PREFACE In a bid to standardise higher education in the country, the University Grants Commission (UGC) has introduced Choice Based Credit System (CBCS) based on five types of courses viz. core, discipline specific, generic elective, ability and skill enhancement for graduate students of all programmes at Honours level. This brings in the semester pattern, which finds efficacy in sync with credit system, credit transfer, comprehensive continuous assessments and a graded pattern of evaluation. The objective is to offer learners ample flexibility to choose from a wide gamut of courses, as also to provide them lateral mobility between various educational institutions in the country where they can carry acquired credits. I am happy to note that the University has been accredited by NAAC with grade 'A'. UGC (Open and Distance Learning Programmes and Online Learning Programmes) Regulations, 2020 have mandated compliance with CBCS for U.G. programmes for all the HEIs in this mode. Welcoming this paradigm shift in higher education, Netaji Subhas Open University (NSOU) has resolved to adopt CBCS from the academic session 2021-22 at the Under Graduate Degree Programme level. The present syllabus, framed in the spirit of syllabi recommended by UGC, lays due stress on all aspects envisaged in the curricular framework of the apex body on higher education. It will be imparted to learners over the six semesters of the Programme. Self Learning Materials (SLMs) are the mainstay of Student Support Services (SSS) of an Open University. From a logistic point of view, NSOU has embarked upon CBCS presently with SLMs in English / Bengali. Eventually, the English version SLMs will be translated into Bengali too, for the benefit of learners. As always, all of our teaching faculties contributed in this process. In addition to this we have also requisitioned the services of best academics in each domain in preparation of the new SLMs. I am sure they will be of commendable academic support. We look forward to proactive feedback from all stakeholders who will participate in the teaching-learning based on these study materials. It has been a very challenging task well executed, and I congratulate all concerned in the preparation of these SLMs. I wish the venture a grand success. After studying this unit students will be familiar with • Defining features of politics as an activity. • How politics has been understood by different thinkers and traditions. • Meaning and features of political theory • Importance and functions of Political theory. 1.1 Introduction The concept of politics originates with the classical Greek Philosophers such as Plato and Aristotle for whom politics is concerned with the general issues affecting the whole community. Politics in the Greek world enveloped the whole life of the individual. Politics is a social activity through which human beings attempt to create a well organised and peaceful society. It exists due to the broad spectrum of ideas. and opinions within any society. It is always a dialogue. Theory is a tool for analysing politics. It is an

10 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 analytical device that helps to advance our understanding of the political world. It simultaneously performs both explanatory and normative functions.

1.2 Nature and definition of politics In everyday language politics is a loaded concept. Negative images have always been associated with it. In popular parlance politics is closely associated with the behaviour and activities of the politicians who are generally considered as selfish power seekers who hide their narrow self interests behind the veil of public interests and ideological convictions. Media exposure of the corrupt activities and practices of the politicians gives credence to the public perception. This has resulted in growing disillusionment with formal and established political processes. This phenomenon is known as anti-politics, which is rooted in a view of politics as a self-serving unprincipled activity. In this view politics is a dirty word, associated with trouble, disruption, violence, deceit, manipulation and lies. Such negative images need to be dispelled to establish that politics is a valuable activity. Another major difficulty in arriving at a definition of politics is that in the academic study of the subject political scientists have defined the concept in different ways. The concept has been defined as the exercise of power, the exercise of authority, making of collective decisions, authoritative allocation of values, as the art of government, the practice of deception and manipulation and so on. Thus, in the academic world it is essentially a contested concept. There exists deep intellectual and ideological disagreements among political scientists. Andrew Heywood has identified four different views of politics in the academic study of the subject. First view defines politics as an art of managing government and administration. This is the traditional view of politics which originated from the meaning of the term in ancient Greece. The word politics has been derived from the Greek word 'Polis', meaning the state or community as a whole. In this light, politics refers to the affairs of the state. The traditional view of politics is reflected in the tendency for academic study with its focus on the machinery of government and administration. American Political Scientist David Easton however, defines politics as the authoritative allocation of values. In his view, politics refers to the whole processes through which government responds to the societal demands by allocating values authoritatively. This is a restrictive view of politics. From this perspective politics takes place in cabinet forum, legislative chamber, government agencies, administrative NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 11 organisations and the like and only a limited number of people engage themselves in politics. Thus most people, institutions and their activities remain outside the domain of politics. Different associations connected with trade and business, sports, education and other areas of social life are, in this sense, non political. In a more restricted view, politics is equivalent of party politics. Needless to say that the negative image of politics largely originates from this attempt to link politics largely exclusively to the affairs of the state. The second view associates politics with public affairs. This view is based on the division between public and private sphere, which largely conforms to the distinction between state and society. State institutions which include government apparatus, court, army, police and so on belong to the public sphere because they are responsible for organization and management of social life. Civil society institutions like family, church, business organizations trade unions, clubs etc. are private in the sense that they are established by the individuals to satisfy their own specific interests. Accordingly, politics is restricted to the activities in the public sphere. The areas of life which individuals can manage for themselves are defined as non- political. Over a period of time particularly with the advent of modernity a subtle distinction is made between personal and the political. In this view personal affairs must be kept separate from politics. Feminist thinkers argue that this is simply an attempt to deny that politics does occur in family life and personal relationships. They insist that politics is an activity that takes place within all social groups and is not confined to the public sphere. Politics, in the third view, is the process of resolving conflict through compromise, conciliation and negotiation. Politics is the art of the possible. This view is well reflected in the description of problems like ethnic conflict as political, which requires political solution. Bernard Crick, one of the leading modern exponents of this view, defines politics as the activity through which diverse interests within a given community are reconciled. In this view politics exists due to the broad spectrum of ideas and opinions within any society. To resolve conflicting views and interests, all affected parties must arrive at a consensus through debate and discussion. Accordingly politics is the process of civilizing the barbarous conflict situation arising out of diverse views and interests. The fourth view relates politics to power structured relationships which operate at every level of human existence. From this perspective politics is universal,

12 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 occurring in every social groups, institutions and societies, large or small. It is argued that politics is at the heart of all collective social activity.

The ubiquity of politics is explained by the inevitable presence of conflict in society. Scarcity of resources and diversity of views and interests make conflict an ever present reality. Thus, politics is, in essence, power, the ability to achieve desired values even at the cost of others. In Harold Lasswell's view, the essence of politics is: Who gets What, When and How? Feminists and Marxists look at conflict differently. Feminists argue that traditional view of politics is exclusionary in nature keeping women outside the public domain. Women are traditionally confined to family. Radical feminists vehemently oppose the idea that politics stops at the front door, emphasizing rather that 'Personal is the Political'.

Politics of everyday life is a major concern of the radical feminists. For the Marxists, the heart of politics is conflict. They argue that the roots of social structure lie in the social relations emanating from the system of production. This is called class relations and the conflict inherent in class relations is called class conflict. Politics is the expression of this conflict in different forms and ways. Both feminists and Marxists share the view that politics is all about domination and subjection. Feminists draw attention to the totality of oppression and subjection to which women are subject.

Marxists argue that in a class divided society politics is characterised by the domination of the ruling class and the struggle of the subject classes to overthrow that domination. Both Marxists and feminists view politics as a means to challenge domination and subjection. It is now abundantly clear from the above discussion that politics is not all about violence, disruption deceit and lie. The negative image of politics is largely a result of the behaviour and activities of the power hungry politicians. Politics, in effect, is a valuable activity and a civilizing force. Politics begins with human purpose. Men form groups to realize their purposes. Politics occurs in and among human groups organized for action. Solitary individuals cannot engage in politics. In any human group members agree on some issues but disagree on others. Perfect unity and harmony in any group is rare. Politics, according to Aristotle, is a master science. For him, politics is an activity through which human beings attempt to realize their potential and create an ideal society. Conflict lies at the heart of politics. It may be argued that politics is at once the condition, the process and the result of the resolution of conflict. Diversity of views

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 13 and interests and scarcity of resources make conflict inevitable. Political world is predicated upon the inescapable presence of conflict in society. Politics, at the same time, is also the process through which allocation of limited resources is attempted and adjustments of diverse needs and interests temporarily achieved. Without this process society would be reduced to a permanent state of anarchy. It must be emphasized, however, that politics cannot eliminate conflict. It is only the process through which resolution of conflict is attempted. Finally, politics is also the result of the resolution of conflict. This is because desired values are always scarce and resolution of conflict in such conditions means at best only temporary adjustment. As a result resolution of conflict at one point in time creates the conditions for conflict. It is for this reason that politics is often described as a process of conflict management of that resolution. Thus, we may define politics as a social process characterised by activities involving competition and cooperation in the exercise of power, resulting in the making of decisions for a group.

1.3 Political Theory : Definition and Features Attempts to construct political theory can be traced back to ancient Greece. Plato and Aristotle, in the context of the crisis of the Greek city state, sought to identify the reasons behind the crisis and prescribe ways for constructing an ideal state. In Greek thought, theory was associated with observation. Theory was the intermediary between the event and the observer. For Aristotle, theory denoted intellectual observation and contemplation in accordance with wisdom. Theory is expression of systematic reflection and explanation of a chosen phenomena. Political theory attempts to arrive at generalizations and draws conclusions from the data relating to political phenomena. The term political theory has been defined in both a broad and a narrow sense. According to G. H. Sabine, political theory, in a broad sense, is anything about politics or relevant to politics. In its narrow sense, Sabine defines political theory "as the disciplined investigation of political problems". David Held defines political theory as a network of concepts and generalizations about political life involving ideas, assumptions and statements about the nature, purpose and key features of government, state and society and about political capabilities of human beings. Political theory is not only concerned with the empirical study of the political phenomena but also prescribing the goals which

14 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 states, governments, societies and citizens ought to pursue. Thus, political theory is neither pure thought nor philosophy, nor science. While it draws heavily from all of them, yet it is distinct from them. Rajeev Bhargava identifies six distinctive features of political theory. First feature is its concern with internal structure of concepts and their interrelations. In order to make sense of the political world, we impose meaning upon it and this we do through construction of concepts. Second, a theory has a rational structure. There is a chain of reasons which is implicit in a theoretical work. Third, theory is committed to find out truth objectively. However, the truth that theories search for are limited to specific time and place. Fourth, theory seeks to identify the underlying assumptions of our specific beliefs actions and practices. Fifth feature of a theory is some degree of generality. It seeks to cover a variety of related but disparate phenomena. Sixth, theory must not be purely speculative. A theory must be rooted in the lived experience of the people and transcend it.

1.4 Decline of Political Theory In the 1950s many political scientists claimed that political theory was on the decline. David Easton in his essay "The decline of Modern Political Theory" raised this issue. According to him, it is primarily because of the attitude of the contemporary political scientists, who are satisfied with century old ideas and has failed to develop new political synthesis. He observed that modern political scientists have been guided by historical approach ignoring contemporary social problems and made no attempt to find their solution. According to him hyperfactualism has been dominating political science for a long time. New techniques of data collection have been adopted without any theoretical orientation. Comprehensive view of politics is conspicuous by its absence. Echoing Easton's view Alfred Cobban observed that there was something definitely wrong with present day thinking about politics. Contemporary political

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 15 writings are characterised by lack of purpose. He attributed this to the influence of historical approach and scientific attitude of the modern political scientists. During the 1950s many political scientists shared the view that political theory has lost its importance. They blamed historicism and increasing influence of logical positivism for the decline of political theory. Peter Laslett, in 1956, observed that the tradition of political theory is almost extinct and political philosophy is now dead. The above view associated with positivism, is now widely believed to be mistaken. Behavioural political scientists sought to strengthen scientific basis of the study of politics by delinking it from normative issues. However, from the 1960s onwards it become increasingly clear that political theory cannot grow along with positivism which abstains from a critical examination of any social situation. Political theory addresses question relating to the structure and functioning of the society in which we live.

Our knowledge of the political world is built up through developing and refining concepts that help us make sense of the human world. Most of these concepts carry a normative import. Thus, every aspect of the human world is subject to normative assessment. 1.5 Need for Political Theory We need political theory to make political life intelligible. Theories do not originate in a vacuum. It originates from practice, reflects on the political realm and prescribe ways to transcend the current situation. According Rajeev Bhargava, we need political theory because it performs certain key functions. First is the interpretative and explanatory function. The human world does not exist independently of the concept we have constructed. To understand and explain the human world we must have clear grasp of the complicated structure of the concepts that partly constitute it. It is theory which helps us in this respect. Second is the contemplative role of political theory. Large social formations, historical changes, nature of modernity and problems associated with it cannot be fully understood by empirical enquiry. Some degree of speculation is needed. Political theory fulfills this purpose. Third is the evaluative role. All human actions are subject to evaluation in the light of ethical considerations. Political theory brings out normative import of concepts embedded in political practices and subject them to critical reasoning.

16 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 Fourth, political theory is a form of thought. It is a systematic enquiry into the self. It provides answers to the questions regarding our identity and corresponding role. David Held in his book Political Theory Today writes that political theory has three distinct tasks: (i) Philosophical : It is concerned with the conceptual and normative world. It involves an account of how things should be with some kind of acknowledgement that this is not how things are. (ii) Empirical-analytical tasks : Theory is concerned with the problem of understanding and explanation of the political world. (iii) Strategic : Theory gives an account of the feasibility of moving from where we are to where we might like to be. All these function of the political theory are crucial in the contemporary world. In the present circumstances with its multitude of problems and uncertainties we need sound political theory to give us a sense of direction and a feeling of purpose. 1.6 Summing Up Politics is the sum total of all those activities and processes through which a society makes its own history and faces the historical challenges. It is a process of conflict and cooperation among individuals and groups whose purpose is to secure values like liberty, equality, property etc. It is linked to the diversity and conflict. Thinkers belonging to different political traditions have understood politics differently. Politics has been defined as the art of government and administration, as management of public affairs, as resolution of conflict or conflict management. Traditional view restricts politics to personnel and machinery of government. However, when politics is defined as power, it is present in all social activities and in every corner of human existence. Theory is a tool of political analysis. Political theory seeks to understand, explain and analyse the political phenomena and prescribe ways and means to rectify the shortcomings. Since the ancient Greece political theory is a form of thought with a direct practical orientation. It is concerned with logical coherence, rigour in argument, empirical accuracy, moral seriousness and practical efficacy. All these attributes are crucial in modern complex societies.

Each presents its own account of social existence and a particular view of the world. As a theoretical tradition liberalism emerged in the 17th century. Renaissance, Enlightenment together with Reformation created the environment for the growth of liberal ideas. Liberalism developed initially as a protest against feudal authority and privileges and absolute monarchy, claimed to be based on the doctrine of the 'divine right of kings.

As a theory of modernity, it was an expression of the economic, social and political aspirations of the rising middle classes. Liberal protest centered around the demand for liberty of the individual in every sphere of life. Liberalism at this stage was revolutionary, fighting against irrationalism, superstition, intolerance and arbitrariness. The distinctive features which marked the liberal tradition at its inception were altered and reshaped by the historical developments since the 19th century. Liberalism which was radical at its inception became increasingly conservative in the face of challenges of other political traditions and movements such as Socialism, Marxism and Fascism. It absorbed democracy and socialism to a great extent in the form of the welfare state. With the fall of Soviet Union and disintegration of the socialist block liberalism has become dominant political tradition of the contemporary world. However, various political developments since the last decade of the 20th century, notably growing moral and cultural diversity in the Western countries and North America, rise of varieties of fundamentalisms, rise of identity politics have led many liberals to cast doubt about the applicability of liberal principles to all people and all societies.

2.2 Origin Liberalism as a theoretical tradition established itself in the 19th century. But its origin as a way of thinking about man and society may be traced back to diverse sources and social experience that gradually merged to form a strong political current. Ancient Greek tradition of freedom of enquiry and comparative religious toleration, sophists and sceptical thinkers' assertion of the universal equality of men and the doctrine of political equality, individualistic legal tradition of Rome, and the Universalist and individualistic outlook of the christianity—all these significantly contributed to the formation of the liberal tradition. In political theory the rise of liberalism is identified with the development of 20 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 individualism. Seventeenth century natural rights theories emphasized voluntarism and inviolability of individual rights. The idea of social contract expressed an individualist philosophy that allowed free choice and personal expression. In the American War of Independence and the French Revolution liberalism was clearly accompanied by a commitment to social equality, indicating that all individuals are equal in relation to one another and deserve no special privilege because of their class or heritage. Liberalism thus, became a theory with a focus on the emancipation of the individual. In theory it subordinated the state and political institutions to individual will, by identifying the former as human creation.

2.3 Definition Liberalism is a dynamic and flexible concept. It has shown tremendous capacity of survival and adaptability. However, it is difficult to provide a precise and uncontroversial definition of liberalism. It has undergone many changes in the course of its evolution and it necessitates a historical rather than static type of analysis. Liberalism refers to a cluster of social, political and economic doctrines which have changed overtime, For Laski, liberalism implies a passion for liberty. It was an attempt to give back to man his individuality. It was this postulate that was expressed in Kant's statement that morality consists in treating persons as ends and not as means. As an attitude, liberalism lays stress on man's goodness and rationality and seeks reforms in every sphere of life for a better future. Liberalism has a rich historical story with contrasting formations. It has acquired different forms in different national cultures. John Gray in his persuasive analysis argues that liberalism has no single static essence. But it has a set of distinctive conception of man and society which differentiates it from other political traditions. This has undergone alteration and modification in the process of evolution of liberalism. But the core elements of the liberal concept of man and society did not change. These elements are: Liberalism is individualist in asserting the moral primacy of individual against the claims of any social group. It is egalitarian in acknowledging same moral status of all individuals. It is universalist in claiming the moral unity of the human species. It is meliorist in asserting that all social and political institutions and arrangements are improvable. John Gray claims that in spite of all the rich historical diversity, liberalism is a single phenomenon by virtue of the four elements that constitute the NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 21 liberal conception of man and society. Despite all controversies and contrasting formations liberalism remains an integral outlook whose core elements are not hard to specify. 2.4 Different Strands of Liberalism : Classical Several crises of modernity and emergence of rival theoretical traditions made reinterpretation of liberal principles inevitable. This led to the rise of several versions of the liberal tradition: Classical, Modern, Neo-liberal and Egalitarian liberalism. Classical Liberalism Classical liberalism emerged in an atmosphere characterized by changes in all areas of social life. Renaissance, reformation and enlightenment created an atmosphere favouring autonomy of the individual, his liberty and rationality Industrial revolution and consequent emergence of a new social class, which was later called bourgeoisie, emergence of the nation state, growing influence of secular ideas led to the rise of classical liberalism. This new philosophy found expression in the writings of Thomas Hobbes, John Locke, Adam Smith, Malthus, Ricardo, James Mill, Bentham, John Stuart Mill among others. Classical liberalism emerged as a protest against the arbitrary power of the kings and privileges of the nobility based on birth. Opposing the tradition of man's fixed station in life it supported an open society where every individual could attain respectability and success based on his merit. It believed in a competitive society and free market economy. It supported free thinking and rationalism. The idea of change, growth, dynamism, competition and mobility occupied central place in classical liberal theory. The distinctive feature of classical liberalism is its commitment to an extreme form of individualism. Human beings are described as selfish and egoistical but at the same time rational. In C.B Macpherson's analysis this form of individualism is identified as possessive individualism, where individuals are owner of their own persons and capacities, owing nothing to society or to one another. Society is composed of atom like autonomous individual. Individual liberty constitute the core of classical liberalism. Classical liberals believed in negative liberty, meaning non interference or absence of restraints upon individual. It is liberty both from the state and society.

The individual is free in so far as he or she is not interfered with or coerced by others. 22

NSOU CC-PS-01 Classical liberals saw the state in purely negative terms. State is not a natural institution, but an artificial institution created by man. The state originates by mutual consent for the sole purpose of preserving and protecting rights of the individual. The relationship between the state and the individual is contractual. Individuals have every right to revolt and establish a new government in the event of violation of the terms of the contract. The state is viewed as a necessary evil. It is necessary in the sense that it establishes order and security. At the same time it is an evil in the sense that it imposes a collective will upon society and thereby limiting the freedom of the individual. Classical liberals supported the establishment of a minimal or night watchman state. In classical liberal theory rights are prior to the state. Locke advocated a theory of natural rights of life, liberty and property for the protection of which state was constituted. In the economic sphere classical liberals had deep faith in the mechanism of the free market. They believed that economy works best when left alone by government. Laissez faire capitalism would guarantee prosperity and uphold individual liberty. The market is a self-regulating mechanism.

One salient feature of classical liberalism is its explanation of poverty and social inequality in terms of human talents and their hard work. a process of natural selection operates within human society, which is characterized by the principle of the 'survival of the fittest.

Inequalities of wealth, position and power are natural and government should not interfere with them. Thus individual liberty, limited state, free contract, competition, free market economy were the hallmarks of classical liberal theory. 2.5 Modern Liberalism The success of capitalism in the 19th century witnessed rapid concentration of wealth in a few hands which created many social, economic and political contradictions. The free market economy created massive inequalities among people and subjected the vulnerable sections of the society to greater exploitation and oppression. With the enormous growth of the labour force in the industrial cities, freedom of contract NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 23 virtually meant freedom of the factory owner to hire and fire workers to maximise their profit. Free market economy virtually resulted in inhuman conditions for the workers, child labour and slum dwellers. When free market was interpreted as total absence of government regulation, it brought disastrous consequences for the bulk of the society instead of greatest happiness of the greatest number held so dearly by the utilitarians. In England, the Royal Commission, appointed to investigate the coal mining industry, in its report brought to light the brutality that existed in the mines, employment of women and children long hours of barbarous work, absence of safety devices. Classical liberalism came in for sharp criticism from different quarters. The humanists criticized it for its practical outcome such as poverty, unemployment, ignorance and disease. The socialists were pressing for urgent solution of problems affecting the working class. The liberals were forced to realize that liberal principles need to be revised in the changed social and historical context. In the changed social and historical contest old notions such as self-interest, pleasure and utility proved unconvincing. The situation called for re-examination of the nature and function of liberty, the relationship between liberty and authority and the relationship between individual and society. The revision was carried out by J.S. Mill, T. H. Green, Hobhouse, G.D.H. Cole, Barker, Laski among others. Modern liberals were profoundly influenced by German idealism, particularly by the ideas of Emmanuel Kant and Hegel. This was evident in the shift away from individualism toward exploring some kind of collectivist concept. Modern liberals acknowledged the institutional nature of society and historical evolution of institutions. Liberty occupies a prime position in modern liberalism. John Stuart Mill in his book "On Liberty" presented solid arguments in favour of individual liberty. According to him, individual is sovereign over his body and mind. Liberty is explained as the absence of restrictions upon individual's selfregarding actions. This is essentially negative concept of freedom. At the same time Mill saw liberty as a positive and constructive force. The value of liberty, for Mill, is that it enables individuals to develop, to acquire talents, skills and knowledge and to refine their sensibilities.

Central to John Stuart Mill's exploration of liberty was the move from individualism to individuality. Mill focussed on human growth and on exercising mental and moral faculties of the individual. According to him, the value of personality can be realized in the actual conditions of a free society. Liberty is a good in itself. To live one's own life, developing one's own talents and capacities, is not only a means to happiness, but a substantive part of happiness itself. For him liberty 24 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 is not only an individual but also a social good. In a free society the function of a liberal state is to act as a means of creating, increasing and equalising opportunity. T. H. Green sought to place liberalism on broad foundations. He argued that at the centre of liberal philosophy was the idea of general good, to be shared by everyone and which provided a standard for legislation. In his interpretation, choice means opportunity and opportunity means a society that is not coercive beyond need in its legal, political, economic and social structure. Liberty, for Green, is really a social as much as it is an individual conception. It refers to a quality of society and also quality of the persons who compose it. A government cannot remain liberal by standing aside and refraining from legislation. A liberal government must support the existence of a free society and remove obstacles in the way of moral development of the individual.

Although this undoubtedly modified classical liberal theory, it did not amount to the rejection of core liberal ideas. Modern liberalism while appropriating some of the socialist principles did not place society before the individual. It developed a positive view of freedom. Freedom implies the ability of the individual to gain fulfilment and achieve self-realization. The night watchman state of classical liberal theory was quite incapable of creating condition for the development of individuality. L. T. Hobhouse and J. A. Hobson developed a radical organic view of society in which the health of the whole was dependent on the health of each and every part. These ideas provided the basis for the emergence of the welfare state in the 20th century.

Influenced by the German philosopher Hegel who described the state as an ethical institution, modern liberals put emphasis on social responsibility of the state. State, for them, is the guarantor of liberty. Social welfare activities of the state will create equality of opportunity. State has responsibility to protect the disadvantaged section of society and by doing so it broadens individual rights. Modern liberals believed that coordinated governmental activities could at least significantly ameliorate evils of industrial capitalism. The principle of laissez-faire was abandoned because of its failure to bring about general prosperity. The insightful argument of J. M. Keynes that growth and prosperity could be maintained only through a system of regulated capitalism became theoretical basis of interventionist state. Keynes argued that problems of unemployment and poverty cannot be solved by the invisible hand of the market. The primary goal of the modern liberals was to develop individual capabilities so that they can take responsibility for their own situation and make their own moral choices.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 25 2.6 Neo Liberalism In the 1970s the sharp deterioration in the performance of the western economy, the collapse of the Bretton Woods agreements for managing currencies, recession, the oil price shocks, the rise in working class militancy and growing inflation led to widespread questioning of Keynesian economic management. The crisis created the context for renewed interest in the theories of classical political economy. The shift away from Keynesian priorities and revival of free market doctrines went under the name neoliberalism. It reflected a reaction to the general trend towards an expanding state in the economy and society. However, it is not a unified and coherent theory. It includes diverse set of ideas and policies having many internal tensions. It has included many kinds of liberals and conservatives. Friedrich Von Hayek, Milton Friedman, James Buchanan, Robert Nozick, Ayn Rand and Murray Rothbard are chief proponents of neoliberal ideas. Neoliberals believe that freedom is the fundamental value that must underlie all social relations. Personal liberty is the supreme moral good. Individual should be free from the interference of others. One's liberty can be restricted only if he consents to restriction. Liberty is not just another good like car. It is a necessary condition of action. Opposition to the big government constitutes one fundamental element of neoliberalism. It is deeply suspicious of the state. The state is viewed in negative terms, as a source of restriction on individual freedom. To the neoliberals economic freedom is the most fundamental. Hayek argued that control over economic sphere ultimately leads to control over every sphere. According to Hayek, the adoption of welfare policies would bring totalitarian government in the long run. The tendency of the state to encroach on individual liberty has to be resisted continually. Rothbard argued that only safe course to protect liberty is to abolish the state altogether and rely on voluntary and private agreements. However, all neoliberals do not subscribe to the view that there is no role for the state. Majority of them endorse a role for the state, but there is considerable disagreement over what functions the state should perform. Those who favour right based arguments tend to advocate a minimal state, whose functions are restricted to internal security, external defence, the rule of law, protection of property and enforcement of contract. Robert Nozick has provided a strong defence of the minimal state in these terms. According to him, the state will arise from anarchy. Individuals in the state of nature would find it in their interest to allow dominant protective

26 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 agency to emerge. The function of the state should be limited to the narrow functions of protection against force, theft, fraud, enforcement of contract and so on. Justifying the minimal state he categorically asserts that liberty must get absolute precedence over equality. He opposes policies of progressive taxation and any redistribution of property by the state because it may violate the liberty of those who have property. Neoliberals claim that only economic order that respects individual freedom is free market. Free market, to them is an example of freedom in action. The market is superior to other economic system, since it handles human ignorance by passing information in coded form through the price mechanism which indicates where profits could be made and resources efficiently used. Market delivers fairness and economic justice. It gives all people the opportunity to rise and fall on the basis of talent and hard work.

Free market is the economic system of free individual and it is necessary to create wealth. Market process being non-coercive is more efficient than planning in producing harmony among men's economic activities. It is in this sense market may be considered as the basis of a spontaneous social order. Neo-liberals support democracy, but consider it exclusively as means of choosing representatives and governments under condition of reasonable transparency and competition. At the same time they have certain reservations about democracy and want to restrict its scope as much as possible. They argue that democracy generates ideas and expectations which if acted upon can undermine the principles of a market order. Democratic concepts such as popular sovereignty and mandate indicate that will of the people should get priority over everything. But for neoliberals reality of the market is much more important than the will of the people. Politicians have a tendency to raise expectation during election, then lower them afterwards. This in turn leads to widespread disillusion and cynicism about politics. Hayek and other neoliberals propose reduction of scope of democracy as much as possible. Hayek advocates the idea of creating an institutional structure for democracy which limits the power of the mob and entrusts power to the informed and the judicious. 2.7 Egalitarian Liberalism Over the course of the last four decades there has emerged a distinctive brand of liberal political theory called egalitarian liberalism. It is primarily concerned with the issue of distributive justice, that is how the benefits and burdens of social cooperation

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 27 are to be distributed. Egalitarian liberals believe that liberty and equality are compatible political values and that the demands of these two values should be taken seriously when considering what the just division of burdens and benefits are. John Rawls in his major works, A Theory of Justice, and Political Liberalism has contributed to the elaboration of this perspective. His theory of justice may be explained as an attempt to combine liberal democracy, the market economy and the redistributive welfare state. He is critical of utilitarianism which employs net aggregate satisfactions to assess the fairness of public policy and institutions drawing upon the moral theory of institutions Drawing upon the moral theory of Immanuel Kant, Rawls argues that a just order should be based on the principle of the priority of right over the good. This version of liberalism is generally conceived as a particular form of ethical theory. It seeks to give priority to the interests of individuals as autonomous, rational and purposive agents. The egalitarian liberalism of John Rawls appears to be a device to create universal ground rules for society that permit a fair and equal opportunity for all in the context of a political order based on impartiality, relative inclusiveness and distribution of goods and services that works for the benefit of all and especially the least well off. For Rawls, a fundamental fact of our world is a pluralism of conceptions of the good. Many conflicting doctrines cannot all be true, but all may be reasonable, According to Rawls, liberalism is a reasonable response to the reasonable plurality of beliefs. This is political liberalism. It can operate as an 'overlapping consensus', shared by men loyal to comprehensive philosophies otherwise conflicting.

2.8 Critique of Liberalism Like any other theoretical tradition liberalism has had its critics. It has been denounced, rejected, revised and defended by leading writers. Thus, Laski while criticising liberalism for upholding the values of the bourgeoisie, laid emphasis on the liberal virtues of freedom and tolerance. Conservatives rejected liberalism's initial emphasis on liberation. They argued that liberalism's emphasis on the individual and his or her creative talents unsettled established order. Liberal theory is criticised for being blind to sources of power other than those found in the state. In the postwar period it is denounced for being too close to neo-colonialism.

28 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 Marxists lay emphasis on the hidden dangers of liberalism. For them, liberalism delivers the exact opposite of what it claims to seek. Liberalism presents itself as a theory of freedom but is in fact one of coercion and exploitation. It pretends to be theory of inclusion when it in fact excludes. It is claimed to be a theory of equality, when in fact it justifies established patterns of inequality. Marxists condemn liberalism for working as an ideological justification for a competitive, property owning, free market capitalism and ignoring the interests of those incapable of surviving in such an environment. Critics argue that liberal ideas have been widely used for distinctly non liberal purposes in the actual history of developed democracies. Liberal languages have been employed intentionally to justify campaign for disenfranchisement, inequality in public service provision and racial segregation. Communitarians criticize liberalism for propagating false conception of the self. Liberals suggest that self is 'unencumbered, detached and separate from social ends'. Liberalism, to recognise the significance of gender differences and propagating a conception of personhood that is dominated by male traits and characteristics. Despite these criticisms it is difficult to underestimate the historical importance and contribution of liberalism. During the last four centuries it has given many humanistic and democratic ideas. Almost all the issues of modern western philosophy have been connected with liberalism. It has provided inspiration to a multitude of political programmes and movements. It has influenced the discourses of a large range of political traditions in smaller or longer degree, It has propagated a secular vision built around some of the most persistent challenges of social and political life. In the twenty-first century liberalism is confronted with challenges from various sources. Growing ideological diversity, various forms of fundamentalism, resurgent nationalism based on ethnic purity, growing importance of multiple cultural identities have created a situation in which liberal tradition is suffering from a crisis of confidence. This is evident in the growing reluctance of liberals to present their ideas as universal.

John Gray argues that in the post modern situation liberalism will have to renounce any claim to universal authority and learn to live peacefully with rival cultures and world views.

Liberalism was the product of the breakdown of feudalism and the growth of a market society in its place. Right from its inception, it has been continuously changing, adding something and discarding others. It began as a protest movement against the hierarchical and privileged authority and absolute monarchy. The main slogan of the protest was liberty in every sphere of life. There are several strands of the liberal tradition: Classical, Modern, Neoliberal and Egalitarian. Classical liberalism believed in the autonomy of the individual will and the rationality and goodness of the individual. Classical liberals defined freedom as absence of restraints. They believed in the inalienable right of the individual. In classical liberal view, state is an artificial institution based upon social contract. It is a necessary evil. Its role is to maintain law and order, and leave the individual free. The development of industrial capitalism necessitated a thorough going revision of liberal theory. The revision was carried out by J. S. Mill, T. H. Green, L. T. Hobhouse, Hobson, Harold Laski, Barker among others. Modern liberals attempted to reconcile the interest of the individual with that of society so that the essentials of the capitalist system could be preserved while removing its ill effects. For the modern liberals state is an instrument of development of human personality through social reform and welfare measures. This involved abandoning the policy of laissez-faire and adopting the principle of the welfare state. In the last three decades of the 20th century there has been a sustained attempt to limit the role of the state in the economy and society and glorify the role of the market. It has brought into existence a new version of liberalism, called neoliberalism. It asserts the primacy of liberty. For the neoliberals market is the embodiment of freedom. They attempt to set up an unbreakable bond between freedom, the market and efficient pursuit of policies and programmes. Egalitarian liberalism associated with John Rawls

32 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 • Different versions of the Marxist tradition • Limitations and contemporary relevance of Marxism 3.1 Introduction Marxism constitutes one of the most lively and influential currents of modern thought. It has constituted the principal alternative to the liberal tradition. It is not a closed and completed system. It is an evolving tradition and has assumed a great variety of forms. It has developed by responding to intellectual challenges from critics as well as sympathisers and attempting to explain and understand changes in the social world. 3.2 What is Marxism? There is no simple answer to the question: What is Marxism? It has been defined differently; as a comprehensive world view, as a philosophical outlook, as an ideology of the proletariat, as a social movement, as a science of society and social change. Russian Marxist Plekhanov defined Marxism as a total world view. For him Marxism is an explanation of the world from the materialist perspective. According to Emile Burns, Marxism is a general theory of the world and of human society. For him, Marxism refers to the ideas which Marx together with Friedrich Engels developed during the middle and latter part of the 19th century. However, Marxism is not simply an ideology or a philosophical world view. It is an aggregate of some definite theories which explain human society, its development and transformation. Lenin defined Marxism as the system of views and teaching of Marx. Recent Marxist scholars like Althusser view Marxism as a science which seeks to uncover the truth lying behind the visible social world. It seeks to explain social life of man and its transformation scientifically. However, Marxism does not mean exclusively the ideas of Marx. It includes ideas of Marx, Engels and their followers who call themselves Marxists. Marxism is constantly being developed keeping in view the changes occurring in the real world. 3.3 Sources of Marxism Marxism emerged as a distinct theoretical tradition in the mid 19th century. It is

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 33 a combination of all those best created by men in the world of science, knowledge and philosophy. According to Lenin, it is the lawful successor to the best that has been created by humanity in the 19th century– German Philosophy, English Political Economy and Utopian Socialism. Late 18th and early 19th century was the golden age of philosophical thinking in Germany. During this period Kant and Hegel gave idealist philosophy an absolute form. Ancient philosophers considered truth as absolute. For them truth is one and the same in all ages. Rejecting this view Hegel argued that truth can never be absolute. Nothing is eternal and everything is in a state of flux.

The driving force of change is the dialectic, a process of interaction between competing forces. Infact progress is the consequence of internal conflict. In Hegel's formulation this explains the movement of the world spirit towards self realization through conflict between a thesis, and its opposing force, an anti-thesis producing a synthesis, which in turn constitutes a new thesis.

This process keeps on repeating itself and historical changes occur through this process. In this dialectical movement of human history ideas are conceived to be principal causes of historical changes. Marx, according to Engels, turned Hegel on his head by investing Hegelian dialectic with a materialist interpretation.

Dialectical changes are not due to ideas but material conditions. Ideas are the product of material conditions of society. Marx got this insight from Feuerbach's writings. Feuerbach was a staunch critic of Hegel's idealism. According to him nature exists independently of human consciousness. Man is a creation of nature. Nothing is real outside nature and religion also is not real. It is a creation of man's imagination. Alienated from himself man creates religion which ultimately controls his life. In Feuerbach's materialism there was no role for consciousness in the process of man's interaction with the material world. His materialism was mechanical. Marx modified Feuerbach's formulation and made it the basis of his philosophical theory. Marx's materialism aimed to do more than interpret the world. It aimed to be intellectually adequate to the practical task of changing the world. English political economy constitutes the second intellectual source of Marxism. Labour theory of value has been derived from the British Political economists of the 18th and 19th centuries. According to this theory the value of every commodity is determined by the quantity of socially necessary labour spent in its production. According to Marx, British political economists had analysed relations between different commodities and for them value of a commodity simply expresses this relation. But in reality value of a commodity expresses relations between different

34 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 men. Exchange means exchange of labour and labour, under capitalist system is a commodity. Marx made a threadbare analysis of economic ideas of British Political economists and constructed his theory of surplus value on that basis. French socialism constitutes the third intellectual source of Marxism. Socialist ideas emerged in France during French Revolution and immediately after it. Babeuf and his associates propagated theory of communist society. They wanted to establish revolutionary dictatorship of the working class. Saint Simon and his followers felt the need for tackling the problem of inequality in industrial capitalism. French socialists had fair understanding of the competitive character of capitalism. They raised the question of social transformation and suggested reorganization of society according to rational principles of production and distribution. However, they could not indicate a real way out. They failed to explain the essence of wage slavery and discover the laws of social development. They could not identify the social force capable of becoming the creator of a new society. However, Marx became familiar with socialist ideas in embryonic form from their writings. Saint Simon's concept of stateless society free from exploitation influenced him. Similarly, Fourier's analysis of division of labour in bourgeois society and Proudhon's economic analysis of private property earned his respect. 3.4 Basic Principles of Marxism The basic principles of Marxism are: dialectical materialism, historical materialism, class struggle, theory of surplus value, revolution, dictatorship of the proletariat and Communism. 3.4.1 Dialectical Materialism Dialectical materialism is the scientific methodology developed by Marx and Engels for the interpretation of human history. The word dialectic was used by the Greek philosophers to denote a method of discovering truth. German philosopher Hegel made scientific use of the term dialectic. For him, dialectic is the method by which human history is unfolded. Historical changes take place in a dialectical process. He developed the trilogy of thesis, anti-thesis and synthesis. Every stage of growth is characterized by contradictions. These contradictions induce further change, progress and development. Thesis is challenged by its anti-thesis. Both contain elements of truth and falsehood. The false elements constitute contradictions. The true elements of both the thesis and anti-thesis are fused together in a synthesis. The

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 35 evolved synthesis in course of time becomes a thesis and it is again challenged by its opposite, antithesis, which again results in a new synthesis. This process continues until the stage of perfection is reached. According to Hegel, in this dialectical movement of human history ideas are conceived to be principal cause of historical process. Dialectical change in history takes place under the impact of ideas. In Marx's view, Hegel's dialectic was standing on its head and he put it on its feet. For Hegel, ultimately it is the idea which matters and other things are its reflection. Marx replaced idea with matter. According to him material forces constitute the base and idea is a part of the superstructure. The material forces determine the idea and not vice-versa. The fundamental laws of dialectical materialism are: (a) the law of the transformation of quantity into quality, according to which gradual quantitative changes; give rise to revolutionary qualitative changes. (b) the law of the unity of opposites, which holds that the unity of concrete reality is a unity of opposites or contradictions; and (c) the law of negation of the negation, which claims that in the clash of opposites one opposite negates another and is in turn negated by a higher level of historical development that preserves something of both negated terms. 3.4.2 Historical Materialism Historical materialism is the application of the principles of dialectical materialism to the study of human society. It constitutes the social scientific core of Marxist theory. Historical materialism starts from the view that in order to survive human beings collectively work on nature to produce the means to live. There is a division of labour in which people not only do different jobs, but some people live from the work of others by owning the means of production. Marx gave pride of place to the production of material life in the investigation of social structure and historical development.

relations of production, is the real foundation of society. It is the basis on which rises a legal and political superstructure and to which correspond definite forms of social consciousness. The economic structure of society contains social relations of production as well as forces of production. A mode of production is a relationship between forces of production and relations of production. As the society's productive forces develop, they clash with existing relations of production. Capacity to produce expands but ownership of the means of production contracts, The result is maladjustment which is built in. Then begins an epoch of social revolution. The conflict is resolved in favour of the productive forces and new NSOU CC-PS-01 relations of production emerge whose material precondition have matured in the womb of the old society. Thus, different socio-economic organizations of production which have characterized human history arise or fall as they enable or hinder the expansion of society's productive capacity. It is to be noted that this is not technological determinism. Technology functions within a social context. Its ultimate source is human labour and inventiveness and what makes it important is the character of the production process. For Marx the super structure is derived from the base. But in each social formation more specific laws govern the precise nature of the general derivation. Marx's theory does not view the superstructure as an epiphenomenon of the economic base. It is because a superstructure is needed to organize and stabilize society that the economic base brings about those institutions that are best suited to it. In fact, one of the fundamental tenets of historical materialism is that superstructure affects or reacts back on the base. Marx designates the Asiatic, ancient, feudal and modern bourgeois modes of production as the major epochs in humanity's advance. However, these mark the general stages of socio-economic evolution-as a whole. These are not the steps which history obliges every nation without exception to climb. Marx did not attempt to indicate a series of successive stages through which all societies without exception must pass in sequence. He denied propounding any historico-philosophical theory of social development imposed by fate upon every people.

3.4.3 Class Struggle The theory of class struggle is a corollary of historical materialism. While historical materialism contains the theory of social change, theory of class struggle describes its mechanism. According to Marx, the history of all hitherto existing society has been history of class struggle. He wanted to prove that class struggle has been the permanent feature of human history. Except the primitive communist stage, all historical ages have been characterized by the antagonism between the dominant and dependent classes. It is the result of exploitation by the property owning class of the property-less class. The interests of the contending classes are irreconcilable. It is resolved through a social revolution. The inherent contradictions of contending classes of every epoch can be resolved only through the abolition of the exploiting classes.

Marx developed the theory of surplus value to explain the whole phenomenon of exploitation in the capitalist society. In simple term surplus value is what is normally called profit. The theory of surplus value is rooted in the labour theory of value. Value of a commodity is nothing but crystallized labour. Surplus value arises because some part of the worker's labour is not paid to him. The major share of profit is appropriated by the capitalists. Surplus value is the difference between market value of commodity and the wage paid to a labourer for creating this value. According to Marx, capital is the vampire that sucks the blood of the worker. With the growth of capitalism and the rise in competition, the wages of the workers continue to fall. Cut throat competition leads to deterioration of the lot of the proletariat. This intensifies class struggle and eventually leads to revolution.

3.4.5 Revolution According to Marx, social revolution takes place when the existing relation of production begin to act as a fetter on the further development of the forces of production. For him, the major political developments of the modern age are to be explained as the result of the long term social and economic developments in which new forms of economic exploitation and property ownership steadily develop. In the capitalist society quest for more profit intensifies exploitation of workers. This creates conditions for the organization of the workers and awakening of class consciousness in the ranks of the proletariat. Revolution occurs to resolve contradictions between the forces of production and the relations of production.

3.4.6 Dictatorship of the Proletariat The proletarian revolution will lead to the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat. This is a necessary prelude to communism. The transient dictatorship is necessary for finishing the tasks of revolution. It is a quasi-state which will function as the representative of the revolutionary working class. It will expropriate the bourgeoisie, centralize all means of production and increase total production as rapidly as possible. In short, the proletarian state will follow revolutionary measures leading to the complete destruction of capitalism. The bourgeoisie will try to stage a counter revolution to restore the old system and so the coercive institutions of the state are needed to restrain the bourgeoisie.

3.4.7 Communism Communism is the central political idea of Marx's theory. It is a social conception with a philosophical and historical meaning. For Marx, communism is the positive

38 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 abolition of private property, of human self-alienation and thus the real appropriation of human nature through and for man. It means that communism abolishes private property in such a way as to move humanity to a more advanced stage of historical development. It will return to men and women something from which they were previously estranged. Marx claimed that communism will resolve the conflict between man and nature. This is an extraordinarily utopian speculative claim. It means that communism will not be a stage of social development, since no further development will come after it. It will inaugurate a new era of human freedom. Communism will be a system of common ownership of the means of production. But it would not regress behind enormous historical advance for the human species represented by capitalism. It is this historical dimension that distinguishes Marx's conception of communism from previous one which were utopain. The historical possibility of communism is based on the revolutionary role that capitalism plays in developing the forces of production. 3.5 Different strands of Marxism Changing class relations, tremendous survival capacity of capitalism and application of Marxism in distinct and undeveloped societies have led to the rise of different strands Marxism. The following forms of the Marxist tradition are note worthy. 3.5.1 Orthodox Marxism Orthodox Marxism is closely linked to the experience of soviet communism and to the contribution of V. I. Lenin and Joseph Stalin. It was concerned with the issues of leadership, political organization and economic management. In fact 20th century is best understood as orthodox Marxism modified by a set of Leninist theories and doctrines. Lenin's central contribution to Marxism was his theory of the Vanguard Party. He argued that the workers under the influence of bourgeois ideas and values would not realize its revolutionary potential. By itself the proletariat could not go beyond trade union consciousness. Hence, a revolutionary party duly armed with a revolutionary theory was needed to serve as a vanguard of the working class. This would be tightly knit party of professional and dedicated revolutionaries capable of exercising ideological leadership. The party was to be based on the principle of democratic centralism, a belief in freedom of debate coupled with unity of action. In Imperialism: The Highest Stage of Capitalism, Lenin analysed colonialism as an economic phenomenon and highlighted the possibility of turning world war into class war.

According to him, a new and final epoch of capitalism had emerged in which competition is replaced by monopoly and the concentration of capital and class antagonism had reached their extremes. Whole world had been subjected to the parasitic exploitation of the most powerful capitalist states. Capitalism, in the imperialist stage had become parasitic, oppressive and decadent. It had simplified the task of bringing the whole economy under society's control and created a complete material basis for socialism. Stalinism Stalin made Marxism more dogmatic. dictated the drive for industrialization, and collectivization, justified by the need to resist capitalist encirclement and to eliminate kulak as a class.

Maoism Maoism is usually understood as an anti-bureaucratic form of Marxism that places its faith in the revolutionary zeal of the masses. As a political theorist Mao Ze Dong accepted Marxism-Leninism to the needs of a predominantly agricultural and traditional society. Mao's concept of the mass line introduced an element of democratic participation from below under party guidance, which was wholly absent in the soviet tradition. His ideas regarding the participation of the bourgeoisie in the revolution before and after 1949 integrated non-proletarian elements into the revolutionary process in China to a degree which was carried a step further by synthesis between national and social revolution in Asia. He launched a great war on bureaucracy and thus, placed the agenda for the future. He tried to combine the principle of working class leadership over the peasants with the conviction that the centre of gravity of chinese society was to be found in the country side and the peasantry must play an active part in building a new socialist China.

3.5.2 Western Marxism

Western Marxism is a term used to describe a wide variety of Marxist theoreticians

40 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 based in western and central Europe. It arises from the uniform defeat of the working class movements and emergence of fascist forces in western Europe in the inter-War period. It challenged Soviet Marxism and shifted the emphasis from political economy and state to culture, Philosophy and art. Some of the important spokes persons of this tradition are Rosa Luxemburg, George Lukacs, Karl Korsch, Antonio Gramsci, Theodor Adorno, Herbert Marcuse, Walter Benjamin, Louis Althusser and Jurgen Habermas. It has led to the emergence of a number of distinct schools of thought such as Austro-Marxism, the Frankfurt School, Structural Marxism, Analytical Marxism and Post-Marxism. The philosophical orientation of western Marxists implied principles which conflicted with Leninism. They relied more on councils and other forms of self management rather than the Vanguard Party. Western Marxists identified alienation, fetishism and ideology as important issues before the working class movement. Basic texts of the second international and Soviet Marxism, treated Marxism as a universal science of history and nature. Western Marxists opposed this trend arguing that such positivist approach undermined the critical categories of subjectivity and class consciousness. Marxism according to them, was not a general science but a theory of society. Opposing positivism and crude materialism inherent in Soviet Marxism, Western Marxists argued that Marxism was primarily a critique of Political economy. Lukacs viewed Marxism as committed to the emancipation of the working class from the rule of capital. Western Marxism has tried to face the predicament of the revolutionary socialist movements in the west by advancing alternative explanations. The works of Antonio Gramsci has been pioneering in this regard. He

Their primary purpose was to expose the particular social basis of apparently anonymous domination and identify the forces responsible for preventing people from attaining consciousness of themselves as subjects capable of positive action. French Marxist Louis Althusser developed a form of structural Marxism. According to him Marxist theory is concerned essentially with the structural analysis of social totality. The object of such analysis is to disclose the deep structure which underlines and produces the visible phenomena of social life. new social movements offer new and rival centres of power. The class based politics has been replaced by a new politics based on democratic pluralism. 3.6 Critique of Marxism Marxism has changed out of all recognition in the last few decades. Marxism has been questioned not only by critics but also by Marxists. Critics argue that it has simplified the class division of society into two classes- owning class and the workers. This is far from the reality. Society is very complex and is divided into numerous groups. There is no clear cut division of classes as envisaged by classical Marxism. Marx's prediction that with the development of capitalism middle class would disappear and merge with the proletariat did not come

42 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 true. In reality middle class has been strengthened both in size and position. The condition of the working class has not deteriorated as predicted by Marx. Marx predicted that the inherent contradictions of capitalism would ultimately lead to its destruction. This again has not been corroborated by facts. Indeed capitalism has shown tremendous capacity for adaptation. Similarly Marx's argument that proletarian revolution would occur only in advanced capitalist societies has been proved false. In fact, revolution did take place in undeveloped societies of Russia and China. One of the major reason for the theoretical critique of Marxism is that economism, determinism and structuralism did not offer a convincing explanation of economic, social and political developments in contemporary societies. Economism emphasizes that economic relations determine social and political relations and thus, focuses on structural explanation, allowing very little space for agency. Empirical analysis indicated that economic relations of production did not determine culture and ideology or the form of the state. Developed capitalist countries at similar stage of economic development have different more or less democratic or authoritarian form of state. Examination of the politics of capitalist states showed that policy decisions did not always advance the interests of the owner of capital. States clearly have autonomy. Marxists have aimed to theorise that autonomy by developing the concept of relative autonomy of the state and by dropping determinacy altogether. Some claim that Marxism is dead. The collapse of communism, the triumph of capitalism. New Right ideology and post-modernism have all been credited for the death of Marxism. There is no doubt that Marxism is in crisis. At the same time it is a living theoretical tradition. One cannot find all truth in the works of Karl Marx writing some hundred fifty years ago. It is a rich tradition and has undergone substantial change as it has struggled to reject economism, determinism and structuralism. It focuses upon the problems of capitalism and upon structured inequality which is the key feature of modern society at both the national and international level. It has great utility as a critical analytical framework and the collapse of communism and the changes that have occurred in capitalist society have revitalized rather than diminished its role. 3.7 Summing Up Karl Marx laid the theoretical foundations of scientific socialism. Lenin and Mao modelled their respective societies by adapting the principles of Marxist

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 43 theory to the conditions prevailing in their countries. In the process of doing so, they have enriched the Marxist theory and practice by adding new dimension and by offering diverse interpretations to the original Marxian formulations. Western Marxist, while differing with each other in matters of detail, share some common elements in their formulations. They underplay the Marxian doctrine of historical materialism, where the economic base determines the super structure. In stead, they emphasize the role of human consciousness will and culture. For them mere existence of the proletariat is not enough for a revolution to occur. They must develop the necessary revolutionary consciousness. They maintain that ruling classes are able to secure their Hegemony by imposing cultural norms and values on the masses. Ultimately it is Marx's writing and the extraordinary richness of his concep- tions of social and economic change which has provided inspiration for generations of Marxist intellectuals. Few would claim that Marxism has all the answers to the problems confronting contemporary societies. In many areas it has been found inadequate. But there is a legacy of critical social theory and analysis which remains a key resource for contemporary social scientists. 3.8 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. What is Marxism? After going through this unit they will be able to understand and explain the following: • Nature of anarchist theory; • Origin and development of anarchism; • Core elements of anarchism; • Different strands of anarchist tradition; and • Anarchist methods. 4.1 Introduction It is difficult to explain anarchism precisely. Some scholars have raised doubt about the possibility of providing a satisfactory definition of anarchism. This is because of the impossibility of identifying common features from among the different versions of anarchism. Even though some relatively stable principles may 46 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 be identified from different accounts of anarchism, commentators differ in their opinion as to which are the core ones. Besides, the term anarchism has often been used in a negative sense. It was initially used to imply breakdown of civilized order. In popular perception it is equated with chaos and disorder. Sometimes its opponents deliberately associate it with any number of social ills to discredit it. Anarchists, however, vehemently contest such associations. It was after the publication of Pierre Joseph Proudhon's book What is Property? that the word anarchism came to be associated with a positive set of political ideas. Anarchists propagate the idea of abolition of government and law in the belief that a more natural and spontaneous social order will emerge. Similarly the attempt to link anarchism with violence is simply misrepresentation of the ideology. Most anarchists believe that violence is counter productive and unacceptable. 4.2 Origin and Development Although anarchist principles were first systematically stated in the late eighteenth century in William Godwin's book Enquiry Concerning Political Justice, the roots of anarchist ideas had their roots in the distant past. The stoic philosophers of ancient Greece expressed doubts about the efficacy of political institutions and favoured creation of a social condition in which men will act freely in response to the natural instinct of sociability and justice. In the medieval age some religious sects advocated that professing and practicing christian ideas and values were adequate to the task of maintaining a free and fair civil life. In the 16th and 17th century anti monarchists propagated the idea of free individual. In 18th century England the Levellers and Diggers interpreted the law of nature as endowing human individuals with innate and inalienable rights which legal and political institutions protect. In France the physiocrats believed in a natural order of society. Economic individualism reflected in the works of Adam Smith and socialist theory regarding exploitation of the workers in modern society significantly influenced anarchist thinking about man and society. The word anarchism came into vogue during the French Revolution when there was practically no authority to enforce rules and regulations and the people had no faith in the existing legal system. The term anarchism was used to explain this situation. William Godwin in his Enquiry concerning Political justice gave classic statement of anarchist principles. He opposed both political authority and the institution of private property. He argued that state power corrupts and misleads people. Pierre Joseph Proudhon described property as theft and maintained that state originated expressed in the desire for freedom within a community of equals. He propounded a view of free individuals which put him at odds with

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 47 from the need to protect private property. According to him, political authority is an enemy of justice and reason. Russian anarchists Michael Bakunin and Peter Kropotkin contributed significantly to the development of anarchist theory.

Karl Marx and his followers. Kropotkin's anarchism was based upon a theory of evolution. Mutual aid, he argued, is the principal means of human development and this constitutes the empirical basis for both anarchism and communism. State for him, is a coercive institution and need to be replaced by a web of freely functioning groups. Russian novelist Tolstoy gave a new dimension to anarchist thinking by emphasizing the principles of non-violence and pacifism.

The influence of anarchism also subsided with success of Bolshevik revolution in Russia and the growing prestige of communism within the revolutionary movements. 4.3

Core elements of Anarchism Anarchist thinkers have stated the theory in their own way which have created a lot of confusion. Its supporters have drawn upon elements from different political traditions. It has been regarded as a conjoining of liberal individualism with socialist egalitarianism. There are a number of different formations of anarchism and commentators argue that there are no common features ascribed to anarchism. However, anarchist thinkers share certain broad principles which constitute the core elements of the theory. Andrew Heywood identifies four core elements of anarchism. These are: anti-statism, natural order anti-clericalism and economic freedom. Anti-Statism Anarchism regards the state as undesirable, unnecessary and harmful. Hostility to the state is shared by all anarchist thinkers. The state is without any natural or 48 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 historical justification and it is opposed to man's natural cooperative instinct. They argue that state authority is based upon political inequality and it enslaves, oppresses and limits human life. It is based upon compulsion, fear, egoism and exclusion. Anarchists argue that government and law represent negative and destructive forces. Law can control every sphere of individual life and thereby prevent the development of individuality. According to US anarchist Emma Goldman government is symbolized by the gun, the handcuff or the prison. For the anarchists, state is in effect a concentrated form of evil. Natural Order Anarchists in general support the view that human beings are essentially rational. They believe that people are naturally inclined to organize their lives in a peaceful and harmonious fashion. Anarchists of all shades believe in the natural goodness of the mankind. They maintain that social order arises naturally and spontaneously and this makes machinery of law and order unnecessary. However, anarchist thinkers acknowledge that human beings could be selfish and competitive as well as sociable and cooperative

depending on the social, political and economic circumstances within which they live. Anti-Clericalism Hostility to the organised religion constitutes third core element of anarchism. The Church obliges poor persons to reconcile their lot with a system which brings them sorrow and degradation. Anarchists argue that emancipation of the human being demands rejection of christianity. Religion and political authority often work in unison. Religion, they maintain, is one of the pillars of the state. Moreover, religion seeks to establish a code of acceptable behaviour and in the process destroys moral autonomy of the individual and their capacity to make independent judgement. Despite their hostile attitude to the organised religion anarchists profess a positive view of the religious impulse. They have utopian faith in the unlimited possibility of development of the human self and in the unity of all living things. Economic Freedom Anarchists are united in their disapproval of the prevailing capitalist system. They are highly critical of managed capitalism of the post war era. State intervantion in the name of giving capitalism a human face, actually strengthens the system of class exploitation. They vehemently oppose Soviet style state socialism and planned

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 49 economy. Individualist anarchists argue that planned economy violates property rights and individual freedom. For the collectivist anarchists state socialism is self contradictory in the sense that state itself becomes the source of exploitation replacing the capitalist class. Anarchists prefer an economy in which individuals freely manage their own affairs without state regulation. 4.4 Different versions of Anarchism There are a number of different versions of anarchism. The most important of these are individualist anarchism and collectivist anarchism. 4.4.1 Individualist Anarchism There are many different types of individualist anarchism. Philosophical anarchism of Willian Godwin captures many of the core features of classical liberalism. It prefers absolute prohibition of coercion in order to protect the negative rights of the individual, Consensual agreements among individuals is the only legitimate basis of human interaction. Willam Godwin developed an extreme form of liberal rationalism. According to him, human beings are essentially rational creatures. Education and enlightened judgement propel them to live in accordance with truth and universal moral law. Unlike liberals, individualist anarchists regard constitutionalism and democracy as simply facade to hide political oppression. Max Stirner developed an extreme form of individualist anarchism on the basis of his idea of sovereign individual. The individual should act as he or she chooses ignoring law, conventions, religious or moral principles. Liberatarians like David Thoreau, Benjamin Tucker and Joseph Warren took individualist argument to a new height. Thoreau argued that government is an impediment to establish spiritual truth and self-reliance. According to him, individual should follow only the dictates of his/her conscience. For him demands of political obligation is secondary to the dictates of individual conscience. Benjamin Tucker believed that autonomous individuals could live and work together in peace through a system of market exchange. Warren claimed that individual right to property is supreme. However, they are forced to work with others to take advantage of division of labour. He believed that this could be achieved by developing a system of labour for labour exchange. Tucker claimed that genuine anarchism is consistant with free market, free trade principles. Free working of the market forces will make government and law unnecessary.

50 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 Another variant of individualist anarchism is anarcho capitalism. Its proponents vehemently oppose state intervention in the economy. Robert Nozick, a right wing libertarian, argued for a minimal state, whose principal function is to protect individual rights. Ayn Rand, Murray Rothbard and David Friedman pushed further free market ideas. They argued that market can replace government and satisfy all human needs. The main target of anarcho, capitalist attack is state legislation that restricts self-ownership such as imposition of minimum health and safety regulations, paternalistic prohibition of drug, alcohol and tobacco, compulsory wearing of seatbelts or violating property rights by destructive welfare policies. 4.4.2 Collectivist Anarchism Collectivist anarchism, some times called social anarchism, is identified by its emphasis on human capacity to work together for common good. Because of their social and cooperative character natural and proper relationship among human beings is one of sympathy, affection and harmony. This makes government regulation unnecessary. Thus, collectivist anarchists reject state and state like bodies. For them state is a political form of hierachical institution which makes social solidarity impossible. State primarily functions to support property relations that support economic inequality maintained by a coercive apparatus. The main form of social anarchism are anarchist communism and anarcho syndicalism. Anarchist communism is historically associated with Errico Malatesta and Kropotkin. It is based on the optimistic belief about the human capacity for cooperation. Anarcho communists argue that since labour is social wealth created through human cooperation

Kropotkin sought to provide a scientific basis for social solidarity by re-examining Darwin's theory of evolution.

He had a strong belief in the importance of the cooperative and altruistic features of human personality. He argued in his book Mutual Aid that cooperation is a vital force in human evolution which turns not upon competition and survival of the fittest. Anarcho communists believed that true communism demands abolition of the state. Kropotkin argued in terms of the abolition of the state and its replacement by a decentralized network of small self-sufficient communities based upon voluntary agreements. Anarcho syndicalism is most often associated with Emile Pouget, Rocker and Lucy Parsons. In the recent era Noam Chomsky is perhaps the most famous advocate

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 51 of anarcho syndicalism. Syndicalist ideas are an attempt to revise Marxism in the light of new experience gained from growing labour movement in Europe in late 19th and early 20th century. Anarcho Syndicalists developed the vision of stateless and classless society with the trade union as its base. They saw trade union or the syndicate as the foundation for a decentralized non-hierarchical society of the future. For them fierce class struggle is the technique of social change. General strike, sabotage and other kinds of direct action are the revolutionary instruments to exert working class power. The application of anarchist principles to the different contexts of oppression produces distinct forms of anarchism such as anarcho faminism, black anarchism and environmental anarchism. Anarcho-feminists seek new ways to identify, examine and confront male domination. Black anarchists seek structures that allow them to develop their own froms where they can share their experiences and meet as people from oppressed backgrounds. Such anarchist groups give priority to agents based on ethnicity rather than class. Environmental anarchists recognise the artificiality of the border of nation states and identify human subject as a part of, rather than separate from, the biosphere. They regard environmental problem as a product of oppressive human interaction. 4.5 Assessment Critics argue that anarchist ideas are mostly unrealistic. Anarchists put emphasis on the natural inclination of individuals for cooperation and harmony completely ignoring their self seeking and competitive impulses. They display immense faith in innate human rationality. But psychological research suggests that irrational forces are important determinants of human behaviour. Second, anarchist description of the state as a coercive institution is grossly exaggerated. It completely ignores the role of the state as the engine of development and provider of important welfare services. Third, anarchist idea of future stateless society with peace, harmony and unbounded individual freedom is a distant dream. It is viewed as the weakest aspect of anarchist theory. Liberty by its nature is limited. There must be restrictions on the liberty of each to ensure liberty for all. Fourth, critics argue that there is some truth in anarchist criticism of the present state of affairs in which there is misery, suffering and unemployment, but they advocate methods which are destructive. In this they suggest a remedy worse than the disease.

