the

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 44 general mass of people were unaffected. What was needed was a completely new alignment of political and social forces. The formation of the Muslim League and the theory of two separate streams of cultural consciousness cut at the roots of the earlier Congress stand on nationalism. Slowly, nationalism in the early years of this century became Hindu and adopted Hindu symbols and traditions on a mass scale. The path-finders of this new religio-political movement were the practitioners of political extremism like B C Pal, Tilak and Aurobindo. The basic requisites for the reconstruction of nationalism, the extremists believed, were : (a) the incorporation of the masses into the political movement and (b) the identification of the nation with religious ideas. These were linked together and gave to the movement a strong militant and revivalist character. If the national spirit was to penetrate beneath the English-educated intellectual groups, and be truly Indian, only cultural and religious awakening could affect this. In the head of social reform, Annie Besant, after an initial attempt to bolster the orthodox position, came out in her book "Wake Up India: A Plea for Social Reform" with a vigorous plea for all the major planks of the social reformer's programme including remarriage of virgin widows and the emancipation of the depressed classes. Further, the Theosophical Society carried her concern into endeavours of a social service or educational nature. Another figure on the intellectual horizon was Swami Vivekananda. Vivekananda was profoundly struck by the malaise of his own society. Much of the country's tragedy, he felt, could be ascribed to the hopeless quest for mukti. Vivekananda wanted to go to the very root of this malaise and effect a radical reformation. This he felt was possible only by means of a spiritual rejuvenation. "Put the tire there (at the level of the masses) and let it burn upwards and make the Indian nation." Vivekananda condemned the so-called reformers as having done no good "excepting the creation of a most vituperative, and most condemnatory literature." Rather than endorse the ornamental reforms advocated by the Social Conference, he sought to bring a new life for 'all' of India's women and for the lower classes. Vivekananda's thought marked the culmination of the 19th century social revolt. As Heimsath says: "The challenge Vivekananda presented to Indians to reform totally their religious and social life was not accepted, because on the one hand it called for too great a sacrifice from the still complacent educated and privileged groups and on the other hand, demanded an uprooting of traditions, customs and beliefs unacceptable to the general populace" Heimsath concludes his study with the assertion that social reform and nationalism are irrevocably linked as living processes and as organised movements in India as well as elsewhere. Following Daniel Lerner, he believes that nationalism and social reform emerge as a result of transformation of traditional societies and the transfer of individual loyalties from the family and caste groups to larger societies of the city, region and nation. It is basically from this social perspective that Heimsath views change and reform in India.

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 45 6.5 Conservatism in Indian Nationalist Movement Conservatism in Indian Nationalist Movement means the process by which modernisation drive of British colonial rulers influenced the Indian princes and they became a conservative lot by which they thought of creating a modernisation-conservatism model different from that of revolutionary upheaval to overthrow British colonial rulers. The question of the relationship between the British Empire in India and modernity remains highly contentious, and in some ways has become even more so in recent years. An older intellectual history approach tried to deal with the question by focusing on the conflicting and changing political projects of the British at the highest levels. It argued that the British were divided between liberal modernizers and conservatives, and the nineteenth century saw a fundamental change in British policy: between the 1820s and the 1850s, the British, inspired by utilitarian and evangelical political thought, promoted a confident liberal modernization—involving, among other things, the Anglicization of elite education, the introduction of liberal legal codes, and the annexation of the remaining Indian princely states. However, after the Rebellion of 1857–58 the British reversed many of these policies to a substantial degree, and increasingly relied on “traditional” modes of rule—that is through elites at the top of old status hierarchies, such as aristocrats, and by means of paternalistic methods. However, this approach has been much less popular in recent years. From the 1970s, the “Cambridge School” argued that British ideological projects—whether of modernization or support for traditional rule—had very little impact on local society and politics, which was largely determined by local factional conflicts. For some, there was no real developmental project underpinning British imperialism in India, over and above what was necessary to secure certain “imperial interests”—markets for British goods, access to cheap military manpower in the form of the Indian Army and prompt and predictable payment of Indian financial liabilities to both the British state and the private financial sector; British policy was largely pragmatic and relatively unaffected by ideology or party-political divisions in either London or Calcutta-Delhi. Others argue that while the British Raj may have undertaken some kind of liberal ideological project (the universalization and codification of law, the imposition of a free market and liberal individual property rights), it soon ran into the sands of collaborator machinations and resistance. In more recent writings, however, some members of the Cambridge School have argued that the British did have more of an impact on India, but by accident rather than design. Chris Bayly and others argue that the effect, if not necessarily the intention, of Raj policy and administration was the traditionalization of Indian culture, economy and society, while the deliberate demilitarization of Indian society between 1790 and 1840 had the effect of deurbanizing and deindustrializing India. Meanwhile for NSOU ? GE-PS-11 46 Washbrook, traditionalization was the inevitable consequence of “collaborator” strategy, for under British rule certain groups such as high-caste Brahmins and dominant peasants, and certain practices, such as customary personal law, attained greater parport over Indian society than they had previously enjoyed. Conservative modernization was not the only British strategy, and some liberals remained opposed to it; nor was it systematic or coherent. Indeed there were endless differences among its advocates as to which elite groups (Indian kings, landed aristocrats, “native gentlemen” or agentrified English bureaucracy) were best suited to be the principal agents of development, as to how they themselves should be “improved,” and what precisely should be their relationship with the Raj itself. However, much British policy after the Mutiny makes more sense if seen through this prism. Rebellion of 1857–58 saw a major change in policy, as the British decided that liberal attacks on traditional elites and paternalistic forms of government had alienated many Indians and precipitated popular unrest. As Metcalf has argued, the result was a loss of faith in a more optimistic liberalism, and by the late 1860s there was broad agreement among liberals and conservatives that radical social and cultural change in India was both dangerous and inappropriate. However, he exaggerates the extent to which the British reverted to a Burkean conservatism. Rather, official policy increasingly adopted a conservative-modernizing approach—in effect combining a Romantic paternalism with an authoritarian liberalism. This, in turn, was legitimized by intellectual and scholarly writings, which queried conventional assumptions that India (especially its village social structures) was some kind of analogue of Western Europe’s medieval past, and that India might simply follow the same path of British economic and political development. By the mid-1870s this set of ideas about aristocrats and modernization was beginning to crystallize into a more coherent policy of conservative modernization. An early proponent was Viceroy Lytton (1876–80), appointed by the Conservative Prime Minister Disraeli, who united a romantic love of India’s old aristocracy with a strong commitment to liberal markets and the creation of efficient bureaucracies to promote economic development. But the high point of this British strategy of conservative, aristocrat-led modernization was reached under the vice-regency of Lord Curzon (1899–1905). Curzon was also keen to promote Indian aristocratic presence in the army and joined debates on establishing the rank of Indian King’s Commissioned officer which had been on-going since the 1880s. In 1901, he founded an Indian Cadet Corps (ICC) with a view to the “modernization” of the princes themselves, a group he saw was generally dissolute and indolent. It is clear that for many maharajas there was no contradiction between their traditional role as promoters of rajdharma and British understandings of “good governance” and “improvement.” So, for example, such indubitably “modern” tasks as holding a population census together information on the caste composition of a state could be seen as simply a continuation of the old kingly task of managing caste relations.

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 47 Similarly, the planning, reorganizing and rebuilding royal cities in accordance with modern ideas of sanitation, but which also re-sited groups by caste (as was done in Mysore), could also be presented as part of a traditional kingly duty of fostering social harmony and caste equilibrium. Meanwhile in Travancore the Maharaja could appear both the ideal “westernizing” reformer, bringer of “good government” and sound administration,” while presenting the same policies to his people as simply the continuation of traditions of kingly management. Thus old notions of rajdharma could also be invoked to justify efforts to create more integrative “national” identities intended to transcend sectarian divisions as a furtherance of orthodox kingly protection and patronage to all religions. But in truth the “progressive” princely states presented a vision of modernity radically at odds with that associated with the mainstream of Congress nationalism. Despite the creation of representative assemblies in a few of them, and even the introduction of a limited franchise, few were in any sense democratic. They had been, to a limited degree, bureaucratized, but not democratized. Moreover even reformist diwans such as Baroda’s Manubhai Mehta, was increasingly associated with the high conservative social and religious ideas of the Hindu Mahasabha. And while education—especially higher education—was a great strength of the reforming states and their diwans, reform was often accompanied by religious revival and interest in Vedic learning, of which many nationalists would not have approved.

6.6 Conclusion In nineteenth century India, nationalist movement reflected two opposing trends. On the one hand, there was a growing presence of social reformers and on the other hand, there was a large number of conservative Indian who included a large section of the Indian middle class intellectuals and the elite society of the princely states. They were highly influenced by the British colonial rulers. Both the social reformist preachers and the conservative elements were influenced by British education. They, in a way, created the base of nationalist movement by making the groundwork for future generation of leaders in twentieth century to carry forward the ethos of openness and pluralism to strengthen the Indian nationalist movement.

While until the end of the 19th century, Indian nationalists confined their political demands to a share in political power and control over the purse, by 1905 most of the prominent nationalists were putting forward the demand for some form of self-government. at the International Socialist Congress in 1904, he put forward the demand for 'self-government' and treatment of India 'like other British Colonies. A year later in 1905, in a message to the Benares session of the Indian National Congress, Dadabhai categorically asserted: 'Self-government is the only remedy for India's woes and wrongs.' And, then, as the President of the 1906 session of the Congress at Calcutta, he laid down the goal of the national movement as "self-government or Swaraj," like that of the United Kingdom or the Colonies. While minds were being prepared and the goals formed, the mass struggle for the political emancipation of the country was still in the womb of time. But the early nationalists were laying strong and enduring foundations for the national movement to grow upon. They did not base their nationalism primarily on appeals to abstract or shallow sentiments or on obscurantist appeals to the past. They rooted their nationalism in a brilliant scientific analysis of the complex economic mechanism of modern colonialism and of the chief contradiction between the interests of the Indian people and British rule. 7.4

Almost from the beginning of the 19th century, politically conscious Indians had been attracted to modern civil rights, especially the freedom of the Press. As early as 1824, Raja Rammohan Roy had protested against a regulation restricting the freedom of the Press. In a memorandum to the Supreme Court, he had said that every good ruler 'will be anxious to afford every individual the readiest means of bringing to his notice what ever may require his interference. To secure this important object, the unrestricted liberty of publication is the only effectual means that can be employed.'

Even the work of the National Congress was accomplished during these years largely through the Press. The Congress had no organization of its own for carrying on political work. Its resolutions and proceedings had to be propagated through newspapers. Interestingly, nearly one-third of the founding fathers of the Congress in 1885 were journalists. Powerful newspapers emerged during these years under distinguished and fearless journalists. These were the Hindu and Swadesamitran under the editorship of G. Subramaniya Iyer, Kesari and Mahratta under B.G. Tilak, Bengalee under Surendranath Banerjea, Amrita Bazar Patrika under Sisir Kumar Ghosh and Motilal Ghosh, Sudharak under NSOU ? GE-PS-11 51 G.K. Varma and Tribune and Akhbar-i-Am in Punjab, Indu Prakash, Dnyan Prakash, Kal and Gujarati in Bombay, and Som Prakash, Banganivasi, and Sadharani in Bengal. In fact, there hardly existed a major political leader in India who did not possess a newspaper or was not writing for one in some capacity or the other.

To arouse political consciousness, to inculcate nationalism, to expose colonial rule, to 'preach disloyalty' was no easy task, for there had existed since 1870 Section 124A of the Indian Penal Code according to which 'whoever attempts to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government established by law in British India' was to be punished with transportation for life or for any term or with imprisonment upto three years. This clause was, moreover, later supplemented with even more strident measures. Indian journalists adopted several clever stratagems and evolved a distinctive style of writing to remain outside the reach of the law. Since Section 124A excluded writings of persons whose loyalty to the Government was undoubted, they invariably prefaced their vitriolic writing with effusive sentiments of loyalty to the Government and the Queen. Another stratagem was to publish anti-imperialist extracts from London-based socialist and Irish newspapers or letters from radical British citizens knowing that the Indian Government could not discriminate against Indians by taking action against them without touching the offending Britishers. Sometimes the extract from the British newspaper would be taken without quotation marks and acknowledgement of the source, thus teasing the British- Indian bureaucracy into contemplating or taking action which would have to be given up once the real source of the comment became known. For example, a sympathetic treatment of the Russian terrorist activities against Tsarism would be published in such away that the reader would immediately draw a parallel between the Indian Government and the Revolutionary Terrorists of Bengal and Maharashtra. The officials would later discover that it was an extract from the Times, London, or some such other British newspaper. Often the radical expose would take the form of advice and warning to the Government as if from a well-wisher, as if the writer's main purpose was to save the authorities from their own follies! B.G. Tilak and Motilal Ghosh were experts at this form of writing.

Indian newspapers began to find their feet in the 1870s. They became highly critical of Lord Lytton's administration, especially regarding its inhuman approach towards the victims of the famine of 1876-77. As a result the Government decided to make a sudden strike at the Indian language newspapers, since they reached beyond the middle class readership. The Vernacular Press Act of 1878, directed only against Indian language newspapers, was conceived in great secrecy and passed at a single sitting of the Imperial Legislative Council. The Act provided for the confiscation of the printing press, paper and other materials of a newspaper if the Government believed that it was publishing seditious materials and had flouted an official warning. Indian nationalist opinion firmly opposed the Act. The first great demonstration on an issue of public importance was organized in Calcutta on this question when a large

The Government of India remained, as before 1858, an alien despot. Nor was this accidental. While moving the Indian Councils Bill of 1861, the Secretary of State for India, Charles Wood, said: "All experience teaches us that where a dominant race rules another, the mildest form of Government is despotism." A year later he wrote to Elgin, the Viceroy, that the only government suitable for such a state of things as exists in India a despotism controlled from home." This 'despotism controlled from home' was to remain the fundamental feature of the Government of India till 15 August 1947. What was the role of Indian members in this Legislative Council? The Government had decided to add them in order to represent Indian views, for many British officials and statesmen had come to believe that one reason for the Revolt of 1857 was that Indian views were not known to the rulers. But, in practice, the Council did not serve even this purpose. Indian members were few in number — in thirty years, from 1862 to 1892, only forty-five Indians were nominated to it. The nationalist agitation forced the Government to make some changes in legislative functioning by the Indian Councils Act of 1892. The number of additional members of the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils was increased from the previous six to ten, ten to sixteen. A few of these members could be elected indirectly through municipal committees, district boards, etc., but the official majority remained.

The two men who were most responsible for putting the Council to good use and introducing a new spirit in them were Pherozechah Mehta and Gopal Krishna Gokhale. Both men were political Moderates. Both became famous for being fearlessly independent and the bete noir of British officialdom in India. 7.5

The richness of the movement was not confined to politics alone. The period saw a breakthrough in Indian literature, music, science and industry. Indian society, as a whole, was experimenting and the creativity of the people expanded in every direction. Swadeshi Movement had its genesis in the anti partition movement which was started to oppose the British decision to partition Bengal. There was no questioning the fact that Bengal with a population of 78 million (about a quarter of the population of British India) had indeed become administratively unwieldy. Equally there was no escaping the fact that the real motive of partitioning Bengal was political. Indian nationalism was gaining in strength and partition expected to weaken what was perceived as the nerve centre of Indian nationalism at that time. The attempt, at that time in the words of Lord Curzon, the Viceroy (1899-1905) was to 'dethrone Calcutta' from its position as the 'centre from which the Congress Party is manipulated throughout Bengal, and indeed which the Congress Party centre of successful intrigue' and 'divide ,the Bengali speaking population.' Rislely, the Home Secretary to the Government of India, was more blunt.

adopted were petitions to the Government, public meetings, memoranda, and propaganda through pamphlets and newspapers such as Hitabadi, Sanjibani and Bengalee. Their objective was to exert sufficient pressure on the Government through an educated public opinion in India and England to prevent the unjust partition of Bengal from being implemented.

From 1905 onwards the extremist leadership in Indian National Congress took hold of the movement. Emboldened by Dadabhai Naoroji's declaration at the Calcutta session (1906) that self government or swaraj was to be the goal of the Congress, the Extremists gave a call for passive resistance in addition to swadeshi and boycott which would include a boycott of government schools and colleges, government service, courts, legislative councils, municipalities, government titles, etc. so as to, as Aurobindo put it, "

The militant nationalists tried to transform the anti- partition and Swadeshi Movement into a mass struggle and gave the slogan of India's independence from foreign rule. "Political freedom is the life breath of a nation," declared Aurobindo. Thus, the Extremists gave the idea of India's independence the central place in India's politics. In science, Jagdish Chandra Bose, Prafulla Chandra Roy and others pioneered original research which was praised the world over. i. Extent of Mass Participation: Students came out in large numbers to propagate and practise swadeshi, and to take a lead in organising picketing of shops selling foreign goods. Police adopted a repressive attitude towards the students. Schools and colleges whose students participated in the agitation were to be penalised by disaffiliating them or stopping of grants and privileges to them. Students who were found guilty of participation were to be disqualified for government jobs or for government scholarships, and disciplinary action fine, expulsion, arrest, beating, etc. was to be taken against them. Women, who were traditionally home-centered, especially those of the urban middle classes, took active part in processions and picketing. From now onwards, they were to play a significant role in the national movement. With the coming of Swadeshi and Boycott Movement, it became clear that the moderates had outlived their utility and their politics of petitions and speeches had become obsolete. They had not succeeded in keeping pace with time, and this was highlighted by their failure to get the support of the younger generation for their style of politics. Their failure to work among the masses had meant that their ideas did not take root among the masses.

Non-violent civil disobedience had succeeded in forcing the opponents to the negotiating table and conceding the substance of the demands put forward by the movement. The blueprint for the 'Gandhian' method of struggle had been evolved and Gandhiji started back for his native land. The South African 'experiment' was now to be tried on a much wider scale on the Indian subcontinent. In other respects, too, the South African experiment prepared Gandhiji for leadership of the Indian national struggle. He had the invaluable experience of leading poor Indian labourers, of seeing their capacity for sacrifice and for bearing hardship, their morale in the face of repression. South Africa built up his faith in the capacity of the Indian masses to participate in and sacrifice for a cause that moved them. Gandhiji also had had the opportunity of leading Indians belonging to different religions, Hindus, Muslims, Christians and Parsis who were all united under his leadership in South Africa. 8.4 Non-Cooperation Movement under Gandhiji Before the second decade of the 20th century struggle for independence was carried by several leaders by their different ideologies and methods of programme. In the Gandhian era which was estimated after the First World War had seen the uniformity of the all section of the society, communities and profession. The philosophy of Mahatma Gandhi that was vested in the ideas of Non-violence and Satyagraha was introduced before the Non- Cooperation movement in the Champaran, Kheda and Ahmedabad. He also successfully used his ideologies and methods in South Africa against the racial discrimination towards the Indians by the British authorities. Gandhi saw the futility of both these techniques. He was therefore searching for an alternative to both the extremes, which would avoid the pitfalls of both. He found the answer in non-violent non-co-operation. His non-cooperation was posited against the moderate techniques which were ineffective at best and also ran the risk of being co-opted. And his non-violence was posited against the methods of violent revolutionaries, which could not last long and would eventually be suppressed. However in treating non-violence as a part of his strategy of struggle, one should not underplay his

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 59 total and uncompromising commitment to non-violence. Non-violence was an effective strategy for the movement, but for Gandhi its significance was much more than purely strategic. He was fully committed to it and convinced of its moral superiority. The Montagu Chelmsford Reforms of 1919 had failed to satisfy the Indian National Congress and the discontented mood of the common people, peasants and workers because of the War time sufferings (rise of the price of the commodities even did not change the policy of wages rise). Both the groups of the INC (Extremists and Moderates) had lost credibility as they failed to achieve their stated goals. The question of the Turkey before the Indian Muslims as a Khilaf against the British Dominance also created atmosphere for the national agitation among the Muslim community. The Muslims started the Khilafat movement against the British Government for preservation of the integrity of the Turkish Empire and better treatment of the Sultan of the Turkey. Muslim leaders Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, Ali brothers (Muhammad and Shaukat), Hasrat Mohani and Hakim Ajmal Khan formed the Khilafat committee to carry on a movement in the favour of Turkey in March 1919. The overthrow of the Czarist power in the Russia and the success of the Bolshevik Revolution were responsible for the change mind of people and nationalist leaders in British India. The Rowlatt Act of 1919 and the massacre at the Jallianwalla Bagh on 13 April 1919 also created a lot of tension among the Indian people. According to the official estimate, 379 persons were killed and more than 1,000 wounded as a result of firing ordered by General Dyer. Shekar Bandopadhyay (From Plassey to Partition) argued with the issue of mass mobilization. The Home Rule Leagues of Tilak and Annie Besant prepared the ground for the success of the Mahatma Gandhi's initial Satyagraha movements. It was estimated that sixty thousands souls all over India participated with the Leagues during the movement. The experiments of his philosophy as non-violence and Satyagraha in India were seen in the early Satyagraha movements in Champaran, Kheda and Ahmedabad. In the Champaran district of Bihar, the peasantry was forced to cultivate indigo in the 15% of their lands and supply them to the British officials at fixed rates. Mahatma Gandhi led the movement and the result came with the Champaran Agriculture Act 1919 which gave relief to the peasantry of the Champaran by abolishing the practice of forced indigo cultivation in their lands. In 1918, Mahatma Gandhi organized a non-violent strike for the textile mill workers at Ahmedabad for the retention of plague bonus which had been introduced since August 1917. He worked as an arbitrator between two groups, employers and workers which lasted with the workers' demand. In the Kheda district of Bombay, Mahatma Gandhi led the movement for the peasants, demanding remission of land revenue on the ground of failure of crops. As the results of these Satyagraha, Mahatma Gandhi emerged as a leader of the masses on the Indian political scene in 1919. . It was the Rowlatt satyagraha that made Gandhiji a truly national leader. Emboldened by its success, Gandhiji called for a campaign of "non- cooperation" with British rule. Indians who wished colonialism to end were asked to stop NSOU ? GE-PS-11 60 attending schools, colleges and law courts, and not pay taxes. In sum, they were asked to adhere to a "renunciation of (all) voluntary association with the (British) Government". If noncooperation was effectively carried out, said Gandhiji, India would win swaraj within a year. To further broaden the struggle he had joined hands with the Khilafat Movement that sought to restore the Caliphate, a symbol of Pan-Islamism which had been abolished by the Turkish ruler Kemal Attaturk. The Allahabad conference of the Central Khilafat Committee which was conducted on June 1920 decided to launch the movement in four stages:

Boycott of titles, civil services, police and army and finally non-payment of taxes.

the annual session of the Indian National Congress, held at Nagpur, confirmed the Non-Cooperation Resolution already passed at Calcutta. But Bipin Chandra Pal, Annie Besant, M.A. Jinnah and G.S. Khaparde didn't approve the Non-Cooperation and left Congress. This was also the period of labor unrest and trade unionism, marked by a major strike in the Bombay textile industry in January 1919, appearance of the Madras labor union in 1918, some 125 new trade unions and finally the formation of the All India Trade Union Congress in Bombay in November 1920. About 14,582 delegates attended the Nagpur session and they supported Mahatma Gandhi for the national movement. All section of the Indian society, communities and professions joined the Non-Cooperation movement. In particular two major political decisions taken by Gandhi – withdrawal of the movement after violence in Chauri Chaura in 1922 and Gandhi –Irvin Pact signed in 1931 – aroused considerable debate. The withdrawal of the non-cooperation movement after violence at Chauri Chaura has been understood in different ways. In its own times, it was considered to be a matter of political choice between violence and non-violence. Given Gandhi's uncompromising stand on this question, it was believed to be at the heart of Gandhi's decision to call off the movement. Leading Marxist historian R.P. Dutt looked at this question very differently. In his view, it indicated and confirmed the 'bourgeois' character of the Movement because Gandhi did not want the Movement to go out of control and turn against the propertied classes. "Non-cooperation," wrote Mahatma Gandhi's American biographer Louis Fischer, "became the name of an epoch in the life of India and of Gandhiji. Non-cooperation was negative enough to be peaceful but positive enough to be

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 61 effective. It entailed denial, renunciation, and self-discipline. It was training for self-rule." As a consequence of the Non-Cooperation Movement, the British Raj was shaken to its foundations for the first time since the Revolt of 1857. 8.5 Civil Disobedience Movement of Mahatma Gandhi In December 1921, Indian National Congress at Ahmadabad session authorized Gandhi to launch a mass civil disobedience movement which had a motive behind it "non-violent violation of unjust laws in obedience to the higher laws of morality." Mahatma Gandhi had been planning to start the Civil Disobedience Movement in Bardoli of Gujarat. The Civil Disobedience Movement was one of the most significant movements launched by Mahatma Gandhi in the course of India's freedom struggle. The three main causes of the civil disobedience movement: 1. Formation of the Simon Commission 2. Demand for Dominion Status 3. Protests against the arrest of social revolutionaries. Dandi March (Salt Satyagraha) : Mahatma Gandhi was preparing for a mass movement on the lines of the Civil Disobedience Movement for a long time. He was looking for a symbol around which the entire movement could be centered and he hit upon the idea of salt as a tax on salt, in his opinion, was the most oppressive form of tax which humankind could devise since salt was a basic necessity of human existence, just like air and water. Therefore breaking of salt laws would be the most suitable way to launch the Civil Disobedience Movement. The Dandi March commenced on 12th March 1930 from Sabarmati Ashram in Gujarat towards the coastal village of Dandi which is about 390 km in distance. Gandhi along with 78 followers set out on foot towards Dandi. They covered the distance between Sabarmati Ashram and Dandi in 25 days and reached the coast of Dandi on 6th April 1930 where by picking up a handful of salt, Gandhi broke the salt laws and launched the mass Civil Disobedience Movement. Sarojini Naidu was among the leaders who accompanied Mahatma Gandhi during the Dandi March. With Gandhi's symbolic breaking of salt laws at Dandi, defiance of salt laws started all over the country.

The civil disobedience movement reached its peak by the end first half of 1930. The government's attitude was marked by ambivalence. Since the movement remained largely non-violent, the government fell into the trap of "damned if you do, damned if you don't".

Either way, it led to the erosion of the hegemony of the British government.

After a lot of vacillation, the government finally ordered Mahatma Gandhi's arrest on May 4, 1930, when he announced his resolve to lead the raids on Dharasana Salt Works. In a conciliatory gesture, the Viceroy Lord Irwin in July 1930 suggested a Round Table Conference and reiterated the goal of Dominion Status.

This marked the beginning of the end of the Civil Disobedience Movement. In order to lay the groundwork for the Round Table Conference to be held in England, Mahatma Gandhi entered into fortnight-long discussions with the Viceroy Lord Irwin which NSOU ? GE-PS-11 62 culminated in the Gandhi-Irwin Pact on 5th March 1931 signed by Gandhi on behalf of the Congress and by Lord Irwin on behalf of the British India government. The Gandhi-Irwin pact is significant since it, for the for the first time, placed the Congress and the Government on an equal footing and the government had to recognize Gandhi as the representative of the Congress and the leader of masses who had orchestrated a non-violent mass movement which the government was unable to halt in spite of its massive resources. With these developments, the first phase of the Civil Disobedience Movement came to an end. In August 1931 Mahatma Gandhi set sail for London to attend the 2nd Round Table Conference (RTC). Meanwhile, in India, Lord Irwin was replaced by the reactionary Lord Willingdon as the Viceroy. The Indian delegates at the 2nd RTC were hand-picked loyalists of the British crown who claimed that the Congress did not represent the interests of all Indians and neutralized Gandhi's efforts to confront the imperialist rulers on the moot question of India's freedom, for which the Civil Disobedience Movement had been launched.

The Civil Disobedience Movement of 1930-31, then, marked a critically important stage in the progress of the anti-imperialist struggle. The number of people who went to jail was estimated at over 90,000 — more than three times the figure for the Non-Cooperation Movement of 1920-22. Imports of cloth from Britain had fallen by half; other imports like cigarettes had suffered a similar fate. Government income from liquor excise and land revenue had been affected. Elections to the Legislative Assembly had been effectively boycotted. A vast variety of social groups had been politicized on the side of Indian nationalism — if urban elements like merchants and shopkeepers and students were more active in Tamil Nadu and Punjab, and in cities in general, peasants had come to the forefront in Gujarat, U.P., Bengal, Andhra, and Bihar, and tribals in the Central Provinces, Maharashtra, Karnataka and Bengal. Workers had not been missing from the battle either — they joined numerous mass demonstrations in Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras and were in the forefront in Sholapur. The participation of Muslims in the Civil Disobedience Movement was certainly nowhere near that in 1920-22. The appeals of communal leaders to stay away, combined with active Government encouragement of communal dissension to counter the forces of nationalism, had their effect. Still, the participation of Muslims was not insignificant, either. Their participation in the North-West Frontier Province was, as is well known, overwhelming. In Bengal, middle class Muslim participation was quite important in Senhatta, Tripura, Gaibandha, Bagura and Noakhali and in Dacca, Muslim students and shopkeepers as well as people belonging to the lower classes extended support to the movement. Middle and upper class Muslim women were also active. The Muslim weaving community in Bihar and in Delhi and Lucknow, the lower classes of Muslims were effectively mobilized as were many others in different parts of the country. NSOU ? GE-PS-11 63 8.6 Conclusion The support that the movement had garnered from the poor and the illiterate, both in the cities and in the villages, was remarkable indeed. Their participation was reflected even in the government statistics of jail goers — and jail-going was only one of the many forms of participation. The Inspector-General of Police in Bengal, E.J. Lowman, expressed the general official bewilderment when he noted: 'I had no idea that the Congress organization could enlist the sympathy and support of such ignorant and uncultivated people.' For Indian women, the movement was the most liberating experience to date and can truly be said to have marked their entry into the public space. 8.7

Summing Up ? Mahatma Gandhi was the first nationalist leader who made it possible for the Indian nationalist movement to acquire a mass character. ? Two most important movements led by Gandhiji based on the principles of non-violence and satyagraha are the Non-Cooperation Movement of 1920 and the Civil Disobedience Movement of 1930 respectively. ? Despite criticism against Gandhiji for his reluctance to take these movements to their logical conclusion, both these two movements had immense impact on the British rulers. 8.8 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. Closely related with nationalism is the role of Indian National Congress and among them the first division that occurred was with the liberal Congress people and with socialist minded Congress people and finally the latter group dissociated from Congress party to form Congress Socialist party. But there are two basic differences between the Congress Socialists and the Communists:i) First, while the Congress Socialists owed their allegiance to the

held that the workers and the peasants should take part stood for abolition of capital and princely states. They wanted to incorporate radical socio-economic

In 1933 in Nasik jail some young Socialists such as Jayprakash Narayan, Achyut Patwardhan, M.R. Masani, N.G. Gore, Ashok Meht. L. Dantwala floated the idea of forming a Socialist Party within the Congress organisation. In April 1934 at Banaras, Sampurnananda published a pamphlet in which he

The first annual session of the All-India Congress Socialist party was held in Bombay in October 1934 under the presidentship of Sampurnananda. It was attended by delegates NSOU ? GE-PS-11 67 from thirteen provinces. In this meeting the National Executive of the Congress Socialist party was constituted with Jaya Prakash Narayan as the General Secretary. 9.4 Congress Socialist Party: Formation and Programme

The move towards the formation of a socialist party was made in the jails during 1930-31 and 1932-34 by a group of young Congressmen who were disenchanted with Gandhian strategy and leadership and attracted by socialist ideology. Many of them were active in the youth movement of the late 1920s. In the jails they studied and discussed Marxian and other socialist ideas. Attracted by Marxism, communism and Soviet Union, they did not find themselves in agreement with the prevalent political line of the CPI. Many of them were groping towards an alternative. Ultimately they came together and formed the Congress Socialist Party (CSP) at Bombay in October 1934 under the leadership of Jayaprakash Narayan, Acharya Narendra Dev and Minoo Masani. From the beginning, all the Congress socialists were agreed upon four basic propositions: that the primary struggle in India was the national struggle for freedom and that nationalism was necessary stage on the way to socialism; that socialists must work inside the National Congress because it was the primary body leading the national struggle and, as Acharya Narendra Dev put it in 1934, It would be a suicidal policy for us to cut ourselves off from the national movement that the Congress undoubtedly represents; that they must give the Congress and the national movement a socialist direction; and that to achieve this objective they must organize the workers and peasants in their class organizations, wage struggles for their economic demands and make them the social base of the national struggle. The CSP from the beginning assigned itself the task of both transforming the Congress and of strengthening it. The task of transforming the Congress was understood in two senses. One was the ideological sense. Congressmen were to be gradually persuaded to adopt a socialist vision of independent India and a more radical pro-labour and pro-peasant stand on current economic issues. This ideological and programmatic transformation was, however, to be seen not as an event but as a process. As Jayaprakash Narayan repeatedly told his followers in 1934: 'We are placing before the Congress a programme and we want the Congress to accept it. If the Congress does not accept it, we do not say we are going out of the Congress. If today we fail, tomorrow we will try and if tomorrow we fail, we will try again.' The transformation of the Congress was also seen in an organizational sense, that is, in terms of changes in its leadership at the top. Initially, the task was interpreted as the displacement of the existing leadership, which was declared to be incapable of developing the struggle of the masses to a higher level. The CSP was to develop as the nucleus of the alternative socialist leadership of the Congress. As the Meerut thesis of the CSP put it in 1935, the task was to 'win the anti-imperialist elements in the NSOU ? GE-PS-11 68 Congress away from its present bourgeois leadership and to bring them under the leadership of revolutionary socialism.' This perspective was, however, soon found to be unrealistic and was abandoned in favour of a 'composite' leadership in which socialists would be taken into the leadership at all levels. The notion of alternate Left leadership of the Congress and the national movement came up for realization twice at Tripuri in 1939 and at Ramgarh in 1940. But when it came to splitting the Congress on a Left-Right basis and giving the Congress an executive left-wing leadership, the CSP (as also the CPI) shied away. Its leadership (as also CPI's) realized that such an effort would not only weaken the national movement but isolate the Left from the mainstream, that the Indian people could be mobilized into a movement only under Gandhiji's leadership and that, in fact, there was at the time no alternative to Gandhiji's leadership. However, unlike Jawaharlal Nehru, the leadership of the CSP, as also of other Left groups and parties, was not able to fully theorize or internalize this understanding and so it went back again and again to the notion of alternative leadership. The CSP was, however, firmly well grounded in the reality of the Indian situation. Therefore, it never carried its opposition to the existing leadership of the Congress to breaking point. Whenever it came to the crunch, it gave up its theoretical position and adopted a realistic approach close to that of Jawaharlal Nehru's. This earned it the condemnation of the other left-wing groups and parties — for example, in 1939, they were chastised for their refusal to support Subhas Bose in his confrontation with Gandhiji and the Right wing of the Congress. At such moments, the socialists defended themselves and revealed flashes of an empiricist understanding of Indian reality. Jayaprakash Narayan, for example, said in 1939 after Tripuri: 'We Socialists do not want to create factions in the Congress nor do we desire to displace the old leadership of the Congress and to establish rival leadership. We are only concerned with the policy and programme of the Congress. We only want to influence the Congress decisions. Whatever our differences with the old leaders, we do not want to quarrel with them. We all want to march shoulder to shoulder in our common fight against imperialism.' From the beginning the CSP leaders were divided into three broad ideological currents: the Marxian, the Fabian and the current influenced by Gandhiji. This would not have been a major weakness — in fact it might have been a source of strength — for a broad socialist party which was a movement. But the CSP was already a part, and a cadre-based party at that, within a movement that was the National Congress.

Moreover, the Marxism of the 1930s was incapable of accepting as legitimate such diversity of political currents on the Left. The result was a confusion which plagued the CSP till the very end. The party's basic ideological differences were papered over for a long time because of the personal bonds of friendship and a sense of comradeship among most of the founding leaders of the party, the acceptance of Acharya Narendra Dev and Jayaprakash Narayan as its senior leaders, and its commitment to nationalism and socialism.

Independence (

freedom from British rule) and socialism were the twin objectives of the Congress Socialist Party. For the purpose of attainment of independence the Congress Socialists joined hands with socialist and non-socialist forces within the Congress. Jaya Prakash Narayan said "Our work within Congress is governed by the policy of developing it into true anti-imperialist body". He also warned his co-workers early in 1935: "Nothing should antagonise the genuinely nationalist elements and drive the compromise-seeking right wing." But as the ultimate objective of Congress Socialists was to establish a Socialist society of India; the Congress also worked to secure the acceptance of their programme by the Indian National Congress.

The Congress Socialists followed three lines of activities for the attainment of the twin objectives of freedom and socialism: 1. Inside the Congress they worked out anti-imperialist and nationalist programmes of the Congress as Congressmen, 2. Outside the Congress they mobilised the workers, peasants, students, intelligentsia, youth and women for the cause of socialism, 3. They also sought to integrate the above two lines of activities.

There was a mixed reaction among the Congressmen to the formation of the Congress Socialist party. The conservative or Right Wing Congressmen criticized the Congress Socialists "loose talk" about the confiscation of property and class war. Mahatma Gandhi also rejected their idea of class war. the princes, zamindars and capitalists so that instead of considering themselves the owners of the states, zamindaries and factories they should behave as the trustees for their subjects, tenants and workers. But the leftist Congressmen like Jawaharlal Nehru and Subhas Chandra Bose welcomed the formation of the Congress Socialist Party, though neither Nehru nor NSOU ? GE-PS-11 71 Bose joined the party. A group of young congressmen who were disenchanted with Gandhism and attracted by socialism went to the extent of forming the Congress Socialist party. They wanted to give the Congress party and the nationalist movement a socialist direction. The Congress socialists simultaneously carried on a movement for independence from foreign rule and establishment of a socialist state. They organised the movement of the workers and the peasants. They carried on movements for the abolition of the Princely order, landlordism and capitalism. Their movement resulted in the adoption of programmes for the upliftment of workers and peasants by the Indian National Congress.

The nationalist movement in India saw major rupture when the communists and radicals started to have different understanding about the course and strategy of nationalist movement keeping in mind the international balance of power situation during the Second World War and their difference surfaced against the leadership style of Indian National Congress and particularly that of Gandhiji. In this unit the leadership and role of communists and radical groups in Indian nationalist movement is discussed in detail.

certain places like Bombay, Calcutta and Madras, large and concentrated working populations came into existence. Gradually the workers started organising themselves to demand better working conditions and higher wages. This led to the emergence of trade unions. In 1919, under the auspices of the Communist government of Soviet Union an international organisation of the Communist parties of different countries was established. This organisation was known as the Third Communist International, as two similar organisations had been formed earlier. It aimed at bringing about Communist revolutions and establishing governments of the working class all over the world. Till the workers were not politically conscious. From the end of the First World War onwards there were frequent strikes in the industries and a large number of trade unions were formed.

The large-scale unrest of the workers at the end of the First World War was mainly due to the rise in prices caused by the War, and unwillingness of the employers to raise the wages. While demanding economic benefits the workers also became conscious of their political role. In cities like Bombay the workers organised strikes against the repressive Rowlatt Act. The nationalist leaders also became keenly interested in the working class movement. The first session of the All India Trade Union Congress was held at Bombay in October 1920 under the presidentship of the nationalist leader, LalaLajpat Rai. 10.4 The Formation of Communist Party of India Having seen the success of the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia, and the formation of the Communist International, some Indian revolutionaries and intellectuals, working within and outside India, contemplated the formation of a Communist Party in India. It was M.N. Roy (Manabendra Nath Roy) who first formed the Communist Party of India outside India in Tashkent under the auspices of the Communist International in 1920. In the meantime, the revolutionaries like VirendraNath Chattopadhyay, Bhupendranath Dutt, and Barkatullah who were working outside India became converts to Marxism, and inside India some Communist groups also emerged. Some Non-co-operators turned to communism after the suspension of the Non-Cooperation movement by Mahatma Gandhi. In

Bombay a Communist group was organised by ShripadAmritDange. Dange was born in October 1899 in a NSOU ? GE-PS-11 75 Maratha Brahmin family of Nasik. His father was a clerk in a Solicitor's firm. When Gandhi launched the Non- Cooperation Movement, Dange discontinued his studies and joined it. Soon after the suspension of the non-cooperation movement, he became a convert to communism. In 1921 he published a book titled Gandhi vs Lenin in which he showed his preference for socialism. In 1922 he started editing a Communist journal, entitled The Socialist. In an issue of this journal dated 16 September 1924, Dange announced the formation of Indian Socialist Labour Party of the Indian National Congress. Dange probably wanted the communists to function as group within the Congress. The early Indian Communists found it difficult to form an all-India organisation because of the British Government's hostility towards them. In 1924, the British Government started a conspiracy case against the four leading Communists –

Muzaffar Ahmad, S.A. Dange, Shaukat Usmani and Nalini Gupta.

The Government alleged that these Communists had “a branch of a revolutionary organisation” known as Communist International, with the object of depriving the British King-Emperor of the Sovereignty of British India. This case is known as the Cawnpore Conspiracy Case, as the trial of the accused took place in Cawnpore. During the trial Dange claimed the right to preach socialism in India, as it had been allowed in other parts of the British Empire and Great Britain. As a result of this trial Dange, Ahmad, Usmani and Gupta were sentenced to four years’ rigorous imprisonment in May 1924. In September 1924, at Cawnpore, Satyabhakta announced the formation of Indian Communist Party. He also announced a provisional constitution of the party. This aimed at the attainment of complete independence and reorganisation of Indian society on the basis of common ownership and control of means of production and distribution of wealth in the interests of the whole community of India. In December 1925 Satyabhakta organised an All India Conference of Communists at Cawnpore which was attended by a number of communists including Nalini Gupta and Muzzafar Ahmad who had been released from jail. The Conference met under the presidency of Singaravelu Chettier. The Cawnpore Conference is regarded as the formal beginning of the Communist Party of India. In this meeting the Central Committee of the Party was constituted with S.V. Ghate and J.P. Bergerhatta as the Joint Secretaries. Towards the end of 1926 t of the Communist Party of India was published. Meanwhile, the Central Committee of the Communist Party held a number of secret sessions for working out the party’s programme. From 1925, the British Communists started coming to India for organizing the Indian Communist Movement. In 1928 two members of Communist Party of India were elected as alternative members of the Executive of the Communist International in its sixth Congress. In 1930 the Party was finally affiliated to the Communist International. The infant Communist Movement of India had some drawbacks: (a)It suffered from paucity of funds (b) The British Government was very hostile towards the Communist Party of India because of its revolutionary character and affiliation with the Communist International (c) There was paucity of cadres (d) The privileged NSOU ? GE-PS-11 76 upper strata of Indian society opposed Communism. In the meantime the Communists increased their influence over the Trade Union Organisations by leading the workers strikes. The Communists played a prominent role in the Railway Workshop strikes of February and September 1927 at Kharagpur. Their influence increased over the Bombay Textile Mill workers. From April to October 1928 the workers of Bombay carried on massive strikes, protesting against the wage-cuts. In these strikes, the Communist Girmi Kamgar Union played the most prominent role. There was a tremendous increase in the strength of this Trade Union in 1928. By December its strength went upto 54,000 members, while the Bombay Textile Labour Union under the veteran liberal trade unionist N.M. Joshi had only 6,749 members. The strikes in industries assumed alarming proportions in 1928. During that year 31.5 million working hours were lost as a result of the strikes. The Government held the Communists responsible for unrest in the industries. The Government, therefore, planned measures for curbing their activities. In January 1929, the Viceroy Lord Irwin declared in his speech before the Central Legislative Assembly: “The disquieting spread of Communist doctrines is causing anxiety”. On 13 April 1929 the Viceroy proclaimed the ordinance for the purpose of deporting the subversive elements. Simultaneously the Trade Disputes Act was passed. This Act introduced tribunals for settling workers’ problems and practically banned such strikes which “coerced” or caused hardship to the people. 10.5 The Radicals in Indian Nationalist Movement The mild policies of the Moderates in the Congress led to the rise of passionate, radical nationalists, who came to be called the ‘Garam Dal’. Thus the first phase of the nationalist movement came to an end with government reaction against the Congress on the one hand and a split in the Congress in 1907 on the other. That is why the period after 1905 till 1918 can be referred to as the ‘Era of Passionate Nationalists or Garam Dal’. Lala Lajpat Rai, Bal Gangadhar Tilak and Bipin Chandra Pal (Lal-Bal-Pal) were important leaders of this Radical group. When the Moderates were in the forefront of the action, they had maintained a low profile but now they swung into action. Their entry marked the beginning of a new trend and a new face in India’s struggle for freedom. According to them, the Moderates had failed to define India’s political goals and the methods adopted by them were mild and ineffective. Besides, the Moderates remained confined to the upper, landed class and failed to enlist mass support as a basis for negotiating with the British. The Garam Dal realized that the British were out to exploit Indians, destroy their self-sufficiency and drain India of its wealth. They felt that Indians should now become free of foreign rule and govern themselves. This group, instead of making petitions to the government, believed in organizing

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 77 mass protests, criticizing government policies, boycotting foreign goods and use of Swadeshi (home-made) goods etc. They did not believe in depending on the mercy of the Britishers, but believed that freedom was their right. Bal Gangadhar Tilak gave a slogan 'Freedom is our birth right and we must have it'. In 1916 the two groups were again united with the efforts of Mrs. Annie Besant. She started working for the Home rule movement in 1914. She was convinced that India should be granted Self-Government. In 1916, Muslim League and Congress also came to an understanding with each other and signed the Lucknow Pact. Later, Mahatma Gandhi, Jawahar Lal Nehru, Subhash Chandra Bose became the eminent figures of Indian National Congress, who led the freedom movement of India forward.

Unlike moderates, the extremist leaders neither believed in the goodness of the British rule nor in their sense of justice and fair play.

They were aware that the British were driven by selfishness and had come to India to exploit her resources.

Since exploitation of India was the chief motive of the British, the extremists did not expect them to take a sympathetic view of the popular demands of the Indian people. Therefore, it was necessary to use pressure to make them accept the demands, not by petitioning or praying like the moderates, but by openly agitating against them.

For the Extremist leaders like Lokmanya Tilak, 'Swaraj' was a 'birth right' and was not at all dependent on British assurances. The extremists' programme of action was radically different from that of the moderates and aimed specifically at arousing emotive indignation against British rule and thereby promoting active involvement of the masses in the agitations. The extremists aimed at preparing the masses for the struggle to gain 'Swaraj' by educating them, uniting them and instilling in them a sense of self-respect, self-reliance, and pride in their ancient heritage. Aurobindo Ghose and Lokmanya Tilak had played a major role in developing the blue print of the extremist programme, which involved the following activities: a) 'Boycott' of foreign goods and promotion of 'Swadeshi' goods to give impetus to the growth of indigenous industry and commerce. b) Non-cooperation with the bureaucracy; this included 'boycott' of governmental activities. c) Establishment of schools and colleges that gave education in the Indian languages and instill in the students pride for the glorious heritage of India, make the students nationalistic and public spirited in character and knowledgeable, self-reliant and independent in spirit. d) 'Passive Resistance' to British rule by non-payment of revenue and taxes and by organising separate 'indigenous administrative institutions' parallel to those of the British at the level of villages, talukas and districts.

There was a fundamental change in the nature of Indian nationalism under extremist leadership due to their forceful articulation of the demand for 'Swaraj' and use of more radical methods than those of the moderates. Their concept of nationalism was emotionally charged and based on rich interpretation of Indian religious traditions. The Extremist leaders tried to reorient Indian religious traditions to worldly life and link them with the national liberation struggle. Aurobindo Ghose reinterpreted Vedanta philosophy, which advocated unity of man and God and based his concept of nationalism on it.

To him national work was the work of God, which should be done in the spirit of Karma Yoga because the true nationalist was an ideal Karma Yogi, who performed his functions in the spirit of disinterestedness. The service of the millions of Indians was service of God because God was present in them. The extremists conceived the nation as 'Mother India', which represented united power or Shakti of millions of her children. Tilak reinterpreted the message of the Gita in his famous book Gita Rahasya. To Tilak, the Gita gave a message of disinterested action with full self-knowledge rather than that of Bhakti or Sanyasa. National work done for general welfare was a type of disinterested action. The new nationalism of the extremists was an "attempt to create a nation in India by reviving the spirit and action of the ancient Indian character." They vehemently opposed foreign rule. According to them, a good or just government was not a substitute for self government and freedom was an inalienable right of all human beings.

The extremists emphasised the mobilisation of people against foreign rule by launching political movements. If the nation was not ready to undertake political movement, then it was the duty of the leaders to prepare the people for it. The extremists were ready to suffer imprisonment, deportation and other physical suffering for the sake of mobilising the masses for struggle against foreign rule.

They saw struggle against foreign rule as a full time activity and devoted their whole life for it.

The demonstrations, processions undertaken by the extremists brought about an involvement of the common people in agitations against British rule. They also made use of popular symbols like Shivaji, and religious symbols like God Ganapati and Goddess Kali for mobilising the people. Thus, under the extremist leadership, the Indian National Movement gradually began to acquire a mass character. However, the extremists could not fully exploit the potential of mobilised people or of their radical methods like boycott and passive resistance. They were successful in arousing the urban middle and lower classes, apart from mobilising the peasants and workers. The extremist leaders used religious symbols in arousing the masses; however, they did not mix religion and politics. Their concept of nationhood encompassed all religions in India. Though the 'Dharma' advocated by leaders like Tilak and Lajpat Rai looked like it had a Hindu connotation, for the extremists, it actually meant 'universal moral law' under whose unifying influence, the different religions and communities in India would coexist peacefully.

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 79 10.6 Conclusion In the unfolding of Indian National movement, the communist and radicals played a significant part to take on the British colonial rulers head on. The communists and the radicals had the dream of overthrowing the British rulers if required through violent means unlike the Gandhian non-violent position. Therefore, the British rulers responded with harsh measures to curb their activities. Due to the timing of historical unfolding of their activities, the radicals/extremists section had to face the music from the British rulers more than the communists as the later had the backing of International Communist movement and Communist International. Nevertheless, both the communists and the radicals unfolded a new paradigm in Indian national movement which accelerated the pace of freedom movement with different strategies from boycott to strikes. 10.7 Summing Up ? They fought against the British colonial rule with true spirit and undismayed courage side by side with their male counterparts. The Indian women broke away from various restrictions and got out of their traditional home-oriented roles and responsibilities. The participation of women in the Indian national movement is simply incredible and praiseworthy. Their participation in freedom struggle strengthened not only the national struggle for freedom, but also it raised "the women's NSOU ? GE-PS-11 84 question” during this time. Actually, the women’s question, like the untouchability question, emerged during the national movement as a political question. After independence the makers of our constitution enshrined many provisions to solve the women’s question in various articles of the constitution. In this Unit, we will discuss typologies of women movement and the social reform movements and women. Here, we will discuss very briefly different practices of the Hindu and Muslim communities, like - Child marriages, Purdah system, Sati system, Devdasi System, Polygamy etc and some reform activities undertaken by Raja Ram Mohan Roy, Ishwar Chandra Vidya Sagar and Jyotiba Phule. The second part of this unit will focus on the role of women in the national movement. Here, we will analyse different issues like Indian National Congress and women; women in the revolutionary and left movements, women’s organizations and their leaders etc. At the end of this unit, we will highlight the impact of the participation of women on the freedom struggle.

11.3 Classification of Women’s Movement

Different scholars classify women’s movements in different ways. Gail Omvedt (1978) classifies women’s movements into two types: (a) women’s equality movements; and (b) women’s liberation movements. Kalpana Shah divides the women’s movements into three categories, such as (a) Moderate or Women’s Rights Position; (b) Radical Feminism; and (c) Socialist Feminism (1984). In his book, Social. Movements in India, a Review of Literature, professor Ghanshyam Shah has focused on different issues regarding women movements, such as - social reform movements and women; freedom struggle and women; people’s movements and women; peasants and tribal movements; women’s movements on women’s issues etc.

11.4 Social Reform Movements and Women

There were many issues like Child marriage, Purdah system, Sati system, Devdasi system, Polygamy etc in colonial India and these issues affect women even in this century. Social reformers, as well as different women’s organisations, raised women’s question to establish a society where all people will have the right to equality, right to freedom and equal dignity. Social reformers like Rammohan Roy, Ishwar Chandra Vidyasagar, Mahadev Govind Ranade, Behramji Malbari, raised their voices against the prevailing religious and social customs subjugating women. Political rights—equal franchise and representation in legislatures - for women were demanded by women NSOU ? GE-PS-11 85 leaders, who were supported by the Congress party. A new education was provided through the Colonial government and Christian missionaries to alter and modernize the traditional social perceptions. To abolish different heinous practices, the Colonial government also made laws, like Abolition of Sati (1829), Widow Remarriage Act. (1856) Child Marriage Act (1872), Banning of Devdasi (1925) etc. Apart from these positive progressive activities, various organizations like Brahmo Samaj, Prathana Samaj etc did valuable work in educating women. Different communities also started talking about educating women. Even some women, awakened with true spirit and undismayed courage took part in the struggle for independence of India and to solve the women’s question. Jana Everett (1979) identifies five factors which have shaped such reformist Indian women’s movements. These are: (1) the hierarchical caste system; (2) the Hindu religion; (3) the joint family system; (4) Islamic rule and (5) British colonialism.