52 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 However, anarchist theory has certain positive aspects as well. Anarchist thinkers have drawn attention to the dangers of growing power of the state. They have shown how modern state controls every aspect of individual life in the guise of democracy. They have rightly underscore the need for decentralization to check overgrowth of state power. Infact, in the contemporary increasingly complex and fragmented world anarchism with its emphasis on equality, participation and decentralization may be better equipped to respond to the challenges facing humanity. 4.6 Summing Up Anarchist ideal has been developed on the basis of two rival traditions: liberalism and socialism. Thus anarchism can be thought of as a point of intersection between liberalism and

They hold that private property by its very nature is an offence against justice. They are bitter critics of religion. Religion, they claim, supports servitude and inequality. The anarchists believe that the law of organic evolution is primarily a law of natural aid, not of conflict. Their ideal is a free society from which the coercive elements will disappear. The anarchist society will be based on purely voluntary cooperation. Two major anarchist tradition may be identified; one of which is individualist and the other is collectivist. cautious behaviour, or a lifestyle that is conventional, even conformist, or fear of change. It is sometimes dismissed as an anti-ideology inspired by self- interest and fear of change with no coherent alternative of its own to offer. In this sense conservatism is a negative philosophy which preaches resistance to change. It is thus a political attitude rather than an ideology. For Samuel Huntington, conservatism is a positional ideology, lacking both an intellectual tradition and substantive ideals. In Michael Oakeshott's formulation, conservatism prefers not the sole objective which conservatives of all shades entertain. The characteristic features of conservatism as evolved over time can be identified in a following manner. First, conservatism is not an ideology of the status quo. It is not merely an attempt to prevent change and to arrest historical process. On the contrary. It is an ideology fundamentally concerned with the problem of change. It does not seek to eliminate change, but to make it safe. Conservatives identify desirable change as growth and 'natural'. They advocate only that change which is respectful of the past and safe. History as organic growth makes change acceptable because its pace does not exceed the ability of people to adjust to it and it does not appear to be instituted by human planning. In fact, conservatives try to set limits to the scope of political action. They advocate limited politics against a belief in the desirability of radical political and social change. Second, conservatives believe in the extra-human origin of the social order. It is independent of the human will. The search for harmony, equilibrium and order has adopted many forms-God, history, biology and science have served as extra-human factors of the social order. In the 19th century. Conservatives saw stability as a function of natural order, or hierarchy. In the early part of the 20th century their main concern was to identify immutable psychological principles of human nature which justifies property ownership as expressions of human worth. In the era of welfare statism and thereafter the appeal has been to scientific economic laws endowed with universal validity. The belief in the extrahuman origin of society has prompted conservatives to reject the concept of individual with free will and purpose. Conservatives question NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 57 the rationality of artificial human design and planning. This amounts to marginalize the role of politics understood as a deliberate and purposive human activity. Roger Scruton has interpreted this marginalization of politics as "Political Scepticism". Third, conservatism is an ideology that attains self awareness when exposed by its ideological opponents. It reacts to them in looking glass manner. Karl Mannheim regarded conservatism as a counter movement and this fact makes it reflective. Much conservative theorising has developed in response to the spread of core liberal concepts of rationality, individuality, liberty and responsible power. Conservatives reject liberal concept of rationality because of its overcritical attitude. Rationality asserts the sovereignty of the individual. In the name of abstract logic it challenges existing authority. It holds out the hope that human will can refashion history in whatever ways human ideals may require. All these run counter to the conservative belief. They marginalize the liberal concept of rationality and individuality in the name of order, stability and continuity. Likewise they dismiss the idea of human perfectibility. They base their theories on the belief that human beings are both imperfect and unperfectible.

Citing French and Russian Revolution they argued against any attempt to reorganize society. History provides no clue to the future. History is not patterned. It is not a repository of grand law of motion. Rather, it is a repository of sensible rules of practice. All these conservative beliefs and values have been fashioned out of reactions to progressive ideological concepts. Fourth, the intellectual development of conservatism lies in the fact that the most recent antagonist dictates the form and tempo of its response. Its perceived enemies change contingently over time. Classical liberals, welfare liberals, socialists, fascists, communists whenever any ideological configuration is viewed as the most menacing source of externally induced change, conservatives came up with response which they believed to be most effective conceptual strategy. Thus, in the face of liberal appeal to individual rights and egalitarianism conservatives insisted on the virtues of paternalism and responsibility. Towards the end of the 19th century conservatives attacked liberal and socialist welfare policies by highlighting the importance of private property rights as anchor of the social order and reaffirmed the importance of traditional institutions as protectors of the nation against unprecedented social upheaval.

58 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 5.4 Different versions of Conservatism The unifying theme of all shades of conservatives is to set limits to the scope of political action by identifying the ineradicable sources of tension at the heart of the human situation. However, different conservative thinkers have theorised the ideas of limit and tension in so different ways that they have given rise to incompatible version of conservative ideology Noel o'sullivan has divided them into four schools: the reactionary, the radical, the moderate and new right schools. 5.4.1. The Reactionary School The reactionary school is known for its outright rejection of modern radical and progressive thought. It is nostalgic about a pre-revolutionary golden age. Reactionary conservatives contended that no society can survive unless its political institutions are based on unified religious and moral values. Modern secular democracy inevitably destroy spiritual control by encouraging diversity of self-expression. This undoubtedly makes way for the emergence of some colossal tyrant. This possibility cannot be averted by the liberal tactics of granting more liberty, rights and new constitution- Religious reaction is the only hope in this situation. Radical argument that man can abandon religion and pursue happiness through creative activities, has created a spiritual void in modern democracies. Extending the critique of modern democracy reactionary conservative thinkers argue that linking modern democracy with capitalism legitimates a ruthless ethic of self seeking and thereby makes it difficult to achieve a consensus on fundamental values. It is argued that self-seeking ethic has replaced the old form of oppression by an aristocracy with oppression by a new business plutocracy. Egalitarian ideal of modern democracy has made it impossible to transmit a common cultural heritage to each new generation, which in turn has created spiritual rootlessness. T.S. Eliot described modern mass democracy as a 'waste land'. The reactionary critique of modern democracy is inspired by an essentially utopian vision of a perfectly harmonious hierarchical society. When this vision proves to be unattainable, their immediate response is to attribute its failure to conspirators, to demonise some groups or other. The condemnation of democratic modernity has led to their marginalisation in politics. They have responded to this situation either by advocating extraconstitutional

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 59 methods for overthrowing established order or by joining a revolutionary political party better placed to overthrow established order or by compromising with modern democracy by adopting a charismatic concept of leadership, capable of uniting the people in the face of divisive impact of representative institutions, or by abandoning politics altogether and confining them to purely private activities. 5.4.2 Radical Conservatism Radical conservatives profess completely different view of democratic modernity. Its members insist that to remain relevant conservatism must embrace democratic modernity positively. This can most successfully be done by mobilising the masses in support of a leader who rejects both liberal and socialist strategy in favour of an ideology which combines nationalism with socialism in a synthesis intended to integrate the whole population. Radical conservative thinkers were associated with Nazism in the inter war period. In the post war era they tried to make conservative school more respectable by adopting three intellectual strategies. First was the rejection of the leader principal in its individualised form. The second was rejection of nationalist doctrine in favour of a supranational idea of European unity. Third strategy was rejection of extra constitutional political methods in favour of the gradualist programme of mass political education. 5.4.3 Moderate Conservatism Moderate conservatism is characterised by support for a liberal idea of a limited state ruled by law, with representative institutions and constitutional checks on executive power. However, they reject abstract rationalist concepts used by liberals. However, moderate conservatives interpret their concept of limit in different ways, For Edmund Burke, the source of moderation is divinely ordained structure of the universe. He believed that society was shaped by natural law and this was reflected in the balanced constitution of Britain. The reason for British success is that British people have rejected abstract political ideal in favour of a constitutional polity working after the pattern of nature. If the recast politics in accordance with abstract principles such as liberty, equality and fraternity.

According to him, wisdom resides largely in experience, tradition and history. Burkean conservatism is characterised by caution, moderation and pragmatism. The commitment of the moderate conservatives to the ideal of the limited state has proved difficult to defend because of its link to an organic vision of society. Conservatives have traditionally thought of society as an organism. An organic society is fashioned by natural necessity. Society has a natural tendency towards harmony provided it remains under the guidance of what Burke called 'natural aristocracy'. Coleridge, however, has shown greater realism by insisting that organic view of society would only be plausible if it takes account of the demand for political reform arising from the spread of the democratic sentiment and disruptive effects of the industrial revolution on social orders. He maintained that in the changed situation organic social order could only be achieved if the state adopted a far more interventionist role than Burke had envisaged. He also emphasized the need for restructuring the state in a way that allowed a shift of political power away from the aristocratic leadership towards the newly influential middle class. Similar sentiment was expressed in Carlyle's proposal for abolishing parliamentary government and promoting instead charismatic style of leadership to bridge the gap between the nation's institutions and its spiritual values. This could be done by articulating the unstated demands of the people. Disraeli advocated moderate revision of the organic view of society and it proved much more influential. Like Burke, he believed that no society is safe unless there is a public recognition of the provincial government of the world. He expressed the fear that growing industrialisation and economic inequality would divide Britain into two nations: the rich and the poor. This could only be averted by reducing hours of labour and humanising the working conditions of the labour. He supported the need for a more interventionist state and extending the suffrage beyond the middle class. Disraeli emphasised

The purpose of paternalistic conservatism is to consolidate hierarchy rather than to remove it.

In Continental Europe the so called middle way took the form of a social market economy. This is best expressed in the christian democratic ideal which combines socialist sympathies with a rejection of secular human culture and a conservative stress on authority and traditional institutions like the family and the church. 5.4.4 New Right Conservatism During the 1970s growing state power, rising inflation, increasing welfare dependency, family breakdown led to the development of a set of more radical ideas within conservatism, known as new right conservatism. This is not an intellectually homogeneous movement. O'sullivan identifies three conflicting responses to the breakdown of the social democratic consensus. The first response consists in the reformulation of the organic position. This is known as neo-conservatism.

The principal concerns of the neo-conservatives are law and order, public morality and national identity.

Roger Scruton, Irving Kristol, Russel Kirk are the leading theorists of this kind. They believe that decline of authority has led to rising crime, delinquence and anti-social behaviour in the western societies. The situation can only be dealt with by strengthening authority relationships in the family, school and larger society. They expressed concern over the fall of moral and social standard that was undermining cohesion of society. Neo Conservatives want to strengthen national identity in the face of threats from within and without.

They want to restore national sentiment which is weakened by the growth of multi culturalism and cultural diversity. For Roger Scruton a shared sense of national identity is the only possible bond for modern European states, all of which are societies of strangers. According to him, restoring national loyalty will unite religion and culture in a way that will give concrete loyalty to the Burkean contract between the living, the dead, and the unborn.

62 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 The second response of new right conservatism was based on defending the free market. F. A. Hayek was the most influential advocate of this version. He argued that there can be no middle way compromise between outright collectivism and the free market. He pointed to the inefficiency of a centrally planned economy. It is not possible to collect knowledge of the entire economic resources. In reality practical knowledge is necessarily dispersed throughout society and can only be coordinated by the market. Hayek put emphasis on custom and tradition, rather than planning as the principal force integrating the social order. The third response is the attempt to deal with the breakdown of the social democratic consensus by reviving the ideal of civil association. The essence of this ideal is to construct a form of political solidarity that depends only on the mutual recognition of civilized men and women. In a state of this kind different religious and cultural groups are at liberty to profess and practice their values without disturbing common peace. The government is only concerned with the limited task of securing peace to create the possibility of a civilisation. Michael Oakeshott is its most impressive philosophical proponent. 5.5 Evaluation Conservatism is too broad and has become too vague an ideology. Reactionary conservatives desires to pull the clock back is that it pursues a romantic vision of a social order that prevents any compromise with the realities of social order. Radical conservative's faith in a politically unaccountable national leader makes it unpopular in societies which have a strong democratic culture. Although radical conservatism claims to be a movement of national unification, in practice it offers no protection against a slide into totalitarian dictatorship. Similarly Burke's ambitions attempt to provide a theological ground for moderate conservatism entails a dogmatic claim to knowledge about God's plan for mankind. It also makes dogmatic claim that social and political hierarchy is divinely ordained. Critics argue that theoretical foundations of conservatism is not convincing. The very concept of sacred body of customs and traditions is historically unfounded. The use of organic metaphor for understanding society denies creative role of the individual in relation to his circumstances.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 63 5.6 Summng Up Conservatism is an ideology of conservation. It developed essentially as a reaction against the growing pace of political and economic changes in the west. It is fundamentally concerned with the problem of change. As a philosophy it defends the values of tradition, hierarchy and order. Conserva- tism is characterized by support for tradition, order, duty, authority and property. Conservatives have traditionally put emphasis on the limitations of human rationality. Rejecting abstract principles they highlight the importance of experience, history and pragmatism. Conservatives do not have optimistic belief in the ability of political action to transform society into a rationally grounded order. However, they have theorised the ideas of limits of political action in different ways giving rise to different versions of conservative ideology: reactionary, the radical, moderate and the new right schools. Reactionary coservatives reject any idea of reform. They contend that no society can survive unless its political institutions are based on consensus on fundamental religious and moral values. Radical conservatives reject both liberal commitment to parliamentary institution and socialist emphasis on class conflict. They favour an ideology which would integrate the whole population. Moderate conservatism is more cautious and more flexible. It is characterised by the belief in 'change in order to conserve'. New Right comservatism is radically anti statist and anti paternalist drawing heavily from classical liberal themes and values. 5.7 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. • the difference between approach and method, • the characteristics and limitations of normative approach, • the characteristics and limitations of historical approach. 6.1 Introduction Political Science deals with an infinite number of political phenomena. These phenomena appear to have varied meanings, dimensions and implications. Persons with different persuasions and perspectives look at them differently, think of them differently, understand them differently and explain or analyse them differently and hardly there lies any substantial unity of outlook while taking those phenomena for 68 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 understanding, explanation and analysis. What it indicates indeed is that there are several attitudes and approaches to understand and explain political phenomena and on the basis of inner trends and characteristics of each of these attitudes and approaches political narratives and counter-narratives have primarily grown. When the primary political narratives and counter-narratives get logically ordered and systematized, they give birth to political theories. This foregoing introduction leads us to state that there are various approaches in the domain of political science. By approach in particular, we mean, in the words of Vernon van Dyke, the criteria to employ in selecting the questions to ask and the data to consider relevant in political enquiry. Approach, in fact, denotes the scientific way of studying a subject. The term 'approach' contains a wider implication than 'method' does. In his Political Ideas and Ideologies, O. P. Gauba writes that method may be defined as a systematic study of comprehends not only method, but also the focus of our study in order to understand the given phenomenon. In political science, the political analysts use to accept and follow a criterion or a set of criteria for the purpose of understanding and explanation of political questions or political issues. In this sphere of politics and political science, the same issues or the same political questions are differently viewed and differently explained as different viewers or scholars have their own perspectives or standpoints and particular focus of attention from which they approach to do so. So there arises a variety of approaches to the study of political phenomena as there remains a variety of standards governing the inclusion and exclusion of questions and data

SA B.A.(H) Pol. Sci._Eng Medium_Sem-I_understandi ... (D147988916)

in political inquiry. Standard of values or inclinations to values are inherent in each of the varied approaches rife in the domain of political science. Contending standard of values or value preferences of the viewers and scholars lead to the birth of contending approaches which are found to be employed in understanding and analysing same political events and issues simultaneously. Again, it is important to note that an approach developed and grown in a particular period of time may incorporate many new aspects and dimensions. For example, both the liberal and Marxist approaches to the study of the subject-matter of politics and political science have thus developed much over the times by means of incorporating various new concepts and thoughts grown within their respective body of knowledge. In this unit we would discuss normative and historical approaches, which are thought to be the components of what is called the traditional approach to the study of political science.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 69 6.2 Normative Approach As indicated earlier, the traditional study of politics as grown from the days of Plato is largely guided by normative approach. It is thus an old approach, but its trends are found in the political expositions of thinkers and theorists who belong even to the recent generation. The English term 'normative' is emanated from the Latin term 'norma' which etymologically means 'principle' or standard that is preferred. From this point of view, normative approach mainly lays emphasis on principles, ideals and values. It aims at, as Vernon van Dyke states, making a normative statement that is predominantly concerned with what 'ought to be' or 'should be'. In political inquiry, normative approach appears to avoid the questions that relate to 'what is'. Thinkers and theorists in political science are traditionally found engaged to prescribe the good and the desirable state of affairs in their attempt to describe and analyse the state, politics and political organizations. They are, in this realm of normative study, very much conscious in their scholarly devotion to establish norm and value in the place of norm and value they consider counter-intuitive and harmful. In Political Science : A Philosophical Analysis, Vernon van Dyke contends that normative statements always tend to express what is considered the most preferred and desirable. They are concerned not with the practical reality but the intrinsic value aspects reflecting the ends and the purposes. The exponents belonging to this trend are more concerned with evaluation of the issues, things and events that are political and try to find out the value and the moral content of the questions under their explanation and inquiry. They seek to make normative statements which express preference for building a particular order which is intended to become good, moral and ideal for the people. So the basic thinking of normative approach becomes the basis of moral priorities and it prefers good to bad. It discusses thus priorities in values. It is important to note that the great political philosopher and political theorists from Plato, Aristotle, Thomas Aquinas, Bodin, Locke, Rousseau, Machiaveli down to Green, Mill, Hobhouse, Marx and the many of the recent times such as John Rawls, Leo Starbuck, Hannah Arendt, Isaiah Berlin, Michael Oakeshott, Dante Germino, John Plamenatz, Robert Nozick etc. belong to this intellectual milieu, and they all have attempted to criticize and repudiate some existing value as enshrined in some political thought or theory and favour and establish some particular value or set of values they think beneficial for the community from their own standpoint. These great thinkers and theorists raise a few general questions in the course of their

70 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 political inquiry and on the basis of their personal opinion grown out of their intuition, past experience, general doubt and scepticism, and after logically describing and analysing each of the questions, they come to moral conclusion. The political philosophers and theorists emphasizing norm and values in their respective enterprise have tried to solve the big moral problems concerning the rights and freedom of the individuals, power and legitimacy of the state, consent and obligation towards the authority, relevance and usefulness of revolution and change and etc. The answers and the solutions as advanced by or derived from these philosophers and theorists have their significant cumulative impacts as they have been the sources of enormous political literatures and discourses grown in the later days. Normative political science contends that it is not essentially bereft of any practical dimension or practical sense. In politics, norm and values are organically present in all issues and events in reality. All political activities found either in parliament or in public protests in the streets and grounds, or in the sphere of policy formulation and policy implementation are dictated or guided by some values to be established or reestablished. The judges in the judiciary work either to establish the constitutional values or to make new moral judgement which, in most cases, gets incorporated into the body of law. Again, in the sphere of undertaking any new research work or project in any field of knowledge, commitment to some value or purpose becomes evident, and it guides the scholar in all phases of his or her research, and the truth to which he or she reaches at the end entails some purpose for the society and the community. So politics can not avoid the relevance of values, on the contrary, it is a value or a set of values that constitutes the content and the realm of politics. It is politics that guides us to find out and accept the right and shun the wrongs. Values are part and parcel of a 'political man'. A man is 'political' because he does have values, and, on the basis of values he acquires the power and ability to differentiate good from the evil. So it is evident from the foregoing discussion that political inquiry and political analysis of political society, processes and institutions are not possible without their respective value relevance because politics essentially embodies an ethical and conscious purpose. Plato pleads for ideal state, Mill for individual freedom, Marx for classless communist society, Gandhi for Ram Rajya and the feminists of these days for gender equality. Ethical considerations and higher social and philosophical ideals and values have been the motive force for these thinkers, theorists and the philosophers to dip into their respective inquiry and investigation for the discovery of truth they consider true. The men in state power cannot deny the relevance of the ideals and values pronounced and emphasized by the thinkers and theorists, and they more often

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 71 than not recuperate their authority from serious crisis with recourse to alternative set of values and principles different from theirs and thus sustain their existence. So values and norms do not altogether reside in the realm of ideas or philosophizing of ideas. Values do have practical value.

6.2.1 Characteristics of Normative Approach

1. Normative political theory or analysis considers and justifies the political questions in the light of definite purpose, pre-determined ideal and cherished principle. It lays emphasis on good rather than evil purpose, 'ought' rather than 'ought not' question, desirable rather than undesirable state of affair, and thus considers the utility and validity of state, politics and political organizations. The purpose of normative political analysis is concerned with the normative ordering or reordering of political society and its institutions and processes so as to ensure people's prosperity both material and moral.
2. Normative political science is mainly committed to deep intellectual discussion, philosophical analysis and moral description of the great issues of politics like basis of state, equality and freedom of the individuals, political obligation, rights of the citizens, law and justice, quality of governance, etc. It is less inclined to deal with description of the factual reality of politics.
3. Normative political science is subjective by nature and for this matter, as many argue, it is more akin and related to philosophy than science. The thinkers and theorists belonging to this normative trend depend on their intuition and sequential logic and counter-logic and reach broad statement relating to any particular course of action rationally considered suitable to any particular time, space and circumstances.
4. Normative analysis of politics lays emphasis on deductive method while describing state, politics and political life of man. Deductive method is philosophical, speculative and a priori. It is, however, argued that thoughts and theorizations as come out of application of this method in political inquiry and investigation at times amount to abstraction and give vent to utopia. But what is relevant here to note that new ideas in all ages appeared as utopia. When these ideas revolutionize the world either at the macro or at the local level, utopia turns into a reality.
5. The statement established in normative political inquiry is mainly prescriptive. A normative statement is inclined to express preference for a particular type of order or a particular course of action which is considered right, moral

72 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 or ethical repudiating the wrong, immoral or unethical. In the context of moral values and ideals, normative analysis sedulously searches out the best form of political institution and political system and expresses its assertion regarding how best the political life of man can be ensured. 6. Normative political analysis is very much connected with history. Historical explanation and description of past facts and past events have historically contributed to the growth and development of normative analysis of politics. Normative thoughts gathered momentum in the context of historical changes of political situations. Different and diverse contexts of history have given birth to new values, ideals and ideas which in turn again have changed the reality through ages. Construction and replacement of values, and philo- sophical ideas are very much inter-connected with the construction and replacement of the phases of human history. From very ancient time down to our own, political philosophers and political theorists have derived historical knowledge and experience from history and thus have enriched their respective political literatures imbued with high philosophical values and vision. Marx spent a big part of his study-life to know and understand the French revolution of the eighteenth century and it led him to theorize on the rise and fall of capitalism and building of the material preconditions for the growth of classless communist society. 7. Normative political analysis also entails an inclination to legal-institutional study. More often than not it starts with state and governmental systems that work under law and constitution. The trend and tradition of juridical and institutional study grow from the days of Pericles and Aristotle. Aristotle had experience of 168 city states, which led him to formulate the scheme of classification of governments and other ideas of high political values and significance. It is relevant to note that the values, ideas and ideals that the normative political analysts and theoreticians have built from time to time are not fixed and static. Different political analyses and expositions have created new values or new set of values replacing those created earlier. Values may again grow out of reform and refinement of old or prevailing values. New value may also result from value-conflict set in motion in any particular time of turmoil and turbulence. Again, within the same category of values, additional values involving new content and dimension may be incorporated. Liberal political values, for example, grown since the days of Locke, Mill, Bosanquet and Hobhouse, reflect itself as a broad spectrum of political values

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 73 involving the recent contribution of liberal thinkers like Hannah Arendt, Isiah Berlin and John Rawls. Normative political analysis that emphasizes values, precepts and principles does not either belong to so-called crass traditionalism, nor it is anachronistic. 6.2.2 Limitations of Normative Approach Normative political science aims at political analysis and explanation of political phenomena from moral, ethical and prescriptive standpoint. The very nature of this sort of analysis and explanation is subjectively speculative and value oriented. Normative concern and philosophical overtone has guided the political narratives of centuries since the days of Plato and Aristotle. But this long established tradition of political science met a formidable challenge posed by a group of the pragmatists came in the begining of the twentieth century. Social scientists having more or less rigorous multi-disciplinary orientation and learning towards scienticism like Graham Wallace, Aurther Bentley, Charles Merriam, Harold Laswell, V. O. Key, George Catlin, Robert Michels, Gaetano Mosca, Karl Popper, all products of the trend of positivism, logical positivism and linguistic philosophy, raised their voice against the relevance, validity and even the dominance of normative political science. They raised against the basic postulates and chief concerns of political theories and analyses based on subjective imagination as opposed to objective verification. They came forward to prefer the 'is' questions in politics and repudiate and nullify the exercise in the realm of what may happen or what ought to do in solving both epistemological and virtual problems in politics. Secondly, the critics of normative political science are of opinion that normative theories and political analyses are not based on facts. Those have denied the factual reality of politics and thus have given room to allegedly becoming either dogma or utopia. The knowledge as developed from the deep cultivation in the sphere of speculation is far from having any practical utility. The theorists and the political philosophers so far have developed knowledge for knowledge sake. The truth they claim to have established through the process of seqential logic and individual intuition is apparent and hypothetical and not subject to rigorous verification. Thirdly, Roy C. Macridis contends that normative political analysis is too concerned with the production of ideology and counter-ideology and hence narrow and uni-linear, conservative and repititive and predominantly monographic. Its orientation is less comparative and hence arid and detached. Fourthly, the main focus of normative discussion and analysis is heavily limited to legal and institutional aspects of politics. Legal and institutional politics places law

74 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 and institution at the centre of attention. But politics is essentially a human activity and political life of man consisting of diverse pulls and pressures constitutes the very core of it. The political phenomena, thus the critics opine, do have a wider critical context and a broad relevant canvas involving various disciplinary dimensions and implications. Their proper understanding and a multi-disciplinary frame of reference alongwith a conscious exercise into it are, therefore, imperative to proper contextualization and satisfying presentation of political phenomena. Normative analysis thus does not bring before us the total meaning immanent in political problems and issues. Fifthly, critics trained in empirical methodological dispensation have alleged that normative political analysts persistently have tended to make either political history, or metaphysics, pure literature or social philosophy or jurisprudence instead of having a concern for building a science of politics. Knowledge as produced through deductive reasoning in normative analysis is far from being reliable, objective and scientific because observation and experiment, collection of data and application of statistical method, and inter-disciplinary perspective of the political issues or events are given no attention in normative political analysis. Normative approach does have no scientifically valid or reliable method of determining the validity of the moral propositions made regarding politics. Normative political science can best be regarded as a meta-science of ideas and values and prejudice and predilections of those detached from objective reality. Sixthly, Karl Popper discovers a distinct trend of epistemological domination in the tradition of political thought based on some pre-conceived ideas, axioms and individual values, that have grown since Plato and Aristotle. The notion and image of the 'philosopher king' as made by Plato is totalitarian, according to Popper, as this 'philosopher king' exists beyond the scope of 'falsification'. Hegel's idea of absolutist sovereign state and Marx's idea of class war for social change appeared mythical dictates for Popper as these suppress critical deliberation needed for ascertaining their validity. Lastly, the focus of normative political tradition dominating political thinking for centuries has been confined only to western political context. All the aspects and dimensions of normative politics namely, history, philosophy, law and institution do not belong to the states of the eastern part of the world, nor the socio-political, economic and cultural scenerio and perspective of the non-western underdeveloped states are taken into account by the great political thinkers done so much without transcending the limit to conservatism and ethno-centrism.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 75 6.2.3 Relevance of Normative Approach to Political Science It is the empiricists grew since the first decade of the twentieth century who have posed formidable challenge against normative tradition of political science. But the importance of normative approach to political science is over-riding becomes denial of this approach is tantamount to the very denial of the study of politics. None can oppose the fact that we study politics to gather knowledge and this knowledge is used for ushering a good life for all of us. Normative political science knowledge does possess an action orientation. Value-based politics has contributed much to constitute the assertive political attitude of man through ages, taught us to become aware of the pitfalls and drawbacks of different political processes, political systems and political ideologies. Enormous literature given by the normative political thinkers and theorists constitute the foundation of modern civilization, modern way of life and also they have been the sources of ideas and knowledge with which men have changed political reality whenever they felt needed or have maintained social and political equilibrium. Traditional political thought drawn along norms and values carries significant bearing upon solving the crisis of modern states and political life of the nations. It also acts as a key to understand where the problem lies and how it can be solved. Harold Lasswell, despite his strong advocacy for behavioural science of politics, sought to direct efforts for providing the knowledge relevant to improve the practice of democracy. The empiricists' persistent urge for and dogged devotion to scientism received a serious blow when a series of new political developments or crises like urban riot, civil rights movement, environmental pollution and serial assassination of some world leaders had violently shaken the floor of western politics in the later half of the twentieth century. In this backdrop, David Easton came forward to speak for the 'Credo of Relevance' as the basic principle of 'post-behavioural revolution' in political science, asking both the scholars and the commoners to devote themselves to generate knowledge relevant to solving the actual problem of both micro and macro political life in the second edition of his 'Political System'. It is now to conclude aptly noting that no discussion, explanation, analysis in and scholarly investigation into philosophy and science is inseparable from purpose and, for this reason, value-neutral. What we call objective reality is essentially but the objectified frame of value. Even a bubble in the realm of society and politics does have its significant social and political import which requires cultivation and application of sensible, critical and creative mind to understand and interpret, rather than bare techniques of objective research as exalted by the early positivists.

76 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 6.3 Historical Approach Historical approach is one of the important components of traditional approach to the study of political science. Political science deals with various subjects like state, law, institutions, ideologies, governmental systems which have their roots in history. History is the store-house of facts and events which are relevant to understand how did state come into existence, how various states were governed in various parts of the world, how the present content and nature of law, both civil and criminal, were built, how democracy did function in the Greek city states and how modern democracy came out of the monarchical regime in Europe, how did the states and their interests interact to grow inter-state confederation and international body, how did capitalism over-power feudalism and revolutionize production and then capture power to dominate market, both local and global, and also how and under what social, economic and political condition people did rise to overthrow exploitative regime and expand freedom for mankind. Political science has to depend upon history for getting information on any of the above subjects requiring serious analysis, explanation and illumination. And this particular requirement or set of requirements reasonably lead us to become less obsessive to recognize the relative truth implicit in Seeley when he says that political science without history has no root. G. H. Sabine is of opinion that basic theories in political science can not be discussed without reference to history. He strongly contends that if political theory has a universal and respectable character, its reason should be traced in the affirmation that it is rooted in historical traditions. Almost in the same direction, Michael Oakshott observes that what we want to inquire into politics is the huge oscillation and elasticity in the growth of political tradition that relates to the systems of human behaviour and human actions which are varied and dynamic indeed. History is the record of the past events. It carries various accounts of how a biological person is transformed into a socio-political being imbued with culture and ability to distinguish between good and evil. The evolutionary roots of human socio-political identity and of human socio-political system are embedded in history. Development of ideas and change in them are also there in interpretations, comments and explanations made by the historians. The information implicit in biographies, autobiographies, travelogues, memoirs, commentaries and letters of the historians and historical figures act as the important primary source for the scholars in political science, who are working on themes even of significant present-day implications.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 77 Political thinkers and theorists like Plato, Hobbes, Hegel, Montesquieu, Seeley, Henry Maine, Freeman, Laski, MacIver heavily depended on history while propounding their ideas on various aspects of politics. Sir Ivor Jennings, Robert Mackenzi, G. B. Mackintosh, Samuel Bear and many other theorists and commentators had produced significant works in the domain of political science deriving several information from the documents of history. For this reason, W.A. Dunning rightly observes that political theory is a historical record of the conditions and effects of political ideas. History is not only important for classical political theory, it substantially constitutes the base of fundamental research in politics. Even for both qualitative and quantitative research fashionable and common in the present day, scholars have to enter into history for relevant facts and information. Zimmern is of opinion that it is contact with the past that equips men and community for the tasks of the present, and the more bewildering the present, the greater the accumulation of material goods and material cares, the greater the need for inspiration and refreshment from the past. History does share its information with the scholars in political science, it orients them to find out the cause-effect relationships among various variables. It embodies laws of historical development and these laws are largely helpful to direct the researchers particularly in political science to formulate their respective research design and draw research deductions. One of the most important characteristic features of historical approach is that it lays emphasis on inductive methodology. An inductive method establishes general truth by observation, experiment or reasoning from particular examples. History is essentially based on facts. The historical approach is regarded as a form of the experimental approach. In a systematic manner it gathers knowledge or builds historical laws on the basis of facts. Historical knowledge and historical laws are helpful for understanding the current pattern of functioning of various state and non-state institutions and organizations, their very nature, and also the future growth and development of institutions and organizations which are right now beset with burgeoning problems coming from social economic, political, cultural and environmental fronts. R.N. Gilchrist points out that history not only explains political institutions, but it helps us to make deductions for future guidance. So history provides a value framework also for men in political science. The study of history admonishes a ruler against committing wrong in public interest. This study again, substantially directs the scholar in political science what to select as a research topic for fulfilling the social purpose of research. We must have to admit that the historians have made history of political life of man. They have made

78 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 available the valuable resources of society, polity and culture for the entire human race. We know from history about what had been our past, how we have arrived at present and what future is staying for us. It is history which brings the three together, throws light on them and speaks for and against them and whatever it speaks expands the map of human knowledge and cognition which are the key to enhance freedom and to place the human community in a higher state of development. 6.4 Criticism of Historical Approach Although history carries tremendous significance for political theory and political science, it has been subjected to several points of criticism advanced by scholars like Sidgwick, James Bryce, Ernest Barker and David Easton. The critics are of opinion that historical approach is descriptive and not it is analytical. The historians tend to describe past events without going into the inner content of them with an analytical bent of mind ; and, as a result of it, the interplay of forces behind the historical events are left mysterious having no first hand significant meaning for an intelligent mind. Secondly, historical approach is limited and narrow in both scope and outlook. In most cases, political history is confined to the discussion of important past events, royal dynasties and renowned personalities. History seldom carries the stories of the common people, the struggles and revolts of the subalterns who really constitute history. Allan R. Ball opines that many a description of the older days are often partial or far from being complete and they do not provide full picture of the nature and characteristics of the time, place and circumstances relevant to the students of political science. So comprehensive and total analysis of political phenomena upon which researchers of political science work is not possible with the help of historical approach. Thirdly, there is no denying the fact that all historical accounts are reliable and true to facts. Many a time adequate care and caution are not consciously taken on the part of some historians while evaluating evidence and facts. They may be influenced by fabricated data and manufactured information. Historical accounts thus grown are misleading and dangerous particularly for young scholars who are yet to gather prudence and erudition. James Bryce observes that historical parallels may sometimes be illuminating, but they are also misleading in most of the cases if historians happen to be less careful and cautious while gathering facts and presenting historical narratives based on them.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 79 Fourthly, historical approach is not always able to provide universal explanation of events took place in history because of the fact that the presenters of history may hold mutually different outlook made up of mutually different value system and attitude to understanding things around them. As the historians explain and interpret history from their own individual standpoint, there remains a variety of history on the same event. Marx viewed the 1857 happening in the history of India as the first war of Indian independence while it appeared before the colonial historians as a big rebellion perpetrated against the civilizing force then at work in India under British rule. Fifthly, individual bias of the historians for certain fixed notions, interests, ideas and ideologies retards the progress of scientific temper and creates hegemonic atmosphere where men can not think and act freely to evolve and strengthen a democratic social order based on justice, equality and freedom. It is a very big problem of historical approach. As David Easton contends that historical ideas are parasitic and may cast a veil of control upon empirical research. Only a few historians are found sincere in collecting data and impartial in interpreting them. Sir Ivor Jennings is known for his broadness of outlook and impartiality of treatment. His authority on British constitution and various aspects of British Government is widely recognized and regarded as authentic. Similarly, the study of the party system by Robert Mackenzie and that of the cabinet system of England by J. B. Mackintosh are taken with high academic esteem as their works reflect a liberal and impartial exercise in their respective research and investigation. In this context, however, it is important to note that in respect of composing institutional history bias-neutrality on the part of the historians is rather possible and easy to maintain, but it is too difficult to do so in the sphere where the law of socio-political change and development or how history of human kind does advance require interpretation from the historians. So the question and doubt concerning the bias of the historians persists and it adversely matters in respect of evolving an impartial and objective history. Karl Popper has described historical approach as 'historicism'. Historicism at present involves several schools each of which involves different outlook and different sets of characteristics and parameters on the basis of which historical events are explained, interpreted and judged. Popper is of opinion that historicism leads to a sort of historical determinism which does entail the traits of totalitarianism. Historical determinism involving totalitarian character if gets room in explanation and interpretation of facts and events of the past truth as inherent in historical facts and events gets away or is thrown into prison.

80 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 Despite all these scathing criticisms against historical approach to the study of political phenomena, we can not however deny the significance of it as a good number of representative political theorists had received inspiration from history while theorizing on key issues of political science. Although the students and scholars of each discipline today are aware of the autonomous identity of their respective discipline they tend to study their respective phenomena from the perspective of multi-disciplinary frame of reference for the purpose of having holistic interpretation of things under study. From this point of view, history substantially helps the scholars of political science to make a broad canvas where they draw the picture of their subject-matter broadly and elaborate ideas. But what is imperative upon them is that they have to become cautious about the personal bias and evil purpose of some of the historians. They have to avoid oversimplification inherent in the statement of Edward Augustus Freeman who observes that history is past politics, politics is present history. They are also to remember that apart from history political science has many a root and that political science has many a thing giving birth to new generation of historians who have rewritten history and discovered new historical laws and new historical truth. It is true that narratives in political science have acquired the status of theory many a time after having been substantiated and verified by historical data. But it is also a fact that many historical accounts have been reconstructed to bring out the significance of various events in the light of political theory. Academic inter-dependence and reciprocity between history and political science is on rising today and it results in recent proliferation of new and new quality researches in both fields of study. 6.5 Summing Up Normative approach to political science is concerned with the ethical and value aspect of the questions and issues under political study. It is prescriptive in nature and based on deductive reasoning. Philosophical, institutional and legal studies of political phenomena are closely associated with normative approach. Political thinkers and theorists from the days of Plato and Aristotle have made a long tradition of normative political science which has faced a challenge as empirical approach to political science grew under pressure of the positivist wave in social science in the late nineteenth and early part of the twentieth century.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 81 Despite several criticisms against normative approach to political theory and political science, the fundamental emphasis upon the fundamental objective and purpose of theorizing on the various issues of politics as stressed by this approach can not be denied. Many contemporary political theorists like Leo Struss, Isaiah Berlin, Hannah Arendt, Michael Oakeshott, John Rawls, etc., have all reestablished the importance of moral, ethical and purposive dimension of political study. Historical approach belongs to the traditional approach to political theory. Historical approach is followed by a good number of political theorists who have tried to discover laws and rules of social and political development of human civilization. As History is based on facts, historical approach emphasizes inductive generalization. On the basis of factual generalization of historical events, political theorists build theories for the present and make prediction for the future on the basis of experience and evidence derived from history. Historical approach does have some serious limitations. Historical approach is descriptive and it is not analytical. Apart from it, the bias and prejudice of some historians may be fatal for those who are not sufficiently cautious while using the resource of history. 6.6 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. attempt to offer a dispassionate and impartial account of political reality.

The empiricists seek to proceed with the assumption that experience gathered through human sense organs is the basis of knowledge. Experience is an attempt and a conscious process of thinking about real problems of political life of individuals and their political society exists at both micro and macro levels. On the basis of experience and thinking of real life situations of the political role-players and of the functioning of their organizations and institutions the empiricists claim that they gather objective and reliable political science knowledge.

84 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 Vernon van Dyke is of opinion that empiricism does not study organizations, institutions, laws, political processes, political activities and other issues of politics as they 'ought to be', on the contrary, it focuses on these aspects and issues of politics as they actually are. According to Robert Dahl, political scientist following empirical approach is concerned with 'what is' rather than with 'what ought to be'. So empirical approach is not concerned with the moral and ethical dimension of things political. It is rather concerned with building of value-free scientific political theories through inductive method that emphasizes observation and experiment of facts. For the purpose of making political theories objective and scientific, empirical approach asks the researchers to give up values and preconceived ideas and prejudices and devote them to collection of facts through sample survey, analysis of facts through statistical method and formulation of general statement after validating hypothesis. This general statement is scientific statement which is verifiable. The empiricist contends that verifiable scientific knowledge based on the analysis of facts is the real pragmatic knowledge. This knowledge is used to make decision and formulate policies of organization to run effectively and efficiently, and it guides behaviour and activities of the people in real political life situation. It is not right to state that traditional political theory is not altogether devoid of the marks of empiricism. The political thoughts of Aristotle, Hobbes, Mechiavelli and Montesquieu in particular, were to a significant extent, based on the practical experience gathered from the then political situation as prevailed at home or in their neighbouring countries. Aristotle's scheme of classification of government, Hobbesian view of human nature, Machivelli's doctrine of statecraft and sociological interpretation of government and law of Montesquieu are all based on facts and experience gathered from the prevalent political situation and political crises besetting the states and political life of people of their time. So traditional political science as a whole was not completely indifferent to the practical aspects of politics. But a common belief goes in that traditional thinking was predominantly devoted to philosophical inquiry and presentation of the value-loaded views and understanding of the theorists belonging to traditional political theory and traditional political science. 7.2 Evolution and Development of Empiricism Empiricism, as such, as a stream of thinking evolved with John Locke and David Hume in the seventeenth and eighteenth century. The underlying idea of empiricism is that the basis of scientific knowledge is observation through sense-experience. The empirical statement is concerned with the knowledge of a fact and a fact is concerned

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 85 with 'is' and not with 'ought to be' questions. The ought-to-be-questions are concerned with values, ideals and morals which are not factual and verifiable. Empiricism lays emphasis on the value-neutral, impartial and unprejudiced description of objective reality. This description is logical, pragmatic and scientific the validity of which can be verified and reestablished whenever and whenever it is required. It is positivism of Auguste Comte, a French sociologist who subsumed all the trends of empiricism into its fold in the nineteenth century. Comte asked the social science theorist to follow strictly the methods of the natural science in order to build true knowledge. He sought to create social physics instead of social and political thinking to base on speculative metaphysics which, according to him, is but pre- scientific forms of thought. He holds that empirical knowledge acquired through rigorous observation and experiment is the key to the genuine inquiry in the field of social sciences. The impact of positivism in social science loomed large since the very beginning of the twentieth century. Max Weber, however, qualified Comte's positivism and promoted 'neo-positivism' which is akin to 'logical positivism'. Weber did extol science but not at the cost of ethics and morality. He held the view that scientific method is the only key to obtain the knowledge of facts. It is empirical analysis which can uncover truth and discover knowledge implicit in issues, events and problems in social sciences, and this truth and knowledge is scientific as they are verifiable. Scientific method, however, can not be applied, as the logical positivists point out, to the analysis and understanding of values and to test their validity. Logical positivists are of opinion that factual and objective knowledge gathered through sense-experience constitutes the core of science which together cause to make logic that builds empirical theory. In lieu of institutional, legal and moral tradition of political theory and political analysis, two books viz. Human Nature in Politics by Graham Wallas of England and The Process of Government by Arthur Bentley of the United States of America, both published in 1908, had set a new tradition in the sphere of thinking and analysing of political phenomena. Wallas laid emphasis on human nature and behaviour of human beings while Arthur Bentley had his focus on the governmental process as influenced by inter-group-relations and activities of several groups. In their discussion the informal aspects of politics, so far neglected, took precedence over formal aspects like law, constitution, institution and organization. Wallase brought before us the inter-play in operation between human nature and shaping of politics not always concerned with formal politics as such. The chemistry between man's nature and

86 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 politics and the vice versa are very important to understand and Wallase had done it and gave it to ourselves so as to consider politics no longer a dull study of state and constitution. Wallase is of opinion that politics is a rational and logical activity upon which the influence and impact of human feeling, habit, intention and orientation are as important as politics is on making the new components of and changing the content of human nature. Arthur Bentley, in his work, holds the view that the inputs and impacts of politics are lied in human activities that are reflected in the processes of government. According to him, human activities can be understood and explained by theory and facts and these facts can be measured and quantified. As he contends, human political activities denotes the activities of various groups working on the basis of competing interests they have towards others. Group activities reflect the behaviour of the group members who are guided by their own will and intention be they negative or positive and short-term or far-reaching. In this way, both Graham Wallase and Arthur Bentley had laid the foundation of empiricism quiet formidably in political science in the year 1908. The empirical political analysis as initiated most prominently by Graham Wallace and Arthur Bentley gained momentum in the effort of a group of American research scholars who had worked under the most effective leadership of Charles K. Merriam who was the founder of Chicago School. Alongwith his associates and deciples, Merriam built a new model of political science which was resulted from the conscions application of the methods of science. Merriam in his 'New Aspects in Politics', laid emphasis on the systematic use of statistical method to measure and quantify the psychological components involved into the behaviours and action of the persons who perform political role or roles in actual reality. According to Merriam, politics is action-oriented and it reflects the behaviour of man which can be described systematically and hence scientifically with the help of the application of scientific methods. In the growth of empiricism in politics, Charles Merriam was an important personality because he felt it imperative to make a strong link between political science and empirical research and he brought into the domain of research in political science the ideas and items which were so far regarded as unnecessary and irrelevant. Merriam strongly believed that political scientists imbued with empirical orientation must focus on the mental and the psychological trends and components that govern and are become evident in the behaviour of the political role- players. These, according to him, constitute also the political personality of the individuals who actually run the political organizations and act in those organization to serve purpose they hold.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 87 In the twenties of the twentieth century George G. E.G. Catlin, Frank Kent and Stuart A. Rice had made tremendous effort to advance the need for orienting political analysis and research along empirical dispensation. In his 'The Science and Methods in Politics', G.E.G. Catlin highlighted on the path of development of the science of politics and purposeful research. Stuart Rice in his Quantitative Methods in Political Science had identified the distinction between science and philosophy. He expressed his indignation for the social science theorists who attempted to conceptualize and establish a science of moral purpose which is not at all the subject to scientific study and investigation. Both Pareto and Mosca who had their continental European influence upon American empiricists strongly advocated the cause of objective research in social science through their analysis of the elite and of the processes of consensus and dissent. In the development of "qualitative empiricism" in political science Harold D. Lasswell is a very big name and, according to Heinz Eulau, his influence was pervasive as he introduced new behavioural trend not in the light of crude empiricism as derived from Comte's positivism. In his "Politics: Who Gets What, When and How" he insisted on the indispensability of scientific methodology but he refused the insistence of value-neutrality. He is of opinion that science can not judge the validity of values but it can judge the impacts of values on social and political activities. As Harold Laswell was a policy scientist for a democratic society his empiricism and scheme of scientific inquiry did not negate the relevance of purpose of the scientist had in his mind before his effort was to start. He contends that scientific description is necessary because the analysis of value can not always provide a satisfactory and reliable answer to who gets what when and how. In the fifties and sixties of the twentieth century, the establishment and consolidation of behavioural revolution in the United States in particular, strengthened the empirical tradition of political analysis and research. The empirical political theorists of Chicago, Michigan, Princeton and Stanford Universities had been a dominant force in the domain of political science research under the pressure of the influence of behaviouralism.

7.3 Basic Postulates of Empirical Approach

Empirical approach to the study and research of the subject-matter of political science indicates the following basic postulates. (a) Greater emphasis on factual background of the subjects under study and research rather than on focussing only on structure, institution and ideology. (b) Discussion and explanation of political phenomena in the multi-disciplinary

88 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 context composed of sociology, psychology, economics and other related disciplines. (c) Verification and validation of the basic idea and induction that guide political analysis and discussion. (d) Reciprocal relationship and inter-dependence between theory and research. (e) Value-neutral commitment to the study and discussion of political phenomena. (f) Reliance on scientific method in the generation of reliable, objective and scientific knowledge required as an input for governing institutions and organizing political activities.

7.4 Characteristics of Empirical Approach

On the basis of the foregoing discussion we can sort out the basic characteristics of empirical approach to political study in the following way. First of all, empirical approach focuses on actual facts. Empirical political scientists search out facts relevant to the respective political issues and events under study and discussion. Facts are the basic input to building of theory which is the decisive objective of empirical project of the political scientists. The researchers take conscious and continuous effort in collection of facts and fact-analysis and for this purpose they rely on and apply the statistical methods. Secondly, the empirical political theorists insistently try to find out causal relationship in the process of analysis of relevant facts and on its basis they build causal theory. This causal theory indicates general laws and rules relating to the problems or issues upon which discussion or research is held. David Easton holds the view that causal theory is a device for improving the dependability of our knowledge. Thirdly, for systematic, objective and scientific theory building empirical political analysis stresses on inductive method. Political scientists are very much cautious conscious in the collection of relevant data and they analyse each of those minutely to find out its value and relevance in view of the basic proposition and intent of the research project. As inductive method is opposed to deductive reasoning, there is no scope of speculation and abstraction in the sphere of empirical discussion and investigation. Reason in empirical analysis is grown out of real life situation and hence, it does not require deep imagination and abstract thinking. Fourthly, empirical approach lays significant emphasis on building of empirical political theory on the basis of empirical research. Empirical research is carried through scientific methodology emphasizing observation and experiment. Empirical

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 89 political theory that relies on observation and experiment is descriptive. It describes in clear terms the facts that are observed and give rise to theory. Fifthly, the main focus of empirical approach is not the law or constitution, institution or organization, nor the ideology and big philosophical issues concerning state and man's political destiny. Rather, the observable behaviour of political actor or group of actors and his/its political activities are the main points of inquiry for the empirical analyst. Empirical political theory is the result of description and scientific analysis of individual and/or group behaviour and individual and/or group activities held in the real world of politics. Sixthly, empirical political theory is objective and focuses on the observable behaviour and activities of individual and group as the main objects of attention. For this reason in particular, values and moral or ethical consideration have no scope to penetrate into the sphere of empirical discussion and inquiry. The champions of empiricism guided particularly by positivism ask the researchers to banish values in order to get their study objective and true to the spirit of scientificism. Value-neutrality and refusal of moral and ethical standard from the domain of discussion and research on politics are regarded as a very important attribute of empirical approach. Seventhly, empirical approach requires and guides the political analysts to become oriented to multi-disciplinary study of political phenomena. Graham Wallase had long laid emphasis on the psychological dimension of politics. In his 'New Apects of Politics', Charles Merriam advised the students of politics to make full use of the recent advances in social sciences particularly in psychology, sociology and economics for the purpose of developing inter-disciplinary and scientific rigour of political science. Inter-disciplinary orientation helps the political reserchers get a broad spectrum of his subject-matter and on consideration of varions aspects and dimension he could build statement of holistic importance, which is more acceptable and useful as it is more purposive. Eightly, the objective of empirical approach is to develop scientific discussion and research on human behaviours and human activities relying on scientific methods of observation and experiment. Man, instead of institution, law or constitution, is placed at the centre of attention On the basis of rigorous scientific inquiry and investigation empirical political science seeks to develop a stock of political science knowledge which may come to improve the condition of actual political life of human being. Empirical approach to political study and research has created tremendous academic sensation among the students and scholars of political science. No doubt it has led to the proliferation of various angles for analysis of various and growing

90 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 aspects of politics both domestic and international, and, as a result of it, many theories and approaches like behaviouralism, system theory, communication theory, structural-functional theory, game theory, etc. have evolved to make political science a more vibrant, dynamic and a very relevant and useful problem-solving discipline in the present time. 7.5 Limitations and Shortcoming of Empirical Approach Tremendous impact and contribution notwithstanding, the empirical approach involves some serious problems and shortcoming about which we have to become alert and conscious while using or applying this approach to understand and explain or analyse politics. Critics like Leo Strauss, Leslie Lipson, Gunnar Myrdal, Alfred Cobban, Karl Manheim and many others have raised the following objections against empirical approach to the study of politics. First of all, methodology of natural science and/or the techniques of statistics can not always be applied to the study of human behaviour and nature of man. Human behaviour and human nature consist of many and diverse socio-psychological components and pulls and pressure which are not always direct and discernible and, hence, they are not subject to rigorous quantification and measurement. Unpredictable behaviour and changing and highly erratic nature of man cause to happen political events which are often regarded unprecedented and altogether novel in character. Application of so-called scientific methods is possible in a rather stable situation which hardly exists in politics that is always in a state of flux. The research finding held on French revolution of 1789 is not verifiable as we can engineer another French revolution neither in France nor elsewhere in the world. The critics are of opinion that fission and fusion lie in the content of political event which result from the will and intention and from behaviour of individual and group of individuals. So it would be an act of folly if we assume or try to discover homogeneity in the pattern of human behaviour and, for that matter, in the happening of political events or within the political issues besetting political life of individual or of group or of nation. From this point of view, empirical approach gives indulgence to conservatism and favours status quo. It defies and denies the ever- changing nature of human nature, human behaviour and that of politics as such. The highly publicised commitment if empirical approach to hyper-science has underestimated the great contribution of the great political philosophers and political scientists who enriched this discipline so long since Plato and Aristotle. The critics also accuse that the empiricists guided by Comte intend to build

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 91 pseudo social science as distinct from social science concerning human being having emotion and instinct, aspiration and intention and natural ability to think and power to judge. The demand for scientificism as asserted by the empiricists is but a matter of pretention, they are theorists created out of a revelling positivist passion. They are mere model builders and in a clan of pseudo-scientists propagating neo-scholasticism and jargon. They have confined political science to number and to monotonous ritual grappled with methodological war-strategy-and-tactics. In this empirical regime this discipline becomes narrow, parochial and obsessed with craze of irrelevant scientificism. The critics again attack the value-neutral commitment of empirical study of political phenomena that relate to human activities and human behaviour. They contend that value-free social science is a fundamental fallacy. Man is a political animal is a saying of Aristotle. It implies that man is a social creature having reasoning faculty. He has the power of judgement on the basis of which he can differentiate good from evil. He possesses the potential to alter or change his living conditions for a qualitatively better and just life full of virtue. Throughout ages man is on searching knowledge that could act as a key to material and moral improvement of human life. These propositions, however, are largely meaningless and irrelevant for empirical approach which advocates objective and scientific study of political life bereft of purpose and reference to more freedom, more equality, more rights and more justice for the people. Empiricism denies the fact that knowledge has a liberating role to play in human society. Man hankers after knowledge and truth for they liberate man from hunger, illiteracy, disease, unemployment and exploitation of man by man on the one hand, and obscurantism, bigotry, intolerance and fundamentalism on the other. Value-free discussion as emphasized by empiricism does not address these issues of human existence and human condition and thus it becomes parasitic. It retards imagination and creativity which the students need to have for using politics as an instrument of change. Empiricism does oppose change and believe in the reason of conservation and this reason, in fact, constitutes the hidden agenda and the ideology of empiricism. The critics also expressed the view that persistent demand for inter-disciplinary focus as required by the empiricists, has been injurious to autonomous disciplinary identity of political science. The different disciplinary perspectives and concepts, ideas, models, information and facts derived from disciplines such as economics, sociology, psychology etc., have unnecessarily made political science encumbered, got its discussion irrelevant and wearisome. The critics point out that over-dependence upon other disciplines has circumscribed the autonomy of political science and got it down from the status of 'master science' that Aristotle, the father of political science, had ascribed to.

92 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 Some critics have again argued that empiricism stands for value-relativism, hyperfactualism, non-ideological reductionism and positivization of social sciences inclusive of political science. All these attributes of empiricism led political theory to its natural decline in the late fifties and sixties of the twentieth century. It was only a small but epistemologically rich group consisting of thinkers and theorists like Michael Oakeshott, Hannah Arendt, Bextrand de Jouvenal, Leo Strauss, Eric Voegelin and a few other had reestablished the link between philosophy and science, rejected the totalitarian notion of dead uniformity and homogeneity in respect of human behaviour, restored the potentiality of politics as a creative activity that change human condition and human existence for the better. The reinstatement in values, reciprocity between philosophizing faculty and scientific methodology, role of politics in society and culture change as emphasized by these theorists had caused to revival of political theory in the later days. 7.6 Summing Up In this unit empirical approach to the study of political science is discussed and explained. Empirical approach is opposed to normative approach. It lays emphasis on factual knowledge based on sense-experience. Observation and experiment and application of statistical methods along positivist social science dispensation are stressed for the study of human behaviour and human activities which are considered as the central focus of attention in the place of institution and constitution. Empirical political approach is primarily oriented to build objective and scientific theory on the basis of objective and scientific research and, hence, it asks the researchers to shun values and to acquire a value-neutral attitude in the whole process of doing research and building value-free objective political theory. Empirical approach also endorses inter-disciplinary perspective of political discussion and explanation. Empirical approach, although useful in research and study of some areas of politics, has been criticized severely by some critics for its excessive craze for scientificism and banishment of values from the field of research and study of human behaviour and human action in particular. 7.7 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. Feminism is, in fact a praxis combining both a theory built for the purpose of attaining equal rights for the women on the one hand and practice as exemplified in the movements of the feminists all over the world, that represent diverse experiences and peculiar context. Feminism is intrinsically associated with feminist movements and feminist movements are the result of the growth of feminism. Right consciousness or identity consciousness of the women is apparently prior to women's movement, but this consciousness is a

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 95 necessary outcome of the subjugated and suppressed socio-political condition the women were used to experience in course of their living. The objective of feminism is to build a society free from gender discrimination. The exercise into feminist epistemology and feminist movements as such are basically oriented to assert and establish the personal identity of women. Feminism is no theory bereft of practical implications. It activates the consciousness of the women about their subordinate position and makes them aware of the fact that they are deprived of equality of opportunity in society because of their being women. The feminists champion the cause of change of patriarchal values and condition pertaining to society, economy, politics and culture that promote gender discrimination and sexual exploitation. 8.2 Growth of Feminism Feminism as a specific socio-political body of knowledge grew since the sixties of the twentieth century in Europe and in the United States of America. But as early as in 1700, Mary Astell wrote "Some Reflection upon Marriage". Astell, the first British feminist, was of opinion that women are no inferior to men and they have as much reason and rationality as men have. As both men and women are human being, both they are rational. Because of particular and peculiar upbringing, socialisation and training and also of customs and social practices as rife in male-dominated society, women are given a subservient or subordinate position and they are subjugated. She raised a very legitimate and pertinent question for the whole human race that if all men are born free, why women are born slave! Astell asked for right kind of upbringing, training and education for women so as to get them free and self-dependent. Before the publication of 'A Vindication of the Rights of Women,' in 1792, the major work of Mary Wollstonecraft, Abigail Adams wrote in March, 1776 a historic letter to her husband John Adams who became the US President in 1797. Abigail in her letter strongly demanded education and property rights for the women. She mentioned in her letter that if the women are not paid particular care and attention, if they are not considered as the co-partner in the making of decision and if their voice and representation are denied in marking laws, they will rise in rebellion. Abigail was averse to putting unlimited power in the hands of the husbands. Wollstonecraft, in her work, raised first the main concerns of feminist critique against 'malestream' political theory. In opposition to the discriminatory projection on education advanced by Rousseau, she established the social role, rationality and claim for equal rights of the women. Wollstonecraft was the liberal feminist who

96 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 stressed the right to education, right to property and the right to participate in the process of politics. Some fifty years before the emergence of the female suffrage movement in Britain and in the United States of America, Wollstonecraft strongly advocated for the right to vote without which, she asserts, democracy remain incomplete. She criticizes the confinement of the women to the 'private sphere' and thus asked them to have connection with the 'public sphere'. She is of opinion that when a woman goes beyond the private sphere and participates in the activities in the public sphere and receives education she is placed in the status due to her as a person. John Stuart Mill advocated the cause of the women's rights, and accordingly he is considered as one the champions of liberal feminism. He in his 'The Subjection of Women' (1869), considered lack of education, legal disparity, and political oppression as being the main causes for the slavery of the women in society. In this direction of socio-political thinking on the condition of women, Frances Wright, Sarah Grimke, Elizabeth Cady Staston, etc., expressed the view that in the interest of establishing women's freedom, of increasing their intellectual skill and of gaining equal rights for them, a significant social change is an imperative, which could ensure educational, property and voting rights for the women against the domination by religious and social customs, institutions and tradition of the male-dominated society. Liberal feminism, however, can not pose a formidable challenge against the ever-more formidable patriarchy or the patriarchal institutions. Without going beyond the limit of existing society and politics the liberal feminists did not demanded the equal rights for the women. But the strong beliefs for the women's rights, the classical feminists raised had their deep impacts upon the later feminists such as Betty Friedan, Radcliffe Richards, Susan Moller Okin who opined for building a state of affair under the active role and supervision of the state. This new condition, as these thinkers contend, will ensure well-being of the women by means of eradicating gender disparity of myriad forms.