11.5 The Women in Indian National Movement

This section will focus on the role of women in the Indian national movement. Here we will analyse different aspects like, Indian National Congress and women; women in the revolutionary and left movements; women’s organizations and their leaders etc. The partition of Bengal in 1905 galvanised and transformed women’s participation in the national movement. Women of different classes from different parts of India in both rural and urban areas were involved in this movement. They took several steps including observing Arandhan vows, boycotting foreign goods, preservation of communal unity and Rakhi Bandhan. They played significant role in the formation of Swadeshi organisations and promotion of national unity. Sarala Devi promoted patriotism and nationalism through Bharati Newspaper. Not only that, the women participated in revolutionary activities also. Some British women also played important roles. Among them were Annie Besant and Dorothy Jinarajadasa, both Theosophists, Margaret Cousins, an Irish feminist, and Sister Nivedita, the disciple of Swami Vivekananda. The Indian national congress also took an important role to awake Indian women. But, initially the Indian national Congress did not directly address the women’s question. However, the Indian reformers and many scholars used the analogy of female goddesses to free Bharat Mata from the colonial rule. The nationalist imagined their country as "motherland" - as opposed to the concept of fatherland in Europe. Gandhiji had inspired women to participate in huge numbers in the Indian national movement. He said that full freedom of India was not possible unless our daughters

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 86 stand side by side with the sons in the battle for freedom and this was necessary to realize their own power. The participation of women in public domain started during Non Cooperation Movement (NCM) in 1920, when Gandhi mobilized large number of women. This movement witnessed unprecedented women activism. Amrit Kaur, Aruna Asaf Ali, Sarla Devi and Muthul Laxmi Reddy emerged as prominent women leaders. Even Muslim women also participated in the Khilafat-Non-cooperation movement under the leadership of Gandhiji. The Civil Disobedience Movement of 1930-33 was undoubtedly a major landmark in women's participation in political activity. Kasturba Gandhi initiated women's participation in the salt satyagrah by leading 37 women volunteers from Sabarmati ashram. Sarojini Naidu and Manilal Gandhi led the raid on Dharsana Salt Works. Women participated actively in processions, picketing of foreign shops, liquor shops and the making and selling of salt. These activities became common activities in all parts of the country. In Bengal, some women also participated in violent revolutionary movement and unlike Swadeshi movement where they played a supportive role, now they stood shoulder to shoulder with men with guns and shooting pistols at Magistrates and Governors. During the quit India movement in the 1940s, more women came forward to participate. During this movement women took a crucial role by volunteering, campaigning, protesting, fasting, and donating to the causes of freedom. When most of the men-folk were in prison, women came forward to take charge of the struggle. Mahatma Gandhi remarked: "When the history of India's fight for independence comes to be written, the sacrifice made by the women of India will occupy the foremost place." Apart from the Gandhian movement, Indian women also actively participated in several other ideological strains of Indian national movement. The revolutionary groups worked underground and the harsh life that they led made it extremely difficult for women to be part of it. In Bengal, women had revolutionary groups who formed physical culture clubs and secretly read banned revolutionary literature. Greatly excited women like Pritilata Waddadar and Kalpana Dutt became more actively involved in revolutionary activities. Late 1920s witnessed the emergence of a viable Left alternative within the Indian Nationalist Movement. Many women chose to join the Communist Party. Several women were actively engaged in trade union movements in Bombay, Madras, Kanpur and Coimbatore, which were important centers of textile industry. Women played an active role in the peasant struggle against landlords. Their role in Telengana and Tebhaga struggle was noteworthy.

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 87 11.6 Women's Organisations and Leadership Initially, the Mahila Mandals were organised by the social reform organisations such as Brahmo Samaj and Arya Samaj. The leaders who raised women's issues during this time were mostly males belonging to the upper strata of society. Since the early 1920s, women took an important role to organise women in support their demands. In this regard a few British women also took a crucial role. But these organisations were mainly confined to urban educated upper-class women. The leadership initially came from the upper caste or class, wives or daughters of princes, government officials and political leaders. Annie Besant, the president of the Theosophical Society and a founder of the Home Rule League was elected president of the Congress in 1917 and Sarojini Naidu was the first Indian women to be elected president of the Congress in 1925. One of the women's autonomous organisations, the All India Women's Conference (AIWC) played a very important role during the 1920s and 1940s to raise women's question, and mobilised middle-class women to fight for their rights. The AIWC took up the question of women's education and organised a large number of literacy schools and handicraft centres to help women belonging to poor families to earn and be relatively economically independent. It also actively campaigned against child marriage and fought for women's equal rights in inheritance. There were many more women's autonomous organisations in pre-independent India and those organisations played crucial role in Indian national movement and raised women's question also. Neera Desai and Vibhuti Patel (1985), classify these organisations into the following types: 1. Agitational, propagandist consciousness-raising groups which may be termed autonomous groups; 2. Grassroots or mass-based organisations like the trade unions, agricultural labourers' organisations, democratic rights groups, tribal organisations etc., taking up women's issues; 3. Groups concentrating on providing services, shelter, homes to needy women; 4. Professional women's organisations such as doctors, lawyers, scientists, researchers, journalists; 5. Women's wings or fronts of the political parties; and 6. Groups involved in research and documentation of women's issues.

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 88 11.7 The Impact of the Participation of Women in the Freedom Struggle After prolonged struggle India achieved Independence on August 15, 1947. Thousands of Indian women like men dedicated themselves to obtain freedom for their motherland. The participation of Women in freedom struggle strengthened not only the national struggle for freedom, but it impacted the entire society. Some scholars assert that the freedom movement helped women in their struggle for 'liberation'. Their participation in freedom struggle provided opportunity to raise women's question. The increasing participation of women in the national movement made it necessary to give them adequate representation in the organisation and decision-making process of the political parties. The makers of our constitution inserted many provisions in the constitution to protect women's liberty and dignity. 11.8 Conclusion Indian women played a crucial role in the national movement. They fought against the British colonial rule with true spirit and undismayed courage side by side with their male counterparts. Initially, there were many constraints . Gradually, the Indian women broke away from various restrictions and got out of their traditional home- oriented roles and responsibilities. They participated voluntarily in large numbers against British colonial rule. They played a significant role in the formation of Swadeshi organisations and in the establishment of national unity. Since the early 1920s women played important role to organise women in support their demands. They participated more actively in the Non-Cooperation Movement, the Civil Disobedience Movement, the Quit India Movement

etc. under the leadership of Gandhiji. During these movements women played a crucial role by sacrificing time and material, volunteering, campaigning, protesting, fasting and donating for the causes of freedom. When most of the men-folk were in prison, women came forward to take charge of the struggle. Their participation in freedom struggle strengthened not only the national struggle for freedom, but also raised "the women's question" during this time. Actually, the women's question, like the untouchability question, emerged during the national movement as a political question. After independence, the makers of our constitution inserted many provisions in the constitution to empower them.

The meaning of 'Caste and Caste system' ? The main features of caste system ? Caste question in Colonial India ? Indian Constitution and caste question 12.2 Introduction In this unit, we will discuss one of the most significant issues in social movements, that is, caste question in India. Caste, described as 'the steel frame of Hinduism' (Desai 1976: 243), has been one of the fundamental features of the Indian society since ancient times. M. N. Srinivas said, "It is impossible to detach Hindustan from the caste system." Caste is hierarchical. Status of an individual in caste-oriented social system is determined by birth. Actually, caste system is contrary to the values of democratic political system. In Hindu caste system, the upper castes, holding the dwija status consists of the Brahmins and Kshatriyas. Brahmin varna or caste was at

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 92 the top of the caste hierarchy as the priestly class and helmsmen in government and administration. They enjoyed not only the privileges in religious field but also in economic, educational and political spheres. A vast majority of people belong to intermediate castes, known as the 'backward castes'. They were below the dwija and above the Dalits. Majority of them were cultivators, small and marginal farmers, agricultural labourers, artisans and other service castes belonging to almost all states of the country. Untouchables or Scheduled Castes or Dalits were in the lowest rank of caste hierarchy. They were oppressed not only at the hands of upper castes but also some of the influential backward castes. The first part of this unit will discuss the meaning of caste, caste system and basic features of the caste system. Second part will analyse caste question in detail during the British colonial rule. We will mention some social reformers and leaders and their activities for the emancipation of the 'backward castes' and Dalits. The last part of this unit deals with caste question and Indian constitution. 12.3 What is Caste? It is very difficult to give a precise and definite meaning of caste. According to Indian sociologist, G. S. Ghurye, "We do not possess a real general definition of caste. It appears to me that any attempt at definition is bound to fail because of the complexity of the phenomenon. On the other hand, much literature on the subject is marred by lack of precision about the use of the term". The English word "caste" (/ka.:st, kæst) is derived from the Spanish and Portuguese 'casta', which, according to the John Minsheu's Spanish Dictionary (1569), means "race, lineage, tribe or breed".

MATCHING BLOCK 116/358

Caste is an English word of 'Jati'. In Oxford Advance Learner's Dictionary, caste means "any of four main divisions of Hindu society, originally those made according to functions in society". Here we should keep in mind that the meaning of Caste is not always uniform and consistent among the Hindus and non-Hindus. Caste is hierarchical. Status of an individual in caste-oriented social system is determined by birth. According to Sir Herbert Risley, "Caste is a product of race that came to India along with Aryans." G S Gurye said that caste is a result of various historical processes, adapting to demands of time and therefore a dynamic institution. He also added that caste originated from occupation.

12.4 Main Features of the Caste System

Caste system is the steel frame of Hinduism and it has been one of the fundamental features of the Indian society since ancient times. We see this system in the Purusha Sukta in the Rig Veda. It speaks of four varnas. They are: The Brahmins (Priests), the Kshatriyas (Fighters), the Vaishyas (Traders), and the Shudras (Serviles). The Brahmin varna or caste

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 93 was at the top of the caste hierarchy. Beyond the pale of these four varnas, there were more caste communities who are collectively known as 'dalits'. They were considered impure and untouchables. The untouchables are the outcastes. They had various names such as Pariahs, Panchamas, Atishudras, Avarnas, Antyajas, Namashudra etc. The British Colonial government called them the Depressed Classes. Gandhiji called them Harijans and according to our constitution they are Scheduled Castes. Their touch, shadow and even their voice was enough to pollute the caste-Hindu. There were rigorous restrictions on their living place, food, dress, marriage, ornaments etc. The members of this caste could not marry outside of it. In a word we can say that they did not have the basic rights to live with dignity. G.S Ghurye identified six different features of the Hindu caste system in his popular book 'Caste and Race in India'. i) Segmentation of Society: The Hindu society is segmented into caste groups. The membership of the groups is determined by birth and not by choice. The status of a person depends not on the amount of wealth he or she possesses but on the rank that his or her caste enjoys in the Hindu society. ii) Hierarchical System: Caste is hierarchical. It follows the hierarchical system very rigorously. Each group is given a specific status in the overall framework of hierarchy. The Brahmins are at the top of the hierarchy. The concept of hierarchy forms the crux of the caste society. Each caste is considered to be more pure or impure than the other in the ritual sense of the term. iii) Restrictions on food and social intercourse: According to Prof. G. S. Ghurye, restriction on food and social intercourse is one of the most important features of the caste system. Food and social intercourse depends on their specific status. There are minute rules on the kind of food and drink that upper castes could accept from lower castes. iv) Segregation of civil and religious privileges among different sections: In the caste system, all individuals do not have equal rights. The dominant caste, the Brahmins do not allow the shudras and other lower castes to use a street, to draw water from a well, to read or learn the sacred scriptures etc. Even the touch, shadow and voice of the lower castes were enough to pollute the caste-Hindu. v) Hereditary Occupation : Generally each caste is associated with a particular occupation. There is no choice of selecting occupation higher or lower on the basis of the ritual purity or pollution of their associated occupations. vi) Restrictions of Marriage : There are many restrictions on marriage. People usually practice endogamy, the practice of marrying within one's own caste, rejecting NSOU ? GE-PS-11 94 those from other caste as unsuitable for marriage. So, the members generally marry within one's own caste group. However, there were a few exceptions. In some regions of India, the upper caste man may marry a lower caste woman. This kind of marriage is known as hypogamy.

12.5 Caste Question in Colonial India

This section will analyse caste question during British colonial rule in detail. The 'Caste Question' like women's question, emerged strongly during the national movement as a political question. Actually electoral politics introduced by the British colonial rule brought the caste question to the fore. During the nineteenth and twentieth century, the lower castes were becoming class-conscious and were struggling for caste equality. Many organisations were established by the non-Brahman castes with the aim of securing preferential treatment for their castes. Apart from Maharashtra and South India, backward caste movements gained prominence in the states of Bihar, Uttar Pradesh and Bengal in varying degrees. The Indian National Congress also focused on the caste question. But, initially the leaders of the Congress thought very little. The Caste question in fact addresses the constitutive relationship between the emancipation of Dalit and Backward castes and Indian democracy. Many social reformers and leaders did a lot for the emancipation of the so-called lower castes during the colonial rule. They were against the inequalities inherent in caste system of Hindu society. Some of the leaders and their activities for the 'Backward castes' and Dalits are discussed below :

- ? Raja Ram Mohan Roy : Ram Mohan Roy, prominent social reformer founded Brahmo Samaj in 1828 to protest against the prevailing caste based inequalities in the society.
- ? Dayananda Saraswati : In 1875 Dayananda Saraswati established Arya Samaj to protest against caste based hierarchy. He focused on work-based division of society instead of caste based division. According to him a Brahmin could be degraded to the position of Shudra and a Shudra could upgrade himself to the position of the Brahmin.
- ? Jotiba Phule : Jotiba Phule was one of the famous pioneer of anti-brahmin and anti-untouchability movement during the 1870s. In Maharashtra, he founded Satyashodhak Samaj in 1873 to work for the cause of social uplift of the lower castes. He strongly criticized the Brahmanical domination in the name of religion. Like Dayananda, he desired for a form of social organisation that would reflect the merits and aptitudes of the individual, instead of enforcing birth as the basis both for occupation and for religious status. He suggested that spread of literacy and NSOU ? GE-PS-11 95 especially English education, could eradicate the Brahmanical hegemony. He also criticised the attitude of the Indian National Congress towards the weaker sections. According to him, Indian National Congress was indifferent to the caste question. The aim of his organization was to achieve social justice for weaker sections of the society.
- ? Sri Narayana Guru : Another famous leader of anti-untouchability movement was Sri Narayana Guru. He organised the untouchable caste of Ezhava by establishing Sree Narayan Dharama Praipalana Yogam (SNDP) in 1903. The main aim of SNDP was to Sanskritise the customs and norms of the Ezhava community to achieve social emancipation of the untouchables.
- ? Keshav Rao Jedhe and Dinkar Rao Jawalkar: Both Keshavrao Jedhe and Dinkarrao Jawalkar were freedom fighters, Congress leaders, social activists and above all leaders of non-brahmin movement in Maharashtra. During the 1920s, the non-brahmin movement came closer to the congress movement under their leadership.
- ? Dr. Bhim Rao Ambedkar : Ambedkar was the all-India leader of the untouchables. He began the Mahar movement to eradicate untouchability from Maharashtra and gradually Maharashtra started becoming the hub of the anti-untouchability movement. He was able to nationalise the Dalit question. During the 1930s the Dalit movements reached a new height. He declared 'you have nothing to lose, except your religion' (Keer 1954:237). In the Round table conference he demanded separate electorate for Dalits. This demand brought him into direct conflict with Gandhi. The Communal Award of 1932 granted separate electorate to the untouchables. Gandhi went on a fast unto death against such divisive decision of the Colonial government. After protracted discussion, Poona Pact was signed between Gandhi and Ambedkar. The central theme of the pact was the promise of a joint electorate with reservation for the depressed classes. But Ambedkar was not happy with the decision . In 1942, he established Scheduled Castes Federation to fight for the Dalit emancipation through the means of agitational and electoral politics. At his initiative special provisions have been inserted in the constitution to protect the interests of the depressed classes. Ambedkar has been criticised for his non-participation in the struggle against colonial rule. However, such criticism is unwarranted. Ambedkar believed that a spirit of unity felt by the bulk of the population was necessary to fight against alien rule. He wished to bring people in India together through the elimination of caste differences. In his assessment so long as a large section of people in India, the Dalits, remained socially marginalised, India could

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 96 not fight unitedly against colonisers. In fact, the anti-imperialist movement and the anti-caste agitations were all parts of the process of formation of a modern nation in India. According to Bidyut Chakrabarty and Rejendar Kumar Panday, participation of an increasing number of hitherto marginalised group of people in the national movement turned an elitist movement into a mass movement in the course of time. As R.P. Dutt (1940:500) argues, "... the advancing forces of the Indian people are leading the fight against caste, against illiteracy, against the degradation of the untouchables, against all that holds the people backward. While learned lectures are being delivered on the Hindu civilisation and its unchanging characteristics, the Indian national movement, enjoying the unquestioned support of the overwhelming majority of the people, has inscribed on its banner a complete democratic programme of universal equal citizenship, without distinction of caste, creed or sex" 12.6 Indian Constitution and Caste Question We have seen that the caste system in Hindu society is a heinous practice. It is the main obstacle to the development of society. Caste is hierarchical. Status of an individual in caste-oriented social system is determined by birth. So, the caste system is opposite to the values of democratic political system. In a democratic system all people enjoy all kind of rights including political rights. When India got Independence on August 15, 1947 and emerged as a sovereign socialist secular democratic republic, the makers of our constitution enshrined many provisions in the constitution, such as right to equality of status, dignity and opportunity; right to freedom of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship; right to freedom of religion; social, economic and political justice etc. to build an egalitarian social order and a welfare state. Apart from the mentioned provisions, special provisions are enshrined in the constitution of India to solve the 'Caste question', Such as: Prohibition of discrimination on grounds of religion, race, caste, sex or place of birth (Article-15); Abolition of untouchability (Article- 17); Protection of interests of minorities (Article 29); Right of minorities to establish and administer educational institutions (Article-30); Reservation of seats in educational institutions and reservation in public employment and provisions for socially and economically Backward classes; National Commission for Scheduled Castes (Article-338); National Commission for Scheduled Tribes (Article -338A) etc. 12.7 Conclusion Caste question is one of the significant issues in social movements in India. It is the steel frame of Hinduism and it has been one of the fundamental features of the Indian society since ancient times. G.S Ghurye, identified six different features of the Hindu caste system in his popular

NSOU ? Many social reformers and leaders did a lot for the emancipation of the so-called lower castes during the colonial rule. They were against the caste system of Hindu society. The British colonial government also reserved some posts in government services and offices in accordance with the divide and rule policy to weaken the Indian National Movement. After independence, the makers of our Constitution enshrined many provisions in the constitution to solve the caste question. 12.8 Summing Up ? Indian constitution has tried to address the caste question by incorporating the concept of positive discrimination as reflected in several articles enshrined in the constitution. ? Caste is the nucleus of Hindu Social system in India. ? Caste consists of four varnas, Brahmin, Kshatriya, Vaishya and Shudra. ? Caste differs from 'Jati' which includes the innumerable sub-castes of four varnas. ? Caste signifies the hierarchical position of the people in society. ? Owing the colonial rule, the caste question emerged as a political question. ? Many social reformers protested against caste inequalities and argued for emancipation of the lower castes from caste oppression and suppression. 12.9 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. 13.1 Objective After studying this unit students will be familiar with— ? The meaning of the Social Movement. ? The meaning of Peasant. ? Peasant Movements in the Pre-Independence and the Post-Independence Period in India. ? Peasant Movements in Contemporary India.

13.2 Introduction Social Movements are social processes and are parts of social progression. These are broadly considered as sustained, organized or collective efforts aiming at changes in thought, beliefs, values, attitudes relationships and major institutions in society or to resist any change in the societal arrangements. Social movements primarily take the form of non-institutionalised collective political action which strive for political and/or social change. These movements are found in all societies of this world in the past and present. The term 'Social movement' is used to indicate a set of activities undertaken by one or many organisations to bring 'change' in society. The core elements of the Social Movements are (1) collective action; (2) political and /or social change and (3) common purpose.

NSOU ? GE-PS-01 100 India has witnessed many such movements over the centuries. Peasant Movement or Agrarian movement is one of them. Anthony Pereira, a political scientist, has defined a peasant movement as a "social movement made up of peasants (small landholders or farm workers of large farms), usually inspired by the goal of improving the situation of peasants in a nation or territory". The first part of this unit deals with the nature of agrarian mobilisation and the peasant movements during the colonial period led by the Congress and the Communist Party of India. In the second part, we look at the agrarian mobilisation and movements after independence. In the last part we look briefly at the 'Farmers' movements which are going on in contemporary India. In India, the term 'peasant' is ambiguous and used differently by different authors. On the one hand, it is used for those agriculturists who are homogeneous, with small holdings operated mainly by family labour, and on the other hand, it includes all those who depend on land including landless labourers, as well as supervisory agriculturists. According to Debal K Singharoy, "In the localised vocabulary, peasants are denoted by terms like "kisan", "krishak", "roytu", "chashi", etc, more or less indicating cultivators who cultivate land with their own labour, and also the categories, namely, "adhiar" and "bhagchashi" (sharecropper and tenant) and "majdoor", "majur", "collie", "pait", "krishi shramik", etc. These terms signify specific cultural connotations to indicate the marginalised and inferior status of peasantry in Indian society." In sociological and social anthropological literature peasants have widely been described as culturally unsystematic, unreflective, unsophisticated and the non-literati, constituting the mosaic of the "little tradition" [Redfield 1956], the "incomplete" and a "part society with part cultures" [Kroeber 1948]. Politically they are found to occupy an "underdog position and are subjected to the domination by outsiders" [Shanin 1984] and "unorganised and deprived of the knowledge required for organised collective action" [Wolf 1984]. Thus peasants are socially and economically marginalised, culturally subjugated and politically dis-empowered social groups who are attached to land to eke out a subsistence living (Singha Roy 1992: 21-231). Peasant movements include the movements of agrarian or peasant classes which are related to agriculture in terms of working on the land or in terms of both working on land and its ownership. In other words, these are the movements of the agricultural labourers, poor and small peasant/tenants and farmers/kulaks/rich peasants/rural rich. We can divide the agrarian groups into two classes: i) The Rural Poor: Agricultural labourers and small/poor/marginal peasants — Agricultural labourers do not own land but work on other's land for wages either as agricultural labourers or tenants. Small/poor/marginal peasants have land but not enough to meet basic needs. They have to work on other's land also; and ii) Farmers/ middle peasants/kulaks/rich peasant/rural rich — these classes own land and other required paraphernalia in agriculture. They work on their land or do not work themselves except NSOU ? GE-PS-01 101 doing the supervisory work along with employing agricultural labourers. The main objectives of any types of peasant movements are generally economic. But in several cases the economic and social issues overlap.

13.3 Peasant Movements in the Pre-Independence Period

The peasants were the worst sufferers in colonial India. We have seen different kinds of Peasant movements during the pre-Independence period throughout the country. These movements were organized by the exploited agrarian classes – peasants, tenants, agricultural labourers, artisans, etc. The pre-Independence movements can be said as the anti-colonial movements also, because most of these movements were against the landlords, moneylenders and other exploiting classes who were the supporters of the British empire. The issues raised in these movements were related to the nature of agrarian relations. The landlords, moneylenders and other exploiting classes exploited them in many ways to fulfil the requirements of the colonial forces and to satisfy their feudal needs. These include unreasonable increase in the rent, forced gifts (nazarans), begar (forced labour) physical torture, insecurity of tenure (eviction) etc. Even during the natural calamities like famines, flood etc. the landlords forcefully collected taxes from the peasants. The poor peasant classes were not only evicted from the land, they were tortured physically for the failure to meet the economic and non-economic requirements of the landlords. But the peasants did not accept everything silently. They reacted to the exploitative system in different ways. The agrarian society of India has experienced several peasant movements, such as, the Bengal revolt of 1859-60 against the indigo plantation system, the 'Deccan riots' of 1875 against moneylenders in Maharashtra, the fight of the Moplah peasants against their landlords in Malabar, while in Sitapur district of Awadh and in Mewar in Rajasthan peasants resisted rent enhancements and imposition of illegal cesses by their landlords in 1860 and 1897 respectively etc. In all these regions the tradition of peasant militancy continued into the first decade of the twentieth century, ultimately merging into the larger Gandhian mass movement in 1921. In the initial years the Congress ignored the urgency of improving the agrarian situation. It was only in the 1920s that Gandhi sought to convert the Congress organisation into a mass organisation and hence thought of bringing the peasants into the fold of the Congress. Under the leadership of Mahatma Gandhi peasant movements became partially linked to the Independence movement. For instance, the Bardoli Satyagraha (1928, Surat District) a 'non-tax' campaign as part of the nationwide non-cooperative movement, a campaign of refusal to pay land revenue and the Champaran Satyagraha (1917-18) were directed against indigo plantations. In the 1920s, protest movements against the forest policies of the British government and local rulers took place in certain regions.

NSOU ? GE-PS-01 102 Wolf (1984) has highlighted several historical revolutions and political upheavals, fought with peasant support, that took place in the 20th century. To him, peasants participated in the great rebellions because of the suffering caused by the crises of demographics, ecology, and power and authority. As poor peasants depend on landlords for their livelihood, they are 'unlikely to pursue the course of rebellion unless they are able to rely on some external power to challenge the power which constrains them'. Wolf holds that there are two components of the peasantry that possess sufficient internal leverage to enter into sustained rebellion: 'land-owning middle peasantry', and 'a peasantry located in a peripheral area outside the domains of landlord control'. He also points out that the 'peasant rebellions of the 20th century are no longer simple responses to local problems, if indeed they ever were. They are but parochial reactions to major social dislocations set in motion by overwhelming societal changes'. The series of peasant uprisings that took place throughout the nineteenth and the early twentieth centuries seriously contested the hegemony of the colonial state. These peasant movements of the pre-Independence period had impact on the programmes of the Indian National Congress. On the other hand, the Indian National Congress after the advent of Gandhi also tried to harness this force for its struggle against British rule. The Congress Socialist group within the Congress which included later generation of socialists, communists, advocated the need for drastic land reforms. The Congress appointed a committee to look into the distress of agrarian classes and to suggest measures to ameliorate their conditions. This had its impact on the agrarian policies of country when it became independent. During 1920s and 1940s, different peasant organisations were established by the leadership of the peasant movements. The first organisation to be founded was the Bihar Provincial Kisan Sabha (1929). Apart from the Congress, the Communists were the other major force that mobilised the peasants. During this time, the peasant movement was strengthened by the participation of a number of left-oriented leaders who espoused the cause of an autonomous peasant movement in the country by way of formation of a pan-Indian peasant organisation. Consequently, the All India Kisan Sabha was formed in 1936, reflecting ' the new spirit of unity among Left-nationalists, Socialists and Communists’.

They worked for organizing Kisan Sabhas for the upliftment of poor peasants, tenants, sharecroppers and landless agricultural labourers. The peasants organised by the Sabhas demanded reduction in land revenue, minimum wages to agrarian labourers, abolition of zamindari, ownership of land to the tillers, distribution of surplus land amongst the landless farmers, and so on. The Tebhaga movement in Bengal (1946-47) and the Telengana movement (1946-51) in the former Hyderabad state were led by the Communists. The first was a struggle of sharecroppers in Bengal for two thirds share of their produce instead of the customary half. The second has directed against the feudal conditions in the princely state of Hyderabad.

NSOU ? GE-PS-01 103 Participation of the peasantry in the armed insurgency in Telengana under the banner of the Communist Party of India demonstrated how ideologies of nationalism and Marxism contributed to the mobilisation of the peasants. Religion, caste, nationalism and Marxism provided the basis of these peasant movements during this phase. Religion and caste became the rallying points of the peasants in Oudh, Mopillaha and Wahabi and Faraidi uprisings. Before 1857, peasant revolts occurred against various oppressive aspects of colonial rule in all parts of the country. But it remained disjointed or isolated and localised movements due to the complex class structure of Indian agrarian society, which had great regional variations. The post-1857 movements acquired some new features as well. First, we find in this period a greater awareness of colonial policies, laws and institutions among the peasantry, both tribal and non-tribal. Religion still played an important role in peasant rebellions as before; in Punjab, for example the attempts to purify Sikhism led to the Kuka revolt in 1872. The other important feature was the growing involvement of the educated middle-class intelligentsia as spokespersons for the aggrieved peasantry, thus adding new dimensions to their protests and linking their movements to a wider agitation against certain undesirable aspects of colonial rule. The educated urban middle-class leaders performed an important role. They tried to connect the localised and isolated peasant and tribal movements to a wider struggle against colonial rule.

13.4 Peasant Movements in the Post-Independence Period Certain issues which had dominated colonial era changed after independence. Land reforms, Zamindari abolition, declining importance of land revenue, community development programmes and agricultural extension schemes; the green revolution in select areas of the country during the 1960s, and opening of agricultural sector to the world market through the latest phase of globalisation from the 1990s introduced significant changes in rural India. The agrarian structure has undergone a change from a feudal and semi-feudal structure to a capitalist one. Agricultural production has increasingly become market oriented since the 1960s. Non-farm economic activities have expanded in the rural areas. As a result, new set of issues, new agrarian classes, new types of organisations and patterns of political mobilisation have emerged. These classes are agricultural labourers, poor and small peasants and the farmers/middle peasants/kulaks/rich peasants/rural rich. The period after 1947 was characterised by two major social movements: the Naxalite movement and the ‘new farmer’s movements. The Naxalite movement started from the region of Naxalbari (1967) in Bengal led by a faction of the CPI (M). The central problem for peasants was land. It erupted in the foothills of the eastern Himalayas in West Bengal, in a place called Naxalbari falling within the subdivision of Siliguri in NSOU ? GE-PS-01 104 Darjeeling district. In Naxalbari, Kharibari and Phansidewa, the movement took a militant turn. In West Bengal, specifically since the late 1970s, the programmes of land distribution and tenancy reforms through Operation Barga, employment generation schemes through the food-for-work programmes, integrated rural development programme (IRDP), extension of microcredit through the rural banks and peasant cooperatives have helped reduce the dependency of the peasantry on landowners- cum-money lender. The so called 'new farmer's movements began in the 1970s. These movements had their own organisations and leadership. These movements were: the Bharatiya Kisan Unions (BKUs) led by Bhupender Singh Mann in Punjab and by Mahender Singh Tikait in Uttar Pradesh; Shetkari Sangathan led by Sharad Joshi in Maharashtra; Karnataka Rajya Raitha Sangha led by Prof. Nanjundaswami; Khedyut Samaj in Gujarat; Vivasayigal Sangam led by Narayanaswami Naidu in Tamil Nadu. These movements were regionally organised, were "apolitical" or "nonpolitical" and involved farmers rather than peasants. The basic thrust of the movement was anti-state and anti-urban. It has been argued that the farmers' movements have broadened their agenda to include environment and women's issues. Therefore, they can be seen as a part of the worldwide 'new social movements'.

13.5 Peasant Movement in Contemporary India Contemporary India is experiencing widespread changes and developments in its society, polity and economy, resulting in a variety of social movements in recent years. The peasant movements are going on against acquisition of cultivable fertile land for industrial units and developmental projects. A few examples are – movements at Singur and Nandigram in West Bengal in 2006 and Sompeta in Andhra Pradesh in 2010. Recently farmers movement is going on all over India against three farm laws passed by the Indian Parliament in September 2020. The Farm Bills have been described as "anti-farmer" by many farmer unions and politicians. They are protesting against the Farm Bills in different ways, such as, gherao, dharna, raasta roko, demonstration, etc.

13.6 Conclusion Social movements emerge as manifestation of collective discontent against existing social, economic and political arrangements. (Singha Roy, 2005) A peasant movement is a social movement. Early peasant movements took place in a Feudal and Semifeudal situation and were violent in character. More recent movements, fitting the definitions of social movements, are usually much less violent, and their demands include better prices for agricultural produce, better wages and working conditions for the agricultural laborers, Peasant mobilisation has been influenced by two developments in Post- Independence India: key role of the state in directing agrarian policies and a capitalist tendency in agriculture. Agricultural policies have undergone a number of changes. Farmers' movements have primarily been a response to the politics adopted by the states.

13.7 Summing Up ? Peasant movement is a social movement usually inspired by the goal of improving the situation of peasants in a nation or territory. ? Peasant uprising of the 19th and early 20th century contested the hegemony of the colonial state. ? Peasant movements in post-independence era included issues relating to environment and women and hence,, have become a part of the worldwide new social movements. ? Peasant movements in the 21st century revolve round the issue of forcible acquisition of agricultural land for industry and development. Nandigram and Singur movements in West Bengal are cases in point.

13.8 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1) Write an essay on the peasant movements in the pre-Independence period. 2) Write a note on the peasant movements of the post-Independence period. Long Questions : 1) Discuss the nature of peasant movements in contemporary India. 2) Discuss the role of the left in mobilising peasants in colonial India. Short Questions : 1) What do you mean by 'peasant'? 2) Discuss the role of Bharatiya Kisan Union in the farmers' movements.

To understand the meaning of 'Tribe'. ? To explain the nature, classification and causes of tribal movements. ? To gain knowledge of some major tribal movements in India. ? To describe the phases and salient features of tribal movements. 14.2 Introduction The word 'tribe' is an administrative concept in India. It means 'Scheduled Tribes' or tribal communities under the Indian Constitution. In other words, the 'tribes' are known as Scheduled Tribes, adivasis, and aboriginals or as autochthonous. Article 366(25) of the Indian Constitution, defines 'Scheduled Tribes' as 'such tribes or tribal communities or parts or groups within such tribes or tribal communities as are deemed under article 342 to be Scheduled Tribes for the purpose of this constitution'. By the Constitution (Scheduled Tribes) Order, 1950, issued by the president in exercise of the powers conferred by Clause

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 108 (1) of the Article 342 of the constitution of India, 212 tribes have been declared to be Scheduled Tribes. 'Isolation, backwardness and cultural distinctiveness', of a social group, though undefined in legal and sociological terms, have guided the state for inclusion to a community in the 'schedule'. Later, by an Act of Parliament, some other groups were also included in the 'schedule'. Each tribe has its own distinct culture and identity in terms of rituals, values, social structure, dialects, lifestyles, festivals and celebrations, and so on. The scheduled tribes can be divided into two categories. These are - frontier tribes and non- frontier tribes. Frontier tribes dwell in the northeast frontier states of India, on the other hand the non-frontier tribes are geographically spread across the country. In this unit, we will discuss one of the most significant social movements, that is, tribal movements in India. The unit will also discuss the classification, nature, main factors, various phases of tribal movements in India. The last part of this unit deals with some major features of the tribal movements.

14.3 Classification of Tribal Movements

There are variations in the tribal movements from region to region in India. So, there is no unanimity in the classification of the Tribal Movement. Different scholars or social scientists have suggested different classification of tribal movements. According to S.M. Dubey (1982) the tribal movements in north-east India can be divided into four categories: (1) religious and social reform movements; (2) movements for separate statehood; (3) insurgent movements; (4) cultural rights movements. Surajit Sinha (1968) classifies the movements into: (1) ethnic rebellion; (2) reform movements; (3) political autonomy movements within the Indian Union; (4) secessionist movements; and (5) agrarian unrest. Mahapatra (1972) divides the tribal movements into three categories: (1) reactionary; (2) conservative; (3) revisionary or revolutionary. But there is very little basic difference among the scholars about the use of different typologies. We can reformulate the typologies of the tribal movements as mentioned by Ghanshyam Shah in his book Social Movements in India – A Review of Literature. According to him the tribal movements may be classified into: (1) ethnic movements which include cultural/religious identity; (2) agrarian and forest rights movements; (3) environmental movements (4) involuntary displacement and rehabilitation movements; and (5) political movements around the nationality question for a separate state. Not only is there a great deal of overlapping among all five types, but they are also interconnected, and one leads to the other.

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 109 14.4 Nature of Tribal Movements The long history of tribal movements in India has been marked by the existence of a vast diversity and variation in the nature and context of these movements. Beginning from the late eighteenth century till the attainment of independence in 1947 and even after that, the nature of tribal movements are not same. The nature of tribal movements varies on different matters. The adivasis are dependent on natural resources. They respect nature. As a result their struggles are considered as a part of environmental struggles. In the past, particularly for the nineteenth century they fought to protect their land and forest rights. So, one of the key issues of the tribal movements of different places of the country is the alienation of tribals from forest lands. From this point of view ecological issues are central to tribal movements. The tribals of Andhra Pradesh participated in the Telengana movement and fought against the landlords and the forced labour. (Pavie 1981; Dhanagare 1983). So, the tribal movements are not only forest-based or ecological but agrarian, cultural, social and political. As an analyst points out, ...while the peasant movements tend to remain purely agrarian as peasants lived off land, the tribal movements were both agrarian and forest based, because the tribals' dependence on forests was as crucial as their dependence on land. There was also the ethnic factor. The tribal revolts were directed against zamindars, moneylenders and petty government officials not because they exploited them but also because they were aliens. (Singh 1986: 166) Some tribal movements used violent path, while, few tribal movements were organised in non-violent way. The Santhal, the Kol and the Munda rebellions were the violent movements. Tana Bhagat movement was a non-violent movement. This movement focused on the structural transformation of the communities.

14.5 Phases of Tribal Movements

Tribal movement is not a new phenomenon. It has had a long history of more than two centuries in India. There are differences of opinion about the phases of tribal movements among scholars. Without going into the debate we can categorise the tribal movements into three distinct phases in pre-independence times. First Phase (1795-1860) : The first phase of tribal movements covers the period of 1795–1860. It coincided with the rise, expansion and establishment of the British Empire. During this phase, there were various tribal revolts/movements in India such as: Tamar

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 110 Revolts (1789-1832); The Kherwar Movement (1833); Santhal Revolt (1855); Bokta Movement (1858) etc. According to Bidyut Chakrabarty and Rajendra Kumar Pandey, "...the movements of this phase were more in the nature of reflecting the anger of a whole region rather than just a group of people. For instance, the Chhotanagpur plateau became the hub of such movements during the 1820s, owing to the common grudge of all the people against the sinister designs of British rulers." Second Phase (1860-1920) : The second phase covers the period between 1860 and 1920. It coincided with the intensive phase of colonialism. During this phase tribals were exploited in a number of ways such as eviction from land, harassment, land encroachment, increased rent, and so on. They started to reject the activities of outsiders to establish their own independent territory and rights. The tribal movements of these times developed an unconventional blend of socio-religious reform on the one hand, and the political resistance, on the other. Birsa revolt, headed by Birsa Munda was one of the famous tribal movements. In this phase the leaders of tribal movements were regarded as Gods out to save them from the brutalities of the aliens. Third Phase (1921-47) : The third phase was between 1921 and till the achievement of independence in 1947. During this phase the tribals began to participate in nationalist and agrarian movements. But few of tribal leaders also did not participate in the nationalist and agrarian movements and they raised demands that were separatist in nature. For instance, while in Central Provinces, tribal leaders— like Ganjan Korke—became a formidable force during the Civil Disobedience Movements (Sarkar 1989: 298), at the same time few leaders organised separatist movement in some parts of the Chhotanagpur plateau.

14.6 Factors behind the Tribal Movements in India

The tribals had been living peacefully and in harmony with nature at different places of India for hundreds of years in their own forests. Their way of life changed after coming of the British in India. The British introduced different laws and allowed outsiders to settle in the tribal areas. The extension of the British land revenue system and the new forest regulations fully destroyed the autonomy of the tribal world. In other words, the imposition of British rule resulted in the loss of their autonomous domains of power, freedom and culture. When tribals were unable to pay their loan or the interest thereon, money-lenders and landlords usurped their lands. The tribals thus became tenants on their own land and sometimes even bonded labourers. The police and the revenue officers never helped them. On the contrary, they also used the tribals for personal and government work without any payment. This reduced them to the status of labourers and debtors from masters of their own land. The uprisings were basically against this unwelcome intrusion and a fight for their independence.

14.7 Some Major Tribal Movements in India

The political autonomy and control over local resources of the tribal population were threatened by the establishment of British rule and the advent of its non-tribal agents. As a result, many uprisings took place during the British Colonial rule against the British Government, zamindars, moneylenders and petty government officials who were not only their exploiters but aliens too. One of the major tribal revolts, the Kol uprising of 1831-32, took place in Chota Nagpur and Singbhum region of Bihar and Orissa. In these areas, they used to enjoy independent power for centuries. But British penetration and imposition of British law posed a threat to the power of the hereditary tribal chiefs. Raja of Chota Nagpur started evicting tribal peasants by farming out land to outsiders for higher rents. Another most effective tribal movement of this period was, the Santhal rebellion of 1855-56, organised by the four Murmu Brothers - Sidhu, Kanhu, Chand and Bhairav. The Santhals lived scattered in various districts of Curttack, Dhalbhum, Manbhum, Barabhum, Chota Nagpur, Palamau, Hazaribagh, Midnapur, Bankura and Birbhum in eastern India. This tribal movement was organised against the zamindars, the mahajans and the government. The low caste non-tribal peasants also joined this movement. The revolt was violently suppressed by the British. But the British government became more cautious about them and the Santhal inhabited areas were constituted into a separate administrative unit, called the Santhal Parganas, which recognised the distinctiveness of their tribal culture and identity. Munda Rebellion of 1899-1900 is one of the prominent tribal movements in India, led by the charismatic leader Birsa Munda in the Chotanagpur area against the British and the dikus (landlords, moneylenders, merchants). Apart from the above mentioned movements there were many tribal movements in India during British colonial rule. Such as -Tamar Revolts (1789-1832); The Kherwar Movement (1833); Bokta Movement (1858); Midnapur Movement (1918-1924); Bhoomi Sena Movement etc.

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 112 14.8 Salient Features of Tribal Movements Some basic features of tribal movements are: ????? There are variations in tribal movements from region to region. So, there is no unanimity in the classification of the Tribal Movement. ????? The tribals strongly felt that alien administration and outsiders ruined their culture and economy. ????? Land alienation, usury, forced labour, minimum wages, land grabbing, etc. were the main issues of tribal movements. ????? The tribal movements are not only forest-based or ecological but agrarian, cultural, social or political oriented also. ????? According to Ghanshyam Shah, the tribal movements have a threefold typology such as - ethnic movements, agrarian movements and political movements. ????? The tribal movements were basically against the unwelcome intrusion of the British Government, zamindars, moneylenders and petty government officials into their own tribal world and a fight for their antonomy. ????? Some tribal movements used the violent path, on the other hand, a few tribal movements were organised in a non-violent way. ????? The leaders of tribal movements were regarded as Gods out to save them from the brutalities of the aliens. ????? Many tribals leaders joined nationalist movements against the British colonial rule. Though some tribals leaders tended to take separatist position at the same time. ????? Various tribes have built up an alliance for achieving political autonomy after independence of India. Such as the tribes of Jharkhand, Nagaland, Mizoram, Gujarat etc. ????? After independence several adivasi groups have demanded more and more welfare programmes including reservation of jobs in government offices. ????? Some tribal groups launched Sanskritisation movements to assert their status as caste Hindus. These movements are also known as Bhagat movements.

14.9 Conclusion One of the most significant social movements in India is tribal movement. The tribals have their own distinct culture and identity. To protect their culture, land and forest, they fought against the British Government, zamindars, moneylenders and petty government officials. Some tribal movements followed violent path, while few tribal movements followed non-violent way. The tribal movements are not only forest-based or ecological issue but agrarian, cultural social or political oriented also. So, the tribal movements may be classified into: (1) ethnic movements which include cultural/religious identity; (2) agrarian and forest rights movements; (3) environmental movements (4) involuntary displacement and rehabilitation movements; and (5) political movements around the nationality question for a separate state.

14.10 Summing Up ? Tribal people are constitutionally recognised people of India who played a very crucial role in the freedom struggle of India. ? Tribal movements are social movements like other movements such as Peasant Movement, Women Movement and Environment Movement etc. ? Tribal movements vary in hature and context from one region to another.. ? Tribal movements were basically against the unwelcome intrusion of the British rulers into their own domain displacing them from their own territory. ? In post-colonial India, only their masters have changed. Issues around which the tribal movements revolve now remain much the same.

Understand the meaning of Working Class Movement. ? Examine the Working Class Movement in the Pre-Independence Period in India. ? Analyse the role of trade unions in the Working Class Movements. ? Review the Working Class Movement in the Post-Independence Period in India. 15.2 Introduction Social movements primarily take the form of non-institutionalised collective political action which strive for political and /or social change (Ghanshyam Shah, 2004). India has witnessed many such movements in the past and present. Workers' movement is also one of the important social movements which began after the establishment of a number of factories in the port cities of the country during the second half of the eighteenth century. But initially, the workers' movements were unorganised in nature and they could not raise their voices strongly against the intolerable and inhuman working conditions, low wages, long working hours and several other issues. Later, NSOU ? GE-PS-11 116 they were organised and many trade unions fought against the colonial administration to improve their working conditions in the factories. Like other sections of society, industrial workers of both organised and unorganised sectors, resort to various types of collective actions such as strikes, satyagrahas, hunger strikes, bandhs and hartals (general strike), gheraos, demonstrations, mass casual leave, work to rule, cutting off the supply of electricity, etc. (Kannappan and Saran 1967). In this Unit, we will discuss working class movements in India as a social movement. We are going to explain only industrial working class movements in India. The first part of this unit deals with the meaning of working class movement and different stages of these movements. The second part of this unit will focus on the working class movements and the role of trade unions in the Pre-Independence period. The working class movement in the post-Independence period in India will be explained in the third section of this unit. 15.3 Meaning of Working Class It is very difficult to define the working class. There are many debates about the meaning of working class among scholars. According to the Oxford Dictionary, working class is "the social group consisting primarily of people who are employed in unskilled or semi- skilled manual or industrial work." In Cambridge English Dictionary, working class is defined as a social group that consists of people who earn less than other groups, often being paid only for the hours or days that they work, and who usually do physical work rather than work for which one needs an advanced education.

Karl Marx defined the working class or proletariat as individuals who sell their labour power for wages and who do not own the means of production. He argued that the working class is the base of all capitalist state. They grow food, build dwelling places and create wealth of a society but they do not have anything to live. Some economists and sociologists have divided the non-agricultural work force into two sectors—organised and unorganised, or formal and informal. The unorganised workers are those who are employed in small-scale industry and other wage earners in non-farm activities. The workers in the organised sector can be divided into white-collar workers and blue-collar workers. 15.4 Phases of Working Class Movements 15.4.1 Working Class Movement in the Pre-Independence Period We can divide the working class movement in India into four stages: (i) 1850 to NSOU ? GE-PS-11 117 1890; (ii) 1890 to 1918; (iii) 1918 to 1947; and (iv) The post-independence period. In this section we will explain the first three stages and the last stage will be discussed in the next section. The First Phase: 1850 to 1890 : During the first phase, many working class movements took place in India. At that time many peasants, who had been thrown out of their land under the impact of the colonial rule, became associated with the emerging 'modern' industrial sector. During this period, the actions of the working class were sporadic, unorganised and their movements were mostly ineffective. At that time several spontaneous strikes occurred. But, there is no unanimity about the exact date or event which might be construed to be the beginning of the labour movement in the country. For instance, while some scholars consider the strike of the textile workers in Bombay in 1882 as the beginning of the labour movement in the country, others argue that K. M. Lokhande's move in calling a meeting of the workers and submitting a memorandum to the President of the Cloth Mill workers in Bombay in 1890 initiated the labour movement in India. During this phase some philanthropists came forward to focus on the problems of the working class and tried to improve working conditions by urging the British authorities in many ways.

S. S. Bengalee in Bombay, Sasipada Banerjee in Bengal and Narayan Lokhandya in Maharashtra were prominent among them. In 1870, Sasipada Banerjee started a Working Man's Club and newspaper 'Bharat Shramjeevi'. In 1878, S. S. Banerjee drafted a bill for providing better working conditions to the labourers and tried to pass it in the Bombay Legislative Council. In 1880, the Bombay Mill and Millhands Association was set up by Narayan Lokhandya. He also started a newspaper called 'Deenbandhu'. The Second Phase : 1890 to 1918 : The labourers formed many trade unions during the second stage. In the last decades of the 19th century, many strikes were organised in Bombay, Kurla, Surat, Wardha, Ahmedabad and in other places all over the India. The strikes however were sporadic, spontaneous, localised and short-lived and were caused by many factors such as the intolerable and inhuman working conditions, low wages, long working hours and several other issues. Though the working class movements were limited in their impact, they prepared the base of the future working class movements at the national level and immensely added to the strength of the national movement. The Third Phase : 1918 to 1947 : The trade union movements underwent rapid transformations in India after World War I (1914 – 1918). During this time the working class struggle took an organised form and many strong and active trade unions were formed. The first trade union was established in April 1918 in Madras by B.P. Wadia, a social worker and member of the Theosophical Society. During the same

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 118 year, Mahatma Gandhi founded the Textile Labour Association (TLA). A number of strikes took place in Jamshedpur, Bombay, Nagpur, Calcutta and other places during this time and these strikes helped to give birth new unions. Panchanan Saha (1978) gives a descriptive account of various strikes by jute, railway, tramway, and Bata workers during the 1920s and 1930s. The Textile Labour Association went on strike under the leadership of Gandhiji. The workers of TISCO organised strike in Jamshedpur in 1920. According to official data, there were 396 strikes in 1921, involving 6, 00,000 workers. A total of 6,894 thousand man days were lost. Between 1921 and 1925, on an average, 4, 00,000 workers in a year were involved in strikes. The number of strikes had again gone up at the end of the 1930s. And the number reached a peak in 1947; there were 1,811 strikes involving 1,840 thousand workers. There were three ideological groups—leftists, nationalists and moderates’—within the Congress to organise the working-class movement. The main ideological groups were the communists led by S.A. Dange and M.N. Roy, the moderates led by M. Joshi and V.V. Giri and the nationalists which involved leaders like Lala Lajpat Rai and Jawaharlal Nehru. Nationalist Congressmen provided leadership and played an important role in the formation of trade unions and the launching of strikes during the 1920s and 1930s. In 1920 the All India Trade Union Congress (AITUC), a broad-based organisation involving diverse ideologies, was formed in Bombay under the leadership of Lala Lajpat Rai. Later on Pt. Jawahar Lal Nehru, Netaji Subhash Chandra Bose, V. V. Giri, Sarojini Naidu, C.R. Das and several other political leaders were associated with subsequent conferences. AITUC in its second session in 1921 in Jharia adopted a resolution of Swaraj (Complete independence from British rule), almost eight years before the Indian National Congress adopted such resolution in 1929. Gradually, the AITUC emerged as the conglomerate having affiliations of approximately 200 trade unions and played an important role by creating pressure on colonial government to improve the working conditions and wage structures of the workers. On the eve of the independence of the country, the AITUC was, by and large, overwhelmingly dominated by the communists. Congress leaders decided to quit the AITUC and formed another trade union body, the Indian National Trade Union Congress (INTUC) in 1947. Communist Party was actively associated with organising the working class and a series of strikes were organised in the wake of the economic depression in the middle of the 1920s. To suppress the communist movement and the communists, the colonial ruler enacted two laws in Bombay, such as- the Public Safety Bill and the Trades Disputes Act of April 1929. A major crack down on the communists came in March 1929 when Dange, along with 32 others were arrested and tried for conspiring against King-Emperor in the notorious Meerat NSOU ? GE-PS-11 119 Conspiracy Case. The case continued till 1933 and ended in long jail sentences for all the leaders. But this incident helped the Communist Party of India to consolidate its position among workers. The working class became associated with the freedom struggle by the end of the 1920s and the beginning of the 1930s. Workers participated in meetings and organised demonstrations and processions against the British Raj. The workers of Bombay, Sholapur, Calcutta, Ahmedabad and other places went on strike to support the Civil Disobedience movement. The workers of Ahmedabad went on total strike to protest against the arrest of Gandhi. Dilip Simeon observes that the workers were ‘profoundly aware of nationalism, identity and gender, not to speak of the violence and communal strife around them (2001:30). But, the trade union movements remained marginalised and fragmented social movement in the pre-independence period having only limited utility for and getting very negligible support from the mainstream national movement. [Bidyut Chakrabarty & Rajendra Kumar Pandey] 15.4.2 Working Class Movement in the Post-Independence Period The transfer of power and Independence of India created a different atmosphere for the entire working class in the country. According to some scholars (Ramaswamy and Ramaswamy 1981, Vaid 1972, Simeon 1995), political issues figure prominently in working- class strikes in post-independence India. Government of India formulated new industrial policy to improve the working conditions. As a result the number of strikes declined between 1947 and 1960. However, the number of conflicts, including strikes and lockouts increased in the 1960s and 1970s. 1982-83 was the important turning point in India’s working-class movement in the post-independence period. During this time a vast number of organised as well as unorganised textile workers’ strike took place in Bombay and it continued over one year. Traditional trade union leadership failed and a new kind of leadership emerged. Women workers of Ahmedabad and Tamil Nadu struck work in the last century and at the beginning of this century against discrimination and ill treatment (Murphy 1981). The New Economic Policy announced by the government of India in 1991 had severely affected the working class. The main focuses of the new economic policy are Liberalisation, Privatisation and Globalisation. As a result, several important public sector units in the country is being sold to private companies, the governmental control over the private sector has been reduced and the bargaining position of the workers vis-a- vis capital has weakened. So, when the government of India announced the new policy, almost all the trade unions, irrespective of their political affiliation, have expressed their NSOU ? GE-PS-11 120 opposition to it. However, the entire movement could not deter the government. As the new economic policy unleashes economic forces, trade unions have a number of challenges to face in the coming years. The working class in order to be effective in the new economic regime have no alternative but to fight together. 15.5 Conclusion In this unit, we have discussed one of the most significant social movements in India, that is, workers' movement.

The working class refers to those individuals who sell their labour power for wages and who do not own the means of production.

We can divide the working class into two sectors—organised and unorganised, or formal and informal. The workers' movement began after the establishment of a number of factories in the port cities of the country during the second half of the eighteenth century. Initially, the workers' movements were unorganised in nature and later, they became organised and fought against the colonial administration to improve their working conditions in the factories. The workers fought against the intolerable and inhuman working conditions, low wages, long working hours and several other issues by various types of collective actions such as strikes, satyagrahas, hunger strikes, bandhs and hartals (general strike), gheraos, demonstrations, mass casual leave, work to rule, cutting off the supply of electricity, etc. After independence, laws were enacted to improve the conditions of the working class. But those proved ineffective. The New Economic Policy announced by the government of India in 1991 had severely affected the working class in all respects. 15.6 Summing Up ? Workers' movement is one of the important social movements which emerged during the second half of the 18th century. ? Working classes are not very easy to define. Karl Marx defined them as individuals selling their labour power and having no ownership in the means of production. ? Working class movements in India originated in pre-independence India. ? Working class movements in India are ideologically divided. ? New economic policy based on liberalization, privatisation and globalization has resulted in the weakening of the workers' movement in Indian. NSOU ? By the time for the deliverance from the British imperialism. Sumit Sarkar writes, "The summer of 1942 found Gandhi in a strange and uniquely militant mood, 'Leave India to God or to anarchy" he repeatedly urged the British – this orderly disciplined anarchy should go, and if as a result there is complete lawlessness I would risk it".

These statements made, in May 1942 are indicative of the restlessness of the leader, who 'promised' Swaraj within one year and who is eager and anxious to see that his mission of gaining freedom for India is realized soon. One more feature to be noticed in this connection was the refusal of Gandhi to condemn the violence of the masses and held the government responsible for this violence. All over the country people responded positively and actively towards the fast of Gandhi. Gandhi was released on 6 May, 1944 on medical grounds. It is to be noted that the Quit India movement was the spontaneous participation of the masses compared to the earlier non-cooperation and civil disobedience movements. Bipan Chandra was of the view: "the great significance of this historic movement was that it placed the demand for independence on the immediate agenda of the national movement. After 'Quit India' there could be no retreat. Independence was no longer a matter of bargain. And this became amply clear after the war". 16.3

the Quit India Movement Quit India or 'Bharat Choro', the simple but powerful slogan launched the famous struggle which also became significant by the name of 'August Revolution'.