8.3 Key Concepts in Feminism It is now important to discuss some general but significant concepts associated with all shades of feminism before we deal with other schools or forms of feminism. One such general concept is the concept of public-private divide. There is a common belief prevalent long in society is that men function in the public sphere while the general works and activities of the women happen in private sphere that is within the confine of their respective family. To go beyond the private sphere and work with others in the public sphere on the part of the women is a social and cultural taboo upon them and even punishable in some places and within some communities. It implies that in the realm of politics and administration that lies in the public sphere,

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 97 women are prohibited. They are permitted to work for her husband and offsprings and others in the family and to perform domestic duties within the private sphere. Private sphere is devoid of effective power with which the women have or should have no connection because any such connection is injurious to their being women and this particular beingness of the women is created by nature which has settled the public sphere only for the men. Feminism does oppose these ideas and notions which are thought to be arbitrary, irrational and dangerous. The feminists argue that as marriage requires registration, birth control and entitlement of heirship are all determined by public policy and governmental laws and rules, the so called private sphere is not left out of control of the public sphere. So the practice of public-private divide has no rational basis and it is but an ill-conceived intrigue of the male designed to dominate over the women, resist them against their desire to get education, to have share of political power and become free from domestic violence and household drudgery. The feminists strongly hold the view that power and authority are very much basic to politics and for this reason, the so-called most personal sphere of the women is basically political where women are subservient to the male who exerts varied power over the women and seeks to acquire their unquestioned allegiance. Kate Millelt, known as a radical feminist, observes in this respect that politics is obviously there where power-relation does exist. So 'personal is political'. Politics exists in the personal sphere where on the basis of power and authority the male rules the women for denying everything that necessitates the share of power and doing everying to the satisfaction of the male. It is important to note here that 'Personal is Political' was the trenchant slogan of the feminist movement in the sixties and seventies of the twentieth century. Public private divide is, indeed, a social and cultural construct and it is devoid of any rational basis. Patriarchy is another important concept against which the feminists are very critical. Patriarchy literally means 'rule by the father'. In feminist analysis, it directly denotes the combination of power, authority and the absolute domination or hegemony of the male head of the household. Obtaining its legitimacy from the long- drawn customs and practices having its deep roots into the mind and body of man and society the husband-father subordinate his wife and children within the family. In society the male members receive and acquire the patriarchal mindset and power operating within the families, and, on the basis of it, they assume the hegemonic authority for total oppression and exploitation to which women are subjected. In patriarchal socio-political regime, women are subordinate and subservient to the male

98 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 both within and outside the family in the spheres of politics, economy and culture. Patriarchy is thus the key cause of female domination and exploitation. The female uses to experience every now and then the diverse implications of patriarchy both within family and in society. Patriarchy turns into an all-pervasive culture into which the female members of society in particular are inducted. The tentacles of patriarchy have a huge spread in educational institutions, religious organizations, sport bodies and elsewhere. They permeate bureaucracy, police, military, judiciary all belonging to state system. As Sylvia Walby in her 'Theorizing Patriarchy' (1990) observes, patriarchy is a system of socio-political structures, socio-political values and socio-political practices, and in this system the male controls, oppresses and exploits the female. It is again an ideology which expresses the view that men are more powerful, productive and skilled than the women. It considers the latter as the property possessed by the former, and it rationalizes the predominating superiority of men over women. Because of the superior status of men as determined by patriarchy the premiere posts in politics and administration are concentrated in the hands of the men. It is again due to all existent and all-pervading patriarchy that the male child is discriminated against female child, female foetus is killed and legislation for reservation of seats in the deliberative body at the upper level fails recurringly to become a fact of political life. As Walby contends, forms of patriarchy are varied and their manifestations are different, deep and pervasive. It frightens the female both at home and in the sphere where they get education, work for livelihood, exhibit their talent, skill and ability as singer, dancer, writer or poet, or perform political role. Sex and gender distinction is again another concept associated with feminist theorization. Patriarchy views that the role of the women in society is biologically determined. Biologically male and female are different from their very birth and hence their respective social roles are not similar but different. Patriarchy considers the females not as powerful physically as males are. Since this difference is unchanging, the females are confined to the structure of family which is their personal sphere where they fulfill the goal of perfect life performing domestic duties, bearing children and rearing them. The feminists attack this biological determinism as the most important source of male domination in society. Biological determinism creates an egoistic personality and an expression of masculine tyranny for the male with which they determine the do's and don'ts for the female. Simone de Beauvoir holds the view that one is not born but rather becomes a woman. A society ruled by patriarchy, artificially constructs the ideas, conditions, mores and customs relating to masculinity and femininity and these taken together give birth to gender ideology. This

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 99 gender ideology builds the socio-political image and identity specific to men and women and decides their respective space and respective roles. At the time when one is born, one is recognised simply as a baby, but it is society and the system based on patriarchy, the notion and characteristic or attribute of masculinity or femininity is imposed upon the baby. In the course of upbringing and living in society the baby becomes male having masculine gender or female having feminine gender. So gender is a social construct. It indicates whether one will rule and suppress or will be ruled and suppressed. The concept of sexuality is also associated with the feminist critique. According to Sylvia Walby, sexual domination over the women in patriarchal society is definitely a sort of oppression. In this society, the male establishes their hegemony over the female through sexuality which also works as a semi-institution having its social recognition behind it. In several phases of feminist movement the notion of sexuality is differently defined and viewed. In the sixties of the twentieth century, sexuality was considered both as a source of pleasure reasonable and legitimate, and again as a danger against which awareness campaign was thought to be organized. In the seventies a group of feminists endorsed and ratified homosexuality or lesbianism in order to deliberately ignore the sex of the male because, as they hold, it dominates, suppresses and exploits the women. Homosexuality is not simply a means of sexual pleasure and gratification, according to this group of feminists; on the contrary, it is a protest against the men's effort to establish sexual supremacy upon the female. Pornography or pornography having exposure of female body is no nuisance, rather it signifies the assertion of women's freedom and women's rights, Wendy McElroy implies in her various works. The idea of equality and difference is also a constitutive of the feminist perspective. Particularly the liberal feminists have required equality for the women to be established in society. In favour of women they demanded the absence of discrimination in the field of education, political representation, employment in public sphere, payment of wage, owning and inheritance of property and dispensation of legal justice. Equal rights for the women are essential for getting a woman a 'person'. But a group of a feminist in the mid seventies of the twentieth century has given stress on difference instead of equality for the women. They contend that the women possess distinctive virtue because it is they who menstruate, bear and rear children, perform domestic works and serve the elders in their respective families. This virtue helps the women to have a distinct identity and a distinct space in society. These feminists are also of opinion that the women are not only a community distinct from the community of men, because of class and ethnic distinctiveness, all the members

100 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 belonging to women community as such are not equal. The feminist movements of the seventies of the previous century have raised with greater importance the individual characteristics and the separate and distinct identity specific to the women. This assertion of self-identity of the women posed a formidable challenge against male domination and it helped form association of the women themselves for holding debate and discussion on women's issues. 8.4 Waves of Feminism In all societies, East and West, the women are prey to dual domination. One is established by the prevailing society, culture, economy and politics and the other by the male members of the family and society. This dual domination is the source of the subservient position, the condition of being slave and loss of identity as a person the women suffer. In the last hundred and fifty years or more, many a feminist movement have been erupted in various parts of the world. In recorded history, the first feminist movement received its inspiration from Seneca Falls Convention held in July, 1848, which asserted that all men and women are created equal. The movement was essentially a suffrage movement which also covered the issues like social and institutional barriers that limited women's rights, a lack of educational and economic opportunities and absence of a voice in political debates. All these issues were discussed and debated in the Seneca Falls Convention. In this historical phase the women's citizenship issue was raised and in this particular phase, National Women Suffrage Association, Society for Promoting the Employment of Women came at the fore. This equal rights feminism of the forties and fifties and the initial assertions and attributes of early feminism belong to what is called the 'first wave feminism', which had been successful to move the people towards more radical and sometimes revolutionary expressions of feminism and feminist movement that constitute the broader context of the 'second wave feminism' started since sixties of the preceding century. The second phase feminism or what is called the 'second-wave feminism' is distinct from the first phase or first wave feminism and is much more powerful than it. In fact, the contemporary students' movement, civil rights movement and national liberation movement held in several parts of the world were the main inspiration of the more articulate feminist movements took place in this phase. The feminist theorists and activists held patriarchy directly responsible for discrimination against and disregard of women. Some feminist activists point to sexual exploitation and sexual oppression as existent even in heterosexuality and, thus, they mark the men as natural enemy to women and support homosexuality as a protest against patriarchy.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 101 In this phase it gets clear that through various institutions and social practices as prevalent in society such as marriage, sexual habit, domestic mores and customs, the male establishes their dominance over the female. In this context, the feminists felt it an imperative to build organizations for themselves to challenge this dominance on the one hand, and to grow awareness among the women in particular, about emancipation and freedom of the women on the other. In this phase, a few women's organizations were grown in the United States. Betty Friedan built National Organization of Women in this phase. In 1970, Carol Hanisch wrote a book under the title "The Personal is Political" and this title became the political argument and a rallying slogan of second-wave feminism. The third phase feminism known also as the third-wave feminism was developed in the nineties of the twentieth century. It represents a combination of many and diverse theoretical trends derived from psychoanalysis, post-structuralism, post-modernism and postcolonialism. Hence third-wave feminism turns from the theoretical conceptualization powered by practical experiences into a developing discourse consisting of basic content of the problem alongwith its varied ramifications. Third-wave feminism is thus broadly regarded as Post-feminism developed by Camille Paglia, Patrick Califia, Natasha Walter, etc. Post-feminism is global in its nature and outlook; and it is not confined to white-centric and middle-class-centric feminism only. Post-feminism rejects 'victim feminism' and glorifies 'power feminism'. It boldly approves sexual exposure of the young lady for the purpose of using it as a weapon to fight against domination of the male over the female. The feminists of this phase find no vice in the fashion-show or beauty-contest programmes of the women, rather they are in favour of promotion of all these events and programmes because, as they think, these programmes signify freedom of women and an alternative construction against the construction that induces the male to suppress and exploit the female. Feminists like Germaine Greer of Australia and Susan Faludi of the United States are, however, critical on some points of post-feminist arguments. Greer disapproves the celebration of women's sex in print and electronic media as it makes, she observes, the women into an exchangeable commodity in the market. But the importance of post-feminist projection is not denied. Because it is widely considered as a continuation of the feminist thoughts and movements of the preceding days. Post-feminism is multi-dimensional and it addresses the feminist issues of the Afro-Asian and Latin American women who live under much more difficult condition and suffer multiple subjugation and exploitation because of backwardness engulfing their state, society, politics and culture.

102 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 8.5 Typology of Feminism In the earlier part of this discussion we have dealt with liberal view of feminism. Avoiding repetitive discussion on liberal feminism we now concentrate on Marxist and socialist types of feminism for discussion and exploration. What is noteworthy in this context, however is that although both Marxist and socialist feminisms are taken interchangeably and although both these two variants receive their inspiration from the Marxist philosophy, both are not similar. "The Origin of the Family, Private Property and State" written by Fredrich Engels is the main source of Marxist feminism. According to Engels, the subordinate position of the women is not natural, but it grew in a particular stage of development of production system. As Engels observes, the dominance and authority of the male is developed to ensure the inheritance of private ownership of the means of production which was developed in the process of production at a particular stage. The women are placed within the confine of respective family where they perform domestic functions and bear and rear children. Introducing monogamy for them, control is imposed upon their sexuality and thus they come under the tutelage of patriarchy. The women engaged in domestic labour are estranged from the process of social production as they have no direct contribution to it and, thus, they become completely dependent upon the male members of their families. Engels is of opinion that the women, under capitalism, are the regular provider of healthy and sound male labourers that are required by the owners of the capitalist production units to produce goods and services. In case of emergency appeared in production system, the women's labour power is used at a very low wage-rate. So, the Marxists are of opinion that the institution of private property is responsible for the inferior and subjugated position of the women in society. The discriminatory relation between the male and female is one of the many expressions of class relation as exists in a society based on private ownership of the means of production. The Marxists strongly believe that with the abolition of the institution of private property, the women will be emancipated and become free. So freedom of the women is contingent upon abolition of capitalism and building of socialism. Socialist feminism like Marxist feminism is based on the Marxist theory. But it throws light on the subjects Marxist feminism does not incorporate. Socialist feminism lays stress on gender discrimination while class discrimination received greater attention by the Marxist feminists. The socialist feminists opine that patriarchy is much more deep and penetrative than an exploitative social system. Patriarchy is

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 103 not necessarily connected with the institution of private property and, hence, abolition of private property does not put an end to patriarchy. The Marxist feminists do not pay much attention to family, domestic labour and to matter like reproduction, which are important concepts in feminist analysis. Socialist feminist Zillah Eisenstein observes that male domination and capitalism are the two central constituents of exploitation of the women. According to Eisenstein, sexism and gendered division of labour is determined by the prevailing exploitative economic system. So the liberation of women depends upon (a) the simultaneous abolition of both the economic and 'cultural' sources of women's oppression, and (b) building of a society that ensures social, economic and political justice. Juliet Michell is of the view that the location of the women in society is determined by production, reproduction, socialization and sexuality. So women's liberation does not depend solely on dismantling of capitalism, rather it requires the abolition of all the determinants that get women subjugated and subjected. Radical feminism, however, is evolved to challenge all the variants of feminism. Unlike liberal feminists, radical feminists do not consider patriarchy as being a natural institution. In contravention of the argument of the Marxist feminists, the radical feminists contend that gender-conflict is the main and the predominant conflict in society and biological and psychological difference or distinction is the source of the discrimination between the male and the female. Patriarchy is built upon gender-division which is responsible for the bondage of the women, and this gender-division empowers and invigourates patriarchy. The dominating biological structure of the male that terrifies and control the women, is derived from patriarchy. Patriarchy, according to the radical feminists, is thus both an institution and an ideology. It gets the women as the subjects ruled by the male. "The Second Sex" of Simone de Beauvoir is the main source and inspiration of radial feminism. Simone holds that the on-going general processes of society have held the women as an "other" group. Because of physical form, reproduction and child rearing the female is 'other' in the eyes of society, they play in 'other' role in society. This 'otherness' restricts the freedom of the women and as a result of it, they cannot express and expose power they have in them. Simone urges the abolition of the processes, norms, mores and values that compel the women to become the 'other' or to become the 'second sex'. Boldly she asserts, 'one is not born but becomes a woman'. According to Shulamith Firestone, another radical feminist, human reproductive biology is responsible for considering women the weaker sex. The prevailing norms and social values work behind the reproductive biology compel the lactating mother

104 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 to feed the dependent babies and in turn the mother becomes dependent on her husband. So liberation of women requires a holistic effort which involves both objective and subjective dimensions. Kate Millet, a very articulate and powerful radical feminist, observes in her 'Sexual Politics' that power exists in relation between man and woman and because of it the relation is political. A male person derives power from the institution of patriarchy and on the basis of it he subordinates women in family and in society. So both the spheres, private and public, are political. Because of politics the women are kept confined to their respective family and they are denied access to public sphere so as to deprive them of any share of political power. And again, it is because of politics that men are allowed to public space to appropriate power existent there. Millet is of opinion that state normally can not resist this politics as determind by patriarchy which dominates women at home and in society and state because it is ubiquitous. The radical feminists, the non-believers in reform, thus call for world wide female solidarity and sisterhood in order to build organized resistance against this all-pervading patriarchy. Rather a more recent theme, called postmodern feminism is developed by Judith Butler, Elizabeth Spelman, Julia Kristeva and others. Postmodern feminism is grown out of a combined theoretical forces of structuralism, postmodernism and French feminism. The post-modern feminists are of opinion that the women have many identities other than gender. The conditions and problems of them are not similar irrespective of caste, class, colour, religion and region. All Asian women, all black women, all Hindu or all Muslim women of India are different and they experience things differently. Post-modern feminists, therefore, reject the broad-narrative or the meta-narrative of feminism and draw our attention to the difference within as exists in the central core of the problem and also to the many, diverse, fragmented and micro expressions and experiences of the women who belong to no singular class, caste, colour, religion, region and culture. According to post modern feminists, women or gender is a multi-dimentional term, it signifies a varied implications, multiple realities and a lot of life-experiences. Hence, it is imperative, they hold, to have a different explanation and analysis of deconstructed and fragmented identity of the women. Critics of postmodern feminism, however, observe that post-modern feminism has attempted to deconstruct the identity of women which has resulted in weakening the central solidarity and the feminist sisterhood, the feminists of several variants have tried to build up through ages.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 105 8.6 Summing Up Feminism as an approach to the study of political science is different from other approaches. The feminists are of opinion that the domain of political theory like that of mythology, literature and culture is male-centric. Main-stream politics, they strongly observe, is but mainstream politics. The women who constitute even more than the lion's share of the total resources of the world and receive less than one percent of it, are subject to domination, exploitation and violence. Both the institution of patriarchy and multi-dimensional vulnerability of the women are ubiquitous and restlessly terrifying. Feminism signifies the protest against the male-dominated theory, ideology, socio-political practices, and culture which deny freedom, equality, power and rights of the women and have suppressed and subjugated them over centuries. The critical perspective of feminism is an important key to understand politics which does have multiple meanings and diverse manifestations. The theme or perspective of feminism has now led to proliferation of research not only in the field of political science but in other disciplines dealing with human relationships irrespective of their focus specificity. 8.7 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. What are various concepts associated with feminism. Explain those concepts. 2. What are the main propositions of liberal feminism? How the radical feminists criticise liberal feminism? 3. What are the basic contentions of Marxist and Socialist feminisms. Is there any difference of emphasis between the two? 4. Point out the main content of postmodern feminism. What are its limitations? 5. Make, a critical estimate of feminism as a necessary perspective of political theory. Long Questions : 1. Examine the typologies of feminism. 2. Attempt typologies analysis of the waves of feminism.

It presents a pungent criticism of painting, art, architecture, literature, movie, music, history, theory and doctrine, etc., emanated out or drawn in the spirit of modernity. Although the notion of postmodernism dates back to 1870 when John Watkins Chapman, an English painter used the term postmodern while reviewing the impressionist art of the French, in the field of social science as such, postmodernism, as a critical

108 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 perspective, is a development of the seventies and eighties of the twentieth century. Jean Francois Lyotard, Michel Foucault, Jacques Derrida, Roland Barthes, Jean Baudrillard are the main exponents of postmodernism. 9.2 Meaning of Postmodernism Postmodernism, in fact, is a radical discursive position which involves enormous ambiguity and controversy and, for this reason, it is convenient for us to state with what we mean by modernity by postmodernism developed by the above-said postmodern thinkers. Modernity is rooted in the Enlightenment and anchored in rationalism. Enlightenment denotes an intellectual movement took place in the sphere of ideas and thinking in Europe in the middle of the eighteenth century. It led to free social and political life from orthodoxy and obscurity and inspired growth of new attitude and outlook basing on reason. This reason-based attitude and outlook favoured by Voltaire, Locke, Descartes, Didero etc. gave birth to a regime of knowledge which is all-engulfing and beyond which nothing exists. This attitudinal and philosophical framework is called rationalism which provides the reason and authoritative authenticity of all explanations of various phenomena of the universe. Modernity implies truth, beauty and all that standards exist as objective realities that can be discovered, known and understood through rational and scientific means. In this sense, modernity is closely associated with positivism which affirms the view that relies on scientific method as the only source of true knowledge. Modernity, like positivism, rejects tradition and metaphysics as pre-scientific firms of thought. Modernity ushered in an age of reason. In this age man became aware of his own potentiality and was able to replace God from the centre of thought and action. This age espoused and affirmed the rational, natural or earthly, secular, human-centric thought-process. Francis Bacon strongly favoured scientific and technological advancement for the fulfillment of human needs. Mastery of man over nature was thought to be the main function of scientific knowledge. Scientific truth established through rigorous analysis of empirical data and information is infallible, absolute and universal. Modern age was as an age of progress too. On the basis of unprecedented development of science and technology, transport and communication industrial production and trade and business get a tremendous fillip which helped to boost market worldwide. This age put an end to feudalism and gave birth to a new

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 109 civilization based on new mode of production. This new civilization asserted the supremacy of reason which made man his own master. In this respect, modernity is an offshot of Enlightenment which according to Kant stands for man's emergence from his self-incurred immaturity which hinders man's own understanding of his immense power inherent in him. Enlightenment entails an engulfing force of reason, rationality and scientific temper and it criticizes all that which appears as unscientific and irrational. According to the spirit of Enlightenment, all human actions and all explanations of things come under the strict rule and scrutiny of reason; and it is reason which searches out and establishes decisive, total and unchanging or constant truth. This truth is, in nature, essential and foundational and denies relativism in respect of reaching alternative truth. Establishment of this truth is the motto of science which is used to create the wealth or to increase the productivity of material production. Huge material production requires the development of technology along with science and this science and technology combined together forges a powerful 'cultural regime' which determines not only human actions but unwaveringly believes in the notion that it is able to expose and explain the rules and laws of development of history and society. Modernity as sponsored by Enlightenment thus believes in historicism ; and it asserts that the development of history is unilinear and always it advances towards progress. Being inspired by the all-engulfing culture of reason, science and technology as activated by the motivation to prodnce more, the concept of creation and strengthening of nation-states looms large and those are established on the basis of homogeneous notion cutting accross all cultural diversities and societal differences and heterogencities and micro identities existent in societies. Overriding and denial of all these cultural diversities and societal fragments require power of dominance and aggressive assertions which sought to be legitimized by the doctrine of the power-thinker like Machavelli, a strong representative of this age of Enlightenment. The inter-relation between Enlightenment and modernity is very close or, to say. organic. The inherent attributes of modernity are claimed to be the attributes of humanism. Enlightenment and, for that matter, modernity were responsible for American War of Independence in 1776, French revolution of 1789 and rapid industrialization of 1780s and thereafter, which led to the birth of capitalism drawn on the philosophical system of individualism and on general progress of mankind. But postmodernism has no unified, essential and foundational defination, nor it represents a so-called coherent theoretical scheme with formidable doctrinaire position usually preferred by a typical scholar in social science or by socio-political activist

110 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 working on any uni-dimensional issue. The central theme of postmodernism as developed by the thinkers is oriented to criticize the notions and the social and political messages of modernity and to point out the limitations of it as a praxis. These limitations were exposed in the course of its operation both at the level of theory and practice to which all dominant social and political theories and their practical manifestations including Marxism have been subjected to. Instead of essentialism, foundationalism, totality, universalism, determinism and homogeneity inherent in modernity, postmodernism relies on relativism, pluralism, detotalization, localism, disclosure and fragmentation, deconstruction and heterogeneity. 9.3 Origin of Postmodernism In social science and in the realm of social and political practice, postmodernism emerged in the background which is composed by the students' uprising and protest movements in Europe and in the United States in the middle of the twentieth century. The postmodernists are of opinion that the entire first half of the twentieth century is riddled with conflicts, chaos and contradictions and all these are grown out of obsessive attitude to hyper-scientific and rational epistemology and overlordship of scientific and technological revolution (STR) pushed and spearheaded by the nations who later turned into powerful imperialist powers in an age of flourishing industrialism. The twentieth century, for important reasons, is eventful. It witnessed the First World War, the emergence of socialist state in Russia rise of fascism and nazism respectively in Italy and Germany, heinous genocide, outbreak of the Second World War, heart-breaking Hiroshima and Nagasaki, crushing of nationalist and democratic aspirations of the people of Asia, Africa and Latin America by the colonial and imperialist powers, birth of cold war between the USA and the erstwhile USSR, politics of possession over world economic, social and political resources by both the capitalist and the socialist blocs, rampant exploitation and mass killing in Vietnam-Laos and Kampuchia, cross border terrorism, fall of Berlin Wall, repeated gulf wars, dissolution of the USSR, burgeoning recession in capitalism etc. on the one hand and on the other, liberation and emergence of many new nations, birth of an wide array of new social movements in various parts of the world like feminist movements, environmental movements, human rights movements of varried forms, urge for sustainable development and so on and so forth through the length of this century. Questions were raised contesting the claims of modernity to (a) emancipate man from unreasonable exploitation and oppression of myriad forms and degrees, (b) ensure progress, and (c) make new history of mankind free from unreason and untruth.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 111 9.3.1 Philosophical Sources Jean Jacques Rousseau, influenced by romanticism, had first raised question against the validity of reason and rationality and of the notion of progress and universalism as emphatically stressed by European modernity and the 17th century Enlightenment. Rousseau was not in a position to approve the confinement of man and his free consciousness to so-called hyper-scientific laws and rules as urged by the positivists. Kant also had expressed his categorial doubt against it. Professor Sobhanlal Datta Gupta contends that Kant's bifurcation of the world of noumenon and the world of phenomenon, his dictinction between the beautiful and the sublime, were powerful philosophical pointers in this direction. Professor Datta Gupta is also of opinion that it is this notion of critique of reason which later flowed into the ideas of Frankfurt School and exposed the vandalizing power of instrumental reason. It revealed, most flagrantly, the content of unreason resident in reason as valorized by European modernity. Postmodern socio-political perspective, it is commonly taken, has received a direct impetus from Nietzsche and Heidegger. Nietzsche is the champion of perspectivism. He is of opinion that interpretations and conceptions of truth depend on perspective. There is nothing saying of absolute truth. Truth varies because of perspective of persons who seek to understand and realize truth varies. According to him, a particular language is not always adequate experession of all realities. Concepts, he holds, may have a long history and in the course of history those concepts are variously defined and understood by people who are in different and heterogeneous positions and with different and heterogeneous prespectives. His Genealogy of Morals approves no objective point upon which anything particular and systematic can be built. Martin Heidegger is very much averse to positivism of modernity and to modern technology which, according to him, lead to homelessness. Modern technology, he contends, is dangerous because it is the ultimate distance from the philosophical study of the nature of being, becoming, existence or reality. Heidegger seeks to restore a home for man in an awareness of Being. In the Letter of Humanism of 1947 he says that homelessness consists in the abandonment of Being by beings and because of it the truth of being remains unthought. Heidegger is in favour of liberation of language from grammer which asks everyone and everything to strictly conform to rules. He opines that thinking begins only when we have come to know that reason glorified for centuries, is the most stiff-naked adversary of thought. Instead of modern utilitarian, technological and, for that matter meaningless and 112 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 empty world Heidegger aims at returning to a supersensuous world where Being would present itself in its plentitude. His philosophical attitude to modern technology leads him to oppose both the capitalist and socialist industrialism. 9.4 Postmodernist Thinkers 1. Lyotard Armed with the attitude and interpretation of many thinkers and philosophers against modernity and Enlightenment Jean Francois Lyotard in his The Postmodern Condition – A Report on Knowledge (1979) represents the central core of postmodern thinking. Lyotard does not believe in the great plans that shape the world. He explicitly rejects totalizing perspectives on history and society. These totalizing perspectives are, according to him, the grand narratives or the meta-narratives. Incredulity towards meta-narratives is his strong philosophical position with which he questions the privileged position of scientific rationalism as a dominant form of knowledge. Lyotard contends that postmodern knowledge is not simply a tool of authorities; it refines our sensitivity to differences and reinforces our ability to tolerate the incommensurable. He discovers intolerance and varying degree of dictate behind the modernist design of so-called universalism, essentialism and totality the modernists have implanted into their science, history, language and narratives. Modernist notions of emancipation, freedom and progress are not, according to Lyotard, very reliable and, hence, are doubtful, and, for this reason, he prefers smallish, localized narratives to meta-narratives or the grand narratives, of modernity. Localized narratives or micro narratives, as Lyotard implies, rescues what is displaced in the high flow of modernism, confines none and nothing to cultural stereotypes and recognizes boundless diversity, differences and million motives and aspirations of man. 2. Foucault Michel Foucault is a very strong postmodernist thinker. He contends that there is nothing saying of absolute truth. Truth is recognized by society and as social reality is always in a state of flux truth, he says, varies. According to him, men in society exchange their ideas and information through signs, symbols, pictures, languages and discourses which reflect power distributed among the members of society. Foucault believes that knowledge is not immune from the workings of power. Power, as he says, has the character of a network which has a wide reach in society.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 113 In his opinion, schools, hospitals, workshops, barracks of modern society are all, in fact the epitome of power where men in there are to become socialized and to work under strict surveillance of the person who can use language, sign, symbol and discourse with greater dominance. Foucault opines that there are various forms of human rationality, diverse and heterogeneous traditions of reason in the histories of human societies, different modes of logical consistency and argumentations which together contradict the monist privilege of essential reason. The reason of Enlightenment is thus repressive to all other forms of reason ; it marginalizes all other reasons and excludes them as unreason, thereby builds an imperialist regime of a despotic reason which forcefully declares itself as the supreme and sovereign and trivialize others as being inadequate, fragmentary and subordinate. So according to Foucault, post-Enlightenment reason is a discourse of power which standardizes, homogenizes and determines what is rational and what is irrational. Foucault holds that power is an integral component in the production of knowledge, reason and truth and all these are not outside power and are lacking in power, rather they manifest the workings and plays of power. His particular position to power-knowledge or power-truth relationship implies that he seeks to take and support a relativist position. He attacks on the tyranny of the great systems, grand theories and vital truths. His aim is to give free play to difference, to local and contextual knowledge, to fragmented and subjugated peripheral knowledge, to marginalized wisdoms, and to rupture, contingency and discontinuity. Michel Foucault, once himself a Marxist and member of French Communist, Party, raises serious question against Marxism which, according to him, is emanated from the so-called European modernity as it could not alienate itself from the root of western knowledge. As he contends Marxism is a structure of orthodoxy and it has failed to solve the problem relating to gender, environment, minority community and crime. Dialectical materialism and class struggle are but grand narratives which expand the net of power- knowledge relationships and create a new equation that instead of hastening the freedom of the masses helps in unfolding a new social and political tyranny. He denounces the role and the belief system of the Communist Party of France as determined by the then Soviet Union and unequivocally supported the East European communist dissenters. Madness and Civilization (1961), The Archaeology of Knowledge (1969), History of Sexuality (Vols I-III, 1976-1987- 1990) and Discipline and Punish (1977) are the major works of Michel Foucault where he has presented his critique of modernism and his own post-structuralist and postmodernist position.

114 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 3. Derrida Jacques Derrida, starts his philosophical journey with severe attack on structuralism and also with strong belief that an word, or a poetry or a language express and reveal multiple meanings and implications. In his Writing and Difference (1978) ; Of Grammatology (1967), Margin of Philosophy (1981) and Voice and Phenomenon (1967), in particular, he establishes his stand for postmodernism. Derrida repudiates Logocentrism which approves the notion that truth is the fundamental, fullest and central thing that expresses the cause or the meaning of origin. Logocentrism, according to him, phallographic, patriarchal and masculine because it rejects others contradicting the central truth. He is, however, agreed to recognize the multiple meanings of any text. As periphery resides within centre, he opines, text involves several dimensions and implications which are denied by the orthodox western scholars. The footnotes and the notes in the margin of a text are important for the text to reveal itself. Derrida here prescribes the need for deconstruction of all constructed texts to reveal what they seek to express and thus they become new construction. Deconstruction, as he thinks, helps to liberate text and truth drawn on uni-linear fashion and thus to continue the search of new and new text and truth which themselves are subject to further analysis and inquiry. Truth, thus, according to Derrida, is not permanent, nor it is universal; but it is contextual as its validity is judged by the context which is but changing. Jacques Derrida's postmodernist ideas do have important impact upon the feminist, lesbian, minority and other identity groups who challenge the centralized socio-cultural values of socially and politically authoritarian regime. Derrida opposes any scheme or project forged by any political orthodoxy, and for this reason, he rejects authoritarian inheritance of Marxism. He prefers discursive Marxism to 'scientific' Marxism.

4. Baudrillard Jean Baudrillard is an ardent postmodernist who later views postmodernity as completely a new phenomenon totally dissociated from modernity. Baudrillard starts his postmodernist philosophical journey with his opposition to Marxism. He has introduced the idea of symbolic exchange as against economic exchange. He is of opinion that in postmodern society a cycle of giving and receiving, taking and returning is in constant operation. Contemporary society is not controlled and determined by production, rather it is controlled and dominated by media, cybernetic models and steering systems, computers, information processing, entertainment and

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 115 knowledge industries. All these models, systems and devices produce or create signs through which coding and decoding of everything are done. These signs and their producers or creators, in fact, control the society. In this society, profit, exploitation or mode of production are irrelevant, and the signs are predominant and these signs are themselves self-referential. In this society, there remains no distinction between signs and the social reality and just for this reason, it is very difficult to determine what does reality mean in definite terms. Baudrillard observes that productive system, commodity and technology as such do not imply the characteristics of the present society. This society instead is characterized by implosion of the distinction between signs and reality. Baudrillard contends that post modern society can be seen as undergoing the process of dedifferentiation while modern world underwent a process of differentiation. Baudrillard describes this world as hyperreality. He opines that the media pervades or engulf all the aspects and spheres of life. In so doing it becomes even more real than life is in reality. Whatever the media presents are indiscriminately followed by people who accept their presentations as more than real without judging their validity. In this process, Baudrillard observes, the real takes on the character of hyperreal which, in the end, replaces the real and establishes itself as real in collective mind and perception. This perception makes the masses increasingly passive, indifferent and apathetic and creates a culture of death. The Mirror of Production (1975), Simulacres et Simulation (1981), The Gulf War did not take place (1995) are Baudrillard's main works. It is relevant to mention here that none of the postmodernist interpretations as advanced by Lyotard, Foucault, Derrida and Baudrillard is above and beyond criticism. Charles Taylor, Noam Chomsky, Camil Paglia, Jurgen Habermas among others have raised serious allegation against postmodernism for its conceptual inconsistency as evident in understanding and presentation of the overall trends of the world we are living in. The language, the postmodernist thinkers have used is exorbitantly complex and full of jargons thereby making their statements unusually critical. Various critics are of opinion that, postmodernism is highly diverse intellectual activity as a result of which it can not provide any distinct idea about what postmodernism does mean in particular. It lacks coherence and promotes resistance to reliable knowledge and relativism in culture and morality.

Perspective Despite intricacy immanent in concepts and presentation of original postmodern socio-political literatures we can sort out some features of postmodern perspective in the following way. 1. In the sphere of knowledge, no inference is final, conclusive and decisive, nor it can be scientific and be categorized as unchanging truth. Knowledge called scientific or theories pronounced as grand and systematic are established by dominant power existent in society. Knowledge, according to postmodernist perspective, is contextual and culture-specific and truths are many and they appear differently to different people at different places and circumstances. Pure reason and infallible knowledge are myth, according to postmodernist interpretation. 2. The notion of power is no uni-dimensional and it is not always necessarily state-centric. Power is ubiquitous in society. Postmodern politics is suspicious of the nation-state system and considers it as a political construction. As against Hegel it denies the emergence and existence of state as an instrument of change of human history and ensuring progress. State power extolls itself and besieges micro, marginal, local and fragmented entities that possess significant resources in making numerous narratives. 3. Postmodern perspectives is opposed to historicism. The postmodernists assert that there is no overall pattern in history, nor history is progressive and is progressing towards any perfection enhancing the freedom of man. History is directionless. History, knowledge and human subject are fundamentally rooted in contingency, discontinuity and iniquitous origins. Postmodern thinkers believe in the irreducible contingency and indeterminacy. 4. Postmodern perspective opposes Marxian explanation of state machinery. The postmodernists are of opinion that power is not only concentrated in the machinery of state. Power has the character of a network which has a wide reach in society. Within society, power is variegated and found everywhere and, hence it is difficult to step outside the net of power. The concept of power, according to postmodernist perspective is multi-dimensional as it operates in much more subtle and small level of regular human activity. 5. The state in postmodern discourse does not have a class character because of the fact that society and state do have multiple discourses of multiple groups and ethnicity. Class-centric politics, according to the postmodernist interpretation, is too limited and does not represent the diverse narratives and interactions taking place in the realm of society and state. 6. Postmodernism defies universal reason and the prospect of rational thinking as emphasized by modernism. For this matter, it goes against its project of humanism and the assurance of independence, freedom, democracy and so-called scientific advancement of human civilization as pronounced by modernity which has extolled its pure reason and science winning over spiritual forces. The postmodernists are of opinion that western ideologies based on the spirit of European Enlightenment, instead of expanding independence in thinking and belief in progress of human race, have allowed the politics of power and are used to colonize foreign cultures and subjugate the minorities and the underprivileged. 7. Postmodernists contend that politics is all-pervading and it is the fundamental basis of our life, of our thinking and activity. All aspects of our life and activity, our existence and feeling, thinking and consciousness, our realization of nature and of needs of others are derivatives of politics which again is shaped by them. Politics is thus an important component of human life and the core of politics is composed of whatever happens in the realm of thinking and activity of human being. 8. Postmodernism tends to reject broad narratives which are taken as authoritative and conceal diverse narratives in the name of absolute and essential reason and science by means of homogenization of all plural and heterogeneous forces existing in state and society. Jacques Derrida, hence, has urged the need for deconstruction of the modernist construction and the modernist text or discourse which do not represent the concrete reality or truth. The purpose of deconstruction is to discover the opposite discourse of the prevalent language and text which rationalize metaphysics as science and domination as natural rule. 9. Postmodern condition of the present world is characterized, as Baudrillard observes, by symbolic exchange simulation, hyperreality and seduction. The media and the electronic devices have changed the social, economic, political and cultural processes as introduced by modernism and have taken away distinction between signs and reality. The media today is no longer the mirror of reality, but it becomes even more real than reality. This hyperreality

118 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 have created a catastrophic culture absorbing the masses who later forget everything meaningful and who lose the revolutionary hope as Marx urged or the need for reform as Durkheim hoped. 10. Postmodern perspective is appeared as distinct and exceptional. When all other theories tend to prescribe any particular state of affair as being good and ideal and guide people to follow and execute it to benefit them, postmodernism does not search for any master discourse. On the contrary, it encourages relativism and scepticism towards and also sabotage against dominant theory, dominant ideology, dominant epistemology and dominant socio-political and cultural force. Postmodernism is explained as being self-refuting and anarchical as it does not even allow itself any pause in decentering the centre, debasing the based, indeterminating the determinate, deunifying the unified and demystifying the mystified. 9.6 Debate between Marxism and Postmodern perspective The debate between Marxism and postmodernism is very interesting as it possesses a deep theoretical as well as practical value. Scholars like Alex Callinicos, E.M. Wood and Terry Eagleton have taken a very sharp critical position against postmodernism. They consider the postmodernist position vis-a-vis Marxism is baffling, dangerous and reactionary. They are of opinion that Marxism project is an alternative to capitalism that is meant for an explanation of oppression, domination and exploitation of man by man. Although Marxism is an outcome of European modernism based on reason and rationality, it negates and is critical towards bourgeois modernism that enslaves man by controlling the reason of capital. Postmodernism tends to attack the Marxist project to create a society free from class domination and class exploitation. A society based on the Marxist principles is society that ensures freedom and equality not for any particular class but for the entire citizenry. Postmodernism, these scholars argue, defeats this grand project of emancipation of man. Marxist scholar Aijaz Ahmad in his book 'In Theory:Classes, Nations, Literature', contends that postmodernism is an intellectual weapon of imperialism. It decisively seeks to uproot socialism and weaken class struggle. It rationalises the capitalist order and misguides the international communist movement for establishing socialism on the demolition of imperialism and colonialism. A few other Marxist ideologues have denounced postmodernism using several

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 119 virulent comments like (a) it is disguised enemy of Marxism, (b) it is intellectually marked nihilism, and (c) it is a bourgeois ideology in its finest sophistication, etc. Some other Marxist critics are of opinion that in an age of total confusion resultantly grown out of the fall of Berlin Wall, breakdown of socialist regimes in East European countries, end of Maoist period in China and finally collapse of the Soviet Union in Russia, postmodernism seeks to roll back the wheel of civilization. These critics contend that the seventeenth century renaissance-reformation and Enlightenment had brought reason and rationalism in Europe. Refusing any particular scheme of social development, postmodernism seeks to refute and attack rationalism. Essentially the philosophy postmodernism espouses is but the fatalism of the middle ages. Marxism is born in the process of modernity. The foundation of Marxism is materialistic philosophy based on rationalism. By its rejection of grand narrative, postmodernism defends the narrative of disorder and anarchy. Marxist critics of post modernism observe that European Enlightenment does have tremendous intellectual contribution to the advancement of human history and human civilization. The theorists and philosophers of Enlightenment like Locke, Kant, Hume, Descartes, Bacon have constructed the theory of progress and advancement by means of illuminating the inner relationship between science and advancement. The postmodernists have opposed Enlightenment and modernism but they could not prescribe any alternative philosophy and theory of human progress and advancement. From this point of view, postmodernism is pointless. It is but an word game. It is itself the dead end of philosophy and of political theory. Fredric Jameson has criticized postmodernism from a rather moderate Marxist standpoint. According to him, postmodernism is the cultural logic of late capitalism. He opines that modernity is the relevant culture of market capitalism while globalized capitalism has created postmodernism as its relevant culture. He has opposed Lyotard when he advocates incredulity to meta-narrative, and observes that the relevance of meta-narrative is still valid. He strongly holds the view that history could not be reduced to only text and narrative, and history, according to him, is the narrative of class struggle. In the sphere of politics, he believes firmly, the notion of totality can not be avoided. Jameson is of the view that postmodernism refuses to critically engage itself with the meta-narrative of capitalization and globalization. This refusal makes it consistent with prevailing relations of domination and exploitation. Perry Anderson has identified a new kind of capitalism which rose in the very later part of the twentieth century. It has led, as he observes, to the birth of postmodernism. Uncertain, restless and speculative stock market condition determining the worldwide flow of capital is the characteristic of this new capitalism. This time

120 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 is a time of boom of information technology which transforms the real man into a digitized image altogether averse and unable to reverse the consistent trend of frustration, cynicism and negation spread in all spheres of life. Features and trends of this age are, Anderson contends, features and trends of postmodernism. As the various Marxist scholars and ideologues criticize postmodernism, the postmodernists are also critical against Marxism and the Marxists. Prof. Sobhanlal Datta Gupta has excellently put together the points of criticism the postmodernists have raised against Marxism. We now mention below the postmodernist arguments against Marxism. First of all, Marxism is an offshoot of modernity. It is a branch and a component of it. It is a metanarrative and a grand utopia against the bourgeois vision of modernity. Marxism is grounded in the notion of reason as emphasized by the European Enlightenment. In Marxism the reason and rationality of capital is replaced by the reason and rationality of class struggle is the only difference between bourgeois vision of modernity and Marxist vision of modernity. Secondly, as postmodernism opposes teleological history and as history is fluid and indeterminate and endowed with a plurality of meanings, according to the postmodern understanding of history, it contests Marxism as it considers

and the future development of history will culminate, as Marxism contends, in the attainment of communism via socialism. Postmodernism does not believe in such unilinear progress of history. Thirdly, in the postmodernist power-knowledge frame of reference, the vision of socialism is outmoded and not tenable because it is essentially a universalist and totalizing frame basically grounded in reason. The Marxian project of socialism and communism represents the notion of power and domination and reflects a persistent trend of totalitarianism. Fourthly, Marxist narrative of class struggle is highly sceptical as history of man is not a result of class struggle, nor it is at its command and will follow its unilateral directives to evolve in the days ahead. The postmodernists contend that history is replete with million struggles waged by various groups at different local and micro levels. Fifthly, Marxism defies the multidimensional existence of gender, tribe, caste and clan and it has given total emphasis on class in its meta-narrative of universal history. It thus gets history in closure. Sixthly, Marxism believes in uniformity so far as the composition and development of history are concerned. It negates difference. According to the Marxists, class is the

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 121 chief component of society and history and they develop according to the universal logic of class struggle. But, on the contrary, the postmodern view of history has its emphasis on difference, fragments and deconstruction. Seventhly, Marxism relies on revolution and revolutionary parties as relevant to social and political transformation and change. So the macro ideas relating to society and politics are central concern upon Marxism lays central emphasis, while decentering the centre or the central is strongly espoused by postmodernism. Eighthly, as Marxism disapproves plurality, multi-dimensionality, heterogeneity, and contextual specificity in respect of social composition and / or human action, it denies the concept of freedom and democracy. Two important notes in the concluding part of the debate between Marxism and postmodernism are thought to be worth mentioning. Note 1. It is not Marx but Marxism of some Marxist ideologues, scholars and practitioners that has been the prime target of postmodernist criticism. And Note 2. It is Marx and his Marxism that have led the mainstream postmodernists to reinstate the creative principles of emancipatory Marxism. The original Marx and his own Marxism is not unilinear, opposed to multi- dimensionality and historical and contextual specificity and confined to fixity or closure. The Class Struggle in France, The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte, The Civil War in France composed by Marx and The Peasant War in Germany composed by Marx and his associate, Fredrich Engels, have reflected in clear terms historical specificity and multi-dimensionality of struggle as against universality and unilinearity of history. Even the writings like The Development of Capitalism in Russia by Lenin, The Analysis of Classes in Chinese Society by Mao Zedong and Prison Notebook by Antonio Gramsci were the exercises into understanding the particular situations of revolutionary processes against contemporary feudalism, capitalism and fascism. Marxism is basically a subjective instrument to change the objective reality of class exploitation and class domination. But literatures like Bukharin's theory of Historical Materialism : a Manual of Popular Sociology, Stalin's Foundation of Leninism and A Short History of the CPSU (Bolshevik) etc., have transformed Marxism into science and into manualized doctrine. The turning of Marxism into a Bolshevik phenomenon, its growing Stalinization, the outright negation and forceful repression of the 'other' or the 'different' as represented by Trotsky or Rosa Luxemburg, growth of absolute centrality and bureaucratization in the structure and functioning of the communist party particularly in Soviet Union, etc., had reduced creative

122 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 Marxism into mechanical, hyperrational and regressive Marxism which reflects essentialism, absence of difference and otherness and negation of democracy and tolerance. The Soviet communist experiment with the East European nations like Poland, Hungary and Czechoslovakia narrates the meta-narrative of control, surveillance and domination upon which the 'Soviet Marxism' excessively relied. This storyline of the 'Soviet Marxism' got it in permanent closure towards the close of the twentieth century. Twenty first century may be a time-period of dialogue between Marxism and postmodernism. Michel Foucault and Jacque Derrida had expressed their unwavering faith in Marxism as revealed in their several conversations. Coming out of scholars, intellectuals and practitioners who have intense reading of original Marxism and of the nature and movement of international capitalism is the need of the hour, for initiating the dialogue between Marxism and postmodernism in the interest of removing the poverty, both physical and philosophical. 9.7 Summing Up Postmodernism is the critique of the basic ideas and assumptions of modern- ism and thier impacts on art, literature and theories and discourses of state, society, politics and culture. Modernity is a necessary product of European Enlightenment that empha- sized the totalizing and essentializing notions like rationalism, scienticism, humanism, integration and general progress. But the objectives social and political reality as grown even in enlightend Europe and America in the face of diverse socio-political chaos and contradiction has challenged the basic assumptions of modernity and bring out the hollowed content of grand theories and metanarratives built upon those ideas and assumptions moder- nity incorporates and espouses. As aganist modernist discourse, Lyotard, Foucault, Derrida and Baudrillard and many others drawing impetus from Nietzsche and Heidegger have emphasized the existence of multiple meaning of truth and they have questioned the validity of settled assumptions of knowledge relating to society, culture and civilization. 9.8 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. In the fields of literature, film, music and art, postcolonialism is a topic of enduring

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 125 critical discussion. It is a subject, basically inter-disciplinary in nature and has become substantially complex but multi-dimensional attractive subject as it involves several questions of intellectual debates relating to epistemological and philosophical thought-processes. Postcolonialism to be precise, is the cultural critique of western colonialism, most formally has evolved in 1970s and '80s. But the root of its evolution dates back to much earlier and the inspiration of this critique or theoretical perspective still permeates a good number of contemporary works of cultural, artistic, literary and educational significance. We all know that colonialism is the name of transformed imperialism. The objective of colonialism is not just to occupy colony through military aggression but to ensure and perpetuate economic exploitation and political control by means of extending the net of power and domination over the realm of psyche and culture of the colonized. The colonial rulers and their intellectual associates legitimizing the colonial rules designate the West as responsible for bringing the colonized of Asia, Africa and Latin America in the light of 'modern' civilization. Rudyard Kipling and many other had much earlier stated the burden of the colonized and their ignorance, poverty and destitute as being the responsibility of the White to address. Postcolonialism signifies the project of extension of civilization by the White rulers and their following and associating social theorists and literary community. Ideologically postcolonialism and postcolonial writings highlight on the forceful cultural and racial domination and supremacy of the West over the non-western world and people thereof. Joseph Ernest Renan, a French racialist orientalist had made rude and offensive remarks towards the non-White people of non-western nations in his various works in the second part of the nineteenth century. These people having old and obsolete ideas and orientations had, as Renan observed, no sense of world civilization of modern times. In all respects, they, according to him, were backward and stupid. Thomas Babington Macaulay in his infamous educational Minute of 1835 despised the tradition of education and learning in Sanskrit language as prevalent in the early part of British India and strongly exalted the superiority of western literature and system of knowledge. In his Minute Macaulay remarked that the education and learning pattern of the native was much inferior to education and learning as rife in the lower primary schools in England. Almost similar narrative regarding Indian education and culture and of civilization Reverend J. Tucker had presented. In his opinion, Indian civilization is inferior

126 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 because Indian mind is deficient in power and the world of understanding of the Indian people is void. Indian people, as Tucker contended, are not those people who are entitled to have importance in the light of Enlightenment humanism as they lack superior knowledge and education or the will to have such knowledge and education. The colonial rulers and their associates are, in fact, so racist as they strongly believe that East is East and West is West and never the twine shall meet as the knowledge and education and culture and civilization of the West reside in a place far beyond the reach of those of the East. There is no denying the fact that the real intention and scheme of these remarks and observations were designed to demolish the cultural and moral backbone of the colonized of the orient and exploitation and looting of economic resources of these countries on long-term basis. As we know, every nation possesses broady two kinds of basic resources: (a) psychological and cultural resources involving the power of mind, consciousness and thought-process and (b) economic resources embeded in water, forests, mines, agriculture and industry. The strongly coarse expression of arrogant egoism of the ethno-centric and racist rulers and their hired administrators and intellectuals was but to consolidate colonial control and domination over these two kinds of resources of the colonized nations. And it indicates that the cultural and psychological supremacy and racial egoism of the West definitely and desperately shows the existence of power-relations between the colonizer and the colonized. Postcolonialism and postcolonial writings have stood against the colonial ethics and ideology and oppose their pervading impact that dampens the spirit and energy of resurgence and regeneration of people once colonized. Postcolonialism is indeed a study of the cultural conflicts and confrontations and their several ramifications which are very complex as they appear often mutally contending. These cultural conflicts and confrontations befall between the dominant racist colonizers of Europe and the colonized of Asia and Africa. Postcolonialism is not culturally or theoretically someting that has evolved in the period when and where colonialism had ended. The mainstream theorists of postcolonialism have enphasized the notion of postcolonial condition or the condition of postcoloniality as an important theme inherent in postcolonialism and most of them, thus, justify not to append hyphen between post and colonialism. These theorists are of opinion that the colonizers use to have intention to establish perpetual cultural hegemony upon the colonized nations. They firmly require to destroy not only their respective economy but to crush their language, education, culture and general understanding of moral principles. Desperately they use to follow very deliberate and subtle plan to implement

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 127 so as to get the general desire, taste and common ideas and prejudices of the people of the colonies consistent with and suitable to the colonial interest of the West. Perpetual subservience and subordination of the colonized to the supremacy and hegemonic hold of the colonizer refers to the condition of postcoloniality or postcolonial condition. This condition exists during the course of colonization and does not cease to exist when colonization comes to an end and the colonized acquires political statehood. Because of colonial hangover widely pervading the ideas and institutions, values and cultures of the peoples once colonized the prescription of the theorists and writers for withdrawing the hyphen between post and colonialism appears justified and consistent. 10.2 Evolution and Development of the Theory : The Per- spective of Frantz Fanon Although writings on postcolonialism began to flourish since 1970s, Frantz Fanon, an working psychiatrist at a French hospital in Algeria, had, in the begining of 1950s penned on the pscological subordination and erosion of cultural consciousness of the colonized people all over world. The immediate perspective of Fanon's work, Black Skin White Masks published in 1952, was the condition of the Algerian people under French colonial rule. Here Fanon elaborated on how the colonized people destroy their own indigenus cultural resources and identities undergoing the process of imitating or going after the ideas and practices of the colonizers. His another important work, Wretched of the Earth was published posthumously in 1961. In this later work, Fanon observed that at the global level, power is discriminately distributed. In this book, he discussed, in strong languages, the nature of inequality of power and couflict between the colonized nations of Afro- Asia and the colonizers of Europe. Domination of colonial discourses, stupid internalization of these discourses by the colonized and its resultant all-round obedience and subordination of the indigenus black and the brown to the White, etc. have been vividly described in Fanon's writings. Fanon is very much critical against the pervasive psychological and political aggression of the colonial rulers of Europe. He strongly rejected the egoistic demand of the White for civilizing the subjugated indigenus people under colonialism. He gave the clarion call for the people to wage psychological resistance against the colonial rulers. He was confident in that the people in the colonies are capable to rise

128 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 against cultural aggression of the colonial rulers and their associates. Rightly he understood that colonial education and culture and the very attitudes to colonial civilization were the instruments of European hegemony and all these instruments were powered by the ideas of so-called Enlightenment, rationalism, humanism, progress and modernity. But these ideas as Fanon intends to express, do not relate to the condition of the powerless colonized, rather they endanger them and marginalize them. He observes that these instruments are instruments of hegemonic colonization, and, for eradication of the racist cultural and psychological decolonization Fanon adheres to the theory of collective violence and theoretically explains the redemptive value of collective action relevant to his project of decolonization. Jean Paul Sartre who consistently believed in revolutionary existential humanism upheld earnestly Fanon's call for forceful extraction of hegemonic European culture from Africa and Asia in his introduction to The Wretched of the Earth. Fanon's idea and exposition of revolutionary cultural and political decolonization is reflected favourably in the works of Simone de Beauvoir and Albert Camus. As we know Simone de Beauvoir is a strong feminist theoretician of France and Albert Camus was the French leftist litterateur and philosophical thinker who won Nobel Prize in 1957 for literature at the age of only 44. Both Fanon and Sartre were close to each other on the question of human freedom and social and moral responsibility of the individual. The philosophy of Sartre emphasized the importance of human dignity and social accountability of man. According to Sartre, freedom and social accountability are the tool of human struggle. To fight against oppression and injustice is the moral responsibility of an individual. If this individual does not take part in this struggle, he or she gets estranged from freedom and humanism and becomes himself or herself an oppressor. Fanon too considered development of new avenue for development of humanism as the moral responsibility of man. He regarded the stupid imitation of the European culture and way of life as contrary to reconstruction of human relationships and he observed that this imitation produces nothing but obscene caricature which adversely results in the way of making new history of the third world nations even after acquiring statehood after a long and protracted struggle against imperialism and colonialism. Fanon strongly required to create creative cultural and psychological autonomy and self-identity of the colonized free from European subjugation and domination. He, however, observed that this new creative cultural autonomy and self-identity of

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 129 the colonized do not conform to the simple and uncontentious cultural values and actual practices of the people in the pre-colonial period. Fanon did not advocate to bring back the old days when our old ancestors lived in peace and tranquility. Rather he advised his fellowmen to overcome coloniality completely. In the post-colonial period, he opined, the attempt to establish creative community life of the once colonized will be failed if we fail to overcome the notions, signs, symbols or marks of coloniality. Fanon asked to evolve unceasing creative innovations by the free community for itself. He strongly believed that Europe can not make those individuals with all-round perfection. European culture and civilization does not involve any iota of humanity or humanism, on the contrary, it involves successive negations of it and it involves series of incidents of murder and killing of persons of various parts of the world. In fact, Fanon had upon him the deep impact of political thinking of his preceptor, Aime Cesaire. Cesaire once expressed his view that colonization led the colonial rulers and their associating poet, litterateur and political thinkers to become wild and savage. This process of colonization turned these people into cruel and inhuman, and it sowed in them the poisonous seeds of greed and violence and racist discrimination and hatred. Almost fully convinced by the observations of his preceptor Fanon contended that the more the Europeans feel them endowed with the ideas of rationality, progress and humanism and all other gifts of European Enlightenment, the more they express their real identity as completely subdued by the pathological ideas of exploitation, racial discrimination, persecution and violence. Fanon is a political theorist of decolonization. He strongly denounced the modernist exposition in regard to the ideas of progress and humanism of Europe and advised to shun this exposition in his attempt to repudiate coloniality of the colonized and make a creative future for them. For acquiring and ensuring freedom from the colonial rule based on violence, exploitation and racial discrimination Fanon gave the call for united revolutionary effort of the indigenous peasants, labourers, feudal masters, capitalists and the bourgeois elite for organization of national liberation struggle. He did not consider post-colonial nation-state as the only legitimate goal of this struggle; but anti-colonial nationalism and post-colonial nation-state, he observed, can require the colonized to evolve the possible condition helping them to remove mental and psychological degradation, dejection and pervasive marginalization. Fanon is of opinion that colonial world is bifurcated, and it is bifurcated between the ruler and the ruled, colonizer and the colonized, western and non-western, White and non-White. This bifurcation predominates the ideas and activities of the two contending

130 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 groups or the parties of the colonial world. Anti-colonial national liberation struggle, as he held, posed the challenge against domination and racial supremacy of the colonial rulers and their associates on the one hand, and on the other, it grew courage in the minds of the dejected colonized to raise human demands for freedom and equality. What is worth mentioning here is that Mahatma Gandhi in India and Ngugi, Cabral and Mboya in Africa had expressed their views favouring the varying influences of anti-colonial nationalism. 10.2.1 Contribution of Edward W. Said Edward W. Said has elaborated the principal features of the intellectual inheritance of postcolonialism. He published his Orientalism in 1978 and this work is considered as the postcolonial classic and the most pertinent referring pointer for postcolonialism. He also wrote Culture and Imperialism published in 1993, The Question of Palestine, published in 1979, Power, Politics and Culture published in 2001, The Politics of Dispossession, published in 1994 and a few other to express his views on cultural studies more concerned to point the connection between imperialism and culture. Said had on him the profound influences of post-structuralist and anti-humanist understanding of the contiguity between colonial power and western knowledge. His Orientalism entails attention to the discursive production of colonial meaning and also to the consolidation of colonial hegemony. In his Orientalism Said emphasized the theme that has enabled marginality and the matter of colony and empire to acquire the status of a discipline or a big area of study and research in Anglo- American academy. In fact, Orientalism does have extending impact on intellectual formations, structures and lives both in the West and in the postcolonial non-West. In Orientalism, Said has elaborated, indeed, a unique understanding of imperialism and colonialism as the epistemological and cultural attitude which accompanies the obvious habit of dominating and ruling distant territories. In his Culture and Imperialism, Said, again, has elaborated this idea. Here he writes that imperialism and colonialism do not indicate a simple act of accumulation and acquisition. He opines there that both imperialism and colonialism are supported and perhaps even impelled by impressive ideological formations and these ideological formations are based on the relationship between power and knowledge. This relationship is the source of hegemony that is imposed by the imperial and colonial rulers upon the people of the colonies. Power and domination backed by knowledge is turned into

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 131 legitimate authority which is hegemonic in nature and which is not normally defied by the people. While unmasking the ideological disguises of imperialism, Said, in his Orientalism, tries to expose the reciprocal relationship between colonial power and colonial knowledge. Said is of opinion that the way the westerners exhibit, judge, observe and assess obviously express definite insolence and boastful threat of power and domination. Western knowledge has its organic link with the rule, power and authority the colonialists build in their colonies. The East is won in the way East is known. In Orientalism, we find that Said is heavily influenced by Michel Foucault. Here he has extended his (Foucault's) paradigmatic accounts of the organic alliance between power and knowledge to colonial conditions. While explaining the contiguity between power and knowledge, Foucault observes that knowledge transforms power, changes it from a monolithic apparatus accumulated within the state into a web-like force which is confirmed and articulated through the everyday exchanges of knowledge or information which animate social life. Accordingly, power is reproduced in discursive networks at every point where someone who knows is instructing someone who does not know. Said is of opinion that the mastery and supremacy of power over knowledge is fatal and injurious. As he says, no self-respecting scholar or writer can get himself dissociated from the concerned social and political condition or reality and hence their work/s relates/ relate to the time, place and circumstances. In socio-political system, Said argues, power is not evenly distributed and this results in multiple problems in society and polity. A responsible scholar or writer in his work tries to address these problems and it is his or her moral commitment. But in organized political society the dominant ruling class tends to institutionalize knowledge and use the institutionalized knowledge as an instrument to serve its own class interest. As a result of it, knowledge gets degraded and deviated from its original grandeur and dignity. Against this institutionalized degraded knowledge, Said seeks to go for oppositional counter-knowledge. Primarily Said welcomes orientalism of the western scholars. But a clear and deliberate effort to belittle and humiliate the East is definitely found implicit in the mainstream western orientalism for long. From their own standpoint and orientation, the western orientalist scholars have made explanation and description of history and culture, ideas and institutions and of social, political and religious life of the East.

These descriptions and explanations are the products of divisive mindset, full of hostility and 'us-them' discrimination. Orientalism of the occidental scholars represents superior-inferior relationship, it is inseminated by racial hatred and expresses overt and covert violence. The western orientalist have used this orientation and mindset in knowing, understanding and theorizing on the mind, nature, characteristics, socio- political and cultural behaviours and practices and general life-patterns of the easterner other who are considered distinct from the westerner selves from cultural and civilizational standpoint. Said firmly believes that the knowledge inspires this essentialization of the 'other' or, to say, this 'othering' is coercive and this coercive knowledge leads to grow discourses. Faithfully following the formulation of Foucault, Said observes that in every society discourses are produced, organized, selected and redistributed to crush or to manage popular resistance against the reigning regime and its authority. These discourses are produced, organized and redistributed under severe surveillance of the state so as to enable them to gain success in controlling the means and forms of representation in the society concerned. Said is of opinion that colonial discourses or orientalist discourses do conform to Foucault's idea of discourse and these colonial or orientalist discourses essentialize, particularize and symbolize the East as ignorant, speechless, sullen, indignant, half-devil, half-child, mystical and impoverished 'other'. Said opines that western discourses relating to the East are originally oriented to control and dominate the East; and, following Lacan's idea, he observes that the western culture with its fundamental orientation towards control and domination constructs its own self identity through 'othering'. In his Orientalism, Said holds the view that by means of constructing the above- said stereotypes the western orientalist despise and neglect everything eastern and establish their own supremacy. Along this line of activity colonies are built, the indigenous education, culture, knowledge and the free spaces of common life of the people of the colonies are occupied and exploitation and presecution are kept in motion. Orientalism of the West is thus violent in nature and it is this discourse, Said observes, that offers representational violence. As he says, orientalist stereotypes invariably presupposes and confirms a totalizing and unified imperialist discourse. The arrogant and violent knowledge implicit in western orientalism, Said argues, led the imperialist and the colonial rulers and their associates to glorify and valorize their 'self' and disdain and humiliate 'other'. The power and authority the imperialist and the colonialist rulers thus assume is not only cultural and psychological, but it is also political and economic and then it is military. Western orientalism constructs the identity of conqueror colonizer and superior for Europe and for the non-Europeans it constructs the identity of the conquered, colonized and inferior. So, as Said opines firmly, orientalism and knowledge about the orient of the occident scholars indicates a distinct scheme of relationship of power between the colonizers and the colonized, between the West and the East and between Europe and non-Europe. The people under long-standing cultural, psychological, political, economic and military rule of the colonizers had followed, imitated and been influenced by the western education and culture, language and forms of apparent behaviour. Various attempts of the colonizers like introduction of English department in Indian universities, valorization of english literature with its own perceived beauty, truth and morality and practising Euro-centric values in public and private life had two-fold objectives. These attempts were undertaken with an intention to enforce marginality and inferiority of the colonized culture and of the indigenous knowledge and sense of morality on the one hand and to manufacture consent towards the imperial and colonial rule by mans of creating in them a favourable belief-system conducive to rule the colonies on the other. Ngugi wa Thiong'O, the renowned Kenyan writer and academic and Mahatma Gandhi have given a solemn declaration of opinion against European aggression of education and culture and knowledge and wisdom of the non-European races. Ngugi has considered the colonial language and culture as the fatal and terrifying sphere of colonial discourse. In his Decolonizing Mind, published in 1986, Ngugi observes that language asserts self-identity. Hence, he emphasizes on building and strengthening cultural foundation of identity of the colonized and calls for abrogation of the language and culture of the colonizers. As he opines, this act of abrogation of the alien language and culture and of building of the strong basis of own culture and language of the people in the colonies are of utmost importance. He has noticed that the language and culture of the indigenous people of Africa and Latin America are about to become extinct in the face of cocrcion and highhandedness of the colonial language and culture and French or Spanish or English has been predominant there. This is why. Ngugi has sought to abrogate colonial language or languages and to reread and rewrite the colonial writings. This rereading and rewriting express his attitude to protest and dissent against colonialist aggression of indigenous cultural wealth of the colonies. His River Between (1965) is an express product of this protest attitude Ngugi had long cherished before his publication of Decolonizing Mind. Edward Said has endorsed Ngugi's intention and attempt to build anti-colonial 134 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 cultural resistance. But he rejects abrogation of the colonial language and culture and has recommended to alter and make them consistent to social and cultural contexts of the locality and then to make the counter-culture against colonial culture. He thinks that Salman Rushdie is successful in performing this work in his Midnight's Children. Said contends that Rushdie has compelled the West to recognize the East. In the hands of Rushdie this East is restructured and it is restructured by the discourses of the West. So, instead of obrogation of colonial culture and languges Said intends to build counter-culture or culture of resistance which repudiates orthodox nativism and extremist nationalism hindering the process of decolonization. Said is of opinion that it is an imperative to rediscover the nature of imperialist domination and repression, deformation and defamation of the history and culture of the indigenous nations and then to build a solid foundation of decolonization. For this purpose he asserts, we should have to work with tradition, language, history and literature of different nations and again, customs and conventions, rituals and social pratices as prevalent in various societies and in various parts of them are required to be involved to this attempt. In his Culture and Imperialism published in 1993, Said lays emphasis on the deep inquiry into the different roots of South Asian culture and literature which entail multi-cultural dimension, and in this attempt he himself comes closer to sub-altern study group.

10.2.2 Homi K. Bhaba and Theory of Postcolonialism Homi K. Bhaba is an important thinker of postcolonialism. Bhaba is influenced by the ideas, observations and conceptual innovations advanced by Jack Lacan, Jacque Derrida and Michel Foucault. Bhada has introduced the concepts and ideas like hybridity, displacement, ambivalence, unhomely etc in the realm of the theory of postcolonialism and these ideas and concepts have led the theory to gain more richness and intricacy as well. What Bhaba has told in his Location of Culture (1994) and Of Mimicry and Man (1984) and elsewhere is that the imperialist powers have brought various changes in the realm of language, education, culture and life-processes of the people in the colonies. The primary objectives of this change-effort were to establish colonies and to consolidate their all-round hold upon there. Introduction of western education and system of knowledge by the colonizers has produced a peculiar oscillation and ambivalence in society, which is an outcome, as Bhaba argues, of hybridization. Introduction of western culture in non-western colonies gives birth to a peculiar

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 135 amalgum of cultures and identities. The age-old social customs and conventions, habits and symbols prevalent in indigenous societies are moved by new ideas and they take a mixed form. The oscillating and ambivalent colonized people who were influenced by mixed cultural ideas and practices embrace the critical existence that is resulted from the mutual cultural contagion. Bhaba is of opinion that the colonizers are not immune from hybridization or from the effects of it. But the ambivalence resulted from this hybridization creates much more problem for the anti-colonial movement as it creates deep doubt as to which direction it will be organized and guided. But, as Bhaba contends, despite this problem and dispite strong surveillance of the colonial rulers, the local people have tried to speak out following their own direction and intent. The colonizers have become not always successful to bring power or the discourses of power under their absolute control and, for this reason, as Bhaba observes, the hybrid identity built through the mutual interaction and subtle intimacy between the two cultures has challenged the cultural supremacy of the colonizers. The purpose and desire guiding the colonizers to construct the 'other' against the 'self' have not been completely successful. The so called subjects of the colonies have become vocal and active and ignored the vigilant and all-pervading watch of the colonizers. Bhaba opines that when the hybridized colonized existing in the realm of ambivalence rewrite the colonial narrative, that rewriting does not necessarily become an irrelevant and pointless duplicate. This rewriting definitely carries the inkling of the change of time and change of the fate of those who are called the subjects. This rewriting obviously hastens the process of decolonization. According to Bhaba, hybridity or hybridization is no any negative fact or a negative force. Rather it identifies the presence or representation particularly of the people of the colonies through their interaction with the aliens. Hybridization does not mean the decay and devastation of the old forms of cultural ideas and practices. In several parts of several colonies deep inquiry into and exercises in age-old community life, community literatures and different community cultural forms were found pervasively and this tradition has been formidable there in the post-colonial period. The enormous diversity as represented by those age-old cultural forms seems to constitute a treasure of gems and diamonds which are now used to make new narratives of mass interest. Hybridization has, in fact, given birth to a certain kind of double consciousness. This double consciousness does not exist only among the colonized in the periphery, it exists even in ideas and activites of the colonizers of the centre, and as a result of it, the colonial identity, the colonial administration and

136 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 the colonial edifice have been nativized and rift and tension are produced within the structure of power. So hybridization, as Bhaba argues, can be said to be responsible for the mutual transculturation of the colonizer and the colonized. It leaves neither the colonized nor the colonizers to remain in pure, rather it forges inter-civilizational contiguity between masters and the so-called slaves in the colonial non-west. In postcolonial discussion, imitation or mimicry is an important concept. Frantz Fanon in his Black Skin, White Masks, mentioned that at the time of carnival held in the Carribean region, the black slaves were given the permission to use white masks. The blacks used to exhibit caricatures using the white masks. Fanon tells that fairly a good number of Carribean blacks had used this practice and wanted to become similar to the white. The colonial power used to induce the local blacks to imitate the language, culture, habits and practices of the colonizers for the actual purpose of downgrading the local people and for estranging them from their own culture and own identity. The condition, the colonialists wanted to create by this effort, is the condition of coloniality which was required to expedite the cultural and psychological fall of the colonized leading them to welcome and enfold the culture of the alien. Homi Bhaba in his Mimicry and Man has elaborated the idea of Fanon. We know that Michel Foucault in his Discipline and Punish has observed that the ruling class seeks elsewhere to expand the net of surveillance in order to consolidate and deepen its absolute power elsewhere in society. To get all ideas and activities under the umbrella of its power and authority and also to crush the anti-government protest movements or even such voices, the ruling power strengthens the net of watch and vigilance upon the people. Bhaba, who is heavily influenced by this Foucauldian idea of power-consolidation of the ruler, observes that the colonial rulers seek to make new habits, taste and all other socio-cultural practices of the colonized on the model and pattern of the colonizers through their act of surveillance and constant vigilance. The western rulers want the colonized to become alienated from their age-old habits and belief-system, social norms and values and practices, and they (the colonized) would become the followers of the westerners through imitation or mimicry. For the purpose of expanding and strengthening imperialism in the vast length and breadth of British India, Macaulay in his Minute on Indian education (1835) sought to grow a class of persons Indian in blood and colour, but English in taste, in opinion, in morals and in intellect. But in Location of power, Bhaba argues that the colonial rulers intended to make the colonial subjects into reformed and recognizable mass

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 137 through mimicry or mimicking the westerners and they even used to accept and regard them as 'almost the same, but not quite'. Bhaba strongly opines in this context that this attitude of the colonizers is fundamentally humiliating and this colonial attitude proves post-Enlightenment civility as being devoid of its essence, honesty, humanity and universality. But mimicry itself, as Bhaba emphasizes, is not altogether devoid of political meaning. The parts of ideas and experiences gathered in the process of mimicry promote and enrich the anti-colonial texts and it results in the expansion of the scope of or the space for anti-colonialism and decolonization.

10.2.3 Gayatri Chakraborty Spivak and the Theory of Postcolonialism

Gayatri Chakraborty Spivak is one of the resourceful thinkers in the continuing discussion and debate on postcolonialism. Spivak is equally influenced by Marxism and deconstruction discourse of Jacques Derrida. Again she has deep exercise into and curious academic pulling for sub-altern history. In her A Critique of Post-Colonial Reason, published in 1999, Spivak has mentioned that the non-westerners have been described as the uncivilized and barbaric in most of the metaphysical writings of the West. Spivak has given particular emphasis on 'difference', a subject she thinks very important in postcolonial discussion. She admits the relevance of Said's Orientalism and considers it as the 'source-book' of postcolonial study. She observes that Said is correct when he opines that the western orientalist had described the non-western world as ignorant, primitive and backward from a totalizing point of view. But the idea and concept of the East Said has built against the western construction of it have been done from similar totalizing stand-point and it does not go beyond the bound of grand narrative neglecting difference, heterogeneity and plurality with which a society, be it western or eastern, modern or backward, is grown and exists. Perhaps for translating 'Of Grammatology' of Derrida into English Spivak is found very consistent and categorical in asserting the view that all discursive endeavours necessarily involve multiple conflicts and contradiction, multiple dimensions and multiple meanings. As she argues, the East involves, reflects and represents enormous differences; life and living here go along several directions and towards several goals. And, hence, she contends that the experience of colonial domination over and exploitation of various resources is not homogeneous and the orientation of the attempt of discussion, analysis of and theorization on this colonial domination and exploitation can not be unilinear and totalizing but multi-dimensional and pluralistic in nature.

138 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 Spivak also throws light on the relationship between postcolonialism and feminism. In postcolonial study it is thought that the women are oppressed by and under the domination of the men. Spivak thinks it appropriate or correct, but in addition to it what she wants to say is that the women in colony are doubly subjugated and doubly dominated and herein lies the difference between the European women and women in the colonies. European women are subjugated and dominated only by the patriarchy of the home country, but the women in the colonies are subjugated and dominated by the two fold patriarchy-one of the home country and the other of the imperial or colonial country. For this reason particularly, the European women and the European feminists cannot represent the women of the third world which was once colonized. The European women and the European feminists are immune from the experience of coloniality or colonial exploitation, domination and persecution. So the European feminist discourse, Spivak strongly observes, is not adequate, complete and universally acceptable, and, for this reason, she, in her paper entitled French Feminism in an International Frame, (1987), strongly criticizes 'About Chinese Women', an work by Julia Kristeva on the plight of the Chinese women. Identifying the marks of coloniality existent in Kristeva, Spivak argues that she has penned on the Chinese women without having an adequate understanding of their real plight or its history. Gayatri Chakraborty Spivak has highlighted on the problems of representation by the sub-altern. She, in her essay entitled Can the sub-altern Speak? (1988), has raised the question about whether the sub-altern can exhibit their vocal existence or can raise their voice signifying their existence or not. Spivak observes that the postcolonial theorists undergoing schooling in and orientation to western mode and system of so-called modern education and learning have come forward to raise the narrative of grief and suffering and also displeasure and agitation of the sub-altern women and they want, thus, to represent them. But she finds no fundamental sympathy and sensitivity immanent in western knowledge, culture and epistemology by virtue of which any scholar oriented to that knowledge and culture can reach the sub-altern become one of them and understand their voice. Rather Spivak finds insurmountable and huge gap between listening to and voicing of the sub-altern, because the curious scholar wishing to understand the sub-altern and to represent them and the sub-altern themselves are mutually 'other' to each other; and since they do not belong to the same knowing race and community, the people belonging to the sub-altern category or class are, as they appear, speechless and unrepresented. In this analysis, Spivak

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 139 also expresses her strong belief and opinion that the women within this sub-altern class or social category are more sub-altern than the normal sub-altern for the reason that the place where they live or exist in sub-altern society is shadelessly dark, a place absolutely unreachable for a narrator wishing to make enlightened, rational, human, modern and universal narrative.

10.3 Features of the Theory of Postcolonialism

Postcolonialism is a multi-dimensional and inter-disciplinary approach to the study of socio-economic, cultural and political phenomena. It consists of various thoughts and ideological waves like Marxism, postmodernism and post-structuralism. It is found that Marx, Gramsci, Lyotard, Foucault, Derrida and also the scholars of the sub-altern school have their varying direct and indirect impacts upon the writers developing postcolonial discursive theory or literary works along postcolonial orientation. So from varying and sometimes mutually unstructured and contending standpoint the postcolonial thinkers have discussed the psychology, values, thoughtful thinking reflected in education and learning, art and literature, habits and persuasions and effort of institution-building and political governance of the people and nations once colonized, and they put forward an unstructured theory we call postcolonialism. Secondly, postcolonialism broadly tends to reject modernist meta-narrative or grand narrative. According to the opinion of the postcolonial thinkers meta-narratives or grand narratives are prone to become fundamentalist, totalizing and hence seeks dominance over all kinds of socio-political, cultural and epistemological diversity and plurality. Most of the grand narratives in the sphere of education, culture and social and political thinking, the postcolonialist thinkers observe, are grown centering on the post-Enlightenment Europe, and, for this reason, postcolonialism is basically a critique of Eurocentrism which depicts Europe as matured, civilized, developed and progressive and denounces the non-western people and their society and civilization as immatured, barbaric, primitive and backward. Thirdly, postcolonialism and post-colonial literatures and other socio-political writings and analyses are directly and indirectly associated with anti-colonial protest and movement for decolonization. Frantz Fanon was the first powerful thinker who most formidably described how the western colonizers used to destroy education, knowledge, culture and civilization of the colonial subjects; and they valorized their own education and culture to legitimize and institutionalize imperial and colonial

140 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 rule. Black Skin White Masks and The Wretched of the Earth, two important works of Fanon had tremendous impacts on the subsequent proliferation of postcolonial writings of the latter days. Edward W. Said in his Orientalism and Culture and Imperialism in particular observes that European orientalism and European knowledge have humiliated and degraded deliberately the East. European knowledge and culture is inseminated by racialism and it expresses egoistic power to occupy the mental, psychological and cultural resources of people of the colonies. Western orientalism, Said opines, is the subtle design for establishing domination over society, polity, economy and mind of the East. It depicts the East as idle, idiotic, idyllic, impoverished and inferior while the West, is rational, progressive, humane and superior. In western orientalism, the West is the 'self' while the East is 'other'. The othering stereotypes tend to recognize and consider the East as similar and homogeneous. Said has criticized this totalizing European narrative on the society, culture and politics of the orient. Fourthly, it is reflected in the postcolonial writings that western 'othering' has failed to take into consideration the enormous heterogeneity and plurality as prevalent and implicit in 'other'. The scheme of western otherings unilaterally assumes that the West is ordered, rational, masculine and good and consistent while the East or the non-West is chaotic, irrational, feminine and bad and inconsistent. This grand narrative of cultural colonialism is an expedient means of colonization and institutionalization of colonization. Fifthly, the binary concept of centre and periphery has acquired importance in postcolonial thinking. In colonial education, culture and epistemology, Britain and France in particular, constitute the 'centre' and the whole of non-West, is known as the 'periphery'. Although the concept relating to centre-periphery division was grown with the colonization project of Britain in the seventeenth century, it becomes fashionable, powerful and far more relevant when English language and literature were introduced for 'civilizing' the natives in the nineteenth century for colonial reason. Colonial narratives presumably project the people in the centre as the natural occupant of political, economic, cultural and psychological resources of the people in the periphery by virtue of their racial and cultural superiority. And because of harsh and pervasive domination and hegemonic surveillance imposed upon people in the periphery their free voice is hardly heard and they get speechless. In her postcolonial writing Gayatri Chakraborty Spivak has offered a very interesting

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 141 discussion about how the sub-altern loses their ability to speak about themselves in a socio-cultural and political regime which is not their own but owned by the elite in the centre. Sixthly, the postcolonial socio-political and literary writings have sought to express and analyse the nature of western domination over non-western people of the colonies. Fanon, Said and Homi K. Bhaba extensively write on how the people of the colonies have accepted, rejected and resisted the cultural supremacy of the colonial powers. In their writings how the cultures of both the colonizers and the colonized came to each other and got mixed and hybridized in the process of acceptance, rejection and resistance are shown. The indigenous culture as transformed through mimicking the language, symbols, values and social practices of the westerners and also through the process of hybridization, is not, in the opinion of some of the thinkers of postcolonialism, altogether a signifier of the cultural void of the colonized. On the contrary, as Said has observed and Salman Rushdie has shown in his Midnight's Children, it has been and can be the signifier of challenge and protest on the part of the people of the colonies against the racist European colonial hegemony who use to brag to the non-westerners about the hollowed national fall-outs of European Enlightenment like rationality, modernity and sense of progress and humanity. Homi K. Bhaba in his Location of Culture observes that the process of hybridization and mimicry does not annihilate the culture of the indigenous people, rather it leads to identify and assert the presence of the colonized, and it restores the cultural forms and ideas which are lost or deformed during the period of long colonial domination. Unlike Ngugi wa Thiong'o who has gone for complete abrogation of alien languages and advised his Kenyan people to cultivate literature in local Kikuyu language, the writers like Rushdie are in favour of brightening the indigenous and pre-colonial cultural elements in the context of hybridized and mixed culture. The process of hybridization and mimicry leads to grow and is capable to grow such works that reconstruct the western discourse and compel the West to recognize this new construction of the East. It is, as these writers view, an important and effective means for cultural decolonization. Said and Homi Bhaba strongly think that the indigenous people or those who seek to represent these people have language and culture the indigenous people have adopted and used should have to be changed and reconstructed in view of local socio-political and cultural context and circumstances. This effort or the outcome of this effort will facilitate the intervention of the East in the domain of the dominant discourse of the West and thus the prospect of

142 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 redevelopment of the history and content of the non-western traditions will be brightened in this process. This attempt taken or to be taken by the perceptible actors in the field history, literature, politics, art and culture is definitely an attempt of protest and resistance against cultural supremacy of the colonizers. This attempt decentres the centre and asserts the identity of the periphery. Seventhly, in postcolonial writings we are offered various binary ideas regarding the colonizers and the colonized. These novel ideas indicate the mutually oppositional relationship between these two socio-political and cultural categories and reflect their relative status, identity and position as determined by the notion of colonialism and its culture. In the field of colonialism and colonial ideas the colonizer West and/or the westerners are depicted as the 'self', civilized, matured, progressive, rational and superior while the colonized East and / or the non-westerners as immatured, barbaric, primitive, backward, aberrant and inferior. These binaries express the antagonistic relationships particularly the colonizers built or constructed to convey their habitual hatred towards and dominance over the colonized. Eighthly, rewriting and reconstruction of history, literary works and discourses is an important feature of postcolonialism. The River Between (1965) of Ngugi is the reconstruction of Heart of Darkness by Joseph Conrad (1899). In India, Partha Chatterjee, Amitava Ghosh and many other scholars-writers have made such attempt which is considered as a significant means for cultural decolonization. Following this trend of postcolonial rewriting of classical narratives, Pompero and Calibon of Tempest by William Shakespeare have been transformed in the context of decolonization process in Africa and Caribbean region during 1960s and 70s into representative of alien rule and indigenous inhabitant from their respective original identity as depicted in original text. Ninthly, postcolonial explanation have their continuing impact upon explaining and analysing the nature and characteristics of various socio-economic and political conflicts and contradictions exist at different levels particularly of the societies belonging to the third world nation-states. Postcolonial perspective is also relevant in explaining the nature and dynamics of political relations among rich and the poor states. Finally, postcolonial thought has been an obvious powerful inspiration for anti-colonial nationalism and anti colonial movement of the countries once colonized and now belonging to the third world. The multi-cultural and pluralist consciousness as

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 143 implicit in postcolonial thinking contains the power to guide the states now independent to fight against unequal distribution of global power and totalizing agenda of economic globalization sponsored by the big capitalist states seeking to destroy the autonomous identity and existential plurality upon which human civilization is based.

10.4 Limitations of Postcolonial Perspective

Postcolonialism or postcolonial perspective has been criticized by some scholars like Robert Young, Aijaz Ahmed and a few others. The main allegations against postcolonialism we will now discuss. First of all, this theoretical perspective have tried to put emphasis on the political and cultural relationship between the European colonizer nations and the non-European countries once colonized on the basis of two important notions of dominance and subordination. But this theory is consistently indifferent to give emphasis on the commitment of the subjugated and unfree nations and on their stiff and difficult struggle for national liberation and for establishing 'swaraj' for them. Postcolonialism lacks in representing the narrative of multi-dimensional exploitation, pain and suffering out of oppression and persecution of the nations under the pressure of colonialism and neo-colonialism. This perspective does have no inspiration for the basic change of the socio-economic and political condition of poor people in the poor nations in particular. This theory has failed to become a material force as it fails to grip the masses. Secondly, the critics are of opinion that the western colonial powers did not always regard the non-western people as culturally 'other'; rather they regard them as stiff political opponents as and when they had faced their countervailing attack for autonomy and independence. Postcolonialism is not thus serious about incorporating the revolutionary intent, strong determination and resistance of the colonized 'subjects' against the colonial 'masters'. Thirdly, the postcolonial theory is no any well-knit, structured and systematic perspective with definite message either. The protagonists and proponents of this theory are influenced by several ideological systems sometimes contending one another. Apart from it, several diversified concepts and experiences grown from the several contexts of colonization and decolonialization, the proponents have used to explain their specific position in regard to the content of this theory. It results in making this theory a bit complex for students of social and political theory.

144 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 Fourthly, postcolonial theory contains an explanation of the relationship of conflict and contradiction exist between capitalist and the former colonial powers on the one hand and the countries belonging to the third world on the other. But this explanation, as some of the critics observe, carries no any new idea; rather it may be regarded as an extension of the old Marxist theory of the relations of states found in international politics. Fifthly, the postcolonial writings or particularly the broad pattern of their presentation are western in nature. Mostly the higher education centres in the West are their epicentre and proponents, of course barring a few, some critics argue, have introduced and supported the assimilative ideas like hybridity, mimicry, in-betweenness etc, in this theory and in the agenda of decolonization for the purpose of getting them included into or connected with the western academia. So, on the question of extinction of imperialism and colonialism and of retrieval and reestablishment of the glorious history, tradition, culture and civilization of the indigenous people this theory is not active; nor this theory talks about the needs of the people of the non- West to develop competitive attitude, skill and productivity for the purpose of their empowerment and progress. Despite the above criticism against the postcolonial theory, we cannot altogether deny its importance. The effort it has taken to unearth and explicate the nature of cultural domination of colonialism and continuing colonialism is really significant. Distinctly this theory has shown that the occupation of mind and culture of people could weaken them and this act gets them subservient to and fervent follower of the ruler. In fact, despite various epistemological opinions and debates on the relationship between consciousness and social existence of man we find to exist in the field of social philosophy, some effective synergy between the two requires of recognition. In the context of both colonization and decolonization, several thinkers and writers of postcolonialism have discussed this subject extensively. 10.5 Summing Up Postcolonialism is a recent critical perspective in the study of political theory. Several thinkers and writers of postcolonialism like Frantz Fanon, Edward W. Said, Homi K. Bhaba, Gayatri Chakraborty Spivak and many others, despite diverse orientations among them, have tried to describe their broad argument within the framework of post colonialism.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 145 Limitations of the in that the West, and the experience of the colonial period, had tried to control and occupy the realm of mind, psychology, language and culture of the colonized for the purpose of institutionalizing the colonial rule and domination. This rule and domination have their continuing impact upon the people of the former colonies which now acquired statehood. Unearthing the ideological disguises behind colonization and relative significance of the process like hybridization and mimicry having their direct and indirect impact on decolonization are discussed extensively in this theory from various epistemological standpoints. However, some critics have identified certain limitations and this theory has rediscovers the fact that those who rule construct ideologies or discourses manufacturing consent in favour of the rulers. 10.6 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. How did the West expand psychological and cultural domination over the East? Answer the question from the postcolonial perspective of political theory. 2. Make an estimate of the contribution of Edward Said to the development of postcolonial perspective. 3. Make an assesment of the postcolonial ideas of Homi K. Bhaba. 4. Discuss the general characteristics of postcolonial theory. Long Questions : 1. Discuss the contributions of Fanan and Eduard said to the development of post colonial theroy. 2. Point out the limitations of the postcolonial perspective. Short Questions : 1. What the central theme of postcolonialism? 2. How did Frantz Fanon develop the theory of postcolonialism?

Indeed, modern democracy seems to be a gift of modern society. Modern democracy along with its different forms spread to different parts of the world with the breakdown of pre-modern societies. Elected representatives, Representative assemblies and representative governments, recognition of peoples' democratic rights, rule of law, sovereignty of parliaments, separation powers and independence of judiciary, freedom of the press—all these signify arrival of and firm foot-hold of modern democracies.

However, the concept of democracy is not a totally new and unknown concept in pre-modern times and an exclusive contribution of modern era. It actually appeared in pre-modern societies also. The term 'democracy' first appeared in ancient Greek political and philosophical thought and its first formal expression was found in the city-state of Athens during classical antiquity. But again, invention and usage of the term 'democracy' firstly in ancient Athens does not imply its non- existence in pre-Athenian period. In its rudimentary form democracy was found in the pre-historical period. It may sound strange but the fact is that scholars have noticed existence of democracy as a form of social decision-making in primitive societies. The first form of democracy in human history is actually primitive democracy. Primitive democracy is that form of democracy that was prevalent among the primitive tribals. Actually primitive democracy was not particular form of state rule with any formal structure of debate and decision-making. Rather it signified essence of democracy in the normal day-to-day lives of the primitive people. Primitive tribal societies were marked by equality, non-subjection to other men and external authorities, participatory decision-making processes, rule of unanimity-based decisions, enforcement of decisions only by customs or general consent etc. Unlike political democracies of ancient Greek or modern periods, the decisions of the class or tribe were made by all adult members of the community and the decisions taken collectively by all adult members of the community were enforced only by custom or general consent. For these reasons, George Novack has rightly observed that "In its widest sense, democracy is as old as the first forms of human society". 11.3 Ancient Democracy The idea of democracy was not even unknown to the ancient people of either China or India. In ancient China a persons named Zho emphasized on the importance of people and Sun Yat-Sen envisioned a republic for India. In ancient India early form of democracy was actualised through the republics. Gana or a Sangha (such as Buddhist Sangha) Sreni, Puga, or Vrata are different forms of republican politics that existed in ancient India. Although monarchy was the widely prevalent and normal form of the state, still democracy, more particularly, democratic form of institutions were not unknown in ancient India.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 151 Democracy as a form of state rule is supposed to be a Greek invention. Democracy is in origin a Greek word. The word 'democracy' is actually composed of two words--One is 'demos' which means the whole citizen body living within a particular polis, or city-state and the other one is 'Kratos' which means either 'power' or 'rule'. In this sense democracy becomes rule of the people. It may be mentioned here that about 422 B.C. Cleon said: "...That shall be democratic which shall be of the people, by the people, for the people". It is usually thought that democracy was by origin an European concept as it is believed to have originated in ancient Greek city-state of Athens. Athens is believed to be the birthplace of democracy. Actually it was not Athens but Chios in Ionia which was the first Greek city to tread the path to democracy and that was in as early as in the second quarter of the sixth century B.C. There were free institutions in Chios between 575-550 B.C. There existed some kind of democratic norms and free institutions in Chios. The desire for democracy which found feeble expression in Chios in the sixth century B.C., got a solid foothold in Athens in the 5th century B.C. The Greek city- state of Athens (which also included both Athens and Attica) may be described as the first known democracy in the world. From the 9th to the 5th centuries B.C., Athens completed the full cycle from monarchy to democracy. In this process the power of the nobility was broken up and developed a political system based on practice of adopting and enacting legislation and executive bill through democratic procedures. Athenian statesman Solon laid the foundation for Athenian democracy. Solonian reforms ensured the rights of all Athenian citizens to participate in Assembly (Ecclesia) meetings. All citizens were entitled to attend the general Assembly, which became the sovereign body, entitled to pass laws and decrees, elect officials, and hear appeals from the most important decisions of the courts. Every citizen was entitled to attend and speak at its meetings. Decisions were taken through voting either by show of hands or by secret ballot. Another democratic body was the Boule. It was the official executive body. It was a group of 500 men. 50 from each of ten Athenian tribes, who served on the Council for one year. It met every day. Its function was of supervisory nature. The Boule was less powerful than the Assembly but more dignified than the Assembly. Notable features of the Athenian democracy were its deliberative and participatory nature. It was deliberative democracy in the sense that there existed in the Ecclesia (Assembly) free atmosphere of public discussion and lively debate both on domestic

152 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 and foreign policies. At the same time, it was a particular form of participatory democracy. Participatory democracy means that particular form of democracy where citizens can directly participate in the decision-making processes of the state. As R. H. Soltan has observed in his Introduction of Politics : "The Greek city-states were indeed democratic in the participation of all citizens, not only in the election of officials but in the daily routine of administration and justice...". The Athenian democracy was indeed a vibrant, direct and participatory democracy. S. Hornblower, in an essay entitled Creation and Development of Democratic Institutions in Ancient Greek, has explained peculiarity of the system of participatory democracy as developed and prevailed in Athens. He said: "What resulted was a system of participatory democracy which combined a complexity and sophistication of political detail on the one hand (including a very severe attitude to individual accountability), with the principle of almost total amateurism in the other, in a marriage which remains unprecedented to this day." The type of democracy prevalent in ancient Greek city-states especially in Athens had some salient features. Firstly, unlike the primitive democracy, it was political democracy. Political democracy arose by way of doing away with primeval democracy. As regards political democracy it may be said as George Novack has pointed out : "Political democracy is a form of state rule--and the state is a product of the cleavage of society into opposing classes." Secondly democracy in Greek city-states especially the Athenian democracy was participatory in nature and marked by participation of all freeman in the common affairs of the city-states. Thirdly, it was deliberative in nature, in the sense, freedom was attempted and it was marked by an atmosphere of free discussion to arrive at public decisions. Fourthly, there was general respect for laws and for the established procedures of the community. Fifthly, it was based on some basic democratic ideas and ideals. The Athenian political ideals were active citizenship, equality among citizens, liberty, respect for the laws and justice and politics as a collective and rational enterprise. Sixthly, at the base of all these features, there remained a general sense and urge for collectively, cohesiveness and solidarity. Actually, in Athenian democracy, public decisions were collectively taken. The purpose of political participation and taking part in the debates in the Assembly by the citizens (i.e. freeman) was to achieve cohesiveness and solidarity. However, its limitations cannot be overlooked. Although its deliberative and participatory nature have been overemphasized overlooking the other side of the coin. As a matter of fact, the right to participate in the election of officials and in the daily routine of administration of justice were confined among a small number of

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 153 citizens, excluding 'foreigners' (i.e. fellow Greeks from other communities), and slaves. Pointing out this aspect of the Athenian democracy Prof. S. Mukherjee and Prof. S. Ramaswamy have said : "It is argued that the Athenian democracy was essentially incomplete and exclusive for it excluded women, resident aliens (metics) and slaves from the democratic process and treated few alone as free". One particular limitation was its class nature. The Athenian society was a slave society as slavery was prevalent there. Most importantly, slaves, an integral part of the then Athenian society, were excluded from all kinds of political participation. Actually, they were deprived from all kinds of basic human rights. It was actually a democracy of the so called 'free' people of the society and as such a truncated form of democracy. According to Aristotle, it was based on false assumption of equality. Both Pericles and Aristotle defined it as the supremacy of the many over the few. Decline of the Athenian polis and the rise of Rome did not make much headway in the direction of development of democratic political system. The Romans initially embraced Athenian democratic principles. Although Roman political system was not purely democratic, however, the Senate, the Council (Councilum) and the Assembly were important political institutions of ancient Rome. Rome's contribution was confined in laying the ground-work for a system of civil and criminal law, establishment of a universal code of law, granting citizenship rights to the slaves etc. Although the Roman's invented the idea of secret ballot, the Romans could not lay the foundation of a real democracy. Authoritarianism was more pronounced in the Roman political tradition. The participation of citizens in the governmental process was only formal. The Roman political system, rather than being purely democratic, was, in reality, a mixture of kingship, aristocracy and democracy. Thus, the Romans did not make much contribution to the development of the concept democracy as was noticed in the case of Greeks. Democracy in Greece in general and in Athens in particular was incomplete and exclusive in nature. Still, they are remembered as "historical forerunner of all subsequent democracies in the world". As Antony Arblaster observes : "For the Greeks did not merely invent the concept of democracy. The concept was devised, or evolved, to describe an evolving reality--the kind of city-state in which the citizen body did actually govern itself." 11.4 Classical Democracy Modern democracy is, as opposed to ancient democracy, a newer form of democracy which originated and took shape in a new social context. Two distinct

154 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 phases of modern democracy may be identified. The first one may be regarded as classical democracy and the second one as contemporary democracy. Actually, classical democracy had originated in ancient Greece. Democracy was practiced as a form of state rule in the city-state of Athens in 5th Century B.C. But the modern form of classical democracy can be traced back to the 17th century Europe. New social context, newer type of socio-economic activities, urges and expectations led to the rise and growth of modern democratic thinking and associated political practices. Different revolutionary movements in Europe and America, rise of capitalism and rising expectations of the new social classes, arrival of new socio-political concepts like individualism, liberalism, individual freedom created favourable situation for the rise and growth of democracy both as a concept and as a form of state rule. Essentially, birth of modern democracy is a result of far reaching socio-economic changes as well as changes in outlook and world-view. In this context, it may be said that the Middle Ages in Europe is generally regarded as the 'Dark Age' in human history. It was marked by absence of free-thinking, individualism, rationality as well as democracy. The political thought of the middle ages was curious combination of theology and scholastic philosophy, universalism, the theory of Two Swords, tug-of-war between the ecclesiastical and the secular schools etc. Moreover, the theory of kingship, not the concept of democracy, gradually gained ground in the middle ages which, however, was a curious mixture of absolutism, contractualism and celestialism. However, there were sporadic existence of democratic governances in the middle ages particularly in the 'free' communes in the urban republics of medieval Italy, France, Germany and in Holland and Belgium. But these were exceptions to the overall undemocratic atmosphere of the middle ages Europe. The emergence of indirect, representative liberal democracy can be traced back from the mid-17th Century. It emerged from the ashes of absolutism in the late 17th century. Establishment of modern democracy took place over three hundred years starting from the rise of the Dutch Republic in the 16th century and extending upto the American Civil War of the mid-20th century. This development coincided with the formative stages of capitalism. Naturally there was a close interconnection between the formation and growth of capitalism and the arrival of modern liberal representative democracy. It was a period of great revolutionary changes. 'Six great upheavals' marked the period from the Dutch revolution to the American Civil War. George Novack in his

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 155 'Democracy and Revolution' has pointed out that "During the the formative stages of capitalism, six great upheavals marked the decisive steps in the forward march of the bourgeois-democratic revolution." These great upheavals were: (1) The Dutch Revolution of the late 16th century, (2) the English Revolution of the 17th century, (3) the Revolt of the American Colonists, (4) The French Revolution, (5) The February Revolution of 1948 in Europe, and (6) The American Civil War of the mid- 19th century. George Novack cites all these historically significant upheavals to substantiate his main point of view that : "Democracy was everywhere the offspring of revolution." Two interrelated processes helped developing modern democratic system of governance and its theoretical justification. The first one was the far-reaching socio- economic changes associated with the disintegration of feudalism and simultaneous growth of capitalism in Europe. These resulted in the creation of necessary preconditions for the origin and growth of modern democratic system. The second one was the contributions of several eminent political and philosophical thinkers whose writings served and supplied necessary justification for the germinating democratic system. Necessary doctrinal support for rising democracy could be traced in the writings of several thinkers like John Locke, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Montesquieu, David Hume, Adam Smith, Ricardo, Thomas Paine, Edmund Burke, Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, Thomas Jefferson and others. As against absolutism and divine source of royal authority, writers like George Buchanan, the most profound intellectual of sixteenth century Scotland, and others developed the concept of popular sovereignty. They contended that it was the people who were the ultimate source of law and that the Prince was created for the subjects. The doctrine of popular sovereignty laid the basis for democracy. Other important contributions of social and political thinkers enriching the concept of democracy were--faith in constitutionalism, rule of law, individual freedom and rights, toleration and right to dissent, pluralism, limited power, seperation of power, faith in liberalism and individualism. All these ideas which were associated with the growth of practice and cocept of democracy, however, did not appear at the same time and at the same place. The important contributions of the 17th century towards the development of the concept of democracy were individualism and liberalism. In the 17th century, the demand for democracy was intimately connected with individualism and liberalism. Individualism was a social theory favouring freedom of action for individual over collective or state

156 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 control. It was urgently needed for free enterprise and the pursuit of profit of rising middle classes and associated with laissez faire economy. Laissez faire economy needed abstention by government from interfering in the workings of the free market. Seventeenth century democracy was also intimately connected with a notion of liberalism. Liberalism was a political and moral philosophy. Liberalism was

laws. John Locke was an early exponent of liberalism and individualism. In his Second Treatise on Civil Government he argued for right to life, liberty and property as inseparable and natural rights of individual and the central liberal outlook were crystallized in his writings. Some revolutionary upheavals occurred in the 18th century. 18th century experienced revolutionary upheavals like the American Revolution (1776), the French Revolution (1789) and the Industrial Revolution (from 1760 onwards). Along with these revolutionary upheavals, scientific and technological changes of revolutionary nature resulted in the creation congenial atmosphere for the growth of democracy. Liberty, equality and fraternity—the motto of the French Revolution, attracted the masses. Montesquieu, Rousseau, Bentham became the chief exponents of democratic ideals in the 18th century. Montesquieu wanted to protect individual freedom from all powerful government and he articulated the theory of separation of powers between the three organs of government. He wanted a democratic and republican political system that would safeguard individual from tyrannical government. Rousseau felt that man was born free but everywhere he was in chains. He believed that good government must have the freedom of all its citizens as its most fundamental objectives. He argued for direct democracy and equality. Bentham, an English philosopher and political radical and an exponent of utilitarianism and legal positivism, was also a liberal democrat. His ideas influenced the development of welfarism and was based on egalitarian principles. As a result of their contributions along with the impact of the Industrial Revolution the French Revolution and the Enlightenment created atmosphere favourable to the growth of democratic thinking. The French revolution popularised the notion of the sovereignty of the people. The notion of the sovereignty of the people actually became the basis for the concept of 'popular sovereignty' which is thought to be a cardinal point of democratic ideology. Moreover, the Enlightenment of the late 17th and 18th centuries emphasized reason and individualism. Along with happiness, nature, progress, reason it also emphasized on liberty and individual freedom. The notions of rationality and individual freedom were associated with the notion of democracy.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 157 Advancement of Democracy in the 19th Century The 19th century experienced further advancement of democratic theory and practice. The notion of the sovereignty of the people which was popularized after the French Revolution, in the 19th century, took a concrete shape in the form of 'Popular Sovereignty'. Its intellectual roots can be traced back to 17th and 18th century European political philosophy but the American Revolution resulted in a government based on popular sovereignty. Here one finds the first large-scale establishment of this concept. Stephen A Douglas, a U. S. politician and leader of the Democratic Party espoused the cause of popular sovereignty in relation to the issue of slavery in the territories before the American Civil War (1861-1865). John Stuart Mill, the most influential British thinker of the 19th century, was also one of the most influential thinkers in the history of classical liberalism. Mill was a liberal individualist thinker and fully supportive of democracy. His considerations on Representative Government combined enthusiasm for democratic government with pessimism as to what democracy was likely to do. He supported representative government but his support was not unconditional. He considered it as ideally the best only because there is no other better alternative. He thought that despotism is a legitimate mode of government in dealing with barbarians. Mill's essay On Liberty is regarded as the most famous vindication of freedom of thought and freedom of conduct. However, Mill was afraid of majoritarianism. His regards for minority opinion and fear of mob mind and of the tyranny of the crowd is well-expressed in his On Liberty. As C.E.M. Joad points out : "He insisted upon the extension of this freedom to 'cranks', on the ground that, while nine cranks out of ten are harmless idiots, the tenth is of greater value to the mankind than all the normal men who seek to suppress him." Like John Stuart Mill, another 19th century thinker, Alexis de Tocqueville was also afraid of Majoritarianism. He observed that "... In America the majority raises formidable barriers around the liberty of opinion; within these barriers an author may write what he pleases, but woe to him if he goes beyond them." [Democracy in America, Volume-1, Chapter-XV, (1835)]. He emphasized participation as the hallmark of democracy and it is infinitely connected to the idea of political liberty.

11.5 Contemporary Democracy

Contemporary democracy has exhibited different, and sometimes contradictory, trends. On the one hand, there have been spread of democracy and democratic rights

158 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 and, on the other hand, repeated restrictions and threat to democratic societies. Some of the notable tendencies are: (1) Spread of democracy : In the 20th century democratic political system spread to the different corner of the Globe. It was not longer restricted to the continent of Europe and America. In the post-second World War period, it spread to other places particularly to the newly-independent states of Asia and Africa. For example, independent India could establish herself as the largest democracy in the world. (2) Extension of adult suffrage : In the 20th century, universal adult franchise was implemented in the true sense of the term. Previously it was universal manhood suffrage and that too was circumscribed by certain specific considerations. In different countries right to vote was not extended to women, propertyless, and non-white people. In Great Britain in 1918, in USA in 1920, in Australia in 1902, right of women to vote was guaranteed. In France until 1944, Greece until 1952, and Switzerland until 1971, women were not given the right to vote. In Australia, although recognised women's right to vote in 1902, did not extend the right to vote to Aboriginal Australian until 1962. In apartheid-era South Africa, non-white people could generally not vote in national election until the first multi-party election in 1994. In this process, adult franchise gradually turned to universal adult franchise by guaranteeing the right of almost all adults to vote in political election. (3) Human Rights : Universal Declaration of Human Rights is another important achievement of the 20th century. It can be considered as a milestone towards strengthening the process of spreading and uplifting democracy to a newer height. It was adopted and proclaimed by the United Nations General Assembly in 1948. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights contain 30 Article. In addition to that, the United Nation General Assembly in 1955 authorised two covenants, one relating to Civil and Political Rights, and other to Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. Both these Covenants became effective in January 1976. (4) Theoretical exercises : Democracy seems to be an ever-evolving process. It evolved both in practice and in theory. There have several attempts to theoretically apprehend the evolution of democracy in practice and to develop different conceptual frameworks.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 159 (a) One such attempt was made by Samuel Huntington who identified the three waves of democratization, Periodization of these three waves are : (i) 1828 to 1920; (ii) 1943 to 1962; and the last quarter of the 20th century. (b) Various concepts of democracy has been developed to conceptualize and depict the nature of democracy. Among these concepts mention may be made of (i) concept of procedural democracy; (ii) substantive democracy, (c) deliberative democracy, (d) sustainable democracy, etc. (c) Another trend of contemporary democratic thinking is construction of various models of democracy. Two distinct models of liberal democracy are protective democracy and developmental democracy. Jeremy Bentham and John Mill were the champions of protective democracy whereas the concept of developmental democracy is found in the writings of John Stuart Mill. There are few other models of democracy such as : (i) Participatory Model (two forms of this model are plebiscitary democracy and pluralist democracy; (ii) Model of Democratic Autonomy as propounded by David Held; and (iii) Marxist Model as found in various versions of Marxism. 11.6 Conclusion Our discussion on democracy suggests that democracy is an ever evolving process which evolved both in theory and practice. According different conceptual frameworks have been developed by scholars at different point of time to appreciate the true meaning of the concept. 11.7 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. government of the people, by the people and for the people. This a very naive definition of democracy. As against this, it is said that “Modern conceptions of democracy are based on the fundamental ideas of popular sovereignty and collective decision making which in which rulers through various ways are held to account by those over whom they rule.” Democracy recognises rights and freedoms of individual, respects and promotes human rights, establishes people’s control over decision-making process, brings transparency in public affairs. It is a form of government based on people’s participation and deliberation. It materialises the dream of representation of citizens and universal participation and ensures accountability of leaders. On the one hand, it provides a method to deal with differences and conflicts, on the other hand had, it establishes a responsible and accountable government. Transparency, peaceful conflict- management, correction of mistakes, establishment of a free and just society with enhanced dignity of citizens– –all these are achievable aims and objectives of a democratic society and governmental system. But democracy is not unmixed blessing. It has its own drawbacks. It is often said that democracy is the government of the innocent, incompetent and ignorant. Most of the citizens neither have interest nor the ability to grasp the complexities of modern democratic government. For successful working of a democratic government, some sort of idealism, involvement, deliberation and participation, courage, honesty and integrity, dedication, vigilance are required both from the leaders and the ordinary citizens which are however lacking in most cases. It can be fruitful if there is an unbiased and courageous media and independent judicial system unrelentingly committed to fair justice and democratic values. In the absense of these conditions, democratic system turns to be a very insipid and formal. Again, it may be unttable form of government. In a democracy leaders keep changing sides which leads to instability. This is which is termed as ‘horse-trading’ and ‘politics of Ayaram-Gayaram’ that leads to instability and may be viewed as a mockery of people’s verdict. In a democracy, decision-making process is rather cumbersome and time-consuming leading to delays even with regard to many vital issues of public life. Moreover, in a democracy, peoples’ representatives, elected for a definite term of period, are often detached from their electorates. Thus, decisions taken by the representative bodies do not always reflect the opinion and will of the citizens. Politics of power and money are great hindrances in the way of establishing people’s government.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 163 12.2 Debates on Democracy
Democracy has great appeal to almost all sections of people. It has a charming impact on ordinary people and politicians. Today, there is hardly anyone who disagrees with democracy. Still it is essentially a contested concept, and a matter of continuing debate. Since its arrival in ancient city state of Athens till today its forms, nature, end, diferent manifestations of democracy as well as its relation to other concepts and practices have been matters of continuing debate. Debates on democracy as a form of government emerged at its initial and classical Athenian phase of appearance. It was viwed by thinkers like Plato and Aristotle as a system of mob rule and as a perverted or degenerated of form of "rule by many". While Plato viewed democracy as a system of mob rule at the expense of wisdom and property,

Aristotle regarded democracy not as a normal form of government but as a perverted form of government. In his view, in normal form of government, power was exercised for common interest; whereas in perverted form of government, power was exercised for satisfying the interest of the ruling class. Therefore, as a form of government representing the 'rule of many' 'polity' was the normal form of government and 'democracy' was the perverted and degenerated form of government. Therefore, since the beginning of political thinking, the purpose of democracy as a desirable form of government was questioned and it was looked with disdain rather than with love. 12.3 Direct vs Indirect Democracy With the development of democracy as a form of government from its ancient Athenian phase to its contemporary phase, a basic debate that has raised its head related to forms or kinds of democracy. Two basic forms of democracy that have been noticed in its entire phase of development are : direct or pure, and indirect or representative. In the ancient city-states of Greece democracy was of direct type whereas in modern times indirect or representative democracy is prevalent. At the core of the debate between direct and indirect democracy lies the nature of relationship between the immediate sovereign and the ultimate sovereign. Direct democracy is based on the assumption that the people or the citizens of a particular state are sovereign in that state and that the sovereign power of the state should be exercised directly by themselves. They are the direct participants in the management of the public affairs. Direct democracy means power with the people and its exercise by them.

164 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 The direct form of democracy prevailed in the ancient greek city-state of Athens. As the first major effort to realise democracy Athens established a vibrant, direct and participatory democracy. It is true that direct democracy, in its truer sense, was prevalent among the primitive tribals. This was actually primitive democracy. But it is not considered a form of state. Democracy as a form of state rule is supposed to be a Greek invention. In this sense, i.e. in the sense of a form of state rule, direct democracy was first noticed in ancient Athens. Athenian democracy was the most celebrated form of direct participatory democracy and, in practice, it signified rule of the people, by the people. The focus of the Athenian democracy was on the participatory character of democracy. All major decisions were made by the assembly to which all citizens belonged. On the other hand, in indirect democracy people or citizens do not directly take part in the deliberative and decision-making process. Indirect democracy, like direct democracy, implies power with the people, but unlike direct democracy, its exercise is in the hands of representative chosen by them. Here people are treated not as immediate but as ultimate sovereign. The electorate in the ultimate repository of the sovereign power. Conceptually people are source of power and all powers belong to them. They wield those powers not directly but as electorates and through their elected representatives. It is the legislature, consisted of the elected representatives of the people, which formulates and expresses the will of the state. Thus, the ultimate sovereign i.e., the people transfer their sovereign power to the immediate sovereign, i.e., the elected representatives and the legislature which is composed of such representatives. Therefore, the debate between direct and indirect forms of democracy relates to the nature of relationship between the immediate and ultimate sovereign, the methods of exercise of sovereign power as well as respective merits and demerits of both forms of democracy. But the fact is that the conditions of the modern nation-states have led to the acceptance of indirect form of democracy as an unavoidable fact. Direct democracy is inconsistent with highly populated, large modern states. Modern democracy is representative democracy as the wills of the people are actualised through their elected representatives. Today people govern themselves, not by participating directly in the decision-making process, but by sending through election their representatives to the legislature, who, by turn, would act as the decision-makers. However, some of the methods of direct democracy such initiative, referendum and recall may be accommodated, to some extent in the broader framework of indirect form of democracy.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 165 But the act of representation of someone on behalf of others is not free from debate. J. J. Rousseau, a great proponent of direct involvement of people, was opposed to representative democracy. He insisted that to be represented is to give up—to alienate—powers that individuals alone can rightfully exercise, for him, it involves a form of slavery—a negation of 'will', one's capacity to exert influence. Similarly, D. H. Lawrence asked ... Who can represent me? – I am myself. I don't intend anybody to represent me'. On the other hand, arguments in favour of indirect representative democracy is generally supposed to be based on convenience rather its righteousness or propriety. As Anthony Arblaster has pointed out 'democrats like Paine originally put forward representation as a means of adopting the democratic principle to societies, such as the United States, which were too large to allow for personal participation by all their citizens'. He also says that 'For them it was expedient, almost a makeshift, and one that contained obvious dangers'. However, John Stuart Mill supported representative democracy not for its expediency or convenience but for its educative instrumental value. Thus, unlike Rousseau and others, John Stuart Mill considers representative democracy as capable of ensuring freedom and right of self-determination.

12.4 Democracy and People's Participation Another contentious issue is people's participation in democratic process. Does democracy require or can democracy ensure participation of all citizens of a particular nation-state, directly or through their elected representatives, in the deliberative and democratic decision-making process? This question arises as soon as democracy is regarded as majority rule which, by implication, makes redundant or unimportant opinion and participation of some people or group of people for the democratic governmental system to continue. Before the introduction of universal adult franchise many people particularly women, uneducated and poor were deprived of voting rights. Even after its introduction, disfranchisement in various forms results in deprivation of voting right to various sections of people in many countries. Again, due to various impediments and lack of incentive or inspiration, large sections of people do not feel interested to participate in the democratic process. Disillusionment, deprivation, threat, oppression, severe inequality and sub-human existence—all these negatively effect people's participation. Moreover, widely prevalent anti-democratic theories do not welcome people's participations in the democratic processes. Thinkers like J. S. Mill or Edmund Burke

166 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 looked at general masses with disdain as people were regarded as the common 'herd' or 'the swinish multitude'. In the modern elite theories there are deliberate attempt to keep the field of political decision-making restricted among the conflicting elitist groups. In this version of politics, mass politics is considered as anti- democratic. Walter Lippmann felt 'the need to protect the executive and judicial powers from the representative assemblies and from mass opinion...' Writers like Joseph Schumpeter, known as an eminent theorist of democratic elitism, has tried to restrict the scope of political participation in the actual decision-making process only to the elites of societies. The elitist theory of democracy bases itself on two basic arguments: one is the nature of the decision-making process and the other one is their concept of elitist effectiveness. Firstly, decision-making is described as a process of consensus of elite positions—i.e., negotiations among various groups. Secondly, the concept of elitist supremacy is supplemented by elite effectiveness. As Antony Arblaster has observed: "The core of elite theory was the contention that democracy, in the strict traditional sense of rule by the people, is impossible: all government is government by an elite, or at best one among a number of competing elites." It attempts to limit the role of 'the masses' within the political system and redefines democracy in such a way as to eliminate its traditional participatory aspirations. Attempts to restrict people's participation in political process is also based in other arguments which also have their origin in the elitist view of democracy. Joseph Schumpeter, in his attempt to redefine the concept of democracy, has actually undermined the participatory aspect of democracy. According to him; (a) democracy has no moral superiority as compared to other form of government and there is nothing about democracy that makes it desirable; (b) democracy is simply a 'political method' and not an end in itself. Therefore discrimination against some section of the population is not undemocratic; (c) The right to vote does not necessitate all adults in contemporary liberal societies to use this right or participate more directly in the political process; (d) as the masses are too irrational, emotional, parochial and 'primitive' to make good decision, therefore, the participation of the mass of the population is not a good idea. Actually, he is very critical of mass participation in politics. Hence, he concludes that government by the people is neither possible nor desirable. He drastically narrowed the conception of democracy. In his scheme of 'rational' selection of ruler through general elections the mass of people has little role to play on account of the proven ignorance, irrationality and apathy of the people.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 167 12.5 Means vs Ends There are several contending perceptions of democracy. Distinction between the minimal and maximal perceptions of democracy may be cited as one of such contending perceptions having relevance over ends-means debate on democracy. The minimal perception of democracy highlights the importance of the 'means'; whereas the maximal perception focuses both on the means and the ends of democracy. The minimal perception emphasises on institutions and procedures of democracy. People having this perception of democracy view democracy as a set of institutions and procedures encompassing free and fair elections, legislative assemblies, and constitutional government arising out of these. Their focus is on procedures such as fair elections, respect for human right and universal suffrage. But the maximal perception of democracy includes both means and ends of democracy. It does not confine discussion on democracy only on the periphery of means but also highlights the 'end' or 'outputs' such as economic equality, justice, fairness etc. Issues relating to working of democracy and how accountability of the elected representatives are ensured draw the attention of the minimal perceptionists. Therefore their focus is on the issues like civil and political right of citizens, universal suffrage and free, fair elections as well as accountability of the people's representatives. On the other hand, maximal perception of democracy emphasises, in addition to issues related with the 'means', on issues like equality of opportunity and outcome, social rights, policy, justice, fairness, responsiveness, public safety, elimination of corruption.

12.6 Procedural vs Substantive Another debate on democracy is connected with the procedural and the substantive conceptions of democracy. Although not entirely but to some extent, the debate regarding the procedural and the substantive conceptions of democracy is based on the arguments and the issues of the maximal and the minimal perceptions of democracy. The procedural democracy concentrate on mechanisms of democracy, whereas substantive democracy pertains to socially based value judgements. The concept of procedural democracy is concerned with the procedural aspects of democracy. To be more specific, it concentrate and emphasizes on the procedural aspects of democracy. Therefore, it deals with the formal aspects of democracy. From the procedural point of view, democracy is viewed purely as a set of institutions and mechanisms concerning holding of free and fair elections, formation of legislative

168 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 assemblies and constitutional governments, assuring accountability of the governments and elected representative and protecting rights and liberties of the citizens. Here procedure is more important than the substance of democracy. Democracy is viewed as a 'system of institutions' or an 'institutional system' and a mechanism to select 'the men who are able to do the deciding'. As a result, people are seen simply as 'producers of governments' – i.e., merely selectors who select who would govern them. The procedural theory or model of democracy is contrasted with the substantive theory or model of democracy. According to the substantive point of view, democracy is a society composed by truly equal citizens, who are politically engaged, tolerant of different opinions and ways of life, and have an equal voice in choosing their rulers and holding them accountable. As N. Joyal has pointed out "Democracy... should not be seen as confined to the sphere of state and government but also as the principle governing collective life in society. Substantive democracy pertains to socially based value judgements. The basic assumption of substantive democracy is that democracy must not merely be procedurally democratic but also be functionally democratic. The state is not merely set up as a democracy but it functions as one as well. It is a form of democracy that functions in the interest of the governed. Therefore, guaranteeing right to vote and allowing all citizens of age to vote is not enough. Rather what is necessary to qualify as a substantive democracy is the meaningful exercise of the equal rights of citizenship. This has to be guaranteed to all. It must ensure a truly equal opportunity to influence governmental decisions. Procedural democracy and substantive democracy—these two types of democracy are supposed to be opposite. Procedural democracy is regarded as formal democracy where the relevant forms of democracy exist but are not actually managed democratically. But substantive democracy is referred as a functional democracy. Procedural democracy emphasizes on free and fair elections, freedom of speech and expression, and the rule of law and its equal protection to all. But the proponents of substantive democracy argue that all these are necessary, but by no means sufficient. Merely securing legal and political equality is not enough. In a substantive democracy there must be truly equal opportunity to influence governmental decisions and democracy should be regarded as the principle governing collective life in society. In procedural democracy, in comparison to substantive democracy, people or citizens of the state is likely to have less influence. Actually it tries to restrict the scope of NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 169 political participations in the actual decision-making process only to the elites in society depriving the masses. In contrast to this, substantive democracy encourages equal participation of all groups in society in the political process.

12.7 Democracy and Human Rights The two concepts—democracy and human rights— have a variable degree of overlap with one another. It is usually assumed that democracy includes human rights. Democracy conceives of a society which not only protect and promote human rights but also makes elaborates arrangements of formal institutions for the protection and promotion of human rights. These two are inter-related, overlapping and one includes the other. However, there is no denying of the fact that tensions remain between theories of democracy and human rights over the degree to which one includes the other. Some writers argue that a right to democracy is a also a human right. At the basic conceptual level, these two goes hand in hand. Democratic system embodies human rights and the later is essential for the functioning of the former. One complements the other. This being the case, the problem, however, arises when it is seen from the perspectives of different theories of democracy. Different theories of democracy have different stands on human rights, although none of them completely overlook some or other aspects of human rights. Some of the important theories of democracy are, for example, (a) procedural democracy, (b) liberal democracy and (c) social democracy. These different theories of democracy incorporate different categories of human rights. As Todd Landman has pointed out (a) Procedural democracy incorporates political rights but not civil rights, economic, social, and cultural rights, (b) liberal democracy incorporates civil and political rights but not economic, social and cultural rights, and (c) social democracy incorporates civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights. It amplifies that procedural definition of democracy affords less place for human rights than social definition. The liberal definition of democracy stands in between them. Democracy means equality. But to be more specific it means only formal equality. Therefore, its commitment to all types of human rights and actualisation of all these rights for all of sections of people in society is not beyond question. Practically in all established democracies human rights of different sections of people are curbed and curtailed in varying degrees. The degrees to which enjoyment of those

170 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 rights are permissible are determined by various socio-economic and political parameters. Persecution on the basis of religious beliefs, political opinion and affiliation or ideological positions are not rare in today's world. As a result, democracy, instead of being a procedure and method of reflecting and acting on the basis of popular sovereignty and collective will actually act as a form of state armed with organised, systematic use of force against persons. Various sorts of electoral malpractices, bureaucratic apathies and indifferences, bias media coverage, unresponsive judicial system, repression and discrimination may, in effect, result in deprivation of human right to specific targeted sections of people. 12.8 Conclusion As a form of government, democracy appears superior to other form of government for protecting, respecting and fulfilling human rights obligations and human rights are accepted as legal and normative standard which judge the quality of human dignity. Democracy must aimed at the removal of differences and abolition of discrimination on the grounds of caste, race, ethnicity, gender and creed. Again in multi-religious, multilingual, multicultural society, it must respect diversity and plurality. Attempt at establishing uniformity and setting a particular religion, language, culture or particular version of nationalism and choice of path for development as norm for all sections of people is dangerous trend both for democracy and human rights. Of course, this aim may not be achieved in formal democratic society. This type of society which are devoid of or deprivators of human rights to a major sections of people may be regarded as formal, not actual, democratic society. Actually, this aim can not be achieved at the expense of human rights. 12.9 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. Write a note on debates on democracy 2. There is no single, uniform form of democracy. Actually, there are many forms of democracy. The forms of democracy is determined on the basis of the yardstick used to classify it. For example, on the basis of the nature of relationship between the immediate sovereign and the ultimate sovereign it may be classified into direct and indirect or representative democracy. In the former, the nature of relationship between the immediate sovereign and the ultimate sovereign coincides while in the latter they differs. In a direct democracy, the people directly participate and decide on legislature. The city-states of ancient greece perhaps best illustrate this type of

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 173 democracy. The citizens of the states were the direct participants in the management of the public affairs. Such system still exists in some very small provinces (cantons) of Switzerland. On the other hand, in an indirect or representative democracy, a clear distinction is made between the immediate sovereign and the ultimate sovereign. In this type of democracy, the citizens of the state do not directly participate and decide, but they merely elect their representatives to deliberate and decide on legislature. The citizens are merely electorate. They are the ultimate repository of the sovereign power; but, not they, but the legislature comprising of the representatives is the immediate sovereign. The elected representatives make laws on behalf of the people and in tune with public opinion. Indirect or representative democracy is the rule of day. A democratic form of government can also be classified as parliamentary or cabinet and presidential form of government. In a presidential form of democracy, like the united states of America, the President is directly elected by the people and he enjoys real powers of decision-making and execution. This form of democracy is based on generally on separation of powers between the legislature and the executive. The President of US is not accountable to the American Congress (the legislature). In a parliamentary form of government, real powers of decision-making lies with the parliament; and the President, the head of the state, is merely nominal or titular head as in India. In a parliamentary or cabinet system of government, the cabinet (the executive) is immediately and legally responsible to the legislature for its policies and acts. But, from broader socio-economic and ideological point of view, democracy can be classified into two basic forms—liberal democracy and socialist democracy. Liberal democracy refers to a political system in which individual rights, particularly property rights, are given special constitutional protection against infringements and its socio economic system is basically capitalist and non-egalitarian. On the other hand, socialist democracy presupposes socialist economy and equalitarian society and rule of the toiling masses. 13.2 From Liberalism to Liberal Democracy Liberal democracy is a combination of two, originally antithetical, principles— liberalism and democracy. It has a hybrid character. As Andrew Heywood has observed, "...

democracy. Actually, in their emerging phases their relations were not cordial and accommodative. Rather in their origins, both liberalism and democracy represented two different trends in political philosophy. Liberalism stood for individual, i.e. individual's rights, liberty and property; whereas democracy stood for collectivity, i.e. collective power in the form of majority rule. Liberalism is a political philosophy and also a programme of social action. It is difficult to define satisfactorily the term 'liberalism'. Rather, in the words of Max Lerner, liberalism is 'perhaps the most disputed terms of our generation. This is partly due to loose and arbitrary way the term liberalism has been used in political discussions and parlances. G. Sartori comments, "Liberalism is a concept so amorphous and changeable as to be left readily at the mercy of arbitrary stipulators". (Democratic Theory, p-366). Question arises as to whether is it a creed or definite doctrine or simply 'a faith', 'an attitude of mind' and a 'psychological attitude'? In a way, liberalism is associated with individual and individualism. Individual— his rights, freedom and liberty—occupies central place in liberalism and by the same token it emphasizes on freeing individual from state and government's control and repression. In Hacker's opinion, " It is a view of the individual, of the state, and of the relations between them". It defines relations between state and individual from the standpoint of individual. From this standpoint, liberalism acts as an organising principle of society, a policy of defining relations between state and individual and also a programme of social action. In Encyclopaedia Britannica it has been defined "as an idea committed to freedom as a method and policy in government as an organising principle in society, and a way of life for the individual and the community." Early liberals felt the need to free the people from authority of feudal lords and powers of the clergy as well as from the restrictions and repression of autocratic and authoritarian governments. Therefore, the idea of liberty occupies an important place in liberalism. As Derek Heater says: "Freedom is the quintessence of liberalism...." Still liberalism, which stood for 'free the people', however, did not favour democracy which stood for 'empowering the people'. But the concept of 'people' was used in very restricted sense meaning thereby only the owners of property or the propertied classes. The classical liberal theory was committed to the individual's right for unlimited acquisition of property. Therefore, right to individual property may be regarded as another 'quintessence' of liberalism. As a matter of fact, early liberal had 'fear of the many, the multitude, which is to be a recurring motif in the re-emergence of democracy in the modern era'. Actually they abhorred 'the beast with NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 175 many heads'. Therefore, they were concerned about using the concept 'popular sovereignty' in a very particular and restricted sense keeping in mind "the interest of the responsible and respectable, without placing an ideological weapon in the hands of 'the multitude'..." As a result, instead of welcoming democracy and implementing popular rule and accepting concept of popular sovereignty in its universalist sense, early liberalism rather had an ambivalence towards democracy. On the opposite, it was antidemocratic. As C. B. Macpherson in his Democratic Theory: Essays in Retrieval has observed: 'Until the nineteenth century liberal theory, like the liberal state, was not at all democratic, much of it was specifically antidemocratic'. Andrew Heywood has noted that '

But perception of liberals towards democracy changed with changing perspectives. Classical liberalism fostered capitalism and a free-market economy. It subscribed egoistic individualism and harboured a detest for popular rule, that is, rule of the multitude. But it was also forced to recognise the rise of a large working class. This, in turn, led to reorientation of outlook of the liberals and reorganization of system of governance accordingly. Thus, a liberal state, which did not begin as a democratic one, shook of its 'tear of the many, the multitude' and accepted democratic procedure as a method of governance. This journey results in the arrival of a new political concept and new a political order– Liberal Democracy. Thus originally two antithetical principles come to be mingled in and gave birth of a powerful, longlasting political philosophy and a particular form of government. Now, 'Liberal ideas and denrocratic procedures have gradually become interowven'. Although liberal state did not begin as a democratic one, however, it gradually became a democratic state. Extension of voting rights to the ever-increasing working class and women paved the way for a liberal state to be regarded as democratic state, This new state-form ushering a new method to arrive at collective decisions and prescribing a set of values and behaviour came to be known as liberal democracy or liberal democratic state. Thus a liberal state which intially did not begin as a democratic state, became gradually a democratic state 'with the widening of suffrage bringing in the working class and women into the political fray, and by improved techniques of participation.' Liberal democracy has to be contrasted from traditional democracy. It has rightly been commented by Professor Sobhanlal Dutta Gupta: "In terms of its arrival

176 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 democracy in the classical sense is as old as the ancient Greeks in 5th century B.C. "6 While democracy is an old concept; liberalism is relatively recent one. Again, at the time of its arrival linalism was not associated with democracy; rather there was an antithetical relations between them. Misgivings about democracy among the early liberals gradually gave way to positive exposition towards democracy. "

By the end of the twentieth century, liberal democracy appeared to have vanquished its major rivals'.