The Quit India was the most powerful mass movement in late colonial India. Its importance lay not only in its reflecting the climax of the anti-British struggle but also in its vision for the future. Mahatma Gandhi led three major movements across the nation began with the Non-Cooperation movement, the Civil Disobedience Movement and the Quit India Movement. Gandhi was the outstanding leader and Gandhism the guiding ideology of the movement during this phase.

He was the first leader who recognized the role of the masses in the struggle for national liberation.

He introduced an era of mass politics. He felt the need to launch a programme of struggle which would mobilize the masses in the nationalist struggle. Under his leadership, the Indians became patriotic and bold fighters for national emancipation. Gandhi was also an outstanding social reformer. He launched movements simultaneously not only against the British rule but also against atrocious social system, customs justified in the name of India's age-old traditions. He denounced the barbarous practice of untouchability. He also considered both Hindu and Muslim communalism as anti-human and anti-national.

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 127 16.4 Objectives of the Quit India Movement In the struggle of Quit India the common people of India demonstrated an unparalleled heroism in the context of draconian measures by the Government and suppression of basic liberties. Why then it became a necessity to launch a movement in these difficult conditions of brutal repression? The failure of the Cripps Mission in April 1942 made it clear that Britain was not willing to offer an honorable settlement during the War and she was determined to continue India's unwilling involvement in the War preparations. The Cripps offer convinced Congressmen like Jawaharlal Nehru and Gandhiji, who did not want to do anything to hamper the anti- fascist war was becoming convinced of the inevitability of a struggle. Gandhiji drafted a resolution after Cripps' departure for the Congress Working Committee calling for Britain's withdrawal and the adoption of non-violent non-cooperation against any Japanese invasion.

Apart from this, there were factors like price rise, war-time shortages resulted in popular discontent. The British policy of taking possession

The nationalist leaders felt that the people were becoming demoralized and that in the event of a Japanese aggression, they might not resist.

Gandhiji was very clear on this aspect to draw the people out of this demoralized state and convince them of their power. He was so convinced about the appropriate time for struggle that he said to Louis Fischer that he will go ahead with the struggle in case of his inability to convince the Congress. However, the Congress accepted his advice on the timing of a mass movement. 16.5 Government's Attitude The Congress first accepted Gandhiji's idea of a struggle at the Working Committee meeting at Wardha on 14 July, 1942 to be followed by a meeting of

He added: 'you may take it from me that I am not going to strike a bargain with the Viceroy for ministries and the like. I am not going to be satisfied with anything short of complete freedom. Kanpur, Allahabad, Varanasi and Patna witnessed hartals, public demonstrations and processions. The Government blocked the press. The National Herald and Harijan ceased publication for the entire period of the struggle.

The Government justified the use of armed forces and the police by stating that the police were carrying out no more than their legal duties and obligations in using force for the security of people and property. In order to win public support, the Government of India issued instructions to all Provincial governments and administrations to emphasize the following points:

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 129 1. Action is not aimed at the Congress as a political party, but as an organization which has involved itself in a movement which, if successful, must cripple India's war effort. Moreover; this movement will also undermine India's political advancement. 2. The action is not punitive but preventive. 3. Once the resolution was passed, it was impossible for Government to hold its hand any longer. There is sufficient evidence that arrangements for a mass movement were being organized and there was no guarantee that these preparations would be suspended while Mr. Gandhi was initiating negotiations with the Viceroy. A large-scale use of military and police was made to suppress the movement. In the absence of the leaders who were themselves detained, people led and organized the movement. The humiliation and inhuman treatment meted out to the people can hardly be expressed in words. Houses of innocent people were raided, searched, looted and burnt. They were dragged out of their homes. As the movement spread in the countryside and took a serious turn; the Government followed the policy of collective punishment and imposed collective fines. The innocent villagers had to suffer not because they had participated in the movement but because they did not help the administration or they had failed to inform about the whereabouts of the leaders. The Government did not hesitate to use repressive measures for realizing collective fines. 16.6 Students' Participation and Government Repression over the Students Since the Government suspected the students and youths of joining the movement, they too were subjected to severe punishment. Non-violent and peaceful marches of the students were suppressed, fired upon, 'lathi' charged and beaten. On 11 August, 1942 the military and police killed seven students who tried to hoist National flag on Patna Secretariat. As the Government repression intensified, underground activities became common. The leaders who evaded arrest were declared absconders for whom awards were announced. The Government also harassed the relatives of such leaders. The uprising was spontaneous and uniform across the country. Though the Government was successful in suppressing the movement temporarily, its impact was so serious that it shook the foundations of British administration in India. On 9 August, 1942 about 5000 Congress leaders were arrested and All India Congress Committee, its subordinate committees and allied organizations were declared illegal and their premises seized. About 90 newspapers stopped publication. The symbols of imperialism became the main target of people's fury. There was large scale destruction of transport and communications. Students went on NSOU ? GE-PS-11 130 strike in schools and colleges across the country and joined processions. They involved themselves in writing and distributing illegal news-sheets. Miss Usha Mehta; a girl student played an important role in 'illegal' programmes of 'illegal' Congress Radio. 16.7 Role of the Working Class and the Peasantry Though the British Government claimed that the working class remained isolated from the movement the fact is that it played its role everywhere. Their demands were confined not only to economic issues; they urged upon the Government to release political leaders. In the wake of the mass upsurge, the people liberated certain areas and established people's governments at various places, including Midnapur, Gaya, Tarapur, Ballia, Ahmedabad and Satara. These parallel governments had a well-organized structure, having various departments, including those of justice, war, health and public safety, law and order and education. There was another large section of 'untouchables' or Dalits of Indian society appear to have been somewhat hesitant about joining the rich peasants and small landlords and also the students from rural or urban petty bourgeois background, the driving force behind the nationalist uprising in 1942. Another interesting feature of the movement was that, even when in the second phase it had spread out from the big cities and towns into the countryside and assumed the form of a mass peasant uprising in some places; it led to few anti-landlord actions. This was in remarkable contrast to the earlier campaigns of mass agitation against the British launched by the Congress in 1920-22 and 1930-34. It must be admitted that no national movement can expect to gain the active support of the nation or to be completely free from inner divisions. It is also true that the

The Quit India movement was the last in the series of mass movements launched by the Congress. Under the leadership of Gandhiji it swept across the length and breadth of the country. With the outbreak of the Quit India movement, INA was formed in Malaya by Mohan Singh but the main inspiration to fight the British tooth and nail came from Netaji Subhas Chandra Basu when he formed INA anew. He fought valiantly against the British with the help of the INA in collaboration with the Japanese soldiers and even set up Azad Hind Government in Burma, although with the fall of Japan in the Second World War, the INA fell into the hands of the Allied Powers, many of them captured and put on trial which saw massive protest from the Indians against the British. Historians like Sumit Sarkar lauded the INA for its valuable contribution to the independence of India. 16.12 Summing Up ? The Quit India was the most powerful mass movement in late colonial India. To decipher the meaning of communalism ? To analyse the causes for the emergence of communalism ? To account for the opposition to communalism ? To study the role of the Muslim League and RSS in spreading Communalism 17.2 Introduction Communalism as a political philosophy has its roots in the religious and cultural diversity among the people of India. Communalism has been used as a political instrument to divide, create differences and tensions between communities leading to communal hatred and violence. It must be noted that in ancient period, people living in Indian society co-existed peacefully. Buddha and Ashok were pioneers of peace and religious tolerance. In the medieval period, despite occasional occurrences of religious conflicts, rulers like Akbar and Sher Shah Suri followed policies of religious toleration among various communities although rulers like Aurangzeb showed religious intolerance towards other religious practitioners. As a modern phenomenon, communalism arose as a result of British colonial policy of 'divide and rule' aimed at ruling the country for long in order to serve colonial interests by dividing the people on religious lines.

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 140 17.3 Meaning of Communalism The term 'communalism' connotes political action designed to preserve the vested interests of separate identity of religion, community, sector and group. Communalism promotes narrow mindedness and bigotry which generates in the adherents of one religion a sense of separateness totally antagonistic to other religions. It implies the opposite of secularism. Communalism is the belief that because a group of people follow a particular religion they have common, social, political and economic interest. It is the belief that in India the different religious communities have their own separate history and communal identity. Each religious community constitutes a homogeneous entity and there is no such thing as an Indian nation. The communalist assumes that the most meaningful distinction among the Indian people in social, cultural, economic and political issues is to be made on the basis of religious communities. The communalist usually starts from difference and ends up with the notion that the interests of the people following different religions are antagonistic. Communalism is the product of the socio-economic and political conditions. It is itself a social malady. It undermines the real struggle for changing social conditions. The struggle for independence from the British and the resulting partition of the country are associated with communalism in Indian minds. Most Indians would contend that British imperial policy of divide and rule was responsible for encouraging separatist tendencies. The roots of communalism lie in political demands made by different communities by exaggerating cultural and religious differences. These differences between two communities were kept alive for vested interests. They reap rich dividends on the stratagem of spreading religious hatred. The rise of nationalism and introduction of democratic institutions in India in the 19 th century was accompanied by the emergence of communalism as a political phenomenon. Indians can exist and act socially and protect their interests only as members of religion-based communities. Communalism considers other religio-cultures inferior and condemnable. It thrives on the philosophy which stood for promotion of a particular religious community. The communalist not only failed to represent national interests, he did not even represent the interests of the community he claims to represent. The basic thrust of communalism as an ideology is the spread of communal ideas and thoughts. The underlying cause of communal violence is the spread of communal ideology. Communal violence occurs when communal thinking reaches a certain level of intensity and the atmosphere is vitiated by the provocation of communal fear, suspicion and hatred. Thus, communal violence cannot exist without communal ideology. The communalists are primarily interested in spreading the communal belief system.

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 141 17.4 Emergence of Communalism Under the British rule communalism was the exploitation of religion by the rulers for a political purpose, for provoking mass conflict between Hindus and Muslims for the purpose of weakening the freedom movement of the country. Before the British rule there was no record of Hindu-Muslim riots or communal tensions. Wars waged by Hindu and Muslim rulers against each other did not take the form of religious antagonism between the two communities. This fact was admitted by the Simon Commission itself. The report mentions that in British India a generation ago communal tension as a threat to communal peace was at a minimum. Communalism was an instrument of colonial domination. Colonialism provided the social structure which produced communalism. Communalism arose as a result of British colonial impact.

Throughout the 20 th century in the absence of modern industries and modern education, health service and culture there were poor economic opportunities and unemployment. The growth of the middle classes constantly surpassed economic development. There was also an acute shortage of superior jobs most of these being reserved for Europeans till 1920s. Thus the lower middle classes were increasingly placed in a position of economic hardships that resulted a sense of social deprivation, frustration and a constant fear of loss of identity often created an atmosphere of violence which when triggered off by any religious issues led to communal riots. In such a situation, the national movement and the intelligentsia worked for the long term radical solution by the overthrow of colonialism. But some sections of the middle classes who lacked a wider social vision and faith in the capacity of national movement concentrated on their immediate interests and sought short- term solutions to their problems. There existed a very tough and unhealthy competition for jobs. The middle classes used various identities like caste; region and religion. The competition for jobs among individuals could be given the colour of a struggle between two religious communities even though the colonial underdevelopment was affecting both Hindus and Muslims equally. The middle class tendency to think and act communally tended to weaken the nationalist struggle for secularism and against communalism. Jawaharlal Nehru correctly observed that communalism was an inherent weakness of a nationalist movement based on the middle classes. The Congress would have found it easier to engage in an undaunted struggle against communalism if its social and ideological base had been shifted from the petty bourgeoisie to the peasantry and the working class .There was also the need to initiate an intense ideological and political campaign among the petty bourgeoisie. 1 (Bipan Chandra, 'Communalism as False Consciousness' in Sudipta Kaviraj, (ed), p. 303).

The colonial political structure and policies provided the ground on which communal politics could flourish. The Congress relied too much on negotiations with the communalists and failed to evolve a long term strategy to combat communalism.

Finally, two new Dominions, India and Pakistan were born, ushering in political freedom to 400 million people, constituting one-fifth of the human race. Some people thought that partition of the country would bring about a lasting solution to the communal problems in India and this social evil would be wiped out of our society forever. NSOU ? GE-PS-11 146 It was hoped that the state would secularize and democratize the Indian society and after achievement of Independence religious antagonism and communalism would disappear from the country. It is, necessary to eliminate the social conditions which favour the growth of communalism. It is significant that most of the Indian political parties and intellectuals have not been communal. This has prevented the growth of communalism and has kept India secular. The Indian state has been basically secular and opposed to communalism so far. 17.8 Summing Up ? Communalism is the belief that because a group of people follow a particular religion they have common, social, political and economic interest. ? The communalist assumes that the most meaningful distinction among the Indian people in social, cultural, economic and political issues is to be made on the basis of religious communities. The communalist not only failed to represent national interests, he did not even represent the interests of the community he claims to represent. ? Under the British rule communalism was the exploitation of religion by the rulers for a political purpose, for provoking mass conflict between Hindus and Muslims for the purpose of weakening the freedom movement of the country. Before the British rule there was no record of Hindu-Muslim riots or communal tensions. ? Communalism was an instrument of colonial domination. Colonialism provided the social structure which produced communalism. Communalism arose as a result of British colonial impact. ? The national movement and the intelligentsia worked for the long term radical solution by the overthrow of colonialism. ? The middle class tendency to think and act communally tended to weaken the nationalist struggle for secularism and against communalism. Jawaharlal Nehru correctly observed that communalism was an inherent weakness of a nationalist movement based on the middle classes. ?

To show how the Congress leadership looked at the Two-Nation theory 18.2 Introduction The Two-Nation theory was a concept that emphasized a separate state for the Muslims in the sub-continent. History clearly shows that after the advent of Islam in the sub- continent, Muslim nationalism evolved as Muslims and Hindus could not co-exist without nationalism rearing its head. The Bhakti movement, Deen-e-Ilahi and other similar ideologies which tried to synthesize Islam and Hinduism prompted Muslim scholars to attempt to preserve the purity of Islam. After the British occupation of the sub-continent, the domination by the Hindus, backwardness of the Muslims and the threat for their survival coupled with sporadic clashes between the Hindus and the Muslims led to the emergence of the Two- Nation theory. The theory described the Muslims as a nation with different culture, heritage, NSOU ? GE-PS-11 150 values and civilization. The Congress party wanted India to remain united as a secular state with equality for followers of all religious denominations but failed to forge a unity among the Muslims and the Hindus. The British colonial rulers encouraged this disunity by all means. As a result, the Two-Nation theory culminated in the partition of India into two separate and independent countries- India and Pakistan. 18.3 Meaning of Two-Nation Theory The two-nation theory means that cultural, political, religious, social and economic disparities between the two major communities, Hindus and Muslims. These differences of outlook were greatly instrumental in giving rise to two distinct political ideologies which were responsible for the partition of the subcontinent into two independent states. This theory means that the Hindus and the Muslims are two different nations and on the basis of this theory demand for two separate countries emerged. The concept of Muslims as a nation developed before the formation of Pakistan. A strong Muslim community had emerged in India who had its own way of life and culture. The British won over the Muslim rulers due to the industrial developments and modern war techniques. In general, the British Government and commentators made it a point of speaking of an Indian nation. Since Indians were not a nation, they were not capable of a national self-government. The Muslim scholars sought to reform the teaching of Islamic Law and to promote its application in a Muslim society. One of such prominent name among them is Sir Syed Ahmad Khan, who, through his educational drive; the Aligarh movement awakened and guided his community for social mobility under colonial rule. He thought, the Muslims were not in a position to involve into the anti-government activities. So he advised the Muslims not to join the Indian National Congress founded in 1885. He argued that modern education and non-political activities might be the key to Muslim advancement. He, in 1883,talked of two different nations, 'Friends, in India there live two prominent nations which are distinguished by the names of Hindus and Mussulmans. Just as a man has some principal organs, similarly these two nations are like the principal limbs of India.' 1 (Ram Chandra Guha, Makers of Modern India, HUP, 2011, p-65).

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 151 18.4 Sir Syed Ahmed Khan and Two-Nation Theory Sir Syed Ahmed Khan believed in Indian Nationalism but later due to Hindi-Urdu controversy he began to advocate the two-nation theory. In 1873, he declared that he did not care for religion to be regarded as the symbol of nationhood. He advocated separation between religious and political matters. When he was a member of the Viceroy's legislative council he stood for the welfare of both Hindus and Muslims. Before 1884, Sir Syed Ahmed Khan committed to unite Muslims and Hindus. He said in a speech at Patna on January 27, 1883: "...Just as the high caste of Hindus came and settled down in this land once, forgot where their earlier home was and considered India to be their own country, the Muslims also did exactly the same thing-they also left their climes hundreds of years ago and they also regard this land of India as their very own...But my Hindu brethren and my Muslim co-religionists breathe the same air, drink the water of the sacred Ganga and the Jamuna, eat the products of the earth which God has given to this country, live and die together...I say with conviction that if we were to disregard for a moment our conception of Godhead, then in all matters of everyday life the Hindus and Muslims really belong to one nation...and the progress of the country is possible only if we have a union of hearts, mutual sympathy and love...I have always said that our land of India is like a newly wedded bride whose two beautiful and luminous eyes are the Hindus and the Musalmans; if the two exist in mutual concord the bride will remain forever resplendent and becoming, while if they make up their mind to see in different directions the bride is bound to become squinted and even partially blind." 2 (V.P. Verma, Modern Indian Political Thought, 1961, p- 424). In Legislative Council, he was always eager for prosperity for the nation. He was the first to argue that the 1857 revolt had been caused by the indifference of the East India Company to the economic plight of the common people and the failure to grant Indians some form of advisory representation in the council. Later on there was a remarkable change in his attitude. He made the Muslims realize that they are separate nation. They should demand for separate country of their own. He was the first Muslim leader who used the word 'Nation' for the Muslims of sub-continent. He observed that in India there exist two nations, the Hindus and Muslims. They could not live together and gradually the hostility between the two nations would grow. He argued that Hindus and Muslims are two separate nations because their religion, culture and history were different from each other. He was the staunch believer and eminent voice behind two nation theory. He became suspicious of the Indian National Congress and advised Muslim community to keep distance from it. In 1888, in a critical assessment of the Indian National Congress, observed that the aims and objectives of the Indian National Congress are based upon an ignorance of history and present politics. India is inhabited by different

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 152 nationalities. The Congress thinks that they profess the same religion and speak the same language, but such views are dangerous for all the nationalities of India, especially for the Muslims. He felt that the Muslims should concentrate on their educational advancement and he founded the Educational Congress in 1888. The Mohammedan Anglo-Oriental Defence Association was loyalist in its declared objectives and was committed to the prevention of political agitation among the Muslims. In spite of his advice, several Muslims like Badruddin Tyebji joined the Indian National Congress. 18.5 Muhammad Iqbal and Two-Nation theory Muhammad Iqbal was a great poet and his life seems to be a life of complete turnaround due to the factors apparently having roots in the policy of divide and rule followed by the colonial rulers from the beginning of the twentieth century in India. His stay in Europe proved to be a turning point in moulding his intellectual orientation towards various aspects of both local and global events. After his return from Europe, he was not very interested in politics. For instance, when the All India Muslim League session held in Lahore in 1920, he did not attend it though the meeting was held just opposite his residence. He entered into politics in 1925, when he contested and won the election to three Punjab Legislative Council and remained a member till 1928. He presided over the Allahabad session of the All India Muslim League in 1930. He advocated the idea of two separate administrative areas in India, one for Muslims and one for Hindus as a solution of differences between the two communities. Muhammad Iqbal remained an admirer of Indian nationalism till his departure for Europe in 1905. However, due to various influences of European ideas and incidents; he developed a love for Islamic religion and began to shape his ideas on the lines of pan-Islamism. Initially he was a poet of Indian nationalism, for example, Sare Jahan se Achcha Hindustan Hamara, represented the voice of Indian nationalists. In another poem, Naya Shivala, he was categorical in calling upon his countrymen to consolidate their affection for Indianness by discarding their parochial outlook and developing a broader perspective on India. Iqbal's love for nationalism as reflected in his poems, gradually disappeared by the seemingly negative policies of various European countries towards Muslims in certain parts of the world. He started to denounce European values such as territorial nationalism and secularism. He also criticized Machiavelli for arguing separation of politics and religion. To him, nationalism was a subtle form of idolatry. He wrote that when he realized that the conception of nationalism based on the differences of race and country, appeared more prominent than the world of Islam and the Muslims were in danger of giving up the universality of their ideal in favour of narrow patriotism and false nationalism, he felt it his duty to create awareness

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 153 about the dangers of nationalism. He had started arguing for a pan-Islamic world view aimed at bringing about a sort of fraternity and unity amongst Muslims. He felt that the destiny of the Muslims in India lay in the formation of a state for themselves. He had no sympathy with any political ideology that, in the name of idealism, would seek to annihilate their cultural entity. He regarded the Muslims as an 'All-India minority' and called them a nation. He was opposed to Indian nation as the plan for domination by the majority. He supported the Communal Award. Iqbal became an advocate of the consolidated North-West Indian Muslim State. This proposal had been placed before the Nehru Committee in 1928 but was rejected. He felt that in a United India there was no future for the Muslims. As the President of the Muslim League Session in Allahabad, he said on December 29, 1930: "To base a constitution on the conception of a homogeneous India, or to apply to India the principles dictated by British democratic sentiments, is unwittingly to prepare her for a civil war." 3 (Ibid, p-450). He was of the opinion that the problem of India was not national, but international. He proposed the formation of a 'consolidated Muslim State'. In 1933, he indicated at the redistribution of the country on the basis of religious, historical and cultural affinities. He had suggested in his letter to Jinnah on May 28, 1937 that in order to solve Muslim India's problems, it would be necessary to redistribute the country and to provide one or more Muslim states with absolute majorities. He is to be considered the spiritual father of the Pakistani ideology. 18.6 Muhammad Ali Jinnah and Two-Nation theory Muhammad Ali Jinnah refused to accept Jawaharlal Nehru's notion that there are only two forces in India, British imperialism and Indian nationalism as represented by the Indian National Congress. He reminded Nehru that there was another party, the 'Muslim League' which alone had the right to represent the Muslims of India. He said in his speech on 15 October, 1937 that the majority community has clearly shown that Hindustan is clearly for the Hindus. He was convinced that the Hindu majority wanted to coerce and dominate the Muslims. Jinnah traced the origin of the idea of Pakistan to Iqbal. "The idea of Pakistan, it is well known, originated in the brain of the late Hazrat Allma Iqbal. He was the mouthpiece of the highest aspirations of his people." 4 (A.R. Desai, Social Background of Indian Nationalism, 1948, p- 391). Iqbal had said in his address to the Muslim League in 1930 "I would like to see the Punjab, North- West Frontier Province, Sind and Baluchistan, amalgamated into a single state. Self-government within the British Empire or without the British Empire, the formation of a consolidated North-West Indian Muslim State appears to me to be the final destiny of the NSOU ? GE-PS-11 154 Muslims at least the North-West India." 5 (Ibid, p-391). He wrote to Iqbal that why not the Muslims of North-West India and Bengal should be considered as nation entitled to self- determination just as other nations both in and outside India. He was convinced that the Muslims of India could never live with Hindus. He knew that Hindus would not tolerate the Muslims when the British would leave. He observed in 1940 that the British being Christian sometime forget the religious wars of their own history and today consider religion as a private and personal matter between man and God. But this can never be the fact in Islam and Hinduism. Both these have definite social codes. Addressing a historic public meeting; he said that it has always been taken for granted that the Muslims are a minority, but, they are a nation by any definition of a nation. Hindu

He said that Muslims are nation according to any definition of nation and they must have their homeland and state. He said "The problem in India is not of an inter-communal character, but manifestly of an international one, and it must be treated as such. So long as this basic and fundamental truth is not realized, any constitution that may be built will result in disaster...If the British government are really eager and sincere to secure peace and happiness of the people of this sub-continent, the only course open to us all is to allow the major nations separate homelands by dividing India into two autonomous national states."He further declared that the Hindus and the Muslims could not be welded into a single Indian nation. He said, "

Ibid, pp-391-92). The Muslims of the subcontinent responded very well to the Lahore Resolution of 1940. The demand for Pakistan presented the concept of a separate and independent Islamic state where the Muslims were absolutely free to live according to their religion. Jinnah said in an interview to London News Chronicle in 1944 that only realistic way to resolve

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 155 Hindu-Muslim differences is to divide India into two sovereign parts of Pakistan and Hindustan. Jinnah organized a demoralized group in a unified and determined whole within a short span of time. He founded a new country on the basis of an idea, that British India's Muslim needed a country of their own in which they could not only practice their religion but develop their culture and society without any hindrance. He believed that the Muslims in spite of their close proximity with the Hindus never lost their separate identity because most of the time after the arrival of Islam into South Asia, India was ruled by the Muslims. The protagonists of Pakistan rejected the scheme of a federal state for India with a central executive responsible to a central legislature retaining control over matters like defence, foreign affairs etc. They declared that a central legislature would be dominated by a Hindu majority since the Hindus formed the majority of the Indian people. Though the Muslim League had still not published any authoritative scheme giving a concrete and detailed idea of the nature of the autonomous sovereign Muslim state, individual Muslim intellectuals had evolved and published their own scheme. These schemes had one thing common regarding the basic premise that Hindus and Muslims in India were two distinct nations. Islamic ideology is the philosophy underlying Two Nation theory. Pakistan is a state founded on ideological basis and not on the territorial grounds. The Two Nation theory became a reality with distinct ideology called Pakistan ideology. Jinnah was not only a staunch believer and supporter of Two Nation theory, but also the founder of the state of Pakistan. 18.7 Congress Views The Indian National Congress, under the Liberal and Militant Nationalists like Bal Gangadhar Tilak, Bipin Chandra Pal and Aurobindo Ghose always held the view that the Indians were a homogeneous nation. Mahatma Gandhi and other leaders also continued to express the same view with an emphasis that the interests of the minority communities, depressed classes and others should be adequately safeguarded. The Congress leaders were opposed to the principle and system of separate communal electorates. However, in the interests of the Hindu-Muslim unity; they conceded the demands of the Muslims and the depressed classes for separate electorates or the reservation of seats. The Congress-League Pact of 1916 and Gandhi's concession to the Depressed Classes regarding legislative seats in 1933 were two such instances. However, the Congress had not officially considered the Indian Muslims as a separate nation. The Congress believed that the Indians as a whole constituted the Indian nation. It criticized the existing division of India into various provinces created by the British as not corresponding to the different linguistic groups. The Congress was in favour of NSOU ? GE-PS-11 156 a federal state structure for India in recognition of the linguistic and provincial-cultural heterogeneity of the Indian nation. The Working Committee of the Congress passed a resolution at its Delhi session in 1942 in which it declared that no territorial unit would be forced to join the Indian Union against its will. Gandhiji and other leaders of the Congress did not accept the Muslim League's theory that the Indian Muslims formed a nation. They did not accept religion as the determinant of a nation. Gandhiji remarked: "The two-nation theory is an untruth. The vast majority of Muslims of India are converts to Islam or are descendants of converts. They did not become a nation as soon as they became converts. A Bengali Muslim speaks the same tongue that a Bengali Hindu does, eats the same food, and has the same amusements as his Hindu neighbour. They dress alike...The same phenomenon is observable more or less in the South among the poor who constitute the masses of India...The Hindu law of inheritance governs many Muslim groups...Hindus and Muslims of India are not two nations. Those whom God has made one, man will never be able to divide." He also expressed that "We are not two nations...We in India have a common culture. In the North, Hindi and Urdu are understood by both Hindus and Moslems .In Madras, Hindus and Moslems speak Tamil ,and in Bengal they both speak Bengali and neither Hindi or Urdu. When communal riots break out, they are always provoked by incidents over cows and by religious processions. That means that it is our superstitions that create the trouble and not our separate nationalities." 7 (Ibid, p-394). He blamed the British government for the Hindu-Muslim division to a great degree. However; he was convinced that if the Indian Muslims became determined to separate, no power could prevent them from doing so. He said, "I know no non-violent method of compelling the obedience of nine crores Muslims to the will of the rest of India, however powerful a majority the rest may represent. The Muslims must have the same right of self-determination that the rest of India has. Any member may claim a division. 8 (Ibid, p- 365). 18.8 Conclusion On the basis of the two-nation theory, India for Hindus and Pakistan for Muslims, India had accepted partition much against its will and ideal simply to accommodate the interests of all. It was a mistaken concept that two different religious communities cannot live peacefully in the same land. True religion does not divide or separate humanity. Pakistan was created on the basis that Hindus and Muslims are different people and cannot live in peace. As a result of Partition of India on the basis of the two-nation theory, millions had to leave their homes because of compulsions of the circumstances. The Partition of India and creation of Pakistan on the basis of two-nation theory is an outcome of British diplomacy-"divide and rule". Indian subcontinent is being destabilized.

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 157 This unfortunate division has unleashed a plethora of misfortunes. Maulana Abul Kalam Azad preferred Hindu Muslim unity even to Swaraj. As Muhammad Iqbal said that religion does not teach to be enemy to each other. All Indians belong to one country and India is one. But when he propounded the two-nation theory, he confined himself to the narrow boundary of religious bigotry. Pakistan's advocacy of a two-nation theory explains the hostile relation between the two countries. Jinnah said that Muslims and Hindus are two major nations by any definition with distinctive culture and civilization and distinctive outlook on life. So the main thing was to split up not only a state but a nation. Jinnah discovered that Muslims and Hindus were not two communities but two nations, coexisting under British rule. He held that with the British withdrawal each nation should separately exist in its own homeland. His two-nation theory was supposed to provide the ideological and philosophical foundation to Pakistani Muslims in India. The two-nation theory is socially reactionary and was never accepted by the Congress prior to independence and has been rejected by the Indian Constitution. This theory is based on an irrational assumption that religion makes a nation. The existence of several multi-cultural, multi-religious and multi-lingual nations in the world proves that the concept of nation has no direct relation with the concept of religion. Gandhiji expressed his vehement opposition to the two-nation theory and declared that Pakistan would be born over his dead body. In his philosophy difference in religion was totally immaterial. He believed that this doctrine would ultimately mean disaster for India and Pakistan and that was proved to be true. The genesis of two-nation theory was purely political. The Hindus and Muslims have lived together for centuries. The ideology of two-nation theory began to collapse immediately after Partition. It has neither ensured peaceful coexistence nor has it resulted into Hindu- Muslim unity. 18.9 Summing Up The two-nation theory held that, Hindus and Muslims were inherently separate people and as separate nations they require their own individual states. Sir Syed Ahmed Khan's political views are: ? India was inhabited by a vast population of different races and creeds. Among these, Hindus and Muslims were the major nations on the basis of nationality, religion, culture and historical traditions. ? After the British, they could not share the political power equally. ? The Indian National Congress was not acceptable to the Muslims.

He had started arguing for a pan-Islamic world view aimed at bringing about a sort of fraternity and unity amongst Muslims. M.A. Jinnah's views: ? Jinnah believed that the Muslims are not a minority, but, they are a nation by any definition of a nation. ? The Hindus and the Muslims could not be welded into a single Indian nation. ? The Muslims of the subcontinent responded very well to the Lahore Resolution of 1940. The demand for Pakistan presented the concept of a separate and independent Islamic state where the Muslims were absolutely free to live according to their religion. ? The Two Nation theory became a reality with distinct ideology called Pakistan ideology. Jinnah was not only a staunch believer and supporter of Two Nation theory, but also the founder of the state of Pakistan. ? The Partition of India and creation of Pakistan on the basis of two-nation theory is an outcome of British diplomacy- "divide and rule". ? The Indian National Congress always held the view that the Indians were a homogeneous nation. Mahatma Gandhi and other leaders also continued to express the same view with an emphasis that the interests of the minority communities should be adequately safeguarded. The Congress believed that the Indians as a whole constituted the Indian nation. 18.10 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions: 1. Critically examine the two-nation theory. 2. It was a handiwork of the British but the political situation as it existed at that time was no less to blame. It was natural that the Colonial rulers had adopted the policy of 'divide and rule' to continue their rule in India. But the two major political parties, the Indian National Congress and the Muslim League

were also to blame as they failed to forge a unity between the Hindus and the Muslims and the British rulers took advantage of this disunity to the hilt. They even went to the extent of giving separate electorate to the Muslim minorities as provided by the Morley-Minto Reforms

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 161 Act, 1919 thus sowing the seeds of communalism in India. Hence, it can be said that the role played by the Indian National Congress, the Muslim League and the British colonial rulers shaped the course of independence in the sub-continent. As rulers, the British faced the increasing wrath of the Indians who fought them both peacefully and with arms. Pressurized thus, the British rulers decided to give independence to India but with partition of the country into two independent States- India and Pakistan. What follows is an account of the negotiations between the British rulers and the Indian people for the independence and partition of India. 19.3 Demand for Transfer of Power India achieved Independence under the Indian Independence Act; 1947. The country was divided, partitioned on the basis of the two-nation theory. For over a long period Muslims and non-Muslims had lived as neighbours and friends, the British imperialism forced them to raise differences around themselves and such differences were exploited by the British rulers. Partition was the most tragic outcome of the age old Hindu-Muslim rift. The Congress succeeded in building up nationalist consciousness that exerts pressure on the British to quit India but failed to integrate the Muslim into

Simla Conference Any account of the political developments must begin with the Simla Conference which Lord Wavell called in June 1945. The importance of this conference consists not so much in any tangible results achieved as in marking the end of the stalemate in Indian politics. Throughout the period of the war the Government had concentrated on the war effort and postponed even the most pressing problems for consideration till after victory had been won. Lord Wavell felt that the tasks of the post-war period would be rendered easier if a working arrangement in the political sphere could be reached during the period of war. An interesting feature of the proposals made at the conference was that they were based upon a composite government at the Centre, held together on the principle of cooperation in the war effort. The failure of the Simla Conference was no isolated episode. In the summer of 1945 the will for a settlement was strong among all parties. The desire for a share in the practical control of administration was common to them all. One factor in the situation which was not fully taken into account at the time of Simla Conference was the unexpectedly early end of the war with Japan. The sudden end of the war precipitated a host of problems which NSOU ? GE-PS-11 163 had been held in suspense while the war lasted, and the Government was not ready to solve them. It was clear that a purely official Government of the old pattern could not possibly tackle these problems with any hope of success and this made a political settlement particularly urgent. The general elections which were held in India during 1945-46, were the first practical consequence of the breakdown of the Simla Conference. The results were not unexpected. The Muslim League swept the polls in Muslim constituencies practically all over the country, the only exception being the N.W.F.P.; and the Congress did the same in other constituencies. The Muslims and the non-Muslims were thus revealed as arrayed in two opposite ranks. Jinnah had realized that it was disastrous for the League to leave the administration in Congress hands. The Ibid, p-502). The surprising speed and success with which this was accomplished must be attributed to the method adopted by Lord Mountbatten in his negotiations. Briefly; this may be called as the method of open diplomacy. In the past the British Government had proceeded on the basis of unilateral pronouncements; it declared what it would be pleased to grant; the political parties could take or leave it. It is not surprising that in most cases they preferred to leave it. The technique Mountbatten adopted was to take political leaders into his confidence and by persuasion obtain their concurrence to his proposals. The British Government's statement of June 3 was prepared on this principle. Since both the parties had already accepted its essential features, they could not refuse to implement it. There still NSOU ? GE-PS-11 165 remains the problem of partition to be solved and more difficult to be implemented. But in the process of working out the plan of division in detail Lord Mountbatten has been adopting the same technique of open diplomacy with remarkable success. The grant of Dominion Status, it has been explained, was forced upon the British Government for reasons connected with the Transfer of Power. Moreover, the Dominion Status is not a political condition which conforms to a rigid and definite pattern. There was another hope that after the British withdrawal differences would be resolved and a free India built jointly by both Hindus and Muslims. But communalism was no longer merely sustained by the British, now it was even defying the British. Another unreal belief was that Partition was temporary; it was reversible once communal feelings subsided. Gandhiji told that Pakistan could not exist for long if people refused to accept Partition in their hearts. Nehru wrote to Cariappa: 'But of one thing I am convinced that ultimately there will be a united and strong India. We have often to go through the valley of the shadow before we reach the sun-lit mountain tops.' 4 ( Ibid, p-502). The most unreal belief was that Partition would be peaceful without any riot and there was also no planning regarding transfer of population. Gandhiji

So they started to find ways for an amicable transfer of power. For this purpose, they sent a Cabinet Mission to India to negotiate the transfer of power. Although the Congress regarded the Cabinet Mission plan as against the creation of Pakistan, the Muslim League thought otherwise. It refused to take part in the interim government, a result of the failure of the Simla conference, headed by the Congress in 1946 despite efforts made by Lord Wavell. The League demanded the abolition of the Constituent Assembly and stuck to its demand for a separate State for the Muslims. Then came the Mountbatten Plan which was in favour of creating two dominions- India and Pakistan. Both the Congress and the Muslim League accepted the Plan as it ensured the creation of two independent dominions. Two Constituent Assemblies were created for two dominions. Nehru became the head of the Indian dominion and Jinnah of the Pakistan dominion.

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 168 Mountbatten became the new Viceroy and 15 th August, 1947 was fixed as the date of independence of the Indian dominion. A new State, Pakistan came into being on 14 th August, 1947. The Two-Nation theory succeeded to divide a country of continental proportions into two independent States but at a great human cost. On the other hand, the British colonial rulers succeeded politically in the sense that acrimony created between the Hindus and the Muslims during the British rule still lingers and stands in the way of cordial relations between the two neighbours. 19.9 Summing Up ? It sets out the framework and principal functions of the NSOU ? GE-PS-11 171 organs of the Government within the state and declares the principles by these organs must operate. The Constitution has devised a structure of power relationship with checks and balances and limits are placed on the powers of every authority or instrumentality under the Constitution. The constitution is the supreme or fundamental law of the country which not only defines the framework of the basic political principles but also establishes what the different government institutions should do in terms of procedure, powers and duties. According to KC Wheare, 'Constitutionalism means government according to rule as opposed to the arbitrary government, it means government limited by the terms of a Constitution, not government limited only by the desires and capabilities of those who exercise power'. Constitutionalism is different from 'constitution'. A country may have the constitution but not necessarily constitutionalism. For example, a country with a dictatorship, where dictator's word is the law can be said to have a constitution but not constitutionalism. Constitutionalism recognizes the need for the government but insists upon limitations being placed upon governmental powers. Indian Constitution was enacted by the Constituent Assembly which had been elected for undivided India. It was constituted under the scheme formulated by the Cabinet Mission plan. The Constituent Assembly sat for the first time on December 9, 1946, and started a historical journey which saw India attaining independence, deciding on its national flag, national insignia, national anthem; and ultimately adoption of the constitution which made our country a democratic republic. The architects of Indian constitution went through all the then existing major Constitutions of the world before drafting their own and as Dr. Ambedkar observed that they tried to accommodate the best possible and time-tested features of each of them to the requirement of the country, the largest influence being exercised on them by the Government of India Act, 1935. The Constitution of India was adopted on 26 November 1949 by the Constituent Assembly and it came into effect on 26 January 1950.

20.3 Need for a Constituent Assembly

The political system of any country is known by its constitution. The hopes and aspirations of the people of any country are reflected through the constitution. In all democratic countries, the constitution is recognized as supreme. It is regarded as fundamental law of the land. In every country making of constitution has gone through a definite process. This process varies from country to country. India adopted the process of making her constitution by a Constituent Assembly. The concept of a Constituent Assembly in order to draft the constitution of the independent India had always been linked with the growth of India's Nationalist movement. The idea of a Constituent Assembly, by which Indians themselves might frame a constitution of their own, was implicit in the opposition to the 1919 Act. In 1922, a joint meeting of members of the two houses of the Central Legislature was held at Simla at the initiative of Mrs. Annie Besant, which decided to call a convention for the NSOU ? GE-PS-11 172 framing of a new constitution. Another conference attended by members of the Central and Provincial Legislatures was held in 1923 outlined essential elements of a constitution. A National Convention was called on 24 April, under the president ship of Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, drafted the 'Commonwealth of India Bill'. This bill was submitted to a committee of the All Parties Conference held in January 1925 which was presided over by Mahatma Gandhi. Finally the draft was submitted to a Drafting Committee. The bill was sent to one member of the Labour Party and found wide support in the Labour Party. This bill was a major effort by the Indians to prepare a constitutional system by peaceful and constitutional means.

20.4 Motilal Nehru Resolution The adoption of Motilal Nehru Resolution in 1924 and 1925 on the National Demand was a historic event as the Central Legislature for the first time supported the demand that the future constitution should be drafted by the Indians themselves. At the Bombay session of the Congress on 17 May 1927, Motilal Nehru had introduced a resolution calling upon the Congress Working Committee to frame a constitution for India in consultation with the elected members of the Central and Provincial Legislatures and leaders of political parties. An All Party Conference organized at Bombay on 19 May 1928 appointed a committee under the chairmanship of Motilal Nehru to determine the principles of the Constitution of India. The report of the committee submitted on 10 August 1929 became famous as the Nehru Report that was the first attempt by the Indians to frame a fullfledged constitution for the country. The Report not only reflected the contemporary nationalist opinion but also an outline of the draft constitution for the country. The draft constitution prepared by the committee was based on the principle of Dominion Status with a parliamentary form of government. This document emphasized on popular sovereignty, fundamental rights, federal system, reservation of seats for minorities in the legislatures for a limited period.

20.5 Gandhi's Demand for India's right to Frame a Constitution Indians, under the leadership of Indian National Congress, could never accept that British Parliament would frame a constitution for India. Gandhiji for the first time made the demand for India's right to frame a constitution in 1922. He firmly expressed the view that Indians alone would form their constituent assembly. He wrote in Young India in 1922 that "Swaraj will not be a free gift of the British Parliament. It will be a declaration of India's full self-expression."The demand was ignored by the British Government. This was made clear by them when in 1927 it appointed Simon Commission to review the working of the Government of India Act,1919.

This Commission had no Indian member,

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 173 thus on the day of 3rd February, 1928 when Simon Commission arrived in India a countrywide hartal was observed with 'Go back Simon' slogan. In 1929, Congress session at Lahore, a resolution for Purna Swaraj was adopted. Since then the demand of Congress to have a constituent assembly constituted only by Indians began becoming stronger. The British Government issued a White Paper prior to enacting the Government of India Act, 1935. In 1934 the Congress Working Committee adopted a resolution opposing this White Paper. The resolution also mentioned that the most desirable alternative to this White Paper was a constitution framed by a constituent assembly formed on the basis of universal adult franchise. The same demand was raised in the Congress session held at Faizpur in 1936, in the Haripura session held in 1938 and in the Congress session held at Tripuri in 1939. In 1937, the ruling Congress in the provincial legislatures adopted a resolution, demanding an independent constituent assembly constituted by Indians. In 1938 Jawaharlal Nehru made the announcement that the basic demand of the Congress was to have a constitution drafted by a constituent assembly, free from external control and established on the basis of universal adult franchise. The White Paper issued after the third Round Table Conference outlined the British Government's proposal for constitutional reforms in India. In June 1934 the Congress Working Committee declared that the only satisfactory alternative to the White Paper was a constitution drawn up by a Constituent Assembly elected on the basis of adult suffrage. The Working Committee of the All India Congress Committee at its meeting held at Patna on 6-7 December adopted a resolution rejecting the scheme of Indian Constitutional Reforms as recommended in the report of the Joint Parliamentary Committee and reiterated the view that the only alternative to the scheme was a constitution drawn up by a Constituent Assembly. The Congress adopted a resolution at its Lucknow Session in April 1936 in which it declared that no constitution imposed by an outside authority shall be acceptable to India; it must be framed by an Indian Constituent Assembly elected by the people of India. The Congress had contested elections to the Provincial Legislatures on the issues like complete rejection of the Act of 1935 and the demand for a Constituent Assembly and following a victory in the election it adopted a resolution asserting the voters' approval of the demand for a Constituent Assembly. After the outbreak of the war in 1939, the demand for a Constituent Assembly was reiterated by the Congress Working Committee on 14 September, 1939. Gandhiji wrote in the Harijan that Constituent Assembly alone can produce a constitution for the people which fully represents the will of the people. 20.6 Cripps Mission and the Cabinet Mission In March, 1942, the British Government, sent Sir Stafford Cripps to India to consider the demand for a constituent assembly for India. In one of its recommendation the Cripps NSOU ? GE-PS-11 174 Mission recognized the Indian demand for a sovereign constituent assembly for the first time. After the failure of the Cripps Mission ,no steps were taken for the solution of this problem until the end of war in Europe in May,1945.With the new Labour Government coming into power in England, its Indian policy was announced by Lord Wavell. He affirmed the Government's intention to convene a constitution making body as soon as possible. The new Prime Minister of Britain, Clement Attlee made a historic declaration when he gave recognition to Indians' right to self-determination and acceptance of Indian demand to frame independently a constitution. The British Government appointed a three-member Cabinet Mission, which came to India on 24 th March, 1946 and submitted its proposals on 16 th May, 1946.The Cabinet Mission proposed an outline of the state structure to be built after transfer of power and also proposed formation of an interim all-party government. Moreover, it was proposed that a constituent assembly comprising Indians alone would be constituted to frame a constitution. The proposed constituent assembly would have 292 members from the provinces, 93 from the Princely States, 3 from Chief Commissioner's provinces and 1 from Baluchistan. 1 (Amal Kumar Mukhopadhyay, A Journey across the Indian Constitution, 2017, p-15). The total number of members of the assembly would be 389. Members of provincial legislatures would elect from among them members of the constituent assembly, following the system of proportional representation. The process through which representatives of the Princely States would be members of the constituent assembly would be decided on in consultation with the native rulers. The proposals of the Cabinet Mission were accepted by the Muslim League on 6 th June, 1946 and by the Congress on 25 th June, 1946. Elections to the constituent assembly were held in July,1946.The Congress had won 204 seats out of 214 General seats and had got the support of 4 elected Sikh members. Muslim League captured 73 out of 78 allotted seats. 2 (Ibid, p-16). Meanwhile, the Muslim League rejected the proposals of the Cabinet Mission and on 14 th November, 1946, it took the decision to boycott the newly formed Constituent Assembly. Thus, before transfer of power, the Muslim League members never joined the sessions of Constituent Assembly. After partition the elected representatives of the Muslim League became members of the Constituent Assembly of Pakistan.

20.7 The Constituent Assembly Members of the Constituent Assembly were not directly elected by the people on the basis of universal adult franchise. The provincial legislatures, the members of which elected the majority members of the Constituent Assembly, were not elected on the basis of universal adult franchise but on the basis of restricted franchise as those who had minimum educational or property qualifications had their right to vote in elections to the provincial legislatures. The important Congress leaders like Nehru, Maulana Azad, Vallabh Bhai Patel and

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 175 Dr.Rajendra Prasad did not publicly admit this limitation of the Constituent Assembly but while drafting the rules on transacting business in the Assembly Rule No.7 was made ,proposing that only when two-thirds majority of members of Constituent Assembly had resolved, it could be dissolved. 3 (Ibid, p-17). Thus, though under the initiative and order of the British Government the Constituent Assembly was formed, they ensured that the British Government could not dominate it. The Congress was very much eager to ensure representation of all classes of people in the Constituent Assembly. It was directed that the provincial Congress must ensure nomination of the recognized leaders and adequate minority representation in the Constituent Assembly. The Constituent Assembly became fully representative of the states and provinces in India and sovereign of all external authority. The first session was held on 9 th December, 1946 and last session was held on 24 th January, 1950.The Constituent Assembly had eleven sessions. It adopted the Constitution on 26 th November, 1949. The historic Objectives Resolution envisioned a federal set up with the residuary powers vested in the autonomous units and people's sovereign power.Justice, social, economic and political; equality of status and of opportunity ;freedom of thought, expression, belief, faith, worship were to be guaranteed to all people along with adequate safeguards to minorities, backward, tribal areas and depressed classes. While defending the objective resolution, Nehru argued strongly for democracy and socialism. He defended democracy as the most appropriate system for India. Socialism also would bring about economic democracy to India. He believed that political independence must be supported by democratic governance and socialistic vision. He was critical of the princely states that were reluctant to accept democracy. As a true democrat he had no doubt that socialism was the ultimate solution for India's poverty. Thus the Resolution gave to the Assembly its guiding principles and the philosophy that was to disseminate its task of constitution making. It was finally adopted by the Assembly on 22 January1947 that later became the form of the Preamble to the constitution. The members of the Constituent Assembly were unanimous for a strong state despite being supportive of India's pluralistic social structure. The Cabinet Mission articulated a constitutional framework by taking into account the principle of accommodating diverse groups. Those who were critical of the Emergency provisions also defended a strong centralized state to strengthen the unity and integrity of the country. The fear of disorder was the most critical factor in favour of the arguments for a centralized state. In 1939, Dr. B. R. Ambedkar was in favour of a federal form of government for India with socio-cultural diversity. By 1946, he expressed a radically different view by saying that 'I like a strong united Centre, much stronger than the Centre we had created under the Government of India Act, 1935.' 4 (Bidyut Chakrabarty and Rajendra Pandey, Modern Indian Political Thought, 2009, p- 363). Nehru also argued in favour of a strong state when he expressed that a weak central authority would be antithetical to the interest of the country because it would be incapable of ensuring peace. Thus, federalism did not appear to be an appropriate structure of

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 176 government in the light of serious threats to the existence of the Indian nation. The framers of the constitution recommended a strong center in the making of the constitution. 20.8 Making the Constitution The Constituent Assembly appointed a number of committees to deal with problems of framing the constitution. These included the Union Constitution Committee, Union Powers Committee, Committees on Fundamental Rights, Minorities and others. These committees were headed by Nehru; Patel worked hard and produced valuable reports. The first draft was prepared in October 1947 by the Advisory branch of the office of the Constituent Assembly under Sir B. N. Rau. The Constituent Assembly on 29 August 1947 appointed the Drafting Committee with Dr. B. R. Ambedkar as the Chairman to scrutinize the draft of the constitution. The most eminent members were Sir Alladi Krishnaswami Ayer, Hriday Nath Kunjru, K. Shantanam, M.R. Jayakar, Satchidananda Sinha, Gopalswami Ayengar and K.M. Muni. Every provision of the draft of the constitution was minutely observed at the general session of the Constituent Assembly. The Assembly arrived at all of its decisions following the principle of consensus. So the Assembly followed a democratic process in decision making. Though the Congress enjoyed a majority in the Assembly, it always accepted different opinions. The members could freely express their diverse opinions. The Constituent Assembly had to make compromises also in certain cases. When there were strong differences among the two groups, compromise was made in issues, for example, relating to national anthem and official language. Among the members, there was a group of modernists and at the same time, a group by the traditionalists also. They chose a midway between parliamentary sovereignty and judicial supremacy. Moreover, federal system was adopted with some unitary features and the assembly adopted both rigid and flexible constitution. While introducing the Draft Constitution in the assembly for consideration on 4 November 1948, Dr. B.R. Ambedkar replied to some common criticisms of the Draft, observed, one likes to ask whether there can be anything new in a constitution framed at this hour in the history of the world. More than hundred years have rolled over when the first written constitution was drafted. It has been followed by many countries reducing their constitutions to writing. What the scope of a constitution should be has long been settled. Similarly, what are the fundamentals of a constitution are recognized all over the world. Given these facts, all constitutions in their main provisions must look similar. The only new things, if there can be any, are the variations made to remove the faults and to accommodate it to the needs of the country. As to the accusation that the Draft Constitution has produced a good part of the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935, I make no apologies. There is nothing to be ashamed of in borrowing. It involves no plagiarism. Nobody holds any patent rights in the fundamental ideas of a constitution. 5 (Subhas Kashyap, Our Constitution, 1994, pp-39-40).

NSOU ? GE-PS-11 177 The consideration of the Draft Constitution was completed during 15 November 1948-17 October 1949. The Preamble was the last to be adopted. Thereafter, the Drafting Committee prepared the final draft and placed it before the Assembly. The second reading of the constitution was completed on 16 November 1949. The Constitution was finally signed by members of the Constituent Assembly on 24 January 1950. The Constitution was the result of a great deal of mutual accommodation, compromise and consensus. The Constitution rejected British rule, but not the institutions that had developed during British rule. The making of constitution and institution- building being a dynamic process, it did not come to an end on 26 November 1949 when the people of India adopted the constitution. The Constitution is a prime evidence of the commitment to constitutionalism and rule of law on the part of the framers of the constitution despite serious difficulties due to partition. In the Constituent Assembly, no attempt was made to force decision. The making of the Indian Constitution was a difficult exercise not only because of the historical context but also due to the social structure of India. The majority in the Assembly was defensive as a result of rising violence immediately after partition. The founding fathers were obsessed with their own notion of integrated national life. Dr. Rajendra Prasad declared, 'personally I do not attach any importance to the label which may be attached to it-whether you call it a Federal Constitution or a Unitary Constitution or by any other name. It makes no difference so long as the Constitution serves our purpose.' 6 (Bidyut Chakrabarty and Rajendra Pandey, op, cit, p-367). The Indian Constitution is regarded as the fundamental law of the country. Naturally; none of the political organs of the Indian State can violate this fundamental law. It is the prime responsibility of the judiciary to see that neither the legislature nor the executive ever overrides the Constitution. The Supreme Court held in the judgment of the case Keshavananda Bharati vs. State of Kerala that Parliament cannot amend the 'basic structure' of the Constitution. Thus it was established by this judgment that Parliament does not have unrestrained power of amending the Constitution. This proves that in India the Constitution is supreme. 20.9 The Preamble The Preamble to the Constitution of India declares the people of India as the architect of the Constitution with the words 'We the people of India'. Therefore, the Indian Constitution declares itself as the making of the people. India wanted to have a sovereign and independently made Constitution and thus the Preamble declares the people of India as the maker of the Constitution. This declaration also ensures the principle of popular sovereignty; the Constitution makes it clear that the people of India are sovereign in the Indian political system. Sovereignty of the people is the fundamental basis of democracy, it may be said that, by recognizing the people as the maker of the Constitution, the Indian Constitution has expressed its commitment to the democratic ideal. Thus, by establishing the sovereignty of NSOU ? GE-PS-11 178 the people, the Preamble implies that the powers which are given to the government in India are sourced not from the states or any section of the society or the former rulers but from the people of India. The Preamble not only ensures a democratic polity but also consolidates the unity and integrity of the nation. The ideal of democratic republic guarantee the people the right of choosing their representatives to foster democratic governance in the country. By making India a republic, the framers of the Constitution ensures an elected head of the State instead of a hereditary Monarchy. The Preamble not only presupposes political democracy but also envisions social democracy. Thus, the Preamble mentions social, economic and political justice, freedom of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship and also promises equality of status and opportunity and maintaining fraternity among all. 20.10 Conclusion The Constituent Assembly drafted the Constitution in the context of serious uncertainty especially in view of the partition. The Constitution remains vital in India's governance. It is substantially different in terms of spirit from the Government of India Act, 1935. Although the basic structure remains unchanged, the Constitution has grown in its size as it is amended to address the needs of the changing time. The Constitution is successful in inculcating a sense of loyalty among large sections of the Indian society. The institutions like the Parliament, the Executive and the Election Commission derive their strength from the provisions of the Constitution. Here lies the validity of India's Constitution as a living document which remains meaningful and relevant even after several decades since it was inaugurated. 20.11 Summing Up ? To arouse political consciousness, to inculcate nationalism, to expose colonial rule, to 'preach disloyalty' was no easy task, for there had existed since 1870 Section 124A of the Indian Penal Code according to which 'whoever attempts to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government established by law in British India' was to be punished with transportation for life or for any term or with imprisonment upto three years. This clause was, moreover, later supplemented with even more strident measures. Indian journalists adopted several clever strategems and evolved a distinctive style of writing to remain outside the reach of the law. Since Section 124A excluded writings of persons whose loyalty to the Government was undoubted, they invariably prefaced their vitriolic writing with effusive sentiments of loyalty to the Government and the Queen. Another strategem was to publish anti-imperialist extracts from London-based socialist and Irish newspapers or letters from radical British citizens knowing that the Indian Government could not discriminate against Indians by taking action against them without touching the offending Britishers. Sometimes the extract from the British newspaper would be taken without quotation marks and acknowledgement of the source, thus teasing the British- Indian bureaucracy into contemplating or taking action which would have to be given up once the real source of the comment became known. For example, a sympathetic treatment of the Russian terrorist activities against Tsarism would be published in such away that the reader would immediately draw a parallel between the Indian Government and the Revolutionary Terrorists of Bengal and Maharashtra. The officials would later discover that it was an extract from the Times, London, or some such other British newspaper. Often the radical expose would take the form of advice and warning to the Government as if from a well-wisher, as if the writer's main purpose was to save the authorities from their own follies! B.G. Tilak and Motilal Ghosh were experts at this form of writing.

The Civil Disobedience Movement of 1930-31, then, marked a critically important stage in the progress of the anti-imperialist struggle. The number of people who went to jail was estimated at over 90,000 — more than three times the figure for the Non-Cooperation Movement of 1920-22. Imports of cloth from Britain had fallen by half; other imports like cigarettes had suffered a similar fate. Government income from liquor excise and land revenue had been affected. Elections to the Legislative Assembly had been effectively boycotted. A vast variety of social groups had been politicized on the side of Indian nationalism — if urban elements like merchants and shopkeepers and students were more active in Tamil Nadu and Punjab, and in cities in general, peasants had come to the forefront in Gujarat, U.P., Bengal, Andhra, and Bihar, and tribals in the Central Provinces, Maharashtra, Karnataka and Bengal. Workers had not been missing from the battle either — they joined numerous mass demonstrations in Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras and were in the forefront in Sholapur. The participation of Muslims in the Civil Disobedience Movement was certainly nowhere near that in 1920-22. The appeals of communal leaders to stay away, combined with active Government encouragement of communal dissension to counter the forces of nationalism, had their effect. Still, the participation of Muslims was not insignificant, either. Their participation in the North-West Frontier Province was, as is well known, overwhelming. In Bengal, middle class Muslim participation was quite important in Senhatta, Tripura, Gaibandha, Bagura and Noakhali and in Dacca, Muslim students and shopkeepers as well as people belonging to the lower classes extended support to the movement. Middle and upper class Muslim women were also active. The Muslim weaving community in Bihar and in Delhi and Lucknow, the lower classes of Muslims were effectively mobilized as were many others in different parts of the country. NSOU ? GE-PS-11 63 8.6 Conclusion The support that the movement had garnered from the poor and the illiterate, both in the cities and in the villages, was remarkable indeed. Their participation was reflected even in the government statistics of jail goers — and jail-going was only one of the many forms of participation. The Inspector-General of Police in Bengal, E.J. Lowman, expressed the general official bewilderment when he noted: 'I had no idea that the Congress organization could enlist the sympathy and support of such ignorant and uncultivated people.' For Indian women, the movement was the most liberating experience to date

The move towards the formation of a socialist party was made in the jails during 1930-31 and 1932-34 by a group of young Congressmen who were disenchanted with Gandhian strategy and leadership and attracted by socialist ideology. Many of them were active in the youth movement of the late 1920s. In the jails they studied and discussed Marxian and other socialist ideas. Attracted by Marxism, communism and Soviet Union, they did not find themselves in agreement with the prevalent political line of the CPI. Many of them were groping towards an alternative. Ultimately they came together and formed the Congress Socialist Party (CSP) at Bombay in October 1934 under the leadership of Jayaprakash Narayan, Acharya Narendra Dev and Minoo Masani. From the beginning, all the Congress socialists were agreed upon four basic propositions: that the primary struggle in India was the national struggle for freedom and that nationalism was necessary stage on the way to socialism; that socialists must work inside the National Congress because it was the primary body leading the national struggle and, as Acharya Narendra Dev put it in 1934, it would be a suicidal policy for us to cut ourselves off from the national movement that the Congress undoubtedly represents; that they must give the Congress and the national movement a socialist direction; and that to achieve this objective they must organize the workers and peasants in their class organizations, wage struggles for their economic demands and make them the social base of the national struggle. The CSP from the beginning assigned itself the task of both transforming the Congress and of strengthening it. The task of transforming the Congress was understood in two senses. One was the ideological sense. Congressmen were to be gradually persuaded to adopt a socialist vision of independent India and a more radical pro-labour and pro-peasant stand on current economic issues. This ideological and programmatic transformation was, however, to be seen not as an event but as a process. As Jayaprakash Narayan repeatedly told his followers in 1934: 'We are placing before the Congress a programme and we want the Congress to accept it. If the Congress does not accept it, we do not say we are going out of the Congress. If today we fail, tomorrow we will try and if tomorrow we fail, we will try again.' The transformation of the Congress was also seen in an organizational sense, that is, in terms of changes in its leadership at the top. Initially, the task was interpreted as the displacement of the existing leadership, which was declared to be incapable of developing the struggle of the masses to a

Initially, the task was interpreted as the displacement of the existing leadership, which was declared to be incapable of developing the struggle of the masses to a higher level. The CSP was to develop as the nucleus of the alternative socialist leadership of the Congress. As the Meerut thesis of the CSP put it in 1935, the task was to 'win the anti-imperialist elements in the NSOU ? GE-PS-11 68 Congress away from its present bourgeois leadership and to bring them under the leadership of revolutionary socialism.' This perspective was, however, soon found to be unrealistic and was abandoned in favour of a 'composite' leadership in which socialists would be taken into the leadership at all levels. The notion of alternate Left leadership of the Congress and the national movement came up for realization twice at Tripuri in 1939 and at Ramgarh in 1940. But when it came to splitting the Congress on a Left- Right basis and giving the Congress an executive left-wing leadership, the CSP (as also the CPI) shied away. Its leadership (as also CPI's) realized that such an effort would not only weaken the national movement but isolate the Left from the mainstream, that the Indian people could be mobilized into a movement only under Gandhiji's leadership and that, in fact, there was at the time no alternative to Gandhiji's leadership. However, unlike Jawaharlal Nehru, the leadership of the CSP, as also of other Left groups and parties, was not able to fully theorize or internalize this understanding and so it went back again and again to the notion of alternative leadership. The CSP was, however, firmly well grounded in the reality of the Indian situation. Therefore, it never carried its opposition to the existing leadership of the Congress to breaking point. Whenever it came to the crunch, it gave up its theoretical position and adopted a realistic approach close to that of Jawaharlal Nehru's. This earned it the condemnation of the other left- wing groups and parties — for example, in 1939, they were chastised for their refusal to support Subhas Bose in his confrontation with Gandhiji and the Right wing of the Congress. At such moments, the socialists defended themselves and revealed flashes of an empiricist understanding of Indian reality. Jayaprakash Narayan, for example, said in 1939 after Tripuri: 'We Socialists do not want to create factions in the Congress nor do we desire to displace the old leadership of the Congress and to establish rival leadership. We are only concerned with the policy and programme of the Congress. We only want to influence the Congress decisions. Whatever our differences with the old leaders, we do not want to quarrel with them. We all want to march shoulder to shoulder in our common fight against imperialism.' From the beginning the CSP leaders were divided into three broad ideological currents: the Marxian, the Fabian and the current influenced by Gandhiji. This would not have been a major weakness — in fact it might have been a

This would not have been a major weakness — in fact it might have been source of strength— for a broad socialist party which was a movement. But the CSP was already a part, and a cadre-based party at that, within a movement that was the National Congress. Moreover, the Marxism of the 1930s was incapable of accepting as legitimate such diversity of political currents on the Left. The result was a confusion which plagued the CSP till the very end. The party's basic ideological differences were papered over for a long time because of the personal bonds of friendship and a sense of comradeship among most of the founding leaders of the party, the acceptance of Acharya Narendra Dev and Jayaprakash Narayan as its senior leaders, and its commitment to nationalism and socialism.

There was a fundamental change in the nature of Indian nationalism under extremist leadership due to their forceful articulation of the demand for 'Swaraj' and use of more radical methods than those of the moderates. Their concept of nationalism was emotionally charged and based on rich interpretation of Indian religious traditions. The Extremist leaders tried to reorient Indian religious traditions to worldly life and link them with the national liberation struggle. Aurobindo Ghose reinterpreted Vedanta philosophy, which advocated unity of man and God and based his concept of nationalism on it.

PREFACE In a bid to standardise higher education in the country, the University Grants Commission (UGC) has introduced Choice Based Credit System (CBCS) based on five types of courses viz. core, discipline specific, generic elective, ability and skill enhancement for graduate students of all programmes at Honours level. This brings in the semester pattern, which finds efficacy in sync with credit system, credit transfer, comprehensive continuous assessments and a graded pattern of evaluation. The objective is to offer learners ample flexibility to choose from a wide gamut of courses, as also to provide them lateral mobility between various educational institutions in the country where they can carry acquired credits. I am happy to note that the University has been accredited by NAAC with grade 'A'. UGC (Open and Distance Learning Programmes and Online Learning Programmes) Regulations, 2020 have mandated compliance with CBCS for U.G. programmes for all the HEIs in this mode. Welcoming this paradigm shift in higher education, Netaji Subhas Open University (NSOU) has resolved to adopt CBCS from the academic session 2021-22 at the Under Graduate Degree Programme level. The present syllabus, framed in the spirit of syllabi recommended by UGC, lays due stress on all aspects envisaged in the curricular framework of the apex body on higher education. It will be imparted to learners over the six semesters of the Programme. Self Learning Materials (SLMs) are the mainstay of Student Support Services (SSS) of an Open University. From a logistic point of view, NSOU has embarked upon CBCS presently with SLMs in English / Bengali. Eventually, the English version SLMs will be translated into Bengali too, for the benefit of learners. As always, all of our teaching faculties contributed in this process. In addition to this we have also requisitioned the services of best academics in each domain in preparation of the new SLMs. I am sure they will be of commendable academic support. We look forward to proactive feedback from all stakeholders who will participate in the teaching-learning based on these study materials. It has been a very challenging task well executed, and I congratulate all concerned in the preparation of these SLMs. I wish the venture a grand success. N It aims to understand the nature of Feminist theories, which emerged from feminist movements. N It helps to know the historical overview of the waves of feminist movements. 1.2 Introduction There can be no singular definition of feminist ideology that can be used to explain the varied trends of thought that have developed over years deriving inspiration from equally varied sources. However, to begin with, feminism can broadly be presented as a system of thought that challenges the social privileging of the male point of view and seeks to establish the right of women to be treated as 9 10 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 equals of men politically, economically and culturally. Thus, the ideology of patriarchy, which recognises men as supreme at both social and familial levels has been the main target of attack of all kinds of feminist movements. Feminist theories, which emerge from feminist movements, aim to understand the nature of gender inequality by examining women's social roles and lived experiences. These theories have been incorporated in a variety of disciplines in order to respond to issues concerning gender. Feminist movements are concerned with a wide range of issues namely, woman's right to own property and vote, getting same pay as men for the same work, gaining control over their own bodies by fighting for reproductive rights through the use of contraception and abortion and so on. It is obvious that this philosophy with all its ramifications was not shaped in a day; it developed over time responding to the contemporary socio-political, economic and cultural trends and visions implicating women's subordination in some way or the other. Some scholars consider feminist campaigns to be a main force behind major historical societal changes for women's rights, particularly in the West. Although feminist advocacy is, and has been, mainly focused on women's rights, some feminists, viz., Bell Hooks (Gloria Jean Watkins, an American author, professor, feminist, and social activist better known by her pen name Bell Hooks) argue for the inclusion of men's liberation within its aims because they believe that men are also affected by traditional gender roles. Now let us take a historical overview of the waves of feminist movements. Feminist movements, even as they developed in waves or phases, display a great deal of overlap among themselves. The most fruitful method to explore the concept will be through a discussion of the broadly identified trends. From Plato to Indian sastrakars, men have defined the ideals of womanhood and social and familial roles of women, but it is from the time when women themselves began to speak about their goals and roles that the term feminism becomes meaningful. 1.3 First Phase: Liberal Feminism The group that is known as liberal feminist was the first to foreground the idea of feminism in literary and social practice. At the theoretical level, the liberal feminists analyse gender inequality in terms of divergent processes of socialization, sway of superstition, irrationality and so on. Their preferred solution lies in legal reform, affecting change in the structure of values through sustained propaganda etc. The essential thrust of this theoretical tendency is individualism.

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 11 It was in the backdrop of Enlightenment around seventeenth and eighteenth centuries that the earliest sounds of feminism (not all theorists would choose to apply the term 'feminism' to this phase, for them it could at best be called 'proto-feminist) were heard in United States and Great Britain when women started demanding legal equality, such as the right to be treated as full individuals endowed with the capability to make choices of life, such as the right to hold property and to choose their husbands. In most crucial sense, the status of women in these countries was very similar to that of children who were not considered capable of making rational choices. As only the householder could cast a vote, the restriction on property right kept most women disenfranchised. 1.3.1 Important personalities linked to Liberal Feminism Judith Sargent Murray in her landmark essay On the Equality of the Sexes (1790) articulated her thoughts on women's rights which were worked upon, expanded and elaborated by other feminist writers as the century rolled on. Mary Wollstonecraft, one of the early feminists, heavily influenced by Rousseau and French political thinkers, in her immensely influential book A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792), argued that women are not naturally inferior to men, but appear to be so only because they lack education. She suggested that both men and women should be treated as rational beings and imagined a social order founded on reason. By the turn of the century similar ideas started pouring in. For instance, Frances Wright in her Views of Society and Manners in America (1821) brought her to public attention as a critic of the new nation by advocating women's full political inclusion. In the contemporary period one of the most important male philosophers to support this wave of women's movement was John Stuart Mill (1806 –1873). Similar to Mary Wollstonecraft, he compared sexual inequality to slavery, arguing that husbands are often just as abusive as masters. In his book The Subjection of Women, Mill argued that sex inequality inhibited societal progress and believed that both sexes should have equal rights under the law. He also argued that until conditions of equality exist, no one can possibly assess the natural differences between women and men, distorted as they have been. 1.3.2 Early achievements in a few countries USA: Increasingly, more feminists began to see that obtaining voting rights was perhaps among the most important steps before other rights could be secured. But it took immense activism almost over half a century for women to gain voting rights in USA. Through stepping stones like Seneca Falls

12 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 Convention (1848), National Women's Right Convention (1850) National American Woman Suffrage Association (NAWSA) was ultimately formed, women had specific laws sanctioning their rights to vote. In 1920, after nearly 50 years of intense activism, women were finally granted the right to vote and the right to hold public office in the United States. After repeated failures in legal battle the National Woman's Party formed by Alice Paul in 1916 took to militancy over the question of suffrage. After a hard-fought series of votes in the US Congress and in state legislatures, the Nineteenth Amendment became a part of the US Constitution in 1920. It states that the right of US citizens to vote shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex. UK: In the UK, militant campaign began with in the first decade of twentieth century. Perhaps the most prominent agitator was Sylvia Pankhurst, a famous socialist who helped campaign for women's equality with men inter alia many other issues which exemplified social injustice. Women gained the right to vote in 1918 although their rights were not fully equal to men. Representation of the People Act 1918 enfranchised all men, as well as all women above the age of thirty who met minimum property qualifications. It was in 1928 that the Conservative government ultimately passed the act of equal franchise giving all men and women above the age of twenty-one the right to vote. Apart from voting right another important triumph for UK women came in 1857 when the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857 set up a special court to deal with divorce cases. This meant that women could get divorce without the endorsement of the church. France: It appears ironical that the country that was the earliest to declare the 'Rights of Man' was almost the last to grant voting rights to its women. In 1909 French Union for Women's Suffrage, French feminist organization was formed primarily to fight for voting right, which was eventually granted in 1945. Through the 18 th century Feminist movements also developed in many other countries. For instance, in Southern Australia, right to vote was achieved by women in 1895, Catherine Spence being a relentless campaigner for this right. In Denmark, they had already achieved not only voting rights but equal rights laws that protected a woman's access to education, work and marital rights during the 1920s. Liberal feminism was quiet for four decades after winning the vote. In the 1960s during the civil rights movement, liberal feminists drew parallels between systemic NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 13 race discrimination and sex discrimination. Groups such as the National Organization for Women, the National Women's Political Caucus, and the Women's Equity Action League were created to further women's rights on issues such as reproduction, child care, domestic violence, work and equal pay and so on. 1.4 Second Phase: Radical Feminism The second wave of Feminism, often termed as radical feminism, began in the late 1960s and continued into the early 90 s.This wave unfolded itself in the context of the anti-war and civil rights movements and the growing self-consciousness of a variety of minority groups around the world.

The book The Second Sex, (1949) an extremely important contribution to Feminist philosophy by Simone de Beauvoir, the French Existentialist author, is often regarded as the starting point of second-wave feminism. In Second Sex, her magnum opus, published in 1949 in French as Le Deuxième Sexe, she famously declared 'one is not born but becomes a woman'. Beauvoir argued that men had made women the 'other' in society by application of a false aura of 'mystery' around them and used this as an excuse to create an 'unfathomable woman' stereotype whose real problems need not be addressed. Its social expression, she clarified, was the creation of Patriarchy. After the publication of de Beauvoir's text, feminists began to employ 'gender' as a crucial analytical category for explaining social processes. These theorists were advocates of gender division as the most fundamental of all social divisions and the universality of patriarchy. The radical Feminists argued that sexual objectification was the most widely shared experience of women on the basis of which a common identity and common goal of action could be forged. Significantly this phase began with protests against the Miss America Pageant in Atlantic City in 1968 and 1969. With the rise of the New Left, this feminist phase got entangled with many other social movements. Whereas the first wave of feminism was generally propelled by Western white middle class women, the second phase drew in women of color and developing nations, seeking sisterhood and solidarity, claiming 'women's struggle is class struggle.' Feminists spoke of women as a social class and coined phrases such as 'the personal is political' and 'identity politics' in an effort to demonstrate that race, class, and gender oppression were all related. The second wave became increasingly theoretical, based on a fusion of neo-Marxism and psycho-analytical theory, and began to associate the subjugation of women with broader critiques of patriarchy, capitalism, normative heterosexuality, and the woman's role as wife and mother.

common in the late 1970s and early 1980s. By the mid- 1980s many of the original consciousness raising groups had dissolved, and radical feminism was more and more associated with loosely organized university collectives. Radical feminism can still be seen, particularly within student activism and among working class women.

the sexual culture, e.g., breaking down traditional gender roles and re-evaluating societal concepts of femininity and masculinity (a common demand in US universities during the 1980s). To achieve this, they often formed tactical alliances with other currents of feminism. 1.5

Marxist and Socialist Feminists Much of what radical feminists were arguing had overlaps with the thoughts of Marxist and Socialist Feminists, the latter being more focused on historical approach. The early Marxist Feminists, while accepting Patriarchy as an important cultural more, were keener on finding a 'material' explanation of gender, the whole approach being an attempt to develop a critique of Capitalism from gender perspective. Given this main theoretical thrust, they, none the less, were vexed by such questions as to what extent economic systems influence gender relationships, or whether subordination of women predates capitalism or, more crucially, the possibility of its continuance even in socialism etc. In an attempt to break-out of this theoretical deadlock, a new position emerged. The economic and gender system are not causally linked social processes, but operate simultaneously and interactively. The early Marxist Feminists from Clara Zetkin to Alexandra Kollontai variously drew their inspiration from F.

Engels' The Origin of the Family, Private Property and the State.

Among the later Marxist Feminists were Maria Mies, [German professor of sociology and author of NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 15 several feminist books, including Indian Women and Patriarchy (1980), Patriarchy and Accumulation on a World Scale (1986), etc], Gayle Maria Rosa Dalla Costa (Italian autonomist feminist who co-authored with Selma Jamesthe classic The Power of Women and the Subversion of the Community). 'The Power etc' launched the 'domestic labour debate' by re-defining housework as reproductive labour necessary to the functioning of capital, rendered invisible by its removal from the wage- relation. Mariarosa Dalla Costa and Selma James American writer, feminist and social activist were co-founders of the International Wages for Housework Campaign, and coordinators of the Global Women's Strike etc. 1.6 A new phase of feminist thinking: The Third Wave In the 1980s radical feminism as a theoretical approach was subjected to severe criticisms. The central charges were of essentialism and biological reductionism. It was alleged that their entire emphasis lay on the male 'need' to oppress women, but they have failed to provide any explanation beyond biology as to why it should be so. The obvious tendency of this approach was to treat men and women as 'homogenous'and 'unhistorical' categories. The critical atmosphere of the 1980s generated another theoretical trend that has been somewhat loosely termed as the Post-Modern or Post-Structuralist approach to feminism. Deriving from a wide range of philosophical currents as represented by the thoughts of Foucault, Freud, Lacan and Derrida, the feminism of this phase was by no means a homogenous trend. In examining identity formation and generation of stereotypes, the theorists variously explored the tools of psychoanalysis and the role of language. All these led to the destabilization of a variety of notions such as 'universal womanhood', body, gender, sexual heteronormativity and so on. Their celebration of ambiguity and refusal to think in terms of 'us-them' ( or men-women binary) led most of them to deny identification as 'feminists' as they found the word limiting and exclusionary. Given the immense complexity and variety of this approach it is difficult to delineate the salient points of a theoretical model. Yet a few directions can be indicated. Focusing on the early stages of child development emphasis has been placed on the centrality of language in communicating, interpreting and representing gender. By language the 'Post Structuralists' do not mean words but systems of meaning — symbolic orders — that precede the actual mastery of speech, reading and writing. Again, those who follow the Foucauldian method question causality or idea of single origin and conceive of processes to be absolutely interconnected and

16 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 entangled. Joan Wallach Scot, one of the very well-known theorists of this trend, provides illuminating exposition of how gender becomes the primary way of signifying relationships of power. To explain this, she enumerates few inter-related constitutive elements of gender. First, in every society there are available cultural symbols that evoke the idea of womanhood. These symbols are multiple and can also be contradictory. The most commonly available cultural icons in Western societies are those of 'Eve' or 'Mother Mary'. Then these symbols are employed in every sphere of social activity such as pursuance of religion, education, scientific research, legal and political doctrines and variously fix binary opposition of concepts of 'femininity' and 'masculinity' with clear implication of power relationship. This takes on a different dimension in modern societies with much wider purview of governance. Finally, the biological sexuality transforms into subjective identity through enculturation and further reinforces the stereotypes. This theoretical trend takes us beyond any simplified concept of fixed binary and fixed origin and opens the scope of dialogue with most other disciplines, namely History, Economics, Sociology, Psychology and so on. 1.7 Post-Colonial and Third World Feminism In the 1980s Postcolonial or often called the Third World Feminism, originated in countries that emerged out of colonial domination, as a critique of feminist theorists in developed countries pointing out the universalizing tendencies of mainstream feminist ideas in which the women living in non-Western countries are misrepresented. Postcolonial feminism emerged as part of the third wave of feminism, which began in the 1980s, in tandem with many other racially focused feminist movements in order to bring into focus the diverse nature of each woman's lived experience. As can be quite expected there is no singular 'Third World Feminism', yet there are certain underlying common theoretical assumptions and lived experiences that can qualify them as a trend. First, postcolonial theorists concern themselves with evaluating how different colonial and imperial relations throughout the nineteenth century have impacted the way particular cultures view themselves. The second defining factor is their opposition to 'Western Feminism' which, they argue, universalizes their own experience thereby becoming a participant in the Western knowledge hegemony. There is a general tendency of Western Feminism, they allege, to construct the 'Third World Women' as a homogenous 'powerless' group suffering victimhood of particular socio-economic systems. They argue that this approach

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 17 issues from collapsing the distinction as women as real historical subjects and their representation. By rejecting the Western feminist imaging of non-western women, post-colonial feminism promotes a wider viewpoint of the complex layers of oppression that exist within any given society. Audre Lorde, American writer, Feminist and Civil Rights Activist, contributed to the creation of Postcolonial Feminism in her 1984 essay

The Master's Tools Will Never Dismantle the Master's House.

The essay of Chandra Talpade Mohanty, Professor of Gender Studies and Sociology in Syracuse University, Under Western Eyes also came out in 1984, analyzing the homogenizing Western Feminist depiction of the 'Third World Women.' These works, along with many others, were foundational to the formation of postcolonial feminism. Celebrating difference in the lived experiences of women, Lorde asserts, that these should be used to create a community in which women use their different strengths to support each other. Mohanty's primary initiative has been to allow Third World Women to have agency and voice within the general feminist realm. The major emphasis of this group of Feminists has been on movement. In the article Third World Women and the Inadequacies of Western Feminism, Ethel Crowley, Professor of Sociology at Trinity College of Dublin, writes about how Western Feminism is lacking when applied to non-western societies. She accuses western feminists of theoretical reductionism when it comes to Third World Women. Her major problem with Western Feminism is that it spends too much time in ideological 'nit-picking' instead of formulating strategies to redress the highlighted problems. The most prominent point that Crowley makes in her article is that ethnography can be essential to problem solving and that freedom does not mean the same thing to all the women of the world. Postcolonial Feminism has strong ties with indigenous movements and wider Postcolonial theory. It is also closely affiliated with Black Feminism because both Black Feminists and Postcolonial Feminists argue that mainstream Western Feminism fails to adequately account for racial differences. Racism has a major role to play in the discussion of Postcolonial Feminism. Postcolonial Feminists seek to tackle the ethnic conflict and racism that still exist and aim to bring these issues into feminist discourse. In the past, Lorde argues, mainstream Western Feminism has largely avoided the issue of race, relegating it to a secondary place behind patriarchy and somewhat separate from feminism. It was only in recent times that 'White' Feminists are waking up to the need to address this issue.

18 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 Criticized as they are, the Western Feminists also launched their critique of Postcolonial Feminism in much the same way. It has been argued that Third World Feminists are also in danger of being ethnocentric, only addressing what is going on in their own cultures at the expense of other parts of the world for colonialism occurring across different timelines embodies different meaning for people across the world. 1.8 Conclusion Feminist thought and movements, as we have discussed, have different shades and strands. But policy making at both national and international levels has been compelled to acknowledge the concerted strength of their contributions, however variegated. Feminism has barely exhausted its potential and different issues, will continue to come and debates rage for a long time to come. The multiplicity of feminist trends not only indicates divergence, it more crucially implies the growing audibility of women's voice that had been achieved through long struggles and sacrifices. 1.9 Summing Up 1. Feminism can broadly be presented as a system of thought that challenges the social privileging of the male point of view and seeks to assert the right of women to be treated as equals of men politically, economically and culturally. Thus, the ideology of patriarchy at both social and familial levels has been the main target of attack of all kinds of feminist movements. 2. Closely connected with them were the so-called Post-Colonial and Third World Feminists who were equally divergent in their approaches. 1.10 Glossary 1. Patriarchy— A socio-familial system in which social and political leadership rests with men. At the family level, the father or the eldest son is considered the head of the family and descent is determined by male-line. At the political and social level, power crucially rests with males, women being ascribed a secondary role. 2. Structuralism— It is employed in philosophy, sociology, anthropology, history and so on, structuralism indicates a method of understanding of human behaviour in terms of underlying broad structures that determine feelings, perceptions and thought processes. 3. Hegemony—In ancient Greece hegemony meant political military dominance of one city state over another, the dominant one being called the hegemon. However, in the definition of Antonio Gramsci, Italian Marxist, it came to denote the manipulative power of the ruling class to get people believe that their own interest was essentially catered by accepting and embracing the rulers' ideology.

N It helps to distinguish between sex and gender in feminist epistemology. 2.2 Introduction The word 'gender' in common English usage is often used interchangeably with the word 'sex', implying male/female anatomical binary. But if we go a little deeper we see neither linguistically nor sociologically such interchangeability as tenable. Let us first look at language. Linguists generally use the word 'gender' to classify nouns. In most Indo-European group of languages (There are about 445 living Indo-European languages and nearly 42% of the human population speaks an Indo- 21 22 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 European language as a first language, by far the highest of any language family) gender implies classification of animate and an inanimate. But the classification mode widely varies. For instance, in both English and Bengali languages we find a triadic gender structure – masculine, feminine and neuter. But in languages like French, German etc. feminine and masculine binary applies to both animate and inanimate. Thus, a scale or a pencil can either be feminine or masculine. This applies to Hindi language as well. Such variations notwithstanding, given the global dominance of English, in our commonplace understanding gender broadly implies ‘masculine/feminine’ division and we tend to believe that gender and sex is one and the same thing. 2.3 Feminist critique of sex-gender equation Over years’ feminists have been arguing for making a distinction between sex and gender. The main point that they want to make is that while sex is a biological given, gender means the social role that society attaches to the sex-based division. In other words, while sex indicates biological man and woman, gender indicates social ‘manhood’ and ‘womanhood’. This distinction is also reflected in dictionaries. For instance, the entry of ‘gender’ in Oxford dictionary reads as follows: noun.

Either of the two sexes (male and female), especially when considered with reference to social and cultural differences rather than biological ones.

It further states that the term is also used more broadly to denote a range of identities that do not correspond to established ideas of male and female.

Now the question arises as to how ‘manhood’ and ‘womanhood’ are defined. Feminists argue that ‘femininity’ and ‘masculinity’ are products of social construct that vary from epoch to epoch and in accordance to difference in social organizations. For instance, the concept of ‘femininity’ and ‘masculinity’ in matrilineal tribal societies and so-called ‘mainstream’ societies are often different in terms of certain crucial factors of social organization and day to day living. Then again, difference also occurs from one historical period to another depending on their specific notions of social production. For instance, in pre-modern agrarian society, where the economy was at least partially home-based, woman’s social productivity was viewed differently from that of industrial societies. Thus, femininity is a social construction just as masculinity is. Then again it should be understood that if the idea of gender had merely been indicative of social and historical variations of the notions of manhood and womanhood, it would have NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 23 essentially remained a matter of anthropological interest. But as the gender stereotyping in almost all societies remain crucially linked to domination of females by males, the concept of gender is rendered politically charged. This will take us to a discussion of the Patriarchy and how patriarchal ideology permeates various institutional forms through which this domination is exercised. 2.4 Patriarchy Previously, narrowly conceived patriarchy simply implied a familial system where the father, being the Patriarch was vested with supreme authority. In current sociological usage, patriarchy is made to stand for a social system that creates conditions of subjugation of women by men. This is not to mean that domination by some ‘cruel’ men over women who are hapless victims. Feminists use the word to indicate systemic control over women. Juliet Mitchell, British psychoanalyst, socialist feminist and a prolific writer, describes patriarchy as a kinship system in which fathers are vested with certain symbolic powers to exercise within the system. She clarifies that such power creates a psychological ambience within which women naturally consider themselves as the inferior others. In short, by discussing the institution forms of domination the feminists, over decades, are trying to drive home the point that to comprehend the unequal power relation between men and women we need to look beyond biology.

Kamla Bhasin, Indian developmental feminist activist, poet, author and social scientist, provides a succinct summarization of the methods of patriarchal control over women. This formulation not only applies to India, but across countries of the world albeit with variations. Household work: In so far as women's work is concerned both within and outside the household, the control of men is only too obvious. Women's relentless household work is not only unpaid; it often goes without recognition. Little wonder that those who do not work outside are called 'unemployed'. The non-recognition of women's household labour as socially productive did not apply so much to pre- industrial household economy as it does to industrial and capitalist economy. In the former, as the household was the main centre of productivity, it was natural to treat household labour as socially productive. But in industrial societies on the other hand, since the major economic activities take place outside the house, home-centered activities of women become identical with unemployment. In the opinion of Maria Mies the surplus that women produce through their 'shadow work' is entirely discounted and is subjected to no economic evaluation. The UNDP (United Nations

24 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 Development Programme)
Human Development Report of 1995 says that the value of the invisible and unpaid labour of women the world wide is over 11 trillion US dollars. Then again to what extent women can be permitted to work outside their homes is determined by the male dominated familial culture that expects women to fulfill certain obligations. Biological productivity: Not only her economic activity, even the biological productivity of woman is subjected to similar control. Motherhood being a chief identifier of women, have to deal with a lot of social pressure upon them to exercise their choice in this regard. Women the world over have fought and are still fighting for control over their own sexuality. In the West it was a long and arduous struggle through which abortion rights were secured. There are still areas in the West where social consensus is strong against it. In India community pressure barely allows women freedom of choice. In very many places forceful abortion of female child at the fetal stage is still quite prevalent. 2.5 Role of other Institutions Patriarchy, as a mode of thinking, permeates all kinds of institutions and influences their policy decisions. We will take up these institutions one by one. 2.5.1 State and the church working in tandem: History has shown us as how the state in its own interest regulates and controls women's productivity and mobility. This was evident particularly in Post Second World War period when Germany was faced with the task of reconstruction. The crucial necessity then was labour power. Women were called upon to engage actively in the work of social and economic reconstruction. But something quite different took place in Britain. After the end of the same war, women who had joined in war efforts were asked to go back to their homes leaving the task of peace-time social reconstruction exclusively to men. The impact of the war in the United States saw an unprecedented population growth that added more than 50 million babies to the country by the end of the 1950s, a phenomenon that has gone down in history as 'Baby Boom'. During the Great Depression in the 1930s, economic pressures dissuaded many Americans from having children and the population growth dropped to a meagre nine million. The post-war economy proved to be more robust and families were encouraged to have more children. This was a covert encouragement to 'motherhood'.

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 25 The transformation of the Free State of Ireland into the Republic of Ireland is a glaring example of how the state and church combine to control the policy of birth control. In order to handle the wartime anarchy and restlessness the state called upon the church to come to its aid. One of the prescriptions that the church floated as a solution was to reassert the ideal of motherhood. As a method, birth control measures were not only prohibited, any campaign for them was also banned. So, women now only lost their right to choose, they were even deprived of their right to know. The New Constitution of the Irish Republic retained the anti-abortion law of the earlier Irish State. 2.5.2 Law Legal structure embedded in the patriarchal belief system has its own way of perpetuating male domination. One of the crucial zones of social discrimination pertains to women's right to property. While it took a very long time to formally grant women, the right to household property that normally passed from father to son in most of the 'mainstream' societies, the actual enjoyment of it often remains unexercised under direct or indirect social pressures. Given the general social practise of women going over to the husbands' family after marriage, there is often a tacit or stridently expressed discouragement for women to ask for a share of her familial property. According to 2015 UN report on women, although, laws provide for gender equality in inheritance for the overall population, discrimination is still found in practice among many groups of population. This is the case for about half of the 116 developing countries with available information. Discriminatory informal laws, customs and practices restrict women's access to land and other property in a large proportion of developing countries, including more than three quarters with regard to land and nearly two thirds with regard to other property. 2.5.3 Politics In most of the 'mainstream' societies men are the masters of the world of politics. In almost all political associations, from the village level to the Parliament, men almost invariably dominate. In the United States a woman cannot dream of being a presidential candidate for a very long time. It is only very recently that a few parties have started thinking in terms of fielding women as residential candidates. But to have women leading role in politics does not imply any immediate change in the status of women in the society at large. For instance, the South Asian countries which are noted for having woman Presidents and Prime Ministers, women's presence in the Parliament had never been

26 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 more than 10 percent. As a repair move, few countries like India have even taken up policies to ensure greater presence through system of reservation of seats. But such policies have barely brought serious change in the ground reality. Newspapers are still rife with cases of various kinds of abuse of women. 2.5.4 Media Media is the main vehicle of propagating ideology in modern societies. Films of both the West and India, by and large, use woman's body as a consumer item while at the same time reinforcing the home-centric status of woman. On television, marriage, parenthood and domesticity are generally shown as more important for women than men. In the Western media between mid-40s and the 60s white middle class women were predominantly portrayed as 'house wives', their major concern being to keep the houses impeccably clean and rearing children. It cleverly hid the fact that by 60s, 40 percent of these women worked outside homes and post- World War II divorce had become rampant. In a study made in 1975, it had been found that while women were shown to be concerned with romance and family problems in 74 percent cases, men are shown to be sharing them only in 18 percent of the cases. The portrayal of women as weak and ineffectual continued to be overwhelming. But as the century rolled to its close and women entered the media profession in far larger numbers, they no longer remained mere consumers of media products, they got involved in decision making and directing. This obviously led to some balancing effect on gender sensitive questions. If we come to the advertisements the reflection of this change can be easily identified. In the erstwhile advertisements on the 'so-called' 'soap war', from the way women were portrayed one would assume that women by and large did nothing but washing clothes. With feminist protest against certain kind of stereotyping of women and with more women entering the world of media, there have been attempts to change certain stereotypes by featuring men in roles which we are used to seeing women in. But these are few and far between and remain as exceptions not to be taken very seriously. Discussion of advertisements perpetuating and even reinforcing divided gender roles of patriarchal tenor can become long enough meriting a separate discussion altogether. 2.6 Conclusion In rounding up the discussion let us once again look at the central idea at the basis of patriarchy. Patriarchy creates within family as well as other institutions a

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 27 gendered consciousness under the influence of which men internalize their dominance and women their subjugation. This engenders two diverse visions and missions of life. Once again the point to note that as an ideology patriarchy not only enjoys the support of men, it is able to secure the consent of a large section of women as well. The cooperation of the subjugated can be secured in a variety of ways. Gerda Lerner, Austrian-born American historian and feminist author, in her book The Creation of Patriarchy enumerates them as follows: by educational deprivation, the denial of women the knowledge of their history, by putting restraints on access to political power and economic resources and creating division among women through defining 'respectability' and 'deviance', and by according class privileges to conforming women and so on. Patriarchal ideology not only creates a subjugated psychology that women internalize, it also creates an 'ideal type' for males which they internalize. However, the idea of transgender has complicated the feminist notion of gendering through social construction. In the late 70s and early 80s, corresponding roughly to the second wave of feminism, feminists (especially early radical feminists) were often in conflict with trans-women within feminism. Janice Raymond, professor of women's studies and medical ethics at the University of Massachusetts Amherst, published The Transsexual Empire in 1979. In Empire, Raymond criticised contemporary medical and psychiatric approaches to trans-sexuality and accused trans-women of reinforcing traditional gender stereotypes. However, the third wave of feminism showed greater acceptance of transgender rights within feminism, largely due to the influence of philosophers like Judith Butler, American philosopher and gender theorist, and Kimberle Crenshaw, American lawyer and civil rights advocate. These philosophers argued for a greater inclusion of other fields (such as critical race theory and queer theory) within feminism. Butler in particular argued that the liberation of women required a questioning of gender itself, and that acceptance of gay and trans-people would promote that sort of questioning. So, the horizon of feminist questioning of all hitherto existing stereotypes of man and woman is ever expanding and entering all systems of knowledge and activism.

28 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 2.7 Summing Up 1. Over decades, feminists, especially those belonging to the Second wave feminism, have been arguing in favour of making a distinction between sex and gender. Their main argument is that while sex is a biological given, gender is a product of social construct that varies from epoch to epoch and in accordance to different social organizations. 2. Patriarchy is an ideological system that not only creates fixed stereotypes of men and women, but ensures domination of men over women. Permeating through all social institutions it propels both men and women to internalize the notions of dominance and subjugation. 3. Institutions like state and church often act together to perpetuate the subordination of women. 4. The media representation of men and women more often than not serve to further entrench the dominant gender stereotypes. 5. In terms of enjoyment of property, legal enactments in favour equal enjoyment of property rights is often thwarted by customs and prejudices that still hold strong especially in developing countries. 6. With the inclusion of issues of trans-gender movement, the purview of feminist activity has substantially broadened. 2.8 Glossary 1. Great Depression—Lasting from 1929 to 1939 was a terrible economic downturn witnessed by the industrialised world. It began with a Stock Market crash which led the Wall Street investors go into panic, most of them ultimately getting wiped out. 2. Baby Boom—The period of Great Depression being over and the Second World War having ended the US went through a period of prosperity and witnessed a surge of population. It was this period, roughly extending from 1946 to 1964 that is generally referred to as the period of baby boom.

While femininity is often equated with motherhood, homeliness, caring and nurturing traits, masculinity is equated with power, rationality, worldliness and ambition. In Western civilization such ideas go back to the ancient Greeks, although with variations. Male dominance being the general ethos Greece also had 30 NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 31 city-states dominated by female warriors. Accomplished women were also not unknown. For instance, poet Saphhoof Lesbos has become iconic to posterity by entering the English lexicon. But with the advent of Christianity the whole idea of fixed attributes came to be more firmly grounded as these fixed attributes were presented in theological terms, as the creation of God, i.e., divinely ordained and therefore immutable. This view remained essentially unchanged till the middle of 19 th century when Darwin replaced Creation by Evolution. Though shorn of divinity, the belief in an immutable origin did not change so much. It was around the middle of the twentieth century during the second wave of the Feminist movement that the idea of gender as socially constructed was floated. Feminists called the tendency to attribute certain characteristics defined as the essence of women and essence of men shared in common by all women and men of all times as biologism or gender essentialism. Against this position feminists stressed that gender, instead of biological traits, denotes cultural constructions of societies based on their distinct conceptions femininity and masculinity and of appropriate roles of men and women. They also said that there was nothing static about these roles and in keeping with the system and values pertaining to each society and age these roles were defined and redefined. We have already read about Simone de Beauvoir's statement in the Second Sex that 'one is not born but becomes a woman'.

The idea that it was actually specific kinds of socialization that create 'femininity' in women and 'masculinity' in men was taken up by most of the later feminist challenging arguments regarding the biological roots of such attributes. The main argument is that the mechanism of creating feminine and masculine is social learning rather than biology. According to Kate Millet, Feminist writer, educator, artist and activist and the first American woman to be awarded a degree with first-class honors from St Hilda's College, Oxford, gender is the product of the sum total of parenting, peer pressure and the cultural notions regarding appropriate gender roles obtaining in specific societies. The combined influence of these reinforces women's subordination by socializing women into subordinate social roles. As a result women, in order to live up to social expectation, cultivate and project an image of being passive, emotional, ignorant and docile help- meet for men. This led to the valorisation of chastity, fidelity and docility in women. Hence, onwards in the successive modes of production the same concern for private property led to the perpetuation of the subordination of women. In the early twentieth century, both

For Maria Mies, maleness and femaleness are not biological givens, but rather the result of long historical processes. In each historical epoch maleness and femaleness are differently defined depending on the principal mode of production of the epochs. This means that the organic differences between men and women are differently interpreted and valued according to the dominant form of appropriation of resources for the satisfaction of human needs. In this way men and women develop qualitatively different relationships to their own bodies.

Radical Women, a major Marxist- feminist organization, based its theory on Marx' and Engels' analysis that the enslavement of women was the first building block of an economic system based on private property. They contend that elimination of the capitalist profit-driven economy will remove the motivation for sexism, racism, homophobia, and other forms of oppression.

Later on through 80s and 90s, Socialist feminists of various groups belonging to Britain, USA, Germany developed their own theories on women's oppression along Marxist lines but with much greater emphasis on 'Patriarchy' as an autonomous institution that had to be addressed independently regardless of obtaining relation of production (see the earlier discussion on 'What is Feminism').

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 33 3.5 Intervention of Feminist Anthropologists Anthropologists, towards the second half of the twentieth century, have made valuable contribution to the issue through various case studies. For instance, Sherry Beth Ortner, American cultural anthropologist, tries to find an explanation of universal devaluation of women. She says that biological determinists argue that there is 'something' inherent in the male species that naturally makes them the dominant sex. And as this 'something' is lacking in females, they are not only subordinate, but in general quite satisfied with their position since it affords them protection and opportunity to maximize maternal pleasures, which are most satisfying experiences of her life. While refuting this position, Ortner does not say that biological facts are irrelevant, or that men and women are not different, but these facts and differences only take on significance of superior/ inferior within culturally defined value systems. Now she asks the most crucial question. Given the fact that all cultures have their own specificities, how is it that in every culture women are accorded a second class status compared to men? To answer this question she delves into the idea of 'nature', 'culture' dichotomy. Ortner observes that every culture implicitly recognizes and asserts a distinction between the operation of nature and the operation of culture (human consciousness and its products). Culture, in almost all societies, is recognized as something superior to nature because culture is capable of transforming nature. Then as women in almost all cultures are seen to be closer to nature and men associated with culture that has crucial transformative capability, women are located in a lower order that is as a subordinate of culture. The question of cultural expression of sexual asymmetry has been variously probed by feminists. Michelle Zimbalist Rosaldo, American social psychologist and linguist, lists the available range of explanations, from historical, in which it is asserted that at one point of time to men usurped power from women to more suggestive accounts of male envy of women's productive power, or different hormonal cycle or emotional orientation, she expresses surprise as to how these could possibly lead to moral evaluation in terms higher and lower. Rosaldo states that biological research may illuminate the range of human inclination and possibilities, but cannot account for the interpretation of these facts in a cultural order. It also cannot explain why cultures everywhere have given Man, as a category opposed Woman, social value and moral worth. In order to get to the root of this Rosaldo gives examples of quite a few societies. In certain African societies like the Yoruba, women may control a good part of food supply, accumulate cash and trade in distant and important markets; yet when approaching their husbands, wives must feign

34 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 ignorance and obedience, kneeling to serve men as they sit. As an example how linguistic practice symbolizes subordination of women, Rosaldo cites the example of Merina tribe in Madagascar. It is a custom there that in order to be cultured, sophisticated and respectable one must learn to speak indirectly. Rather than being assertive, men, here, are masters of an allusive, formal style in public speech. Women, on the contrary are said not to know the subtleties of polite language. They are, in effect, are cultural idiots who are expected to blurt out language. In some of the Jewish ghetto communities of Eastern Europe women are generally strong, self willed, shapers of political events decision makers and so on. Yet, wives defer to husbands and their greatest joy is to have a male child. Taken individually none of these examples appear surprising. But Rosaldo points out a common thread running through them. Everywhere, even in those appear to us as very egalitarian, men are the locus of cultural value. Some areas of activity are always seen as exclusively or predominantly male and therefore overwhelmingly morally important. It is possible to go on with such examples of feminists of various strands pitting against gender essentialism. In substance, it needs to be noted that post sixties feminists, cutting across ideological persuasions, point out the historico-socio- cultural factors behind gender construction. (If the early Liberal Feminists of the West were charged for universalizing the experience of White women and using 'woman' as a-historical category, the later liberal feminists substantially modified their position.) Then again gender does not merely mean certain sets of culture specific symbols constituting the subjective identities of men and women: gender remains integrally linked and embedded in institutional and organizational practices. The latter encompass almost every inch of social space and every social action from the manner of speaking to the choice of economic activity, each item being defined either as manly or womanly. To give an example of gendered nature of the language, we need to go back to Simone de Beauvoir once again. A long time before gender was recognized as an analytical category, she argued that in the English language the word 'man' is often made to refer to humanity as a whole. The word 'woman', however, never enjoyed such broad applicability. Moving away from English language, if we look at some of the South Asian languages, we will come across such terms — as swami, pati, malek etc—which simultaneously mean husband and master. Many similar examples can be cited to

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 35 demonstrate the gendered nature of our world of words. And it is through these words that we begin to learn about ourselves as well as the world that we live in. Now from language if we move to other social processes and institutional practices, we see the division to be operating just in the same way. Let us begin with home. Parenting: Almost unwittingly parents tend not only to buy their children gender stereotypical toys (guns and cars for boys and dolls for girls) and clothes (frocks for girls and shirt and trousers for boys), the choice colors is also stereotyped (blue for boys and pink for girls). Then Parents (often quite unintentionally) extend this difference in setting down their code of 'appropriate' behavior. While this precise form of gender socialization has changed a lot with the passage of time, even today girls are discouraged from sports like football or from playing 'rough and tumble' games and are more likely than boys to be given dolls or cooking toys to play with while boys are told not to 'cry like a baby' and be given 'masculine' toys.

Children's books keep on replicating similar differentiating models of conduct. For instance, males in most children stories are adventurers and leaders while girls are helpers and followers. Fairy tales are replete with stories where princes appear as saviors of hapless women. No wonder young girls are fed with dreams of an arrival of prince charming and made to believe that their future bliss lay in their natural obedience to their husbands. Division of space: Public places also tend to be categorized along the line of this difference. For instance, places like inns, motels, theatres, tea stalls, local clubs, coffee houses etc are clearly marked masculine spaces. Women are not denied entry to these places, but they are generally expected to come with male companions. Again there are specific spaces like kitchen, the precincts of water wells etc which are not only earmarked for women, but are treated as areas of their sovereignty where men are almost denied entry. (How spaces will be divided not only vary from culture to culture, the division is also not static and unchanging. And it goes without saying that the aforesaid division applies lot more to Indian, South Asian and Middle Eastern countries than to Western ones. In the former however, with more and more women entering the public sphere, such spatial division is increasingly coming under challenge.) Thus, it is evident that gender does not merely have psychological and linguistic

36 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 dimensions, it has spatial dimension too. Even categories like race and class can also be gendered. For instance, during the colonial period in the eyes of the British the non-warrior Bengali race appeared effeminate and therefore feeble and emasculated. It is evident that beyond certain biological givens, complex social and historical processes work behind the creation of notions of femininity and masculinity. In every society, its notions of rights and wrongs, duties and obligations, behavioural norms and so on combine to create specific cultural ideals within which women and men learn to recognize their distinctive identities. Just like women, neither men are born men, they become so. 3.6 Summing Up 1. Gender essentialism is a concept that attributes fixed, intrinsic, innate biological qualities to men and women. While femininity is often equated with motherhood, homeliness, caring and nurturing traits, masculinity is equated with power, rationality, worldliness and ambition. 2. It was around the middle of the twentieth century during the second wave of the Feminist movement that the idea of gender being socially constructed was given theoretical expression. Feminist called the tendency to attribute certain characteristics defined as the essence of women and men as biologism. 3. Gender as an analytic category had mostly to do with social construction rather than any 'innate' attribute supposed to be having biological roots. 4. Anthropologists have made valuable contribution to this debate by studying the variation of social roles of men and women across societies. They have demonstrated that in almost all societies with great differences in the social activities, women are almost universally accorded a secondary status. 5. The social construct of the division of gender permeates almost every institution. 3.7 Glossary 1. Gender—Grammatically gender in most of the major languages is loosely related to sex differentiation, male and female (and in some, neuter as well.)

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 37 In sociological usage, however, male and female signify a range of attributes that societies view as femininity and masculinity without any necessary biological correspondence with the latter categories. 2. South Asian Languages— Of the huge variety the major languages are Hindi, Urdu, Bengali, Tamil, Tlclgu, Malayali, Canara, Nepali, Pali, Panjabi, Prakrit, Sanskrit and Sinhalese. The roots of these languages are generally Indo Aryan, Dravidian, Austro Asiatic, Tibeto-Burman etc. Many of the Himalayan languages are still unclassified. 3. New Left—A broad range of activist movements and intellectual currents that arose in Western Europe and North America in the 1950s and 60s. This phase was specifically marked by student radicalism and innovative reinterpretation of Maxism. 3.8 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. What is biologism? How do feminists criticise biologism in terms of gender theory? 2. How do cultural anthropologists describe subordination of women across societies? Long Questions : 1. Write an essay on how gender distinction permeates various social institutions. 2. Explain how gender is viewed in sociology? Short Questions : 1. Write a note on the arguments of Socialist Feminists. 2. Write a note on the representation of girls in the children's books you have read. 3.9 Further Readings 1. Rosaldo, M Z and L. 4.11 Probable Questions 4.12 Further Readings 4.1 Objectives N The study tends to make an analysis of the public-private divide and how women are affected by it. N It aims to explain how feminist discourse challenges the existing dichotomy between public-private and establish how their interconnection is grounded in the patriarchy. 4.2 Introduction Modern World as defined by sociologists is based on a system of rights that recognize two distinct realms of people's day to day activities: the public and the private spheres. The basic distinction between them, is that, the public sphere is the larger realm of politics open to everyone where people (even if they are strangers) come together to engage in free exchange of ideas, whereas the private sphere is a smaller, enclosed realm (like a home) with restricted access.