By the term 'major rivals' he particularly means other models of democratic rule. 13.3 Liberal Democracy: Main Principles and Characteristics Liberal democracy is based on certain main principles and identifiable on the basis of certain characteristics. B. Goodwin in his book Using Political Ideas mentions few ideas as the basis of liberal democracy. The ideas she mentions as the basis of liberal democracy are: (a) supremacy of the people; (b) the consent of the governed as the basis of legitimacy; (c) the rule of law; (d) the existence of a common good of public interest; (e) the value of the individual as a rational moral active citizen; and (f) equal rights for all individuals. Peter H. Merkle, in his Political Continuity and Change, has enumerated four principles of liberal democracy. These are: (a) government by discussion; (b) majority rule; (c) recognition of minority rights; and (d) constitutional government. These basic principles, to some extent, characterise the nature of liberal democracy. But these are not enough. In additions these, there are certain institutions and procedures which are considered to be essential characteristics of liberal democracy. Some of the charateristics features of leberal democracy are: (a) recognition and existence of individuals rights and freedom of expression; (b) universal adult suffrage; (c) periodic elections based on universal adult franchise; (d) competitive political parties; (e) representative government; (f) openness of public offices to all; (g) a system of political checks and balances; (g) independence of the judiciary; (h) freedom of the press. Therefore, liberal democracy is not simply a political idea or a political philosophy. It is a way of life. Moreover now-a-days it is seen as a political system. As a political NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 177 system, liberal democracy exhibits the above-mentioned characteristics. Profesor Alan R. Ball in his Modern Politics and Government (p.43) has enumerated 7-fold characteristics of the liberal democratic system. According to Ball these are: 1. There exists more than one political party competing for political powers. 2. Avenue for political power is open, that is, there exists open competetion for power which is, however, conducted on the basis of established and accepted forms of procedure. 3. Entry and recruitment to positions of political power are relatively open. 4. Periodic elections are held on the basis of universal adult franchise. 5. There exists various types of voluntary associations (like pressure groups, interest groups) which are free from close governmental control and they are able to operate to influence government decisions. 6. Civil liberties are recognised and protected as well as mass media are free from governmental control. 7. There exists some form of separation of powers among three branches (executive, legislative and judicial) of government and the judiciary remains independent of the other organs (both executive and legislature) of government. We may say that popular sovereignty, representative government, open competition for political power, existence of more than one political parties and a host of autonomous private associations (i.e. interest and pressure groups), individuals rights and freedoms specifically right to dissent, separation of powers and independence of judiciary are some of the essential characteristics of liberal democratic political system. Many other characteristics may be added to this list. But, according to Andrew Heywood, three central features are: "

of capitalist organizations of economic life." 9 13.4 Models of Democracy Liberal democracy is composed of two components—liberal and democratic. Democracy has an instrumental value to the liberals. But there is no unanimity among the liberals in respect of value they attach to democracy. Some liberals are concerned about its 'protective' value and role, while some others are concerned about its 'developmental' value and role. As a result different models of liberal democracy have appeared in the political discourse. Prof. David Held in his Models of Democracy has identified two variants of liberal democratic model. These are known as 'protective' and 'developmental' models. Outside the ambit of these two variants of liberal democratic model, he also identified another model which is known as 'participatory' model of democracy. Actually, there are two basic models of democracy—the liberal and participatory models. And the liberal model has two variants—protective and developmental. Protective Democracy Early liberal like Jeremy Bentham and James Mill were the champions of protective democracy. They were concerned about protection of citizens from despotic use of political power. For them, democracy was meant to be protective, in the sense that it was to protect the rights of citizens and safeguard them from the tyranny of state power. As David Held has observed that 'Principle(s) of justification' of protective democracy is: "Citizens require protection from the governors, as well as from each other, to ensure that those who govern pursue policies that are commensurate with citizens interests as a whole". 10 Rudimentary ideas of protective democracy are traceable in the writings of John Locke and Montesquieu. However, the ideas of political thinkers of the 17th and 18th century were not fully developed. James Madison, Jeremy Bentham and James Mill may be regarded as the main exponents of protective democracy. It is true that liberalism emerged in the context of the transition from feudalism to capitalism. But protective variant of liberal democratic model developed in the late 18th and early 19th century in the writings of Bentham, Madison and James Mill. Actually classical exposition of protective democracy could be found in their writings.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 179 These early liberals were reluctant democrats, more liberal than democrats and concerned more about protecting individual, that is, their rights and interests from tyranny of state powers. In their opinion, democracy was required to protect citizens from despotic use of political power, and hence, they sought to put limits on the absolute powers of the monarchs and the feudal aristocrats or other groups. Citizens require protection not only from the governors but also from each other. Protective democracy has some key features. These are: (a) Sovereignty of the people executable through their representatives; (b) regular elections through secret ballot, open political competition between factions, potential leaders or political parties; majority rule and accountability of those who govern; (c) impersonal and legally circumscribed state powers along with division of powers among the executive, the legislature and the judiciary; (d) centrality of constitutionalism guaranteeing freedom from arbitrary treatment, equality before the law and recognition of other political and civil rights like freedom of speech, expression, association, voting and belief; (e) separation of state from civil society. Thus, protective democracy is based on the idea of popular sovereignty, electoral politics and representative democracy, legally limited state powers, separation of powers among different departments of government, recognition of citizens rights and liberties, separation of state and civil society or the public and private life of individuals. Modern version Modern version of protective democracy is found in the writings of Robert Nozick and Friedrich Hayek. They are known as the New Right and their views are also known as neo-liberals or neo-conservatism. Both Nozick and Hayek have expressed their apprehension about 'an ever more intrusive welfare state in the west'. In the opinion of Nozick the proper role of the liberal democratic state in the future should only be a 'protective agency' against force, theft, fraud and the violation of contracts. In essence, he argued for 'minimal state'. Hayek saw fundamental dangers in the dynamics of contemporary 'mass democracy'. In his opinion coercive political power (resulting from 'the unrestricted will of the majority') can be contained if, and only if, the 'Rule of Law' is respected. In brief, as David Held has pointed out." At root, the New Right has been concerned to advance the cause of 'liberalism' against 'democracy' by limiting the democratic use of state powers.

180 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 Developmental Model Other model of liberal-democratic theory is known as Developmental Model. David Held constructs his concept of developmental model on the basis of writings of John Stuart Mill. Not protective, but the developmental aspect of democracy was more important to Mill as, he thought, it has positive bearing on the free development of individuality. However in this regard C. B. Macpherson attributes credit also to T. H. Green. In his opinion, both John Stuart Mill and T. H. Green wanted democratic theory to maximize men's developmental power. But it was mainly John Stuart Mill, who being a clear advocate of democracy, understood democracy as a system which allows for the development of an individual's personality. David Held mentions that Macpherson in his The Life and Times of Liberal Democracy points out that like Rousseau and Wollstonecraft before him, Mill conceived of democratic politics as a prime mechanism of moral development 11. David Held himself observes that : "Liberal democratic or representative government was important for him, not just because it established boundaries for the purpose of individual satisfaction, but because it was an important aspect of the free development of individuality". 12 Aims and Features The aim of developmental democracy is to create an informed, committed and developing citizenry. Here promotion of individual interests are not of primary importance although its necessity is not completely ignored. Developmental democracy is based on the assumption that participation and involvement in political life is essential for the 'highest and harmonious' expansion of individual capacities. As opposed to protective democracy, which aims to protect the rights and interests of citizens and safeguard them from the tyranny of state power; developmental democracy is more concerned for the development of an individual's personality. Key features of developmental democracy are: (a) popular sovereignty with a universal franchise; (b) representative government on the basis of elected leadership, regular elections, secret ballot etc; (c) constitutional checks, limitations and division of state power; (d) clear demarcation and separation of functions between legislature and executive and (e) citizen's involvement and participation in political life. All these features are aimed to ensure promotion of individual rights and freedoms, which, in turn, help the pursuit of individually chosen 'life plan' and develop the intellectual talents of people.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 181 Unlike Bentham and James Mill who were reluctant democrats, Mill was a clear advocate of democracy. So for him, liberal democracy or representative government and political involvement and participation of people in political life were essential for the free development of individuality and for their moral development. The 'highest and harmonious' expansion of individual capacities was his central concern. As Weyper has said. "Mill is a democrat above all not because he believes that democracy makes men happier, but because he is convinced that it makes them better". 13.5 Socialist Democracy There is a good deal of confusion about the relationship between socialism and democracy. Their relationship has been debated, defended, but ultimately defies any satisfactory answer. Two questions that relate to this topic is: (a) is socialism compatible with democracy?; and (b) is socialism possible without democracy? These two issues can be addressed and their relationship can be explained both from the theoretical and practical point of view. Again, there is a great deal of confusion regarding what is socialism as there are varieties of socialism like utopian socialism, guild-socialism, fabianism, democratic socialism etc. As we are not dealing with the subtle differences among these varieties of socialism, we may remain content with some fundamental characteristics that all forms of socialism share. Michael Newman has pointed out three fundamental characteristics of all forms of socialism. These are, according to him: 13 "In my view, the most fundamental characteristic of socialism is its commitment to the creation of an egalitarian society. "A second, and closely related, common feature of socialism has been a belief in the possibility of constructing an alternative egalitarian system based on the values and cooperation. "Finally, most socialists have been convinced that it is possible to make significant changes in the world through conscious human agency." (Socialism: A Very Short Introduction). Socialism is usually thought to be not only incompatible with democracy but also basically an anti democratic ideology. While liberal democracy emphasizes on liberty and individualism, socialism emphasizes on egalitarianism and collective

182 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 effort and cooperation. Critics of socialism usually hold that equality and liberty are two contradictory things and socialism, by emphasizing on preeminence of equality, actually ignores the importance of liberty and individual freedom. To them, "liberty matters more than equality". It is held that socialism is basically anti-liberty, anti- freedom, and that is why, anti-democratic. This view has ofcourse been reinforced by Soviet practice during Stalinism and Neo-Stalinism (or Khrushchovism) and Chinese practice during Mao-era and post-Mao-era. But the advocates of socialism, particularly the marxists, do not admit that socialism is incompatible with democracy. Rather, they belive that socialism immensely expands the horizon of democracy. Under the liberal, in the marxist termonology 'bougeois', democracy, it remains confined within narrow, limited sphere; whereas under socialism it becomes meaningful and actual to the larger section of people. The advocates of socialism believe that 'democracy means equality' and democracy remains narrow and incomplete without equality. Socialism overcomes formal equality of liberal democracy and it paves the way for advancenest from formal equality to actual equality. Thus expanding and actualizing the process of democratization, socialism builds newer and developed form of democracy as distinguished from liberal democracy. Salient features of Socialist Democracy: Socialist political system has been noticed in the past in earstwhile Soviet Union and various East Emopean states as well as it is still, at least theoretically, found in Prople's Republic of China. Inspite variations and subtle differences among these states, certain general features of socialist democracy as found in all of them may be mentioned in brief. These are: (a) Socialist democracy is based on basic premises of socialism. Concept of democracy is inseparable from the basic principles of socialisms : equality, particularly economic equality, protection and development of toiling people's interests, socialist ownership of the means of production. Establishment of socialism through goal-oriented socio-economic development works as the bases and direction of democracy under socialism. (b) Socialist democracy bases itself on concept of popular sovereignty. People is thought to be the sources of state power. Whether it was former Soviet Union or it is present People's Republic of China coustitutionally

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 183 all power belong to the people. They exercise this power through their representatives bodies like the Soviets of People's Deputies or the National People's Congress. (c) The basis of socialist democracy is equality. Socialism emphasizes on both legal and economic equality. Socialist democracy recognises equality before the law, without distriction of origin, social or property status, race or nationality, sex, education, language, attitude to religion etc. It specially emphasises on economic equality without which it is hold that both democracy and socialism remain meaningless and ineffective. (d) Socialist democracy recognizes basic rights and freedoms of the individual. It is said that the rights and freedoms of the individual constitute an organic element of socialist democracy. The members of socialist society enjoy various socio-economic and cultural rights, political rights and freedoms, and persopnal freedoms. Such rights and freedom enable them freely to develop and execute the abilities and talents they are endowed with as well as to participate in various spheres of social and state activities. It is also claimed that equallly active measures are taken to protect the individual and his rights and freedoms. (e) Another aspect of socialist democracy is socialist law and morality Socialist laws and legislation are intended to enable the individual to enjoy his rights and freedoms to the fullest extent and at the some time impressing on him the need to fulfil his obligation towards society. Law embraces the principles of socialist morality. These two are, though not completely identical, close to one another. (f) Socialist democracy is usually associated with single party system and single ideology. Experiences of various socialist systems found in different parts of the world show that socialist political systems do not allow more than one political party to function. Existence and dominance of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU) as the only political party in the earstwlite Soviet Union and the Communist Party of China (CPC) in People's Republic of China are cases in point. It is claimed that as both the socialist states and their communist parties represent the aims, aspirations and interests of the toiling masses; therefore, people can exercise their democratic rights through

184 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 them and enjoy their freedoms. Working of the organisational principle of democratic centralism both at the state and at party level provides scope for democratic activities, and exercise of democratic rights in consonance with the principles of socialism. (g) At the economic level, socialist democracy is associated with socialization of the means of production. It is pertinent to point out here that one of the cardinal points of liberal democracy is to protect private property of individual and it is considered as the very basis of liberal democracy. Private property is thought to be sacrosanct and inseparable from individual and all rights and freedoms are aimed at protecting and promoting it. But socialism takes a different view. It takes away private property in the means of production. In socialist view, this step furthers the bases of equality and thus enable larger number of people to enjoy and practice their legally and constitutionally recognized rights and freedoms. It is claimed that by way of doing away with private property in the means of production, which is seen as means for oppression and exploitation, socialism actually makes democracy meaningful and effective and paves the way for more developed and larger democracy. 13.6 Conclusion Though democracy is most popular and familiar system of government yet over time it assumes a complication nature. This makes it a highly contested concept. However, despite the forms it takes, it cannot be denied that a democratic government needs to value every individual and protect their rights without which its sustenance in the long run will be at threat. 13.7 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. Considerations of different perspectives, perceptions, and aspects dominate the process of conceptualisation and development of different theories, forms and models of democracy. Therefore, there is no uniformity among theorists and model-builders in these respects. However, it may be said that two different and contrasting ideas or concepts of democracy are: procedural and substantive concepts of democracy. In his

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 187 Models of Democracy, David Held, however, attempts to distinguish broadly between the liberal and participatory models of democracy. According to him two variants of liberal democracy are: protective and developmental. Therefore, the question arises whether procedural and substantive notions of democracy are to be regarded simply as ideas, or concepts or models. 14.2 Procedural Democracy The concept or to be more specific, the model of procedural democracy concentrates and emphasizes on the procedural or formal aspects of democracy. From this point of view, democracy is viewed 'purely as a set of institutions—encompassing free and fair elections, legislative assemblies, and constitutional governments arising out of these'. Here procedures for formation of a government, its accountability and also its responsibility to protect citizens' rights and liberties are important criteria to be characterised as procedural democracy. Procedural democracy, according to Professor Subrata Mukherjee and Sushila Ramaswamy, "involves the mechanism of free, fair and competitive elections by which governments are held accountable and a constitutional framework that guarantees and protects rights and liberties". 14.3 Main Principles of Procedural Democracy Procedural democracy relies on five main principles: electoral process, universal participation, political equality, majority rule and responsiveness of representatives to the electorate. Electoral process : Electoral process is an important indicator of procedural democracy. In procedural democracy elaborate structural and institutional arrangements are made for election of representatives by the electorate i.e. by the voters. Periodical elections are held to elect the representatives of the people. Therefore, electoral process is at the core of the political system as envisaged by the proponents of procedural democracy. This type of democracy is characterised by voters choosing to elect representatives in elections. Universal Participation : Universal participation is another main principle of procedural democracy. This type of democracy is characterised by universal participations of the citizens particularly in the electoral process. No doubt, universal adult franchise is a prerequisite of universal participation. As procedural democracy

188 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 is basically election-centric, therefore, its efficacy is mainly judged by electoral participation, that is, by voter's turnout in the elections. From this point of view, election data about participation are considered to be important yardsticks to judge the success of a democratic system. In this respect, India's standing is very high with average voter turnouts are between 50 and 60 per cent. Political Equality : In consonance with democratic concept, procedural democracy emphasizes on political equality. Like universal adult suffrage, political equality is, again, a prerequisite for universal participation. Political equality means that all persons irrespective of sex, caste or creed, race or religion, rich or poor, have the right to participate in the affairs of the state. It ensures the right to elect and to be elected. Procedural democracy is basically political democracy which can be ensured through political equality. Political equality which, in turn, is based on legal equality, that is, equality before laws and equal protection by the laws, is an important principle as well as characteristic of procedural democracy. Majority Rule : Democracy is, in essence, a majority rule or government of the majority. But what does majority imply in this regard? Majority may mean majority of votes secured by a political party in the legislative or decision-making bodies or majority of seats won in the election of legislative and decision-making bodies. In general, majority rule means majority of seats won by a political party in the legislature and other decision-making bodies which give them the right to rule and decide on behalf of the electorate. It also means that in those bodies issues are to be resolved by voting. Procedural democracy is characterised by voters choosing to elect their representatives in elections and through those elections, government and decision-making authorities are formed at the concerned levels with the support of larger numbers of elected representatives. It is supposed that there shall be more than one political parties, competitors or candidates competing freely for electoral mandate and the right to rule vests on that political party or candidates which secure larger number of seats or votes in the elections. Whether it is parliamentary form of government or presidential form of government, it is the majority opinion expressed through electoral mandate that determines the right to rule and decide. Responsiveness : In a democracy, responsiveness of representatives to the electorate is so important as the election of representative by the electorate. Democracy means not only representative government but it also means responsible government. Responsible government can only be ensured when government is responsive to the

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 189 demands and grievances of the elected representatives as well when elected representatives are also responsive to the demands and grievances of the electorate. When this responsiveness is ensured democracy becomes meaningful and fruitful and it turns out to be popular government. 14.4 Advocacy for Procedural Democracy: Schumpeter and Dahl The concept of procedural democracy finds justification in the writings of eminent theorists like Joseph Schumpeter and Robert Dahl. While Schumpeter is known as eminent theorist of democratic elitism, Robert Dahl is regarded as the prominent theorist of democratic revisionism. Joseph Schumpeter : Joseph Schumpeter's idea set out in his Capitalism, Socialism and Democracy. This book is the most influential text in the development of 'the modern elitist theory of democracy' which is alternatively known as theory of democratic elitism. To him, 'democracy is only a formal political organisational principle'. He does not consider democracy as 'an end in itself'; but it is 'a political method'. He defines it as 'a political methods... for arriving at political – legislative and administrative– decisions'. It is a system of institutions' or an 'institutional system'. As he himself says: 'Democracy is not based on certain social values; it is a system of institutions designed for putting political decisions into effect, in which these decisions are made in a competitive struggle for the people's vote'. For him, people are simply 'producers of governments' and democracy is a mechanism to select 'the men who are able to do the deciding'. Thus, the proper role of the people was to choose their ruler through competitive elections, and then leave them to get on with the business of governing. In this way, Schumpeter, firstly, emphasizes the role of people and democratic values. People are simply producers of governments or selectors who select who would govern them. As he himself says: "... the role of the people is to produce government..." Secondly, he reduces democracy simply as ' a formal political organisation principle' and as a political and democratic method or an institutional arrangement. As a method, according to him, it

He calls it 'the democratic method'. Thirdly, the significance of Schumpeter's concept of democracy which is

190 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 based on the idea that people are not rulers, but they are merely selectors or choosers or 'producers of governments' is that it makes elitism compatible with democracy. Free elections induce an element of competition among elite groups and it legitimises competition among governing elites. Fourthly, democracy is hereby viewed as a procedure. It is an exercise to institutionalise and rationalise election of rulers through general elections without having any relations to certain social values. Fifthly, he thus rejects both the doctrine of classical democracy as well as the central proposition of the classical theory that "the people" hold a definite and rational opinion. At the same time he emphasises for a proper recognition of the vital fact of leadership. In brief, he views democracy as a procedure and defines democracy as a method to arrive at political, legislative and administrative decisions. In this process, the role of the people are merely those of producers of governments. Other side of the same coin is the vital role of leadership which he emphasises by introducing 'the concept of competition for leadership'. He merges these two sides in his concept of democracy as a procedure. Actually in this way he tries to make democracy and elitism compatible. 14.5 Robert Dahl While Joseph Schumpeter describes democracy from the elitist point of view and makes democracy compatible with elitism, Robert Dahl examines it from pluralist point of view. But both these thinkers viewing democracy from different angles; however, in essence, both of them argue for procedural democracy, or what one may say, democracy as a process. Robert Dahl, an eminent American political scientist and a leading theorist of political pluralism, views democracy basically as a process. He says: 'democratic theory is concerned with processes by which ordinary citizens exert a relatively high degree of control over leaders'. He was initially an exponent of polyarchy or polyarchal democracy and later he advanced the theory of procedural democracy. His most recent essays (After the Revolution) discussed the idea of "procedural democracy" which is properly understood as the latest version of his evolving theory of polyarchal democracy. Dahl coined the term 'polyarchy'. It consists of two words 'poly' and 'arkhe'. Poly means 'many' and 'arkhe' means 'rule'. Dahl uses the term 'Polyarchy' to denote the acquisition of democratic institutions within a political

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 191 system that leads to the participation of a plurality of actors. It refers to the form of government found in contemporary democracies, but it is not the same as democracy. According to Hans Keman, "Polyarchy, which means 'rule by many', describes the process of democratization, in contrast to democracy itself." 3 (see https:// www.britannica.com:topic,Polyarchy). Keman also says that "Polyarchy, as presented by Dahl, should be understood as a process by which a set of institutions that comes close to what one could call the ideal type of democracy is developed. Therefore, public power is essential, and authority is effectively controlled by societal organizations and civil associations (e.g. interest group and political parties). Hence, in Dahl's view, the extent to which those societal actors can and do operate autonomously, as well as independently from the state, will enhance the democratic quality of a polity". 4 His concept of democracy (i.e. elections combined with continuous political competition between individuals or parties or both) promote popular sovereignty and political equality by increasing the 'size, number, and variety of minorities whose preferences must be taken into account by leaders"; but it does not lead to the majority rule. As a matter of fact, "polyarchy is neither pure majority rule nor unified minority rule. It is an open competitive, and pluralist system of 'minority rule'. 5 Moreover, popular participation plays only a peripheral role in Dahl's early democratic theory. Emphasis is led on ceaseless bargaining and negotiation between organized minorities "operating within the context of an apathetic majority" rather than extensive mass participation. This ensures leaders responsiveness to the preferences of non-leaders in the decision-making system, He insists that rule by the people' (popular sovereignty and political equality) is essential for democracy. But political equality and popular sovereignty are not absolute goals, rather these have instrumental value. These two are seen as instrumental means for ensuring the responsiveness of the government to the policy preferences of individuals. In his After the Revolution? and in sharp contrast to his earlier works, Dahl's preference for smaller, more participatory democratic form becomes evident. In it we find, a much stronger emphasis upon the value of direct citizen participation in political and economic life. But here again, he thinks democratic participation is like popular sovereignty and political equality, purely an instrument for enforcing accountability. All these shows evolution of Dahl's theory of democracy. It has evolved from his initial theory of polyarchal democracy, to his theory of 'procedural democracy'.

192 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 A policy to be regarded procedural democracy must satisfies three criteria. These are (a) 'political equality' (including its socio economic prerequisites), (b) 'effective participation' and (c) 'enlightened understanding'. Effective participation roughly indicates popular sovereignty. Thus the first two are familiar extensions of his earlier theory of polyarchy. Therefore, the third one is the additional criterion that Dahl added to his theory of procedural democracy and it requires that citizens have adequate and equal opportunities for formulating their preferences. Dahl's concept of procedural democracy functions according to the ideal standards, that is, according to five criteria that he has introduced in this respect. The criteria are effective participation, voting equality at the decisive stage, enlightened understanding, control over the agenda, and inclusion.

However his vision of procedural democracy does not ignore a variety of such as equality, freedom, human development, and human worth. Therefore the procedural democracy is not oblivious of substantive issues. However, Dahl's theory of procedural democracy relies basically on four major principles: universal participation, political equality, majority rule and responsiveness of representatives to the electorate. 14.6 Contrast between Procedural and Substantive Democracy Procedural democracy has to be differentiated from substantive democracy. Substantive democracy is another form of democracy which emphasizes not on procedures but on the substantive issues of democracy. According to the theory of substantive democracy 'a democracy is a society peopled by truly equal citizens, who are politically engaged, tolerant of different opinions and ways of life, and have an equal voice of choosing their rulers and holding them accountable. This type of democracy functions in the interest of the governed. Substantive democracy, it is claimed, transform formal democracy to a real democracy. It is also referred to as functional democracy. Procedural democracy concentrates on the procedures and institutions of representation rather than on the actual role of the general population. Institution of representation serves as an instrument of accountability. But the drawback of the system is that it also serves, as David Bentham has pointed out, 'as a means of keeping the people at arm's length from the political process, and establishing a division of labour between an elite of professional politicians engaged in politics, as

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 193 a specialised activity on the one side, and a depoliticised, private citizenry on the other'. Secondly, proceduralist view of democracy slips into 'the fallacy of electoralism' as studies of democracy from this standpoint is restricted to election data, Thirdly, it is not concerned with the meaningful exercise of equal rights. Moreover, procedural democracy is compatible with the results which are always skewed in favour of particular interest and groups. It is in this context, the substantive view of democracy becomes relevant. This view of democracy does not restrict itself only to the procedural and institutional aspects of democracy as well as to formal legal and constitutional guarantees of equal democratic rights. As N. G. Joyal has pointed out that the proponents of a substantive definition of democracy argue that 'the democratic project is incomplete until the meaningful exercise of the equal rights of citizenship have been guaranteed to all'. Naturally, substantive democracy strives to overcome the formal limitations of procedural democracy. On other hand, it emphasizes that the general population must play a real role in carrying out its political affair. Merely securing legal and political equality is not enough. Rather what is absolutely necessary is having a truly equal opportunity to influence governmental decisions. Thus, the state is not merely set up as democracy but it must function as one as well. As Joyal has rightly remarked: "Democracy, therefore, should not be seen as confined to the sphere of state and government, but also as the principle governing collective life in society." 14.7 Conclusion As a matter fact, neither the procedural aspect of democracy be overlooked nor the substantive goods be de-emphasized. On the one hand a just process may lead to unjust results, and at the same time, as Robert Dahl maintains when substance takes over process, we are often left with dictatorship. Therefore, what is needed is not a debate between procedure versus substance or priority of one over the other, but a combination of the two to achieve an ideal democratic system. 14.8 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. In the last quarter of the 20th century, deliberative democracy came to be presented as complementary to traditional representative democracy. Since the 1980's, particularly in 1990's deliberative democracy began to attract substantial attention from political scientists.

Deliberative democracy came to be considered as an important

196 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 component of modern liberal theorising. New lights were thrown on decision-making, discourse and debate, discourse of citizenship, legitimacy etc. from the point of view of newly-developed theory of deliberative democracy. It thus presents itself as a new trend in democratic thinking and, of course, within liberal framework. The concept of deliberative democracy has emerged and developed in the last three decades and considered as an exciting development in political theory. But, as a matter of fact, it has a long history. It was not unknown in primitive society. In primitive societies, all adult members of the community had the right to participate in the collective decision-making process of the community and collective assemblies were empowered to render judgements. However ancient Athenian democracy which arose in Greece during the sixth century BC. is frequently cited in political literature as the earliest manifestation of classical democracy. Athenian democracy was both deliberative and largely direct because of its participatory character. Deliberative democracy in its ancient form faced its extinction when in 322 BC Athenian democracy came to an end. Revival of democracy in modern time can, however, hardly be regarded as revival of deliberative democracy. It is true that in parliamentary democracy, parliament has been regarded by thinkers like Edmund Burke as a deliberative assembly and it is also true that deliberation is considered to be an essential part of government. However, the notion of democracy that evolved from the mid 17th century onwards may be different varieties of liberal democracy but can hardly be regarded as deliberative democracy in its newly ascribed sense. Deliberative democracy also falls within the framework of liberal democracy and an important component of modern liberal theorising; still it stands apart from traditional liberal democratic theories with regard to its approach towards procedures of decision-making and legitimacy under democratic system. It emphasizes on the practical reasoning of citizens rather than on that of people's representatives. Definition "Broadly defined, deliberative democracy refers to the idea that legitimate law making issues from the public deliberation of citizens". It holds that deliberation is central to decision-making and political decisions should be the product of fair and reasonable discussion and debate among citizens. In the opinion of Andrew Heywood it is '

preferences should be shaped by deliberation in advance of decision-making.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 197 The theory of deliberative democracy has a normative aspect too in the sense that it is concerned not only with how decisions are made but also with how decisions should be made. It assumes that political decisions should be the product of fair and reasonable discussion and debate among citizens. Actually its intention is to influence the actual political process rather than to state the actual political process. As Professor S Ramaswamy has observed that "Deliberative democracy is a normative theory with an intention to influence the actual political process by improving the popular input into policy by making it as broad based as possible". As a normative theory its objective is to broaden the base of democracy through discussion and debate among citizens. This, by effect, legitimizes the political process, because, according this theory, deliberation among citizens paves the basis of legitimacy. Christy Friend, in her review of Iris Marion Young's Inclusion and Democracy, observes that Young—along with Benjamin Barber, Jurgen Habermas, Nancy Fraser and others—is one of a group of theorists who subscribe to "deliberative" view of democracy,..... holds that democracy is most fundamentally a set of deliberative practices by which people negotiate in order to solve public problems. In this view, democracy is all about persuasion'. The idea of deliberation lies at the core of deliberative democracy. It is its central idea. As has been pointed out by Christian F. Roseboll 'The Central idea of deliberative democracy is that the basis of democratic legitimacy is the public deliberation of citizens'. It is said that free deliberation among equals is the basis of legitimacy. Thus, democratic legitimacy is produced out of public deliberation and serves as the basis of deliberative democracy. Deliberative democracy attaches very much importance to the idea of deliberation. It acts as the basis of democratic legitimacy. Deliberation is a process and as a process it is concerned with shaping citizens preferences. Citizens preferences are shaped by deliberation and that too in advance of decision making. People's preferences are formed during the political process, i.e. in a public process of deliberation among free and equal citizens. Therefore, deliberation is concerned with the process of reason giving which should precede political decision-making. But deliberation is concerned not only with the process of reason giving, it is also concerned with its outcome. As Christian F. Roseboll notes 'Deliberation is concerned both with the process of reason giving and with its outcomes'. It produces legitimacy and also tends to promote justice.

198 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 John Rawls makes a distinction between requirements of deliberation in civil society and official deliberation and, in his view, ideal of public reason only applies to the latter. But Joshua Cohen argues for the ideal deliberative procedure. She points out three features of the ideal deliberative procedure. According to Joshua Cohen these are: First, it helps to account for some familiar judgements about collective decision-making, in particular about the ways that collective decision-making ought to be different from bargaining, contracting and other market-type interactions, both in its explicit attention to considerations of the common advantage and in the ways that alteration helps to form the aims of the participants. "Second; it accounts for the common view that the notion of democratic association is tied to notions of autonomy and the common good. "Third, the ideal deliberative procedure provides a distinctive structure for addressing institutional questions".

15.2 Origin and Development
The concept of deliberative democracy is rather new in the vocabulary of political theory. Joseph M. Bassette is credited with for coinage of the term 'deliberative democracy. Bassette in his The Mid Voice of Reason: Deliberative Democracy and Americal National Government (1994) seems to have first used the term 'deliberative democracy, to argue against elitist (or "aristocratic") interpretation of the US Coustitution. Bassette called for a participatory view of democatic politics. It is generally recognised that this new concept of democracy calling for a participatory view of democratic politics gradually developed through the 1970 and began to take definite shape only in the 1980. But its origin can be traced in early sixties of the twentieth century with the publication of Jurgen Habermas's The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere. The basic theoretical ideas behind this conception of democracy was worked out by Jurgen Habermas. Later, many other critical theorists joined chorus of voices for a participatory view of democratic politics and developed the key theoretical issues of the concept of deliberative democracy. Christy Friend, in her review of Iris Marion Young's Inclusion and Democracy, says that 'Young—along with Benjamin Barber Jurgen Habermas, Nancy Fraser, and others—is one of a group of theorists who subscribe to 'deliberative' view of democracy". Among the others mention may be made of John Rawls, Jon Elster, Joshua Cohen, John Orygek who have developed the concept of deliberative democracy and its different features and aspects.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 199 Jurgen Habermas is one of the pioneer theorists of deliberative democracy. Unfortunately his contibution to this theory has not received proper acknowledgement. But he laid the basic theoretical ideas behind this conception of democracy. He presented idealised model of rational, consensus-oriented discourse by elaborating an idealized deliberative procedure. In his 'Popular Sovereignty as Procedure' Jurgen Habermas reviews the relevance of the radical democratic ideas associated with the French Revolution. In this essay, by way of combining the best features of the civil republicanism and liberalism i.e., the two dominant conceptions of democracy, he attempts to present his own model of democracy which is an idealized model of rational, cousensus-oriented discourse. He tries to link political power with the rule of law as well as the participatory characteristics of democracy with due emphasis on institutions and legality. As he himself says "the normative expectation of outcomes is grounded ultimately in the interplay between institutionally structured political will-formation and spontaneous, unsubverted circuits of communication in a public sphere that is not programmed to reach decisions and thus not organized." He reminds us that " In this context, the public sphere functions as a normative concept". The arguments and reasons that have held up in the public sphere contrains government officials in constitutional regimes. Pointing out Habermas's position in this regard, Bohman and Regh say that: 'Insofar as a broadly dispersed, "subjectless communication" among citizens is allowed to develope an autonomous public spheres and enter into receptive representative bodies with formal decision making power, the notion of popular sovereignty—a democratically self-organising society- is not beyond the pale of feasibility" 2 . Therefore, although he does not completely reject the traditional liberal democratic model and its constitutional regimes and decision making bodies, he adds a new element to it by elaborating an idealized deliberative procedure as its point of departure. In this way, the basic theoretical ideas behind this conception of deliberative democracy was worked out by Jurgen Habermas and also by other critical theorists. Although Habermas worked out the basic theoretical ideas behind this conception of democracy, however, it did not immediately take any definite shape and many of the writers on deliberative democracy even in the late eighties did not appreciate many of his ideas. Till up to 1970, two main sources for liberal democratic theory were (a) sociological realism (e.g. Schumpeter's elitist theory and Dahl's puralist models) and (b) the other economic (e.g. the compitive political process on rational choice assumptions) in working out the philosophical details of a conception of political justification based on deliberation and public reason. John Elster developed his

200 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 conceptions of politics as 'public in nature' and that political deliberation requires citizens to go beyond private self-interest of the 'market'. For him, politics involves a public activity that cannot be reduced to the private choices of consumers in the 'market' and that political engagement requires citizens to adopt civic standpoint, an orientation toward the common good, when they consider political issues in the 'forum'. Gutmann and Thompson, in their Democracy and Disagreement attempt to show how deliberation can deal with fundamental moral disagreements. The main concern of Iris Marion Young is how to make democracy more inclusive for disadvantaged groups. The proponents of deliberative democracy have actually developed different aspects of it. Their differences relate to their different approaches and focuses rather than on the key theoretical issues of deliberative democracy. They are in general agreement on at least this: ' The political process involves more than self-interested competition governed by bargaining and agregative mechanisms'. There are agreements in their views in respect of their emphasis on the will of the people and their active participation, open and uncoerced discussion, democratic self-restraint and human rationality. In deliberative democracy, the citizens see each other as free persons worth arguing with, as persons who can freely make up their minds in the light of good reasons. It emphasizes on the democratic process based on citizens' participation, debate and discussion, rationality and cousensus. But it does not subscribe the view of the aggregative model that democracy is simply 'a process aggregating the preferences of citizens in choosing public officials and policies'. Rather in the deliberative model, democracy is a form of practical reason and democratic process is primarily a discussion of problems, conflicts, claims of needs or interests. It is a form of public reasoning, a public process of deliberation among free and equal citizens through which preferences of citizens are transformed and become the basis of democratic legitimacy. However, the competitive-pluralist theories and models of liberal democracy faced theoretical challenges and the pravailing trend began to reverse itself in the late 190s. Actually, certain practical and theoretical issues and reasons were active behind this reversal and at the same time growth of interest about deliberative democracy. These were, according to Bohman and Regh; 1) Broad dissatisfaction with debacle and anonymity of liberal government. The vietnam war, the 1986 student revolt, and the impact of the civil rights NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 201 movements signalled a shift in the academic perception giving rise to neo-conservatism. There was also an increasing perception that decision making in government was bureaucratic and beyond the control of citizens. 2) Revival of interest in participatory democracy and politics played an important role in this respect. As Bohman and Regh say "leftist political activism, with its emphasis on participatory democracy, sparked renewed interest in the possibilities for consensual forms of self-government" Two separate but complimentary trends were at work for the rise of interest in deliberative democracy. One was the theoretical critique of liberal democracy and the other one was the revival of participatory politics. Both of these two trends gradually developed through the 1970's These on-going developments had been, to a great extent, crystalised in the 1980s and concept of deliberative democracy began to take definite shape. But it was particularly in the 1990s that the concept of deliberative democracy began to attract substantial attention from political scientists.

It came to be considered as an important component of modern liberal theorising and it presented itself as a new trend in democratic thinking. Important contributions were made in this regard by John Rawls, Joshua Cohen, Jon Elster, Gutmann and Thompson, Iris Marion Young and others. The proponents of deliberative democracy differed among themselves as well as agreed on many points. For example, Habermas idealized model of rational, consensus- oriented discourse and he elaborated an idealized deliberative procedure. John Rawls and Joshu Cohen were more interested in its different aspects. 15.3 Liberal democracy and deliberative democracy Deliberative democracy is often considered as an important component of modern liberal theorising. It is claimed that "It is a theory that concentrates on refining the familiar framework of liberal democracy". Like liberal democracy, deliberative democracy emphasizes on the will of the people and traslation of the concept of 'popular sovereignty' through active participation of the people in the democratic process of deliberation and debates. Jurgen Habermas, one of the pioneer exponents of deliberative democracy, wants to develop the participatory features of democracy; as in liberalism, he wants to emphasize the role of institutions and law.

202 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 However, the concept deliberative democracy differs from some prevailing mode of thinking developed within the broader framework of liberal democracy. Firstly, it differs from the sociological theory of democracy. Two variant of the sociological theory of democracy are (a) the elitist theory of democracy propounded by Joseph Schumpeter and his disciples, and (b) the pluralist model of democracy proposed by Robert Dahl and others. In the first variant, it is assumed, on the basis of empirical findings, that modern democracies are politically uninformed, apathetic, manipulable and popular participation could be downright dangerous. It views citizens primarily as passive consumers and political process as a struggle for power among competing interests. Robert Dahl and others, on the other hand, presented a decentralized, 'polyarchal' version of pluralism and gave up much of Schumpeter's elitism. Still, however, like Schumpeterian view, it retained the emphasis on competition, interest, and voting. Secondly, another source for liberal democratic theory upto 1970 was the economic theory of democracy. This theory as propounded by Anthony Downs attempted to apply economic categories to politics and it results in developing the model in which competitive political process is seen to be based on rational-choice assumptions as it suggests that parties functions as entrepreneurs who compete to sell their policies in a market of political consumers. All these developments ranging from sociological realism and pluralism to the model of competitive political process on rational choice assumptions took place within the broader frame-work of liberal thinking. As has been pointed out by James Bohman and William Rehg: "These two developments, one sociological and the other economic, were the two main sources for liberal democratic theory upto 1970." 4 The theorists of one of the two major variants of democratic theory emphasize the plurality of citizens interests and the potential for civil strife as citizens are viewed primarily as passive consumers who exert democratic control primarily through voting and the political process is viewed as a struggle for power among competing interests. Whereas the theorists of other variant takes a more rationalistic view of the citizens but preclude active public deliberation by citizens about a common good. As against this, deliberative democracy views political process as a search for the common good. It questions the key assumptions underlying the economic and pluralist models. The thrust of the deliberative democracy is on will of the people, human rationality, debate and deliberation, democratic self-restraint, and hope of a

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 203 public opinion about a common good. "For a democracy based on public deliberation presupposes that citizens or their representatives can take counsel together about what law and policies they ought to pursue as a commonwealth." Again to quote from Bohman and Rehg: "Deliberative theorists are in general agreement on at least this: the political process involved more than self interested competition governed by bargaining and aggressive mechanisms." Therefore, it accepts neither the views of self or group interests and resultant struggle for power among competing interests nor a purely economic standpoint and rationalistic view of citizens precluding active public deliberation by citizens as crucial conditions for democracy. Politics involves public activities and hence active participation and deliberation cannot be precluded from the political process and again it cannot be reduced to the private choices of consumers in the market. It may be inferred that deliberative democracy advances the theoretical critique of liberal democracy and revival of participatory democracy. Jurgen Habermas's idealized model of rational, consensus-oriented discourse is a case in point. He seeks to combine the best features of the two dominant conceptions of democracy: civic republicanism and liberalism. As Bohman and Rehg have observed: "As in civic republicanism, Habermas wants to develop the participatory features of democracy as in liberalism, he wants to emphasize the role of institutions and of law." At the same time, they are quick to point out: "Models such as Habermas's differ from updated republicanism and right-based liberalism by elaborating on idealized deliberative procedure as its point of departure." Thus deliberative democracy is both a criticism and rejection as well as accomodation of liberal democracy. It develops participatory features of democracy and idealizes deliberative procedures and, at the same time it emphasizes the role of institutions and law. Therefore, it is a queer mixture of both the theoretical critique of liberal democracy and the acceptance of some of the features of liberal democracy. 15.4 Characteristic Features 1. The concept of deliberative democracy is both an old as well as a new concept of democracy. It was old in the sense that deliberative democracy was prevalent in ancient Greece. Ancient Athenian democracy was the ancient form of deliberative democracy. Again it is new in the sense that after its extinction in Athens in 320 BC it has again reemerged and evolved in the last three decades.

204 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 2. In deliberative democracy, deliberation is considered to be essential part of government. It emphasizes on the practical reasoning of citizens rather than on that of people's representation. 3. Deliberation shapes citizens' preferences. Deliberation is a process and as a process it is concerned with shaping citizens' preferences. Citizens preferences are shaped by public deliberation and that too in advance of decision- making. 4. Deliberative democracy refers to the idea that legitimate law making issues from the public deliberation of citizens. It attaches too much importance to the idea of deliberation. It lies at the core of democracy. 5. Deliberative democracy assumes that public deliberation acts as the basis of democratic legitimacy. The public deliberation is the basis of democratic legitimacy. Free deliberation among equals is the basis of legitimacy. 6. The theory of deliberative democracy has a normative aspect in the sense that it is concerned not only with how decisions are made but also with how decisions should be made. 7. Deliberative democracy implies a deep and broader inclusion and political equality, whose implementation will eventually promote justice. In her essay 'Deliberation and Democratic Legitimacy' Joshua Cohen mentions five main features of the formal conception of a deliberative democracy. According to her, these are: (a) A deliberative democracy is an ongoing and independent association, whose members expect it to continue into the indefinite future. (b) The appropriate terms of the association provide a framework for or are the results of their deliberation. For the members of the association, free deliberation among equals is the basis of legitimacy. (c) According to Cohen, a deliberative democracy is a pluralistic association. The members have diverse preferences, convictions, and ideas concerning the conduct of their own lives. They also have divergent aims. (d) The terms of their association are not merely be the results of their deliberation, but also be manifest to the members of the association as such. (e) The members recognize one another as having deliberative capacities like exchange of reasons and acting on public reasoning.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 205 15.5 Forms of deliberation Ancient form of deliberative democracy was found is Athens. The striking features of the Athenia democracy was its participatory and deliberative character. It developed institutions of deliberation like Ecclesia. It was the basic governing body where every citizen was entitled to attend and speak at its meetings. As a matter of fact, as democracy evolved in Athens and its citizens enjoyed a free atmosphere of public discussion and lively debate on various domestic and foreign policy questions as well as on institutions and personalities. In modern times, there are different types of deliberative forms. Modern deliberative forums include both governmental as well as nongovernmental institutions. These include legislature, courts, the administration, and civil society associations. Different deliberative forums have different purposes and follow different procedures. For example, there may be deliberation aimed directly at decisions and also deliberation which has no such direct aim. In Jane Mansbridge's opinion, the distinction between the two is of everyday talk and formal talk. Similarly, in Habermas, we find a distinction between the informal public sphere of civil society and decisional publics. The importance of differentiating between these two types of publics in civil society is that they serve different purposes and that in order to do so they must involve different types of deliberation. There is no denying that civil society is an important forum of deliberation and as Habermas points out its associations "specialize... in discovering issues relevant for all society". But we cannot disregard the importance of governmental institutions. Parliamentary and governmental decisions are also important as they reflect the deliberation of civil society. Members of different branches of government (such as legislators, administrators and judges) are also considered to be important forums of deliberation. In addition to that, election campaigners and voters also provide different forums of deliberation. There are also alternative form of communication which also play important role. Iris Marion Young thinks that deliberative democracy to be inclusive should allow for the use of greetings, rhetoric and narrative as legitimate forms of communication.

206 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 15.6 Conclusion Thus, deliberative democracy aims to reach political decisions through fair and reasonable discussion and debate among citizens. So deliberation turns out to be a necessary pre condition for the legitimacy of democratic political decisions. Such a democracy not only prioritise deliberation in decision making but also encourages competing viewpoints and arguments. In doing so, it actually

210 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 16.1 Introduction The term democracy is no longer tied singly to a form of government. The political coinage of democracy in contemporary times went beyond the territories of an ideal. As a method, it began to imply a set of values and behaviour with which a decision is concluded by the people. In a way, it also denotes of a particular culture involved in a process of a decision making. As a corollary therefore, the concept invited fierce debates not only in political theory but also in general discussion on politics. Since its formal appearance in the Greek city states of the classical period till contemporary times, the concept and practice of democracy has traversed a long way in political history. From a pejorative implication 'as a rule of the ignorant' by Plato to a 'corrupt form of polity' by Aristotle; democracy as an enduring principle continued to be dominant even in the post modern political landscape. Interestingly, the age old negative connotation of the concept has been replaced with a positive value which is accorded to democracy over time. Though this development is much recent in history and at present, the charge of being labelled as undemocratic is not only uncomfortable but also to be taken a matter of serious offence in global political parlance. Amidst the failure of socialist system within erstwhile Soviet Union and the rising crisis of capitalism in the past years, democracy emerged not only as an universal accepted political system but also perhaps the most successful compelling form of political organisation in history. 16.2 Meaning of Democracy The concept of democracy was of Greek origin. The term was derived from the Greek word 'democratia' in which 'demos' meant 'the people' and 'kratos' meaning 'power or rule'. Democracy thus, means 'rule by the demos'.

kratos' meaning 'power or rule'. Democracy thus, means 'rule by the demos'.

The term 'democracy' was first used in the fifth century BC by the Greek historian Herodotus in the sense of 'rule by the people'. However, the nature of the concept was perhaps popularised by Abraham Lincoln Gettysburg Address, delivered in 1864 at the height of the American Civil War. He added both flesh and spirit to the meaning of democracy as government of the people, by the people, for the people.

Analysing Lincoln's definition, D.D.Raphael in Problems of Political Philosophy observes that all government is government of the people. Hence, government of the people does not

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 211 convey much. As regards 'government for the people' Raphael argues that a benevolent despotism, as much as democracy, may be government for the people. So the essential idea of democratic government is 'government by the people'. This implies that, in effect, people govern themselves that they participate in making the crucial decisions that structure their lives and determine the fate of their society. This participation can take a number of forms. In classic sense, democracy means the rule of the people, either directly or through elected representatives. In this meaning, democracy is taken not only as rule of the majority but also involving the spirit of equality. Subsequently, even representative form of democracy also recognises the principle of equality. However, this equality is mainly confined to political equality where equal voting right and right to hold public offices are treated as relevant. In other words, it implies a belief that all people are equally capable of, and have a stake in making collective decisions that shape their lives. In a democracy, no one person's opinion or interest is of more value than the other. Hence, the principle which is practiced is 'one person, one vote'. It is based on the idea of equal moral worth of all individuals and against the exclusion of anyone from the political process. Thus, it is against hierarchy or inherited privileges and discrimination. Democracy is also widely described as a process of selecting governments. This implies free and fair elections under open, multiparty electoral competition and based on universal adult suffrage. Samuel P. Huntington, who is well known for his Clash of Civilization thesis says that 'elections open, free and fair are essence of democracy'. Democracy as government by the people relies heavily on the wisdom of the people. J.S.Mill in his Considerations on Representative Government has mentioned two different aspects that go in the name of democracy. He defines 'pure idea of democracy' as 'the government of the whole people by the whole people, equally represented'. Mill contrasts this idea of pure democracy with commonly conceived and practiced idea of democracy as 'the government of the whole people by a mere majority of the people'. In other sense, democracy as a form of government though called the government of the whole people is only the government of the majority. This majority actually elects representatives since representatives are elected on the basis of majority votes, they cannot by definition therefore, represent the minority. The principle of democracy requires that while all public decisions are taken with the approval of the majority, due regard may be given to the view of the minority. However, in a multicultural society where people tend to vote for the candidates belonging to their own caste, region, religion language or culture etc. they may be 212 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 divided into permanent majority and minorities. In such a case the principle of democracy requires that different minorities like racial, religious etc. enjoy full freedom to preserve their cultural traits and feel fully safe. Democracy not merely means a form of government alone. It also imbibes for a culture in which certain intrinsic human values like that of tolerance, equality, freedom and the like is fostered and retained in society. In a democracy, therefore, it is assumed that there will be a diversity of opinions and interests on almost every matter of common concern. Indeed, this diversity is seen as its main strength and it calls for tolerance for all shades of opinion. A democratic society is also called an open society where there is space for all voices however, unpopular or conventional they may be, to be heard. This requires a range of political freedoms like freedom of speech and expression, association and movement among others which are protected by the state. People must have access to information and be able to protest and freely criticise the government and others in order to make informed uncoerced choices and intervene in the decision making process. Thus, the practice of democracy is unthinkable without rights. Thus, democracies are expected to arrive at a consensus. 16.3 Attributes of Democracy It is often argued that a democratic method of making legislation is better than non democratic methods in three ways namely strategically, epistemically and via the improvements of the characters of democratic citizens. Strategically, democracy has an advantage because it forces decision makers to take into account the interests, rights and opinions of most people in society. In this respect, an instrumental argument provided by Amartya Sen is that 'no substantial famine has ever occurred in any independent country with a democratic form of government and a relatively free press'. The basis of this argument is that politicians in a multiparty democracy with free elections and a free press have incentives to respond to the expressions of needs of the poor. Epistemologically, democracy is thought to be the best decision making method, on the grounds, that it is generally more reliable in helping participants to discover the right decisions. Because democracy brings a lot of people into the process of decision making, it can take advantage of many sources of information, and of the critical assessment of laws and policies.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 213 It is further argued that democracy tends to make people stand up for themselves more than do other forms of rule. This is because under democracy collective decisions depend more upon the will of the people than those made under monarchy or aristocracy. Hence, in democratic societies, individuals are encouraged to be more autonomous. Finally, some have argued that democracy tends to enhance the moral qualities of citizens. When they participate in decision making they have to listen to others and they are also called upon to justify themselves to others and they are forced to think partly in terms of the interests of others. Hence, some have argued that democratic processes tend to enhance the autonomy, rationality and morality of participants. 16.4 Arguments against Democracy Critics of democracy can be classified into two groups namely those who are dissatisfied with a particular kind of democratic practice and seek to deepen it and those who are critical of the democratic principle as such. A key objection to democracy is that, it produces incompetent and inefficient governments. According to Plato, democracy is inferior to various forms of monarchy, aristocracy and even oligarchy on the grounds that democracy tends to undermine the expertise that is necessary to properly governed societies. In a democracy, he argues, those who are expert at winning elections and nothing else will eventually dominate democratic politics. Most people do not have the kinds of talents that enable them to think well about the difficult issues that politics involves. Hence, the state will be guided by very poorly worked out ideas. Hobbes argues that democracy is inferior to monarchy because democracy fosters destabilising dissension among subjects. From his perspective, individual citizens and even politicians are likely not to have a sense of responsibility for the quality of legislation, because no individual makes a significant difference to the outcome of decision making. As a consequence, citizen's concerns are not focused on politics and politicians succeed only by making loud and manipulative appeals to citizens in order to gain more power. Even J.S.Mill for all his defence of democracy and political participation considered majoritarianism and mediocre government as the biggest weaknesses of 214 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 democracy. Not only does majoritarianism exclude minority voices but it lowers the standards of the government. Subsequently, people with a lower level of intelligence perform the most important task of legislation and administration. Mill suggested a number of institutional mechanisms to counter these ills. Mill was particularly concerned about the opinion of minorities, the experts and the geniuses who are sidelined when the majority principle is applied. Mills philosophy thus, combines a value for participation and equality with elitism, where governance is seen as the task of the educated and the experts. Elite theorists went a step ahead in expressing their dissatisfaction of the democratic functioning and argued in favour of the inevitability of the elite rule. Elite theorists consider a functioning democracy impossible because of the inevitability of concentration of power. Classical elite theorists like Pareto and Mosca says that political power in every society has always been in the hands of a minority, the elite, which has ruled over the majority in its own interest. These elite manage to dominate because they possess exceptional skills specially the psychological attributes and political skills of manipulation and coercion. They are far better organized than the masses and also possess qualities which are considered valuable and hence, use it to justify their privileged position in the society. Michels noted, how despite socialist principles, the actual working of the decision making process tended to concentrate power in the leadership due to bureaucratization and centralization. Not only did the leaders not consult the working class members, the decision taken were often contrary to their interests. Rajeev Bhargava argues, that the merit of these critiques lies insofar as they expose the myths of democratic practice by exposing who actually wields power. But in considering this concentration of power as inevitable, these critiques affirm a belief in the natural inequality among human beings and are pessimistic in nature. 16.5 Models of Democracy Democracy is often treated as a homogenous and unambiguous phenomenon. It is often assumed that democracy as practiced in western societies is the only legitimate form of democracy. In reality, however, there are a number of rival theories or models of democracy, each offering its own version of popular rule. This highlights not merely the variety of democratic forms and mechanisms, but also more fundamentally, the very different grounds on which democratic rule can be justified.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 215 Even liberal democracy is a misleading term, as competing liberal views of democratic organisation can be identified. The different models are discussed in the following manner : 1. Classical Democracy 2. Protective Democracy 3. Developmental Democracy 4. People's Democracy 5. Participatory Democracy 6. Cosmopolitan Democracy Classical Democracy The classical model of democracy is usually associated with the city states of ancient Greece. It is the most celebrated form of direct participatory democracy. Amongst the city states, the most discussed one happened to be the system of rule that developed in Athens. The salient features of Athenian democracy can be summed up in the following manner- A) Equal participation by all freemen in the common affairs of the polis (city state) which was regarded as an essential instrument of good life. B) Arriving at public decisions in an atmosphere of free discussion and C) General respect for law and for the established procedures of the community. The form of direct democracy that operated in Athens during the fourth and fifth centuries BCE is often portrayed as the only pure or ideal system of popular participation. Athenian democracy developed a very particular kind of direct popular rule, one that has only a very limited application in the modern world. Athenian democracy amounted to a form of government by mass meeting. All major decisions were made by the Assembly or Ecclesia, to which all citizens belonged. This meet takes place atleast forty times a year. What made Athenian democracy so remarkable was the level of political activity of its citizens. Not only did they participate in regular meetings of the Assembly but they were in large numbers, prepared to shoulder the responsibility of public office and decision making. The most influential contemporary critic of this form of democracy was the philosopher Plato. Plato decried democracy because the people were not properly equipped with education to 216 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 select the best rulers. Aristotle identified democracy as the rule of the many, that is, of the more numerous members of the community, particularly the poor ones. In his classification of the governments into normal and perverted forms, Aristotle placed democracy among perverted forms since it signified the rule of the mediocre seeking their selfish interests, and not the interest of the state. on a practical level. However, the principal drawback of Athenian democracy was that it could only operate by excluding the mass of the population from political activity. Participation was restricted to Athenian born males who were over 20 years of age. Slaves, women and foreigners had no political rights whatsoever. Protective Democracy The idea of democracy as evolved in the 17 th and 18 th century was very different from that of classical democracy of ancient Greece. Democracy then came to be viewed as a mechanism through which the public could participate in political life and protect themselves from the encroachments of government. Hence, it is called Protective Democracy. It was protective in the sense, that it was meant to protect the rights of citizens and safeguard them from the tyranny of state power. The emergence of liberalism as a doctrine and the newly emerging bourgeoisie middle class had placed limits on the absolute powers of the monarch and the feudal aristocracy of the European state from 16 th century onwards. With the emerging new doctrine of individualism, the notion that all individuals are free and autonomous masters of themselves and makers of their own destiny were popularised. Individuals are primarily rational and self interested beings intend on pursuing their desires and goals. What individual requires are the basic condition to pursue this self defined goals. Liberals identify these conditions as rights namely of life, liberty and property which are fundamental and inviolable in nature. The emergence of liberalism is linked to that of capitalism and market society. That is why, property is understood as a fundamental right. An individual's property is considered an extension of the self and an individual is the masters of his/her own self. In the 17 th century John Locke argued, that that the right to vote was based on the existence of natural rights and in particular on the right to property.

If government, through taxation possessed the power to expropriate property, citizens were entitled to protect themselves by controlling the composition of the tax setting body; the legislature.

In other words, democracy to mean a system of government by consent' operating through a representative assembly. Political participation in a representative democracy means to control the government and ensure the protection of individual

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 217 liberty. Through franchise and competitive elections individuals choose representatives who then form governments on the majority principle. Political decisions can be made only by these representatives and the people can keep a check on the representatives through periodic elections. The idea of protective democracy is perhaps best understood in the views of two of the key spokesmen of 19th century namely English liberals J. Bentham (1748-1832) and James Mill (1773-1836). In their hands, the protective theory of liberal democracy received arguably its most important elaboration: the governors must be held accountable to the governed through political mechanisms (the secret ballot, regular voting and competitions between potential representatives among other things) which give citizens satisfactory means for choosing, authorising and concluding political decisions. Through these mechanisms it was argued a balance could be attempted between might and right, authority and liberty. But despite this decisive step, who exactly were to count as individuals and what the exact nature of their envisaged political participation were remained either unclear or unsettled in the Anglo-American world. Thus, protective democracy is but a limited and indirect form of democracy. In practice, the consent of the governed is exercised through voting in regular and competitive elections. This thereby, ensures the accountability of those who govern. Political equality is thus, understood in strictly technical terms to mean equal voting rights. Moreover, this is above all, a system of constitutional democracy that operates within a set of formal or informal rules that check the exercise of government power. Even though the model of representative democracy was based on the principle of equality, in early liberal democracies, franchise or political equality was in effect restricted to a few. It is worth noting that in all early democratic systems of modern western world, the idea of democracy was not based on universal adult franchise rather restricted male citizens had the right to vote in elections. In France, adult male suffrage was abruptly introduced in 1848, but they could not set up a parliamentary government on an enduring basis till 1871. In Britain, parliamentary government had been established on an enduring basis since 1688 but the bulk of male citizens were not granted franchise till 1867. Female franchise has been operative in the United States since 1919, in Britain since 1928 in France since 1945 and in Switzerland all women got their right to vote as late as 1971. Developmental Democracy Democracy in the late years also exhibited its concern with the development of

218 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 the human individual and the community. This gave rise to quite new models of democratic rule which can broadly be referred to as systems of developmental democracy. The most novel and radical model was developed by J.J. Rousseau. In many respects, Rousseau's ideas mark a departure from the dominant liberal conception of democracy. For Rousseau, democracy was ultimately a means through which human beings could achieve freedom. What gives Rousseau's model its novel character, is his insistence that freedom ultimately means obedience to the 'general will'. Rousseau makes a distinction between the will of the individual i.e. the particular will and the will of the community, i.e. the general will. Particular will may either be inclined towards general will, or it may turn against it. When an individual is motivated by his momentary self interest, he is acting against the general will. It is called his 'actual will'. On the contrary, when he decides to act in the common interest i.e. according to the general will, he is acting on his real will. In other words, real will involves self discipline in the interest of the community. It also serves the individual's real and long term interest which cannot be separated from the common interest. General will is therefore, harmonious. It reflects the real will of all members of the community. In Rousseau's view, such a system of radical developmental democracy required not merely political equality but a relatively high level of economic equality. Rousseau's theories have helped to shape the modern idea of participatory democracy taken up by New Left thinkers in the 1960s and the 1970s. In fact at the heart of this model is the notion of grassroot democracy. This implies a belief that political power should be exercised at the lowest possible level. Nevertheless, Rousseau's own theories have been criticised for distinguishing between citizen's true wills and their felt or subjective wills. The danger of this is that, if the general will cannot be established by simply asking citizens of what they want since they may be guided by their self interest, there is scope for the general will perhaps by a dictator claiming to act in the 'true' interests of society. According to A. Heywood, Rousseau is therefore, sometimes seen as the architect of so called totalitarian democracy. However, along with Rousseau model of developmental democracy can also be rooted in the writings of John Stuart Mill. For Mill, democracy is essentially an educational experience as it enhances the political understanding of the citizens and helped them to achieve a higher level of personal development. For Mill, a representative system must create maximum space for people to take part in the functioning of the government and not restrict their involvement by merely allowing

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 219 them to vote. He considered participation important because it develops the confidence of the people in their ability to govern themselves. That is why, he suggested for broadening of popular participation arguing that the franchise should be extended to all but those who are illiterate. In the process, he suggested, that suffrage should also be extended to women.