40 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 In trying to trace the origin of the division of spheres political theorists go back to classical antiquity. For Plato (as he states in Republic) the main social division was a sexual one for man's virtues lay in knowing how to administer the state, while a woman's lay to order her house and in being obedient to her husband. For Aristotle, good life was possible only through participation in the life of the Polis. Although all other associations aimed at some good, it was in the Polis that the realization of highest good was possible. However, participation in the Polis was restricted only to citizens. Public persons, stated Aristotle, were responsible and rational beings who shared a public life of the Polis through its constitutive elements. Private persons (that included women and other non-citizens), on the other, were not fully rational and could only share in the limited goodness appropriate to their spheres. But this did not render the private sphere insignificant; it existed as a necessary condition for the superior public realm. 4.3 Social Contract Theorists Carole Pateman, English political theorist and feminist, writes that among the Social Contract theorists Hobbes and Locke both regarded women as incapable of public 'political' participation. For Hobbes, in the State of Nature the ultimate driving force was self-interest. Pursuance of uninhibited self interest led to a state of war— a situation in which none could be assured of peaceful life. To avoid the horrors of the state of nature people came together to hand over absolute power to sovereign who in return would ensure people's peace and security. It is necessary to remember that in Hobbes' hypothetical State of Nature men and women were equal—they could freely kill and be killed. Political or moral issues were not Hobbes' concern. Susan Okin, liberal Feminist, philosopher and author, points out that while women are mentioned by Hobbes in the familial structure in the State of Nature, they are entirely left out when people enter political society. Locke, however, allows women certain rights, but in any difference of interests between husband and wife, he makes clear that the will of man will prevail. Locke does not offer any satisfactory answer as to why it should be so. However, among the three Social Contract theorists, Rousseau shows most negative attitude towards women. Rousseau's Sophie (in his Emile et Sophie, incomplete sequel of Emile) lacking the 'wholeness of a unified soul' can merely qualify as man's help-mate rather than 'citizen'. Even though both men and women are passionate creatures, only man has 'reason' to restrain himself. Woman, on the other hand, is passionate but lacks moral restraint; she is docile, meek and physically weak, all of these being typified as strongly

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 41 'feminine' traits. Men, on the other, are not only more capable of exercising moral control over their passions they are also physically strong, intelligent and overall rational and democratic. Wedded in marriage men are the instrument of 'will' and the 'head' of family, while woman has to submit to him. 4.4 Habermas and the general theoretical thrust Coming to modern times, we find, theorists of various ideological persuasions arguing in favour of a robust public sphere that encourages plurality of views and is necessary to avoid social and political stagnancy. Emphasis on the importance of the public sphere however, does not mean discounting the importance of the private sphere. The most influential text on the subject, however, was produced by Jurgen Habermas, German Sociologist belonging to the Frankfurt School. In his work The Structural Transformation of Public Sphere (1962) Habermas argues that the public sphere, a place where the free exchange of ideas and debate take place is the cornerstone of democracy. It is, he writes, made up of private people gathering together as a public articulating the needs of society before the state. Theoretically, public sphere do not debar the entry of anyone; all people regardless of their status can participate. Speculating on the development of public realm, Habermas argues that it actually took shape within the private sphere through the practice of discussing literature, philosophy and politics among family members and guests. Later this practice left the private sphere and effectively created a public sphere where men started engaging in such discussions and debates outside their homes. Especially, in 18th century Europe, the spread of coffee houses and other joints of gathering across the continent and Britain created a space where the concept of modern Western public sphere first germinated. In contrast to this, the private sphere is the realm of family and home life, which in theory is free of the influence of government and other social institutions. In this realm, one's responsibility is to oneself and the other members of one's house hold and work and exchange that takes place within the home is separate from the economy of the greater society. However, the boundary between the public and private sphere is not fixed and inflexible. It is important to note that in all these formulations the issue of women's participation in the public sphere is either ignored or dealt with hesitancy. Women's primary definition as 'care giver' and the general idealization of 'motherhood' fix 42 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 women's home-bound role as the primary one. That is why gender stereotypes about women 'belonging to the home' linger even today. But women do not constitute the only category to be excluded. Within the United States of America, people of colour and others perceived as different or deviant have been excluded from participating in the public sphere for a long time. Though progress in terms of inclusion has been made over time, we see the lingering effects of historical exclusion, among other things, in the over-representation of white men in the U. S. Congress. 4.5 Issues of working women Feminists have been trying to break out of this socially created separation since long ago. From the beginning of first wave feminism and the fight for women's suffrage, women have been using politics to enter the public realm of men, thus, challenging the strict division between public man and private woman. Since the Industrial Revolution in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, men have been defined as the money-making workers and women as the child-bearing emotional support for men. In this traditional model, the ability of the unencumbered individual (man) to participate in the public sphere of work and politics assumes that someone, usually a woman, is preparing his food, cleaning his house, and raising the next generation of labourers through her reproductive labour. But gradually various extraneous forces created the need for greater labour hands. This often required women to move out of the precincts of home into the labour market. But women's participation in the labour market did not bring about any radical change in the value system. In fact, much of it lingered till quite late into our times. The expectation that child care will be done 'for free' by the mother at home is connected to the lack of publicly funded day care that can enable women to work outside the home. This also turns the societal attention from the 'actual labour' involved in child care and home-making. Everything tended to be glossed over as 'labour of love'. By the same token, the non-valuation of child care and the work of nurturing also serve to under value the work performed by women in the labour force. Women have demanded the creation of better child care facility, better paid maternity and paternity leave, and equal pay in all occupational fields — all the issues that push the feminist agenda of equality for the sexes. Unfortunately, in politics, women's concerns and demands are largely regarded as reflections of moral or familial commitment, rather than authentic political stance. These issues often deemed as 'women's issues' tend to be trivialized and bypassed by the male-dominated political system.

women have had never been completely excluded from public life but the ways in which they are included are grounded firmly in their position in their domestic spheres and in patriarchal beliefs and practices. Women's presence serves to highlight the continuity of patriarchal values in the sexual division of labour in the family and the sexual division of labour in the workplace. From laissez faire liberals to Marxists, it has been assumed that it is possible to understand economic activity in abstraction from domestic life. In the liberal model, the basic issue has been to create a structure of rights between individuals and contractually created organizations on the one hand and state action on the other. But in this theoretical formulation, family being a matter of private sphere, the rights of women have never been addressed or if at all addressed, then solely acknowledged in terms of women's reproductive function. Feminists insist on their interconnection. They insist that the liberal vision of separation between private and public realms is actually untenable. The essential connection between the two is grounded in the patriarchal structure of the society at large. The mantra of second wave feminism, 'the personal is political', signifies the first serious attempt to question the identification of public sphere with political and that between private with non-political. Feminists emphasize the ways in which the public/private dichotomy is gender-linked in terms of structure and ideology. Moreover, by designating family as private, most frameworks shield abuse and domination in this realm from legal redress and political scrutiny. For a long time politics had rested in the public realm, the private realm being a place to escape from politics. Frances Olsen, America-born feminist and legal theorist, explains that as family is regarded as the repository of values destroyed in the market place, the family is also seen as the sanctuary of privacy into which one can retreat to avoid state regulation. Thus, the ideology of public/private allows the state to wash off hands from any responsibility of the 'private' world. Thus, one of the main agenda of feminism is to question, critique, reformulate and redraw the public and private distinctions and their boundaries.

Carole Pateman contends that the dichotomy between the private and the public is central to almost two centuries of feminist writing and political struggle, and it is ultimately, what the feminist movement is all about.

44 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 Second Wave Feminists laid bare the contradictions within early liberalism. Without addressing the patriarchal structure of private life, they argue, women cannot expect to benefit from the scheme of universal rights or can be ensured equal standing with male in the public sphere. The slogan 'personal is the political' has led feminists to explain and argue about the ways in which women's lives are constrained by the private. They have emphasized how personal circumstances are structured by public factors, by laws about rape and abortion, by the status of wife, by policy of child care and sexual division of labour in the home and at the workplace. For feminists, personal problems can be solved only through political means and political action. In other words, it ought to be recognised that most of women's individual problems are not domestic and private problems, but in fact structural, public, and shared problems. There is no reason to believe that feminists offer any uniform point of view. There are differences between Liberal, Radical and Marxist feminists regarding their stance towards division of spheres as well as to the extent to which private sphere ought to be brought under the purview of state legislation. For instance, Susan Okin, in her work Feminism contends that challenging the dichotomy does not mean demeaning the value of privacy or making all behaviour subject to state action. As politics influences every inch of interpersonal behaviour – from small emotions to linguistic pattern– women's issues should always remain in focus of public debate. People need to realize from everyday experience that the determination of the model behaviour in the private sphere is often the result of the decision taken formally or informally in the public domain. The domestic division of labour underlies the public inequalities between men and women. Marxist scholars have pointed out that the boundary between public and private and the laws that enforce those boundaries, benefit capital more than labour. Feminist scholars, however, point out that these boundaries and the laws that reinforce them benefit men far more than women. According to Rawls, the celebrated American moral and political philosopher of the liberal tradition, the benefits and burdens of maintaining and sustaining the boundary between public and private are not equally shared among men and women. While women have to bear most of the burden, benefits accrue to men, thereby rendering this distinction unjust, unreasonable, and problematic. Besides, this injustice is very crucial as it makes the domination of men over women look 'natural'. Louise Lamphere, American anthropologist, writes that since mid nineteenth

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 45 seventies the dichotomous relationship between men in the public sphere and women in private sphere has been critiqued by a number of Feminist anthropologists. For instance, talking of a small village in southern France, Rayna Reiter shows how men and women inhabit different domains. While women are primarily confined to the household, there are two public places that fall within women's domain: the church and few shops of which the most important is the local bakery. She shows how men and women use public places in different ways and at different times. While early in the day men leave for fields and congregate in squares and cafes to socialize after work in the evenings. In the early part of the day when women are cooking at home and doing other household chores, they are invisible to public view. But when the men have abandoned the village for fields, women come out to do their marketing in a leisurely fashion. The village then is in female hands. This kind of temporal adjustment of day to day activities testifies to fact of overall linkage between politics and the idea of division of spheres. Feminist anthropologists have led researches through almost all societies, Western and Eastern, among those emerging out of colonialism and those unaffected by it, to stress the afore-mentioned point. Thus, it becomes evident that private is not so private after all.

4.7 Indian Context Let us now briefly look at the Indian context. The reform movement that germinated under the aegis of the British colonial rulers and also engaged the Indian intelligentsia had the 'women's question as the nodal point. Its legacy continued through the first two decades of Indian Independence. Soon more specific issues relating to women's work and familial environment had to be attended to especially under the influence of refugee migration when substantial section of the middle class women started joining the workforce. From 1960 to 1975 the major issues related to discrimination of wages, health hazards and education. Although during the successive Five Year Plan Period, nothing much was achieved in actual terms, the Government appointed a Committee to undertake a thorough survey of the related rights and problems of women against the changing backdrop of the socio-economic scenario and make remedial recommendations. This brought to the fore an awareness of the major problems to be addressed. Meanwhile, the year 1975 was declared the International Year of Women and was subsequently extended for a decade. This created the context for the Indian Council for Social Science Research to majorly take up women related issues for in-depth exploration and policy formulation. Much

46 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 emphasis was given to the multifarious problems of lower class women in a developing economy like India. But no miracle happened. Violence in both public and private spheres went on unabated. But visibility of women and their issues had certainly increased. It is on this plank that future feminist movements could bring in more subtle issues as women's rights over their bodies and wedlock between patriarchy and state power, questions that had hitherto remained beyond the purview of women's movement in India. 4.8 Conclusion We will end with the problematization of the issue by Carole Pateman. She faults the leading theorists of democracy for ignoring the sexual division of labour along with women's dependent status. Pateman intends to 'connect' the public and the private, and wonders how the public world of paid employment and citizenship can be divorced from the private sphere. Pateman observes that feminists are torn by the dilemma over whether to become likemen and thereby full citizens, or to continue doing women's work that is of no value to citizenship. She searches for a non- patriarchal definition of democratic citizenship that would at once preserve women's autonomy and break down the opposition between paid and unpaid work, public and private work and independence and dependence. Given the deep social entrenchment of an ideology like patriarchy it is quite reasonable for one to wonder as to how feminism intends to simultaneously retain the division of the public and the private and break down the political implication associated with it. To reconnect the public and private in a way that women and their experiences are not subordinated and overlooked is a task that still awaits more imaginative attention of the feminists the world over. 4.9 Summing Up 1. The idea of division of spheres goes back to Classical antiquity. From Plato to Aristotle division of spheres have been variously explained. Women, by and large, have been denied political right. The same continues with the Social Contract theorist as well. 2. N Trace the history of diaspora in the modern world. N Introduce the concept of ‘other’ in the context of hybridity. 5.1 Introduction Diaspora: If one goes by dictionary entries, one will find the earliest use of the word diaspora in most of the well-known dictionaries, namely, the Cambridge Advanced Learner’s or Oxford or Webster, being inevitably linked with early Jewish movements from Israel to other parts of the world. Originally associated with the dispersal of the Jewish people in sixth century BC, the word today is widely used for the migration or scattering of people away from an established or ancestral homeland. Hybridity: In its most basic sense, hybridity refers to mixture. The term originated from biology and was subsequently employed in linguistics and in racial 50

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 51 theory in the nineteenth century. Its contemporary uses are scattered across numerous cultural concepts related to colonialism, identity, anti racism and multiculturalism and globalization. Essentially diaspora and hybridity are linked phenomena, i.e., movement of people from their original homeland to other places and new identity formation through selective appropriation, modification and various other negotiations with the 'host culture'. The objective of the present discussion is a brief exploration of the phenomena of diaspora and hybridity in the twentieth century with emphasis on South Asian and particularly Indian scenario as can be gleaned from cultural representations. 5.2 Diaspora and Hybridity From time immemorial the world civilization has been witness to the fact of vast masses of people journeying out of their native soil. Migration may be voluntary within one's region, country, or beyond and also involuntary under pressure of environmental change, paucity of resources and various kinds of political and social persecution. Recently, scholars have distinguished between different kinds of diaspora, based on its causes such as imperialism, trade or labour migrations, or by the kind of social coherence within the diaspora community and its ties to the ancestral lands. For instance, according to Rogers Brubaker, Professor of Sociology at the University of California, from the initial paradigmatic case of Jewish diaspora, the term later expanded to refer to similar other cases as the Armenian or the Greek diasporas. More recently, it has been applied to emigrant groups that continue their involvement in their homeland from overseas, such as the Albanians, Basques, Hindu Indians, Irish, Japanese, Kashmiri, Koreans, Kurds, Palestinians, Tamils and so on. Diaspora theorist William Safran, Professor Emeritus of Political Science at the University of Colorado Boulder, delineates the features of the people of a diasporic community as follows: 1) they, or their ancestors, have been dispersed from a specific original 'center' to 'peripheral,' or foreign, regions; 2) they retain a collective memory, vision, or myth about their original homeland; 3) they believe that they are not—and perhaps cannot be—fully accepted by their host society and therefore, feel partly alienated and insulated from it; 4) they regard their ancestral homeland as their true, ideal home to which they would eventually return; 5) they 52 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 believe that they should, collectively, be committed to the maintenance and the safety and security of their original homeland; and 6) they continue to relate, personally or vicariously, to that homeland in one way or another, and this defines their ethno-communal consciousness and sense of solidarity. Closely in line with this typography A.K.Sahoo and Brij Maharaj in their work on Asian diaspora Sociology, argue that a migration can be defined as 'Diaspora' if four conditions are met: firstly, an ethnic consciousness; secondly, an active associative life; thirdly, contacts with the land of origin in various forms, real or imaginary; and fourthly, by relations with other groups of the same ethnic origin spread over the world. Thus, diaspora as a social form is an identified group characterized by their relationship despite dispersal. 5.3 Major Movements: History and Present If we try to look into the history of diaspora in the modern world, we have to begin from mid 15 th century when Christopher Columbus voyaged out to discover a new sea-route and incidentally opened the 'New World'. The British Empire began to take shape during the 16th century, precisely from the Elizabethan period (1558-1603), with the English settlement of North America and the smaller islands of the Caribbean, and the establishment of joint-stock companies, most notably the East India Company, to administer colonies and overseas trade. From then onwards migration took a whole new dimension. Under socio-economic and even religious compulsions people in hordes from Britain crossed the Atlantic Ocean and settled in the 'land of promise', a land which promised a fresh new start. In order to help them build their dream land, these 'New Englanders' transported the Africans slaves to cope with the problem of shortage of manual labour. This process continued till the 20 th century even after official prohibition of slavery. Although there has been a great deal of cross-racial and cross-cultural fusion, two distinct races, the native 'Whites' and the immigrant 'Blacks' still in racial turmoil continue to plague the social fabric. In so far, as studies on diasporic communities are concerned forced migration from Africa still occupies the centre stage. After losing the thirteen colonies in North America the British concentrated their full attention in the East. South Asia was also a fertile ground for fulfilling ever increasing need of the British for working hands. Just as the British imperialists journeyed out to the colonies, there was a horde of indigenous people from the colonies who were made to move to the Empire.

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 53 These voyages however, did not end with the official withdrawal of British power from the various colonies. In fact, it can be said that at the end of the Second World War the former colonizing nations have witnessed a series of migratory moves of the people from erstwhile colonized nations to the old colonial centres often as government recruits in public services like health and transport and also as a refugee to escape the difficult and rigid political and economic conditions in their native lands. As a result, at the end of the twentieth century, Britain housed a wide variety of diaspora communities that grew out of their close connection with Australia, Africa, South Asia and China. Studies have shown that diaspora communities are always subjected to the predominant socio-political-cultural norms of the 'host country'. Too often, these people feel marginalized and suffer from a sense of alienation. The feeling of exclusion in a new country keeps them in a state of unmitigated psychological angst. Migrant population reveals a complex tension existing between distinct generations. In spite of the generational differences, the children of migrant families continue to suffer from sense of rootlessness and displacement. These have been major fodder of countless films and novels of our time. Hybridity and the concept of 'Other' This discussion takes us back to colonialism. Justification of their cultural superiority required the colonizers to create an 'inferior other'. The celebrated thesis of Edward Said has made it well known that the British colonialists had to justify their domination by convincing the subject populace of their civilization superiority and their glorious 'mission' to civilize them. This conversely saw the creation of Orient as an inferior homogenous entity to be used in defining the superior Occident. The most effective strategy of achieving this was through education policy. Macaulay's famous or infamous Minutes on education declared that the need of the day was to create a class of Indian natives who would be Indian in blood and colour, but European in taste, morals and intellect. The educational policies of the colonizers aimed at creating Europeanized natives, who suffered a precarious location between 'we' and 'they'. Homi K Bhaba, Indian English scholar and critical theorist, has developed a number of the key concepts, such as mimicry, difference and ambivalence to theoretically capture the duality that cause a split in the identity of the Western educated colonized, a social group that were a hybrid of their own cultural identity and the colonizer's cultural identity.

54 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 It is in terms of this psychological ambivalence we need to understand the struggle of the first generation of South Asians, who immigrated to Britain and USA after the independence of the subcontinent, and their progeny to find a space for articulating their diasporic identities. The predicament of the immigrant communities, as represented by films and literature, is that their fight is spread over multiple fronts like forging a positive identity by erasing a pre-given negative one, maintaining and resuscitating ties with the homeland left behind, and also adapting to the cultural mores of the new land. The result of such struggle has often been the creation of a condition of perpetual non-belonging, both here and there. We will come back to the cultural representation of this phenomenon. Feminism and Diaspora Developments in gender studies, second wave feminism, and feminist politics thereafter, have significantly impacted the western scholars' understanding and approach of diasporas. A gendered lens highlights how different the diasporic experience might be between men and women. Nadjie Sadig Al-Ali, Egyptian professor of gender studies says that as in other fields of study, large segments of diaspora studies reveal either limited or narrow conceptualization of gender roles or complete gender blindness. Diasporas cannot be fully understood and studied without taking into account how patriarchal control in the areas of laws, rights, and political dynamics and socio-cultural representation of women's bodies and sexualities. These aspects crucially inform and impact the context in which fluid diasporic individuals or communities build cultural identities. There has been a lot of theorization on Black diaspora referring to memory trauma and sense of loss. Ann Hua, Associate Professor in the Department of Women's Studies at San Diego State University, California, proposes to read Asian diaspora in the light of the theories offered for Black diaspora to gain a proper understanding of the complexities of both. Talking of diasporic Asian feminism in US and Canada, she underlines the basic issues at stake: history of colonialism and anti-colonial struggles, racism and sexism, the inter-connections among gender, race, class, sexual oppression, belonging/unbelonging and so on. One of the main objections of Asian Diasporic feminist theorists is that barring a few writers like Avtar Brah, Rey Chow and others, most other renowned theorists of diaspora like James Clifford, William Safran etc. have neglected to explore the theme of gender inequality in the context of diaspora.

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 55 Representations Novels In the age of globalisation and mass migration, societies can hardly claim an exclusive cultural, ethnic or religious origin. Diasporas are a prime example of groups of individuals living in the contact zone between two cultures. Situated as they are in neither-here-nor-there, in-between cultures, their identities challenge any simplistic approach in terms of opposition of the mutually exclusive categories of the 'self' and the 'other'. There are often multiple layers within the 'otherness'. These complexities are best brought out through novels, films and other modes of cultural representation. Just as they explore the general feeling of alienation and rootlessness among diasporic communities, they also often speak for women and their precarious location in a doubly oppressive situation characterized by patriarchal sway along with shared general sense of alienation and loss. A few powerful exploration of the theme of dual marginalisation of displaced women, and the contradictory roles of an immigrant and expatriate communities are Anita Desai's Journey to Ithaca, Bharati Mukherjee's Darkness and Desirable Daughters, and Jhumpa Lahiri's Unaccustomed Earth. The following discussion will take up two novels which are major efforts to portray the dilemmas and difficulties of diasporic experience. A major theme of the novels by Amitav Ghosh is diaspora. The Shadow Lines: The first section of the novel titled 'Going Away' constitutes breaking down of utopian ideas and ideals that cause diaspora. Ghosh makes Ila a spokesperson of the present generation which believes in westernization in particular and internationalism in general as the only paths to follow. Ila represents the author's take of the young generation of India that is contemptuous of whatever that is happening inside, a perception that impels it leave the country to find 'space' elsewhere. 'West' to at least a section of this generation is a heaven for freedom. This is the hope that makes Ila leave India: to be free, to be free from the shackles of any cultural grid, to be free from all the conventionally-indoctrinated principles. Her departure from the 'fixity', i.e. home, entails the very possibility for freedom. For Ila nothing really important ever happens in her homeland except riots and disasters which are local and petty in nature. These are absolutely different from revolutions or anti fascist wars, that spring from higher political ideals and are laden with the promise to change the order

56 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 of the world. Ila negotiates between two lands: separated by space, geography and history. However, the rosy picture of the West that Ila had in mind is soon tarnished. Being in London, Ila realizes that her freedom is more apparent than real as deep seated racial prejudice of the new land barely allows her to actually enjoy the freedom. This is topped by the infidelity of Nick Price that actually shatters Ila's hopes of finding any real foothold within another culture. Her subsequent efforts of to carve out a niche for herself in an alien land continue to be disappointing in the same way. She remains in rootless. Ghosh creates a contrast between Ila's 'Going Away' and Thamma's 'Coming Home'. Having to leave her place of birth that is Dhaka because of marriage, Thamma, while living in Calcutta, was always haunted by nostalgia of the large and comfortable house where she was born and grew up. But the home that she cherished so long never created a permanency in her imagination due to the change of times that saw Partition of the country with Dhaka becoming the capital of East Pakistan, while both the countries became a hot bed of violent riots. Now when she goes back to her home after many years, she finds that nothing was the same as she remembered. Dhaka remains her place of birth only on her passport and disembarkation card. She feels like a foreigner. She desperately searches for her once familiar Dhaka but finds it nowhere. The house where she and her sister Maya Debi had grown up was crumbling. In place of what was once a garden in their house there is now an automobile workshop with a large number of families living there. Ghosh establishes striking metaphoric parallels in delineating the dislocated persons like Thamma and Ila. Thamma has been uprooted from Dhaka while Ila has failed to cultivate roots to any place. She has no place to call her own, no culture to assimilate into. Through the process of 'going away' and 'coming home' Ghosh examines the various perspectives that encourage the state of physical mobility, connected with the idea of finding 'home', but in both cases 'home' continue to be elusive in a world of confused search for identity. The next novel that will be taken up for discussion is Jhumpa Lahiri's Namesake. In her novel (2003), Jhumpa Lahiri, a second generation Indian immigrant, reflects the immigrants' inner psyche, identity crisis, sense of belongingness, loneliness, alienation, the clash of culture, the conflicts of adjustment and the baffling ties between the first and second generation. Ashoke Ganguli in pursuance of higher studies in fiber optics goes to settle in

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 57 Cambridge and Massachusetts in USA with his wife Ashima. This was Ashoke's choice and Ashima's compulsion. Ashima, while trying hard to adapt to the ways of the new place, constantly pines to go back home. After their first child was born, as a suitable name takes time to come from 'home', they willy-nilly named the baby boy after Ashoke's favorite Russian writer Nikolai Gogol as Gogol Ganguli. Readers get to know that way back in his youth Ashoke survived a terrible train derailment where many had died. He had been reading a short story collection by Gogol just before the accident, and lying in the rubble of the accident he clutched a single page of the story 'The Overcoat' in his hand. Severely injured and with no strength to call out, dropping the crumpled page was the only thing Ashoke could do to draw the attention of medics looking for survivors. But our protagonist Gogol, ignorant of this connection between his father and Gogol, is however, not comfortable with the name that was neither American nor Indian and a point of fun and ridicule of his friends and associates. At the age of 14 he comes to hate his name. He finally had it changed to 'Nikhil' Gogol Ganguli. This change in name and Gogol's going to Yale, rather than following his father's footsteps to MIT, sets up the barriers between Gogol and his family. The distance, both geographically and emotionally, between Gogol and his parents continues to increase. Meanwhile, we get the pen picture of the struggle of Ashoke and Ashima to bring up their children the way it is done in their home country India. Lahiri shows how the first generation immigrants try their level best to follow the mannerisms, values and beliefs of their own culture and they feel bafflement noticing clash between their inherited ones and their children's imbibed ones. But for the sake of fulfilling the demands of their children, they often assimilate with the culture of the land they were living in. Gogol and her sister suffer the double alienation of the second generation migrants who are neither completely assimilated in the culture of their present homeland nor feels identity with that of their parents. However, years later in another context of accident his father revealed to him the background of his name. The rest of the story unfolds in the shadow of Ashoke's sudden death with Gogol undergoing failed relationships one after another and hopelessly searching for roots. Absolutely lonely, he is nonetheless comforted by the fact that Ashoke, prior to his death, finally told his son why he had chosen that name for him. Gogol comes to accept his name and picks up a collection of the Russian author's stories that his father had given him as a birthday present many years ago. At 32, feeling proud for his name and its meaning, Nikhil Gogol Ganguly accepted his name and destiny. Lahiri's expertise in exploring the diasporic traits in all their complexity and indeterminacy is fascinating.

58 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 Visual medium Here the discussion of TV channels like BBC, Channel 4 and ITV which regularly telecasts shows that range from genre of comedy, family drama to thrillers on Asian life in Britain will be left out because of their less familiarity with Indian/ Bengali TV viewers. Visual representation of diaspora in this discussion will be based on a somewhat popular film Bend it like Beckham made in 2002 by Gurinder Chadha. Chadha, born in Africa to Indian parents who migrated to Britain, grew up accustomed to ambivalence. Just as her Britishness was not pure, her Indianness was also not. She regularly clashed with her family's traditions, refusing to wear Indian clothes and trying to get out of her cooking duties. The director set the film in the area of England where she grew up and had the film show case many of her autobiographical components. In Bend it like Beckham the protagonist, Jesminder Bhamra, or "Jess", a Punjabi Sikh by birth isn't just a young woman trying to balance her British and Indian identities, she is also one who loves football. Jess, like Chadha, also comes from a family who was part of the Indian Diaspora and resents the traditional agenda imposed on her. In nearly every scene, we find Jess trying to come up with her own unique formula for balancing her heritage and her obsession with football. When she's in the kitchen with her mom, Jess is practicing knee-ups with a cabbage, and when hanging laundry, she bends the ball around the clothes—at once conforming to her familial duties and pursuing her dream to be a part of one of the sports that is quintessentially British. Viewers see Jess in many traditional situations—making Indian food, dancing at her sister's wedding ceremonies, and trying to wrap a pink sari in the locker room— alongside the scenes of her trying to pursue football. Bend it like Beckham helps viewers understand Jess's clever invention of a hybrid identity. Although Jess does not ignore her roots, she also does not resign herself to a life dedicated to be a faultless subscriber of tradition. Her attempt to play soccer in the park with boys and then secretly play for a team, while also trying to be a good Indian daughter, requires continuous maneuvering. David Beckham's (legendary English footballer) trademark kick of curling the ball so it looks like it's going one way, but, in midair, it actually swerves around a wall of defenders before hitting the back of the goal becomes 'a metaphor' especially for girls constantly trying to walk a tight rope between fulfilling parental expectations and personal ambition. The climactic football and the intermittent wedding scenes which Jess would have to attend capture the beauty and fullness Jess achieves from weaving her worlds together. When Jess's teammates lift her in the air, it truly feels as though she has transcended so many of the restrictions placed on her. In the locker room afterward, her

In diasporic space borders of both the worlds are constantly challenged and negotiated through which ever new forms and identities are generated. Our foregoing discussion of literary and visual representation presents a thumbnail impression of this enormously variegated playing field. 5.5 Summing Up N Essentially diaspora and hybridity are linked phenomena, i.e., movement of people from their original homeland to other places and new identity formation through selective appropriation, modification and various other negotiations with the 'host culture'. 64 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 6.2 Introduction The first step to solve any problem begins by accepting that there is a problem. To understand the problems of modern day gender discrimination as well as disparity that persists there is a need to grasp the basics of the source of such disparity which inadvertently is Patriarchy. As mentioned in The Concise Encyclopaedia of Sociology patriarchy is defined as "the totality of male domination and its pervasiveness in women's lives." The briefest glance at the current and historical outcomes of men relative to women yields an immediate impression that the latter are an unfortunate party to a societal flawed system and the origin of this system can be found in the agency of Patriarchy. To put it simply, it is a system created by and for men at the direct expense of women in a social setup which can include but need not be necessarily limited to family, clan, tribe, a grouping, or any social institution. The mechanism and institutions that reinforce and restrengthen patriarchy are important facets in learning how to deal with the problems it gives birth to and provide solutions for creating an antithetical reality against the machinations of patriarchy itself. 6.3 What is Patriarchy? Patriarchy understood in its most naïveté terms is superimposition of male dominated behaviour, thoughts and exercise, perpetuation of the same to maintain the status quo over any system where there exists members of two or more sets of genders. Classically the victims of patriarchy have been women as major part of civilized human historical epochs show the structural domination of the idea of a linear binary of gender roles put into practical effect by the agencies of patriarchy and its supporters, but the same effects have been felt by the newly acceptable ideas of third gender roles. For many civilizations all over the world patriarchy is considered a very normal form of social behaviour, the same is true for many of the modern multicultural States and Nations which support the cause of liberty equality and justice. Accepting the premise of patriarchy and being comfortable with it is the omission of not only the dignity of women but also show the decimation of the society which aims for advancement based on an all encompassing virtue of development. Modern day patriarchy expresses itself both in the private and public domains of social life in various forms. The most prevalent forms this in modern daily life is expressed in wage gap in the professional sphere, women being excluded from certain areas of

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 65 work which are specifically dominated by male and restricted to womenfolk such as combative role in the military prevalent in many countries. Social demarcation based on gender discrimination is a reality both in the developed and the developing world and it is a serious cause of concern for the holistic development of humankind. 6.4 Role of patriarchy in history The term 'patriarchy' has an ancient connotation to the faith of the Hebrews, as the term was first applied to the male leaders of the tribes of Israel whose source of power was based upon kinship and not 'contract.' In light of the controversy raging in seventeenth-century England about the legitimate source of power in society and how power relations were to be regulated and maintained, the term according to the patriarchalist such as Sir Robert Filmer argued towards a gender based source of authority centred around the male heir of a male sovereign against the contractual argument of power to the people and then to the King. Filmer argued for absolute monarchy on the patriarchalist grounds that 'kings were fathers and fathers were kings'. According to the views supported under the banner of 'classic patriarchalism' as opposed to traditional patriarchy which is later defined as paternal rule of the family. Filmer's addition was to make the procreative power of the father in the family the origin of political right in society. The patriarchalist theory didn't meet much success as the counter arguments proposed by John Locke and Thomas Hobbes triumphed over the traditional patriarchalist tradition. These philosophers argued that all men are 'naturally' free and political right can only be imposed by contract not by patriarchal fiat. Hobbes and Locke separated paternal from political power and claimed that 'contract was the genesis of political right. However, they did not include women in their notions of contract and political right. Women continued to be subordinated to men as fathers and husbands. Hobbes conceived of the family as patriarchal 'wherein the Father or Master is the Sovereign,' and Locke concluded that there is 'a Foundation in Nature' for the legal subjection of women to their husbands. Therefore, by denigrating and entire half of humankind both the patriarchalist and the contractualists divided the social sphere into a superior and inferior sector. And the most noteworthy factor being that this demarcation happened in the land of the enlightening civilization by proponents of liberal order. To understand why women are typically thought to inhabit a specific role in the arena of domestic household while men have the privilege to not only seek professional satisfaction outside of the home but engage in it vociferously, the question goes directly to the origins of patriarchy beyond the determinants of contractual theory. The layman's argument resides in the division of labour which is

66 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 frequently mapped onto a social hierarchy in which males' freedom to venture outside of the home and presumed control over women is perceived as superior and dominant characteristics of any normative social life. As such, rather than working to destabilize the historical notion of patriarchy, much literature and history assess the origins of patriarchy with great implication on the institutions of male rule and privilege and entails female subordination. 6.5 Patriarchal society The exposition of patriarchy in a system is directly related to the concept of power exercise of one social strata over the other. Power in this sense is related to a position of privilege and preference in a society. In a system in which men have more power than women, it is understood that men enjoy a higher level of privilege to which women are not entitled residing in the same system. Therefore, the concept of patriarchy exposition of power in a hierarchical and exploitative manner has been central to the antithetical onslaught led by feminist theories. It is an attempt to explain the stratification of power and privilege by gender that can be observed by many objective measures, society can be observed as the macrocosm of patriarchal machination. A patriarchy, deriving from the ancient Greek patriarches, was a society where power was held by and passed down through the elder males. The modern historians as well as sociologists while theorising, describes a "patriarchal society," as men hold the positions of power and have more privilege, which can be seen both in the microcosmic entity of family where the male acts as head of the family unit, leaders of social as well as political outfits and groups, leaders and bosses in the workplace, and in the meta structure of state as heads of government (HOG's). In systematic patriarchy, there exists a hierarchy among men as well. In traditional patriarchy, the elder men had power over the younger generations of men. In modern patriarchy, some men hold more power (and privilege) by virtue of the position of authority, and this hierarchy of power (and privilege) is considered acceptable. The situation gets problematized in various ways as the patriarchal society perceives women in power as an exception to a collectively held view of women's role in society which is considered an aberration rather than an encouraging behaviour to be replicated en-masse. Feminist theorists have replaced the discourse that individual men oppressed women, with the structural argument that oppression of women came from the underlying bias of a patriarchal society and it's acceptance by all actors indulged in its perpetuation and exploitation. The stabilization of a patriarchal society over vast

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 67 arrays of cultural denominations and political entities for a great part of human history shows its acceptability and invulnerability even by its victims. This societal acceptability has made the existence of patriarchy as a structural form of domination. It persist even through ever changing historical conditions and stages of human development both on a atomistic level as well as a macro institutional level. 6.6 Means and agencies of patriarchy- Sexism and misogyny Patriarchy functions through various means and agencies both tangible and intangible in the society. The various institutions that perpetuate patriarchal narratives and imposes them upon the members act hand in glove with the patronage of its instigators and profiteering section. Even the agents in the form of male hegemony create a structure of systematic oppression to align themselves with the ideology of patriarchy in order to maintain their domination and protect their privileges in the bifurcated society. The reluctance to share power as well as responsibility creates the need to maintain the dominant status quo over the exploited section. Considering the Hegelian premise of ideas triumphing over intent as well as the actions, thoughts play a great role and act as prime agency of propagation of any idea as a cohesive cognitive mainframe to be implemented upon a working environment comprising of objective reality based humans with subjective thoughts. Two of the most widespread agencies to propagate the idea of patriarchy as a definitive means of controlling society are I. Sexism- Sexism as a way of functioning within a society includes most commonly discrimination and prejudice based behaviour against women and girls. Sexism as an agency functions to maintain as well as sustain the existence of the patriarchal order, or male domination, through ideological and material practices of individuals, collectives, and institutions that oppress women and girls on the basis of sex or gender. Such oppression usually takes the forms of economic exploitation and social domination both in private as well as public. Sexist behaviours, conditions, and attitudes perpetuate stereotypes of social (gender) roles based on one's biological sex. A common form of socialization that is based in sexist concepts teaches particular narratives about traditional gender roles for males and females. According to such a view, women and men are biologically opposite and therefore, their social roles are also different with widely different. Rather both the sexes share complementary roles based on their physiological disposition: women are physically weaker sex and less capable than men,

68 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 especially in the realm of logic and rational reasoning. Therefore, women are subjected to be relegated to the domestic realm of nurturance and emotions and, therefore, according to the same line of reasoning, cannot be good leaders in business, politics, and academia. Although women are seen as naturally fit for domestic work and are superb at being caretakers, their roles are devalued or not valued at all when compared with men's work. Patriarchalist tendencies see an overt expression through the agency of sexism which seeks not only to discriminate women but also demean them to secondary status due to biased perceptions and false premises. Sexism therefore acts as a medium to keep patriarchal powers at the helm of affairs by keeping women out of the line of contention by denigrating their status based on their sex. II. Misogyny- Misogyny which conventionally means hatred of women, was once a radical accusation. A way of not only discrimination but also insult, ridicule and even imposition misogyny not only takes sexist attitudes but acts on them in a hostile or violent way, and is often revealed through demeaning or denigrating comments and to an extreme point even violence. The issue with misogyny is more structural than mere hatred and dismissal. Society was and in many ways even today is organized in a misogynistic way, even if its individual members didn't see themselves as woman-haters, the structure encourages a system of behaviour where there are certain acts which are considered demeaning or insulting just because it was expected to be done by a female. For millennia, rigidity and repetition has been ingrained into male and female identities, but behind these social structures may be something more primal which is expressed by thought perpetuation of patriarchy and its manifestation in action. 6.7 Effects of patriarchy on society Patriarchy, misogyny, sexism, toxic masculinity, domination, deprivation, isolation and denigration create the entire corpus of thought based exploitation of society along strict gender lines especially targeted towards the women. It creates an entire system of restrictions put on women to stop them from venturing out in public life and gaining the pre requisites for an independent and self actualised life without the shadow of patriarchal domination. Patriarchy not only harms the women from going forward and create a holistically developed society free from discriminating and denigrating tendencies but also restrengthens the shackles of disparity between NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 69 women themselves as an overlapping agency to demarcate power parity based on status and relation to the menfolk with power. Patriarchy does not exist only in men. The force of patriarchy have a sway of both the sexes. Women can be just as patriarchal as men by holding those same types of values and biases. The effects on men have a subdued but potent effect as patriarchal agencies create a situation where makes are expected to behave in an oppressive manner to support the system which in many ways limits the scope of expression of oneself. Males subjected to ignominy if they don't toe the misogynistic line and may lead to the same form of dehumanisation faced by the women.

6.8 Societal rectification- Equality based on education empowerment. To counter the menace of patriarchy one of the foremost things to understand is that, it is a system supported by all its constituents units, both the oppressed and the oppressor. Therefore, the solution must be aimed to rectify the thought that goes behind patriarchy functioning in the social institutions both in private and public. Educating the masses about empowerment based gender roles where equality acts as the core ideal is a great method to eradicate patriarchal stereotypes. People need to be shown and made to realise how patriarchy is prevalent around them. Issues of masculinity, customs, and practices rooted in gender bias, media portrayal of women, and unequal opportunities at work, need to be debated within daily personal exchanges. The transformation of patriarchal education into transpersonal, integrative education will have to wait until the relevant authorities get over the still-prevailing taboo against therapeutic and spiritual elements in education. When systemic oppression seeps into the very core of human existence, it is tough to remove it at surface level. It requires critical intervention and sustained effort. Given the omnipresence of patriarchy, any form of affirmative action is a welcome step.

6.9 Conclusion Patriarchy has a long history in the human social sphere. It's existence is as long as civilization itself and it has sustained itself in every great historical epochs. Throughout various countries, cultures and institutions patriarchy has strengthened itself by creating differences between the genders and subverting the aspirations of women. The modern age seeks to rectify the historical mistakes perpetuated by the agencies of patriarchy and render more rights for a collaborative impetus for creation

70 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 of an equality based society that bases itself on skills rather than stereotypes. Indian patriarchy is about removing barriers from existing gender norms which create disparity and discrimination. To eradicate the patriarchal view on women in the society, it must be overtly displayed that irrespective of any gender an individual is capable of choosing their own path in life and be consistent with it. Never restricting oneself from achieving one's full potential in reaching desired targets, disproving the patriarchal belief that women cannot do things that men can do.

6.10 Summing Up N Patriarchy is an institution that has developed along with human civilization. N Patriarchy is domination of male based thoughts and actions making them primary actors over women. N Patriarchy functions in various institutions both in the public and private sphere. N There are various means and agencies by which patriarchy creates a hegemonic structure to subvert the identity of women. N The attributes of power, control, rationality and extreme competitiveness to disenfranchise the women are central to the exercise of patriarchy. N Sexism, misogyny, deprivation, discrimination, masochism, chauvinism are various way by which patriarchy imposes itself upon the societal structure to create a system of oppression aggravating the problems of women. N Feminist critique of patriarchy blames the perpetuation of exploitative means to males as well as to the acceptance and admittance by women and subtle means of expanding it through antithetical agencies as well. N The rectification of this system can be overtaken only by propagation of equality based education to create empowering situations for the womenfolk to achieve a stabilized developing and conducive environment for the future generations.

Subjugation- The act of subduing, subverting someone’s action, speech or role in a public or private affair to control their movements in order to create disparity is called subjugation. 3. Sexism- Sexism is prejudice or discrimination based on sex or gender, especially against women and girls. Although its origin is unclear, the term sexism emerged from the “second- wave” feminism of the 1960s through the 80s and was most likely modelled on the civil rights movement’s term racism (prejudice or discrimination based on race). Sexism can be a belief that one sex is superior to or more valuable than another sex. It imposes limits on what men and boys can and should do and what women and girls can and should do. The concept of sexism was originally formulated to raise consciousness about the oppression of girls and women, although by the early 21st century it had sometimes been expanded to include the oppression of any sex, including men and boys, intersexual people, and transgender people. 4. Microcosm- The microcosm-macrocosm analogy refers to the view according to which, there is a structural similarity between the human being and the cosmos as a whole. Given this fundamental analogy, truths about the nature of the cosmos as a whole may be inferred from truths about human nature, and vice versa. 5. Misogyny- Misogyny is the hatred of, contempt for, or prejudice against women or girls. It enforces sexism by punishing those who reject an inferior status for women and rewarding those who accept it. Misogyny manifests in numerous ways, including social exclusion, sex discrimination, hostility, androcentrism, patriarchy, male privilege, belittling of women, disenfranchisement of women, violence against women, and sexual objectification. 6.12 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. The term feminism can be used to describe a political, cultural or economic movement aimed at establishing equal rights and legal protection for women. Feminism involves political and sociological theories and philosophies concerned with issues of gender difference, as well as a movement that advocates gender equality for women and campaigns for women’s rights and interests. Although the terms “feminism” and “feminist” did not gain widespread use until the 1970s, they 73 74 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 were already being used in the public parlance much earlier.

Feminism has altered predominant perspectives in a wide range of areas within Western society, ranging from culture to law. Feminist activists have campaigned for women’s legal rights (rights of contract, property rights, voting rights); for women’s right to bodily integrity and autonomy, for abortion rights, and for reproductive rights (including access to contraception and quality prenatal care); for protection of women and girls from domestic violence, sexual harassment and rape; for workplace rights, including maternity leave and equal pay; against misogyny; and against other forms of gender-specific discrimination against women.

Liberal feminists believe that their philosophy positively answers each of these critiques and though liberal feminism at one time was racist, classist, and heterosexist, it has overcome these issues. With its focus on gender justice and its ability to adapt, liberal feminism is here to stay. 7.3 What is liberal feminism? Liberal Feminism began in the 18th and 19th centuries and has continued till the present day. Throughout its history the liberal feminist movement has been and continues to be focused on eliminating female subordination. Its long history is a testament to how well it has been able to adapt and change to the many issues confronting women. Liberal feminism conceives of freedom as personal autonomy—living a life of one’s own choosing—and political autonomy—being co-author of the conditions under which one lives. Liberal feminists hold that the exercise of personal autonomy depends on certain enabling conditions that are insufficiently present in women’s lives, or that social arrangements often fail to respect women’s personal autonomy and other elements of women’s flourishing. They also hold that women’s needs and interests are insufficiently reflected in the basic conditions under which they live, and that those conditions lack legitimacy because women are inadequately represented in the processes of democratic self-determination. Liberal feminists hold that autonomy deficits like these are due to the “gender system” or the patriarchal nature of inherited traditions and institutions, and that the women’s movement should work to identify and remedy them. As the protection and promotion of citizens’ autonomy is the appropriate role of the state on the liberal view, liberal feminists hold that the state can and should be the women’s movement’s ally in promoting women’s autonomy. There is disagreement among liberal feminists, however, about the role of personal

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 75 autonomy in the good life, the appropriate role of the state, and how liberal feminism is to be justified. Liberal feminism is built upon two inter-related elements. Firstly, women are rational individuals entitled to inalienable and universal human rights. In the eloquent words of the pioneering first-wave feminist Mary Wollstonecraft; “the mind has no gender.” In the context of gender equality, liberal feminists advocate a society in which women hold political equality with men. The second aspect of liberal feminism is the aim to facilitate a diversity of lifestyles amongst women. Diversity is the watchword of liberal feminists and the guiding principle should be one shaped by individual choice (as in the case of pro-choice pressure groups). A society governed by liberal feminism enables women (and men) to maximise their personal freedom to the very full. Liberal feminists contend that the governance of society would be improved significantly by a more inclusive attitude to women. These benefits would also apply to the economic realm. Access to education and career opportunities must also be broadened to benefit women – particularly those marginalised within society. Liberal feminists also wish to dismantle the patriarchal character of social institutions (notably within the political realm) that force women to suppress their natural femininity. Liberal feminism is the most significant of the main strands of feminism, and was the dominant strand during both the first-wave and the third-wave of the women’s movement. At heart, liberal feminism entails a constructive engagement with the political and legislative process (such as the One Billion Rising worldwide movement in opposition to violence against women). Ultimately, the problem of sexism is resolvable via a set of legislative and employment measures to prevent discrimination in the workplace. The focus of liberal feminism thereby, centres upon protecting the rights of females with regard to employment and reproduction. As the strand of feminism closest to the centre of the political spectrum, liberal feminism entails a rejection of the overt emphasis upon equality from those on the left of the women’s movement, and the extremist stance adopted by radicals at the margins of political debate. 7.4 History of liberal feminism Liberal feminism is part of, and thus, finds its roots in, the larger tradition of liberal political philosophy; thus, we see much liberal feminist work inspired by Immanuel Kant, John Stuart Mill, and John Rawls (and other figures in this tradition). But liberal feminism shares with feminist political philosophy generally a concern with understanding the “gender system” that is, the patriarchal nature of

76 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 inherited traditions and institutions, so that it might recommend a remedy. To get a good picture of that system, liberal feminists draw broadly from the rich tradition of feminist theorizing. For example, some liberal feminists draw on radical feminist insights into the nature of violence against women and into the nature of gender identity, some draw on psychoanalytic feminist theory; some on socialist feminist work on women's exploitation in the home. Classical-liberal or libertarian feminists understand themselves as heirs to the first generation of feminist political philosophers, for example Mary Wollstonecraft, Harriet Taylor Mill, and John Stuart Mill ; the first generation of feminist political reformers in the United States, the abolitionist feminists Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Sarah Grimke and the tradition of 19 th century anarchist feminism, including figures such as Voltairine de Cleyre. Equity feminists stress the extent to which these early thinkers and activists identify women's liberation with equal respect for women's right against coercive interference . Cultural libertarian feminists emphasize the extent to which these thinkers and activists challenged both coercive state power and the patriarchal culture. Classical-liberal or libertarian feminists hold that "the very arguments that rightly led to the legal reforms affecting the status of women during the 19 th century militate against the demands for reform from the late 20 th century women's movement". That is, they hold that the defense of equal rights and independence for women promulgated by these early feminists is incompatible with the tendency of the contemporary women's movement to call on the state to improve the lives of women. 7.5 Autonomy of Personal and Political Liberal feminists hold that women should enjoy personal autonomy. That is, they hold that women should live lives of their own choosing. Some offer "procedural" accounts of personal autonomy. These accounts suggest that to say women should enjoy personal autonomy means they are entitled to a broad range of autonomy- enabling conditions. On this view, the women's movement should work to identify and promote these conditions. Identifying these enabling conditions requires careful attention to the particular ways in which autonomy deficits are produced in diverse women's lives. Procedural accounts avoid judging directly the substance of women's choices or the arrangements that ensue. The following list of enabling conditions is representative. Being free of violence and the threat of violence: Violence and the threat of violence violate women's dignity; they make women do what others want or reduce

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 77 women's sphere of activity to avoiding harm. In some cases, violence fractures the self and takes from women their sense of self-respect. The feminist literature on violence against women documents the particular role that violence and the threat of violence play in unfairly disempowering and limiting women. Being free of the limits set by patriarchal paternalistic and moralistic laws: Patriarchal paternalistic laws restrict women's options on the grounds that such limits are in women's interest. Think for example of laws that limit women's employment options on the grounds that taking certain jobs is not in women's interest. Patriarchal moralistic laws restrict women's options on the grounds that certain options should not be available to women because morality forbids women's choosing them. Again for example, the laws that prohibit or restrict prostitution or abortion, or laws that favour certain kinds of sexual expression or family forms. Together, patriarchal paternalistic and moralistic laws steer women into socially preferred ways of life. These are unfair restrictions on women's choices, on the liberal feminist view, because women's choices should be guided by their own sense of their self-interest and by their own values. Having access to options: On the liberal feminist view, women are entitled to access to options. Women's access to options is frequently and unfairly restricted due to economic deprivation, in particular due to the "feminization of poverty". Other sources of unfairly reduced options for women are stereotyping and sex discrimination in education and employment . Such stereotyping and discrimination affects some racial, ethnic and cultural groups in particularly pernicious ways. Liberal feminists also point to the way cultural homogeneity unfairly limits women's options, for example when culture assigns identities and social roles according to sex. Some emphasize the importance of internal, psychological enabling conditions as well, for example the ability to assess one's own preferences and imagine life otherwise. Without the ability to assess the preferences on the basis of which one makes choices, and the ability to imagine life otherwise, one can't meaningfully be said to have options other than affirming the status quo. These internal enabling conditions are related to the external ones. Violence and the threat of violence, stereotyping and discrimination, material deprivation, and cultural homogeneity all can have the effect of closing down reflection and imagination. Some liberal feminists emphasize the importance of political autonomy, that is, being co-author of the conditions under which one lives. Some use contractualist political theory to argue that the state should ensure that the basic structure of society satisfies principles of justice that women, as well as men, could endorse. Others

78 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 argue that the democratic legitimacy of the basic conditions under which citizens live depends on the inclusion of women in the processes of public deliberation and electoral politics. Some liberal feminists, inspired by John Rawls' contractualist liberal theory of justice, argue that the state should ensure that the basic structure of society distributes the benefits and burdens of social cooperation fairly, that is, in a manner that women as well as men could endorse. They argue that the basic structure currently distributes benefits and burdens unfairly, in part due to the gender system, or the patriarchal nature of inherited traditions and institutions. A substantial liberal feminist literature engages this tension between associational liberty and possible state action aimed at remedying the way the current distribution of the burdens of reproduction disadvantages women. Much of this literature draws on both the liberal tradition within feminism and feminist work on care giving.

7.6 Equity feminism Equity feminism is a form of classical-liberal or libertarian feminism that holds that feminism's political role is simply to ensure that everyone's, including women's, right against coercive interference is respected. Feminism's political role involves assuring that women's right against coercive interference by private individuals is recognized and protected by the state. On the equity feminist view, the feminist slogan "the personal is political" is accurate when the state fails to recognize women's right against coercive interference, especially in women's personal lives. So, for example, in some countries husbands have legal control over their wives' persons and property. If women are to be described as currently oppressed in societies like the United States, on the equity feminist view, one must show that the state fails to protect women, as a group, from sustained and systematic rights violations. Some feminists have argued that violence against women is pervasive in societies like the United States so that, even though the law recognizes women's right against it, that right is insufficiently protected, and thus, women endure sustained and systematic denial of their right to bodily integrity. Equity feminists argue that the differences in outcomes between women and men can be explained, not by violence against women and sex discrimination, but by differences in the preferences of women and men. To be sure, classical-liberal or libertarian feminists hold that women and men are sufficiently the same that they have the "same political interests," in particular the interest in being treated as a self-owner.

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 79 7.7 Criticism By far the most common argument in the classical-liberal or libertarian feminist literature is consequentialist. The argument says that the political arrangements recommended by classical-liberalism or libertarianism, as compared with the alternatives, will provide women with more of what is good for them: for example safety, income and wealth, choices, and options. Some critics take aim at the consequentialist argument offered in support of classical-liberal or libertarian feminism. The consequentialist argument says that the political arrangements recommended by classical-liberalism or libertarianism, as compared with the alternatives, will provide women with more of what is good for them. In addition to the consequentialist argument, classical-liberal or libertarian feminists offer an argument from principle. According to this argument, regardless of the consequences, women and men should be treated as self-owners with rights to property justly acquired and to freedom from coercive interference because this is what they deserve as ends in themselves, or because this is what moral insight teaches, or because this is what their perfection requires. In short, the claim is that the dignity of women and men depends on their being treated as self-owners. Critics urge us to consider that all human beings are utterly dependent on the care of others for many years at the start of life; many come to need the care of others due to temporary or permanent disability later in life; and many require care as they become infirm at the end of life. Those who provide care for those who cannot care for themselves will also find themselves dependent on others for material support. Liberal criticism of the argument from principle begins by noting that the liberties championed by classical-liberals and libertarians are valuable because of what they make it possible for individuals to be and do. But it is not liberties alone which facilitate our being and doing what people value. It is required also, at least, adequate material resources, genuine opportunities, and standing as an equal in society. Critics have also taken aim at the treatment of oppression in classical-liberal or libertarian feminism. Recall that equity feminism holds that women are oppressed when the state fails to protect them, as a group, from sustained and systematic rights violations. Equity feminists argue that, in western countries like the United States, women are not oppressed because the state protects these rights of women. It should be conceded that much violence against women which was, in the past, tolerated or condoned is now unambiguously prohibited. But, critics contend, violence against women remains all too common in western countries, and thus, it is premature to 80 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 suggest that women are not oppressed, that is, are not effectively protected against sustained and systematic rights violations. To summarize, critics suggest that classical-liberal or libertarian feminism is not adequately supported by a consequentialist case; fails to recognize our obligations to those who cannot care for themselves; hides from view the way in which the work of care is distributed in society; denies that state power should be used to ensure equality of opportunity for women and women's equal standing in society; and (cultural libertarianism excepted) is uncritical of traditional social arrangements that limit and disadvantage women. For reasons such as these, some have argued that classical-liberal or libertarian feminism counts as neither feminist nor liberal. 7.8 Summing Up N

The phrase "socialist feminism" was increasingly used during the 1970s to describe a mixed theoretical and practical approach to achieving women's equality. 83 84 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 Socialist feminist theory analysed the connection between the oppression of women and other oppressions in society, such as racism and economic injustice. Socialists had fought for decades to create a more equal society that did not exploit the poor and the powerless in the same ways that capitalism did. Like Marxism, socialist feminism recognized the oppressive structure of a capitalist society. Like radical feminism, socialist feminism recognized the fundamental oppression of women, particularly in a patriarchal society. However, socialist feminists did not recognize gender and only gender as the exclusive basis of all oppression. Rather, they held and continue to hold that class and gender are symbiotic, at least to some degree, and one cannot be addressed without taking the other into consideration. Socialist feminism has often been compared to cultural feminism, but they are quite different although there are some similarities. Cultural feminism focuses almost exclusively on the unique traits and accomplishments of the female gender in opposition to those of men. Separatism is a key theme, but socialist feminism opposes this. The goal of socialist feminism is to work with men to achieve a level playing field for both genders. Socialist feminists have referred to cultural feminism as "pretentious." Socialist feminism is also distinctly different from liberal feminism, although the concept of liberalism has changed over the early decades of the 21st century. Though liberal feminists seek equality of the sexes, socialist feminists do not believe that is entirely possible within the constraints of current society.

socialist feminism? Socialist feminism addresses women's inequality in a two-pronged approach, connecting capitalism and patriarchy and proving that patriarchy isn't the sole source of oppression. The first objective is often referring to women's limited roles in society, staying at home and raising a family, as a major factor in their oppression. The second object aims to show that women can experience it in various other ways, including race, class, sexual orientation, and education, among others. Socialist feminism gained momentum during the 1960s to 1970s, a timeframe also known as the second wave of feminism. This wave was focused on social welfare issues. Though it is not considered the most radical form of feminism, socialist feminism still has strong ties to Marxist theory and calls for a major shift in societal structure. More specifically, it calls for an end to the capitalist economic system, which social feminists believe perpetuates sexism, patriarchy, and a division of labour based on gender. A common mentality during that second wave of feminism was that children needed their mothers at home in order to be properly nurtured. However, with the rise of single mothers and a lack of affordable childcare and liveable working wages for women, socialist feminism began to spread. Instead of focusing primarily on working-class women, socialist feminism also reached out to poor women of colour and colour activists. At the time, women of colour were experiencing a different kind of oppression based on their race. Many were victims of forced sterilization while giving birth at local hospitals, some through coercion and others through complete deception.