Mill was however, aware of the dangers of democracy. He rejected the idea of formal political equality. Following Plato, Mill did not believe that all political opinions are of equal value. He feared that democracy always contains the threat that individual liberty and minority rights may be crushed in the name of the people.

Mill's particular concern was that democracy would undermine debate, criticism and intellectual life in general by encouraging people to accept the will of the majority, thereby, promoting uniformity and dull conformism. He believed strongly that majority is not always right and wisdom cannot be determined mere quantitatively. So, he supported the idea of deliberative democracy or parliamentary democracy. People's Democracy The concept of people's democracy is usually related to the Marxian tradition which analyses political system mostly in terms of class character. Marxists criticise the prevalent form of liberal democracy because it harbours the capitalist system in which the majority of people comprising workers is deprived of power. Liberal democracy exclusively serves the interests of the bourgeoisie ie. the capitalist class. Marxists therefore, dubbed liberal democracy as the bourgeois democracy. In spite of its vast paraphernalia of representative institutions, liberal democracy hardly serves the interests of the people on whose behalf power is exercised. Marx believed that with a overthrow of capitalism, democracy is likely to flourish. He was highly sceptical of liberal or parliamentary democracy and viewed it essentially as a bourgeois or capitalist democracy. He had anticipated that after the socialist revolution, bourgeois democracy would be replaced by a 'commune system'. Communes were envisaged to be small communities who would manage their own affairs and would elect their delegates for the larger administrative units like districts and towns. These larger units would in turn elect their delegates for the still larger administrative areas, like national administration. This system is described as 'pyramidal structure of direct democracy'. They were described as 'people's democracies' in order to distinguish them from western type liberal democracies. According to O.P. Gauba, this term was adopted to indicate a new type of democracy. Conventional use of democracy stands for liberal democracy which is based on a specific procedure of government formation. Hence, it may be identified as 'procedural democracy'. On 220 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 the other hand, people's democracy focuses on the substance of democracy ie. safeguarding the interests of the ordinary people. Hence, it claimed to be identified as 'substantive democracy'. In its view, interests of the working classes is coterminous with the interest of the people. This form of democracy was developed in the 20 th century in communist states like that of former Soviet Union and China. However, in erstwhile Soviet Union democracy owed more to the ideas of V.I.Lenin than it did to those of Marx. Although Lenin's 1917 slogan ' All power to the Soviets' had kept alive the notion of commune democracy, in reality power in Soviet Russia quickly fell into the hands of the Bolshevik Party. In establishing itself as the vanguard of the working class the communist party claim to represent the genuine interests of the proletariat and thus, guide it to the realisation of its revolutionary potential. However, in doing so, what really turned out to be a major weakness was that this model failed to build any mechanisms for checking the power of the communist party.

Participatory Democracy The major idea behind the democracy includes the authority of governance to rest upon people themselves. That is how the journey of democracy began during classical age of ancient Greece. However, when the size of a democratic community expands geographically with a variety of composition in terms of race, religion, language and culture, etc the distance between the people and their representatives is likely to widen. While elitist theory do not places much significance to citizen's participation as one of the necessary condition of democracy, the model of participatory democracy repudiates it. Participatory democracy emphasises on political participation of people as the basic principle of democracy. Political participation, however, refers to active involvement of individual and groups in the governmental processes affecting their lives. The chief exponent of this form of democracy was Rousseau in whose hand the doctrine of popular sovereignty gained ground. In participatory democracy citizens themselves play an active role in the process of formulation and implementation of public policies and decisions, their activity is called political participation. Conventional mode of political participation is called voting , contesting for public for a public office, campaigning for a political party or contributing to the management of a community project like public safety, cleanliness drive or the maintenance of a public park etc. Interestingly, an act of opposition or public protest also involves political participation. They are the manifestation of a strong awareness of public interest.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 221 The present day champions of participatory democracy argue that representative democracy give little opportunity to its citizens for any significant participation in the decision making process. In modern large scale states, the objective of participatory democracy are sought to be achieved through (a) Decentralisation of administration in which many decisions are left to local communities, as in the case of expansion of Panchayati Raj in India; and (b) Extensive use of referendum as prevalent in Switzerland. In contemporary political theory, citizen participation is sought to be justified mainly on three grounds: a) Instrumental view- It asserts that citizen participation is aimed at promoting or defending the interest of the participant. b) Developmental or educational view- This holds that citizens participation enhances the participants general moral, social and political awareness. c) Communitarian view- This justifies participation on the ground that it contributes to the common good. However, the limitations of participatory democracy cannot be ignored. Firstly, the champions of participatory democracy insists only on increasing citizens participation within the existing democratic system. They do not suggest any alternative system for its implementation. Secondly, the advocates of participatory democracy seem to be too optimistic. Beneficial results of public decisions, policies and programmes come very late. Ordinary people are not always endowed with adequate patience and insight that would enable them to make a correct assessment of the situation. If they are encouraged for too much participation, they may take their grievances and disputes to streets, and disrupt normal life.

Cosmopolitan Democracy With globalization extraordinary changes have taken place in international politics. The first half of the 1990s championed the idea of democracy but its efficacy as a national form of politics came to be questioned. David Held, in his article, on Cosmopolitan Democracy has identified the emerging world since 1990s to be doubly faced. On the one hand, it has fostered the extension of democracy and on the other; it has revealed tensions within nation states. He argued that, cold war by imposing limited autonomy to states had managed to suppress many forms of domestic conflict. However, with an end to it domestic discord reopened.

222 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 Infact, David Held has pointed out several impacts of globalisation on the recent functioning of democracy. He argued that, first; the locus of political power no longer rests with the national government rather it is shared by diverse forces and agencies operating at regional, national and international levels. Secondly, 'self determining collectivity' no longer confines itself within the single nation state alone. Political communities both within and across are now beyond the reach of individual nation state. Thirdly, the operatives of the states have become so complex with international and regional interaction that it affects the autonomy and sovereignty of a nation. Finally, the late twentieth century witnesses a world where transnational actors and forces cut across the boundaries of nations in diverse ways. Subsequently, it is found that the powerful states make decision not just for their people but for others as well. Such overlapping spheres of influence, interference and interest creates dilemmas at the centre of democratic thought. This worldwide development opened up the possibility of a cosmopolitan democracy. According to David Held, cosmopolitan democracy involves the development of administrative capacity and independent political resources at regional and global levels as a necessary complement to those in local and national politics. So cosmopolitan democracy would override the states in defined spheres of activity which have visible transnational and international consequences and call for regional or global initiatives for democratic legitimacy. 16.6 Contemporary Theories of Democracy Pluralist Theory Pluralist theory of democracy is based on pluralist concept of power distribution in society. Pluralist model appears in two forms- one treats democracy as competition between plurality of elites and the second treats democracy as negotiation between pluralities of power centres in society. While the first is based on assumptions of power concentration in the hands of variety of elite; the second is based on the assumption of power distribution amongst a variety of groups. The first systematic development of pluralist theory can be traced in the work of James Madison entitled The Federalist Papers. Unlike the most liberals, Madison argued that unchecked democratic rule might simply lead to majoritarianism, to the crushing of individual rights and to the expropriation of property in the name of the people. He stressed upon the multiplicity of interests and groups in society. He believed unless each such group possessed a

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 223 political voice, stability and order would be impossible. He therefore, proposed a system of divided government based on the separation of powers that offered a variety of access points to competing groups and interests. Thus, the system of rule which he envisaged is often referred as Madisonian democracy. The most influential modern exponent of pluralist theory is Robert Dahl. Robert Dahl in his A Preface to Democratic Theory (1956) developed a model of democratic process which he described as polyarchy. According to him, polyarchy means a rule by many, as distinct by rule from all citizens. The key feature of such a system of pluralist democracy is that competition between parties at election time, and the ability of interest or pressure groups to articulate their views freely, establishes a reliable link between the government and the governed and creates a channel of communication between the two. Robert Dahl has given the theory of polyarchy which holds that democratic government must take into account interests of many groups in society compulsorily. Dahl's study of local politics in New Haven, USA explored how decision making is done. Based on his conclusions and observations, Dahl suggested a model of democracy where various groups participate in decision making. Infact, he suggested there is widespread dispersal of power among various interest groups and these groups compete and negotiate as per their issue-areas. Thus, polyarchy to Dahl, refers to a model of democratic decision making where multiple groups participate in decision making without anyone of them dominating. Infact, the pluralist theory calls for the revision of the democratic theory itself. In its view, policy making is actually done neither by the representatives of a coherent majority, nor by an autonomous and unresponsive elite, but is the product of the interaction among various groups. This theory goes to the extent of claiming that since public policy is largely an outcome of the bargaining among groups interested in a given policy issue, the form of government becomes almost insignificant. On the other side, the system of rule by multiple minorities may simply have been a device to prevent the majority from exercising political power. According to A. Heywood, a further problem is the danger of what has been called 'pluralist stagnation'. This occurs as organised groups and economic interests become so powerful that they create a long jam resulting in the problem of government 'overload'. In such circumstances, a pluralist system may simply become ungovernable. Finally, there is the problem identified by Dahl in later works such as A Preface to Economic Democracy (1985) notably that the unequal ownership of economic resources tends to concentrate political power in the hands of the few and deprive it from the many. This line of argument has given rise to neopluralism.

224 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 Arnold M. Rose's The Power Structure reflects Dahl's conclusions on power distribution. He studied the policies of the National Associations of Manufacturers and the United States Chamber of Commerce, the two bodies that represent economic elite. Rose, unlike Dahl concludes that plurality of elites, relatively small are operating in different spheres. Dahl and Rose reached more or less the same conclusion and suggest pluralism as the basis of power distribution. However, while Dahl does not hint at elite within the respective groups, Rose tends to hold that there are pluralities of elites who are competing. Rose sounds like Schumpeter who talks of decision making amongst competing elites. Rose's pluralism suggests elite pluralism. Elitist Theory Elitist theories were originally developed in the field of Sociology to explain the behaviour of men in a social setting. Their implications in the field of politics posed a challenge to democratic theory. This was in turn revised by several thinkers. Broadly speaking, the elitist theories hold that every society consists of two categories of men namely the elite or the minority in a social collectivity and the masses or the majority which is governed by the elite. This theory argues that masses are unintelligent and apathetic and elite are organised, capable, intelligent and have leadership qualities. Classical elitists, such as V. Pareto, G. Mosca and R. Michels believed that democracy was no more than a foolish delusion because political power is always exercised by a privileged minority namely the elites. Pareto and Mosca conceptualised general perspective on elite rule and view society divided into elite and non elite. They pointed out that elite provides leadership and are capable of rule. Michel carried out the study of oligarchic phenomenon in political parties. In his study, Political Parties: A Sociological Study of the Oligarchical Tendencies of Modern Democracy,

he analysed the inner dynamics of decision making and power distribution of European Socialist Parties and Trade Unions with particular emphasis on German Socialist Party. According to him, democracy requires organisation in the form of parties to represent the masses because of vastness and complexity of society, which will not allow any other way of democratic participation. Political parties operate through structured organization with leadership, full time politicians and officials. Due to division of labour, hierarchy and control, decision making and resource allocation becomes confined in the hands of a small group of leaders. This produces rule and control of small elites. Michels calls this as 'Iron Law of Oligarchy'. This

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 225 means any organization is bound to degenerate in elite rule. Whereas classical elitists strove to prove that democracy was always a myth, modern elitist theorists have tended to highlight how far particular political systems fall short of the democratic ideal. A distinction can be drawn between a two set of elitist theorists. The early elite theorists argue that due to omnipresence of elites in every society, there is no possibility of any other form of government than rule of the elite either through circulation of elite or Iron Law of Oligarchy. They deny the possibility of democracy as rule of the people. Pareto, Mosca Michels and Ostrogorski are champions of this position. There is a second group of elite theorists, who argue that despite elite being present as the leaders, competition between elites and elections at periodic intervals give sufficient chance to the people to express themselves and this choice of elites represents democracy. Karl Manheim's Ideology and Utopia upheld the possibility of democracy even when they agree the presence of elites as a fundamental reality in society. He maintained that though policy formulation was in the hands of the elite, the very fact that the elites can be removed in elections make the people master. He thinks that this very limitation is sufficient proof of democracy and accountability of elite. In fact, Manheim's views reflect an attempt to reconcile theory of political elites and democracy. Joseph A. Schumpeter in his Capitalism, Socialism and Democracy (1942) pointed out that the forms of government should be distinguished by their institutions, specially by their methods of appointing and dismissing the supreme makers of law and policy. This implies that firstly, in a democracy political decisions are taken by the 'leadership', and not by the people themselves. Secondly, there is a free competition among the leaders for winning people's votes. In other words, the role of the people is reduced to choosing their rulers from the competing elites. Schumpeter does not allow any moral content in democracy and treats it merely as market mechanism where voters are only consumers and the politicians act as entrepreneurs. Hence, this theory is often called the economic theory of democracy. Following Schumpeter, Anthony Downs too developed his model of competitive elitism. Downs argued that a system of open and competitive elections guarantees democratic rule because it placed government in the hands of the party whose philosophy, values and policies correspond most closely to the preferences of the largest group of voters. Thus, while early elitist theory of democracy in the hands of 226 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 Pareto, Mosca Michels and Ostrogorski was elitist, in the hands of Manheim and Schumpeter, it acquired the characteristics of competitive elitist model, where elites compete for vote. Therefore, democracy simply turns out to be a political method which acts as a means of making political decision through competitive struggle for gaining popular votes. Marxian Theory The Marxian theory of democracy revolves around three major thrust areas firstly, a critique of the bourgeois democracy, secondly, theory of dictatorship of proletariat and thirdly, social democracy leading to a classless society. Marxists challenge the liberal conception of the state as a neutral body. There are two strands of thinking about political power in the writings of Marx and Engels. In the first instance, Marx declared in the Communist Manifesto (1848) that the state and its agencies are the instruments of dominant class interest. Following an instrumentalist view, the Marxists argue that a liberal state is actually an instrument of the bourgeois rule where there is no equality, no freedom and hence, no democracy. According to them, the bourgeois democracy is a class democracy dominated by the bourgeoisie. In the second instance, Marx and Engels talk about the 'relative autonomy of the state' from the dominant class. The practice of parliamentary democracy and the compulsions of elections do lead governments to respond to some demands of the working class majority. But for Marxists, this is at best a short term measure because the state cannot go against the long term interests of capital. Marxists acknowledge the emancipator potential of liberalism because it rejects hierarchy and affirms the equal moral worth of all individuals. That is why, it appears that Lenin is not opposed to democracy as such, but only bourgeois democracy. Democracy provides a meaningful means for equality. Lenin considered democracy as significant step for achieving 'formal equality', ie. 'equality of labour and wages' and equality in ownership of means of production. This is the stage of dictatorship of proletariat, where democracy is realised not as a class concept but as people's democracy. In his claim to recall liberal democracy as bourgeois democracy John Plamenatz in his work entitled Democracy and Illusion had advanced the following arguments- Firstly, in the context of inequality of wealth and resources, power and influence will be possessed by those who acquire capacity to possess them through education and other such entry.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 227 Secondly, in the context of large organisations, power and influence belongs to the leaders than to rank and file Thirdly, in the context of social inequalities, leaders soon acquire ambition, privileged position and lose touch with their followers Finally, power and influence is exercised by those who have information and wealthy are better placed to get information and control its distribution. According to Plamenatz, due to these reasons, democracy is not real in liberal capitalist society. The above arguments, however, clearly suggests that the Marxian concept of democracy is not related to form of government is mainly linked to procedure of how leaders are elected. 16.7 Some Recent views on Democracy Feminist view Feminist critique of democracy rests on the following major arguments- 1. The liberal distinction between the public and the private 2. Gendered division of labour 3. Under representation of women in political institutions 4. Democratic theory being insensitive to the realities of women's lives. The liberal distinction between the Public and the Private Feminists argue that relation between men and women is based on unequal power relations and this is mainly due to the liberal distinction between the Public and Private. Family and the household is a part of the private sphere and hence, kept out of politics which solely lies under a public domain. Once being outcasted from politics, women's interest therefore, were placed out of democratization. Women's labour subsequently was not regarded as productive enough to constitute for paid labour. Domestic arena therefore, turns out to be a site of unequal power structure and therefore, an arena in need for democratization. Gender division of Labour According to Janaki Srinivasan, gendered division of labour and power in the private sphere is linked to the unequal distribution of political status and power in the public sphere. Western countries, which have the longest history of democracy,

228 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 but even there women were the last category to get the right to vote. Most political thinkers explicitly excluded women from the category of citizenship on the grounds of their natural inferiority and incapability. Under representation In contemporary democratic system women despite their political equality continue to be grossly underrepresented in political institutions and decision making structures. Further political equality has been undermined on the grounds of sexual, social and economic inequality. Democratic theory being insensitive to the realities of women's lives Democratic theory fails to realise that substantive equality for women have to be of a distinctive kind. It understands equality mechanically as mere removal of differences. So, formal political equality recognizes no difference among people and socio-economic equality understands difference as a disadvantage and seeks to remove them. But the idea of disadvantage is based on a notion of comparison which is always based on a particular standard. Neoliberal view The neoliberal view was favoured by public choice theorists like James Buchanan and Gordon Tullock. They contend that elites and their allies will tend to expand the powers of government and bureaucracy for their own interests, and that this expansion will occur at the expense of a largely inattentive public. Only those interest groups that are guided by powerful economic interests are likely to succeed in organising to influence the government. Furthermore, they argue that such interest group will tend to produce highly inefficient government, because they will attempt to advance their interests in politics while spreading the costs to others. Thus, neoliberals argue that any way of organising a large and powerful democratic state is likely to produce serious inefficiencies. However, the neoliberal account of democracy also shares certain inherent limitations. First, citizens in modern societies have more ambitious conceptions of social justice and the common good than are realizable by the minimal state. The neoliberal account thus, implies a very serious curtailment of democracy of its own. Second, the neoliberal approach ignores the problem of large private concentrations of wealth and power that are capable of pushing small states around for their own benefit, and of imposing their wills on populations without their consent. The

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 229 assumptions that lead neoliberals to be sceptical about the large modern state imply equally disturbing problems for the large private concentrations of wealth in a neoliberal society. New Right view The post 1973 decade saw one of the substantive economic difficulties for most advanced industrial countries including Britain and France. Economic growth and relative prosperity received a severe blow in these countries compared to their preceding decades. These new conditions provoked a rightward electoral shift in the majority of western democracies. These rightward shifts were pronounced in Britain and USA and were associated with a grouping of ideas and movements collectively termed as the "New Right". It is difficult to specify the term "New Right" as it has been variously applied to government public policy and administrations. Infact, the term cannot be used to any particular ideas, theorists and politicians since there is not one simple and coherent set of principles but rather several not necessarily linked together. Kenneth Hoover recognises three main set of ideas within liberalism that have its influence on the arguments forwarded by the New Right. First, liberals defend the superiority of the markets in producing economic prosperity and political freedom. These "traditional liberal values" may be reduced to an emphasis upon the individual, a limited role to the state and support for market processes. Secondly, following public choice analysis emphasis is given on application of economic techniques and assumptions to political and social behaviour. Therefore, constitution should be redesigned to control public spending and market practices to be introduced in the Public Sector. Thirdly, liberalism embraces the ideas of "libertarians" who promote a more trenchant version of liberal economic and political principles but who remain a distant subgroup of liberalism. However, here it must be noted that liberal values are not the only ones associated with New Right. There also exists a set of moral and social arguments too. According to A. Heywood, New Right theorists are keen advocates of the free market, believing that economies work best when left alone by the government. They have focussed upon the danger of what has been called 'democratic overload'. This overload, on part of the government can be seen to be a consequence of the electoral process. Thus, according to Samuel Brittan, electoral politics amounts to a self defeating process in which politicians are encouraged to compete for power by offering increasingly unrealistic promises to the electorate. Voters are attracted by promises of higher public spending because they calculate that the cost will be spread 230 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 over the entire population. According to Brittan the economic consequences of unrestrained democracies are high levels of inflation fuelled by public borrowing, and a tax burden that destroys enterprise and undermines growth. New Right theorists therefore, tend to see democracy in strictly protective terms, regarding it essentially as a defence against arbitrary government rather than a means of bringing about social transformation. 16.8 Conclusion Discussion on democracy thus, suggests that there are divergent views on the very nature and desirability of democracy. The concept had traversed a long way to indicate a mere political system to a way of life in contemporary times. The demand of democratization at all levels of life had broadly extended its jurisdiction and tends to develop a culture based on equality and collective decision making. It calls for an end of authoritarianism at all levels of institutions, be it social or political. However, democracy as a way of life could flourish only when a higher level of tolerance, on part of the individual and institutions are encouraged, so that the voices of the opposition could be raised as comfortably and seriously like the established voices of the existing society. Till then, democracy would just be a fish out of water which may be sustained by artificial means but at the cost of sacrificing its very essence. 16.9 Summing Up Democracy not merely means a form of government alone. It also imbibes for a culture in which certain intrinsic human values like that of tolerance, equality, freedom and the like is fostered and retained in society. Democracy as a method of making legislation is better than non democratic methods in three ways namely strategically, epistemically and via the improvements of the characters of democratic citizens. Critics of democracy can be classified into two groups namely those who are dissatisfied with a particular kind of democratic practice and seek to deepen it and those who are critical of the democratic principle as such. There are a number of rival theories or models of democracy namely Classical Democracy, Protective Democracy, Developmental Democracy, People's Democracy, Participatory Democracy and Cosmopolitan Democracy.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 233 democracy in a country. Liberal democracy sees citizenship as the principal prerequisite of the democratic system where the citizens act as an active participant in the processes of decision making around public policy. This is based upon the principles that citizens should be considered the best judge of their own interests. They are capable of making social and political decisions and also hold the key to political influence through the media of participation, discussion, voting and through the movement towards political equality. This perspective obliges elective representatives and public servants to be cognisant of the values, beliefs and needs of the citizenry, to cultivate necessary levels of political competence in the citizenry and to activate those sections of the citizenry who generally fail to articulate their views. This therefore, suggests for participatory processes to avail the requisite political need. Thus, political participation turns out to a cornerstone of democracy and the primary mechanism through which citizens influence political officials and hold their governments accountable. So, it provides the ideological and philosophical bases for the relationship between a state and its citizens. Ajit Chaudhuri in one of his article has highlighted three inherent conflicts that citizens' participation entails. Firstly, public policy in modern societies is complicated and decision making around it requires expertise, vision and strategy. At the same time, modern societies see value in extending the democratic base of such decision making through participation but participation is inherently contentious, confused and conflicting. It is rarely possible to maximise both these value preferences. Secondly, meaningful citizen participation affects power relationships in society by increasing the role of ordinary citizens in decision making, and thereby simultaneously reducing that of the elite. The view that reduced power differentials would lead to better public policy and therefore, to better governance is in sharp contrast with the view that the maintenance of differentials is a precondition to social order and that the elite are better able to handle society's decision making responsibilities. Thirdly, participation requires participants who are motivated to act. Empirical evidence suggests, that such motivation is negligible among the general citizenry but high among organised interest groups looking to use apathy around public decision making processes to bend policy towards their aims. Needless to say, that any decision on the usage of participatory processes has to take into account the above stated three dilemmas and adequately address them for a better planning, implementing and monitoring of public services. 17.2 Meaning of Political Participation Political Participation, as one of the basic concept in political science has been

234 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 defined by scholars in different ways. The concept has gained a key place in contemporary political science in general and political sociology in particular. In a very general sense, political participation essentially means taking part in politics. However, getting involved in politics may imply participation at varying degrees and at different levels. For instance, some may be highly active and may even choose politics as a career while there may be others who may appear to abstain completely from political activity and may even refuse to apply polling right. As a concept, political participation includes both the cited extremes and as obvious therefore, makes the concept complex and highly controversial. Adoption of a standard definition on the concept automatically tends to include or excludes certain activity from the purview of political participation thereby, leading to debates in ascertaining an activity to be regarded at all as an act of participation into politics. For example, political participation is defined as those voluntary actions in which people seek to influence the making of public policy, then the emphasis on voluntary actions appears to exclude those forms of mass participation that are obligatory or coerced as for example the requirement of shows of symbolic support for authoritarian regimes. Such a definition might further exclude the act of voting in democratic countries where voting is required by law. The recent Taliban occupancy in Afghanistan might invite almost a similar debate with regard to the concept. There have been several attempts in Political Science to define political participation and analyse its nature from different perspective. Sidney Verba and Norman Nie state that 'political participation will refer to those voluntary activities by which members of a society share in the selection of rulers and directly and indirectly in the formation and influencing of public policy.' They view political participation as legal activities which are aimed at influencing the selection of governmental personnel and the actions they take. Samuel P. Huntington and Joan M. Nelson defined political participation as 'the activity by private citizens designed to influence governmental decision making.' This is almost similar to Verba and Nie's definition. Michael Rush has viewed political participation from a rather broader angle. To him, 'political participation is the involvement of the individual at various levels of activity in the political system, ranging from non involvement to the holding of political office.' This definition sheds the legal overtones of the earlier two definitions. However, in almost all definitions there is a latent emphasis on voluntary participation by the people. Obligatory or coerced mass action, such as the show of symbolic support for authoritarian rules, is not considered as political participation. Infact, it is a point of debate among the political scientists whether political participation should include only voluntary participation by the people or otherwise. A more inclusive definition was provided by G. Parry, G. Moyser and N.Day. According to them, 'political participation consists of

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 235 taking part in the process of formulation, passage and implementation of public policies. This implies to include those actions which seeks to shape the attitudes of decision makers to matters yet to be decided, or it may be action in protest at the outcome of some decision.' According to Parry, 'political participation is not confined to successful actions only. Those actions that fail to fulfil their desired goal are also regarded as political participation. The present definition therefore, broadens the ambit of political participation. 17.3 Factors affecting Political Participation Political scientists have identified a number of socio-economic and political factors which influence the degree and rate of political participation. Robert E. Lane makes a meticulous study to identify those socio-psychological and political variables to explain various forms of political participation in USA. His generalisation could be easily taken into consideration for understanding the nature of political participation, in general. All these factors are not equally effective and important at all places and at all times. Their relative importance and effectiveness are time-place specific. The different factors as identified, can be summed up in the following manner- a) Psychological factors The psychological factor emerges from individual personality traits and cognitive structures. Such structures involves political activities of man's need for power, competition and achievements, affiliation, aggression, money prestige, status, recognition, approval, manipulation, sympathy and responsibility. Participation may also be classified in terms of goals. These are- instrumental and consummatory. Instrumental political activities are primarily oriented towards concrete goals such as the party's victory in the election. Consummatory or expressive activities are aimed at more immediate satisfaction. For example, common people who cast their vote and feel elated for being involved in the decision making process. b) Social factors Political participation is determined to a great extent by social factors such as education, income, age, place of residence, religion etc. Some of these factors for convenience are discussed below- i) Education - Education acts as an important determinant in formulating reasonable thinking and voting. It is widely understood, that there is a natural and necessary correlation between an individual's educational 236 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 qualifications and his/her participation in politics. Almond and Verba opine that education attracts the individual towards democratic political culture. Education gives information about politics and expands the horizon of one's interest in the political process. It enables the individual to develop the skill for political participation. ii) Income - People belonging to the higher income groups are generally found to be interested in political participation. This however, does not mean that a rise in income has a uniformly proportionate effect on political participation. Although, income at the individual level is an important correlate of political participation, it may not necessarily be so at the national level. A recent study contradicts the facts and claims that low income groups are easily mobilized and actively participate in political activities. Vendors, hawkers, riksha pullers, auto drivers etc. are now more politically vigilant than the middle class and their turn out in polls at times outnumber the middle class people. iii) Age - Along with education and income age and sex are also sometimes important in explaining political participation. Those who are too young lack experience about politics. The lack of stability and security at the early age usually makes the young evasive of political participation. Older people on the other hand, cannot participate very actively due to the lack of physical fitness and declining political efficacy. Middle aged citizens are usually free from the problems of the too young or the too old and tend to participate more actively. However, there can be exceptions to this general rule depending upon the type of political participation. For example, if within the domain of political participation the protests movements of the students are included then such movements launched by students and youths of different countries shows that the above explanation no longer holds good. iv) Place of residence - It is often argued that an individual's place of residence has its impact upon his/her fate of political participation. Usually, urbanites are found to be more participative than their rural counterparts. City dwellers get greater opportunities of education which helps in their greater understanding of political issues. They are much more exposed to different forms of mass media. It makes them more informed about politics. Rural people are generally denied these opportunities. This negatively affects their rate of participation. However, such a rural-urban divide does not hold good in all cases. Researches have shown that in Japan, the rural NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 237 folk participate more than the city people. Again, it is also suggested that the longer a person resides in a given community, the greater are the chances of his/her political participation. v) Religion - Some studies on political participation have attempted to indicate that religion also sometimes has an impact on political participation. It has been shown mainly in the context of the western political systems that generally catholics participate more in elections that involves issues like legislation on birth control or matters touching the affairs of educational institutions imbued with catholic beliefs. The impact of religion on politics is more evident in political systems that are not secular in the real sense of the term. Religions in such cases are often used in various ways as a major component of political behaviour – particularly in the arena of electoral politics and also outside its boundary. c) Economic factors Economy has an impact in formulating political participation. Affluent class of the society either controls political participation through muscle and money or tries to maintain the status quo of the political system. They rebel against the evils of the society and clamour for positive change. But the people at the lowest economic ebb do not rationalise their voting behaviour. They are swayed by emotions and mobilised by local area elites. Therefore, in a developed society the level of political participation is high as compared to the developing society. d) Political factors Political participation is no doubt a political activity, but it is highly influenced by non political variables like caste, community etc. However, it cannot be suggested that political factors are of no use. They do play a crucial role in articulating political participation. The natures of political system have impact on the political participation. Constitutional structure, election procedure, party system, role of press and the functions of the organs of state decides the voting behaviour in any political system. Political orientations, affiliations ideological commitments and cognition of issues and events determine political participation. 17.4 Types of Political Participation Earlier citizen's involvement in the political process was regarded as the only

238 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 form of political participation.

Then the perspective of the concept was limited. However, with the widening of the concept of politics from state centric, institutional and legal analysis to individual socio-political behaviour or interaction, the scope of the concept of political participation was enhanced beyond electoral participation. Political participation, thus, can broadly be classified into two types namely- 1. Participation in the electoral process 2. Participation through other modes

1. Participation in the electoral process Modern day democracies are indirect, representative democracies. To realize the idea of representative democracy in practice, various institutional arrangements are needed. The electoral system is one of the most important of these. It is through the electoral process that individuals choose their representatives who perform the act of governing on their behalf. Shefali Roy in her book on Political Sociology has highlighted some of the major types of political participation.

a) Voting - Electorate in order to safeguard themselves and secure their rights needs to be critical in analysing government performance. Citizens must not be guided by social psychological pressures, rather, should cast votes on the basis of political efficacy. So voting becomes not only a political right of a citizen but also a basic duty. Adult franchise is universally practiced where an adult citizen takes initiative to vote and to control the reigns of power holders.

b) Campaigning - An individual can take part in the electoral processes in a number of ways, for instance as a voter, as a candidate, taking part in election campaigns, discussing politics, distributing party literature, attending political meetings and so on. In whatever ways a citizen takes part, the individual actually performs the act of political participation. Such participation naturally assumes greater importance in a democratic political system. One such major form of political participation is campaigning. Citizens actively involve themselves in canvassing. Citizens use their vehicles, money or man power in canvassing for a particular political party or for a particular political candidate. Though they are not the main political actor, yet they seek and capture power as a reward of their loyalty towards a party or a person. Those persons who have keen interest in political affairs motivate masses to cast vote, and makes an effort to produce collective mobility.

c) Self interest - Self interest makes an individual an active citizen. They are NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 239 continuously involved in political activities right from reading newspapers to taking processions. They always assess and express the performance of the government through processions and debates. Moreover, they always remain ready for forming interest groups with the government officials to get their work or others work done with or without gratification.

d) Collective activity - In such a type of political participation, citizens do not act on their own rather joins a group to influence the decision making process. The citizens may even put pressure on the government and get certain policies framed. They work for collective gain, but in most of the cases, they promote a small group of interests. Such an activity is mainly the output of vested interests.

2. Participation through other modes In addition to taking part in the electoral process and voting, there are many other ways by which the individual can participate in politics. A number of political scientists have attempted to identify and classify different types of political participation. Anthony Birch has included many other kinds of activities than that of merely voting, within the purview of political participation. These are, for example, active membership of a political party or a pressure group, taking part in political demonstrations, industrial strikes with political objectives and similar activities aimed at changing public policy. While identifying different forms of political participation, Michael Rush and P. Althoff arrange them in a hierarchical order on the basis of the degree or extent of participation. They place the types of activities in a descending order-

i) Holding political or administrative office ii) Seeking political or administrative office iii) Active membership in a political organization iv) Passive membership in a political organization v) Active membership of a quasi political organization vi) Passive membership of a quasi political organization vii) Participation in public meetings and demonstration viii) Participation in informal political discussion ix) General interest in politics

240 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 x) Voting xi) Political Apathy What is significant in this hierarchical arrangement is that the act of voting has been placed almost at the lowest level. The argument forwarded is that in all political systems the election is an occasional, periodic happening. Moreover, the act of voting requires minimum involvement and labour on part of the individual. Milbrath's classification tends to show that political participation basically is of two types namely active and passive. This distinction actually is a necessary outcome of the most common fact that political participation in every society has a cost that involves time, energy and resources. Not all people are equally able or even willing to bear these costs and hence, all are not direct and active participants in every society. Political participation may further be classified in terms of its purpose as instrumental and expressive. Instrumental political participation is essentially directed to the achievement of concrete goals like securing party victory or the passage of a bill or just a rise in one's status or influence. Expressive political participation, on the other hand, does not aim at the realisation of any concrete goal. It is concerned with some immediate satisfaction or a mere release of feeling. Thus, some vote because they are really interested in the political results flowing from the elections or in any material gain for themselves, but because they just have a feeling of satisfaction in exercising their voting right. Milbrath classified the acts of political participation into three categories namely 'Gladiatorial Activities', 'Transitional Activities' and 'Spectator Activities'. In Milbrath's scheme, political participation was seen as a hierarchical activity. He arranged the American population in three groups namely 'gladiator', 'spectator' and 'apathetic'. His classification of activities for convenience is discussed in the following manner: - a) Gladiatorial Activities- This category includes the activities which are part of routine of the political parties, such as elections to political post, participation in election to legislature, gathering fund for the party, movements to increase membership, and organization of meetings everywhere to form public opinion in its favour etc. b) Transitional Activities- These include activities of the helpers and well wishers of the political parties, such as hearing the lectures of the leaders, donating to the fund of the party and maintaining contact with the leader of the party. c) Spectator Activities- This category includes voting, influencing others vote, NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 241 participating in political debate, being influenced by political stimuli, wearing badges of the political party and distributing leaflets etc. However, the analysis of Milbrath throws light upon the nature of the political participation which is always changing, from time to time and place to place. Some later studies on political participation felt the need to amend Milbrath's one dimensional hierarchical model. This was reflected in the important researches by Verba, Nie and J.O.Kim. These researches pointed to a picture of highlighted specialisation in political participation. The research done by Parry, Moyser and Day on participation in Britain showed that among those people who did more than vote four sub groups could be distinguished namely- a) Protestors b) Election campaigners c) People active in community groups and d) People who specialised in individual contacts with officials, politicians or the media. Most legislators are familiar with constituents in this last category. Based on their findings a more elaborate and sophisticated classification of political participation was presented. The participants were classified into six classes namely- a) Totally Passive b) Voter whose only activity is to vote in elections c) Localist whose activities are limited within the boundaries of local level politics d) Parochial who is interested only in those activities that fulfil his/her personal needs e) Campaigner whose involvement in politics centres around some particular political issues and problems and f) Total Activist who takes an active part in the political process as a whole. These different types of political participation can be placed at different points along a continuum whose one end starts with total passivity and at the other lies the total activist. 17.5 Types of Non Political Participation If political participation happens to be one of the crucial yardstick to measure the success of democracy then simultaneously it has to be noted that there are cases of non participation as well. It is essential to identify the major types of non participation since this will enable us to analyse the reasons behind the passivity with regard to

Broadly, there are four main types of non participation which are – a) Apathy – Social scientists have shown interest in certain forms of political non participation of which apathy is one of them. Apathy is a type of political passivity which provides support for the regime, but enables the individual to avoid the politicization of his/her whole being. There are different causes of apathy. In a democracy one usually comes across two types of apathetics. There are those who fail to participate because of a lack of information about and interest in the political world which results from their political indifference and incapacity and also from a lack of the opportunity to participate. This kind of political apathy which is far from deliberate and is usually found among the uneducated, the inarticulate, the parochial, the isolated and also among those whose very roles operate only on the basis of a kind of political passivity. At the same time, there is another group of persons who are highly aware of the political changes and they are either frustrated and helpless or highly satisfied and wills no change whatsoever, to bring in the polity, and therefore, deliberately keeps themselves away from the political activities. There may be very many reasons why an individual deliberately shuns political involvement. In the first, it may be due to the fact that political involvement to an individual may appear to be far less rewarding than other kinds of human activity. One may tend to derive higher psychological satisfaction and greater amount of concrete material benefits from one's preoccupation with family, friends and the like than from political involvement. The extent to which political participation will thus, be lowly valued by an individual, however, depends on two factors- psychological and social. An individual's mental make up may be such that he has a greater interest in his primordial, biological and psychological needs than in the distant and vague results likely to flow from political involvement. Secondly, an individual is likely to be disinterested in his/her political participation, if he/she somehow goes by the belief that it really makes no sense in as far as it will never be able to change the existing state of things. Thirdly, political apathy may also result from the fact that an individual is too satisfied with the efficiency and efficacy of the political system of which he/she belongs to. He/she may have so great a confidence in the excellence of a political system that he/she may be led to the belief that the system will go on functioning smoothly and efficiently no matter whether he/she is politically involved or not. This explains why voting turn outs raise high in times of economic crisis in USA in 1936.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 243 Apathy leads to the decline of political vitality and vigilance. This might ultimately result in depriving this particular section of the society who need most to be represented for exercising the right to influence the decision making process. Sometimes political apathy becomes an ideology which is detrimental to the interests of the nation. Infact, political apathy makes politics confused, complicated and contradictory, and political communication becomes mere propaganda. Personal reasons may also account for apathy. It develops certain degree of mental laziness to a phobia toward a serious thought of political decay. Whatever be the cause or causes, political apathy remains a crucial problem. b) Cynicism – Cynicism etymologically means complete distrust towards others. It is a psychological disorder where good deeds of others are always taken into suspicion and doubt. Such a person grows a cell around him/her and becomes isolated. They also become pessimistic and regard political leaders as actors of oppression. Political cynicism, if increases qualitatively or quantitatively, it weakens the foundation of democracy. Cynical person regards voting as a futile effort to control the government. They are fed up with the existing political system and at the same time they are not optimistic towards bringing about change. Thus, cynicism leads to lack of legitimacy and popular support for the political system. c) Alienation- Alienation as a concept was elucidated by Satre and Marx which is a stage of dilemma. The inherent conflict and the loss of judgement lead to it. In a political system such a condition of a man/woman divorces him/ her from the day to day activities. A person purposefully segregates themselves from the polity. d) Anomie- This is another psychological phenomenon which refers to a sense of rootlessness, loss of values and lack of direction among individuals. Anomie inhibits political participation because as in the case of apathy it implies a feeling of ineffectiveness or a feeling that authorities do not care about the common people. However, there is also a difference between the two. While the former is passive in nature, latter involves fear, panic, violence and destruction. The implication of anomic attitude is reflected at the individual level in the form of suicide, as riot at the group level and as terrorism at the country and cross country level. This is a very serious problem as it involves devaluation of norms and goals.

244 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 This suggests that participation by the people in the political process is regarded as one of the essential preconditions for the success of democracy. Thus, in a democracy, non participation may be viewed as a disease or a crisis. 17.6 Voting behaviour One of the major concern of political participation in a representative democracy is the voting behaviour. It is in a true democracy, that, election provides opportunities for the most overt forms of political participation. Broadly speaking, the factors responsible for voting behaviour can be classified into three categories namely socio- economic, psychological and political. a) Socio-economic The socio-economic factors are governed by the following:- 1) Caste- The study of electoral behaviour suggests that the main force behind voting in India is caste. Rajani Kothari had a firm belief that voting is an extended family affair usually guided by the choice of the head of the family or caste affiliation. He further added that caste and community are two easily identified social clusters which are keenly and deliberately exploited by the politicians for the electoral gain. The most glaring example in India can be Mandal and Kamandal Politics. 2) Class- Class cleavage in the society though being a sociological concept has a lasting political impact. Karl Marx rightly claims that there are only two class in the society- haves and have-nots. The economically dominant class according to him, remains more authoritative than the middle income group. Politicians take help from capitalist class in contesting elections, and in return give them certain favours. Class factor remains important in orienting voting behaviour. The role of class in electoral politics has come in for critical review in the work of Geoffrey Evans where it was indicated adequately how class is still relevant as an important explanatory variable in voting behaviour. 3) Community- Religious affinity and race can also turn into communal frenzy. The dictates of religious heads or priests in guiding voting behaviour needs to be discouraged. As it happens to be a sensitive issue politicians try to gain optimum result out of it. Be it Ram Janam Bhumi or Babri Masjid or the Khalistan issue religious sentiments are exploited NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 245 for vested interests. The influence of religion is more pronounced in the developing countries like that of India where the pace of secularisation is slow and the grip of tradition is strong. 4) Region- Geographical proximity also plays a crucial role in influencing the voting pattern. The north south divide in India is a glaring example of opposed political behaviour. The autonomy of the state within a federal structure is a result of regional imbalances and strikingly different political culture. The emergence of regional parties was mainly due to the fact that Congress as a party failed to serve the interests of the nation as a whole. It was alleged to be a party of north India and south Indians as a sharp reaction to it found their own regional parties for promoting their sectional interests. 5) Language- Linguistic loyalty often forms the basis for the formation of political parties dedicated to meet the requirement of specific groups. Language affinity is a direct offshoot of regional grievances and is purposefully used by political leaders for seeking or holding power. Unfortunately, Hindi as a language has been a bone of contention between north and south India. 6) Money- Food, security and adequate means of livelihood remains the most complicated problem in a larger democracy like that of India. Welfare state functions on the principle of just and human order. India too, follows its footsteps but the non delivery of the services at the grassroot level aggravates the problem. b) Socio-Psychological factors The voting behaviour reveals the fact that human psychology also has an impact on exercising of vote. Even in western democracies, personality or sympathy voting cannot be denied. The sudden demise of a political leader pulls sympathy of the masses which are often reflected in the in their voting behaviour. For example, post poll results after the assassination of Indira Gandhi and her son Rajiv Gandhi reveals this truth. Film stars and celebrities find easy to become representatives because of the popular support. Age is also a difficult factor to treat as an independent variable. However, older voters tend to vote for conservative parties. Though there is no final finding regarding gender as a determinant of voting behaviour but Lipset found that 246 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 women are more sensitive towards ethical issues and therefore, corruption criminalisation adversely affects their behaviour. c) Political factors The major political determinants of voting behaviour includes- political orientation, political issues and events, political ideological allegiance, political efficacy and anti incumbency factor. Political variables have not received due attention. What motivates the electorate to become a voter is its sense of political security rather than performance efficacy. Matured political systems demand political orientation of the electorate. Here, the role of the political party becomes highly crucial and responsible. Political parties disseminate political ideas and information and make voters aware of their polling rights. Elections are contested primarily based on issues where there is ideological ambiguity in the party system. Long term continuities in allegiance to particular group or ideologies inspite of the changes in the issues or in the role of different political parties remains stable conditions underlying mandate. For example- older people have a very strong affiliation to Indian National Congress and they are not ready to undermine its importance even with the changing behavioural pattern of the party. People link themselves with the political system and political parties, as they do with caste or community. It has also been found that ideological allegiance varies from area to area. There are many factors responsible for political allegiance. The family orientation, the individual interest or the ideological affiliation work together as man is a product of multiple and dynamic environmental factors. The most analytical and critical voting behaviour is based on evaluating performance of political parties. Political participation is a human activity fundamentally and therefore, cannot be completely free from personal preferences. The analysis of the past elections provides us many examples where voters were influenced by immediate political speeches and normative agendas. It is true that voting behaviour cannot provide a final explanation of the voting participation. Yet, it cannot be denied that they establish some important links. These links are extremely important since through continuous verification of these links in different historical conditions, one may finally arrive at some reliable propositions and it is in the perspective of these propositions that one can make an attempt of a theoretical analysis of the phenomenon of political participation.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 247 17.7 Political Participation of Women
Role of women in political participation has been a topic of much discussion in the recent years. The participation of women in electoral process can be defined not only in terms of the equality and freedom with which they share political power with men, but also in terms of the liberty and space provided for women in the democratic framework of electoral politics. The marginalisation of female from electoral participation in India stems not mainly from competition arisen between national and regional parties in terms of seat allotments but also from the patriarchal prejudices that shrouded the political parties and refrain them to be in command even within the organization. In contrast to the poor allotment of seats to women by political parties in the elections and marginalisation within the party structure, female electoral participation as voters has been a notable upsurge in the late 1990's as voter turnout in the last few elections. The electoral participation of women in India, invites a wide range of opinions and divergent views. On the one hand, some theorists argued that the electoral process in India is fraught with male patriarchy and dominance that act as impediments to women participation. The lack of political voice and poor representation in the Parliament bears the testimony of such claims. On the other hand, there are theorists who dispute this argument and feel that the increased participation of women in electoral competition as voters and sharing of political power at the grassroot level reveal that electoral politics in India is no more gender exclusive but is quite inclusive. The participation of women has been systematically analysed by Praveen Rai in one of his article published in Economic and Political Weekly (EPW) using a pyramidal electoral participation model stratified at four levels on a quantitative basis. This model suggests the following four strata- 1) In the top strata, is female representation in the lower house of the Parliament and in Legislative Assemblies which is the narrowest and most constricted numerically. 2) In the second strata, are women as candidate in electoral competition participating as members and functionaries of political parties where their representation in quantitative terms is more than that at the top layer. 3) In the third strata, as active campaigners for political parties where female participation is much larger in numbers than that in the second strata.

248 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 4) In the bottom strata, with the widest base of women in numerical terms as single time voters. The levels of female participation at the top tiers of electoral competition are fairly low as compared to Indian men and the only level of electoral participation where they have achieved some degree of parity are as voters in elections. Thus, women's participation in electoral competition has been restricted to being periodic electors, something that is not only promoted and encouraged by the political parties and society but also by the state organs in India. Before analysing the low level of representation of women in the lower house of the Parliament, it is worthwhile to compare their positions with other countries of South Asia in recent years. The representation of women in the lower house of Afghanistan Parliament is the highest ie. 27% as witnessed at the first parliamentary election after the downfall of the first Taliban rule. Apart from Afghanistan, Iraq and Pakistan are the two countries in the region where women representatives occupy more than 20% seats in the lower house of the Parliament. The reasons for other countries being ranked higher than India is mainly due to reservation of seats for women in the lower house of the Parliament. Thus, India (10.86) and Srilanka (4.89) are two countries in the region where representation in the Parliament is below the world average of 20% representation of women. The main factors as identified by P.Rai includes the following- Firstly, socio-economic forces inherited from nationalist movement, current social policies and the gendered nature of citizenship in hampering women's political participation in government structures, elections and community organisations. Secondly, lack of reservation of seats for women in the Parliament and state legislatures. Thirdly, lack of national consensus and willingness among political parties to give more tickets to women in elections. Fourthly, perpetuation of a patriarchal political structure together with caste, class and gender subordination acting as strong deterrents to women contesting elections. Finally, lack of awareness and knowledge of electoral politics combined with a lack of support from the family and political parties in resources severely affects women's chances to contest and win elections. However, despite the gloomy reality, the silver lining over women's participation in electoral politics in India, is the participatory upsurge witnessed among women as voters since 1990s. Women's participation has also noticeably increased in campaign

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 249 activities during the election. It is obvious to address the key barriers restricting women's participation in politics on a priority basis and simultaneously efforts on part of the government and the civil society to motivate women for their active participation in formal politics is needed to be ensured. An increased participation of women in active politics will not only ensure equality with men but will further enhance the scope to address larger serious issues concerning women which were otherwise mostly neglected. 17.8 Conclusion Electoral politics in liberal democracies are going through revolutionary changes with the ushering in of new techniques of electoral propaganda and marketing strategy. If the new politics based on new social movements have tended to activate the civil society in influencing the elections then the role of technology particularly internet and social media have engulfed the country with cyber campaigns. The increasing use of opinion polls and development of several research groups meant for elections (like MARG, IMRB etc.) have helped political parties and candidates to develop a marketing strategy. The intense usage of such tools not only gave birth to media hype centering on elections but has a significant influence upon the electoral behaviour of the voters. 17.9 Summing Up Political participation as one of the basic concept in Political Science has been defined by scholars in different ways. In a very general sense, political participation essentially means taking part in politics. However, getting involved in politics may imply participation at varying degrees and at different levels. Political scientists like Robert E. Lane have identified a number of socio- economic and political factors which influence the degree and rate of political participation. Political participation can broadly be classified into two types namely- participation in the electoral process and participation through other modes. There are cases of non participation in democracy too, such as apathy, cynicism, alienation and anomie. One of the major concerns of political participation in a representative democracy

The meaning of representation ? The different theories relating to suffrage ? Different theories on representation ? A variety of models related to representation 18.1 Introduction Electorate and Representation happens to be one of the most significant areas of discussion with regard to liberal democracies of contemporary world. Democracy implies popular sovereignty and popular sovereignty becomes meaningful only when 252 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 electorate exercises their right to vote to constitute a government. So to make democracy effective in practical plane, it is the elections that play the most crucial role. The practice of periodic elections in liberal democracies and in electing representatives to act as a custodian of masses gave rise to the idea of representation. However, the method to ensure representation had given rise to severe controversies amongst scholars. Subsequently, a number of theories in representation have been introduced based on distinct ideological and political assumptions. Growing political consciousness of the masses led to the belief that governmental actions must conform to the interest of the public. Under the ancient democracies, the citizens of the city states participated in the making of laws and administration of public business. In the large nation states of the later ages, direct popular participation became impossible. Consequently, the practice of electing periodically some representatives, who would work as the trustee of the people, came to be developed. This gave birth to the idea of representation.

18.2 Idea of Representation What is Representation? If we go by the meaning of the term representation in accordance to the Oxford Advanced Learner, it implies, “the act of presenting someone or something in a particular way”. However, this is a very general meaning of the term. Specifically, in political parlance representation is the process through which influence by the entire citizenry or a part of them is exerted upon governmental action, with their express approval, exercised on their behalf by a smaller number among them with binding effect upon those represented. Historically, the idea of representation was often used synonymously with responsible government. But here, a clear line of distinction is required to be drawn between the two. Usually, the purpose of representation is the attainment of responsibility. But there may be governments, which inspite of the fact that they are characterised by representative assemblies, are not responsible in their manners of operation. The fascist government of Italy and the government in Hitler’s Germany had elections yet, they were not responsible governments. Contrarily, a government may be responsible without being representative. For instance, the ancient democracies operating through direct popular vote did not have any system of representations. In a democracy, however, representation is a method of securing responsible government.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 253 Again, representation is often referred to mean delegating authority to somebody and thereby, surrender their right of judgement of policy. However, modern representation is not merely another name for delegation. Representation implies both direction and control. Infact, delegation requires the consent of the governed, whereas representation requires the fulfilment of their will. The purpose of representation is as much to choose representatives as to exercise control over the direction of governmental policy. The principles of representation have generated profound and recurring political controversies. With the spread of democracy in the 19 th and 20 th centuries, questions arose largely centering upon the issue who should be represented. Initially, representatives were elected by only male, propertied section of the society. However, later the question was largely been resolved through the widespread acceptance of the principle of political equality in the formal sense by means of universal suffrage. Women were enfranchised in Switzerland in 1971, and racial criterion for voting was swept away in South Africa in 1994. But equating representation merely with elections and voting makes the approach of representation too simplistic, since then it tends to ignore a more difficult question as how one person can represent the interests of others and what it is that he/she represents. Furthermore, the transformation of the older social unity based on territory into diverse specialised interests has created a problem in the theory of representation. It is often argued, as how can diverse individual opinions and group interests be represented. A partial solution to this problem can be found in the political parties. Insofar as the parties cut across local and personal prejudices, sectional and occupational differences, they serve to integrate the diverse forces. Still, the representation of the multifarious interests through the political parties is not quite satisfactory. Infact, a representation cannot be expected to represent all the interests in the constituency. That is why, several methods of representations have been suggested to resolve the problems arising out of it. Nature of Representation History throws some light on the nature of representation. As the ancient democracies operated through direct popular participation in public affairs, the problem of representation did not arise at all. However, with the emergence of the kings in the feudal societies of Europe, the custom of calling representatives from the communities developed. This was necessary for the purpose of obtaining their consent to extraordinary taxes or levies. The local representatives presented complaints and petitions, and bargained on grants of money. Hence, they were not true representatives but acting as local powers under special instructions or mandates.

254 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 Generally speaking, in the past a representative used to represent the councils of the king which was a close knit community with a distinctive unity of its own. It could well serve the purpose of the constituency. However, only highlighting upon the local interests, the question of national interest seems to have been neglected. Thus, this led to the theory that a representative must rise above petty localism and represent the national interests. In contemporary times, constituencies are strips of territory where various kinds of voters live. Hence, the boundaries of constituencies are frequently readjusted to give representations by populations. 18.3 Theories of nature of suffrage As the question of representation is integrally connected with the voting system, it is worthwhile to note the different theories as propounded surrounding the nature of this political right. These are briefly discussed in the following manner: The Natural Right Theory This theory is actually derived from the theory of social contract which expresses an explanation with regard to the origin of the state. The contract theory assumed a hypothetical state of nature where the people were supposed to be living a free and equal life under the laws of nature. Since the state was created by the people through a contract among themselves, they have a natural right to take part in the government. This right to vote is thus, an abstract right derived from the ancient laws of nature. The Legal Right Theory This theory treats suffrage not as a natural right but as a political right granted by the law of the state. Voting is a public function and the electorate is an organ of government. Hence, the composition and powers of the electorate are determined by law. The Ethical Theory This theory regards the right to vote as a means for the self expression of the individual in political affairs. By allowing the individual to associate itself with the government, suffrage ensures the development of human personality. The Tribal Theory The conception of inclusive citizenship developed among the early Greek, Roman and German led to the theory of suffrage. Within a narrow citizen class, NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 255 voting was supposed to be a part of the life of the community. It was necessary attribute of membership of the state. Citizenship as a qualification for voting today is a survival of the tribal theory. The Feudal Theory This theory as developed in the latter part of the middle ages, argues, that the right to vote depends on a particular social status. In the past, it was usually associated with the ownership of land. The modern emphasis in some states on property qualification may be said to be a relic of the feudal theory. Though the feudal theory and the legal theory tend to limit the right to vote by imposing some restrictions but the widest possible extension of suffrage was supported by the tribal theory, the natural rights theory and the ethical theory. However, a controversy arises concerning voting whether to be regarded as a moral duty or a legal obligation. Whatever be the motive behind its practice, it cannot be denied that voting to be made a compulsory act if at all, the will of the electorate is to be ensured. 18.4 Theories of Representation It is difficult to determine representation through a single general theory. The theories of representation evolve mainly over the issue of the role to be played by representation in the process of policy making. Different theories have been propounded by thinkers in analysing the role to be played by representatives and in evaluating it against their control of the entire process. O.P.Gaubha has identified the major theories of representation which for our convenience, are discussed in the following manner- Reactionary Theory of Representation The chief exponents of this theory are Thomas Hobbes (1588-1679) and Alexander Hamilton (1756-1804). The reactionary theory largely depends on the superior knowledge and wisdom of the politicians who are regarded as the best custodians of public interest. Hobbes defined representation as acting in the name of another who has authorised the action. So when a representative is authorized to act on behalf of the represented, the latter is bound to accept the consequences of this act. When people authorize a sovereign, to act in their behalf, they make him their unlimited representative. This gives rise to absolute sovereignty. This theory is democratic only so long as it accepts the primacy of public interest in policy making.

256 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 Conservative Theory of Representation The chief exponents of this theory are namely Edmund Burke (1729-1797) and James Madison (1751-1836). It is more progressive than the reactionary theory because it grants a measure of public control without encouraging popular participation in the process of government. It is also an elitist theory because it allows people to choose their representatives from an elite group. However, if the representatives fail to satisfy them, they can be replaced by other suitable members of the elite group at the next election. Burke defined the role and duties of a parliamentary representative to put 'great wieght' on the wishes of his constituents and accord their opinions high respect. However, he did not want him to receive instructions from his constituents, but to exercise his own judgement. Liberal Theory of Representation The chief exponents of this theory are John Locke (1632- 1704) and Thomas Jefferson (1743-1826). This theory banks on the wisdom of the masses and treats their representatives only as their agents or messengers. In its view, representatives of the people are their true representatives. Instead of using their own judgement they must translate the judgements of their constituents into concrete policy proposals. Locke not only wanted that the government should rule with the consent of the people but also argued that no taxes could be imposed on the owners of property. He has no special rights or powers, but only special obligations. Radical Theory of Representation Its chief exponents are J.J.Rousseau (1712-78) and the New Left. This theory holds wisdom of the people in highest esteem and goes to the extent of depreciating representative government itself. It holds that wisdom of the people is bound to be diluted through the process of representation. It therefore, exalts direct democracy as the only truly democratic form of government. 18.5 Models of Representation There are contesting models on representation which are based on distinct ideological and political assumptions. These models of representation dictate very different behaviour on the part of representatives. It is often questioned, if the representatives are bound by policies and positions as outlined during election. It is also argued, if it is the responsibility of the representatives to form a public opinion and thereby, determine the public interest. However, here it is further pointed out that

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 257 more than one interest actually operates within the same political system. This suggests that no single model sufficient enough to secure a representative government. A. Heywood, has identified four principal models of representation which are advanced for our discussion in the following manner- Trustee Model The classic expression of representation as trusteeship is found in Edmund Burke's writings. A trustee is a person who is vested with formal responsibility for another's property or affairs.

For Burke, the essence of representation was to serve one's constituents by the exercise of mature judgement and enlightened conscience. In short, representation is a moral duty; those with good fortune to possess education and understanding should act in the interests of those who are less fortunate. This implies that the mass of people do not know their own best interests. A similar view was advanced by J.S. Mill in the form of liberal theory of representation. This was based on the assumption that, although all individuals have a right to be represented, not all political opinions are of equal value. Mill therefore, proposed a system of plural voting in which four or five votes would be allocated to holders of learned diplomas or degrees, two or three to skilled or managerial workers and a single vote to ordinary workers. Trustee representation thus, portrays professional politicians as representatives insofar as they are members of educated elite. It is based on the belief that knowledge and understanding are unequally distributed in society, in the sense that not all citizens know what is best for them. This model of representation is not beyond criticisms. Firstly, it is often argued that this model is anti democratic. This is so, since if politicians happen to be the best judge of actual conditions and the public is ignorant, poorly educated or deluded then surely it is a mistake to allow the public to elect their representatives in the first place. Secondly, the link between representation and education is also questionable. Finally, as argued by Thomas Paine, that if politicians, are allowed to exercise their own judgement, they will simply use that latitude to pursue their own selfish interests. Delegate Model A delegate is a person who is chosen to act for another on the basis of clear guidance or instructions.

This model of representation usually supports mechanisms that ensure that politicians are bound as closely as possible to the views of the represented. This includes what Paine referred to as frequent interchange between representatives and their constituents in the form of regular elections. In addition, 258 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 radical democrats have advocated the use of initiatives and the right of recall as means of giving the public more control over politicians. Although delegation stops short of direct democracy, its supporters nevertheless usually favour the use of referendums to supplement the representative process. One of the greatest advantages of this model is that it provides broader opportunities for popular participation and serves to check the actions of the professional politicians in securing their self interests. This model has been criticised on several grounds. In the first place, in ensuring that representatives are bound to the interests of their constituents, it tends to breed narrowness and foster conflict. Secondly, delegation limits the scope for leadership and statesmanship. Politicians are forced to reflect the views of their constituents and are thus, not able to mobilise the people by providing vision and inspiration. Mandate Model New theories of representation have emerged viewing the limitations of the Trustee and Delegate models of representation. It is often argued that the above two models were developed before the emergence of modern political parties when representatives were viewed essentially as independent actors. However, in contemporary times candidates are rarely elected on the basis of their individual capacities. Rather they are supported as a member of the political party whose programmes and policies receives attention and are accepted to a certain extent by the majority. The most influential amongst the new theories is the doctrine of the mandate. This is based on the idea that, in winning an election a party gains a popular mandate that authorises it to carry out whatever policies or programmes it outlined during the election campaign. As it is the party, rather than individual politicians, that is, the agency of representation, the mandate model provides a clear justification for party unity and party discipline. As such a politician tends to serve their constituents by remaining loyal to their party and its policies. The strength of the mandate doctrine is that it takes account of the undoubted practical importance of party labels and party policies. However, it is also subjected to severe criticisms. Firstly, it is based on a highly questionable model of voting behaviour, insofar as it suggests that select parties on the grounds of policies and issues.

According to this model, voters are assumed to be rational and well informed which may not be true in all respects. They can also be influenced by a range

Secondly, even if voters are influenced by policies, it is likely that they will be attracted by certain commitments. Thirdly, it limits government policies to those positions and proposals that the party took up during the election, and leaves no scope to adjust policies in the light of changing circumstances. Finally, a representative government would constitute a microcosm of the larger society, containing members drawn from all groups and sections in society and in numbers that are proportional to the size of the groups in society at large.