As result of this cooperation a joint attack on male dominated economic system and its perpetuation in the social level was addressed by the socialist feminists. 8.4 History of socialist feminism Socialist supporters for feminism have existed since the 19th century with prominent socialist thinkers such as Friedrich Engels who outlined how the capitalist economic system acts to reinforce the oppression of women under the nuclear family. Friedrich Engels set forth the theoretical basis for modern socialist feminism in his book of the Family, Private Property and the State. He explains that a communal, matriarchal social system preceded the rise of private property, class society, patriarchy, slavery and the state. He pointed to the primary role women played in the economic, social, cultural and political life of these communal societies and the egalitarian relationships that characterized them. Socialist feminists argue that women are shackled by capitalism because of their function as bearers of children. It is in the capitalist class' interest to maintain control over women's sexual functions because of the need for capitalists to secure the inheritance of their property and wealth by their own offspring. Thus, capitalists have historically sought to constrain women's sexuality under notions of the feminine virtues of virginity, female chastity and submission to one's husband. This is the cornerstone of the nuclear family and while this model of the family has gradually broken down in many western societies it is still a powerful feature in the lives of women in developing countries and even in the west it hasn't totally disappeared. For example, even today women are often quietly discriminated against due to the expectation by employers that they will become mothers and will thus, leave their profession to start a family or at the very least be rendered less productive by the burden of pregnancy. Thus, women are often passed over for promotion in favour of 86 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 men and also face wage discrimination even in the advanced west with women still frequently earning less than men for the same work. Another area which capitalism oppresses women uniquely is their role in providing unpaid household labour. Even in the developed world it is still remarkably common for women to do the majority of household tasks and chores, almost by default, leaving men free to work more and women tied to the home. Capitalism has often encouraged men to support this status quo. For instance, one of the chief propaganda tools of the anti-women's suffrage campaign in the early 20th and late 19th centuries was an appeal to working men about who would look after the house if women were allowed to take a role in the public sphere (as opposed to the private sphere of the home) with suffragettes demonized as poor wives and bad mothers for taking time out of household work to engage with politics. As a result of the overthrow of the matriarchy and the rise of private property and capitalism, women now bear the brunt of the poverty, suffering, deprivation, wars and environmental devastation the profit system creates. 8.5 Why socialist feminism? One answer is that reforming capitalism so that it is "kinder and gentler" is a dead end. Reforms are important for survival but they are always undermined or reversed. Never-ending attacks on reproductive rights and affirmative action and endless imperialist wars are just a few examples of the limits of reformism. Social justice advocates end up fighting the same battles over and over again instead of expanding democratic rights for excluded groups or preventing the next war. Equality for women cannot be achieved under capitalism while socialism cannot be attained without the participation and leadership of working and poor women in the struggle to win it. Socialist feminists believe that the only way to win the fight for women's rights is to connect it up with the larger global campaign for human liberation in all its forms. Women are the most oppressed of every oppressed group. No one needs revolutionary transformation of society worse than they do and no other group has the capacity to unite the oppressed in a mighty, working class movement that addresses all the injustices suffered by the dispossessed under capitalism: racism, poverty, homophobia, xenophobia, anti-Semitism, ageism, and war. The profit system survives on women's unpaid labour in the home and low- waged labour in market place. Their inequality is solidified like concrete in a

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 87 perverse arrangement where owners and employers profit off of women's second- class status and misery. This is a radicalizing experience and accounts for the tremendous role women play, particularly women of colour and indigenous women, as leaders in the struggle for revolutionary change. Both men and women have a stake in changing their unequal relationship. The subjugation of females lays the basis for ruling class exploitation of poor and working-class males of all races, nationalities, abilities and sexual orientations. The profit system, and the oppression of women which keep it afloat, must be overthrown for women, children and men to be free of economic insecurity and discrimination. Working class men who are feminists know that when they fight for women's rights, they are making a stand for all the exploited—including themselves! Socialist feminism would turn capitalism and the subjugation of women and all other underdogs upside down. First, because socialism replaces the current system of wealth for a few with a system that can meet the human needs of the majority. Secondly, because the fight for women's equality, with the lowest paid and most oppressed in the leadership, would guarantee everyone wins, because when those at the bottom of the economic ladder rise up, everyone moves up with them.

8.6 Critique of Global capitalism Socialist feminism developed as a critique of both radical feminism and of Marxism. Its point of departure was that radical feminism alone was ahistorical and idealist and therefore inadequate to provide an understanding of the situation of women. It argued that the radical feminist use of the concept of patriarchy was ahistorical because it assumed that relations between men and women were unchanging throughout history and universal in different cultures. The socialist feminists argued that radical feminism was simplistic in arguing that there was one single cause of women's oppression. They also said that it focused too exclusively on ideological factors and that it totally separated the oppression of women from capitalist social relations. Socialist feminism argued that Marxism was the main theoretical source that could provide feminist analysis with a materialist foundation - an analysis that took account of class relations as well as the concept of patriarchy. Such a synthesis was said to be necessary because Marxism alone was incomplete or deficient when it came to a comprehensive understanding of women's oppression. Having rejected Marxist analysis, socialist feminism then sets up the concept of 88 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 patriarchy as the centrepiece of its viewpoint. While criticizing the ahistorical approach of radical feminists such as Kate Millett, socialist feminism adopts the radical feminist notion that women's oppression is a result of a distinct system of social relations based on male supremacy and oppression of women. In the socialist feminist view, patriarchy is a system of oppression bearing equal responsibility with economic / class relations for the shape and character of a society. It rejects as "reductionist" and "economist" the notion that all social relations, including those between the sexes, are framed and determined by historically developed systems of social relations (such as capitalism, feudalism, etc) centring on production of the essentials of life. Socialist feminism asserts that patriarchy and particular relations of production have different origins and are relatively autonomous of each other. It rejects the notion that particular forms of social organization can be understood as a unified whole. Relations between men and women are said to have their own, independent logic, dynamic and history that do not stand in any necessary or contingent relationship to the prevailing relations of production.

8.7 Marxist critique Socialist feminism is a popular trend among the petty bourgeois women's liberation movement that split from the "new left" and various other liberation struggles of the late '60's and early '70's. Socialist feminists are not a consolidated group but rather various groups whose common unities are the criticisms of what they call the Marxist movement and the feminist movement as advocated by old school marxists. The Marxist critique of socialist feminism views that it does not speak to the oppression of women but merely concerns itself with things that "relate directly to the productive process." Many view "orthodox Marxism" as an outdated product of 19th century capitalism that has traditionally been insensitive to women's needs and struggles only to improve the economic conditions of workers. Feminism, on the other hand, is seen as a response to the inequality of the sexes that exists to some degree in all societies. Socialist feminists see that feminism exposes the oppression of women by men the same way that they see Marxism exposing the class nature of society. Feminism, however, is aimed only at men, ignoring what socialist feminists consider the "other" enemy of women, the capitalist system. Socialist feminists borrow much of radical feminist analysis, some of which can be seen in the analysis of the origin of women's oppression.

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 89 8.8 Criticism Socialist feminists do put forward that full liberation cannot exist for women within a capitalist society, not because class society and private property are the material basis for the oppression of women, but rather because, imperialism uses and distorts any reform designed to alleviate the oppression of women. Their analysis seems to indicate that they see imperialism more as an obstacle to their primary struggle against the patriarchy. Many, however will not agree with this characterization. Socialism is the alternative proposed. Their view of socialism, however, is Utopian. They see socialism not as the dictatorship of the proletariat, but as the elimination of what they call the hierarchy of society. Socialism, they say, is a social system where decisions are made collectively. "Collectivity" is seen as a feminist alternative to capitalism because it is the negation of the male principle of "competition" which they see as the driving force of capitalism. Thus, socialism is seen as the triumph of women over both of their enemies, the patriarchy and imperialism. In the main, this position vacillates between that of men as the enemy and imperialism as the enemy. Their tactics inevitably reflect this vacillation. Some socialist feminists choose to work on alternative institutions based on the female principle; others will join anti-imperialist organizations, such as the Lawyers Guild, but within those organizations will focus primarily on the woman question. Many times, however, socialist feminists will combine the struggle for legal reforms and the struggle for alternative institutions. Unlike radical feminists, socialist feminists tend to rely more on the state. 8.9 Summing Up N

Radical feminism is a philosophy emphasizing the patriarchal roots of inequality between men and women, or, more specifically, the social domination of women by men. Radical feminism views patriarchy as dividing societal rights, privileges, and power primarily along the lines of sex, and as a result, oppressing women and privileging men. Radical as "getting to the root") than other feminists. A radical feminist aims to dismantle patriarchy rather than making adjustments to the system through legal changes. Radical feminists also resist reducing oppression to an economic or class issue, as socialist or Marxist feminism sometimes did or does. Radical feminism opposes patriarchy, not men. To equate radical feminism to man-hating is to assume that patriarchy and men are inseparable, philosophically and politically.

Radical feminism arose from the backlash of the 1960s' focus on liberal and Marxist feminism. Radical feminism focuses on male oppression of females both privately and politically. Radical feminists claim that the central issue is the subordination of women by men within the private and political spheres. This subordination is exemplified by the rhetoric surrounding rape and victim blaming. During the 1970s, radical feminists argued that rape was not a biological predisposition among men but the socialization of men that projected women as objects. Throughout the 1970s and 1980s, radical feminists, along with liberal feminists, reformed rape statutes in all states to reflect the sentiment that rape was not just a crime against virginal women but against all women, through the fear of rape. Radical feminism focuses on the rejection of the patriarchal ideal that the private sphere (for women) focuses on child rearing, marriage, and the maintenance of the household. Due to this private sphere, the political sphere of patriarchy results in women being harmed through rape, domestic violence, and prostitution. Many radical feminists prioritized the struggle against violence on women since they saw that violence as upholding patriarchy. Radical feminists often were the driving force behind rape crisis hotlines and shelters for women subjected to domestic violence. In speaking out and organizing against violence against women, radical feminists transformed the discussion within our society. Their efforts successfully ended the silence about rape and domestic violence and helped to begin changing our criminal justice system. Many radical feminists took a stand against pornography, because they viewed it as propaganda for patriarchy and violence against women. This was more controversial and was rejected by many other feminists.

9.3 What is Radical feminism? Radical Feminist theory analyses the structures of power which oppress the female sex. Its central tenet is that women as a biological class are globally oppressed by men as a biological class. Radical feminism has from the beginning been concerned with all framework for understanding all forms of invidious hierarchical distinctions between categories of human beings.

It believes that male power is constructed and maintained through institutional and cultural practices that aim to bolster male superiority through the reinforcement of female inferiority. One such manifestation of the patriarchy is gender. The theory supports that manifestation of such kind are a socially constructed hierarchy which functions to repress female autonomy and has no basis in biology. Radical Feminists also critique all religions and their institutions and other practices that promote violence against women such as prostitution.

9.4 History of Radical feminism?

One of the first theoretical advances of second wave feminism was to separate out biological conceptions of women's identity from socially-constructed ones in order to disprove the notion that biology was destiny and hence, that women's main role was as mothers and caregivers. It was in the 1960's which saw Radical feminism emerging from second-wave feminism and the civil rights movement. Radical feminism began to diverge from other forms of feminism with their belief that the whole system of social and political institutions should be destroyed and rebuilt. Radical feminists emphasized the creation of alternative institutions and women-only spaces. They were involved in cultural initiatives such as women's music festivals. Kate Millet, in her book Sexual Politics (1970), writes that the root of women's oppression lies in the sex/gender system, and to eliminate oppression, gender has to be eliminated. This is because through elaborate social sanctions of institutions like religion and family, patriarchy justifies male control by imposing naturalized gendered ideals. Though she looks forward to an androgynous world, she warns against embodying undesirable masculine and feminine traits. The assertiveness to change this oppressive system demanded the radicalisation of the feminist movement bringing the radical feminist to the mainstream.

9.5 Discourse of Radical feminism

Unlike liberal feminists, who view power as a positive social resource that ought to be fairly distributed, and feminist phenomenologists, who understand domination in terms of a tension between transcendence and immanence, radical feminists tend NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 95 to understand power in terms of dyadic relations of dominance/subordination, often understood on analogy with the relationship between master and slave. Like socialist feminists, radical feminists take issue with the individualism of liberalism and argue that personal choices and individual achievement are not enough to transform society. And they locate women's oppression in a broader, societal context. Thus, the initial task which faced early radical feminist thinkers was that of creating a theory which both treated the family as a social institution and recognised its centrality in structuring social life as a whole. Thus, if for liberalism the state, or public law, has been seen as possessing priority in structuring social life, and if in certain interpretations of Marxism the economy, or sphere of production, has been viewed as the base from which might be explained all other social phenomena, so for radical feminism the family, sometimes described as the sphere of "reproduction," occupies an analogous role. From the beginning, radical feminists have been especially concerned with sexual and domestic violence, seeing it as fundamental to women's oppression. Andrea Dworkin, one of the most prominent radical feminists of the 1980s, distinguished herself with her crusade against sexual violence. In one of her most famous speeches, "I Want a 24 Hour Truce During Which There is No Rape," Dworkin implored men in the audience to try to understand the profound fear of sexual violence that women live with every day. This commitment to combatting sexual violence — a scourge that hinders all aspects of women's lives — is admirable. So too is radical feminists' emphasis on large-scale reform rather than small-scale tweaks. Those who work in radical feminism continue to take issue with many of the central tenets of liberal feminism, especially its focus on the individual and the supposedly free choices that individuals can make. Where the liberal sees the potential for freedom, the radical feminist sees structures of domination that are bigger than any individual. Patriarchy itself, according to this view, dominates women by positioning them as objects of men's desire. Radical feminists remain committed to getting at the root of male domination by understanding the source of power differentials, which some radical feminists, including Catharine MacKinnon, trace back to male sexuality and the notion that heterosexual intercourse enacts male domination over women. "Women and men are divided by gender, made into the sexes as we know them, by the requirements of its dominant form, heterosexuality, which institutionalizes male sexual dominance and female sexual submission.

96 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 Claiming that an exclusive feminine gender identity is detrimental to women’s development as full human persons, radical libertarian feminists encouraged women to embrace androgyny, i.e., embodying both masculine and feminine characteristics. This claim was challenged by other radical feminists who believed that being androgynous necessarily implied assuming mostly masculine traits, and sometimes the worst of the masculine characteristics. However, they understood that this was an attempt to free women to express and choose their own gender identities. Radical cultural feminists rejected this model of androgyny by suggesting that women should embrace their femininity and celebrate those values that are culturally associated with being women, thus, essentializing the ‘female nature’ that is common to all women, across varied socio-cultural-political contexts. According to radical-libertarian feminist Gayle Rubin, the sex/gender system is a “set of arrangements by which a society transforms biological sexuality into products of human activity.

This means that society (associated with patriarchal norms) takes certain biological characteristics of being male and female and converts that into a system of masculine and feminine identities that create a hierarchical power relation between men and women. Masculine traits (assertiveness, independence, practicality, etc) are associated with being a man and these are more celebrated than feminine traits (submissiveness, interdependence, being emotional) that are looked down upon. These societal constructions are naturalized as biological or inherent to individuals and this limits their freedom to express their gender identities if different from their biological identities. The early organisers of radical feminism shared with the rest of the New Left a belief in the systemic nature of much of political injustice. Thus, when these women began to perceive the situation of women as representing a case of this injustice, they employed the adjective “radical” to describe their stance. It signified a commitment to look for root causes. Radical feminists viewed the activities of women who had been involved in existing business and professional women’s organisations as “reformist,” helpful and necessary but fundamentally inconsequential. This view stemmed both from a belief that the criticisms liberal feminism made of relations between women and men in both domestic and non-domestic life did not go far enough, and also, from a belief that liberal feminism had no sense of the importance of gender, and the social relations of domestic life, in structuring all social life. For radical feminism, liberal feminism’s belief in the power of the law to remedy inequalities between women and men testified to a lack of insight into the fundamentality of the “sex-role system,” those practices and institutions which were important in creating and maintaining sex-role differences. Of particular importance was the family, for it was here that biological men and women learned the cultural NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 97 constituents of masculinity and femininity, and learned about the fundamental differences of power which, according to radical feminism, were a necessary component of both. The attention that radical feminists gave to the dynamics of personal relations was accompanied by a belief that attention to feelings and personal experience was a necessary condition for eliminating the present sex-role system. Since the components of that system were embedded in deep and complex ways in daily life experience, it was only through careful examination of that experience that the multiple manifestations of gender could be understood and thus changed. Essentially, radical libertarian feminists claimed that gender is separable from sex, and naturalized gender roles are attempts on the part of patriarchal society's to control women through rigid sanctions. Hence, most of them supported the idea of androgyny as it implied women, (and men) can choose to embody the combination of gender identities and traits at will. While most radical libertarian feminists believed that there should not be any judgment towards sexual practices (as being good, healthy, normal as opposed to bad, unhealthy, abnormal), radical cultural feminists believed that the only unambiguously good form of sexuality for women is monogamous lesbianism. They believed that patriarchy as an institution traps women into heterosexual relationships that need to be severed in order to end sexual oppression.

9.6 Critique of radical feminism Both radical libertarian and radical cultural feminism have been heavily critiqued by each other as well as non radical feminists. Radical libertarian feminism has been criticised for its overemphasis on 'choice'. Critics argue that while the idea of women's freedom to choose is empowering, in reality, their ability to do so is seriously constrained in a patriarchal context. Patriarchy coerces women into upholding patriarchal norms by constraining the range of choices available to them, and creating the illusion of 'free choice', when in reality women are conditioned to act a certain way due to patriarchal social conditioning. On the other hand, radical cultural feminists have been criticized because of essentializing masculine and feminine traits as being universal. Essentialism has been previously used to justify many forms of oppression (racism, colonialism, slavery), and by trapping women into rigid roles, radical cultural feminism falls into the danger of doing the same. Generalising every man as the oppressor and every woman as the victim is oversimplifying the way patriarchy works- through elaborate system of social sanctions and institutions.

98 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 Further, this also rejects the nuanced relationship that sexism has with other forms of oppression, such as racism or classism or casteism, in the case of India. In other words, the power hierarchies become unstable when one or more of these axes of oppression are thrown into the equation. For instance, the direction of oppression between a white woman and a black man, or between an upper caste woman and a lower caste man cannot be analysed as simplistically as saying 'all men are oppressors'. By proclaiming universal sisterhood through similar experiences, radical feminism negates the unique socio-cultural contexts that different women come from, thus, being in danger of being representative of only one type of feminism, that of a white, western feminism. It is precisely in this context of essentialism and being perceived as primarily a feminism of white, middle class women, other forms of feminisms such as feminism of colour, postcolonial and third world feminism emerged. The strengths of radical feminism lay in its recognition of the interconnection of sexuality and gender and of their importance in affecting social life, its weaknesses result from its tendency to collapse gender into sexuality and to see all societies as fundamentally similar.

9.7 Conclusion In sum, for radical feminism, women's inferior political and economic status were mere symptoms of a more fundamental problem: an inferior status and lack of power built into the role of femininity. Radical feminism challenged prevailing beliefs that the constituents of this role, such as women's abilities and interests in child-rearing or lack of assertiveness or even the content of women's sexual interests, were "natural." Rather the argument was made that all but certain limited biological differences between women and men were cultural. The constituents of the sex-role system were social constructions, and more important, such constructions were fundamentally antithetical to the interests of women. The norms embodied in femininity discouraged women from developing their intellectual, artistic, and physical capacities. It dissuaded women from thinking of themselves and from being thought of by others as autonomous agents. Whereas "masculinity" embodied certain traits associated with adulthood, such as physical strength, rationality, and emotional control, "femininity," in part embodied traits associated with childhood, such as weakness and irrationality. The norms of femininity created an emphasis in women's lives on achieving the roles of wife and mother whose outcome was a comparable imbalance between men and women in economic and emotional autonomy. Moreover,

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 99 while the norms embodied in femininity often worked against women, the norms embodied in masculinity served to create many unattractive beings, those who too frequently were aggressive, selfish, instrumental in their dealings with others, and unskilled in the arts of nurturance and caring. The source of the problem, according to radical feminism, was to be found in the home and family, where girls and boys received their initial and most primary lessons on the differences between the sexes and where adult women and men played out the lessons that they learned. The lessons of gender differences learned and practiced in the home were in turn transferred to the outside world when women did leave the home. Thus, when women took paid employment, they replicated and were expected to replicate the practices and inferior status of women which were a part of the home. In sum, according to radical feminism, the inferior status of women as political or economic beings was merely the symptom of a problem whose roots were to be located elsewhere. 9.8 Summing Up N Radical feminist thought thus, analyses women's oppression primarily from the understanding of patriarchal control over women's sexuality and reproductive labour. N Radical feminism not only attempts to understand women's oppression and victimhood but also focuses on celebrating womanhood and sisterhood and consciousness raising to negotiate with patriarchal and structural inequities. N Societal constructions are naturalized as biological or inherent to individuals and this limits their freedom to express their gender identities. N Commitment to getting at the root of male domination by understanding the source of power differentials. 9.9 Glossary 1. There is an increase in the use of rhetoric that women’s rights are human rights as a framing and justification of feminist action, simultaneous with a turn of feminist activity away from autonomous separatist groups towards their mainstreaming within civil society and the state. Of course, neither the use of the notion of equal rights nor demands on the state are entirely new within feminism, but both the state of the use of universalistic conceptions of human rights, which draw down on global and regional practices and institutions, and the extent of the orientation to states constitute new developments. This raises a number of questions as to how this is to be understood and why it is happening. Globalization has facilitated new spaces, institutions and rhetoric where the notion of universal human rights is a powerful justificatory 102

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 103 principle embedded in specific institutions. Globalization constitutes a new framing for feminist politics that assists the change in discursive presentation and new opportunities for argumentation. Globalization impacts on the nature of feminism especially by creating changes in political opportunities. On a different stratum altogether we have seen an overlapping of the traditional and the modern aspects of feminism with the advent of the new millennium. New Feminism becomes a crucial part of this overlapping and resuscitate the controversial dichotomy of the linear and horizontal progression of modernity and it’s aspects. 10.3 Meaning of Neo feminism New feminism is traditionally attributed to the opponents of the 1920’s suffragette movement claiming that differentiation of the female self from the men women duality and creating an individualist rhetoric will only harm the cause of feminists. The new feminists argue in favour of such measures as family allowances paid directly to mothers, welfare schemes targeted towards the females of the society and increased impetus on female health care within the state. They were also largely supportive of protective legislation and safeguards in the industry. The new feminists in many places have been referred as welfare feminists or welfare suffragists for their encouragement of state based gendered welfare. 10.4 History of Neo feminism In an 180° turn, the Welfare suffragist based new feminism has been taken over by one of the most patriarchal institutions in existence, The Roman Catholic Church. there is a need to overcome all discrimination, violence and exploitation and with it creating an independent narrative of women power and empowerment. The crucible of such a thought is centred around integral complementarity of sexes. Pope John Paul II had begun his theologically-based affirmation of integral gender complementarity in his Wednesday audiences between 1979 and 1984, in what is now compiled as the Theology of the Body. In this work, he describes his belief that men and women are formed as complementary human beings for the sake of loving and being loved. Pope John Paul II continued his call for women to become advocates of humanity

104 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 in his Apostolic Letter to Women prior to the 1995 Beijing Women’s conference. Integral complementarity differs from fractional complementarity. In that it argues that men and women are each whole persons in and of themselves, and, together, equal more than the sum of their parts. The concept of fractional complementarity argues that a man and woman each make up a part of a person. The form of integral complementarity supported by the Pope eschews the idea that the relationship between the two sexes isn’t based on the dichotomous relationship of superiority or inferiority. Both men and women are integral part and are cooperative in nature. 10.5 Difference feminism New feminism in the broader corpus of feminism is identified as a form of difference feminism,. Difference feminism advocates the idea that women and men are different in aspects of role as well as identity. There is no competition between both and both exists as coordinated units of the human social structure. It also supports the idea that men and women have different strengths, perspectives substantiating varied roles. Though new feminism supports differentiation of assessment, it supports the contradictory idea of judging the roles based on the premise of holistic equality. New feminism gives equal worth and dignity of both sexes despite differentiation of characteristics and functionality. Certain concepts that make it a distinct trend among feminists is that it recognises biological differences as significant and does not compromise sexual equality. New Feminism holds that women in society should be valued in their traditional role as child bearers which have been vehemently opposed by radical feminists maintaining that women are individuals with equal worth as men; and that, in social, economic and legal senses they should be equal, while accepting the natural differences between the sexes. The acceptance of naturalization of gender roles among sexes is what that has brought the wrath of radical feminists against the new feminists. New feminists support the idea that politics is what that has problematized the feminists movement and in a way discredited it as a reactionary movement rather than progressive stance for equality. To solve this the narrative put forward by the new feminists is that natural roles are dedicated to women due to societal and historical imperatives which is not demeaning of exploitative. Treating the natural roles with respect and keeping them in the same precipice as men is what is required to emancipate the women of the world. Where major trends of feminism support politicization of the gender and political change supporting it’s cause, the new feminists argue that depoliticising of the gendered norms can create real equality with mutual respectability of respective roles. Radical feminists have criticized this stance as imposition of latent patriarchy in the name of

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 105 biological imperative. This is seen as moulding thought process to keep command over the power structure by the association of the exploitative gender and conservative dogmatism of religion. 10.6 Conclusion New feminists claim that men and women are different and that this difference affects the way they live their lives, what they care about, and their strengths and weaknesses. Women can fulfill their vocational calling by acting as spiritual mothers in whatever their occupation: as wife, mother, consecrated woman, working professional, or single woman. Differences between the sexes should never be used to unilaterally discriminate except in cases when a task is contingent upon a person being of a certain. 10.7 Summing Up N With an increased focus on state interventions and a global discourse of human rights, feminisms was reshaped. It has always involved theoretical disagreements and reflected different perceptions and interests of women. Today it has multiple connotations and includes a diversity of approaches with relative focus on different issues. To understand the crux of the feminist approach, we need to examine these diversities. In this context, it is pertinent to use 109

110 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 the term 'feminisms' rather than feminism. Despite its multiple connotations and diversities, it can be argued that feminism believes in subordination, oppression and subjugation of women and calls for equal rights and opportunities and a change in this subordination. It differs on the sources and levels of subordination and the means to change it. The origin of feminism lies in the West though there is debate on the exact period of emergence of the feminist approach. Feminism in the West is also a site of disagreements, debates and controversies. Our objective is to explore those debates. The term 'feminist' was first used in 1880s to indicate demands for equal legal and political rights of women. Feminism is often being criticized as a Western approach or an approach that addresses the problems of Western white women only. The idea originated and flourished first in the West but later came to include women and issues of the non-western world too. To understand the evolution of the idea of Feminism, we must study the development of Feminism in the West. Feminism in the West has gone through different changes and phases with each phase focussing on different issues. From this perspective, Feminism can be divided into three waves- First wave, Second wave and Third wave. These divisions are not in terms of time period but in terms of issues that they addressed. Within these three waves, we find different variants of Feminism-Liberal feminism, Radical feminism, Socialist feminism and Postmodern feminism. Each of these variants differ with the other in terms of the broader political ideologies they identify with, their theoretical standpoints and the issues they focus upon.

11.3 Early Feminism in the West Feminist activity in the West initiated in early modern England though the term 'feminist' first came into use in the 1880s. These activities are usually identified with efforts made by women to seek better treatment from men though there exists debate on whether they can be regarded as feminism. The earliest documented expression of feminist consciousness is said to have occurred in the West wherein alternative readings of Christian theology were used to assert the worth of women. In the beginning of the fifteenth century, claims were raised in Europe on educating women and subsequently there developed a Europe-wide public debate called Querelle des femmes. This debate was mainly focussed on education of women and feminine morality and manners and the arguments in favour of women were based on alternative readings of Bible. In 1405, Christian De Pisan published a book, Book of the City of Ladies wherein she documented remarkable contributions made by women since ancient times. This book is regarded as one of the earliest feminist text. England, during the period between sixteenth to eighteenth century witnessed several developments that challenged patriarchal authority

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 111 in social, religious and cultural fields like education, arts, and literary tradition. From sixteenth century there emerged feminist voices in the field of literature. Katherine Philips (Orinda), Aphra Behn (Astrea), Deleriviere Manley, Mary Pix, Catherine Trotter, Mary Astell were all female writers from seventeenth and eighteenth century England who made remarkable contributions in the field of literary tradition. Their work highlighted different woman-identified issues. Women poets in the later half of the seventeenth century took up the subject of female friendship and also wrote passionately about relationships between women. The woman-centric literary tradition of this period was England-based and it also raised the issue of women's education. In the early seventeenth century, the English Catholic reformer, Mary Ward, created a new religious order called the Institute of Blessed Virgin Mary. This institution offered an opportunity to English girls to have free education and thus, expanded the scope of women's education. The humanist philosophers of the Renaissance also reflected enlightened views of women. Inspired by Enlightenment philosophers' focus on reason and rationality thinkers like Mary Astell, Marie de Gourmay, Anna Maria Van Schurman questioned the traditional authority of patriarchy exercised through unreasonable institutions. Akkerman and Sturum have described this seventeenth century feminism as 'rationalist feminism' in Europe. These activities, often termed as 'early feminist' activities in the West, may not have brought crucial legislative changes but they laid the foundation for further development of feminist thought in the forthcoming centuries.

11.4 Feminism in the West: Eighteenth to Nineteenth Century The eighteenth century was the time when the Enlightenment ideas reached their fullest political expression. The ideas of reason, rationality, freedom and individual worth got a tangible form through the French Revolution and the American Declaration of Independence. It was in this backdrop that the first wave of feminism evolved in the West. The first wave of feminism, that was initiated in the late eighteenth century, challenged the idea of individual in the contemporary dominant Western ideology of liberalism. This variant of feminism was called liberal feminism and it was a Western idea. Chris Beasley refers to liberal feminism as a 'broad church' where inspite of all commonalities, variations exist between its different variants [Beasley, 2005]. She has identified three characteristic features of liberal feminism: N Focus on reason and the idea of the universal human N Focus on the status of women as the basis of a just society N Focus on social reforms to ensure to alleviate the status of women

112 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 11.4.1 Liberal Feminism: First Wave The liberal feminism of the first wave argued for inclusion of women in the liberal project. Influenced by the Enlightenment philosophy's focus on reason, Liberalism was based on the belief in the autonomy and freedom of individual as a rational agent. Liberal feminism argued that liberalism is a flawed descendent of Enlightenment as this rational individual of liberalism is exclusively male and does not include women and women were considered irrational creatures without any social, economic and political rights like right to education, vote or property. Liberal feminism challenged liberalism's claim of universality and argued for extension of social and political rights to women. The most important proponent of liberal feminism of this era was Mary Wollstonecraft. She is known to be the first major feminist thinker of the West.

FEMINISM AND THE POLITICS OF INTERPRETATION BY ... (D141208497)

Her A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792) is regarded as a crucial text of liberal feminism where she called for inalienable human rights for women also. An advocate of individual rights, she challenged the idea that women are devoid of the power of reason and have a different set of virtues. She questioned the dominant feminine virtues of her time like frivolity, vanity, sensuousness or sensibility and called for the power of reason. These feminine virtues are a construct that impedes the development of women. Women, to her, are equally capable of reason as men. She wanted women to be given access to equal education with men and social participation to public life. She had a debate with Rousseau on education of women. Rousseau, in his Emile, argued for an education of women that was different from men. Confronting Rousseau's view, she argued that since by nature men and women are equally capable of reason, there should never be different set of virtues for men and women. Liberal feminism wanted equal rights for men and women and believed that this could be achieved through legislative changes. It never challenged the capitalist system and believed that changes in the position of women can be brought through guarantee of rights through legislative changes within that system. It is also called equal rights feminism. The principles of liberal feminism later faced criticism from radical feminism as well as Marxist and Socialist feminism. 11.4.2 Marxist-Socialist Feminism Liberal feminism has been criticized by another tradition of feminist thought in the West- Marxist and Socialist feminism. This tradition has Marxism as its intellectual foundation. By the late nineteenth century, a sharp split was observed in many European states between mainstream feminists with their focus on equality and rights and the Marxist- Socialist feminists who emphasized on class struggle and revolution. Classical Marxism viewed women's oppression as a product of capitalism which can

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 113 be solved only with the abolition of capitalism. It gave primacy to class politics over sexual politics but both Marx and Engels have identified the sexual division of labour between man and woman as the first division of labour in human history. Fredrich Engel's The Origin of Family, Private Property and the State (1884) gave an account of how the origin of class society based on private property led to a transition from matriarchal to patriarchal family and can be regarded as an earliest expression of the origin of patriarchy. He gave a historical-materialist explanation of the oppression of women. As he says, 'The overthrow of the mother's right was the world historic defeat of the female sex. The man seized the reign in the house also; the woman was degraded, enthralled, the slave of man's lust, a mere instrument of breeding children'. Following the Marxist line, Alexandra Kollontai argued that the world of women is divided between bourgeois and proletariat women, the interests and aspirations of which differ from each other. Other than the suffering within a family, there can never be a universal 'woman question' for there can never be any unanimity of aspirations between these classes of women. For women, the solution of the oppression within the family is no less important than achieving political rights and economic independence. The 'woman question' acquired importance in the writings of August Bebel, leader of the German Social Democratic party, who established an official party line on this question in Germany in late nineteenth century. His book Woman under Socialism (1878) is considered a key text of the Marxist-socialist feminism in Germany. Bebel agreed with Engels that oppression of women is a product of society and it can only end with a socialist revolution and establishment of a socialist society, where women will have economic independence and all domestic work will be done collectively. But Bebel gave importance to non-economic aspects of women's oppression also like the double standard or sexual morality or the restrictions imposed on women's freedom through conventional female dresses. He also recognized the dual oppression of women through capitalism and patriarchy and highlighted the role of women in socialism. Bebel's ideas were later supported by Clara Zetkin, another leader of the Social Democratic Party, who believed that socialism cannot be achieved without establishing equality between sexes.

11.5 Feminism in the West: Twentieth Century

The twentieth century has been crucial for feminism in the West as the diversities in the feminist tradition flourished and acquired more complexities in this century. This century witnessed liberal feminism and Marxist feminism acquiring new dimensions. There have also been alternative traditions like the radical feminism and post-modern feminism.

11.5.1 Liberal Feminism: Second and Third Wave

Liberal feminism of the first wave inspired the Suffragette movement in Europe and America that initiated in nineteenth century and reached its culmination in twentieth century. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, The Pankhurst sisters, Sarah Grimke, Angelina Grimke were all British and American women who demanded political, legal and economic equality of women with men. John Stuart Mill was also an ardent campaigner for women's economic and political rights. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, the American feminist, was an activist of the American anti-slavery movement and she along with others raised voice against exclusion of women from an anti-slavery convention held in London in 1840. In her leadership the first women's rights convention was held in America in 1848 - the Seneca Falls Convention. The convention made a Declaration of Sentiments and Resolution through which demands were raised for rights of women as citizens to vote, to property, to education, to employment and to public participation in politics and church. Elizabeth Cady Stanton is known for being instrumental in making a trans atlantic network of feminists demanding equal rights for women. The first wave of liberal feminism brought the following changes through legal reforms in different states:

- Rights for women to have admission in medical schools
- Right to have job opportunities in public and clerical work
- Reforms in matrimonial laws ensuring equality of women
- Reforms in laws on sexual morality
- Right to have custody of child
- Right to have ownership in property
- Right to have access in political process

Liberal Feminism of first wave in the West is said to have reached its fullest expression by the first half of the twentieth century. Then there was a period of silence after which the major feminist breakthrough again took place in the 1970s. On first wave of liberal feminism, Betty Friedan said, 'The fact is that to women born after 1920, feminism was dead history. It ended as a vital movement in America with NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 115 the winning of that final right: the vote” [Friedan, 1965]. In her The Feminine Mystique, she raised the issue of the emergence of a new feminism of women’s liberation which is more complex than the old feminism of equal rights. This new version of liberal feminism is said to be belonging to the second wave of feminism. While the earlier version of liberal feminism was individualist and reformist, the new one was collective and revolutionary. Focus on collective action was found in the writings of second wave liberal feminists like Gloria Steinem and Beatrice Faust. Equal rights, opportunities and non-discrimination were again demanded in new forms. Friedan founded the National Organization for Women (NOW) in the USA which demanded equal participation in mainstream American society within the framework of existing laws. The liberal feminism of the second wave does not focus upon freedom or equality of individual woman or self-realization of individual woman to put an end to gender-based social hierarchy; rather it focuses on legal and political reforms through collective action. It shares commonality with the first wave on its support for the liberal ideas of equality and democracy and furthering the cause of women through institutional reforms. Waves of feminism are not chronological developments and are often found to be coexisting. Second wave of liberal feminism and third wave of liberal feminism often coexisted with each other. Naomi Wolf, Natasha Walter, Camilia Paglia, Kate Rolphe, Susan Okin can be regarded as proponents of the third wave of liberal feminism, which emerged as a response to radical feminism. In 1993, Naomi Wolf in her Fire with Fire gave the idea of ‘power feminism’ and ‘gender quake’ where instead of viewing women as victims of oppression she asserted on independence of women and their power to achieve success. The focus was strongly on individual self-development as the political means to achieve equality and the idea of woman as a rational autonomous individual. The demands were no longer limited to involvement of women in public sphere; rather there were demands for better conditions in employment to make it more compatible with family life and more involvement of men in domestic responsibilities. There was call for a paradigm change in social policy with more role of state in ensuring gender equality and justice through education, employment legislation and child care provisions. A gender just society needs a restructuring of domestic and caring responsibilities and this structuring should be done by public policy.

11.5.2 Radical Feminism Radical feminism is a development of twentieth century. The idea developed as a critique of and a response to the first wave of liberal feminism based on equal

In 1949, Simone De Beauvoir published The Second Sex, known as a ground breaking work on how gender is constructed. “One is not born a woman, but made” , argued Beauvoir [Beauvoir, 1949]. Her main argument was that the main reason behind women’s oppression is their cultural construction as the other. This argument later became the key issue of second wave feminism.

Kate Millet’s Sexual Politics , Germaine Greer’s The Female Eunuch , Shulamith Firestone’s The

Dialectic of Sex, Michael Wandor’s The Body Politic are all key texts that propagated the idea of radical feminism during the second half of the twentieth century. The key ideas of radical feminism are:

- N Patriarchy is the basis of subordination and oppression of women
- N Position of women can improve only if patriarchy is overthrown
- N Legal reforms cannot bring the desired changes in society
- N Society needs radical change not reforms
- N Whatever personal is political
- N Relation between sexes is power-centric and thus political
- N Focus on difference and not equality between sexes

Radical feminism put forth the idea of patriarchy as a root cause behind subordination and oppression of women in society. Patriarchy is the principle of rule of men. Radical feminism focussed on patriarchy as power-centred political relationship between sexes and believed that emancipation of women cannot be possible within this structure of power-centred relationship. Millett argues that the principle of patriarchy is two-fold – ‘male shall dominate female, elder male shall dominate young’. This sexual domination of male is so universal and complete that it expands over all spheres of life. It permeates our culture and appears as natural to us. It becomes a pervasive ideology through gender socialization from early stages of life. Women are conditioned to believe that they are made for roles in private sphere only while the public sphere is for men. Radical feminism focused on the idea of ‘personal is political’ and contested the idea of public-private divide. Politics does not end at the threshold of home. It is very much existent in personal man-woman relationships. Marriage and motherhood bear the manifestations of patriarchy. Marriage is conceived by radical feminists as perpetuating male domination camouflaged by love. Firestone

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 117 argued 'Love, perhaps even more than child bearing, is the pivot of women's oppression today'. Radical feminism brought to the forefront several aspects of subordination and oppression of women- domestic violence, sexual violence, domestic labour, reproduction, pornography. Catherine Mckinnon and Andrea Dworkin were radical feminists known for their anti-pornography campaigns. The idea of reproductive rights was also advocated by them as rights of women to decide on the time and mode of reproduction. Some radical feminists have also challenged the idea of heterosexuality and called it a political act. 'Woman identified woman' or 'lesbian continuum' are all challenges to heterosexuality as an essentialist principle. With its radical ideas radical feminism made a significant challenge to mainstream political theory and traditions of feminist thought influenced by it and successfully laid the claim that woman should develop their own political theory.

11.5.3 Marxist and Socialist Feminism The classical Marxist position gave primacy to class politics over sexual politics. This classical Marxist position that developed in nineteenth century was contested later by some socialist feminists of twentieth century. Socialist feminists agree with classical Marxism that the oppression of women is rooted in their social and economic life, but they differ on the relative importance of gender and class. Classical Marxists gave priority to class division over sex division and regarded 'class war' as more fundamental than 'sex war'. Women's revolution is just viewed as a by-product of social revolution in which capitalism will be overthrown and socialism established. But socialist feminists of twentieth century questioned this prioritization of class politics over sexual politics and highlighted the discrimination women faced in socialist societies or within socialist parties. Marxist-socialist feminism in West during this period focused on cultural and ideological roots of patriarchy and its link with capitalism. Juliet Mitchell suggested in her Women's Estate (1971) that women perform four social functions: i) they are all members of the workforce and are active in production; ii) they bear children and thus, reproduce human species; iii) they socialize the children; iv) they are sex objects. Abolition of capitalist system is not enough to liberate women. Marxist-Socialist feminism became popular in Britain and America also in the twentieth century. Male domination of socialist politics in Britain was challenged by Sylvia Pankhurst. An active participant of revolutionary political movements in Europe after the First World War, she argued that emancipation of women is linked to emancipation of the working class. She argued for collectivisation of housework and child care and condemned marriage as an unequal economic relation between

118 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 sexes where the woman is economically dependent on the man. She supported open relationships based on love. The American Communist Party was founded in 1919 where a handful of women acquired important positions during the 1930s giving rise to debates on feminist issues. Mary Inman, an American feminist of the Marxian tradition, focused on the politics of personal life and domestic labour. She extended Marxist economic categories to include women's domestic labour and to highlight how housework plays an important role in capitalism as it is the process through which labour power is reproduced and maintained. She wanted housewives in capitalist societies to organize and demand for changes in their working conditions. An important feature of Marxist-socialist feminism in America is that within these tradition voices of black women were raised. A group of American black women, who were part of the Communist Party, highlighted the issue that the specific condition of exploitation of poor black women and argued for making their struggle central to any sort of emancipatory movement for women. They insisted that the people who were most exploited in the capitalist societies were black women domestic workers, who were employed by white housewives to do menial domestic chores. They focused on the issue of triple oppression-race, class and gender- of black women in capitalist societies. 11.6 Postmodern Feminism Feminism has many variants most of which thrive on the modern-postmodern continuum. In the earlier section we have discussed feminism with focus on issues of modernity like equality, freedom, rights and justice. They have existed as part of the metanarratives of liberalism and Marxism. But we also have approaches of feminism which can be associated with postmodernism. The ideals and principles of modernity that developed in Europe since the Enlightenment got challenged during twentieth century in the works of theorists like Lacan, Derrida and Foucault. Influenced by postmodern approach, French Feminism focused on issues of different dimension. Theorists like Julia Kristeva, Helene Cixous and Luce Irigaray raised the issue that whether there exists anything particular called feminine or is there any essential femininity based on biology. Postmodern feminism criticized all the earlier feminisms for being universal and based on meta narrative. If gender is a construction, the idea of any essential femininity becomes fluid. If all dichotomies or binaries are constructed, the question of gender becomes linguistic rather than material or social, argues Judith Butler. To her, not only gender but sex is also a product of society and not determined by nature. Society creates the categories of 'man' and 'woman' by

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 119 socializing us and attaching great importance to certain physiological features of our anatomy. Society constructs the idea of masculinity and femininity, which is called gendering. Gender roles, thus, can be undone also. 11.7 Conclusion The different phases of feminism indicates that there have always been many feminisms in the movement. It is, therefore, not just a single ideology to suit all time and conditions. There have always been debates and counter debates which have enriched the ideology with an innate objective to reduce gender discrimination and in promoting equality. 11.8 Summing Up N The present unit, have studied the idea of feminism as it evolved in West with a focus on the diversities and complexities of the concept. Often criticized later as a Western idea, the evolution was predominantly Western as most of the main variants of feminism have developed in the West, particularly Europe and America. N To study the concept, effort is being given for a discussion century-wise with each century having more than one tradition. The nineteenth and twentieth centuries have been most crucial for feminism in the West as in these centuries most of the crucial categories of feminism developing in the West namely liberal feminism, Marxist-socialist feminism, radical feminism and postmodern feminism have been found. N Diversities and critiques have been the major features of feminism in the West as each variant differed as well criticized the other. There have been reformists as well as radicalists, liberal as well as socialists. N Feminist theory reached its highest level in the twentieth century where new dimensions as well radicalism were found. It addressed so many issues that with the end of the century there developed a belief that the movement has achieved all and facing a phase of decline. From this belief, there emerged the idea of 'post-feminism' which argues that most of the feminist goals have been achieved and the movement has no further relevance. But the fact is that patriarchy still exists and asserts itself in new forms. The idea of feminism is longer limited to the West and we must focus on feminism in

Marxist-Socialist feminism believed that the 'women's question' is a by- product of capitalism and women face oppression due to the dual operation of capitalism and patriarchy. It considered capitalism as a more fundamental reason behind women's oppression and argued that with the overthrow of capitalism and establishment of a socialist society, equality between the sexes will be achieved. This NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 123 argument of classical Marxism was supported by many socialist feminists though some of them later questioned the primacy of class politics over sexual politics. If we study the condition of women in the socialist countries we will find that establishment of a socialist society was not a solution to the problems women faced. The disappointing progress made by women in socialist countries made it evident that socialism could not overthrow patriarchy. An overview of feminism in the socialist countries is crucial to understand the idea of feminism as a practice. 12.3 The Marxist-Socialist Argument Classical Marxist theory has given primacy to class politics in society over divisions over sexual politics. Class divisions in a society are more fundamental than class divisions and class exploitation is deeper than sexual oppression. It recognized the importance of 'women's question' but considered it as a by-product of capitalism. This 'women's question' cannot be separated from social and economic life. Women face oppression in a capitalist society and with the abolition of capitalism they will be liberated from their subordination. Women's emancipation is a by-product of a social revolution that will overthrow capitalism and establish socialism. This position can be found in the ideas of thinkers like Frederick Engels, August Bebel and Clara Zetkin.

The Origin of Family, Private Property and the State, explained the evolution of the family from the earliest savage society. He contested the claim that the evolution of family is natural and argued that in the primitive societies sexual relations were free and unregulated and relations between sexes were based on equality and not domination. Women had a superior status in society as descent was calculated in female line. This position of equality changed with development of private property. The overthrow of mother's right was viewed by him as the first historic defeat of women in society. With this, men took command in the home also degrading the women and making them live a life of servitude. With class society women lost their status and can regain it with the abolition of the class society only. The basis for equal relations between sexes evolves within the capitalist society as capitalism demands involvement of more women in the labour. Female paid employment was viewed by him as a progressive force but he recognized the exploitation of women in capitalist societies. Women's liberation, to Engels, is subject to two condition. The first condition is to bring the whole female sex back into public industry and the second condition was the social revolution that would overthrow capitalism and establish an economic system based on common ownership.

124 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 Bebel, a leader of the German Social Democratic Party has also been crucial in his ideas on feminism. His work Women under Socialism (1878) is regarded as an important document of the Marxist position on women. Like the classical Marxist position of Engels, Bebel also believed that women's liberation is subject to socialist revolution. Only in a socialist society, women can have full economic independence and freedom from domestic responsibilities as domestic work and child care would be collectivised. He gave full importance to role of women in socialism and argued that without active participation of women socialism cannot succeed. He focused on dual exploitation of women in capitalist societies as a labour earning less than men and as a person with the burden of domestic responsibilities. Bebel was the Marxist thinker who recognized the non-economic oppression of women like the norms of sexual morality that are different for women. 12.4

Feminism in Russia The origin of feminist thinking in Russia, as says Valerie Bryson, was during nineteenth century. Feminist thinking originated in pre-socialist Tzarist Russia. It is said that the early feminism in Russia was influenced by feminist thinking in Western Europe. Russia had an extremely patriarchal society with its basis in the Orthodox Church. Men dominated every aspect of personal and public life. To give legal validity to existing patriarchal customary practices, in 1836 a Russian law code was passed by Tzar Nicholas I in which men were given full legal right to control their wives. Women were not allowed any separate civil identity and required permission of their husbands to work, study or travel. Marriage was considered as a career option and women were not given any right to initiate divorce proceedings. Norms of sexual morality were also stricter for women than men. From mid nineteenth century, middle class women in Russia were found demanding right to education, economic rights, right to vote and equal legal rights with men. These demands were raised as part of other broader demands for social reform. The left-wing organizations treated women's issues seriously and alongside demands for social reforms there were also radical women's movements during the late nineteenth in support of equal rights. These movements even used terrorist measures and women became actively involved in anti-Tsarist movement also. This involvement was so keen that the assassination of the Tzar Alexander II was orchestrated and led by a woman, Sofia Perovskaya, in 1881. She was executed and now known as Russia's first woman terrorist. The Bolshevik Revolution took place in Russia in 1917 putting an end to Tzar regime. Inspired ideologically by Marxist ideas, the 'woman question' was a part of

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 125 the socialist question in the new regime established after 1917. Nedezhda Krupskaya, Lenin's wife, was the first to apply Marxist ideas to address the women's question in post-Bolshevik revolution Russia. Following the classical Marxist tradition of thinking, she argued that women's participation in the workforce is progressive and women's liberation can only be achieved through class struggle. She published a pamphlet, The Woman Worker, where she highlighted the working condition of both working class and peasant Russian women. Her pamphlet was instrumental in making issues of legal and political rights of women a part of the party programme from 1903. Women's issues were not matters of political priority for Lenin but he also focused on the need to liberate women from the burden of everyday domestic responsibilities. He wanted to make use of technology and public provisions to liberate women from the drudgery of housework. Women have specific needs and problems and there should be separate organizations and methods to involve women in revolutionary politics. He established a separate women's department called Zhenotdel in 1919. It was the women's section of the Central Committee of the Communist Party. The Zhenotdel was entrusted with the responsibility of educating women in socialism and involving them in the revolutionary politics. The Zhenotdel made significant contributions to organization-building and improving political participation of women during the period 1919-1923. It was based on the idea of involving women in their own emancipation and to achieve this goal it worked in close cooperation with the Commissionerate of Health, Education and Labour, Social welfare and Internal affairs to address different aspects of Russian women's lives. Issues of motherhood, abortion, labour rights, prostitution, child care were addressed by the Zhenotdel members and they also published journals highlighting women's issues and women's pages in leading newspapers. It worked both at national as well as grassroots level and helped women get empowered through formation of self help groups of women. Alexandra Kollontai was in charge of the Zhenotdel for a brief period in the 1920s. After the establishment of the socialist state of Soviet Union, Kollontai became the Minister of Social Welfare. With her initiative, the socialist state ensured legal equality of women and guaranteed them reproductive rights by legalizing abortion. But the legalization of abortion was revoked later by Stalin in 1936 to increase birth rate for the purpose of fulfilling the demand for labour. Kollontai also influenced the ruling Communist Party to adopt policies on collective housework and childcare to relieve women from the burden of domestic responsibilities. Initially it was taken but soon withdrawn as other policy decisions took priority over women's liberation. When the New Economic Policy was introduced in 1921, Soviet Union faced disproportionate and rising female

126 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 employment, budgets cuts for local party committees resulting in liquidation of their women's sections and budgets cuts in social services like public child care and food preparation services that helped in making women free from the drudgery of domestic chores. Kollontai was removed from Zhenotdel and the ministry and sent on a diplomatic mission to Norway. With her exit, the issue of women's liberation took a back seat and the Zhenotdel focused more on low key issues. Finally, the Zhenotdel was abolished by Stalin in 1929 on the basis that the 'woman question' has been solved. The initiatives for a gender-just society that characterized the early years of the socialist state of Soviet Union gradually declined from the 1920s. With Stalin's rise to power, women who were active politically earlier were gradually removed from important political positions. The Soviet authoritarian state considered the women question as a solved issue and focus was laid on women's role in family rather. There were campaigns to emphasize role of women in a family. The idea of women's liberation from the drudgery of housework, that was once a policy objective, was no longer given any importance. Women were expected to work for a job as well as in the home simultaneously. Women's agenda were only discussed in the context of their familial responsibilities. In the mid 1980s Mikhail Gorbachev introduced Glasnost and Perestroika and Soviet citizens were ensured of greater civil liberties. The dissolution of the Soviet Union in 1989 is often considered as the time for emergence of Russian feminism. With greater opportunities to speak and to be heard, women's organizations raised their voices. Demands were raised on domestic violence law, maternity and paternity leave, abortion rights and post-divorce custodial matters. Several women's groups became active in their protests. The Pussy Riot and the Femen are some of such organizations that operate in contemporary Russia. The Pussy Riot is a feminist punk rock group, which became famous for its protest through performance of a song in the Church of Christ the Saviour in Moscow. The Femen is a Ukraine-based women's group, which has protested sexual exploitation, corruption, homophobia and fascism. 12.5 Feminism in Czechoslovakia Feminism in Czechoslovakia is often conceived as a development after the Velvet Revolution of 1989. Though the Czech history has a long tradition of women's activism that started much before the establishment of the socialist regime, the socialist republic of Czechoslovakia has no major instance of any feminist activism. The Czech land was once part of the Austro-Hungarian empire and there

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 127 was a movement for Czech national revival in the nineteenth century. In this movement women participated actively along with men. There was focus on education of women in their own language and their right to vote. In early twentieth century, when there were movements for civil and political rights of women in the Western world, there were no such activities in Czechoslovakia as Czech women have already achieved them. The first President of Czechoslovakia, Tomas Garrigue Masaryk, was an advocate of women's rights. Radical feminists argue that Masaryk's regime resisted the formation of woman's separate identity as there was no confrontation between men and women. The socialist state that was established in 1948 gave no priority to women's issues. Feminism was considered as a silly Western import which women don't need. Women's participation in labour work force increased but their role in family also increased simultaneously. The equality between men and women was considered an important part of the political programme of the socialistic rebuilding of the Czech society but liberation of women was viewed as dependent upon the liberation of the working class. The Stalinist regime in Soviet Union stopped giving any special primacy to the idea of women's liberation. Influenced by the Stalinist regime of Soviet Union, the socialist state of Czechoslovakia focused on the role of female labour force. But this participation didn't bring any change in their familial responsibilities. With the breakdown of the traditional family structure, collective responsibility of child rearing came to an end. Unlike Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia did not have any provision for state-supported collective child rearing. So the domestic burden on women increased but their share in economic activities also increased. There was also a rise in their level of education. But an independent collective feminist movement failed to develop in the socialist regime of Czechoslovakia as the communist state did not provide any opportunity to raise the question of rights. Feminism was considered as a 'bourgeois ideology' and as women were bound to participate in the workforce, the 'women's question' was perceived to be solved. With higher level of participation of women in workforce and a rise in their level of education, birth rates started declining. The Czech government placed restrictions on abortions affecting women's reproductive rights. From 1960s motherhood incentives were also introduced to increase birth rate. Women's role as natural mothers was valorised. The objective was not ensuring women's rights but induce them for reproduction. The Czechoslovak state-controlled Czechoslovak Women's Union (CSWU) was re-established in 1967. It worked to increase the length of maternity leave, increase welfare services to women and children and

128 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 ensure equal pay for and women. The CSWU worked in cooperation with the popular women's magazine Vlasta to raise awareness on these issues. But both were controlled by the centralized Czechoslovak state. Feminist activities were there in socialist Czechoslovakia but they were shaped and controlled by the state. This state- controlled feminism was there in Czechoslovakia from 1948-1989, the period when Czechoslovakia was socialist. The Velvet Revolution of 1989 put an end to the socialist regime and established democratic rights. The women's movement was liberated from state control and acquired new dimensions. 12.6 Feminism in Bulgaria Feminism in Bulgaria also has a similarity with Feminism in Czechoslovakia. It also had an official state-sponsored women's committee and most activities concerned with women's issues were framed and controlled by the committee on behalf of the socialist Bulgarian state. In 1968, the Committee of the Bulgarian Women's Movement (CBWM) was formed by the Bulgarian state to address issues concerned with women. The magazine Zhenata Dnes was the official state women's magazine and it was controlled by the CBWM. This magazine was the platform of communication between the Bulgarian women and the CBWM. The Bulgarian women were encouraged to share their views on domestic issues through the magazine. Since 1944, like Czechoslovakia, the participation of Bulgarian women in the workforce also increased. The economic dependence of women on men declined and their access to education increased. But at the same time like all other socialist states of the time their domestic responsibilities also increased and there was focus on women's dual role as workers and mothers. When the birth rate in Bulgaria started declining in Bulgaria, the CBWM was reorganized to make plans to increase birth rate without affecting women's participation in the labour force. The CBWM encouraged women for reproduction but advocated the concept of shared parenting rather than placing the burden of child rearing on women alone. The socialist state of Bulgaria countered the traditional patriarchal expectations of the Bulgarian society and encouraged men to share domestic responsibilities. The CBWM proposed expansion of state entitlements for mothers that included a new maternity leave policy with paid leave of two years for mothers and counting the time spent in motherhood as labour service in calculation of pension for women. The proposal also included child allowances for women with new born babies, creches at work place and provisions for meals at workplace so that women can carry them to home after work. Bulgaria was much ahead of all other socialist states in making provisions for women that can help them

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 129 to participate in labour force and reduce their burden of domestic responsibilities. Like Czechoslovakia, Feminism in Bulgaria was also state-controlled and state-sponsored. Women's issues were determined from above in the context of other broader issues. 12.7 Feminism in Yugoslavia Yugoslavia had a history of feminist activism during the pre Second World War period when it did not have a socialist regime. When the socialist state came to power, like all other socialist states women's issues were considered dependent upon other broader issues. But feminist activism in Yugoslavia reappeared in 1970s and Yugoslavia is said to have one the most vibrant feminist movement of all other socialist states of that time. The Communist Party in Yugoslavia supported the role of women in the public life but the party was itself dominated by men. From 1970s different feminist groups started operating in different parts of Yugoslavia like Belgrade, Zagreb and Ljubljana. They were active in discussing wide ranging issues like Christianity, patriarchy, family, gender and language. They were called the new Yugoslav feminists. The feminism which reappeared here had a new form and it reformulated the 'women's question'. It provided a critique of the model socialist- state sponsored women's emancipation which was the practice in other socialist states of East Europe. The new Yugoslav feminism provided a feminist critique of socialism. The socialist state guaranteed equality of women with men but the feminist movement questioned this equality in practice. This new Yugoslav feminism had a wide range of activities that include artwork, intellectual discussions, publications and direct political activism. On one hand, it tried to include its agenda in the official policies while on the other, it provided a critique of the socialist state. There were regular feminist conferences in Yugoslavia during the 1980s and help lines launched for abuse victims or victims of domestic violence. Initiatives were also taken to institutionalize feminist knowledge through introducing subjects like women's studies or gender studies in the university curriculum. 12.8 Conclusion The socialist regimes of the above stated countries suggests that the blooming feminist ideas was followed by a subordination of the woman question to the class

130 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 struggle. The ushering in of socialism resulted in standardisation in addressing the woman question. Though the socialist governments were committed to emancipation but they seem to have different constraints in implementation particularly when women questions were concerned. However, at the same time what is highly neglected in most of the works on women of socialist regimes lies on the assumption that it was the government alone and not women who were active in doing anything for emancipation. Such an approach in a way undermines the positive role played by the women of the region in promoting sexual equality. 12.9 Summing Up In this unit we have studied the development of feminism in socialist countries. Classical Marxist theory has always given primacy to class politics over sexual politics. So, feminism was not a matter of interest in classical Marxist thought. Feminism has also taken different forms and character in different socialist countries. The socialist states of Russia, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria or Yugoslavia have witnessed feminist developments but the pattern has differed according to their specific context. 12.10 Glossary Zhenotdel: A special woman's department that was established in USSR in 1919. There have been diversities. When Western feminism made its foray into Islamic countries, many Muslims grappled with its colonial and secular undertones. Many of these countries were on the way of gaining freedom from colonial powers and they were uncomfortable with the colonial connotation of Western feminism. The same uneasiness was also there for the ideal of secularism. As a response to this, feminism in Islamic countries took a dual mode. On one hand, there developed secular feminism, mostly practiced by upper class Muslim women while on the other hand, there developed a new variant called Islamic feminism. The term Islamic feminism 132

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 133 was coined in the 1990s. Islamic feminism provides a challenge to Western secular feminism. On one hand, it challenges the Christian modality of Western secular feminism, on the other hand it tries to accommodate the demands of Muslim women with reference to Islam. Like all other non-western feminisms, Islamic feminism also tried to nuance feminism with specific religion and culture. It is often conceived as a reaction to the Western model. Islamic feminists have criticized the traditions and practices of Islam and not Islam itself. Their argument is that though religious texts of Islam were open for interpretation, women in Islam were never given the opportunity to interpret the holy text. They were always subjected to patriarchal interpretation of the text and faced discrimination. Subjugation of women was never a part of Islam and they came into being just as practices associated with the religion. Islamic feminism is based on this argument core values of Islam have principles of equal rights for women but it is the way Islam is practiced that women get deprived of their rights. Islamic holy texts can thus, be reinterpreted and the feminine voice accommodated therein. The patriarchal bias of Islamic traditions is due to misinterpretation of Islamic holy texts. Islamic feminist writers like Fatima Mernissi, Margot Badran, Leila Ahmad, Asma Barlas and Amina Wadud believe that religious text is open for interpretation but women are never given the opportunity to interpret it and are always subjected to male interpretation, which is discriminatory. Islamic feminism can be found in different Islamic countries of the world. West Asia is the region which is predominantly Muslim and follows Islam as its religion. An overview of feminism in West Asia can help understand the position of feminism in the Islamic world. West Asia comprises of the states of United Arab Emirates, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Lebanon, Iraq, Iran, Turkey, Cyprus, Azerbaijan, Armenia, Israel, Yemen, Oman, Qatar and Syria. 13.3 Feminism in Saudi Arabia Saudi Arabia is a country in West Asia. It follows Sharia law supplemented by some secular codes. Islam is the official religion. Segregation of sexes is followed formally in public places and maintained by the religious police 'mutawa'. All activities in public life are conducted in a way that restricts intermingling of unrelated men and women. Feminist development in Saudi Arabia and demands for equal rights for women is a recent development that specifically initiated in the 1990s. The interest of the Western public, specifically in America, in Saudi women was mainly triggered by the 1991 Gulf War. As Saddam Hussein approached the Saudi border, the United States sent troops to Saudi Arabia to stop another invasion

134 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 by Iraq. This was the formal start of the Gulf War which witnessed the largest deployments of female soldiers in American history. The experiences of military women were heavily documented in Western media. These women often reported the restrictions they have to face as compared to their male counterpart. Patriarchal bias of Saudi police was also reported. Feminist advocates and American feminists lobbied to change foreign policies by virtue of which America was patronizing countries that violate basic human rights. In these debates one thing was highlighted that Saudi women is lacking agency and they need the help of Western feminists to achieve equality .The advent of digital technology gave an impetus to women's rights based groups. Several women's rights based groups started developing in Saudi Arabia. Through the digital platform women got the opportunity to exchange their ideas. It is also often argued that with globalization women got opportunities for economic empowerment. There was expansion of work opportunities for women and women's participation in jobs started rising since 1990s. They were found opting careers in the public as well as the private sector. The number of women in workforce rose with most being employed in the field of education and government jobs. Many women took to entrepreneurship also. In the private sector also the areas of finance, manufacturing, retail and business services started having increasing representation of women. This economic empowerment of women had family support also. So, Saudi women were found making a balance between their traditional family roles and economic empowerment. Many Saudi women started expressing their agency through breaking dress code rules or other areas of discrimination while at the same time adhering to religious laws. Use of veil continued but it was made a fashion symbol with more decorations. Saudi women were found combining modern fashion with traditional practices. Feminist was not the preferred term and women activists from Saudi Arabia used the term womanist. They did not question Saudi culture or Islam and argued for alternative reading of religious texts. Space for protest and activism is limited in Saudi Arabia but within that restricted space women were found expressing their agency. Demands for equal rights were voiced in areas of driving and make guardianship. In 2011, Saudi Arabian activist Maran-al.Sharif, posted a video of her driving on youtube. Driving has been an activity which was prohibited for women in Saudi Arabia and this video became the symbol of discrimination women faced in Saudi society. After the video went viral and used by Western media to depict the plight of women in Saudi Arabia, Maran-al Sharif was arrested. She got support from feminists all over the world, who highlighted women's prohibition to drive as an ultimate form of injustice to women. Subsequently, women's restrictions to driving

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 135 were removed. Several other areas of discrimination also came into focus. There was a concept of male guardianship whereby women required male approval for certain activities. Women could be jailed for driving or inciting political dissent but require a male guardian to sign their prison release papers. They can vote but they have to be escorted by a male chauffeur in the car that drives them to the polling station. There is also the practice of wearing an abaya that women use to cover their body. Though there is no law that provides for using the abaya but Saudi women would use it in public places. Western feminists view these as symbols of oppression and some Saudi women prefer not to conform to these practices. But many Saudi women who are advocates of women's rights voluntarily don the abaya or don't object to be driven by male chauffeurs. Contrary to the Western secular version of feminism, they believe that the best way to further their rights is to act within the structure of Islamic law. A growing number of Saudi women are now found using their traditional attire but asserting their authorities at the work place, home or even in the corridors of the government. 13.4 Feminism in Iran Like other countries of West Asia, in Iran also Islamic law forms the basis of the constitution and treats man and woman unequally. Iran has a theocratic state which applies Islamic law to personal, social and political spheres. In 1979 the Pahlavi dynasty under Mohammad Reza Shah Pahlavi was overthrown in Iran and replaced by an Islamic republic under Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini. The revolution was led by people representing diverse political and social groups ranging from leftists, nationalists, and Islamists to middle-class women and men and the working class. During the movement, the cleric faction following Khomeini's lead became powerful and casted out other groups. It is often argued that Iran had two revolutions: a populist revolution and an Islamic one. The leftists and liberals were part of the populist revolution that led to the overthrow of the monarchy and gave rise to a republic. However, due to the lack of cohesion and organization, they were marginalized by the Islamic one, and a theocratic state was established in Iran. During the following years, the new regime crushed most of its opponents inside the country. The Islamic Republic of Iran under the leadership of Khomeini approved a new theocratic-republican constitution that applied Islamic law to personal, social, and political areas and made the provision of veil mandatory for women. These changes weakened the position of women and decreased their legal status. The Family Protection Laws, which restricted polygamy and raised the marriage age for

136 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 women passed under the previous regime, was abrogated by Khomeini. Women were banned from occupying public office. All public spaces were segregated on the basis of sex. The practice of veil or hijab was made legally mandatory and not following it a punishable offence under Islamic Punishment Law of Iran. Before Khomeini's regime, the Iranian women have achieved certain degrees of gender equality in terms of right to vote, right to have custody of children, right to have maintenance after divorce and right to move to court. Polygamy was also banned in Iran in 1976. But under Khomeini's regime all these provisions were abrogated and women were driven back to the sphere of domesticity. Iranian women continued their fight for equality and it became more prominent after the election of President Khatami in 1997, who had women as a major group of supporters. Although under Khatami's rule there were changes in many discriminatory measures but Khatami was not able to remove the influence of the conservative clerical establishment of Iran and his measures were restricted. In spite of those women were able to make achievements in the field of education and their representation in universities improved. They were also given scholarships to study abroad. In 2002, Women's Studies as an academic discipline were introduced in many universities of Iran. But in 2012, Iran's Supreme Council of the Cultural Revolution changed the name of the discipline to 'Family Studies and Women's Rights in Islam' and subsequently it was removed from the curriculum of different universities. Feminists in Iran were also from both the schools of secular feminists and Islamic feminists. One of the first scholars who started discussing the women's movement in Iran in terms of Islamic feminism is Afsaneh Najmabadi. In her famous essay 'Feminism in an Islamic Republic: Years of Hardship, Years of Growth', Najmabadi considers Islamic feminism as an opportunity for dialogue and debate between Islamic and secular feminists. Though as per Iranian law, women are not equal to men in legal and social status, Najmabadi sees "an incredible flourishing of women's intellectual and cultural productions" in Iran. She highlighted Iranian women's active presence in the diverse fields of artistic, educational, industrial, social, and athletic activities. Although most secular feminists believe that Iranian women have gained these successes despite the Islamic Republic and against Islam as the dominant discourse in the society, Najmabadi does not consider it as a valid explanation for the achievements of Iranian women. After the revolution of Iran, the task of confronting the apparent misogyny of Islam fell on the women who supported the Islamic Republic. This gave rise to efforts to rethink gender and women's status

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 137 in Islam. As a result, many women's organizations and institutions were formed which focused on reinterpretation of Islam. Many journals also came out representing women's views. Zananwas one such journal that represented voices in support of reform. It was founded by Shahla Sherkat in 1992. Sherkat believed that gender equality is Islamic and the religious texts have been misinterpreted by the misogynists. Ziba-Mir-Hosseini is another Iranian woman, who focused her research on status of women in Iran after the revolution. She argued that women's participation in public and politics increased after the revolution as the enforcement of hijab made use of public space by women appear morally correct to the traditionalist society and thereby gave legitimacy to women's involvement in public life. Mir-Hoseini has been a strong Iranian voice of Islamic feminism. One of the problematic laws of Iran is the law on custody which makes a distinction between guardianship and fostering. Guardianship of the child is considered as the natural and automatic right of the father and in his absence the paternal grandfather. And fostering or caring for the children is considered as the natural right of mothers. Mothers do the caring work while the important decisions of guardianship like finance, marriage etc are managed by the fathers. Fathers and paternal grandfathers, on their death, can leave this duty to others. This law has been opposed by the feminists. There have been other discriminatory laws like the law of using compulsory veil or the law that prohibits women from holding position of those judges in the judiciary, who can make judgements. Women are allowed only in the lower rungs of the judiciary, where they cannot pass a verdict. Islamic feminists in Iran are often criticized for not demanding formal equality of sexes in these spheres. 13.5 Feminism in UAE United Arab Emirates is not a democracy. It is a union of several monarchies. Traditionally women are considered the backbone of family life and society and an important part of the country's Islamic heritage and national culture. In the United Arab Emirates, women enjoy the same constitutional rights as men. Under the Constitution, women enjoy the same rights as men regarding access to education, healthcare and social welfare. They also have equal rights to employment. As per the World Economic Forum's Global Gender Gap Report, 2018, the UAE ranks 121 among all the counties with respect to gender balance and this position is higher than other countries of the region like Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Lebanon, Jordan, Oman or Qatar. Of the four indices of gender inequality, UAE scores most in terms of political

138 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 empowerment of women. In the field of political empowerment of women, UAE ranks 68, which is higher even than the USA. To improve her gender balance, in 2015, the UAE formed a Gender Balance Council to make women equal partners in nation building. The establishment of the UAE Gender Balance Council aimed at reducing gender gap in all UAE sectors, public as well as private. It also aims at achieving gender balance in centres of decision-making and strengthening the position of the UAE in the Global Competitiveness reports in the area of gender gap at workplace. According to government figures, while the literacy rate of both women and men in the UAE is close to 95%, participation of women in secondary education and university enrolment is higher than men. In September 2014, the UAE opened the region's first military college for women. The state-of-the-art military college provides world-class training, physical fitness sessions and leadership development. Women in the UAE participate actively in the private sector also. They have equal rights to economic resources, as well as access to ownership and control over land and other forms of property, financial services, inheritance and natural resources, in accordance with national laws. The UAE had the highest number of women on Forbes' 100 most powerful Arab business women with 19 Emirati women on the list. Women business-owners account for 10% of the total private sector in the UAE. There are several active women's organizations in the UA Eliekei the General Women's Union (GWU), Family Development Foundation and the Dubai Women's Establishment. The GWU was established in 1975 by HH Sheikha Fatima Bin Mubarak. The GWU has been a key player in the government's strategy to provide a supportive environment for women. It was established to bring together all the existing women's societies under one umbrella. Since its formation, the government- funded GWU has been instrumental in organizing literacy programmes, vocational training, job placement services and family mediation services for women. It helped women to organize small businesses and become economically independent. It also made suggestions for new laws and amendments in existing laws that would benefit women. 13.6 Feminism in Israel Feminism in Israel can be said to be having three phases. The first wave started in the pre-statehood Yishuv period when women demanded inclusion in the public sphere on equal terms with men. The women wanted to preserve their distinctive identity as women and gain equal civil equality with men. This feminist movement was very popular during the first two decades of the twentieth century when there

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 139 was a movement in the region demanding the right to vote in the Yishuv institutions. Israeli women believed that suffrage could ensure them equality in other spheres. The second wave of feminism in Israel initiated during the 1970s when women's status became a crucial part of the social and national agenda of Israel. In the 1960s the second wave of feminism was very popular in the Western world but Israel remains largely unaffected by this Western wave. Distinct from the West, Israel had its own second wave of feminism. In 1970, Shulamit Aloni, the founder of Citizen's Rights movement returned to Israel. She

The Yom Kippur War of 1973 constituted a watershed in the feminist movement of Israel. The process of self-criticism carried out by the military high command after the war, combined with the need to strengthen combat units and the increasing use of advanced technologies, led the army to reassess its policy toward women. Feminist movement in Israel has grown more diverse preventing the formation of any uniform female identity. 13.7 Conclusion For long, the possibilities for combining Islam and feminist movements were regarded as inconsistent and incoherent through the lens of western epistemology. In an age of multiculturalism, when diversities and differences in culture had received special acknowledgment within a dominant political culture, stereotyping the usage of veil as a symptom of oppression for muslim women has resulted in severe complications over the issue. Again on the question of women's liberty to make their own choices of political and social rights, the fear psyche of Taliban rule in Afghanistan for the second time, has asserted the existence of a strong patriarchal religions culture within Islamic society. However, Islamic culture cannot be used in an uniform manner since its variations is evident and noticed in different Islamic states. What is worth here to note, is that, if interpretations on Islam needs to be reshaped to meet the changing demands of women over time then's it is equally important to review the Islamic feminism independent of existing western biases and its deep ingrained cultural variations need to be reconsidered.

N To analyse the role of social reform movement in the upliftment of the social conditions of women in India. 14.2 Introduction In colonial India the ‘woman question’ acquired a central importance during the nineteenth century. The question was not ‘what do women want?’ rather it was on ‘how to modernize them?’. The social reform movements that started taking shape in early nineteenth century India gave primary importance to women’s issues like education, widow remarriage and discriminatory social practices like the child 143

Influenced by the Enlightenment ideas and the liberal ideas of the West, the West-educated Indian intelligentsia led the social reform movement in India and the major focus of this movement was the uplift of the status of women and ensuring them equal opportunities in different spheres of life. So the women's issues acquired a position of importance in the social reform measures of the nineteenth and early twentieth century India. The experience of the colonial rule is considered as having a formative influence on the feminist movement of the nineteenth and early twentieth century India. The nineteenth century was a period when justices and injustices done to women became major issues and were organized movements to alleviate the conditions in which Indian women were living. An interesting feature of the social reform movements of the early nineteenth century was that the attempts to bring changes in the lives and status of women were mostly led by men. Women were the subject and they did not have agency. By the late nineteenth century women started joining the movement as wives, sisters and daughters of the male protagonists or as women affected by the reform measures. By early twentieth century, autonomous women's organizations were formed and women's movement in India acquired an activist role. The male reformers played an important role in upholding and advocating for the 'woman question'. In Bengal there Iswar Chandra Vidyasagar championed the cause of female education and led the campaign to legalize widow remarriage. Raja Rammohan Roy, a pioneer of the Brahmo Samaj was active for abolishing Sati. Keshav Chandra Sen, another leader of the Brahmo Samaj, sought to bring women into new roles through schools and other experiments in the style of living. Swami Dayananda Saraswati, the pioneer of Arya Samaj, advocated for female education and condemned discriminatory practices like dowry and polygyny. Among Muslims, Kwaja Altaf Hussain Ali, Shaikh Mohammad Abdullah, Syed Ahmed Khan, Shakhawat Hossain supported the cause of educating women.

14.3 Abolition of Sati The nineteenth century has been defined as 'an age of women' by Radha Kumar. It is called an age of women all over the world because in this period the rights of women, the wrongs done to them, their capacities as well as their potentials became subjects of discussions. In Europe feminist consciousness started becoming popular during the French Revolution and by the end of the eighteenth century it has spread its wings to Russia also. In all these states, the 'woman question' became an important issue. In India, the injustices done to the women became subject of interest

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 145 to the social reformers of the nineteenth century. The social reform movements of this period was mainly in Bengal and Maharashtra and the 'woman's question' also became a crucial issue in these states. As parts of demands for social reforms, there were campaigns against caste, polytheism, idolatory, purdah, child marriage, and sati. They were considered as reflections of pre-modern identity, which needs to be reformed for the establishment of a modern civilized society based on egalitarian principles. The social reform movements of this period were not uniform as different campaigns were there at different points of time and different issues were addressed. Some of these campaigns and some of these issues were focused on women. The introduction and spread of British education in India created an Indian intelligentsia who were dedicated to the principles of liberty and equality. Rationalism, evolutionism and utilitarianism were ideas that were very popular in nineteenth century Britain. Influenced by these ideas, the Indian intelligentsia initiated campaigns in support of certain social reform measures in Indian society. Bengal and specifically Calcutta became an intellectual centre and there started a process which was called the Bengal Renaissance. In this period there started the Young Bengal Movement. Under the Young Bengal Movement, different groups were formed who concentrated mainly on defying caste hierarchies by encouraging and participating in practices like eating meat, drinking wine or attempting to reform women. Several issues and campaigns concerning women were initiated during the early nineteenth century. Of these various issues, two of the earliest issues were introduced by the same group of people. The importance of educating women and the abolition of Sati were these issues. The importance of educating women was first discussed publicly in Bengal by the Atmiya Sabha. The Atmiya Sabha was founded by Raja Rammohan Roy in 1815. In the same year he wrote the first text in which he attacked the practice of Sati. The campaign for abolition of Sati got support of the colonial government instantly and law was enacted soon in this regard. The movement for women's education continued for a long time with many Indians participating in it over the period. Rammohan Roy is regarded one of the first Indians who campaigned actively in favour of abolition of Sati. But British missionaries and the colonial government have from the late eighteenth century cited it as a practice reflecting Hindu barbarism and as a reason that justifies the British rule as a civilizing mission. In spite of depicting it as a barbaric practice the British Parliament was initially reluctant to pass legislation in this regard. The issue even became an issue of contention among the British politicians with the conservatives supporting non-

146 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 interference and the liberals campaigning for legislative action. The Liberals were divided into the Radicals and the Evangelists with the latter interested in the construction of a cruel and barbaric native in need of the civilizing mission of the Christian evangelists. The Liberals wanted a support from the community that was practicing Sati and with Roy and others initiating the campaign; they got the support they were asking for. In 1817, Mrityunjaya Vidyalamkara, the Chief Pundit of the Supreme Court announced that Sati has no shastric sanction. In 1818, the provincial governor of Bengal, William Bentinck, prohibited Sati in his province. The abolition of Sati act was finally passed in 1829, when William Bentinck became the Governor General of India. There were protests from the Hindu orthodoxy and in 1830 orthodox Hindus in Calcutta formed the Dharma Sabha to campaign against the act of abolishing Sati. By the end of the nineteenth century there was the presence of a strong reformist ideology. The position of women in this ideology was retained throughout the twentieth century. Indian women were conceived to be in misery. This view of pity towards Indian women became a major component of the Western critique of Indian society. Humanitarianism was considered as the basis of social reforms. Influenced and inspired by the Western ideas, many reformers like Raja Ramnohan Roy, Pandit Vidyasagarr and Swami Dayananda Saraswati wanted India to recover from her dark age and revive the golden age. Social reform measures were considered as being in harmony with natural law and reason. Customs like child marriage and polygyny were considered as not being in harmony with nature and nor regarded as rational. There is a body of scholarship which argue that the colonial power influenced anti-abolition movement might have created a myth of an existing practice of Sati, which did not exist in reality. Doubts were casted in the numbers of Sati. It was also argued that it is strange that most of the Satis were reported from Bengal with Ashis Nandy calling it the Bengali 'epidemic' of Sati. Scholars like Anand Yang has pointed out that a considerable proportion of Satis recorded in early nineteenth century Bengal were of women who killed themselves years after their husbands have died and it may be due to other reasons rather than the cause of Sati.

14.4 Education for Women The movement for women's education was another part of the social reform movement of early nineteenth century. The first school for girls was started by the English American missionaries in the 1810s. In 1819, a text on women's education

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 147 was written by Gourmahan Vidhyalankar and published by the Female Juvenile Society in Calcutta in 1819. Several other schools were opened in the vicinities of Calcutta in the next decade. By 1827, many girls schools were opened by the missionaries in the Hooghly district. The Ladies Society for Native Female Education also opened schools for women. By the mid nineteenth century, women's education became an issue that was campaigned by the members of the Brahmo Samaj and even Muslim women got enthusiastic in getting education. Hindu and Brahmo schools for girls were opened. Radha Kumar argues that while poor women attended schools opened by the missionaries, women from upper castes attended the schools by Hindus and Brahmos. There even started campaign for adult education for women or offering services of education to women at home for those who cannot attend schools. This was called home education and though the endeavour was started by the missionaries, it was soon followed by the Brahmos. Special curriculum were adopted for this practice of home education. Bethune school was opened in Calcutta in 1849 and in 1882 the Indian Education Commission (Hunter Commission) the progress of education in India. In the interim period several efforts were made to develop primary school for girls and teacher-training institutions. But higher education for women and co-educational institutions, argues Geraldine Forbes, were still debatable issues. Hunter Commission report pointed out that 98 percent of school age girls were still not in school and recommended more grants for opening schools for girls than for boys. In the next two decades of the nineteenth century, higher education for women expanded rapidly. So, while in 1881-82 there were only six women in the Indian universities, by the end nineteenth century this figure went upto 264. Secondary school enrolment of girls also increased significantly from 2054 to 41,582. Geraldine Forbes argues that the story of women's education in India following the Hunter Commission till the end of the nineteenth century can be best told through the work of three great educationists-Pandita Ramabai, Mataji Tapaswini and D.K Karye. Pandita Ramabai was part of the social reform movement. She started the Sharada Sadan in Bombay and Poona. She was a pioneer in women's education and a champion of women's rights. She worked with the Arya Mahila Samaj to educate women and focused on the need to have more women doctors and teachers. In 1889, after receiving education from England, USA and Canada, she started the Sharada Sadan, a school for widows. In the Sharada Sadan, all the caste rules of Brahmins were observed, which attracted high caste Hindu widows to the school. Though Pandita Ramabai was later accused of converting widows to Christianity in her school, she was successful in bringing changes in the lives of Hindu widows of

148 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 Maharashtra. She herself was a Christian and she denounced the caste practices of Hindus. In 1897, she started a second school called Mukti in a place called Kedgaon near Poona. There was a famine in Maharashtra during that period and women and child victims of the famine sought refuge in Sharada Sadan. To accommodate the larger number of inmates in Sharada Sadan she started the second school at Kedgaon. This school accommodated 2000 women and children. It provided industrial training to the inmates. Ramabai designed a unique educational programme to suit the needs of the inmates. Literature, physiology, botany, printing, carpentry, masonry, tailoring, wood-cutting and weaving all became parts of the curriculum. Funding for her Mukti came from an American organization. Mataji Tapaswini's contribution to women's education was different from that of Pandita Ramabai. She founded the Mahakali Pathshala of Calcutta in 1893 and was considered as an Indian attempt of making provision for women's education. The school had many branches which imparted education to women on what was later called 'the nationalist line'. These schools had no foreign assistance or foreign teachers and they did not advocate the idea of co-educational institutions or common curricula for boys and girls. Their objective was to educate Indian girls on national lines and regenerate the Hindu society. Mataji Tapaswini wanted to impart female education in Harmony with Hindu religious and moral principles. To her, education for women should be based on a syllabus that included sacred literature and history, myths and legends that spoke of duties of mother, daughter, wife and sister. Education should enable women to be better members of the Hindu society. Though the people associated with Mahakali Pathshala had differences with the liberal reformers, they too believed in the importance of female education. D.K. Karye was known for starting schools for widows in Poona in the 1890s. He was associated with the social reform movement of this period and founded the first school for widows in 1896 in Poona. He viewed education as a medium of empowering widows and making them self-sufficient. He also designed a curriculum for his school which could make the widows employable and self-sufficient. Apart from widows, he also started a school for unmarried girls. The curriculum for unmarried girls was different. While the objective of widow's education was employability, the objective of education for unmarried girls was to train them to be good wives, mothers and neighbours. Karve was not an advocate of widow remarriage; rather he supported economic independence of women. In 1916, Karve started another institution for women, which was the Women's University. This university

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 149 was later adopted by Sir Vithaldas Thackersey and renamed after his mother as Shreemati Nathibai Damodar Thackersey Women's University or the SNDT University. Another crucial effort of women's education was made in the early twentieth century by Begum Rokeya Sakhawat Hossain. She was the pioneer of education for Muslim women in India. She started a school for Muslim girls in 1909 in Bhagalpur district of Bihar. Later she closed this school and opened the Sakhawat Memorial School in Calcutta in 1911. Supported by her husband, Syed Sakhawat Hossain, Begum Rokeya got education in Urdu and English and published articles, short stories and novels at a very young age. She believed that neglecting female education would ultimately threaten Islamic culture. She wanted to make women conscious of their oppression and conceived education as a means of doing that. The schools started by Begum Rokeya maintained provisions for purdah and female seclusion. Arrangements were made to transport girls to and from the school in carriages with curtains and students were allowed to cover their head inside the school. In the curriculum that was taught in Begum Rokeya's school practical subjects like handicrafts, home science and gardening were included. There were also provisions for physical training of girls in the school. Radha Kumar has pointed out that by the end of the nineteenth century, several strands were visible in the social reform movement that differ on why women should be educated and what their education should comprise of. On one hand, there were demands for education in English language where reformers wanted English behaviour and manners for the women. Bombay Parsi Framji Bomanji was very vocal in English education for women. Keshav Chandra Sen preferred Bengali literature and Brahmo religious instructions in the curriculum for girls of his schools and home education groups. His schools taught cooking, sewing and nursing to the girls. Iswar Chandra Vidyasagar did not favoured religious instruction but wanted Sanskrit and Bengali in the curricula of his schools for women. Syed Ahmed Khan, a pioneer of Muslim social reform movement, wanted home education for Muslim women and was strictly against any sort of anglicisation of Muslim girls through English education. Dayananda Saraswati and his Arya Samaj held both Hinduism and Islam responsible for degradation of women in India and wanted education for girls in secular lines. He differed from many of his contemporaries on the view that women should be educated so that they can be better mothers and wives. To him, women's education should be a path to virtue. Education following the Vedic texts was also advocated by the Tattavabodhini Sabha formed by Rabindranath Tagore in 1839. The Sabha preferred reading of the Upanishads over any other religious texts.

150 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 14.5 Widow Remarriage The deplorable condition of Hindu widows led the reformers work on reforming on discriminatory Hindu customs and resist the degradation of women. There have been diverse responses from the social reform movement on the question of condition of widows. Vidyasagar wrote a tract supporting widow remarriage in 1855 in which he claimed that this practice was permissible in Kaliyug. He was supported by many as well as opposed by many and even subjected to abuse and insult. He urged the British to legislate on the matter and also collected signatures in support of his appeal. Finally, the colonial government passed the Hindu Widow Remarriage Act in 1856. Despite effort by Vidyasagar and legislation by the government, widow remarriage was not approved by the larger society. In the 1890s it was reported that even forty years after the act, the number of widow remarriages in India was barely five hundred. Widows were continued to force to relinquish their jewellery and food habit. Young widows were often victim of lust of men and many of them landed in brothels. In 1869, a report was published in the Amrita Bazaar Patrika, which claimed that ninety percent of Calcutta's prostitutes were widows of whom a large number were from upper caste Hindu families. Remarriage was also used as an excuse to deprive them of their rightful share of inheritance. Another reformer who fought for widow remarriage was Kandukuri Virasalingam Pantulu. As a member of Brahma Samaj and Prarthana Samaj he supported the idea of purifying religion by eliminating inhuman customs. He made widow remarriage and female education the key points of his programme for social change. The widow remarriage campaign led by Virasalingam brought the Western-educated Telegu people into social reform activities. 14.6 The New Woman The social reform movement of the nineteenth century changed the way Indian women were living their lives. By the end of the nineteenth century there emerged a group of women who were educated, liberated and mobile. They were not merely good wives and mothers but were actively visible in public life. These were the 'new women' of the nineteenth century who benefitted from the 'woman question' of social reform movements. They were educated, either at home or in schools. There were women who were married at a later age or women who continued their education after marriage. They also started experiencing increased opportunities to express their individuality. Women developed a voice of their own and started

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 151 reading, writing and publishing on a regular basis. Pandita Ramabai, Begum Rokeya or Sarala Devi Caudhurani were examples of this breed of new women. 14.7 Conclusion Social reform is not meant the same way as it did in the West. In the West social reform primarily meant a reorganisation of the entire structure of society with a view to improve the conditions of the under privileged. In India, social reforms was more an infusion into the existing social structure of newer ways of life and behaviour. So social change in India was gradual and was mostly initiated by the upper class. However, social reform movement in India was not an isolated phenomenon. It had much wider national and political implications. It provided a strong impetus to nationalism in India though its practical appeal remained confined to urban population in India. 14.8 Summing Up N The social reform movement of the nineteenth century encompassed the 'woman question' and played a crucial role in changing the lives of women. As part of the reform movement there were efforts to reform Hindu customs and practices that discriminated or degraded women and also initiatives to make women educated and in some instances, economically independent. N Abolition of Sati, education for women and widow remarriage were the prominent issues that became part of the 'woman question'. Apart from these issues there were also issues of rehabilitating prostitutes, child marriage and debate over the age of consent. N The pioneers of the social reform movement fought for justice for women through legal measures. N The 'woman question' was relegated to the spiritual sphere by the nationalists in the twentieth century. The new and reformed women who emerged from the nineteenth century moved forward to set up their own organizations. 14.9 Glossary Sati: Sati or Suttee is the act or custom whereby a Hindu widow burned herself on the funeral pyre of her husband. The act was supposed to be voluntary. It was considered a prevalent practice of among upper caste Hindus against which the

Now if we focus on India, we can find here women's activism and awareness of women's issues since the nineteenth century simultaneously with the development of liberal 154

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 155 feminist ideas in the West. Though initially inspired by the liberal school of thought, women's movement in India has never blindly followed the footprints of its Western counterpart. Rather it has developed a dynamic and distinct character of its own according to the local socio-political, socio-economic and cultural condition. A brief overview of the trajectory of the movement would show how it has been responsive to the broader issues. The history of women's movement in India is said to have passed different phases or 'waves'. The first phase began in the early nineteenth century as a part of the social reform movements and continued till the first half of the twentieth century. Radha Kumar held the view that from the early nineteenth century there arose the issue of deplorable condition of Indian women and the need to change them through reform. By the early twentieth century the emphasis shifted to stressing on women's rights to be treated as useful members of society and by the late twentieth century the emphasis further shifted to the demand that women should have the power to decide their own lives. The first phase of the women's movement witnessed campaigns for social reform and the issues related to women were addressed within the broader agenda for social change. The early nineteenth century social reform movements, supported by the colonial government addressed the 'woman's question'. The main argument was that women's difference from men does not justify the suffering and subjection of the former and their condition needs to be reformed through legal and social changes. This period witnessed some significant legal reforms like abolition of sati and provision for widow remarriage. There were also strong campaigns supporting women's education. The early twentieth century was the phase when women's activism took a concrete shape and several women's organizations were formed like the Bharat Stri Mahamandal, Women's Indian Association and the All India Women's Congress. These organizations heralded the emergence of a rudimentary women's movement in India. Entry into the nationalist struggle for freedom marked the period between 1930s to 1947. Women were motivated to serve the nation with their abilities to nurture and care. 15.3 Women's Movement in post-independent India: 1950s and 1960s Women's participation in the nationalist movement created the preconditions for the growth of a critical consciousness that found expression in the radical recommendations made by the Women's Sub-committee of the National Planning 156 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 Committee set up by Nehru in 1939-40. This committee comprising of women active in the nationalist movement was formed to study and draft a plan to improve Indian women's status in the planned economy of free India. It wanted development of women based on the ideal of equality and just society and stressed the importance of social as well as economic planning in uplifting the status of women in India. Though the committee report was a landmark document, it did not receive any importance in post-independent India. During the immediate post-independent period, programmes for women were undertaken by the state and the focus was on women's welfare. Women from diverse groups came forward to explore avenues for socio-economic mobility or a search for new identities in the new democratic set-up. The Constitution guaranteed them new rights and the exercise of these rights came into conflict with the patriarchal values of society. During the first two decades after independence except for the spirit of protest build up before the passage of the Hindu Code Bill of 1956, there was not any remarkable agitation on women's issues. The women's movement got fragmented and the women's issues gradually disappeared from the political agenda. The 1950's and 1960s were decades when the state-led developmental model was having its heyday and the nation enjoyed a hegemonic status in the eyes of its citizens. This period is often referred to as the silent period of the women's movement. 15.4 Women's Movement in post-independent India: 1970s onwards The 1970s witnessed a renewal of concern for women's issues. The United Nations mandate given to governments of all member countries to critically assess the status of their women led to the formation of the Committee on the Status of Women in India (CSWI).

The

CSWI comprised of activists, academicians and members of Parliament. The report of the CSWI was called 'Towards Equality', which is regarded as the founding text of women's movement in India. It highlighted gender inequalities reflected through the imbalanced sex ratios and constraints experienced by women as a result of socio-cultural institutions like dowry, polygamy and child marriage. It also identified discriminatory legal frameworks and economic practices that did not recognize the contribution of women, an educational system that was not equally accessible to women and a political system that did not promote women's participation adequately. The women's movement in India since 1970s onwards is also viewed as one of the many efforts of reassertion of citizens' claims

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 157 to participate as equals in the political and developmental process. The main concerns of the movement were based on the issues brought to the forefront by the CSWI report. Agnihotri and Majumdar points out that in contemporary India, the resurgence of the women's movement should be examined in the light of: 1) The crisis of the state and the government culminating into emergency; 2) The post- emergency upsurge in favour of civil rights; 3) The mushrooming of women's organizations in the early 1980s and the arrival of women's issues on the agenda. From its earliest phase in the late 1970s one of the major issues addressed by the contemporary women's movement has been violence against women. One of the first cases that came to limelight in the late 1970s was the rape of a poor Muslim woman, Rameeza Bee, in Hyderabad in 1978. Rameeza Bee was a poor Muslim woman, who while returning home with her rickshaw puller husband, was picked up by police and accused as being criminals. Rameeza Bee was raped in the police station and when her husband protested, he was beaten to death. The incident created serious repercussions among the masses and there were severe protests from all over Andhra Pradesh that demanded action and even resignation of the Chief Minister. There were protests from diverse groups and everywhere the issue was highlighted as a women's issue. Several women's organizations actively participated in these protests. In 1980, another incident of rape became subject of serious protests by women activists. It was the custodial rape of Maya Tyagi in Uttar Pradesh and in this case also the husband was killed and before rape the woman was made to strip and parade naked. Women activists from all over the country responded immediately and the government was forced to set up an enquiry commission to probe the incident. In 1979, the Supreme Court judgement in the Mathura rape case consolidated women's groups all over the country on the issue of rape as a form of violence against women. In Maharashtra, a young woman called Mathura was raped by two policemen who were found guilty by the High Court. Later the Supreme Court acquitted them and even held that Mathura has submitted to the rape. Women's groups all over the country protested this move. It was highlighted that rape violates human rights of women under the law and the Constitution. Women's groups in Mumbai took the initiative to protest and a series of coordinated demonstrations were held in various other cities. These groups demanded action and accountability of the government and expressed their solidarity with victims of other similar cases. Several other incidents, which have erstwhile remained outside the public eye, came to the forefront. The demand was to change the law on rape, which have not changed since the last one hundred and fifty years. The state responded to the demands and the Law Commission was charged with the responsibility of drafting a new legislation. The Law Commission made a

158 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 comprehensive document incorporating some of the observations of the women's groups. Scholars like Urvashi Butalia points out that when the legislation was finally accepted by the Parliament in 1983 it was found it was a much diluted version of what was actually demanded by the women's groups. The activism that centred around Mathura rape case represented the resurgence of organized women's activism in post-independent India. Bombay became the centre of protest against rape and a forum was set up in 1981, called the Forum Against Rape. It later became Forum Against Oppression of Women. During the same period of 1970s and 1980s another issue that crystallized in the women's movement was dowry. During this period newspaper reported regular occurrences of dowry deaths. In most of the cases the deaths were presented as suicide and accident and the guilty acquitted by the court. The victims were all young and earlier subjected to violence and demands for dowry. Though dowry was legally prohibited as early as in 1960s, it continued to be an important part of marriage rituals of many families. Organized protests against the practice of dowry and dowry deaths originated from Delhi during the latter half of 1970s. Two Delhi- based women's groups were at the forefront of these protests-Mahila Dakshata Samity and Stree Sangharsh. Various demonstrations were organized in Delhi which targeted the police, the state, the offending families and also the communities that tacitly provided support to the perpetrators of violence. Groups were also formed in other states like Mahila Utpidan Virodhi Mancha of Uttar Pradesh. The anti-dowry agitation caught much attention during the 1980s. The agitation developed some popular slogans like 'Brides are not for Burning'. There was organized public assertion on issues that were earlier considered as private agenda. There were demands for amendments in existing laws. The most remarkable instance of amendment was the introduction of Sec 498A in the Criminal Procedure Code (CrPC) of the Indian Penal Code as a law designed for victims of dowry violence wherein mental cruelty to victims was made legally punishable. In the 1980s the women's movement brought within its ambit the campaign against widow immolation following the death of Roop Kanwar in Rajasthan. This issue of forcible widow immolation of Roop Kanwar as a Sati was taken up by many women's organizations and there were massive protests from all over the country. These protests resulted in a court order to stop the celebration of the event. The government was also forced to intervene with a law. In the same decade female foeticide and infanticide were also taken up as issues by the activists. A number of autonomous women's groups emerged during this period like Manushi (1979), Saheli (1981), Jagori (1984), Kali for Women (1984) etc.

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 159 The eighties were also the time when the Shah Bano judgement was delivered by the Supreme Court. In the early seventies, Shah Bano, a Muslim woman, was divorced by her husband, Mohammad Ahmad Khan. Shah Bano filed an application for maintenance under Sec 125 of Criminal Procedure Code. The case continued for a considerable time for the contradictions between Sec 125 and the Muslim Personal Law and finally came before a bench of the Supreme Court. The five-member bench of the Supreme Court upheld Shah Bano's right to maintenance under Sec 125 of CrPC. This landmark judgement of Supreme Court created several repercussions among Muslim religious leaders, who were of the opinion that the judiciary did not have the right to interfere with Muslim Personal Law and Muslim women must be excluded from Sec 125 of CrPC. As a result of this reactions, the Parliament in 1986 passed the Muslim Women's (Protection of Rights on Divorce) Act, whereby Muslim women were entitled to have maintenance only under this Act. Women's groups supported the Shah Bano judgement of the Supreme Court and vehemently protested this Act. Women's activism in the 1970s and 1980s was one among the several other movements of the period demanding democratic rights. Large scale capitalist model of development in the 1950s and 1960s, unemployment and poverty have initiated student's movements, worker's agitations, peasant, tribal, anti-caste and consumer movements. Women participated in many of these movements actively. The Adivasi women initiated strong struggles particularly in the Shahada movement against consumption of alcohol by men and domestic violence. In Maharashtra, an anti-price rise movement was organized by a temporary coalition of women belonging to the Communist Party of India (CPI), Communist Party of India (Marxist) [CPIM] and the Social Democratic Socialist Party. The emergence of the Self Employed Women's Association (SEWA) in 1972 was also an important development wherein women went for self-employment through formation of cooperatives. SEWA became a movement for economic empowerment of women. 15.5 Women's movement of the Nineties The 1980s was also crucial for the emergence of Dalit women's voices within the women's movement. Earlier, caste identities were camouflaged by the larger demands of sisterhood. Young dalit feminists formed the Mahila Samsad in Mumbai to discuss issues concerning dalit women. In the mid 1990s the Dalit Stree Sahitya Manch was formed which was a forum of the Dalit feminist literary movement. By Christi Mahila Sangharsh Sangathana. The Dalit feminist movement challenged the brahminical bias of the Indian women's movement and the patriarchal bias of Dalit politics in India. The Dalit feminist movement highlighted the issue of difference within the feminist movement. The women's movement in India has not addressed the concerns of Dalit women and has been mostly dominated by urban upper caste women. This thrust changed the character of women's movement in India. The debate that initiated within the women's movement during the eighties culminated in a more fragmentation and difference in the 1980s. Anupama Rao points out that it was in the 1990s that the Indian lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) movement sought to place diversity of sexualities and genders on the agenda of the women's movement. They demanded recognition of sexual and gender diversities and elimination of discrimination against the LGBT people. The central concern of the Seventh National Conference of the Autonomous Women's Movement in Kolkata in 2006 was affirming diversities without divisiveness. The Women's movement in the 1980s and 1990s also encompassed the struggle to enhance women's representation to elected bodies. The issue has first emerged in pre-independent India and was revisited by the CSWI report 'Towards Equality' in the 1970s. The CSWI report highlighted the structural constraints that inhibit women's representation in elected bodies. The report was not able to provide a principle for reservation but it recognized that they face constraints. But it provided recommendations for one-third representation at the Panchayat level. A demand for increased representation for women was raised again in the 1980s. Under pressure from the women's movement the National Perspective Plan for Women (1988) emphasized reservation upto thirty percent at the Panchayat and Zilla Parishad level. Under the 73 rd and 74 th Constitution Amendment Act reservation of seats for women were provided to Panchayats and Municipalities respectively. The Women's organizations continued their demand for reservation of seats at state assemblies and parliament. The Women's Reservation Bill was tabled in the Parliament for the first time in 1996. But due to lack of unanimity among different political parties on the terms and conditions of the bill, it has failed to have its passage through the Parliament till date. With the initiation of the liberalization process in India, there has been a change in the character of the women's movement. The liberalization of the economy brought non-governmental organizations in the process of development alongside the state. There was a proliferation of autonomous organizations running on funds from NSOU N GE-PS-21 ----- 161 international organizations. The NGOs and their funding facilitated in many cases campaigns on specific issues. So, several networks are often formed on specific agenda and they become inactive after some time and replaced by some other network. This is often called the NGO-facilitated women's activism.

15.6 Conclusion The genesis of women's movement in India was not a recent one. Its history can be traced way back before independence when women's question was adequately addressed and became a bone of content for the later scholars. The civilizing mission of the colonial masters and the counter arguments by the nationalists, no wonder has succeeded in politicising the women's question. Since then women's movement has traversed a long way wherein its style, form and mode of functioning have been changing to keep up with the passage of time. Thus, women's movement in recent years has embraced a varied range of issues to fight for originating from violence to economic and political empowerment.

15.7 Summing Up N The women's movement in India is full of diversities in terms of issues addressed, participants and political affiliations. N A large number of organizations with wide range of political affiliations from left to Gandhian can be traced. N There has also been a trend of autonomous women's movement where women's groups have established themselves as groups distinct from any political parties. N Women's movement has brought within its ambit a diverse range of issues from violence to economic and political empowerment.

15.8 Glossary SEWA—Self-employed women's association (SEWA) is a women's movement for economic empowerment and self-reliance. It was founded in 1972 by Ela Bhatt. It is basically a trade union organization of poor, self-employed women workers of unorganized sector. The members of SEWA earn their own living through small businesses.