This model was endorsed by socialist and radical thinkers. They argue that the under representations of groups such as the working class, women and racial minorities at senior levels in key institutions ensures that their interests are marginalised and neglected. This model therefore, suggests that only people who came from a particular group and have shared the experiences of that group can fully identify with its interests. This model too raises some difficulties which are worth to note. Firstly, this model portrays representation in exclusive or narrow terms believing that only women can represent women and so on. If all representatives simply advance the interests of the groups from which they come, the consequences would be social division and conflict with no one being able to defend the common good. Secondly, a government is said to represent the society but how far it is likely to benefit is questionable particularly in a society in which majority of the population happens to be apathetic to common interests, or ill informed or even poorly educated. Finally, it is often argued, that microcosmic ideal can only be achieved by imposing powerful constraints upon electoral choice and individual freedom. In the name of representation political parties may be forced to select quotas of female or minority candidates. As such, in this system the electorate might have to be classified on the basis of class, gender, caste, race and so on and only be allowed to vote for candidates from their own group. 18.6 Conclusion The long history of democracy suggests that representation as a major principle emerged due to two reasons. Firstly, the ever growing population can be endured

260 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 with it and secondly, the rising mistrust of several scholars like Dahl over the capacity and motivation of the majority of individuals to be governed directly. In contemporary times, representation is found everywhere in social and political milieu. This is more prevalent in the spheres of civil society activities and also in transnational governance. However, such representations are not bound to election. Infact many social and political spheres give input to political decision making and generate representation without electoral authorization. While examining concepts about representation beyond elections and states, it is often found that the context of representation becomes more meaningful. As argued by Henrike Knappe that representative relationship can be seen as something socially constructed which is difficult to be captured through a single dimensional concept like election. When electoral politics rely on a clear temporal sequences of authorization vide election and held the representatives responsible for their actions, in non electoral politics the authorization and accountability are diverse and often diffused in nature. This becomes true particularly for informal representative relationships like social movements in which represented groups are shaped and sometimes even constructed in the process of representation. Thus, it can be said that democratic representation is not a mere substitute for direct democracy. With a recent note of change in representation, as socially constructed, the norms of representation depend to a large extent on the definition of representative relationships. This implies that democratic representation may be differently practiced if individuals, groups, interests or the common good is represented. 18.7 Summing Up To make democracy effective in practical plane, it is the elections that play the most crucial role. The practice of periodic elections in liberal democracies and in electing representatives to act as a custodian of masses gave rise to the idea of representation. Historically, the idea of representation was often used synonymously with responsible government. The principles of representation have generated profound and recurring political controversies.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 261 The question of representation is integrally connected with the voting system so it is worth to note the different theories on suffrage namely—The Natural Right Theory, The Legal Right Theory, the Ethical Theory etc. There are several contesting theories of representation which have evolved mainly over the issue of the role to be played by representation in the process of policy making. 18.8 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 263 19.1 Introduction With the rising popularity of the democratic systems in the past years the significance of elections cannot be questioned. Elections provide the public with its clearest formal opportunity to influence the political process, and also help directly or indirectly, to determine who will hold government power. From this perspective, elections are about results. This view is encouraged by media coverage, which with the goal of opinion polls increasingly turns elections into horse races. Nevertheless, politicians are not backward in claiming that elections have a broader and more profound meaning. Elections are, in this sense, seen as nothing less than a visible manifestation of the public interest. However, the term public interest is highly ambiguous since it also raises a question, if at all, any such thing as public interests exists. Generally, public interests tend to refer common or collective interests of all citizens but it is difficult to perceive for an indivisible public interest. This is so, since interests of individuals vary as it is not expected them to act selflessly in accordance with a general or collective will. At best, what electoral results can be accepted as to reveal is the preferences of a majority or a plurality. 19.2 Elections: Some Paradoxes Election is one of the necessary conditions to ensure representation but it cannot be claimed to be the sufficient condition. Firstly, elections are widely used to fill those public offices whose holders have policy making responsibilities yet, there are certain key political institutions which are sometimes treated as exceptions. This applies for instance, to the second chambers of legislature in states like the UK and Canada and also in those states where constitutional monarchs still serve as heads of the state. Secondly, though restrictions on the right to vote based on factors such as property ownership, education, gender and racial origin have been abandoned in most countries, yet there may be informal restrictions, as in the practice in most US states of leaving electoral registration entirely in the hands of the citizens. This results in non registration and non voting as a widespread phenomenon. On the other hand in Australia, Belgium and Italy, for instance, voting is compulsory. Thirdly, modern political elections are generally held on the basis of secret ballot. The secret ballot is usually seen as the guarantee of a fair election. However, Heywood observed that it also keeps the dangers of corruption. Infact electoral 264 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 fairness need not alone depends on how people vote. It is also affected by the voters' access to reliable and balanced information, the range of choice offered to them, situation in which campaigning took place and finally how scrupulously the vote is counted. Finally, electoral competition concerns not merely the right of the people to stand for election and the ability of political parties to nominate candidates and campaign legally. There exist also other significant factors that might affect party performance such as the sources of funding and access to the media. In this respect , the nature of the party system may be as crucial to the maintenance of genuine competition as are rules about who can stand and who can vote. 19.3 Functions of Elections Liberal democratic electoral systems has been popularised particularly with the collapse of the communist regime by the disintegration of erstwhile Soviet Union, since 1990s. Being essentially characterised by universal adult suffrage, the secret ballot and electoral competition, it has expedited the advance of democratisation.

The conventional view is that elections are a mechanism through which politicians can be called to account and forced to introduce policies that somehow reflect public opinion. This emphasises the bottom up functions of elections, political recruitment, representation, making government, influencing policy and so on. On the other hand, a radical view of elections as developed by theorists like Ginsberg portrays them as a means through which government and political elite can exercise control over their population. This view emphasises top down functions like building legitimacy, shaping public opinion and strengthening elites. This shows, how elections have no single character. Heywood has identified several functions of election which are enumerated below: - Political Recruitment In modern democracies elections serve the principal source of political recruitment. It takes into account the processes through which parties nominate candidates. However, elections are typically not used to fill posts that require specialist knowledge or experience such as those in the civil service or judiciary. Forming Governments Elections only make governments directly in states like USA, France etc. However, in most other parliamentary systems it influence the formation of NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 265 governments, most strongly when the electoral systems tends to give a single party a clear parliamentary majority. Providing Representation Elections happen to be a means through which demands, when they are fair and competitive, are placed before the government from the masses. However, people do not possess any means to ensure that mandates are carried out effectively apart from their decision not to vote for the same in the next election. Influencing Policy Elections restrict the government from pursuing radical and deeply unpopular policies. However, in case of predominance of a single issue in the election campaign then it is said to influence the policy directly. Nonetheless it is also argued that government policy is in any case shaped more by practical dictates such as the state of the economy than it is by electoral considerations. Awaring Voters The process of campaigning provides the electorate with an abundance of information, about parties, candidates, policies, the current government's record, the political system and so on. However, this becomes meaningful, if it engages public interest and stimulates debate. At the same time, it may also be noted that the same may likely to have an adverse effect, if the citizens are provided with incomplete and distorted information. Creating Legitimacy A valid reason why even an authoritarian regime bother to hold elections lies in the fact that it helps to foster legitimacy by providing justification for a system of rule. This is so, since by encouraging citizens to participate in politics even in the limited form of voting, elections mobilise active consent. Supporting Elites Elections can also serve as a means through which elites can control and manipulate the masses. Political discontent and opposition can also be neutralised by elections that channel them in a constitutional direction and allow governments to come and go while the regime itself survives.

266 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 19.4 Direct and Indirect Elections The electoral functions can be exercised either directly or indirectly. Direct democracy means the rule by the people of a state, town or another political community by means of direct participation in the management of public affairs. Some examples of direct democracy are found in ancient Greek city states, some of ancient Indian Republics etc. This system can operate in an area having a small number of citizens who can periodically meet at one place. However, it is not practicable in larger states of modern times. In case of indirect election, the electorate chooses a smaller body which in turn elects the final representatives. In India, the bulk of the members of the Council of States are elected indirectly. Modern democracies therefore, have indirect or representative democracy where government is conducted by the representatives of the people, who are elected at regular intervals. Thus, in modern times the term democracy is used as a synonym of representative democracy unless otherwise indicated. The advocates of direct election regard it as more democratic since the system allows the electorate to take part in constituting the government directly. Also direct election is supposed to promote political education of the electorate and to arouse interest in politics. Against this system, it is argued that when the people exercise the electoral function directly rational voting is made impossible. Indirect election is often suggested as an antidote to the vices of direct election. However, despite its advantages, the system of indirect election has been found incompatible with the spirit of democracy. As the representatives are finally elected not by the whole electoral body, but by a smaller group, the system in most cases helps political corruption. For a smaller group is more easily swayed by special interests. Further, as a means of political education indirect election is supposed to be inferior to direct election. Being deprived of the direct responsibility of electing representatives the primary voters may not take much interest in politics. Finally, it is pointed out that the system of indirect election is reduced to a mere formality by the operation of the party system which serves as the link between the primary voters and the intermediate electors.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 267 19.5 Methods of voting Several methods of voting have been adopted by different democratic countries over time. Some are discussed below: Public and Secret Voting The method by which voting is exercised may be public or secret. The practice of oral or public voting was prevalent in Prussia, Denmark, Soviet Russia etc. It was however, subsequently abandoned. Eminent writers like Montesquieu and Mill defended public voting. To Montesquieu, it was a means for the education of the common people under the guidance of the enlightened. Though theoretically sound, public voting has been found to be practically defective. This is because, it does not enable its voters to exercise its choice freely and independently the government in powers or powerful individuals or groups could influence the voters and pressurise upon them. Hence, to ensure free and independent voting or secret voting, votes through ballots were introduced and practiced universally. Plural and Weighted Voting In contemporary times, the equal weighing of votes is practically universal. But plural or weighted voting also known as differential voting was not lacking in the past. In Belgium for instance, plural suffrage was introduced as early as in 1893. Votes were graduated on the basis of educational, property and professional qualifications. The main argument for plural voting rested on the idea that in the choice of public officials, the opinions of the intelligent few must have a greater weight than the rest. The main objection of plural voting, however, rests on the fact that no suitable standard or criterion is to base political right on wealth which is clearly undemocratic. 19.6 Functional Representation There is hardly any single method of representation rather there are a number of competing methods, each citing its own advantages and limitations in a particular way. However, despite their differences in mechanism, there is no doubt that all the major methods of electoral representations arises mostly to overcome the shortcomings

268 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 of one or the other methods. Heywood for instance, has argued how the majoritarian systems are thought to be at their weakest when evaluated in terms of their representation of functions. To a greater extent, all majoritarian system distorts the popular preferences in the sense that party representation is not commensurate with electoral strength. This is most glaringly apparent in their unfairness to small parties and parties with evenly distributed geographical support and their over fairness in relation to large parties. For example, in 1997 in the UK the Labour Party gained 63% of the parliamentary seats with 44% of the vote while the Conservatives had won 25% of the seats with 31% of the votes and the Liberal Democrats gained merely 7% of the representation with 17% of the vote. Such biases are not justified in representative terms specially since the third parties are often centrist parties and not the extremist parties of popular image. Similarly, limitations of territorial representation have prompted to harness the arguments in favour of functional representation. The system of territorial representation is based on the assumption that people residing in the same area share common interests. The advocates of functional representation have contested this thesis and pointed out that not territorial community but interests can be represented. Their contention is that representation should be functional and in this way individuals can be more accurately represented on the basis of occupational or economic interests. Usually it is argued, a constituency comprises diverse economic groups such as traders, farmers, employers, industrial workers etc. Hence, it is not possible for one representative to represent all the views of the constituents. However, such representatives take part in the enactment of laws affecting these diverse interests. It is sure to lead to the making of ineffective laws that have little or no relevance to the choice of effective means. The advocates of functional representation find in it, a remedy against these defects of territorial representation. Their scheme is to treat every important specialised interests or functions as a unit for representation. The legislature would thus, be composed of the representatives of organised interests and not of the people residing in particular geographical areas. There have always been advocates of the system of functional representation. At the time of the French Revolution it was supported by Mirabeau and Sieyes. Later eminent writers like Duguit, Guild Socialists and the like have proposed different schemes for the representation of interests or functions.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 269 19.7 Limitations of Functional Representation The system of functional representation has been attacked by several eminent writers. The most serious criticisms against it have been discussed in the following manner: Firstly, it is argued that this system seeks to bolster up the claims of particular interests at the expense of the general national interests. Anxious care is taken under a scheme of functional representation to make provisions for the representations of the various economic and occupational groups but there is no room for a unified central authority epitomising the conceptions of the national interest. However, too much preoccupation with the clear articulation and vindication of function weakens the sense of community of belonging to something that contains but transcends the function. Secondly, if representation is based on particular functions there would be as many parties as there are functions. Consequently, the present party system, which seeks to patch up group interests and throw up a unified conception of general interest, would cease to function under a system of functional representation. Thirdly, such system of representation operating through the mechanism of a multiplicity of functional organisations would automatically lead to the same governmental paralysis as taken place under the system of proportional representation. Fourthly, it can be remarked by way of conclusion that democracy lives by the organisation of centripetal rather than centrifugal forces. This is so, since functional representations seeks to release the disruptive forces in a community and it is inimical to the spirit of democracy. Finally, the utility of the functional representation has been questioned on the ground that various interests are needed to be represented. However, it is argued that instead of making provisions for the representation of various interests in the legislature, arrangements in recent years are made for their representation through advisory committees attached to particular government departments that deal with the administration of laws affecting some functional groups. 19.8 Advantages of Functional Representation Every dark cloud has a silver lining and so does the method functional representation. It has several advantages which for convenience are discussed below: Firstly, through this system the legislature is likely to be formed by members

270 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 coming from different functional and occupational groups representing diverse organised interests. It is thus, argued that by this mechanism the interests of the members as reflected would be distinct and seeks to be more effective in providing the expertise to policy formulation. Secondly, it is often argued that a representative of a particular geographical territory cannot take care of the interests of all sections of people living in that territory. As such, functional representation is suggested, so that representatives can be send to decision making body on the basis of economic and professional interests and exerts its influence in policy framing. So it claims to reflect democracy in the truest sense of the term. Finally, in most cases it has been found that functional representations have largely been tried under totalitarian systems particularly in pursuance of corporatism. In doing so, it is argued that the class conflict could be easily avoided. In Mussolini's corporative state a non representative fascist or Corporative Chamber was developed on the basis of economic grouping. To facilitate the working of a highly regimented economic system, Nazi Germany organised a system of "estates" representatives of economic interests. The Salazar regime in Portugal has also tried this system. 19.9 Minority Representation Democracy is based on the principle of popular sovereignty which implies that along with the majority, the minorities too have a role to play in the process of legislation. However, democracy in practice thrives for a majority to form an effective government. This imply that to ensure the voice of the minorities in safeguarding their interests, it is essential to have their representation in the legislature. Nevertheless, it is very difficult to underpin the meaning of a minority in a nation state since the term is used ambiguously to indicate several usages. Sometimes it may stand for a political party like the United Socialist Party or Jana Sangha in India which is a minority party as compared to other national parties like Indian National Congress or Bharatiya Janata Party. Besides such political minorities, there may be racial, linguistic and religious minorities. Thus, from the communal stand point in India the Hindus are in the majority and the Muslims or the Anglo Indians are the minorities.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 271 Various methods have been suggested for securing the representation of minorities, some of which are discussed below: Cumulative Vote System This system involves multi member constituencies. The voter has the right to cast as many votes as there are seats in a constituency. But his/her votes may be spread over several candidates or concentrated on one candidate only. Hence, the voter belonging to a minority party may elect their representative by concentrating all their votes on him/her. Limited Vote System The constituency under this system are multi member. The voters are allowed to cast a certain number of votes which is less than the number of seats to be filled. By limiting the number of votes of each voter, this system acts as a check on the monopolisation of representation in a constituency by a single political party, and helps the minority to get atleast one seat. Communal Representation Special arrangements are sometimes made for the representation of minority communities. There may be separate electorates for separate communities. Under British rule such a system was introduced in India. Thus, voters of each community voted for the candidates of their own community. A second method of communal representation is the reservation of seats in a joint electorate. Under this system, the voters may cast their votes for the candidates of communities other than their own. But in deciding the result a member of the community having reservation of seats, which gets the highest number of votes among the candidates of that community, will be declared elected despite candidates of other communities might have acquired a larger number of votes. Under Articles 330 and 332 of the Indian Constitution, there are provisions for the reservation of seats for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes in the House of the People and in the Legislative Assemblies of the states. Concurrent Majority In the United States, during the first half of the 19 th century, a debate ensued between the North and the South on the question of the abolition of slavery. The 272 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 South was in favour of continuance of slavery but the North wanted the abolition of slavery to ensure supply of workers for the newly set up industries. The North enjoyed majority in the American Congress, hence, it was most likely to win its case. At this juncture John C. Calhon (1782-1850) advanced the principle of concurrent majority with a view to safeguard the interests of the South which was in minority. This imply that if, the government of a country takes a decision on the basis of numerical majority, the minority affected by that decision should have the power to veto that decision. So Calhon proposed to replace the prevalent federal system of the United States by a constitutional structure wherein each of the important economic functional or regional interest interests of the country would have the right to indicate its organ of self expression and concurrence of all these organs would become necessary for every important decision. In America this proposal was never accepted but this principle has invoked on the question of the role of minority in the decision making process. Consociational Democracy This system involves an elaborate arrangement to ensure minority representation. It is regarded particularly suitable for the governance of the societies which are deeply divided by religious, ideological, regional, cultural, racial or ethnic differences. It involves four basic principles namely- a) Executive power sharing which entails a grand coalition of the representatives of all significant segments. b) Greater autonomy of different segments implying that decisions on all issues of common concern should be made jointly by the representatives of all important segments. c) Proportionality which made provisions for allocation of political offices, administrative appointments and public funds in proportion to the population of each segment. d) Minority veto which is the ultimate weapon for the minority segments to protect their vital interests. A veto may be invoked by the minority for the protection of its position in case of a possibility of being outvoted by the majority.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 273 19.10 Problems of Minority Representation There are certain practical difficulties associated with minority representation. Firstly, any system of minority representation is sure to multiply the number of parties in the legislature. In such a case, it is likely that no single party is to have the required majority in the legislature to form the government. Consequently, a coalition ministry becomes inevitable which is likely to function on a principle of temporary compromise. Such a coalition government would therefore, be feeble and short lived. Secondly a strong allegation is made against minority representation by arguing that it seeks to pay premium on anti democratic forces in a country and thus, in future might imperil the operation of democracy. Thirdly, a system of minority representation deliberately divides people into hostile camps. It encourages the minority to indulge in minority thinking. A minority in viewing from such perspective is likely to have a distorted idea over reality. Consequently, democracy which postulates the existence of a common will, suffers most under the system of minority representation. Finally, provisions of minority representation would encourage formation of political parties on the basis of narrow sectional interests rather than on the basis of larger national interests representing reconciliation of conflicting group interests. 19.11 Conclusion The shortcoming of the different methods of representation suggests that there can hardly be an universally acceptable system of representation. If critics argue for violation of political equality as one of the major weaknesses of functional representation, as was the case of Hong Kong in the recent past, then there are equally strong arguments against geographical representations as well. Various strategies have been explored ranging from broadening of electoral basis through a balanced bicameral legislature to adequate minority representation, yet none seems to be flawless and highly effective to satisfy all situations and people. No matter how much reforms and suggestions are advanced by scholars, debates and controversies over the right kind or the ideal type of representation would continue to exist and thereby, motivates intellectual intrigues for further research in the arena. 274 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 19.12 Summing Up Elections are a visible manifestation of the public interest. NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 277 20.1 Introduction Modern democracies function mostly through electoral representations. Elections in recent years turned out to be an essential condition for the sustenance of democracy. As such, elections are often referred as the very heart of democracy. In identifying democracy simply as a political method, it is the elections with which it sets its journey. The mechanisms of elections vary from country to country and its varied forms often give rise to severe controversy amongst scholars. The mechanism to conduct elections thus, assumes significance in analysing the nature of democracy in contemporary times. Through a considerable extension of franchise from a narrow, frequently unequal and indirect system to one which is now virtually universal and equal the history of democracy has traversed towards a more steady and stable evolution. The changes undoubtedly have helped democracy to earn its credibility and this becomes evident with a rising number of democratic countries all across the globe in the past years. 20.2 Universal Adult Franchise In a representative democracy elections are usually held on the basis of Universal Adult Franchise. Now, on the question of who to have the voting right has given rise to severe debates. Opinions varied from a group favouring universal suffrage to the other seeking to restrict suffrage. The arguments in favour of universal suffrage are enumerated in the following manner: Firstly, it is often argued, that, if democracy implies popular sovereignty then suffrage must be universal. The logic behind it is firmly rooted on the ground that popular sovereignty becomes meaningful only when every individual has the right to take part in constituting and conditioning the government. Secondly, it is also argued that since the laws and policies of the state affect all so all must have the right to vote and practically gets actively involved in shaping of the state policies. Thirdly, it is often forwarded that a restricted electorate cannot ensure the welfare of the masses, as deprived of suffrage implies deprivation of the benefits of the government. Finally, Universal Adult Franchise also provides an opportunity to the citizens in expressing their opinions in public affairs. In doing so, the dignity and self respect of the individual is not only enhanced but it also helps in the development of

278 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 individual personality. Through their right to vote the citizens constitute the government and thereby, take interest in political questions which help to promote political consciousness. If the arguments in favour of Universal Adult Franchise are strong then there also existed some counter arguments too which are discussed below: Aristocratic Argument Writers like Macaulay, Lecky and Sir Henry Maine considered it unwise and dangerous to extend the franchise to the ignorant masses. Lecky in his Democracy and Liberty, denounced the system of universal suffrage as he could not reconcile with the view that progress could be ensured under a government by the ignorant rather than the intelligent. According to Sir Henry Maine, universal suffrage is inimical to scientific progress. Though much of these statements are highly exaggerated as there is no evidence to show that universal suffrage is an obstacle to progress yet these criticisms also reveals certain truths. For instance, if the people are given the right to constitute the government then they should be properly trained up and made fit for the job. In this respect there is inherent truth in Mill's remark when he said that universal education must precede universal enfranchisement. Property Owning and Tax Paying Arguments In the 19 th century the main qualification for the franchise was the possession of property or the payment of taxes. Until 1832, the parliamentary franchise in England was limited in the countries to freeholders possessing property worth forty shillings a year. In Japan until 1925, there was a taxpaying requirement which led to the disfranchisement of a large portion of the population. The property owning and taxpaying tests are also in operation in some of the American states too. Insofar as, property qualification was supposed to be a guarantee of education and hence, of political competence can be debated over time but as a general test the ownership of property undoubtedly leads to injustice. For in most cases where multitudes do not possess property due to misfortune or in consequence of rigid economic class divisions in the society the test of property ownership tends to become clearly reactionary. The taxpaying test is however, to some extent justified as the state may legitimately expects something from its members in return for the protection it guarantees to them. Also the operation of the state is made possible by the contribution of its members. Still it may be argued that the function of the tax payment depends on the capacity to pay which in turn is largely determined by the income earning opportunities made available to the citizens. A state which fails to

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 279 provide employment for its masses has no justification for its policy of excluding those who cannot pay taxes from the voting right. Property is after all not a bar to political competence. Educational Qualification Many writers have favoured educational tests for voting. It is accepted as a measure of electoral ability. Since the essence of democracy is popular judgement, the plea for educational qualifications seems to be logical. There is however, practical difficulty in finding out an objective test for determining political intelligence. Also it is highly doubtful, if political intelligence is a function of formal education. In the field of politics, human behaviour is in most cases as Graham Wallas point out determined by intuitions, passion and desires. It is the consciousness of one rather than intellectual achievement which condition the voter's attitude. Hence, it is not logical to believe that the ignorant masses will not be able to know what to vote for. The literacy test presupposes that the state, as Mill said must ensure adequate educational opportunities for all. But such opportunities hardly exist today. However, an enlightened and intelligent electorate is really an asset to democracy. So what is necessary is that every social vehicle for promoting political knowledge like the press, radio etc, should be properly utilised and the electorate should be made to depend on wise and honest leadership. Sex Qualification The political enfranchisement of women is quite a recent phenomenon. The exclusion of women from the suffrage was a general rule even after the democratic movement had led to the enfranchisement of the masses. It was further perpetuated, even after the emergence of the modern states, by the general economic and legal dependence of women. The earlier discrimination against them was gradually removed owing to their increasing employment in different professions and their equal access to educational opportunities. Also, the movement for female suffrage was greatly strengthened by the admirable role women played in the two world wars. Political parties in their zeal for the support of the newly enfranchised did much to emancipate women. Thus, in most of the states, today, women have been given equal political rights with men. Race qualification Racial barriers sometimes work against the extension of suffrage. During Hitler's regime the Jews in Germany were not allowed to vote.

280 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 Nationality Qualification Modern states grant the right to vote only to their nationals, ie. those who have acquired citizenship by birth or naturalisation. Again, naturalised citizenship does not always carry with it the right to vote. Age Qualification In no country is the right to vote granted to persons of every age. As a matter of fact, all states exclude the children and restrict the suffrage to those who have attained maturity though the question of maturity of the voters is highly controversial. Miscellaneous Qualification Most states deny the right to vote to insane persons, the bankrupts and those who have been convicted of great crimes. In fact almost everywhere the residence in the country and in the voting district, and registration as a voter are the most common requirements. 20.3 Types of Representation Representative systems in contemporary times can be classified into two alternative systems namely 1. Territorial Representation and 2. Functional Representation Territorial Representation Territorial Representation is often called geographic representation. The territorial principle of representation is prevalent in most countries having representative governments. According to this principle, the whole country is divided into districts or areas of approximately equal population and a single representative is selected from each district by majority vote. To make the system equitable, it is necessary to redraw the boundaries of constituencies frequently and fairly to keep pace with the growth and variations of the population. Also the task of redrawing the boundaries should be placed in the hands of a non partisan body, as in Great Britain. Functional Representation Functional Representation implies that the people belonging to different occupations or functions should be allowed to elect their representatives on this very

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 281 basis. These representatives should vote on issues relating to their specific function. For instance, those belonging to industry should vote on industrial policy and so on. 20.4 Territorial Representation The Territorial Representation system is apparently based on the assumptions that each constituency has uniform interests. Under territorial or geographic representation the whole country is divided into geographical areas of nearly equal population, which are called constituencies. Voters of each constituency are entitled to elect their representatives or representatives. With a growth of population, boundaries of different constituencies may be required to be redrawn. It is imperative to ensure that any changes in these boundaries do not result in any advantage or disadvantage to any political party. The system is simple and convenient. It enables the electorate to know their representative more closely. However, sometimes it may lead to undue prominence of simple, routine issues relegating the complex, policy issues to the background. 20.5 Merits and Demerits of Territorial Representation Merits of Territorial Representation The greatest advantage of territorial representation is that it is simple and very easy to be implemented. The voter, under the system, is required simply to cast a vote for one representative in a constituency. Secondly, the limited area of a constituency enables the voter to know his representative intimately. Also, the representative keeps in touch with and becomes responsible to his constituency. Thirdly, owing to the restricted area of each district, the system is economical for the representatives. Finally, as the operation of this system has proved in several countries, it secures a stable majority in the legislature and thus, ensures a strong and stable government. Demerits of Territorial Representation The system of Territorial Representation has a tendency to represent the local interests more than the national interests. The representative becomes an agent for securing every advantage for his own locality and takes little care to advance the national interest. Secondly, when this system encourages the election of only the residents of a district, it naturally narrows the list of candidates available to the voter. Consequently, inferior men are often chosen and able men are discouraged from

282 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 running for office. Thirdly, since the constituency is small in size, a government can easily influence adequate number of voters and thus, obtain the return of its own candidates. Fourthly, this system produces a peculiar practice of "Gerry mandering". It means manipulation of the boundaries of constituencies to enable the party in power to capture as many seats as possible. Fifthly, under this system a relative majority is required to win a seat. As such, Finer observed that this may produce injustices in some constituencies and general nationwide misrepresentation. The system, therefore, may lead to the permanent voicelessness of a perpetual minority. 20.6 Safeguards of Territorial Representation Harold Laski has suggested three safeguards to improve the electoral machinery of the system which is discussed below: Firstly, the electoral choice should not be limited to one of the residents of a district. What is needed in politics is experienced leadership and not parochialism. Secondly, the candidate elected from a constituency must not be merely a delegate for the representations of the local interests. Nor should he be a servant of the party which is in the majority in the constituency. Finally, in between elections the electors have some means of registering their dissatisfaction if any, either with their elected representative or with the government. For this purpose the limited recall can be accepted as a method of last resort. 20.7 Classification of Representative System The available system of representation can be divided into two broad categories on the basis of how they convert votes into seats.

On the one hand, there are majoritarian systems, in which

larger parties typically win a higher proportion of seats than the proportion of votes they gain in the election. This increases the chances of a single party gaining a parliamentary majority and being able to govern on its own.

A classic example in this case is United Kingdom. On the other hand, there is proportional systems which guarantee an equal or at least more equal relationships between the seats won by a party and the votes gained in the election.

In a pure system of proportional representation a party that gains 45% of the votes would be NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 283 exactly 45% of the seats. Proportional Representative systems therefore, make single party majority rule less likely, and are commonly associated with multiparty systems and coalition governments. Plurality Systems Under plurality system, or simple majority system election may be won by simple majority. If there are only two candidates in the field for one seat, there will be no problems in deciding the winner. But in case of three or more candidates in a single member constituency, situation becomes a bit complicated as the voter can cast vote for one candidate only. It implies that any candidate obtaining the largest number of votes will be declared elected. It is not necessary for him/her to secure absolute majority. That is more than 50% of the total number of valid votes. This practice is widely followed. Again, under the simple majority system the votes scored by different political parties might not correspond to the number of seats won by them in the legislature. Advantages Firstly, as there exist a clear link between the representative and the electorates so there is a scope to ensure that duties of the constituencies are met adequately. Secondly, it provides the electorate a clear choice of potential parties of government. Thirdly, it makes for a strong and stable government which rarely collapse as a result of disunity and internal friction. Finally, it helps to keep away extremism since it becomes difficult for small parties to gain seats and credibility. Disadvantage Firstly, there is immense wastage of votes in this system since there are people who would be casting votes in favour of the losing candidate and also some voting for the winner over the plurality mark. Secondly, it has duopolitic tendencies thereby, limiting the electoral choices.

284 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 Thirdly, it distorts electoral preferences by under representing small parties. Finally, it might lead to unaccountable government in the legislature. Majoritarian System In a majoritarian system a candidate to win election is required to obtain an absolute majority ie. 50% of the valid votes cast. If the total number of candidates amount to two then there will be no problem. But if, there are more than three contestants in a single member constituency and no candidate wins an absolute majority then the following two methods are adopted for the purpose. They are: 1. Alternative Vote 2. Second Ballot Alternative Vote The alternative vote system, also known as the method of preferential voting, does not involve two elections. In an election, the voters are required to make their order of preference for the candidates in a constituency. Thus, a voter is to mark 1 opposite his first choice on the ballot and accordingly 2 and 3 opposite to his second and third alternative preferences. Then if, on the counting of the first preferences of all the voters none of the candidates is found to get an absolute majority, the candidate getting the lower number of votes is dropped out of the contest and the second choices of the voters who voted for him as their first choice are distributed according to their preferences. In the second counting that follows, the first and second choices are totalled to see if any candidate gets an absolute majority. Even then if an absolute majority for someone does not emerge, the process of eliminating candidates from the bottom of the poll continues, till one gets an absolute majority. Advantages Firstly, compared to the Plurality system fewer votes are wasted in this system of voting. Secondly, though in this system winning candidate is required to secure atleast 50% support yet single majority government is not ruled out entirely. Finally, the outcome cannot be influenced by deals made between candidates.

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 285 Disadvantage Firstly, this system is biased in favour of large parties. Secondly, the outcome may be determined by the preferences exhibited by voters in small numbers which has the potential threat of extremist parties. Finally, winning candidates may enjoy little first preference support thereby, making the government not stable enough to tackle situations. Second Ballot The second ballot system involves second or runoff elections immediately after the first. Under this system, the voter is required to vote for one candidate only. If no candidate is able to obtain absolute majority, second ballot is held to decide the winner. This system of voting was prevalent in France and Germany for some time. Under this system constituencies are drawn on a geographical basis on the lines of plurality system. Hence, this may suffer from the same disadvantages as noticed in the case of the plurality system. Advantage Firstly, the system provides a wide range of choices for the electorates. Secondly, strong and stable government can be formed out of this system. Finally, as candidates win elections by a majority support so they are encouraged to make their appeal as broad as possible. Disadvantage Firstly, it may distort the preferences and is often unfair to the third parties. Secondly, it may found to be too stressful for the electorates and may even test their patience and interest in politics. Finally, runoff candidates are encouraged to abandon their principles in search of short term popularity. Proportional Representation The single member constituency system does not ensure mathematically exact representation of the electorate. Certain small minorities, under this scheme, may go

286 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 all together unrepresented and the legislature may not reflect proportional representation of the actual majorities and the minorities. To remedy this defect, political theorists and practical politicians of different shades of option have sought to bring forward various arrangements for what is known as proportional representation. There are many variations of these electoral systems. But whatever may be the diverse technicalities, this system involves multimember constituencies instead of single member ones. Advantages Firstly, in a society there are various sections with their peculiar problems and opinions. To make the legislature a true mirror of the nation, it is essential that all sections are directly represented. Proportional representation enables due representation of all types of groups, such as ethnic groups, women, different interests and ideologies. Secondly, under this system, there will not be any necessity for reappointment and redrawing of the boundaries of electoral districts with a rapidly fluctuating relationship of population to districts. Thus, this system will eliminate the incentive to "Gerry mandering." Disadvantage Firstly, the critics of proportional representation argue that it encourages divisive, centrifugal forces, and aggravates sectionalism. Secondly, the whole logic of democracy is based on the conception of national welfare and a common interest. The idea is that, various sectional interests will work out an ultimate compromise. Proportional representation by widening the area of conflict rather than that of agreement, spells a danger for democracy. Thirdly, the inevitable consequence of organised group interests and minority thinking is the splintering of political parties. By substituting narrow sectional interests for the national welfare, proportional representation tends to equate a faction with a political party. Fourthly, the splintering of political parties makes the legislative body filled with numerous groups. No single party possess the independent strength to form a

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 287 government. Hence, weak coalition governments are formed. The government lacks the solidarity for effective legislative leadership and for the formulation of a coherent policy. Fifthly, the vast size of the electoral districts under a system of proportional representation involves a number of difficulties. It renders impossible an intimate connection of the candidate with his constituency. In a single member constituency, the candidates can visit the different sections and try to understand the 'configuration of opinion'. But when a gigantic multimember constituency consists of hundreds and thousands of voters, neither can the candidate make contact with all nor do can voters know him/her well. Finally, what is more dangerous is that proportional representation tends to widen the gap between the electorate and the government further. The effect is that the electorate fails to understand who should be held responsible for a policy and consequently feels remote from governing. There are two main schemes for proportional representation namely- 1. Hare System 2. List System Hare System The single transferable vote, called the Hare system, was first suggested in 1857 by an Englishman named Thomas Hare in a pamphlet entitled The Machinery of Representation. In a Hare system, large constituencies are set up and the voter has only one effective vote. Under this system, a voter is required to indicate his/her order of preference against the names of different candidates. For each constituency a quota is set which a candidate needs to reach. The quota is determined by dividing the total number of votes cast by one more than the number of seats to be filled and then by adding one to the result. $Quota = \frac{\text{Total Number of Votes} + 1}{\text{Number of seats} + 1}$ The candidates who reach the quota on the result of the first counting of the ballots was declared elected. His/her 'surplus votes' ie. first preferences over and above the electoral quota are redistributed among those candidates whom these voters have given their next preference, in proportion to the number of second

288 _____ NSOU CC-PS-01 preferences obtained by each of such candidates. The candidate obtaining the least number of first preferences is eliminated and the next preferences of his/her voters are added to the first preferences of those candidates this process of redistribution from both sides is repeated till the number of candidates securing the electoral quota equals the number of seats available, who are then declared elected. This system has been used in the national elections of Irish Republic and Malta. List System This system is widely used in continental European countries. It takes two forms, the bound list and the free list. Under either type, each political party prepares lists containing the names of its candidates in the constituencies. Thus, if from one constituency, six members are to be elected, each political party will make a list containing six names of its own candidates. The voter must vote for the list prepared by a political party. Under this system the voter is required to mark one list according to his/her choice. In case of a bound list the voter is not allowed to express his own preferences for the candidates listed by the party. He/she is simply to follow the order of preference determined by the party. The free list system, however, allows the voter to indicate his/her own preference among his/her party's candidates and in some countries like Switzerland, the voter may even write in additional name. The list system is employed in voting for national elections in Germany, Italy, Israel, Switzerland, Finland etc. 20.8 Conclusion Democracy in contemporary era is passing through a stage of perpetual crisis. This becomes more evident when even in democratic countries underneath a formal democratic institutions, public leaders are found to be engaged in serious democratic abuse which often adversely affects the conviction of integrity attached to the democratic principles. The rising cost of running an election in a hugely populous country has places many of the developing countries in grave economic crisis. The roles of media are further not beyond the range of influences. Infact, private and social media have many of their obligations to be fulfilled which restricts them from their inherent neutrality and often prompts them to embody certain biases. Even individual journalist closer to political actors lose their ability to work independently and with credibility. With political parties prone more towards internal struggles for power and growing deficiencies in intellectual and ideological capacities of political

NSOU CC-PS-01 _____ 289 leaders have made the voters look forward for a more complementary element of participation and accountability required for the system. This calls for a more effective electoral management system that might struggles against the possible adversaries of democracies and ensures a more adequate and systematic representation for the next generation possible voters. 20.9 Summing Up Elections in recent years turned out to be an essential condition for the sustenance of democracy. In a representative democracy elections are usually held on the basis of Universal Adult Franchise. Opinions varied from a group favouring universal suffrage to the other seeking to restrict suffrage. Representative systems in contemporary times can be classified into two alternative systems namely Territorial Representation and Functional Representation. Territorial Representation is often called geographic representation. The territorial principle of representation is prevalent in most countries having representative governments. PREFACE In a bid to standardize higher education in the country, the University Grants Commission (UGC) has introduced Choice Based Credit System (CBCS) based on five types of courses viz. core, generic, discipline specific, elective, ability and skill enhancement for graduate students of all programmes at Honours level. This brings in the semester pattern which finds efficacy in sync with credit system, credit transfer, comprehensive continuous assessments and a graded pattern of evaluation. The objective is to offer learners ample flexibility to choose from a wide gamut of courses, as also to provide them lateral mobility between various educational institutions in the country where they can carry their acquired credits. I am happy to note that the university has been recently accredited by National Assessment and Accreditation Council of India (NAAC) with grade "A". UGC (Open and Distance Learning Programmes and Online Programmes) Regulations, 2020 have mandated compliance with CBCS for U.G. programmes for all the HEIs in this mode. Welcoming this paradigm shift in higher education, Netaji Subhas Open University (NSOU) has resolved to adopt CBCS from the academic session 2021-22 at the Under Graduate Degree Programme level. The present syllabus, framed in the spirit of syllabi recommended by UGC, lays due stress on all aspects envisaged in the curricular framework of the apex body on higher education. It will be imparted to learners over the six semesters of the Programme. Self Learning Material (SLMs) are the mainstay of Student Support Services (SSS) of an Open University. From a logistic point of view, NSOU has embarked upon CBCS presently with SLMs in English / Bengali. Eventually, the English version SLMs will be translated into Bengali too, for the benefit of learners. As always, all of our teaching faculties contributed in this process. In addition to this we have also requisitioned the services of best academics in each domain in preparation of the new SLMs. I am sure they will be of commendable academic support. We look forward to proactive feedback from all stakeholders who will participate in the teaching-learning based on these study materials. It has been a very challenging task well executed, and I congratulate all concerned in the preparation of these SLMs. I wish the venture a grand success.

the Indian Independence Act, 1947, passed by the British parliament, led to the independence of India. The Constituent Assembly which was formed in 1946 became a sovereign body and acted as the legislature of independent India along with its original function of framing a constitution for India. The constitution was finally adopted on 26 th November, 1949. Dr. RajendraPrasad was unanimously elected as the first President of India and the constitution came into force on 26 th January, 1950 with India emerging as a sovereign, democratic republic securing justice, equality and fraternity for all Indians. Constitutional development in India has a long history. This history is closely linked to the history of British rule in India. The British Parliament passed several Charters and Acts which are considered as sources of the constitutional development in India. A brief discussion of these Charters and Acts is in order to get a glimpse of how they contributed to the path of constitutional development in India. 1.3

Regulating Act, 1773 The first step taken by the British Parliament to control and regulate the affairs of the East India Company in India was through this Act. It designated the Governor of Bengal (Fort William) as the Governor-General of Bengal. Warren Hastings became the first Governor-General of Bengal. Executive Council of the Governor-General was established with four members. There was no separate legislative council. It NSOU ? CC-PS-02 9 subordinated the Governors of Bombay and Madras to the Governor-General of Bengal. The Supreme Court was established at Fort William (Calcutta) as the Apex Court in 1774. It prohibited servants of the company from engaging in any private trade or accepting bribes from the natives. Court of Directors (the Governing Body of the Company) was entrusted with the responsibility to report its revenue. 1.4 Pitt's India Act, 1784

The Act made a distinction between commercial and political functions of the company. Under the Act, the Court of Directors would deal with commercial matters and the Board of Control would look after the political affairs. It

It introduced a system of open competition as the basis for the recruitment of civil servants of the Company (Indian Civil Service was opened to all). 1.7 Government of India Act, 1858 The rule of Company was replaced by the rule of the Crown in India. The powers of the British Crown were to be exercised by the Secretary of State for India and he was to be assisted by the Council of India, having 15 members. He was vested with complete authority and control over the Indian administration through the Viceroy as his agent. The Governor-General came to be known as the Viceroy of India. Lord Canning became the first Viceroy of India. The Act abolished Board of Control and Court of Directors.

It formalized the process of the end of the Company rule and placed India under the direct control of the Crown. The assumption of the Government of India by the British Crown was announced formally by a proclamation of Queen Victoria on first November, 1858. 1.8

It accorded statutory recognition to the portfolio system and initiated the process of decentralization by restoring the legislative powers to the Bombay and the Madras Provinces 1.9 India Councils Act, 1892 The Act introduced indirect elections (nomination). It enlarged the size and the functions of the Legislative Councils and gave them the power of discussing the Budget and addressing questions to the Executive.

The number of additional members in the Council was raised. Due to pressures exerted by the Indian National Congress, NSOU ? CC-PS-02 11 the Government permitted elections to be held in India under the rules, although the members so elected could take their seats only on being nominated by

It changed the name of the Central Legislative Council to the Imperial Legislative Council. The number of members of the Central Legislative Council was increased to 60 from 16 and introduced a system of communal representation for Muslims by accepting the concept of 'Separate Electorate'. Indians, for the first time, were given representation to the Viceroy's Executive Council. The Act sowed seeds of communal disharmony in India. It created confusion because although it introduced parliamentary reforms, it did not bestow responsibility on an equal basis. The election introduced by the Act was indirect and there was hardly any touch between the people and the members on the Legislative Council. The Indian National Congress vehemently criticized the Act for its pro-communal stance and expressed its dissatisfaction at the non-establishment of a Council for the Central Provinces and Berar. K.M. Munshi went to the extent of describing the Councils as 'glided shams with 'magnified non-entities whose constituency was the Government House' 1.11 The Government of India Act, 1919 (The Mont-Ford Reforms) system, the provincial subjects were divided into two parts– transferred and reserved. On reserved subjects, Governor was not responsible to the Legislative Council. The Act introduced, for the first time, bicameralism at the center. Legislative Assembly with 140 members and Legislative Council with 60 members. The Act also required that the three of the six members of the Viceroy's Executive NSOU ? CC-PS-02 12 Council (other than Commander-in-Chief) were to be Indians.

This Act provided for the establishment of the Public Service Commission. The Govt. of India Act, 2019 failed to bring about the desired gains for the Indians so much so that the Indian National Congress criticized the Reforms as inadequate, unsatisfactory and disappointing. The major criticism against the Act was that it destroyed the national unity by introducing separate electorates for not only the Muslims but also for the Sikhs, Christians, Anglo-Indians and Europeans. 1.12 Nehru Report, 1928 Main features of the Nehru Report : 1. There was a compromise between two groups, one who favoured dominion status and those who supported complete independence. The majority favoured dominion status not as a distant goal but as "the next immediate step". 2. Secularism was envisaged as the basic feature of the constitution. The report proposed joint electorates with reservation of seats for the minorities in proportion to population with the right to contest additional seats. 3. No seats were to be reserved for any community in Bengal and Punjab. 4. The citizens were to enjoy 19 fundamental rights. 5. The government was to derive its authority from the people. 6. The federal structure was to be introduced. 7. The report recommended the organization of the Provinces on linguistic basis and granting of Provincial autonomy in internal administration. 8. The report demanded that full responsible governments should be set up at the central and the Provincial levels. 9.

to be appointed by the British Crown. He was to act on the advice of the Provincial Executive Council which was to be responsible to the Provincial legislature. 12. The report held that the Supreme Court was to be the final court of appeal in India. The Nehru report suggested the establishment of parliamentary system in India both at the central and the state level. The Congress party accepted the report in its Calcutta session on December 31 in 1928. The Muslims were critical about the report as the report did not provide for separate electorate for them as was given to them by the 1909 and 1919 Acts. 1.13 Jinnah's Fourteen Points In response to the Nehru Report, M.A. Jinnah placed his 14-point demands. Jinnah called a meeting of the Muslim League in Delhi in 1929 and put forward his 14-points. Discarding the Nehru report, Muslim League declared that no future constitution would be acceptable to the League unless and until the 14 points are implemented. The basic principles of Jinnah's 14-points are as follows : 1. The form of the future constitution should be federal with the residuary powers being vested in the Provinces. 2. A uniform measure of autonomy shall be granted to all Provinces. 3. All legislatures in the country and other elected bodies shall be constituted on the principle of adequate and effective representation of minorities in every Province without reducing the majority in any province to a minority or even equality. 4. The central legislature will give the Muslims one-third representation. 5. Representation of communal groups shall continue to be by separate electorates as at present provided: it shall be open to any community, at any time, to abandon its separate electorate in favour of joint electorates. 6. Any territorial re-distribution that at any time might be necessary shall not in any way affect the Muslim majority in the Punjab, Bengal and North-West Frontier Province.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 14 7. Full religious liberty, i.e., liberty of belief, worship and observance, propaganda, association and education shall be guaranteed to all communities. 8. No bill or resolution or any part thereof shall be passed in any legislature or any elected body if three-fourths of the members of any community in that particular body oppose such a bill, resolution or part thereof on the ground that it would be injurious to the interests of that community or in the alternative method is devised as may be found possible and practicable to deal with such cases. 9. Sind should be separated from Bombay presidency. 10. Reforms should be introduced in the North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan on the same footing as in other Provinces. 11. Provision should be made in the constitution providing the Muslims an adequate share along with other Indians in all the services of the State and in local-self- government bodies with due regards to the requirements of efficiency. 12. The Constitution should embody sufficient safeguards for the protection of Muslim culture and for the promotion of Muslim education, language, religion, personal laws and Muslim charitable organizations and for their due share in the grants-in-aid given by the state and by the self-governing bodies. 13. No cabinet, either Central or Provincial, should be constituted without there being a proportion of at least one-third Muslim ministers. 14. No change should be effected in the constitution except with the approval of the states forming the Indian federation. The British rulers did not accept either the Nehru report or Jinnah's 14 points. They, with communal divisions in mind, came up with the communal award which insisted on giving the Muslims, the Sikhs, the Christians and the Anglo-Indians and Europeans separate representations. The Depressed Classes were given a number of seats to be filled by election from special constituencies where the depressed class voters could only vote. Mahatma Gandhi opposed this move and as a result, Gandhi- Irwin Pact was signed. The Viceroy offered dominion status which was rejected by the Indian national congress and in its Lahore congress, it declared that Swaraj or full independence was its aim and empowered the AICC to start Civil Disobedience movement. Henceforth, 26th January, 1930 was declared as India's Independence Day, and civil disobedience movement started in March, 1930 followed by repressions by the British colonial rulers.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 15 1.14 Simon Commission Report, 1930 In the midst of a very charged situation of civil disobedience movement, the Simon Commission submitted its report in June, 1930. The Commission was constituted under the provisions of the 1919 India Act. Under pressure from the rising momentum of the nationalist upsurge, the Commission was formed two years earlier in 1928 under Sir John Simon and when it landed in India, it faced widespread protests and it was shown black flags. Hartals and Boycotts were organized against the Commission. "Go back" slogans were raised. Despite all these, the Simon Commission continued its work and submitted its report in June, 1930. The main focus of the Commission was to prepare the framework of the future constitution of India and the position the Provinces should enjoy. The important recommendations of the Simon Commission were : 1. The future constitutional development of India should be on the lines of federalism. 2. Diarchy in Provinces should be done away with. 3. Each Province should be supreme in its own sphere and the Governor was to be vested with over-riding powers over the Legislature. 4. The size of the Provincial Legislature should be enhanced. 5. The Upper house of the Central Legislature would be as it is while the size of the Lower house would be enlarged and its members would be elected by the Provincial Legislative Councils. 6. There should be no responsible government at the Centre. The governor-General should be empowered to select and appoint the members of his Executive Council. 7. There should be less functions for the Council of the Secretary of the State for India and its membership should also be reduced. 8. A Council for Greater India should be set up with representatives of the States and British India for consultative purposes. 9. A Provincial Financial Fund should be created for providing enough resources to the Provinces.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 16 10. The High Courts should be under the control of the government of India. 11. Burma should be seceded from India in the new constitutional scheme of things. 12. Sindh and Orissa should be given adequate consideration for the status of Provinces. 13. The presence of British troops and British officers in Indian regiments should be there for many years, but the Commander-in-Chief should not be a member of the Vice-Roy's Executive Council and he should not be a part of the Central Legislature. The report of the Simon Commission could not satisfy the aspirations of the Indian people. There was fear that the Governor-General and the Governors would be very powerful if the report of the Simon Commission had been accepted. The nationalists and even the Muslim League opposed the Report. Despite the opposition to the Report by the Indians, the British Government accepted it and convened the First Round-Table Conference (1930-31) in London with a view to discussing the future constitutional reforms in India. 1.15 The

the Committee came out with a draft bill on 5 th February, 1935. The bill was discussed in the House of Commons and in the House of Lords and finally, the King signed the bill and it came into force as the Government of India Act, 1935 in July, 1935. The main features of the Act are as under : 1. Federal Government was to be introduced between the Central government and the Provinces and States. But ultimately, the Central Government continued to function as per the 1919 Act and only the part of the 1935 Act dealing with the Provincial Governments came into effect. 2. The Act provided for three lists: 1. Federal List 2. Provincial List and 3. Concurrent list. The residuary powers were vested in the hands of the Governor- General.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 17 3. The Governor-General was made the head of the Central Administration and enjoyed good amount of power relating to administration, legislation and finance. He was to be helped by the Council of Ministers in the discharge of his functions and the number of Ministers was limited to 10. 4. Diarchy was to be in operation at the center. However, it was abolished at the Provincial level. 5. The Federal Legislature was to consist of two houses, namely, the Council of State and the Federal Assembly. The term of the Federal Assembly was to be 5 years. However, the Governor-General was given the authority to extend its term. 6.

Indian legislatures were denied legislative powers on a number of subjects and Governor-Generals or Governors were granted powers to override their ministers and legislators in certain cases including assumption of unlimited powers in a situation of constitutional breakdown. 13. Two new Provinces Sindh and Orissa were constituted. 14. Reforms were undertaken relating to North-West Frontier Province and in other Provinces. 15. Separate electorates were retained as before. 16. Muslims were allowed to have one-third representatives in the Central legislature. NSOU ? CC-PS-02 18 17. of the Act. When Independence came, both the two dominions, India and Pakistan accepted the Act as their provisional constitutions with certain amendments here and there. 1.16 The Cripps Mission The First World War forced the British rulers to change their policy towards India. They sent Sir Stafford Cripps, a minister in the British cabinet, to India to find a 'just and final solution' of the constitutional crisis. The Cripps Mission envisaged the granting of dominion status to India and framing a constitution for India after the end of the War. The Provinces were given freedom to accept or reject the constitution. The Muslim League did not accept the proposals as its demand for partition was not conceded. The National Congress also declined the proposals of the Cripps Mission. Gandhiji called the offers made by the Mission 'a post-dated cheque on a crashing bank'. The British Government was not amenable to the conditions put forward by the National Congress leaders and as a result, the Cripps Mission ended in a total failure. 1.17 The Quit India Resolutions Soon after the failure of the Cripps Mission, the Indian National Congress leaders met at Bombay in August, 1942 and adopted the famous "Quit India" resolutions for the immediate end of the British rule in India. Gandhi played a very crucial role in adopting the resolutions. The British Government, in response to the resolutions, put almost all the Congress leaders behind bars and banned all Congress organizations. This led Indians NSOU ? CC-PS-02 19 to waging an all-out revolution against the British known as 'August Revolution'. The British rulers crushed this revolution with all its might. Consequently, war efforts of the British Government were seriously hampered due to apathy shown by the Indians. 1.18 Simla Conference The Allies' victory in world war-I came in 1945, three years after the Cripps Mission. The Governor-General ordered the release of the jailed Congress leaders as a step towards holding negotiations with them. A conference was convened at Simla where leaders of all political parties assembled, but no agreed solution came out of it. Lord Wavell, the then Governor-General of India went to England amidst the Labour party coming to power defeating the Conservative party. Lord Wavell came back and announced that the British Government was serious enough to give India self-governance. 1.19 Parliamentary Delegation In 1946, the Prime Minister of Britain, Clement Attlee declared that a Parliamentary Delegation would visit India to discuss various issues connected with the self-rule in India. The Delegation came to India and discussed things with the leaders of various political parties which led to further understanding of the constitutional issues regarding self-rule of the Indians. The Labour Government in England felt convinced about the need to grant self-governance for the Indians. For this to happen, the British Government sent another Mission called 'Cabinet Mission' to India. 1.20 Cabinet Mission The Cabinet Mission consisting of three members of the British Cabinet, Sir Stafford Cripps, Lord Pethic Lawrence and A.V. Alexander came and started deliberating on the future political set-up of India, known as 'Cabinet Mission Plan'. The Plan envisaged a confederation of three autonomous groups of states each

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 20 having separate constitution thereby creating opportunities for people belonging to various religions to live unitedly but at the same time, enjoying complete autonomy in areas where they were in a majority. The Plan had two sides- one pertaining to future political set-up of India and the second relating to the establishment of an immediate Indian Interim Government. The Cabinet Mission was against giving the Muslims a separate state. It also envisaged that the constitution of the Union and the Groups could have a provision whereby any Province, by a majority vote in the Legislature, could call for a reconsideration of the terms of the constitution after an initial period of ten years and thereafter at ten-year interval. The Muslim League accepted both the two parts of the Plan while the Indian National Congress accepted only the long-term programmes. As a result, the Muslim League rejected the Plan wholesale and declared that it would depend on direct action to achieve its demands. Meanwhile, the elections in the British Indian Provinces were held and the Provincial autonomy scheme of the Constitution Act, 1935 was given effect to. But the issue of forming an Interim Government at the Centre still remained unresolved. The Cabinet Mission Plan was praised and it was seen as an opportunity to reconcile the stands taken by the Congress and the Muslim League. It upheld the long-standing demand of the Indians for establishing a Constituent Assembly. Congress was elated for the fact that the Plan rejected the demand for a separate Muslim State. Muslim League was happy for the fact that the provision of grouping of Provinces coupled with the requirement of a majority of all religious communities for settlement of all major communal issues. But it cannot be denied that this Plan also led to the passage of the Mountbatten Plan and thereafter the Indian Independence Act of 1947 leading to the partition of India.

1.21 Formation of Interim Government The direct action programme announced by the Muslim League hampered Lord Wavell's efforts to bring the rival political parties to some agreement. Communal tensions gripped the country and communal disturbances spread like a violent conflagration. In the midst of such disturbances, Lord Wavell invited Nehru to NSOU ? CC-PS-02 21 consider the proposals for the formation of Interim Government at the Centre and fortunately the discussions led to the formation of an Interim Government on 2 nd of September, 1946.

1.22 Mountbatten Plan Events in India were moving so fast and dangerously that it was felt both in India and England that unless immediate action was taken, things could go out of hands. The British Government replaced Wavell by Lord Mountbatten as the new Governor-General of India. On 20 th February, 1947, the British Government made a historic announcement of transferring power to responsible Indian hands not later than June, 1948. Lord Mountbatten, the new Governor-General, plunged into action and started negotiating with the leaders of various political parties. He came to the conclusion that the only solution to the ongoing communal violence and bloodshed was to transfer power in the hands of the Indians. With a view to transferring power and accommodating the interests of the two leading religious communities, Mountbatten devised a plan for partition of the country-India and Pakistan. It was according to the Plan that Punjab and Bengal were also partitioned between the two new nations of India and Pakistan and the Plan was accepted by both the two leading political accordingly the Indian Independence Act was passed providing for the setting up of two Dominions- the Dominion of India and the Dominion of Pakistan on August 15, 1947. As a result, on the historic day of 15 th August, two Dominions of India and Pakistan were born. Main features of the Indian Independence Act, 1947 : a. The Act made the existing Constituent Assemblies the legislatures for the Dominions for the time being. The Assemblies were empowered to exercise all powers exercised earlier by the Central Legislatures, in addition to its power to frame a new constitution. e. Until a new constitution was framed, each of the Dominion and all the Provinces were to be governed as per the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935. Each Dominion was empowered to make amendments to the Act as per the Indian Independence Act, 1947. f. The Governor-General was authorized to modify the Government of India Act, 1935 as would be necessary till March, 1948 after which it was the Constituent Assembly which had the power to modify or adapt the same Act. g. The power of the King to veto laws or to reserve laws for his pleasure was done away with and this power was given to the Governor-General. h. The Act terminated the authority of the Crown over the Indian states. All treaties, agreements and functions exercisable by his Majesty with regard to the states and their rulers were made to lapse from 15 th August, 1947. i. Agreements with the tribal population of the North-Western Frontier Province of India were to be sorted out by the successor Dominion. j. The office of the Secretary of State was to be done away with and his functions were to be transferred to the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Affairs. k. The title of "Emperor of India" was to be dropped from the Royal style and titles of the King of England. l. It was decided that there shall be a Governor-General for each of the Dominions who would be appointed by His Majesty and would represent

Dominions. m. The Act laid down temporary provisions for the Government of the Dominions by giving the two Constituent Assemblies the status of Parliament with full powers of Dominion legislatures.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 23 The Indian Independence Act, 1947 freed India from the clutches of the British colonial rulers and gave freedom but at the cost of partition. Two independent and separate countries- Pakistan and India were born on 14 th and 15 th August of 1947 respectively. India became an independent and sovereign country. The first Prime Minister of Independent India, Pt. Jawaharlal Nehru observed, "At the stroke of midnight hour, when the world sleeps, India will awake to life and freedom...." The Constituent Assembly started working on the drafting of a Constitution for free India since 9 th December, 1946. After working for almost three years, the Constituent Assembly came out with a Constitution on 26 th November, 1949 and the same was given effect to from 26 th January, 1950 declaring India a Sovereign, Democratic Republic and electing Dr. Rajendra Prasad as the first President of India (26 th January 1950- 13 th May, 1962).

1.24 Conclusion The constitution of India is a product of the freedom movement of the people of India against the British colonial rulers. As the freedom struggle intensified, the British colonial rulers started enacting various laws paving the way for formulating a constitution for free India. Unfortunately for the people of India, the British colonial rulers divided the country on religious lines- India and Pakistan, the roots of which are to be found in the laws enacted by the British Parliament, particularly the laws of 1909 and 1919. The British rulers were forced, both by the peaceful agitations and armed uprisings resorted to by the Indian people, to choose the legislative route to ensure a Constitution for the Indians of their own choice but it was done at the cost of the partition of the country.

1.25 Summing up ? Under pressure from the Indians, the British rulers enacted various laws towards gradually giving the Indians the opportunity to be part of the colonial administration and ultimately the right to frame their own constitution on achieving independence. ? Both the Indian National Congress and the Muslim League reacted to these laws in their own way keeping their own interests in mind.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 24 ? The British rulers sowed the seeds of communal disharmony among the Hindus and the Muslims through 1909 and 1919 Acts which ultimately led to the partition of India into two separate and independent countries – India and Pakistan. ? After partition, both the two countries constituted their own Constituent Assembly to frame the constitution of their choice. 1.26 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. This philosophy includes those ideals or policies on which is based the Constitution. Jawaharlal Nehru’s ‘Objectives Resolution’ helps us understand the philosophy of the Indian Constitution. Nehru placed these resolutions before the Constituent Assembly on 23rd December, 1946 and they were adopted in an amended form on 22 nd January, 1947. These resolutions declared India as an “Independent Sovereign Republic”. Indian people

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 27 were described as the source of all power and authority. In addition, social, economic and political justice, equal status and opportunities, equality before law, freedom of expression, faith, and religion and adequate provisions for the preservation of the interests of the SCs and STs were included in the resolutions. Nehru’s ‘Objectives Resolution’also incorporated ideals like the integrity of the territory of the Republic, promotion of world peace and the welfare of mankind.

The preamble of the Indian constitution has given an important place to the ‘Objectives Resolution’ of Nehru. 2.3

Notably, the Indian brand of socialism is a 'democratic socialism' and not a 'communistic socialism' (also known as 'state socialism') which involves the nationalization of all means of production and distribution and the abolition of private property. Democratic socialism, on the other hand, holds faith in a 'mixed economy' where both public and private sectors co-exist side by side'. As the Supreme Court says, 'Democratic socialism aims to end poverty, ignorance, disease and inequality of opportunity. Liberty The term 'liberty' means the absence of restraints on the activities of individuals, and at the same time, providing opportunities for the development of individual personalities. The Preamble secures to all citizens of India liberty of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship, through their Fundamental Rights, enforceable in court of law, in case of violation. Liberty as elaborated in the Preamble is very essential for the successful functioning of the Indian democratic system. However, liberty does not mean NSOU ? Fraternity Fraternity means a sense of brotherhood. The Constitution promotes this feeling of fraternity by the system of single citizenship. Also, the Fundamental Duties (Articles 51-A) say that it shall be the duty of every citizen of India to promote harmony and the spirit of common brotherhood amongst all the people of India transcending religious, linguistic, regional or sectional diversities. The Preamble declares that fraternity has to assure two things, the dignity of the individual and the unity and integrity of the nation. The word 'integrity' has been added to the preamble by the 42nd Constitutional Amendment, 1976. 2.5

Nature of the Preamble It should be noted that the first Constitution to have a preamble was that of the United States of America in the year 1787. The other countries having a preamble to their Constitutions include Japan, Ireland, Myanmar, India etc. In India, there is much debate about whether the preamble is the part of the constitution. In Berubari case, the Supreme Court refused to recognize the preamble as part of the Constitution. But in Keshavananda Bharati case, the majority of Judges of the Supreme Court of India, mentioning the debates in the Constituent Assembly, opined that the preamble is very much a part of the Constitution. In fact, in spite of the preamble being an inviolable part of the Constitution, it cannot be considered to be the source of power as well as it cannot impose NSOU ? CC-PS-02 31 restrictions on power. In Berubari case in 1960 and in Indira Gandhi vs. Rajnarayan judgement in 1975, the Supreme Court Judges opined that the preamble is a part of the constitution but it is not a part of the effective part of the constitution.