Introduction The Culture of Domesticity is a term used by historians to describe what they consider to have been a prevailing value system among the upper and middle class during the 19 th Century in the United States and United Kingdom. This value system emphasized new ideas of femininity, the woman’s role within the home and dynamics of work and family. “True Woman”, according to this view, was supposed to possess four cardinal virtues: piety, purity, domesticity, and submissiveness. The idea revolve around the woman being the centre of the family, she was considered “the light of the home”. Although all women were supposed to emulate this ideal of femininity, black, working class, and immigrant women were often excluded from the definition of “true 165 women” because of social prejudice. Since the idea was first advanced by Barbara Welter in 1966, many historians have argued that the subject is far more complex and nuanced than terms such as “Cult of Domesticity” or “True Womanhood”. They suggest, that the roles played by and expected of women within the middle-class, 19 th century context were quite varied and often contradictory. For example, it has been argued that much of what has been considered as anti-feminist in the past, in fact, helped to lead to feminism. According to Welter, an ideal true woman was too “frail”, mentally and physically weak to leave her home. The care of her home supposedly made her feminine, and she depended on men to protect her within the shelter of it. Wilma Pearl Mankiller agrees, claiming that a “True Woman” was expected to be delicate, soft, and weak. She should not engage in strenuous physical activity that would damage her “much more delicate nervous system.” Frances B. Cogan described the ideal of “Real Womanhood”, in which women were encouraged to be physically fit and active, involved in their communities, well educated, and artistically accomplishes, although usually within the broader idea that women were best suited to the domestic sphere. The conflation of Domesticity and True Womanhood” can be misleading in that dedication to the domestic sphere did not necessarily imply purity, submission, or weakness. The characteristics of “True Womanhood” was described in sermons, books, and religious texts as well as women’s magazines. Magazines which promoted the values of the “Cult of Domesticity” fared better financially than those competing magazines which offered a more progressive view in terms of women’s roles. In the United States, Peterson’s Magazine and Godey’s Lady’s Book were most widely circulated and popular among both men and women, supported some of the ideals of the “Cult of True Womanhood”. The magazine’s paintings and pictures illustrated the four virtues, often showing women with children or behind husbands. It also equated womanhood with motherhood and being a wife, declaring the perfection of womanhood is the wife and mother”. The magazine presented motherhood as a woman’s natural and most satisfying role and encouraged women to find their fulfillment and their contributions to society mainly with the home. At the same time, the long-time editor of Godey’s Sarah Josepha Hale, encouraged women to improve themselves intellectually, to write, and to take action that would, improve the moral character of their communities and their nation. 16.3

Influence The Cult of Domesticity affected married women’s labour market participation in the 19 th and the beginning of the 20 th century. “True Women” were supposed to

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 167 devote themselves to unpaid domestic labour and refrain from paid, market-oriented work. Consequently, in 1890, 4.5% of all married women were “gainfully employed”, compared with 40.5% of single women. Women’s complete financial dependence upon their husbands proved disastrous, however, when wives lost their husbands through death or desertion and were forced to fend for themselves and their children. This division between the domestic and public spheres had effects on women’s power and status. In the society as a whole, particularly in political and economic arenas, women’s power declined. Within the home, however, they gained symbolic power. The legal implications of this ideology included the passage of protective labour laws, which also limited women’s employment opportunities outside the home. These laws were based on the assumption that women’s primary role was that of mother and wife, and that women’s non-domestic work should not interfere with their primary function. As a result, women’s working hours were limited and night work for women was prohibited, essentially costing many female workers their jobs and excluding them from many occupations. The Cult of Domesticity “privatized” women’s options for work, for education, for voicing opinions, or for supporting reform. Arguments of significant biological differences between the genders (and often of female inferiority) led to pronouncements that women were incapable of effectively participating in the realms of politics, commerce, or public service. Women were seen as better suited to parenting. Also, because of the expected behaviours, women were assumed to make better teachers of younger children. Woman’s great mission is to train immature, weak, and ignorant creatures to obey the laws of God, first in the family, then in the school, then in the neighbourhood, then in the nation, then in the world. One of the first public jobs for women was teaching. 16.4 Domesticity and the Women’s Movement: Women’s rights advocates of the late 18 th and early 19 th centuries, such as Mary Wollstonecraft, Frances Wright, and Harriet Martineau, were widely accused of disrupting the natural order of things and condemned as unfeminine. After 1850 saw the expansion of voting rights to virtually all white males in the United States, many women believed it was their opportunity for increased civil liberties. Early feminist opposition to many of the values promoted by the Cult of Domesticity (especially concerning women’s suffrage, political activism, and legal independence) culminated in the Seneca Falls Convention in 1848. Although the “Cult of True Womanhood” set many societal restrictions that took away women’s working rights and freedom, it nonetheless laid the groundwork for the later development of feminism by creating women with a moral authority which implicitly empowered them to extend their moral influence outside the home. The ideal woman was expected to act as a status symbol for men and reflect her husband's wealth and success, and was to create babies and care for them so that her husband's legacy of success would continue, but she was also seen as the "Angel in the House" whose purpose was to guide her family morally. Because of the perceived importance of the role, this ideology was imprinted on girls at a very young age; these girls were taught to value their virginity as the "pearl of great piece" which was her greatest asset" and to develop the skills to manage a household and rear children, but they were also taught to themselves as "a pillar of strength and virtue" who was key not only in providing her husband a proper image but in raising boys who would later have a direct impact on the success on the nation. During the Progressive era, the ideal of the New Woman emerged as a response to the Cult of True Womanhood. The New Woman, frequently associated with the suffrage movement, represented an ideal of femininity which was strongly opposed to the values of the Cult of True Womanhood. Although women finally gained ratification of a constitutional amendment and the right to vote in 1920. After emancipation, these New Women could be identified by as "cigarette-smoking, lipsticked and rouged, jazz-dancing, birth-control-using types known as 'modern girls' or flappers. World War II brought about a restructuring of the labour market as women stepped into the war effort on the home front. In the era after World War II, many of the ideas of the "Cult of Domesticity" were stressed again as American society sought to integrate veterans and emphasize the rival of family life and enter companionship marriages. Veterans returned home to be the head of the family and women who had been involved in high-paying and high-skilled wartime jobs were pushed back into the home. The remaking of the private life was central to this era. Anticommunism structured much of the American life, emphasizing the free enterprise system which brought about a period of economic prosperity and a consumer culture. In the 1950s television shows often presented series that depicted fictional families in which the mother's primary work was to raise the children and run the household. Men's and women's spheres were increasingly separated as many families lived in suburban settings, from which men commuted to other cities for work. However, this image of separate spheres disguised the reality that all groups of women continued to work for pay; many did not stop working after the men returned home from the war, they were instead forced into lower-paying jobs. Wages were low and there was little room for advancement. Women that did enter into professional fields were intense scrutiny for going against the feminine domestic ideal. Despite, neo- domestic ideals, many middle-class mothers were burdened by women's double shift of working in the home and also a job. At the same time, women had independent lives during the day and were often active in volunteer and community activities, particularly around issues of education, health, children, and welfare. 16.5 Women and Domestic Labour Women's participation in the public sphere was primarily (but not exclusively) conceived in terms of economic independence, and within less than two decades women all across the western world had joined the labour market. This move was hardly balanced by men who remained reluctant to increase their involvement in unpaid domestic and family work, and the need to combine unpaid work with paid work turned to be a distinctive brand of women's lives. In geography and in neighbouring disciplines feminists paid much attention to the confinement of women to the privacy of the home, the resulted limiting pattern of their home-work relations, and their dependence on the provision and finance of adequate parental and domestic services in various locations. This imbalance resonate Marxist theories of surplus value, with women's unpaid domestic work being recognized as the facilitator of urban decentralization and the suburban way of life. It has become apparent that for women, the family home is primarily a place of work for which they are not paid and hence, it is where the impression of the totality of capitalism loses its colour as it intersects with patriarchy. Accordingly, the home has been conceptualized as a site of women's oppression, where patriarchy takes a variety of forms from direct domestic violence, through economic dependence to socio-cultural vulnerability. Moreover, it turned out that women's abilities to fulfill their (public) right to the city (to appropriate and to participate in the urban creation) depends to a large extent on their right (to appropriate and participate) in their home, that is, their power to share responsibilities and to dictate family life is connected to their freedom to use public spaces. While the notion of the separated spheres is a powerful tool for a gendered analysis, feminists also criticized this imaginary 'separation' on two central grounds. First, that this image reflects the ideal of the dominant white, middle-class, heterosexual, nuclear families, and it is historically and geographically specific. Second, empirical evidence from across the world showed that the private and the 170 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 public spheres and their epitome of home-work relations are linked and interdependent. It was noted that the two spheres represent fluid entities which are mutually defined, and the delineation of one relies on the omission of activities, duties, privileges and people that typically mark the other. It is however, not insignificant that the rhetoric of the spheres, whether separated or linked, presents them as seemingly equivalent. Yet, the tendency to prioritize public sphere interests and promote profit-making, productive, capitalist concerns (as opposed to reproductive, domestic ones) is most apparent among individuals and institutions in family settings, workplace arrangements, policy-making contexts, political situations and other circumstances. This hierarchy heavily relies on the power of the gendered identification of the private, domestic sphere as feminine and the public sphere as masculine, which is a deeply-seated cultural code whose self-evident risks it is being overlooked. However, the transformation of the home that follows second wave feminism, not only propelled out women and brought in auxiliary labour, its effects has challenged the one-dimensional, authoritarian meaning of home. The home can also serve as a working- place for its permanent residents who work for money at home. Examples includes rural women in peripheral areas who sew and quilt, women who combine their contesting, domestic and work duties by locating both at home, and men and women in various locations who rely on communication technologies to generate income from within the home. This raises the issue of the division of domestic space itself and how the gendered meaning of some domestic parts (such as dens and kitchens) changes at the intersections of the performers and the type of the performed activity. 16.6 Conclusion Whereas these various circumstances suggest that the home and domestic relations are politicized in a ways that involve identity performances, they also draw attention to the typical senses of attachment and belonging which are embedded to the experience at home. Here domesticity in its more positive connotations, seems to link the self, and the home as it is recognized that all imply being and living in the world. 16.7 Summing up N The idea of Cult of Domesticity and Domestic Labour, paved the way for the nuclear family.

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 171 N The expectations of female nature focus consequently on consumerism, sexualized marriage, and civic activism. 16.8 Glossary Domesticity: A woman's proper place was in the home and her role as a wife was to create a refuge for her husband and children. Cooking, needlework, making beds, and tending flowers were considered naturally feminine activities, whereas reading anything other than religious biographies was discouraged. Purity: Virginity, a woman's greatest treasure, must not be lost until her marriage night, and a married woman had to remain committed only to her husband. Piety: Religion was valued because unlike intellectual pursuits it did not take a woman away from her "proper sphere," the home, and because it controlled women's longings. Submission: True women were required to be as submissive and obedient "as little children" because men were regarded as women's superiors "by God's appointment". Domestic Labour: Domestic labour refers to the different roles and responsibilities that need to be completed within the household. For example, child rearing and house work. Domestic labour, a concept developed within feminist theory to analyse the significance of the unpaid work performed by women in the home. Most definitions of domestic labour equate it with housework but some include 'emotional work' such as tension, management and caring. Womanhood: Womanhood is the state of being a woman rather than a girl, or the period of a woman's adult life. 16.9 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. 17.2

Introduction The Industrial Revolution, traditionally associated with the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries has long been seen as the great historical turning point in the nature of women's working lives. With it came a reorganization of the production process which separated the household from the workplace. A debate has raged 174

among both feminists and historians since the early years of this century over the positive and negative impact of industrialization on women's workforce participation and status. Optimists have argued that industrialization and the factory brought gains in employment and higher wages which improved women's status within the family. Pessimists have argued that women's jobs were narrowed to less skilled and less valued work, and that women's social position was degraded by the decline of the household economy. In spite of the feminist pronouncements on this crucial historical period, and in spite of significant quantitative research on the social and economic structures of eighteenth century, we are as yet no closer to definitive conclusions on this debate. The first generation of women's historians in the inter-war years, wrote the first sustained historical studies of working women. They were seeking to understand the constraints on women's working lives in a historical transition associated with mechanization and the rise of the factory system. Sources accessible to quantitative estimates have been difficult to identify for women's work in the eighteenth century, a time when women's occupations were only rarely specified in terms other than widow, spinster or servant, and when their contributions were not separated out from those of the head of household or family. It is unlikely that we will ever resolve this debate at the level of the whole economy, but it may at least be addressed at the level of individual sectors, industries and regions. Apart from assessing the impact of industrialization upon women, it is also important that our understanding of industrialization itself is determined by the gender division of the workforce. We can ask to what extent key features of the Industrial Revolution were determined by the characteristics of its labour supply. Our current understanding of the Industrial Revolution is thus, largely based on what we know of the occupational distribution and wage trends of male labour. We can ask to what extent our assessment of the Industrial Revolution is thus, largely based on what we know of the occupational distribution and wage trends of male labour. Most of the debate on industrialization and women's work has focused on women in manufacturing, and this will necessarily be the case here. 17.3

Agriculture and Domestic Service It is first important to note that more women, in absolute numbers, were occupied in agriculture and domestic service during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries than in any other income-earning activity. Social tables provide only extremely rough estimates of occupational distribution, found one in four families occupied in agriculture in 1759 and one in seven by 1803. However, trends in female employment

176 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 in these sectors diverged in the course of the nineteenth century. Agricultural developments include a transition to more arable cultivation and to larger farms; these innovations resulted in the shedding of labour, which much higher proportions of female labour than of male labour disappearing. Women's traditional labour during the harvest and in dairying was curtailed over the course of the century. Male labour became concentrated at harvest time, and women's employment was increasingly confined to low-paid activities such as weeding, stone-gathering, hoeing and spreading manure. Proportionately fewer women were employed in dairying. This was because of trends to more arable cultivation, and also to bigger farms, as a result both of enclosure and of the amalgamation of farms. In contrast, women's employment in domestic service increased. A consensus exists that, from the later eighteenth century onwards, the occupation became feminized. One reason for this appears to have been the rising numbers of middle- class consumers. Certainly by 1851 there were large numbers of domestic servants. Servants accounted for one in ten of the labour force, and women outnumbered men by nine to one. But here too, available estimates are subject to large errors. Those who assembled data failed to separate personal services either from work in husbandry or, even on occasions, from retailing and household manufacture. In both centuries, therefore, there may have been proportionately fewer occupied in personal domestic service than we now tend to assume. 17.4 Women's workforce participation There have been varied explanations for the unequal and subordinate participation of women in the workforce. What has been lacking hitherto has been a detailed analysis of the specific historical conditions for women's entry into industrial work during the eighteenth century. Explanations for the special features of women's participation in industry must first be sought on the basic outlines of labour supply and demand. These were affected in turn by three factors: population change, institutional change and organizational and technological innovations. Taking labour supply first, a new economic framework was provided by the contemporary growth in population, with its changed age and gender balances. The higher numbers of women than men in the population, and the higher proportion of women marrying late or not, meant that many women were seeking some means of gaining subsistence in the period. They created a ready pool of cheap labour. Substantial numbers of women needed to gain an independent subsistence, but in many cases, wages were pitifully inadequate or highly precarious. Our standard image of women working mainly within the context of the household or family economy is therefore, a distorted one. Where women did work within a family economy, their earnings were very meagre, especially at times in their life-cycle when this was dominated by rearing small children. But even these limited earnings, if pooled within a family economy, could help to put together subsistence. Among very poor families, all women and children who could find any work did it. Amongst those who were poor, but who could eke out a living, the earnings of the head of the household – rather than female market wages– provided the major determinant of female participation rates. This was another factor which contributed to new departures in female labour supply although there was considerable regional variation. Low male wage rates–where family incomes were at stake–had the effect of encouraging high rates of female labour force participation. It is likely that such improvements came about, not through higher wage rates or more employment for males, but through more labour by women and children. If trends in population and wages helped stimulate a new female labour supply in the eighteenth century the agricultural and institutional change, added considerably to this. Women's income earning activities on the commons were sharply constrained by enclosure during the course of the eighteenth century. Enclosure cut out vital sources of subsistence in gleaning, wood gathering and gardening. It also drastically reduced the possibilities for both squatters and copyholders to pursue small trades and domestic industries which, on their own provided insufficient or volatile returns, but with common rights could provide subsistence income. Other institutional changes, especially those in the poor law, increased difficulties in obtaining outdoor relief, housing and a settlement. These were all the factors which had eased women's participation in the labour force. These institutional changes, when taken together with agricultural innovation, caused the classic 'release of labour' from agriculture that economists have shown to be necessary before the transition to modern economic development can take place. It is important to appreciate that the labour that was released was predominantly female. We can thus, understand the historical origins of a rising female labour supply in the early stage. But labour force participation must also depend upon labour demand. Labour demand was changing in conjunction with these supply factors. 17.5 Why were women employed? The gender division of the workforce was clearly a major consideration in the demand for labour in manufacturing. Wage rates were one factor, women generally received one third to one half of the male wage. More important in explaining the demand for women's labour than wages was organizational and technological innovation. Women's labour was used to yield substantially higher rates of profit than was possible under earlier manufacturing regimes. Proto-industrialization in some of its forms was associated with extensive division of labour, and putting out or other subcontracting arrangements. Large-scale workshops, and small factories could yield economies of scale even when there were as few as six to fifteen employees. This was because of a division of hand-performed tasks, the use of simple tools, better supervision, and a more disciplined work regime. Such factories and workshops drew on higher proportions of female and child labour than their predecessors. In industries deploying large-scale production, such as the factory textile industry and paper making, more capital-intensive processes were associated to some extent with the substitution of women and children for men. It is interesting to see that women and children were assumed to be the key workforce in certain situations. For example, contemporary innovation in processes such as calico printing and spinning was tried out first on a female and child workforce. In situations of high-labour intensity, processes were broken down into series of dexterous operations; these were performed particularly well by teenage girls who contributed manual skills learned at home. There is increasing evidence of single women and girls working in all-female households or workshops in such activities as lacemaking, calico printing, linen spinning and button manufacture, as well as in the better-known and more conventional factory arrangements in cotton manufacture or the potteries. Organizational innovation also tapped the supply of married women with children, thus, developing a division of labour based on an adult with child assistants. Women workers in these early factories, workshops and proto-industrial manufacturers were employed as they are in the Third World today. They were employed not because their wages were lower than those of local male labour, but because new methods of production could be introduced. These included management practices, divisions of labour and technologies which bypassed traditional artisan customs and arrangements. While high proportions of the labour force employed in manufacture were women and child workers, it was also evident that the employment provided by industry was insufficient. The demand for labour created by industry was not adequate to the task of soaking up surplus labour left in the wake of demographic and agricultural change. While factors affecting both labour demand and supply encouraged NSOU N GE-PS-21

179 high rates of female labour force participation during the industrial revolution, the demand created for women's labour was not what models of economic development would predict. To explain this, one area to which we must turn is the effect of technological innovation. 17.6 Impact of mechanization If we look at those industries affecting women, there is evidence of an eighteenth-century 'machinery question', one predicting the introduction of the big power technologies and large-scale factories of the nineteenth century. Spinning jenny, warp spinners, weft spinners, silk-throwing machinery and Heathcoat's lace-making machinery destroyed traditional sources of women's domestic employment. The double engine loom, the jacquard loom, the flying shuttle, and framework knitting machinery displaced more. But other new processes in calico printing, the Birmingham trades, and the potteries drew on more women's labour. The spinning jenny and the power loom displaced women workers, but they were still themselves worked by women. When women's work in woolen spinning in Scotland went into decline it was by flax spinning, then by flowering muslin or embroidery. Since we are hampered by the lack of quantitative indicators on women's employment for the early industrial period, there can be no resolution of the issue of mechanization and women's work but it seems probable that the opportunities afforded for women in the new sectors (which were still a relatively small part of industry in terms of value added according to current estimates) were not sufficient to offset the numbers of women displaced in agriculture and domestic spinning. The labour surplus economy which prevailed for men by the early nineteenth century also prevailed for women. Nevertheless, in terms of their proportionate contribution to the manufacturing labour force, women workers played a greater part of the whole course of the eighteenth century, than they had done previously and were due in the later stages of industrialization. While for the most part women's work in this period was low-waged and exploitative, but there is no doubt that this work contributed to a family economy. Where wages were higher for women, there were some limited possibilities of gaining an independent subsistence, and in such cases single women did work independently or in groups outside the family economy. But such work was precarious, subject to fashion or to short-term cyclical trends or structural imbalances. It could support women as individuals, but did so generally for limited phases of the life cycle. By the mid-nineteenth century labour conditions historically specific to the Industrial Revolution had changed. As real wages rose, the proportions of occupied women fell at a rate of 0.7 per cent per decade over the last half of the nineteenth century. Other factors combined to reinforce this effect, notably a combination of factory legislation, the activities of male trade unionists and an increasingly pervasive ideology of the male breadwinner and of 'fit and proper' female activities. 17.7 Conclusion What impact does the recognition of women's employment have on our interpretation of the Industrial Revolution? Interpretations have so far been focused mainly on data for adult male labour. The shift of labour away from agriculture would be reinforced with the inclusion of female labour. But the interpretation given to industry might be substantially alerted by accounting for women's labour. The dominants part of the manufacturing sectors were employers of higher proportions of women than of men, and women rather than men were employed in the new progressive industries to which most of the productivity gain in industry has been attributed. We need to know the extent to which the sources of productivity gain which made the first Industrial Revolution can be found, in industry at least, in the deployment of a large female workforce with attributes of low wages, high labour intensity and discipline, and technical dexterity. 17.8

It is particularly used with regard to the unpaid work that a mother or wife will perform within a family and household.

Industrial Revolution—The Industrial Revolution, now also known as the First Industrial Revolution, was the transition to new manufacturing processes in Europe and the United States, in the period from about 1760 to sometime between 1820 and 1840. This transition included going from hand production methods to machines, new chemical manufacturing and iron production processes, the increasing use of steam power and water power, the development of machine tools and the rise of the mechanized factory system. The Industrial Revolution also led to an unprecedented rise in the rate of population growth. Gender—Either of the two sexes (male and female), especially when considered with reference to social and cultural differences rather than biological ones. The term is also used more broadly to denote a range of identities that do not correspond to established ideas of male and female. Mechanization—Mechanization is the process of changing from working largely or exclusively by hand or with animals to doing that work with machinery. In some fields, mechanization includes the use of hand tools. In modern usage, such as in engineering or economics, mechanization implies machinery more complex than hand tools and would not include simple devices such as an ungeared horse or donkey mill. Devices that caused speed changes or changes to or from reciprocating to rotary motion, using means such as gears, pulleys or sheaves and belts, shafts, cams and cranks, usually are considered machines. After electrification, when most small machinery was no longer hand powered, mechanization was synonymous with motorized machines. Extension of mechanization of the production process is termed as automation and it is controlled by a closed loop system in which feedback is provided by the sensors. It controls the operations of different machines automatically. Production—Production means the action of making or manufacturing from components or raw materials, or the process of being so manufactured. Production is a process of combining various material inputs and immaterial inputs in order to make something for consumption. It is the act of creating an output, a good or service which has value and contributes to the utility of individuals. Labour Women—Labour Women is the women's section of the Labour Party of Ireland. All women party members are Labour Women members. Those who wish to be actively involved are included in a mailing list which informs them of events, developments, networking opportunities and any other relevant information.

movements. 18.3 Definition of Peasant It is important to understand the concepts related to the categories such as peasantry. This exercise that engages with the definitions of these categories will help us to locate the linkages that exist between gender, and the peasantry. The category of peasant is contested. It refers to diverse sections such as share croppers, rich small holders, landless labourers and sections such as feudal tenants. These are dealt within the Marxist theoretical tradition. The revolutionary agency of the peasantry is very much part of the Marxian analysis. Marxist scholars link feudal tenants to the world of peasant economies. This approach explores the conditions that determine the location of rural day labourers, feudal tenants and independent farmers. Peasants and their life worlds are explored in the context of consumption/production, capitalist/non-capitalist agriculture and the exploitation of impoverished producers in agriculture. The mode of production plays a vital role in the class location of the peasant. Anthropological readings on peasantry focus on the role of norms and values, predicaments on tradition, nature of vision and so on. In other words, norms, values, tradition and vision of peasantry are studied in the field of anthropology. Scholars who belong to the school of subaltern studies positioned the category of peasant in a different theoretical fashion, Ranajit Guha (1983), one of the path breaking founders of the school, emphasized the historiography of the peasant and peasant insurgency in colonial India as seen 'from below'. Thus, a subaltern study re-reads the peasant (subaltern) resistance and its representation in the colonial historiography. Subaltern studies focused on the impact of caste system in agrarian milieu and resistance. It explored the dimensions of peasants and their movements in the pre-colonial, colonial and post colonial period. "Subaltern is a category that 186 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 signifies subordination. Partha Chatterjee is one of the important scholars who contributed to the field of subaltern studies. He provided the subaltern interpretation of the peasant world and caste system. He criticized the Marxian analysis of the peasantry as a particular way of reading that reduces the caste system to a super structural epiphenomenon. He contended that this reading was a particular kind of Marxist distortion. According to Partha Chatterjee (1983) both base and superstructure contribute to the shaping of caste system. He argues that religion acts as a form of consciousness which helps the subalterns to oppose the dominant forces. Tom Brass (1991) criticized subaltern studies for its construction of rural producers as uniform and he equates it with the approach of populism. Three agencies such as Sarkari (government), Sahukari (money lending) and Zamindari (landlordism) controlled the lives of the peasants in India. These agencies are active in the exploitation of the peasantry. However, the peasantry in contemporary- neoliberal India is experiencing the retreat of state from agriculture, lack of proper policies, the penetration of capitalist forces in the field of agriculture, "NGO-ization" and the consequential depoliticization of peasant agency, recurring suicides in agrarian communities, rapid technological change and so on. 18.4 History of Peasant Feminism In the previous section we learnt about how the categories of peasant and working class have been defined by various scholars in the field. In this section, we will examine these categories in a historical framework as well as in relationship to women and feminism. Some of the issues to be covered here include the condition of Indian women, their relationship to labour, and to agriculture. The independence related struggle about the peasantry in our country took place in 1857. It was an unorganized feudal peasant struggle against the colonizers that was led by feudal lords. The emergence of leadership among peasants happened only after the formation of Kisan Sabhas. Uday Mehta (1979) has classified peasant movements in terms of the following three phases: 1) First phase: The sporadic growth of peasant movements in the absence of organized and proper leadership emerged in the period, 1857-1921. 2) Second phase: During the period 1923-46, an organized form of Kisan Sabhas created consciousness among the peasants. The salient feature is that peasant movements were led by people and they gave importance to the problems of peasant in the national question.

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 187 3)

Post-Independence era: Agrarian movements became assertive due to the ruling parties' incompetence to foreground the problems of Indian peasantry. It was broadly mobilized by leftist parties and in the late seventies and eighties; it became the discourse of some other autonomous farmers' organization. The tremendous peasant assertions, is a part of "the deepening economic crisis which affects the peasants and more brutally than urban middle class". The agendas of the peasant movements were land to the tiller, higher prices for farm producers, write off farmers' loans, and so on. Militant peasant assertions were neutralized by clashes, firings and deaths.

18.4.1 Peasant Upsurge in Awadh: Role of Women

After the Uprising of 1857, the dynamic of British rule changed and a need was felt to create an ally which would enable the upholding of their rule in India. Thus, were created and buttressed a small class of feudal barons and their 'kinsmen' along with the rajas and maharajas of the Princely States. The taluqdars of Awadh were on such category which found patronage in the British Raj. Besides general exploitation numerous humiliation were exerted on the peasantry to carry out their extortionate demands. The outbreak of the First World War resulted in scarcity and high prices, adding to the existing problems of poverty, unemployment and underemployment. In Awadh, the loyal supporters of the Empire-the taluqdars-squeezed the peasantry dry by forcibly raising war loans and recruits to aid their masters, leading to increased discontent. The British Government was well aware of their conditions prevailing in the Awadh areas. But any step taken to improve the peasants' lot was bound to annoy the taluqdars, which the government could not afford as they were the upholders of the empire against 'seditious' national leaders. The peasants of Awadh were ready to take to any means to achieve compensation of their grievances. They found a benefactor in the form of Baba Ram Chandra. He launched an eight-fold agrarian program for the upliftment of the peasantry. The peasantry was stirred into action in May 1920. This soon involved women also as we find the first instance of active political participation of women in the peasant struggles in August-September 1920. When Ram Chandra was arrested for the first time, about 40,000 peasants surrounded Pratapgarh jail and the government was forced to release him. Women had taken an active part in this agitation and after this there is no going back. Incidentally, Ram Chandra and thirty two other peasants had been arrested by the police on the complaint of a woman taluqdar. As the revolt thickened, women were the major sufferers. In December 1920, the Ajudhya Kisan

188 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 Conference was held in which 50,000 one lakh peasant men and women were present. This was a great achievement. When there was resistance from the authorities women offered Satyagraha and sustained the struggle. The peasant movement in Awadh assumed the dimensions of a class war as the desperate peasantry resorted to militant action on a large scale in Rai Bareilly district.

18.4.2 The Tebhaga Movement

The Tebhaga movement of sharecroppers started in undivided Bengal in 1946- 47 after the great famine of 1943. The sharecroppers of that particular region did not have occupancy rights. They faced threats of eviction. The landlord exploited them by taking their produce. They levied illegal cess from the sharecroppers and the women were exploited by the landlords. The main slogan of this movement was 'land to the tiller'. It demanded a reduction in land rents from one-half to one-third of the crop share. It was organized by Bengal Provincial Kisan Sabha (BKPS) and led by Communist Party of India. Women's self-defense league or MARS (Mahila Atma Raksha Samiti) was also part of the struggle. It was founded in the year 1942 and linked to the mobilization of Bengali women on the eve of Bengal famine. In 1943 five thousand women from Calcutta and its suburban regions conducted a hunger march to the Bengal Legislative Assembly to protest against the hike in prices. They also conducted marches in small towns of Bengal. It had branches in every district by May 1944. There was membership of 43,500 women belonging to working class, peasant, middle class, urban poor sections. Oppression on the basis of gender is related to caste, economy based oppression and agrarian conditions. Caste Hindu landlords regulated the lives of the women who also experienced sexual exploitation from the land lords. It is argued that rural poor women faced the worst conditions. Both Hindu and Muslim women were very much part of this struggle. Women acted as the informers for the activists of the movement. They informed the activists about the arrival of the police, gave food and shelter to them. Women also become messengers of the activists who worked in the market and other areas. There were Nari Bahinis or Mahilla Bahinis (women's corps) to protect the village. Women who belong to poor sections were active in meetings and demonstration. They were also the members of the Tebhaga committee. These women were courageous and resisted arrests. They used household devices used for husking, chopping woods, brooms, knives, mixture of dust and chilli powder to resist and attack the police. They resisted the landlords who were harvesting paddy with the help of the police. Many women were killed and got injured during the movement. They protested against wife beating in the Tebhaga peasant courts and branches of MARS. They argued that wife beating questions the integrity of the movement against the landlords. Their campaign against domestic violence provided new dimensions to the Tebhaga movement. Some of the peasants in the Muslim areas objected to the presence of women in the Kisan Samitis. 18.4.3 The Telengana Struggle The Telengana struggle started in the year 1945 as an armed struggle organized by the Communist party of India in the rural part of Andhra Pradesh against the feudal regime. It stood for the cause of providing land to the peasant cultivators. It demanded hike in wages, abolition of forced labour and sexual exploitation of women. Three million men and women belonging to 3000 villages of the several districts of Telengana participated in the struggle. Landlords during the Nizam period sexually exploited women from the poor and vulnerable sections. They were kidnapped and forced to submit themselves to the sexual advance of the landlords. Those women who were part of this movement belong to landless and middle class peasant backgrounds. They joined the movement to solve their land related issues. It was also an attempt to come out of the structure of oppressive family. Women in Andhra Pradesh participated in the Telengana struggle and challenged the barbaric rule of razakars during 1948-50. They were active in rallies and strikes. Men found refuge in the forests for their activism during the bitter days of repression. Women remained in the family. Women used chilli powder, slings and pestles to defend themselves. Women carried messages by disguising themselves as boys. Ten thousand women participated in this struggle. They were repressed and brutally raped by the police and landlords. But, leaders of Telengana showed a paternalistic attitude to women's question. Women were not allowed to work as guerrillas and asked to work as messengers, providing shelter and so on. Male leaders considered women as not capable of fighting with arms. Thus, women who were part of the Telengana were alienated from the dominant patriarchal leadership. During Telengana, women guerrilla committees were formed and women fought against the razakars of Nizam. Some of them who were part of the guerrilla wing were asked to go back to family after the struggle. For instance, women were considered as a supportive part of the Communist Party. A few among them only become party members. Women argue that they did everything for the struggle like their male counter parts. But, they were not given membership in the party. The question of separate land titles to women, domestic violence, dowry were never discussed in the party. Women played a role in environmental movements. They were assertive in the Chipko movement. It emerged in the Garhwal hills of northwest India. The Chipko movement was innovative way to prevent the cutting of trees. It was against the exploitation of forest that was owned by the government and the forest department and emerged in the year 1973. One village woman protested against the logging of a tract of oak forest related to the potato seed farm. Women protested because it would result in the loss of their source of fuel and fodder and would add five kilometers to their journey for fire wood. Women took the initiative to start vigilance against illegal felling. They also protested against the tree auctions. They also opposed alcoholism and domestic violence. They were conscious that their daily life was dependent on trees. Thus, women become more active in village meetings. 18.5 Conclusion Peasant women are fragmented in contemporary India. Social strata based on caste, class, region proliferate the fragmentations. At the same time they are facing the challenges of the retreat of the nation-state from social security. They are also becoming the victims of development included displacement that is driven by neo-liberal ideology. The oppression of the dalit-advansi-women working class in Nandigram, plachimada, Muthanga and so on demonstrates the brutal dimensions of the repression of their assertions. Identity politics and the NGO-ization of the social movements accelerate the gap that exists between the different sections of women. They think that leadership from their community can only address their issues in a positive manner. Thus, they are caught in a complicated gendered political milieu. The differences as well as solidarities symbolize the diverse ways of engendering democracy. 18.6 Summing up N The unit tried to explore the intersections of peasant class identities among women. It dealt with their struggle in the various movements in India and also about contribution towards the peasant class.

N The present unit

critically analysed questions such as: What conflict exist between peasants and ideological/repressive state apparatus? Has male leadership in the peasant assertions-movements addressed the question of women? These questions have discussed by locating women's issues and concerns in the historical context of peasant movements. 18.7 Glossary Agency—Human action and its impact on actors; ability to take action. Peasant—A poor small land holder or agricultural labourer of low social status (chiefly in historical use or with reference to subsistence farming in poorer countries).

Endogamy—It is the selected or prescribed practice of marriage within the boundaries of kin-group, clan, lineage, village and social class. The opposite of endogamy is called as exogamy in which the prescribed marriage will be outside the in-group. Feudalism—This term refers to the political system of western European institutions during the middle age. It is also applied to refer to the landholding in the seventeenth century England. Marc Bloch explored the relationship between feudalism-vassal age. According to him, the features of feudalism are succession based on hereditary, the mode of providing land by lords to their Vassals; split in the authority and limited/taxable self disciplined peasantry. Max Weber linked it with patrimonial power and struggle related to rent. Zamindari—The system under which zamindars held land or the office or territory of a zamindar. Colonialism—Colonialism refers to the political order imposed by the developed countries on Asia, Africa, Australia and Latin America. It began with the penetration of white populations of Spain, Portugal, Britain, France and Netherlands during the fifteenth century and their entry to Asia and Africa in the nineteenth century. They exploited native resources. It also contained the idea of civilizing mission to hide its exploitative nature.

the social stratifications that determine the assertion of working class women. 19.2

Introduction The Emancipation of Women – The enslavement of women, historically, is the legacy of development of class society based on private property relations i. e. Private ownership of the Means transformed from Feudalism to Capitalism, could not end the exploitation and inequality. The status of the women also continued to be secondary even in capitalist society and in fact, it further deteriorated due to commodification of women and severe exploitation of working women. The emancipation of women is impossible without total emancipation of the society as a whole and this can be achieved only under a non- exploitative system like socialism as perceived by the Marxist tradition of thought. Working Class is the vanguard of the struggle against capitalism. Women can never be emancipated in the capitalism because the system itself is based on exploitation of the working class and women are inseparable part of the toiling masses. The gender inequality is not a feminine issue but a class issue and must be fought against by the workers as a class by both men and women. Thus, organizing working women is not a task of only women but a task of the whole working class. Working women have an important role in trade unions. Their participation is vital not only as part of working class but also in the democratic movement. They add new dimensions to the struggles. Once they are convinced and motivated their participation is total and militant. Women become loyal members of the unions if their specific issues are taken and some gains are achieved through struggles. Women workers are ready to make any sacrifices needed for their struggles and they also have a clear vision of rights and wrongs. They are normally very strong and do not easily back out from the struggles. They are also very clear about their class enemies and the nexus between their employers, police and politicians. The trade union movement and working women's movement have achieved many things through their struggles such as equal remuneration, maternity benefits, no deployment in night shift, provisions of crèche, rest rooms etc. The movement was demanding an Act against Sexual Harassment at workplace for a long time. The working women's movement should now give a united fight for the legislations, their application to all sectors and strict implementation. 19.3

Defining Working Class The working class is the class which has to sell its labour power for survival. Marx called this category as the "proletariat." The sale of labour power within a particular time determines the wage of labourer. But, there are differences in the category of working class based on market conditions and work. The labour contract too decides the nature of the subordinate location of the working class. Blue collar occupations and manual jobs determine the social space of working class. The working class is not a homogenous category. Rather, there are differences in the location and social mobility of the working class. Those who are skilled are more privileged than the unskilled. The section that exists between skilled and unskilled are the semi skilled.

Those who are part of the primary market and secondary market also have a different trajectory. Changing needs and demands in labour market result in poverty. Primary market and secondary markets are the two entities of labour market. Primary market is determined by the requirements of the workers. It has good jobs with career prospects. It also has proper pension schemes, full time employment and good pay. Those who are part of the primary labour market are socially mobile and better paid than those who work in the secondary labour market. The primary labour market is composed of skilled labours. On the other hand, secondary market provides low social mobility, part time jobs. It does not provide pension. Those workers in the secondary market are vulnerable to multiple forms of exploitation and exclusion. The marginalized sections are very much part of the secondary labour market. For instance, workers who belong to the subordinate classes, castes, races and gender are part of the secondary labour market. They do not have the access to paid vacations, standardized labour contracts, pensions and entitlements, and other forms of social security. Unemployment and under-employment are the salient features of those workers who are situated within the secondary labour market. The working class in the first world faces the threat of automation. Rapid technological changes call into question the day to work of the labourers. The primary markets and manufacturing sectors also undergo rapid changes in the developing society. The shrinking of those sectors affects the working class in such countries. 19.4 Trade Union Movement in India Women's organization in India first appeared at the beginning of this century partly under male patronage, partly under the initiative of some western women, involving primarily elite Indian women. The earliest of the women's organization and Mahila Samitis came to be established in Bengal in 1910. In 1917, the foreign women active in the Theosophical Society, notably Annie Besant and Margaret Cousins founded Women's Indian Association (WIA). They urged Indian Women to join Home Rule League and the Swadeshi Movement.

The National Council of Women in India was established in 1925 by lady Tata. The All India Women's Conference (AIWC) was formed by Margaret Cousins in 1926-27 and soon came to be recognized as the most important among women's organizations in India. All these organizations concerned themselves with social and educational problems of women. The AIWC intended to press for educational rights for women. A major dilemma for this elite women's organization was retaining the importance of women's issues together with their participation in the freedom movement. In 1971, the WIA raised the issue of women's suffrage in front of the Montague Commission; its lobbying was responsible for the grant of restricted franchise to women based on wifehood, property and education. Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddy became the first women legislator. Sarojini Naidu, a WIA leader, on becoming the President of the Indian National Congress, further tried to interlink the women's issue with the nationalist issue. But the entire approach of the pre-independence women's movements was generally cautious and appeasing. The post-independence period witnessed a mushrooming of women's organizations operating on an All India or regional basis, covering women's issues, general and specific. It is these organizations, which have been able to mobilize masses of women or at least, large sections of them into political activity. Also the pressure from these organizations has influenced the government and political agenda. All the major parties, particularly the leftist ones have women's wings or women's organizations. The CPI has the National Federation of Indian Women (NFIW) which established in 1954, happen to be the oldest of the party organizations. The CPI-M organized their women's front in the All India Coordinating Committee of Working Women (women's wing of the CITU) and the All-India Democratic Women's Association (AIDWA). From the 1970s, the Janata Party's Mahila Dakshata Samiti has been active. Most of these organizations are national, have local chapters and are organized hierarchically. They are primarily mobilization organizations. The BJP's women's front is organized on the lines of the Sangha Parivar. The RSS has its Rashtra Sevika Samiti, the VHP Matri Mandal and Durga Vahini, and the BJP has Mahila Morcha. Whereas the Rashtra Sevika Samiti was founded as early as 1936, the other women's organizations of the Parivar dramatically expanded only in 1989- 90, on the eve of Babri Masjid demolition. The women's organizations of the Communist parties share the parties approach to the Indian state and follow similar agitational strategy. The CPI's National Federation is committed to the cause of the poor and the working class women. It adopted a two fold technique: one, social service projects for poor women, such as, literacy classes and employment generating projects; the other technique is that of 'agitation' through mobilizing and enrolling women in the local level organization for pressurising government for increased educational and employment opportunities, equal pay, prohibition of dowry and land reforms. In spite of agitational activity, its major objective has been getting more laws enacted in favour of women. The women's front of CPI-M emerged in the late 1970's as a response to the demands of the leftist women generated by the rise of women's consciousness during the 1970's. The AICCWW (All India Coordination Committee of Working Women) as the Women's wing of the CITU aimed at improving trade union policy with regard to women, and to induct women into the trade union movement. In contrast, the AIDWA, is a membership organization. It functions through its local affiliates which organize local women against dowry, violence, price rise, working women's grievances, etc. From the 1970's the NFIW, the AIDWA and AICCWA on various women's issues such as rape, dowry deaths, have formed broad coalitions with autonomous women's groups; they demonstrate together, petition to the government, organize public rallies to influence government policies. In reality their objective is to mobilize poor and working class women for electoral purposes and strengthen the women's base of the respective parties. They have been helpful to women's cause no doubt they primarily have contributed to building the working class movement. The Mahila Dakshata Samiti (Women's Vigilance Committee) of the Janata Dal has its roots in the Anti-price Rise movement of the 1970's; the Emergency that followed and the ensuing elections brought together socialist women leaders like Pramila Dandavate, Dr. Sushila Nayar, Mrinal Gore etc. in organizing the Mahila Dakshata Samiti ( MDS). In contrast to the communist women's organizations, the MDS followed the strategy of parliamentary politics by relying on lobbying with parties and legislators for better laws. Besides lobbying, MDS has three major areas of activity which include (i) Consumer protection, (ii) Women's rights and anti-dowry issue, and (iii) a concern for general status of women. In the late 1970's the MDS organized women against rape, dowry deaths, and contributed to media publicity and public awareness. It also took up the cause of the rights of Muslim women in the matter of divorce. Compared to the NFIW and AIDWA, the Mahila Dakshata Samiti is relatively independent and functions more as pressure group, but in outlook, membership and organization it is closely related to the Janata party. The Congress Party, also did not remain unaffected by the ferment of the 1970's and 1980's. It formalized its women's front, the Mahila Congress, which has been very subdued after the nationalist period. Adequate information is not available on the activities of Mahila Congress; its primary role has been to mobilize women's voters at the time of election, and use women as electoral support base. The BJP and the two organizational wings of the Sangha family – the RSS and VHP defined the political and social role of women from the conservative rightist Hindu position; the emphasis was on Matri Shakti, the strong Hindu women, both as wives and mothers. Although the Rashtra Sevika Samiti (of the RSS) brought Hindu women outside the family for physical training, the priority was always the family and the preservation of Hindu culture in the context of modernization. In contrast to the party-based women's organizations, from the late 1970's and especially from 1980's there has been a proliferation of autonomous women's groups in most parts of the country. Three most successful organizations which can be mentioned here are Self-Employed Women's Association (SEWA, Ahmedabad) Working Women's Forum (Madras) and Annapurna Mandal (Bombay). Some of these are offshoot of large professional organizations like Vimochana. Even the

NSOU N GE-PS-21

SEWA originated from the Textile Labour Association. Women who were part of different trades in the informal economy were mobilized by the SEWA. This was founded by Ela Bhatt in the year 1972. Compared to many other autonomous women's groups, the SEWA and Working Women's Forum adopt a co-operative stand towards the state. Both use government and international funding to create economic opportunities for poor women and become politically effective. The SEWA has expanded into rural areas, organized income generating projects through Khadi protection and dairy development. The Working Women's Forum in Tamil Nadu organizes poor rural women so that they receive bank loans for income generating projects, but the long-term objective is to develop leadership and make them effective in the community. 19.5 Limitations Though there is need to organize Working Women on a greater scale, there are some hurdles which we have to overcome to engage them in Union work. Some of them are – 1) They have to bear the triple burden – Work at Factory/Office; - Work at home; - Work in the Trade Union. 2) They have less access to education, further trainings and skill up gradation programs. They also have a very little opportunity for self-study and development. 3) They are victims of religious and social taboos, inhibitions imposed by customs and tradition. 4) Restrictions from the husband and in laws for participating in Trade union work. 5) They are easy targets of character assassination when they work in public along with male colleagues. 19.6 Conclusion The division between the rights oriented wing and the empowerment wing is often fluid, it is a matter of priorities or emphasis. Often a single organization engages in both kinds of activities. In fact, in the process of mobilization and the consequent empowerment, the agencies are not fixed and predetermined. The political parties, particularly the leftist parties, have a significant role in mobilizing and making rural women politically conscious. Sometimes the government can also contribute to the process of empowerment. An example can be found in the Forest Protection Committees (of women) in West Bengal. The process of empowerment has manifested itself with greater intensity in rural areas among lower caste/class. Tribal women formed Coastal Women's Front which became a part of fish-workers movement against mechanized trawling and also to be establish a separate platform for women. The two major problem areas for autonomous groups are: its over emphasis on autonomy of women's issues which might delink women from the mainstream, and second, the practical aspect of dependence for funding, both on national and international sources. 19.7

It dealt with their struggle in the various movements in India and contribution towards the working class.

A critical analysis of women's issues and concerns in the context of trade union movement was made. 19.8 Glossary Capitalism—This refers to an economic system that subjects wage labour and commodity production for sale. It is also associated with exchange and profit. It does not immediately address the needs of the producers. It is a principle as well as the means of industrialization. It abounds with private property, free-competitive market and involvement of work force in employment in the private sector. It promotes the idea of free market of small scale entrepreneurs who are competent to hire individual labourers for minimum cost. It also expects profit maximization through this sort of an arrangement. It focuses on the production for profit and private property that is partially controlled by the state. Sociologists such as Max Weber explored the category of wage labour and market exchange as one of the key aspects of capitalism. Capitalist systems are based on calculated rationality, achieving wealth through deferred gratification and separation of the economic and social conditions. Labour—According to Karl Marx, labour not only produces commodities; it produces itself and the worker as a commodity. It is identical with wage-labour. It is conceptualized as the conflicting realm of the labour and class in Marxian scholarship. Labour refers to the working class and exploitation of the labour power by the 200 _____ capitalist class. Marx argues that if labour is value, wage is private property. Thus, labourer belongs to one whom he labours. Working class is not homogenous and the decomposition of labour happens due to their stratification of their skills. Skill—Skill refers to the manual and mental techniques that have to be acquired through training and schooling. It is also associated with aptitude. Trade Union—A trade union is an association of workers forming a legal unit or legal personhood, usually called a "bargaining unit", which acts as bargaining agent and legal representative for a unit of employees in all matters of law or right arising from or in the administration of a collective agreement. Working Class—The social group consisting of people who are employed for wages, especially in manual or industrial work. "Working class" is a socio-economic

term used to describe persons in a social class marked by jobs that provide low pay, require limited skill and/or physical labour, and have reduced education requirements. Unemployed persons or those supported by a social welfare program are often included in this group. Informal Economy—The informal economy is the diversified set of economic activities, enterprises, jobs, and workers that are not regulated or protected by the state. The concept originally applied to self-employment in small unregistered enterprises. It has been expanded to include wage employment in unprotected jobs.

Objectives The present unit will enable us to explain : N The property rights of women N International regulations on women property rights N Barriers to women property rights 20.2

Introduction Ownership of any of the movable and immovable property comes under the property rights. Property rights are the rights of own, acquire (through purchase, gift, or inheritance), manage, enjoy, and dispose of tangible and intangible property, including land, house, money, bank accounts and other assets, livestock, and crops. Women's property rights are property and inheritance rights enjoyed by women as a category within society at any point in time. Women, under the international law, have equal property rights. It applies for both movable and immovable (or tangible NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 203 and intangible) properties. The patterns and rights of property ownership vary between societies and are influenced by cultural, racial, political, and legal factors. In many countries of the world, women property rights are limited by norms, religious traditions, social customs and legislations. The lack of control over both productive and non-productive resources that is apparent in both rural and urban settings places women at a reduced level of advantages in areas of security of home, maintaining a basis for survival, and accessing economic opportunities. Development related problems faced across the globe have been increasingly linked to women's lack of property and inheritance rights, especially with regard to land and property ownership, encompassing areas such as low levels of education, hunger and poor health. Thus, land property rights, through their impact on patterns of production, distribution of wealth, as well as market development, has evolved as one of the prerequisites of economic growth and poverty reduction. 20.3

Global Overview Women play an integral part in the production of food and goods, from work in fields, factories, and home-based business across the globe. There is a critical relationship in the role that women play and the sustenance provided for families, communities, and nations. Globally, an estimated 41% of women headed households live below the locally defined property line, with one-thirds of world’s women either homeless or living in inadequate housing facilities. The additional exclusion of women from access to land pushes them towards cities, where they often join the ranks of increasing number of women-headed households in slum areas. However, through the processes of globalization and industrialization, there has been a noted increase in the numbers of women entering in the waged labour sectors. Rural women are solely responsible for half of the world’s food production, and in developing countries, as much as 80% of food crops. More recent estimates claim that half of the world’s food and in developing countries, between 60-80% of food crops are the results of growth from seeds that have been planted by a woman’s hand. This persistence of traditional divisions of labour, in which woman hold primary responsibility for producing food, as well as other labour-intensive tasks such as gather water and fuel, contributes to the large percentage of women informally working in rural areas. The roles that women play differ significantly by region, with an average of 43% of the agricultural labour force in developing countries, ranging from 20% in Latin America to 50% in Eastern Asia and Sub-Saharan Africa. Thus, in addition to increasing vulnerability and reducing status, exclusion of women from the decision making process and the control and transfer of land has also led to a decrease in food security and sustainable development. 20.4 International Regulations on Women Property Rights: The international human rights law requires equal protection of property rights of both men and women. Property rights are actually human rights. Women’s right to land and property, being the inalienable human right, is also related to adequate standards of living, right to housing and freedom from forced evictions. These rights are guaranteed in the international instruments. International Relevant Article Text Convention Article Universal Declaration of Human Rights

Both the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights require that there will be no discrimination based on “property” of a person.

NSOU N GE-PS-21 _____ 205

The Beijing Platform for Action (announced in 1995) has also required that women's right to inheritance and ownership of land and property should be recognized and governments should take legislative and reform measures to remove disparities. Women's property rights are also implicit in Millennium Development, especially Goal 1 on eradicating extreme poverty and Goal 3 on gender equality. The goals to reduce or eradicate poverty and achieving gender equality will remain distant if women are not granted property rights. 20.5 Shifting Systems Though women's lack of formal control over land and resources has long persisting historical roots, economies and societies undergoing extensive change created deep implications for ownership rights. In subsistence production systems, access to land was determined by status within the family rather than actual ownership of rights; resulting in both men and women having "user rights" to produce food for their families. The combined processes of industrialization and globalization have disrupted longstanding livelihoods and systems of production, forcing many families to focus more on income-generating activities than on subsistence practices. However, increasing women's access to property rights has numerous significant economic benefits for the overall community as well as psychological and social benefits for the lives of women, themselves, especially in agricultural societies. Economically, when women have greater access to land-ownership in rural areas, which started being implemented by the government following the 20 th century mandates on property laws in order to ultimately promote greater gender equality, women began to independently cultivate their own land (given to them either by the state itself, allocated otherwise through the private market, or passed on by a male relative), from women collectives to learn more about agricultural practices as well as profit-generating skills and ultimately, have yielded more output from that given land than the previous owners. Further, the psychological benefit from increasing women's access to property rights is that this leads to a significant decrease in instances of marital domestic violence. All these factors would contribute positively to the economic growth of that given community in the long-term by experiencing greater overall force participation rates, increased income generation and greater investment in child health care and education, also thereby combating malnutrition and breaking out of the poverty cycle.

206 _____ NSOU N GE-PS-21 20.6 Impact of Gender Bias The typical process of agrarian transformation under which labour shifts from agriculture to non-agricultural has occurred slowly and with heavy gender bias. Because women's property rights are often assumed through the security of the often times, male, household head, some inheritance laws allocate less property to female heirs than male heirs. Ongoing adherence to male-dominated traditions of property ownership has generally meant that women cannot take advantage of the wide range of benefits associated with ownership and control of property. According to the Land Tenure Service at FAO, poverty is inversely correlated with household land ownership and direct access to land minimizes women's risk of impoverishment and improvements the physical well-being and prospects for children. The process of titling has been administered with strong gender bias, with women usually denied equal ownership rights. Furthermore, property and inheritance claims are generally processed through loosely organized administrative bodies consisting of local leaders and clerks with limited legal training. Closer inspection of the decision makers, notes a body of mostly males. 20.7 Patriarchal Property Rights Women who are potentially able to meet their subsistence needs on their own may threaten to leave the household if they are not given a large share of the surplus. However, due to patriarchal property rights, husbands control over the allocation of wives' labour time, husbands can make decisions that reduce the value of their wives' alternatives to marriage. Both the right to manage land and control the income from production, encompassing secure rights to land access, has much deeper implications than mere access. For many women, access to land and property are essential to the production of food as well as sustainable livelihoods, but are dependent on natal and marital affiliations. In many countries, women can lose rights to land when there is a change in marital status, including marriage, divorce, or even death of a spouse. Because of the worldwide prevalence of patrilineal inheritance customs, both productive resources and property such as household goods have ended up in the hands of men and not women. When only men have rights of inheritance or family succession, women have little opportunity to improve their status or living conditions within the family and community. Consequently, they are rendered dependent on male relatives for survival and have little say over how property is used to generate income or to support families. Additionally, within patrilineal communities, there is strong resistance by men towards endowing women, especially daughters, with rights to land access. 20.8 Barriers to Change in Status While there are a growing number of contemporary laws, as framed by the modern State, which give inheritance rights to daughters when they are recognized as individuals among the communities, the process of marriage and the traditionally patrilineal customs have remained largely unchanged. Thus, there remains a mismatch between marriage practices and inheritance laws, with the strength and biases of the marriage practice often overriding inheritance laws. This is also evidenced in the process of dowry practices. In many cultures, a daughter's dowry is viewed by her family as her direct portion of her inheritance, even though it may be typically absorbed by the new husband and his family. Thus, while in some communities, women do have the formal rights to inherit lands, the social representation of inheritance in the form of dowries and the strength of the practice of marriage trump given laws. Levels of education, often times products of restrictions on women's interaction with institutions which are primarily composed of men, ideologies about the conduct that a woman displays, normally taking the form of docility, can bring shame to the idea of challenging persisting gender inequalities in law, policy and land rights. Gender ideologies, or beliefs and stereotypes of the expected characteristics of a particular gender, provide a barrier for women to gain property rights and enhance status. These ideologies may take the form of assumptions of the role that a woman plays in society, her needs or capabilities, which thus affect the way that an issue is framed and implemented. 20.9 Conclusion Unless women are granted property rights, a country can't develop. Women property rights promote gender equality, which eventually leads to development. Lack of these rights causes underemployment of women and keeps them impoverished. According to UN Habitat, every one in four developing countries have laws that impede women from owning property. As argued by World Bank, countries with the unequal inheritance laws have also unequal property rights regimes. Hence, women's property rights are important, as these are fundamental to women's economic security, social and legal status, and sometimes their survival. Land and property ownership empowers women and provides income and security. Without property rights, women have limited say in household, decision-making and no recourse to the assets during crises (be it divorce or death of a husband or any other difficult situation). The lack of property rights also results in domestic violence. 20.10

Summing up N The present unit analyses the land and property rights, women's right in ancestral property, property rights for daughter and married woman etc.

N It highlighted the limitations of property rights and exposed how it is gender biased. 20.11

Glossary Land Rights—Property rights are claims to property that are legally and socially recognized and enforceable by external legitimized authority. Broadly defined, land rights can be understood as a variety of legitimate claims to land and the benefits and products produced on that land. Inheritance, transfers from the State, tenancy arrangements, and land purchase are all constructs of land rights. These rights can be in the form of actual ownership of usufruct, the rights of use. Property Right—Property rights are theoretical socially-enforced constructs in economics for determining how a resource or economic good is used and owned. Resource can be owned by (and hence be the property of) individuals, associations, collectives, or governments. Property rights can be viewed as an attribute of an economic good.

Globalization—Globalization is the word used to describe the growing interdependence of the world's economies, cultures, and populations, brought about by cross-border trade in goods and services, technology, and flows of investment, people, and information. Industrialization—Industrialization is the process by which an economy is transformed from primarily agricultural to one based on the manufacturing of goods. Individual manual labour is often replaced by mechanized mass production, and craftsmen are replaced by assembly lines.