Renowned constitution expert, Dr. Durgadas Basu also agreed with this opinion. Despite being not an effective part of the constitution, it cannot be denied that the preamble helps us get a clear idea about the objectives of the framers of the constitution. Taking part in a debate of the Constituent Assembly, Alladi Krishnaswamy Iyer commented that the preamble is 'a sort of introduction to the Statute'. In Golaknath case in 1967 and in Keshavananda Bharati case, the Supreme Court expressed the similar view. From the above, it can be said that the preamble to the Indian constitution has very little legal importance. Firstly, it is not associated with the effective part of the constitution and secondly, it cannot give legal explanation of the effective part of the constitution. All the functions of the Indian state are conducted and controlled as per the basic part of the constitution. Moreover, if any citizen ignores the ideals and principles of the preamble, the Court has no power to force him or her to follow these ideals and principles.

2.6 Significance of the Preamble Although the Preamble is not a part of the basic constitution, its importance and significance cannot be denied.

1. The Preamble helps in the clarification of any ambiguities relating to any word or sentence of the effective part of the constitution. The Preamble plays a very important role in removing the ambiguities of the constitution.
2. The Preamble acts as a key to opening the mindset of the constitution-makers. In other words, the Preamble helps us understand the objectives and concerns of the makers of the constitution. In Berubari and Golaknath case, the point, that through the Preamble, the aspirations of the constitution-makers have found expression, has been made very clear. While delivering the judgement, the then Chief Justice of Supreme Court commented that the Preamble was, in short, an expression of the "ideas and aspirations" of the constitution.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 32 3. The Preamble is the philosophical foundation of the constitution. The social, economic and political ideals of the makers of the constitution have got reflected through the Preamble. The Preamble has not only reflected the ideals of popular sovereignty, state sovereignty, democracy, socialism, secularism and republicanism, determination to establish economic and political justice, freedom of expression, faith and belief, equality, fraternalism has also found an important place in the Preamble. Moreover, the Preamble has gone to the extent of declaring establishing a welfare state coupled with democratic socialism in the country. Unity and integrity of the country have also been emphasized on by the Preamble. In this way, the Preamble has, in a nutshell, described the aims and objectives and principles of our constitution. Even, we can know the date of adoption of the constitution and the date from which it came into effect. Subba Rao commented that the ideals and principles, on which our constitution is based, have been given a place of pride in the Preamble.

4. The Preamble is very important not only nationally but also internationally. The majority ruling in the Golaknath case categorically stated that the Parliament has no power to amend the fundamental features enshrined in the Preamble as the edifice of Indian constitution rests on these features. If any one of these features is weakened, the entire structure of the constitution will break down. Internationally, the Preamble plays a very important role as the principle 'Fraternity' acts as the basis of our national and international affairs. Our foreign policy is bound to fail unless bound by fraternity. Article 51 of our constitution has clearly stated the ideals of our foreign policy and for these policies to be realized, we must adopt the ancient Indian principle of "Basudhaiva Kutumbakam". The 'Fraternity' principle must not be confined within the four walls of our national boundary, it must also be extended to the international sphere.
5. The Preamble has immense moral significance. No government can ignore the principles and ideals embedded in the Preambles that will spell political doom for the party in power. Hence, it is considered to be a moral duty of any government to implement these ideals and principles contained in the Preamble. Considering the importance of the Preamble, Thakurdas Bhargav said that the Preamble is "the most precious part of the constitution". It is the 'soul' of the NSOU ? CC-PS-02 33 constitution, a key to understand the essence of the constitution. Bhargav considered the Preamble as "a jewel set in the constitution" and "superb prose-poem". Dr. Dhirendranath Sen went to the extent of calling the Preamble as a "solemn resolve". He criticized the Preamble as nothing more than a law serving the interests of the capitalist class. So, it must be kept in mind that what is important is not the ideals and principles enshrined in the Preamble, but its class-character. Any Preamble should be analysed in terms of the criterion of political power of the class concerned.

2.7 Can the Preamble be amended? There is much disagreement

as regards whether the Preamble can be amended under Article 368 of the constitution.

Even the Supreme Court judgements in various cases at different times are not similar. The reason for this may be due to the fact that the Preamble is not related to the effective part of the constitution and thus, it has no legal value. Whether the Preamble is amendable under Article 368 came to be discussed by the Supreme Court first in the Keshavananda Bharati vs the State of Kerala case in 1973. The petitioners claimed that the power to amend the constitution under Article 368 was not unlimited and an implied limitation has been imposed by the Preamble on this power of the Parliament as the basic elements or the fundamental features of the constitution have been codified in the Preamble.

These features cannot be changed by amendment of the constitution. In addition, as the Preamble is not a part of the constitution, it cannot be amended with the help of Article 368 as this Article can be used only to amend the constitution. The Supreme Court gave this ruling in Berubari case in 1960. But in Keshavananda Bharati case in 1973, the Supreme Court was of the view that as the Preamble is very much a part of the constitution, it can be amended by Article 368. But it should be kept in mind that the majority of the judges in this case opined that certain conditions must be followed while amending the Preamble. They said that the Preamble could be amended by applying Article 368 but the basic features contained in the Preamble could not be amended under any circumstances as our constitutional edifice was grounded on these basic features. So the judgement of the NSOU ? CC-PS-02 34 Keashavananda Bharati case made it clear that although the Preamble is amendable, the basic structures of the constitution are not. It may be in order to mention that in 1976, constitution was amended and like other parts of the constitution, Preamble was also amended and three words were inserted into the Preamble, namely, 'socialist, 'secularism' and 'integrity'. Nobody objected to these amendments as these were important principles like already-existing ones like 'sovereignty', 'democratic', 'republic', 'social-economic and political justice', 'freedom of expression', 'faith and belief' etc. There was no novelty in inserting these three principles as there were provisions already existing in the constitution relating to these principles as enshrined in the Directive Principles of State Policy and Fundamental rights. They were just explicitly given place in the Preamble. 2.8 Conclusion The Preamble is the cornerstone of the Indian constitution. Although it is not binding on the Government of the day to always act in accordance with the Preamble, it is at its own political risks that the Government can disregard or ignore the principles and ideals enshrined in the Preamble. The Preamble represents the spirit of the Indian political system as a democratic, sovereign, socialist, secular republic. The Preamble has lost much of its sheen due to the policy of liberalization, privatization and globalization initiated since 1991 by the then Congress led Government at the Centre. The ideals enshrined in the Preamble are at odds with the market-oriented principles of governance being resorted to by the rulers of our country. 2.9 Summing up ? Indian Constitution has a highly admired Preamble. ? Preamble of the Indian Constitution has immense political and moral significance. ? Preamble of the Indian Constitution can be amended keeping the basic features of the constitution in mind. ? Preamble of the Indian Constitution acts as a guide for the rulers of the day.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 35 ? Ideals enshrined in the preamble have lost much of their sheen due to market oriented policies followed by the Governments at the national level since the 1990s of the last century. 2.10 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. To dwell on the features of the Constitution in some detail. ? To make an assessment of these features. 3.2 Introduction The features of a constitution help us understand the nature or character of the same. The Constitution of India is a unique constitution framed by a Constituent Assembly. The Constituent Assembly took almost three years to frame the constitution after a lot of debates and discussions. It is the largest written democratic constitution of the world and it contains a number of important features which help us understand not only the character of our constitution but also the nature of the Indian political system. Since its inauguration on 26th January 1950, the Constitution of India has more or less successfully influenced the direction and progress of India. 3.3 Salient Features of the Indian Constitution 1) Written constitution – Like the constitutions of various other countries of the world, the constitution of India is also a written one. There were 395 articles and 8

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 38 schedules in the original Indian constitution. Subsequently, as a result of amendment of the constitution, the number of Articles and Schedules got increased. In the present constitution, there are more than 450 Articles and 12 Schedules. The amendments at various times have made the constitution a sizable one which has, in turn, made it a complex constitution too. 2) Unwritten conventions – Though the Indian constitution is written and there is no place for the convention in it, yet these have made their way into it. The conventions and traditions grow automatically and make their entry into the constitutional system. Though these are not recognized by the Courts, yet, these are there and not violated. The constitution of UK has influenced our constitution in this regard. The important conventions of the Indian Constitution are : ? The PM in Lok Sabha and the CMs in the State Legislatures are the leaders of their respective parties. ? Generally, the Speaker of the Lok Sabha belongs to the majority party and Deputy Speaker is chosen from the opposition. ? The President dissolves the Lok Sabha on the recommendation of Prime Minister, etc. 3) Constitution starts with a Preamble – The constitution of India starts with a Preamble. Although the Preamble is not a part of the Constitution, yet through the 42nd Amendment, the Parliament has increased its importance manifold. The Preamble has its own importance, that is why it is variously known as the “mirror of the Constitution”, “soul of the Constitution” or the “key to the constitution”. It includes the objectives and ideals of the Constitution such as Sovereignty, Democracy, Republicanism, Socialism, Secularism Liberty, Equality, and Justice, Fraternity etc. From the Preamble we can know the source of the constitution, date of its adoption etc. 4) Constitution was drawn from various sources – The constitution of India has been drawn from various sources as our objective was not to enact an original

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 39 constitution rather enact a good and workable constitution. The following basic principles were taken from other constitutions such as : 1. Parliamentary form of Government and the Rule of Law from the British Constitution. 2.

Fundamental Rights from the Constitution of the USA. 3. Directive Principles of State Policy from the Constitution of Ireland. 4.

Federal system of India from the Constitution of Canada. 5. Emergency powers of President from the Constitution of Germany. 5) Rigid as well as a Flexible constitution – The unique feature of the Indian constitution is that it is a mixture of rigidity and flexibility. It is neither as rigid as the constitution of the USA nor as flexible as the constitution of Great Britain. Article 368 Some parts of the Constitution can be amended by the Union Parliament by passing a resolution with 2/3rd majority of the members present and voting like the Fundamental Rights, Directive Principles of State Policy etc. Then, in amending some parts like the election of the President, distribution of powers between the Center and the States etc, support of two-thirds majority is required for passage by the Parliament and then the approval of half of the Legislature of the States is a must. These two methods are proof of the rigidity of the Indian constitution. Besides, there are certain other parts of the constitution which can be amended by the Parliament with a simple majority like the changing of the boundary of a state or changing of the name of a state and the abolition or the creation of the Legislative Council etc. So, the constitution of India is a mixture of rigidity and flexibility. 6) Universal Adult Franchise – India is a democratic state, therefore, the constitution of India, under article 326, provides for universal adult franchise and every citizen, male or female, who is 18 years of age is given the right to vote without making any discrimination on the basis of sex, caste, color, religion, etc. 7) Single Integrated Judicial system – The constitution of India provides for the single integrated judicial system. Unlike other federal countries of the world, in India, there are no separate courts for the states and the union government.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 40 The entire judicial system of India is organized into a hierarchical order : Supreme Court is

and District courts at the district level. All the courts of India are bound to accept the decision of the Supreme Court. 8) Rule of Law – The Constitution of India provides for rule of law for which our constitution is indebted to the Constitution of Britain. The rule of law means that nobody is above law and everybody is equal before the law. 9) Single Citizenship – In some federal States, people enjoy double citizenship. First, they get the citizenship of the State in which they live and then they enjoy the citizenship of the country. This principle of double citizenship has been adopted in federal States like the USA, Canada, etc. But in India there is single citizenship. A person may be living in any State but he is a citizen only of India. 10) Hindi to be the official language of the Union Government – The Constitution of India has given recognition to 22 regional languages and to promote unity and mutual cooperation among the people speaking different regional languages, Article 343 states, 'The official language of the Union shall be Hindi in Devnagri Script.' 11)

Independent Judiciary – The Constitution of India makes provisions for the independence of the Judiciary because only an independent Judiciary can safeguard the rights and liberties of the people, and can protect the supremacy of the Constitution. To make the Judiciary independent, the following provisions have been made : 1. An impartial method has been adopted for the appointment of the Judges. 2. Provisions have been made for long tenure of the Judges. Judges of the Supreme Court work till the age of 65 and the Judges of the High Courts can be in service till the age of 62. 3. No Judge can be removed except on grounds of proved 'misbehavior' and 'incapacity' 4. No question can be asked in the Parliament relating to the reasonability of the rulings of the Judges. NSOU ? CC-PS-02 41 5. No Judge can act as a lawyer in any court after retirement. 6. The salary and allowances of the Judges cannot be reduced generally during their office. But the sad fact is that many Judges in our country don't hesitate to become pro- government of the day in order to have plum posting after retirement. Corruption has also made its presence felt in the Judiciary. 12) Secular State – The Constitution of India has declared India to be a secular State and

Also, no tax can be imposed by the State in the name of religion. No discrimination will be allowed to be made while making an appointment in higher offices, rather appointments are to be made on the basis of required qualifications. 13) Special provisions for the protection of the interests of the Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes and Backward Classes and Minorities – The Constitution of India has made special provisions for the protection of the interests of Scheduled castes, Scheduled Tribes, Backward Classes, and the Minorities. According to the Constitution, everybody is given the right to equality. Untouchability has been prohibited and practice of it in any form is declared a crime and punishable under the law. of the constitution deal with the Directive Principles of State Policy and the constitution makers were inspired by the Constitution of Ireland in this regard. These principles are considered to be the guiding principles for the Government to make India a welfare state. Directive Principles concerning social ideals, legal and executive reforms and international relations are also of great importance. But we must remember that these principles are not enforceable by the Courts but these principles are nevertheless fundamental in the governance of the country and it shall be the duty of the state to apply these principles in making laws.

So, these principles have moral importance to the Government and it is morally bound to fulfill these principles. In case of failure to implement these principles, the Government may have to pay a heavy political price too. 16) Balancing between the supremacy of the Judiciary and the sovereignty of the Parliament – One of the important features of the Indian Constitution is to make a balance between the supremacy of the Judiciary and the Parliamentary sovereignty. In the USA, the Supreme Court is guided by the 'due process of law' principle and hence it can declare any law passed by the Congress as null and void if such law is found to be unconstitutional or is against natural justice. But in India, the Supreme Court can consider any law passed by the Indian Parliament on the basis of the principle of 'procedure established by law', that is, it can declare any law as null and void only in case such law is not passed in accordance with the rightful procedure.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 43 It cannot nullify any law on the ground of its being anti-natural justice. On the other hand, the Indian Parliament can override any ruling of the Supreme Court by amending the Constitution. It may be mentioned that in 1986, the government headed by Rajiv Gandhi passed a law for overriding the ruling of the Supreme Court in the Shahbanu case. Earlier, by amending the Constitution (24 th and 25 th amendment acts), the then government made the ruling of the Supreme Court in Golaknath case ineffective. In Keshavananda Bharati case, the Supreme Court ruled that the Parliament has no power to amend the 'basic structure' of the constitution.

But the then Government headed by Indira Gandhi passed the 42 nd Constitution Amendment Act and brought the matter of constitution amendment outside the purview of the consideration of the Supreme Court. In 1980 Minarva Mills Case, the Supreme Court nullified those parts of the 42 nd Amendment Act. Thus, a tug of war continues between the Supreme Court and the Parliament around the issue of supremacy. This is also a fact that the Supreme Court, many a time, asserted itself and acted independently leading to the emergence of 'Judicial Activism' which has become a debatable point in Indian politics. 16) Federal in form but Unitary in nature – Indian constitution is regarded as a mixture of both Federalism and Unitarianism. Features of federalism exist in India like written and rigid constitution and the presence of a Federal Court, that is, the Supreme Court. So far as centralizing tendencies are concerned, the Central Government can issue directions to the States, the President can impose President's rule in any State, the prevalence of the Central legislation over the State legislation in case of a conflict between the two. Centralization may also occur through the power of the Central Government to utilize the 'Grants-in-Aid' as per its preferences. K.C.Wheare has described the Indian constitution as 'quasi-federal'. 17) Fundamental Duties of the citizens- Although the original constitution had no provision for fundamental duties, 42 nd Constitution Amendment Act passed in 1976 has added 10 fundamental duties for the citizens of India by inserting IV-A in the fourth part of the constitution. Later, one more fundamental duty has been added and presently, there are 11 fundamental duties in our constitution. 18) Provisions for emergency powers of the President – To meet emergency situations, the President of India has been given three types of emergency powers and NSOU ? CC-PS-02 44 they are there in the 18 th part of the constitution. President has emergency powers relating to 1. National Emergency (Article 352) 2. President's rule in the states Pacifism – In the Indian constitution, emphasis has been put on the establishment of world peace and fraternalism in the international sphere. Article 51 has clearly stated this position of the Indian Government. This craving for peace is most evident in the foreign policy of the Indian State. Author like A.R.Desai does not agree with this formulation. According to him, being a capitalist country, India is more inclined towards the capitalist world but the reason for India seeking world peace is that India is economically and militarily weak. 20) Special status for Jammu and Kashmir – Through Article 370, J&K was given special status under which Jammu and Kashmir would enjoy certain privileges like having a constitution of its own and autonomy in some other spheres. This made the State a bone of contention to many. The present dispensation at the centre, after coming to power for the second time in 2019, has done away with this special privilege enjoyed by the state of Jammu and Kashmir. 3.4 Conclusion The features of the Indian constitution are innovative in all respects. Through these features, the ideal of individualism had been combined with the ideal of social welfare and efforts were evident in making India a welfare state. But post-economic reforms in the nineties of the last century, the concept of welfare state has taken a back seat and neo-liberal philosophy has been adopted as the guiding principle of governance. As a result, the aims and objectives of the Indian State have got changed from being a welfare State to a minimal State in keeping with the dictates of the International Financial Organizations.

To dwell on the Writs issued by the Courts (Supreme Court and High Courts) to protect the Fundamental Rights of the citizens. ? To highlight the circumstances under which Fundamental Rights can be suspended.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 48 4.2 Introduction In any democratic set-up, fundamental rights are a must for the citizens. It is due to the fundamental rights that the individuals are able to develop their personalities to the full. Like many constitutions of other countries of the world, Indian constitution has provided the Indian citizens with some fundamental rights. The Constituent Assembly set up many committees for constitution making and one committee headed by Sardar Patel was entrusted with the stupendous task of dealing with the fundamental rights of the citizens. After much discussions and deliberations, the committee came to identify the essential rights for the citizens of India making them enforceable in courts. Fundamental rights have been highly praised and their importance highlighted. They have been called, "conscience of the constitution" and the very "soul of the constitution".

4.3 Important features of the Fundamental Rights ? Fundamental rights are different from ordinary legal rights in the manner in which they are enforced. If a legal right is violated, the aggrieved person cannot directly approach the SC bypassing the lower courts. He or she should first approach the lower courts. ? All the fundamental rights are available to the citizens, while persons other than citizens residing in India are entitled to enjoy some fundamental rights. ? Fundamental rights are not absolute rights. They have reasonable restrictions which means they are subject to the conditions of state security, public morality and decency and friendly relations with foreign countries. ? They are justiciable, implying they are enforceable by courts under Articles 32 and 226. People can approach the Supreme Court directly in case of violation of fundamental rights. High courts can also be approached through Article 226. ? Fundamental rights can be amended by the Parliament by a constitutional amendment but only if the amendment does not alter the basic structure of the Constitution.

Fundamental rights can be suspended during a national emergency. But, the rights guaranteed under Articles 20 and 21 cannot be suspended. ?

The application of fundamental rights can be restricted in an area which has been placed under martial law or military rule. ? Fundamental rights can be classified into two types-Positive and Negative. Some fundamental rights like Article 14, 15(1), 16(2), 18(1), 20, 21, 22(1), and 28(1) impose restrictions on the state from doing something. On the other hand, Articles 19(1), 25, 29(1), and 30 (1) are positive fundamental rights in the sense that they direct the state to perform certain functions. Former Chief Justice of India, Justice P.B.Gajendragadkar went to the extent of saying that, "a legally enforceable right governing the relations between the state and citizens has both a negative and positive aspect. It must, as the words indicate, be fundamental. It does not mean a right of liberty permissible under law: it also means a Right to Liberty in a positive sense which enables an individual to develop his personality and his faculties and to live his life in his own interest and in the interests of the community as a whole." ? Fundamental rights are not only binding on the state and its agencies but also on the individuals and organizations. If untouchability or any other discrimination is practiced by any person then he or she is subjected to punishment under the law ? Certain fundamental rights are there which are available against private individuals like Article 15 (2), Article 17, Article 18 (3)-(4), Article 23 and Article 24. ? Another important feature of the fundamental rights is that the Right to Property, which was a fundamental right, has been taken away from the chapter of the fundamental rights by the 44 th constitution amendment act, 1978 and it has been made a legal right under Article 300A which says, "

No person shall be deprived of his property save by authority of law." 4.4

Amendability of the Fundamental Rights The fundamental Rights are a bulwork against the State interference as well as individual infringement of fundamental rights. Still, the question of amenability of the fundamental rights takes us to the point whether the fundamental rights can be amended NSOU ? CC-PS-02 50 under Article 368. Till the time Golaknath case was not there, it was the general view that no part of the constitution is immune from amendment and the Parliament can amend any part of the constitution taking advantage of Article 368. But in Golaknath case of 1967 it was upheld by the Supreme Court that fundamental rights as enshrined in Part-III of the constitution cannot be amended by any authority as the fundamental rights have been given a transcendental position by the constitution. To override this judgement, Parliament passed the 24 th Amendment Act in 1971 and made the fundamental rights amendable in accordance with the procedure of Article 368. In the case of Keshavananda Bharati v. State of Kerala, the opinion of the Supreme Court may be expressed in a nutshell: 1) Golak Nath's case is overruled; 2) Article 368 does not enable Parliament to alter the basic structure of the Constitution; 3) The 24th Constitution Amendment Act, 1971 is valid. 4.5

Fundamental Rights
Right to Equality (Articles 14 to 18) Article 14 states, "

93% MATCHING BLOCK 75/905 W

The state shall not deny any person equality before law or equal protection of the laws within the territory of India." This is both a negative and positive fundamental right. The positive side relates to the equal protection of all persons under equal circumstances and the negative side relates to the expression equality before law which implies the absence of privilege or favour towards any individual irrespective of his status or rank. Equality before law means that among equals, the law should be equal and the like should be treated alike. The Supreme Court of India, while interpreting the ambit of Article 14, upheld that a. Equal protection means equal protection under equal conditions b. The state can make reasonable classification for purposes of making laws c. Presumption of reasonableness is for legislation d. The burden of proof is on those who will prefer to challenge the laws However, there are some exceptions in Article 14 which are as follows : i. The President or the Governor of a state shall be exempted from being

This particular Article has to be read along with Article 35 which confers on the Parliament the power to make laws for prescribing punishments for offences as mentioned in Part-III of the constitution. Acting on this provision, the Parliament NSOU ? CC-PS-02 53 passed the Untouchability (Offences) Act 1955 which was later amended in 1977 and renamed as the Protection of Civil Rights Act, 1955. The Act recommended certain acts of untouchability as offences : 1. Refusing admission any person to public institutions, such as Hospitals, Dispensary, Educational Institutions; 2. Preventing any person to from worshipping or offering prayers in any place or public worship; 3. Subjecting any person public entertainment or with regard to the use of any reservoir, tap or other sources of water, road, cremation ground or any other place where services are rendered to the public. The scope of the Act was further widened in 1976 following an amendment. The various aspects of the amendment are : 1. Insulting anybody belonging to Scheduled Caste or Scheduled Tribe community on the ground of untouchability 2. Preaching untouchability, directly or indirectly 3. Justifying untouchability on historical, philosophical or religious grounds or on grounds of religious tradition. India seeks to prevent such abuse of titles by prohibiting the NSOU ? CC-PS-02 54 State from conferring any title at all as such abuse creates artificial distinctions in society. The State is allowed to confer military or academic distinctions and it can also confer awards or distinctions for excellence in social, cultural, public service or extra-ordinary services leading to achievement in art, literature and science, like Bharat Ratna, Padma Vibhushan, Padma Bhushan and Padma Shri, which cannot be used as titles. 4.6 Right to Freedom (Articles 19-22) Right to Freedom in the Indian constitution consists of four Articles, Article 19, 20, 21 and 22. Article 19 has given us several rights. They are : e.

Right to freedom of speech and expression f. Right to assemble peacefully and without arms g. Right to form associations or unions h. Right to move freely throughout the territory of India i. Right to reside and settle in any part of the territory of India j. Right to practice any profession, or to carry on any occupation, trade or business 4.7

Restrictions on the Right to Freedom No freedom can be unrestricted. Therefore, to strike a balance between individual freedom and public order, reasonable restrictions have been imposed under Article 19 in the sub-clauses (2) to (6). The grounds of restrictions can be Public Order or Morality, Sovereignty and Integrity of India, the Security of the State, and Friendly relations with foreign Nations etc. For example, the rights of a non- ST citizen can be restricted in an area exclusively inhabited by the Scheduled Tribes. The freedoms guaranteed by Article 19 are sought to be protected further by Articles 20, 21 and 22. NSOU ? CC-PS-02 55 Protection in respect of conviction of offences. Article 20 protects us from conviction in respect of certain offences. The Article states : 10.

Protection against Arbitrary Arrest and Detention. Article 22

Article 22 provides for what the State can do in case a person is detained under laws relating to preventive detention: NSOU ? CC-PS-02 56 1. The State can detain such person without trial for only three months and 2. Any detention for a longer period must be authenticated by the Advisory Board. 3. The person who has been detained will have the right to be informed about the grounds of detention and be allowed to make a representation against detention at the earliest opportunity. Preventive Detention Act was first enacted by the Indian Parliament in the year 1950. Subsequently, this was replaced by Acts like MISA in 1971, COFEPOSA in 1974, NSA in 1980, and ESMA in 1980 and the latest being UAPA. All these laws empower the State to put people under detention. The Preventive Detention Act was challenged in the Gopalan v the State of Madras case, 1950 when the Court went to the extent of observing that Preventive Detention as guaranteed under Article 19. any of them.

These provisions bear similarity with the 13 th Amendment of the American constitution through which slavery or involuntary servitude was done away with. Indian constitution, in order to make the purview of Article 23 wider, has inserted the term 'traffic in human beings' instead of slavery so that it not only prohibits slavery, but also any kind of traffic in women or children or the crippled for immoral or other purposes. can be said to be related to the Directive Principles of State Policy which imposes the duty on the State to ensure universal compulsory and free primary education for children of the age upto 14. 4.9 Right to Freedom of Religion (Articles 25-28) The Preamble of the constitution of India has ideals of secularism inscribed in it. It has described India as a secular State. India has no 'State Religion'. 'Articles 25-28 ensures the religious neutrality and impartiality of the Indian State and also guarantees the minority rights. Article 25 contains the

However, it must be kept in mind that although this Article has given the right to propagate and spread the tenets of one’s religion, it has prohibited forceful conversion of people belonging to one religion to another religion. The wearing and carrying of kripans by the Sikhs are to be thought of as a part of the profession of the Sikh religion and the sub- clause (b) of (2) refers to Hindus which must include a reference to persons professing religions like Sikhism, Jainism or Budhism and the Hindu religious institutions must be construed as such.

Article 32) A declaration of fundamental rights is of no meaning unless there is an effective machinery for implementation of the rights. For this reason, the framers of our constitution argued for special provisions guaranteeing the right to constitution remedies. Article 32 provides for such right. Article 32 has four sections. the Supreme Court to issue writs including writs in the nature of habeas corpus, mandamas, prohibition, quo warranto and certiorari for the enforcement of any rights. The third section empowers Parliament to confer the power of issuing writs or orders on any other courts without prejudice to the power of issuing writs on any courts. The last section deals with the conditions under which this right can be suspended. Therefore, the Supreme Court has been given the authority to play the role fundamental rights. The power to issue writs for the enforcement of the fundamental rights has been conferred on the Supreme Court (Article 32) and High Courts ( Article 226). Supreme Court can issue writs under Article 32 only for enforcement of fundamental rights whereas the High Courts, acting under Article 226, can issue writs for enforcing fundamental rights as well as for redress of any injury or illegality arising out of violation of ordinary legal rights. It should be noted that the right guaranteed under Article 32 cannot be suspended except during Proclamation of Emergency in the manner laid down by the Constitution (Article 359). 4.12 Writs Habeas Corpus It is a Latin term meaning "to have the body". In India, the court secures the body of a person detained or imprisoned to be brought before it and secure the release of the person from confinement if it is found that there is no ground of detention and hence unlawful. This writ can be issued both by the Supreme Court or High Courts. By issuing this writ, the Court directs the person who has kept another person in detention, to bring the body of the detained person before the court. Mandamas Mandamas means, "We order". It is an order issued by the Supreme Court and High Courts directing a person to perform some public or quasi-public

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 61 duty which he or she has refused to do and there is no legal remedy left for its enforcement. The High Court may refuse to issue Mandamus if there is alternative remedy available for redress of injury. A writ of Mandamus can be issued not only against officers or persons engaged in public duty, but also the government itself. Apart from protecting fundamental rights, the High Courts can issue a writ of Mandamus for purposes of enforcement of the performance of a statutory duty of a public officer conferred upon him by a statute or the constitution itself, to compel a Court or Judicial Tribunal to exercise its jurisdiction which it has failed to do and to direct a public official or the Government not to enforce any law which may be unconstitutional. Prohibition It is a writ issued by the Supreme Court to refrain the lower courts from usurping jurisdiction or overstepping their jurisdiction in any proceedings before it. Prohibition is a writ which warrants inaction when Mandamus wants public officials to act. It is applicable only against a body empowered to exercise public functions of a judicial or quasi-judicial character. Certiorari It is a prerogative writ by which order can be issued for removal of a suit from an inferior court to higher court. By a writ of certiorari, a decision of a lower court or tribunal can be quashed when there is an error of law or the subject is beyond the jurisdiction of the body or it assumes jurisdiction on the basis of a wrong decision or the inferior court or tribunal has violated the principle of natural justice. High Courts can issue this writ and quash the decision of a lower/inferior court while the Supreme Court can issue this writ if some fundamental rights have been infringed upon in such cases. Quo Warranto By issuing this writ, the Supreme Court or the High Courts may prevent a person from occupying a public office which he or she is not entitled to hold and may remove the person from enjoying the office and declare the office to be vacant. But a writ of Quo Warranto can only be issued when there is a usurpation of an office of public nature and an office which is substantive in nature, and there has been a breach of constitutional norms or a statute or NSOU ? CC-PS-02 62 statutory instrument in appointing that person to that particular office. This writ is a discriminatory remedy and may be refused by the Court on the basis of factual and legal evidences. 4.13 Suspension of Fundamental Rights Despite being the 'conscience of the constitution', fundamental rights are not unrestricted and one can enjoy these rights subject to restrictions like, the Sovereignty and Integrity of the country, the Security of the State, Public order, Decency or Morality. The fundamental rights remain suspended during National Emergency proclaimed by the President of India (Article 352). Even in normal times, these fundamental rights can be restricted when someone has been booked under Preventive Detention Act like MISA, NSA, ESMA, COFEPOSA, POTA, TADA, UAPA etc. The misuse of these restrictions by authorities can make the enjoyment of fundamental rights by the citizens a complete mockery. 4.14 Conclusion Fundamental rights are essential for the development of individual personality. These rights are expected to create a congenial atmosphere so that individuals would be able to develop their personalities to the fullest extent. Indian constitution has given six fundamental rights to the citizens of India. It was not an easy task for the Constituent Assembly to draw up a list of fundamental rights. It had to make difficult compromises in order to arrive at a consensus on fundamental rights. In independent India, fundamental rights have come to face many hurdles created both by the Legislature and the Executive. Critics argue that fundamental rights are not fundamental rights in reality, but they are just an apology for them. More important rights like the right to work, education have been left out. Many are of the opinion that draconian laws like preventive detention have taken much of the spirit and substance of the 3rd chapter of the constitution. Another category of people argue that the fundamental rights have been hedged in with so many exceptions, explanations and qualifications that it becomes very difficult for ordinary citizens to understand what exactly is available to them in the form of NSOU ? CC-PS-02 63 fundamental rights. The only consolation has been the role played by the Supreme Court and the High Courts. Whenever fundamental rights of the citizens have been infringed, the Courts have come forward to protect these rights. Overall, the chapter of fundamental rights has worked as a bulwark of individual liberty, a code of public conduct and a strong and sustaining basis of Indian democracy. 4.15 Summing up ????? Fundamental Rights are those rights which help individuals to be at their best selves, that is, with the help of these rights, the individuals can develop their personalities to the fullest extent. ????? Fundamental Rights are not absolute. Reasonable restrictions can be imposed on them and they can be suspended during national emergency and even in normal times when someone is booked under the Preventive Detention Act. ????? Fundamental Rights are amendable as has been proved by the fact that by the 44th Constitution Amendment Act, 1978, the Fundamental Right to property has been abolished and it has been made a legal right under Article 300(A) of the Indian Constitution. ?????

Ivor Jennings opined that the constitution-makers were influenced by the principles of Fabian socialism in incorporating these principles in the constitution. According to Durgadas Basu, the constitution of Ireland has its imprint on the directive principles of state policy as enshrined in the Indian constitution. In order for democracy to be successful, civil and political rights are not enough, economic and social rights are also necessary. Economic and social rights have found their place in the form of Directive Principles of State Policy in the constitution. The framers of the constitution, through these principles, wanted to make India a welfare state. Many are of the opinion that the directive principles of state policy are major steps forward towards realizing Nehru's "socialistic pattern of society." Unlike the fundamental rights, directive principles are not justiciable, that is, they cannot be enforced by the courts. The importance of these principles lie in their being the guiding principles of governance.

5.3 Distinctions between the Directive Principles and the Fundamental Rights There are some differences between the Directive Principles and Fundamental rights which are as follows :

- a) Directive principles are positive in the sense that they direct the state what it should do while the fundamental rights are negative as they impose limitations on the state as regards what it cannot do.
- b) Directive principles cannot be operational without laws, but fundamental rights can come into force without laws.
- c) Directive principles are not justiciable, that is, no citizen can go to the courts for enforcement of the Directive Principles but fundamental rights are enforceable by the courts. If one's fundamental rights are violated then one can seek redressal in the court.
- d) Government cannot enact any law on the basis of Directive Principles, but the government can enact laws on the basis of fundamental rights. For example, Parliament has enacted some laws on untouchability basing on Article 17 which has prohibited behaviour and campaigning relating to untouchability.
- e) Article 13 of the constitution has stipulated that any law enacted by parliament or any executive order which is against fundamental rights will be declared null and void by the court. In 1950, the Supreme Court nullified a part of the preventive detention act passed by the parliament in 1950. But the courts cannot declare any law null and void if it is against any directive principle.
- f) If any conflict arises between a fundamental right and a directive principle, the fundamental right will prevail. At present, directive principles under Articles 39 (B and C) will prevail over Article 14 and Article 19 which deal with the right to equality and right to freedom.
- g) According to many, the objective of the fundamental rights is to build up a democratic society but the objective of the directive principles is to create a welfare state. In other words, fundamental rights are political in nature but the directive principles are social and economic in nature.
- h) Fundamental rights are not unlimited. The state can impose limitations on them in public interests. So a kind of balance between individual interests and collective interests has been forged through the fundamental rights. But no limitation can be imposed on the directive principles.
- i) Fundamental rights have limited the powers of the state. On the other hand, directive principles have expanded the state's power both nationally and internationally.
- j) According to some, fundamental rights are not as dynamic as the Directive Principles of State Policy.
- k) The importance of the directive principles lies in the fact that they are expected to play an important role in socio-economic revolution. On the other hand, fundamental rights are more geared to ensure political equality.

the Directive Principles of State Policy In the Indian constitution, the Directive Principles of State Policy have been given a lot of importance so far as socio-economic implications are concerned. But compared to fundamental rights, the Principles enjoy secondary position in legal terms. In spite of legal inferiority, the principles have political and moral significance. If any government fails to implement these principles then the government may have to face an unsatisfied electorate at the time of election. The principles have also constitutional significance as Article 37 stipulates that it is the duty of the state to keep these principles in mind at the time of enacting laws. The central government can issue directives to the states to implement 1) Article 39(d) relating to equal pay for equal work irrespective of gender 2) Article 40 regarding introduction of the Panchayat system and 3) Article 47 prohibiting intoxicating drinks and drugs. The Directive principles are considered to be complimentary to social revolution through constitutional means as they have not only socialist principles in them, they have also helped us to find ways of implementing these principles. G.Austine described these

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 72 principles as "clearer statement of the social revolution". Moral importance of these principles cannot also be denied as they act as a reminder to the government as regards its economic, social and international duties. The Directive Principles are said to have no legal importance. But this is not wholly true because the Supreme Court, many a time, has considered the validity of laws on the basis of these principles. Prof. K.C.Wheare has pointed out the educative value of these principles. These principles make the people aware of their rights and duties. In fine, it can be said that these principles have given birth to new wants and aspirations among the people. Prof. Pylee has described these principles as symbol of minimum hopes and aspirations of the Indian people. Directive Principles can make India a welfare state, if implemented seriously. It should be kept in mind that both the Fundamental rights and the Directive Principles are complementary to each other. What is necessary is that both the two should made to balance each other. As Austin says, "By establishing these positive obligations of the State, the members of the Constituent Assembly made it the responsibility of future Indian governments to find a middle way between individual liberty and the public good, between preserving the property and privilege of the few and bestowing benefits on many in order to liberate the powers of all men equally for contributions to the common good."Hence, it can be said that the Directive Principles are no less important than the Fundamental Rights in making India a truly democratic country. 5.7 Conclusion Despite high ideals being expressed through the Directive Principles of State Policy, exploitation of the people, particularly the poor, discrimination based on caste, gender are very much in existence in India. Ignorance, caused by illiteracy on the part of a large section of people in society,has led to their religious enchainment and superstitious behavior. Liberalization, privatization and globalization policies followed by Governments since the 90s of the last century have weakened the objective of making India a 'socialistic pattern of society' as dreamt of by Nehru through the implementation of these Directive Principles of State Policies. What needs to be noted in particular is the non-enforceability of these principles where

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 73 more important socio-economic rights of the people reside. The unwillingness to implement the important Directive Principles by Governments coming to power at various times for political reasons has also been a bane for establishing a society based on equality. 5.8 Summing up ? House of the People. The House of the People is commonly known as the Lok Sabha. It is the lower or the popular chamber of the Indian Parliament. The members of the Lok Sabha are elected directly by the people. Unlike many other constitutions, the maximum numbers of member to be elected to the Lok Sabha is fixed by the Constitution. Originally, this number was fixed at 500. But the Seventh Amendment of the Constitution following the reorganization of the states in 1956 raised it to 520. The Forty Second Amendment of the Constitution further raised it to 545(Art 81). However at present it consists of 550 elected members. Of these a maximum of 20 seats are reserved for members from the Union Territories. The remaining 530

figures with due regard to the constitutional provisions on the subject. Accordingly, on the basis of the 1951 Census, India had a population of 360 million. But in 1981, it was about 700 million and by 1991 it has gone over 840 million. By the year 2001, the population of India has exceeded 1000 million. Yet, there has been no change in the total number of elected members to the Lok Sabha. Infact, by an amendment of the Constitution in 2001, the present strength of the Lok Sabha will remain the same until the year 2026. Here, it may be pointed out that the election of the House of the People being direct requires that the territory of India should be divided into suitable territorial constituencies, for the purpose of holding such elections. Article 81 has provided for uniformity of representation in two respects – (a) as between the different States and (b) as between the different constituencies in the same State.

Thus,

there shall be allotted to each State a number of seats in the House of the People in such manner that the ratio between that number and the population of the State is, so far as practicable, the same for all States; and each State shall be divided into territorial constituencies in such manner that the ratio between the population of each constituency and the number of seats allotted to it is, so far as practicable, the same throughout the State. As regards the House of the system of proportional representation has been abandoned and instead, the Constitution has adopted the single member constituency with reservation of seats for some backward communities namely scheduled castes and tribes. The reasons held by the Constituent Assembly for not adopting proportional representation were the following:- i) Proportional Representation presupposes literacy on a large scale. It presupposes that every voter should be a literate, at least to the extent of being in a position to know the numerals and mark them on the ballot paper. ii) Proportional representation is ill suited to the Parliamentary system of government laid down by the Constitution. One of the disadvantages of the system of proportional representation is the fragmentation of the Legislature

People and the Legislative Assembly of the State

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 78 into a number of small groups. This means that every time anything happened which displeased certain groups in Parliament, would on those occasions withdraw support to the government with the result that the Government, losing the support of certain groups, would fall to pieces. 6.4 Essential Qualifications to become a Member To be qualified for election to the Lok Sabha, the following conditions are required to be fulfilled :- 1.

cannot be challenged in a court of law. When the Further, the President is also empowered to extend the life of the house for one year at a time during a National Emergency. But in any case, the life of the house cannot be extended beyond six months after the emergency has ceased to operate. place of meeting will be decided by the President who will summon the house to meet. He/

she has also the power to prorogue the house. For a session to be legally valid it is essential for the Lok Sabha to assure the presence of minimum number of members which is known as the quorum. Without a quorum, Lok Sabha cannot legally decide over a matter nor can it comply any of its essential functions. The quorum of Lok Sabha is 1/10 th of the total strength of the house. Its presiding officer is the Speaker who is assisted by the Deputy Speaker during the period of his/her absence. The debates and discussions within a Lok Sabha is usually done either in English or in Hindi but in case a member is not comfortable in either of the two languages then the member may do so in his/her mother tongue. 6.7 Powers and Functions India has adopted the model of a parliamentary democracy. In such a system usually the authority of the lower house is established. This is so, since, the House is composed of members who are directly elected by the people. In India too, the importance of Lok Sabha is established in carrying out the administration of the country. The powers and functions of the Lok Sabha are wide and varied. For our convenience, they can be discussed in the following manner :- 1. Legislative : The principal business of the Lok Sabha is to deal with the matters relating to legislation. A non-money bill can originate in either house of the Parliament and it cannot be taken as passed by the Parliament unless NSOU ? CC-PS-02 81 it is so agreed to by both the houses of the Parliament. In the event of a difference of opinion between the two houses, the President is required to call a Joint Session

in the Union List and the Concurrent List but in case of subjects under State list, certain conditions on part of the Lok Sabha is required to be fulfilled. They are : i. To make a law under State list it is required for the Rajya Sabha to pass a special resolution. ii. The Lok Sabha can do so, if, National Emergency under Article 352 is declared for the entire country iii. If there is a request by two or more states iv. If there is the implementation of some international treaty or convention. However, it may also be noted that the Lok Sabha has exclusive control over the residuary subjects. 2.

Executive : The Lok Sabha exercises control over the Executive. According to the Indian Constitution the Union Council of Ministers headed by the Prime Minister shall be collectively responsible to the Lok Sabha. The Council of Ministers will have to resign, if, a vote of no confidence is passed in the Parliament. In case the Lok Sabha rejects a Government bill or a budget, or disapproves official policy, or shows its lack of confidence in the Government by making alterations in the policies and programmes of the Government against its wishes, it shall amount to the expression of a vote of no confidence. Infact the executive power of the Lok Sabha extends to the control of the executive through various devices like calling attention motion, questions and supplementary questions, tabling motions on matters of urgent public importance for discussion, half an hour discussion, No Confidence Motion and other means.

3. Financial : As far as the financial power of the Lok Sabha is concerned

SA

16MB04IndianParliament.pdf (D22450078)

a Money bill can originate only in the Lok Sabha. It is sent to the Rajya Sabha

where it is required to pass within a period of 14 days. In case the Rajya Sabha returns the money bill with some recommendations of its own, it shall depend upon the will of the Lok Sabha to accept them or not. However, a NSOU ? CC-PS-02 82 money bill can in no case be referred back to the Rajya Sabha for a second time. Moreover, it is one of the powers of the Speaker to decide whether a bill is a money bill or not. It is therefore, clear that the Lok Sabha alone is powerful in the sphere of financial legislation. Again, the annual budget is placed before both the houses but it is adopted by the Lok Sabha alone. Again, Rajya Sabha has no power to vote on the demand for grants of the Ministries / Departments, as this is the exclusive domain of the Lok Sabha. The Lok Sabha has further control over the Contingency Fund of India. It bears the sole responsibility to study the reports of the Estimate Committee and Public Accounts Committee. 4. Judicial : The Lok Sabha shares equal powers with that of the Rajya Sabha in taking punitive action against the outsider as well as its own members who commit a breach of its privileges. Lok Sabha jointly with Rajya Sabha can establish a High Court in the Union Territories and can even enhanced its power in such areas. Lok Sabha shares equal powers relating to the removal of the Chief Justice and the Judges of the Supreme and High Court. 5.

Powers related to Amendment : Lok Sabha plays a crucial role with regard to the amendment of the bills. It shares equal authority with that of the Rajya Sabha in this respect. If a constitutional amendment bill is passed in the Lok Sabha but is rejected in the Rajya Sabha then the bill becomes non functional. Not only that, on issues related to Supreme Court High Court, distribution of powers between Union and the States, Constitutional Amendment, election of the President requires the ratification of half of the states as well. However, on all other issues Parliament can alone amend the Constitution of India. 6. Miscellaneous Powers : Lok Sabha performs a number of miscellaneous functions. It shares with the Rajya Sabha equal authority in matters relating to the election and removal of the President. It elects its Speaker and Deputy Speaker. It shares with the Rajya Sabha authority in matters relating to the approval of the Emergency declared by the President. Both the houses of the Parliament can act in emergency times for setting up Martial Law Courts for NSOU ? CC-PS-02 83 dealing with the offences committed by the civilians. Besides, the Lok Sabha shares with the Rajya Sabha, the powers of discussing reports submitted by autonomous officials, agencies like the Union Public Service Commission, Comptroller and Auditor General of India,

Finance Commission, Language Commission, Minorities Commission, Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes Commission and the like. Lok Sabha also plays a severe role in providing important information related to the administration. The members query about governmental policies and activities on which the ministers concern had to reply. The answers of the ministers are expected to be based on informations collected from the official sources. These information helped the people to have an idea of the governmental activities. Lok Sabha also criticizes the governmental policies, if, it goes against the interest of the public. So, in this sense it tries to aware the people and alerts them on governmental activities. It in a way, helps to form the public opinion and it is public opinion which helps the democracy to flourish even further. 7. Other Powers : i. According to Article 2 of the Indian Constitution, Parliament by its discretion can create a new state or can include any part within the territory of India. According to Article 3 Parliament can enact a law relating to reorganizations of the states and of creating a new state. Parliament can expand the territory of a particular state or can even limit its territorial boundary and can even change the name of the state. ii. Parliament by virtue of Article 16 can determine additional residential qualification regarding jobs under state governments or that of the Union Territories. iii. Parliament can make final decision regarding creation or elimination of the upper chambers of the state legislatures. If the majority members present and the 2/3 rd members of State Legislature agreed to pass a bill then, the Parliament based on such decision can take a decision in its favour. Here, it must also be noted that the Lok Sabha shares equal authority with that of the Raya Sabha in this respect. NSOU ? CC-PS-02 84 6.8 Speaker of the Lok Sabha

The functions and powers of the Indian Speaker emanate both from

the provisions of the Constitution and the Rules of Procedure made in pursuance of them for conducting the business of the Parliament. Two things deserve special mention at this stage. First, the Speaker possesses some unwritten or unspecified powers to supplement his/her other powers. The reason for this should be discovered in the important position that the speaker holds. Second, though the office of the presiding officer of our popular chamber is largely modelled on that of the English Speaker, the Indian Speaker has wide powers than his/her counterpart in the United Kingdom. The powers of the Speaker may be roughly classified into four parts like regulatory, supervisory and censoring administrative and special or miscellaneous. 1. Regulatory : In the first place, the regulatory powers of the Speaker include his/her entire authority and responsibility for conducting the business of the house in an orderly manner. Thus, he/she maintains order and decorum in the house. He/she allots time for the debates and discussion and allows the members to express their views within the time determined by him/her. The Speaker interprets the rules of the Constitution and of the Procedure for the guidance of the members. He/she puts matters for division and announces

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 86 the result. In the event of a tie he/she exercises his/her casting vote. It is within his/her powers to admit motions, resolutions and points of order and then make arrangements for discussion on them. The Speaker may adjourn the house in the event of the absence of quorum or grave disorder. He/she may make his/her address on an important matter under consideration for the enlightenment of the members. The business of the house is conducted in English and Hindi languages, but he/she may allow a member to speak in some other language that happens to be his/her mother tongue and then make arrangements for authentic translation of the statements of the member into Hindi and English languages. No representation can be moved by members of the house without his/her consent. A secret meeting of the house can take place at the request of the leader of the house after its approval by the Speaker. Finally, the Speaker gives his/her ruling to settle a matter of dispute and his/her version is final. It can be challenged only when a substantive motion is brought by the members of the house. 2. Supervisory : Allied with the regulatory powers of the Speaker are also his/ her supervisory or censoring powers. The Speaker is the head of the Parliamentary Committees. Some important committees like Rules Committee and Business Advisory Committee work under his/her chairmanship. He/she appoints the Chairman of the various committees of the house and may issue instructions and directions for their guidance. He/she may ask the Government to supply such information to the house or to its committees that is so essential in the public interest. The Speaker sees to it that no member speaks unparliamentary language or becomes unnecessarily argumentative or verbose in his/her expression. He/she may force a member to withdraw his/her indecent expression or make amends. He/she may warn the member in the event of his/her disorderly behaviour or he/ she may also ask him/her to withdraw from the house. He/she may also make use of his/her Marshal for getting a member out of the house in the event of his/her highly disorderly behaviour. He/she may even adjourn the house in the event of grave disorder or some serious situation. No member can be arrested, nor can any legal proceedings be served on him/her without the permission of the Speaker. The Speaker may even issue warrants of arrest for bringing an alleged offender of the privileges of the house and it is his/her function to implement the decision of the NSOU ? CC-PS-02 87 house with regard to the punishment given to a person for the breach of privileges or contempt of the house. 3. Administrative : The Lok Sabha Secretariat functions under the control and direction of the Speaker.

The Speaker's authority over the Secretariat staff of the house, its precincts and its security arrangements is supreme. All strangers, visitors and press correspondent are subject to addition can be made in the Parliament house, and no new structure can be erected in the Parliament Estate without the Speaker's permission.

He/she makes provisions for the accommodation and other amenities of life granted to the members of the house. He/she regulates the lobbies and galleries meant for the press and the public. It is his/her concern to make arrangements for the sittings of the house and its Committees. He/she is the custodian of the honour of the house. It is his/her concern to see that the life and persons of members are secure and that the staff and property of the house are immuned from any danger. Besides, by virtue of 33 rd Constitution Amendments Act of 1974, he/she has been empowered not to accept the resignation of a member of the house in case he/she finds it submitted under duress. He/she may disqualify a member from the membership of the house and then declare his/her seat vacant on the ground of being a defector. On 11 January 1991s the Speaker gave a historic ruling whereby he/she disqualified eight members of the ruling Janata Dal including five ministers, on the ground that they were defectors under Schedule X of the Constitution and as such their seats were declared vacant. He/she ruled that a split in the ranks of the Janata Dal had taken place on 5 th November and the event of persons leaving the original party on that date could be taken as a split. Moreover, they could be given a benefit of doubt in view of the highly uncertain conditions of the time. But the defection of eight other members after a few days could not be regarded as a split, because their number could not be equal to the 1/3 rd strength of the residual strength of the Janata Dal. The important point of his/her ruling to be noted here, is that the spilt could be one time affair and could not be an ongoing or continuous process or phenomenon.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 88 4. Miscellaneous : Finally we come to the miscellaneous or special powers of the Speaker. He/she gives his/her certificate to a Bill that is passed by the house. He/she alone can decide whether

MA Politics SEM 2 Indian Constitution.pdf (D118114822)

a bill is a money bill or not. He/she

presides over the Joint Session of the Parliament. He/she acts as a sole channel of communication between the President and the house. He/she makes obituary reference in the house and delivers a valedictory address on the expiry of the term of the house. He/she makes formal reference on some occasions to important national and international events. He/she can correct patent errors in a bill after it has been passed in the house. He/she may even make changes in the bill consequential on the amendments accepted by the house. He/she acts as a ex officio chairman of the conferences of the presiding officers in the country. He/she can make nominations for the Parliamentary delegations visiting various parts of the country or abroad. 6.10 Position of the Speaker A study of the powers of the Speaker in practice, however, shows that he/she has not been able to gain that high level of dignity which is enjoyed by his/her English counterpart for the obvious reason that India is yet develop a sound tradition of our Speakers being a non - partyman. That is why, there have been occasions when a move for removing the Speaker from office was made or that some angry members went to the length of undermining the high office of the Speaker until they were forcibly pushed out of the house by the Watch and Ward Staff headed by the Marshal. G.V. Mavalankar dismissed the proposal of Speaker's being a distinctly non political man on the ground that he/she could establish another tradition of remaining above politics inside the house while living like a man of politics out of it. It was certainly the biggest day in the history of the Speakership in India when N.Sanjiva Reddy after being elected to this great office on 17 March 1967. He/she observes that his/her office requires him/her to be impartial and judicious in the conduct of his/her work. Unfortunately, this high tradition failed to prevail when Sanjiva Reddy relinquished his/her office to jump into the fray of the politics of the Presidential election in 1969. As such the tradition had a serious setback.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 89 No less unfortunate has been the tradition of conferring gubernatorial assignments on the persons after their retirement from the great office of the Speaker. In this way, instead of setting up of a healthy tradition like that of conferring the distinguished membership of the Upper Chamber of our Parliament by means of Presidential nominations upon one after his/her retirement from the office of the Speaker, new rooms for lucrative temptations have been opened whereby the occupant of this great office might fall prey to the charm of executive patronage. Sometimes the bias of the Speaker becomes well discernible in his/her attitude towards the Party in power as a result of which vocal members of Opposition lose their temper and demonstrate their resentment by means of shouts and walkouts. The Speaker often do so on the request of the ruling party and sought to justify his/her unjustifiable action in the name of 'extra-ordinary circumstances'. The office of the Speaker has a dignity of its own. As such it is a matter of regret that his/her authority is undermined on several occasions. There are several important reasons behind it of which some has been enumerated by J.C. Johari in the following manner : 1. The holders of this office seldom resign their political affiliations and remain active politicians. 2. They generally pronounce rulings and decisions, admit or reject motions, appoint members to various committees and treat members on partisan lines. 3. They remain ambitious to become Ministers, Governors or Chief Ministers, try to form factions and win favour from their groups. 4. They tend to please the powers and favour them out and out. 5. The leaders of the Opposition may resort to unparliamentary methods to fight the ruling party in the house. When checked by the Speaker, they defy and blame him/her. 6. The Opposition leaders are seldom consulted at the time of the election of the Speaker and for this reason, they look upon him/her as the nominee of the ruling party. Thus, the above mentioned circumstances suggests that the Speaker is sometimes compelled to adopt a partisan line and favour the ruling party either because he/she gets

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 90 political favour and patronage which is required by him/her to remain in office or he/she needed the support of the majority in the house for conduction of the house properly. 6.11 Conclusion A comparative study of the functions and powers of the two houses of our Parliament may leads to an impression that the Lok Sabha is more powerful than the Rajya Sabha.

There is no doubt that the Indian Parliament is constituted on the basis of the principle of bicameralism, that is, legislature having two houses or chambers. The lower house or the House of the People being composed of directly elected members has an edge over the upper chamber. But here, it must be noted that the Constitution has also established a federal system of government. Even there was unanimity among the framers for achieving a balance between the direct representation of the people and the representation of the units. Keeping in mind the aspirations of our forefathers, the two houses should not be designated as such to exalt one and denigrate the other. Infact, what should prevail is the convention of harmony and cooperation between the two. 6.12 Summing Up ? The House of the People is commonly known as the Lok Sabha. It is the lower or the popular chamber of the Indian Parliament. ? The members of the Lok Sabha are elected directly by the people. ? At present it consists of 550 elected members. Of these a maximum of 20 seats are reserved for members from the Union Territories. ? To get acquainted with the functioning of the different committees in the Parliament 7.2 Introduction The significance of the Parliament consists in its multifunctional role. In a traditional sense, the Parliament is just a law making organ of the state. But in a modern empirical study, it is a multifunctional institution. However, at the same time it cannot be denied that NSOU ? CC-PS-02 94 the primary function of Parliament is law-making. Historically, it was the function of making laws that made the legislature a distinctly separate department of the Government. In spite of all the additional functions that a Parliament takes up as a result of the complexities of modern Government, law making still remains its most important activity. A Parliament without legislative work ceases to be a Parliament in the real sense. Now modern society is so complex that laws which govern it have necessarily to be complex. Naturally law making too has become a complex process. Further, the concept of a welfare state has entrusted additional responsibility upon the state. So not only the functions of the state have been extended but it has been done so at a rapid speed over the years. 7.3 Procedures related to sessions of the legislature The Parliament is also required to make laws within a definite constitutional framework. Law making in every country has to be done by a process prescribed under the Constitution of the country. This is true for India as well. Here it is worthwhile to discuss in brief, about the actual working of the Parliament. For this we need to have some knowledge of its practice and procedure according two houses. For the sake of convenience we may discuss them in the following manner :- Summoning of the house :

The President summons the sessions of the houses of Parliament. It is necessary that there should not be a gap of more than six months in the holding of the sessions. In practice the Minister for Parliamentary Affairs, proposes the date to two houses obtain orders from the President to this effect and they issue summons to the members individually. In case the new Lok Sabha is to meet, the President appoints its senior most member of the house as protem Speaker who presides so as to administer the oath to the members. Then, the Speaker is elected by the house who conducts the proceedings. After sometime, the members elect a Deputy Speaker. Here it must be noted, that generally the Parliament has three sessions each year- i) Budget Session-February to May ii) Monsoon Session-July to August iii) Winter Session-November to December Inauguration of the Session : A session of the Parliament after a general election begins with the inaugural address delivered by the President. He/she addresses both the house assembled together in the Central Hall of Parliament house. He/she reads out a speech written and approved by the Parliament. It contains a review of the activities of the Government during the preceding year as well as a statement of the policies and programmes of the new government for the ensuing year. After this, the two houses meet in their respective chambers and then the members has the right to discuss the address in the light of all aspects of administration. They also have a right to put amendments. Quorum, Adjournment and Prorogation : Quorum means minimum attendance without which the proceedings of the house cannot be conducted. In our country 1/10 th of the strength of the house has been fixed for this purpose.

W

It means that there must be at least 55 members present in the Lok Sabha, if the work is to be conducted.

In case the presiding officer finds that there is no quorum, he/she may ring the quorum bell so that the members sitting in the lounge or elsewhere may rush to the house. In the event of the lack of quorum the presiding officer may adjourn the sitting for some time. The President has the power to prorogue the session. In case the house is adjourned, the presiding officer may call its session as per his/her pleasure. In case it is prorogued then the President shall issue the summons for the next session. Point of Order : The business of the house should be conducted according to the rules of procedure as given in

so that it is in order. In case there is any breach of it, a member may raise a point of order so that nothing is done that is against the rules of law or procedure. The point of order is an extraordinary process which when rose has the effect of suspending the proceedings before the house. Hence, it is governed by certain specific conditions. It can be raised only in relation to the business before the house at that time. A member is not allowed to raise a point of order just for explaining his/her personal views, or asking for information from a minister, or when a matter is being put by the Chairman before the house for discussion or when the matter is being put to vote of the house.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 96 7.4 Procedures for Questions in the legislature Questions and Supplementary Questions : The first hour of every sitting is called the Question Hour. It is during the Question Hour that the members of Parliament may ask questions on different aspects of administration and Government policy in the national and International spheres.

Questions are of three types—Starred, Unstarred and Short Notice. A Starred question is one to which a member desires an oral answer in the house and which is distinguished by an asterisk mark. An unstarred question is one which is not called for oral answer in the house and on which no supplementary question can consequently be asked. An answer to such question is given in writing. Minimum period of notice for starred/unstarred questions is 10 days. A short notice question may only be answered on short notice if so, permitted by the Speaker and the Minister concerned is prepared to answer it at a shorter notice. A short notice question is taken up for answer immediately after the Question Hour. Keeping in view the time factor, it has been provided in the Rules of Procedure and Conduct of Business that a member of Lok Sabha cannot ask more than 5 questions in a day (starred as well as unstarred). Not more than 3 starred questions in the Rajya Sabha and not more than 1 starred question in the Lok Sabha by the same member can be admitted on a single day. The member in whose name the question stands may ask two supplementary questions. The total number of questions in a stirred list for a day is not more than 20 in Lok Sabha. The maximum number of questions in the unstarred list for a day is 230 in the Lok Sabha. In Rajya Sabha there is no such limit but normally the member of unstarred questions listed for a day is less than 200. 7.5 Motions and Resolutions Apart from questions, the members may move motions and resolutions relating to a matter of urgent public importance. Motions are of different kinds. They are namely Adjournment Motion, Calling Attention Motion, No Confidence Motion, Censure Motion and Statutory Motion. Adjournment Motion A member may move on adjournment motion of urgent public importance having a definite and factual basis with a prior notice being given to the Speaker or the Minister or the Secretary General. Calling Attention Motion The concept of Calling Attention is another device which combines the asking of a question for answer with supplementary and short comments in which different points of view are expressed concisely and precisely.

SA INDIAN POLITY book.docx (D57972790)

prior permission of the Speaker call attention of a Minister on any matter or of urgent public importance.

This gives an opportunity to the members of Parliament to highlight the failure or inadequate action of government on a matter of urgent public importance. No Confidence Motion Another device of utmost importance is No Confidence Motion. As the Council of Ministers is collectively responsible to the Lok Sabha,

they lose the confidence of the house, a motion of this sort can be moved with prior notice being given to the Speaker. Either the Prime Minister may move that the house has the confidence in the Government, or the members belonging to the Opposition parties may move that the house expresses the lack of confidence in the Government. Just after the Question Hour the Speaker may ask the mover to ask for leave of the house and in case the move is supported by at least 50 members he/she may rule that it is admitted. The matter is discussed within 10 days of the leave being granted and the time is specified on the recommendation of the Business Advisory Committee. However, the motion is finally decided by the votes. The Prime Minister takes care to reply all the charges. In case the motion is passed the government must resign. Censure Motion It is sometimes identified with the No Confidence Motion. Both have the same effect. It contains specific charges against the Government and no leave of the house is required to move it. It is in the discretionary power of the Government to find time and fix a date for its discussion. Resolution : Finally we come to resolutions which though like motions are different from them in the sense that while all the motions may not be put to vote necessarily, all resolutions are required to be voted upon. The resolutions may be moved by the Ministers as well as by private members. A member who wants to move a resolution has to give notice to the NSOU ? CC-PS-02 98 Secretary General of the house informing him/her of his/her intention to this effect the names of three members in the Lok Sabha and five members in the Rajya Sabha from among those who have expressed their desire to move it are desired by ballot to allow them to give notice of one resolution each. In case a resolution is tabled in pursuance of a provision of the Constitution or an Act of Parliament, it is called a Statutory Resolution. Such a resolution may relate to the approval of the Parliament for the continuance of Emergency under Article 352 in the country or under Article 356 in the State of the Indian Union or under Article 249 for shifting an item of the State List to the Union List or to the concurrent list etc. When passed it has a binding effect on the government. It may also be pointed out here, that while a government resolution may be taken up on any day from Monday to Thursday, a private members resolution can be taken up only on Fridays and the time of last two and a half hours is devoted for discussion on it. 7.6 Discussion One may also refer to discussion as an important item in the list of Parliamentary procedures. Discussions are of different types. They are- Short Duration discussion : At least three members of the house may demand a short duration discussion on some matter of urgent public importance. A notice to this effect should be given to the Chairman/ Speaker and in case it is admitted he/she may allot two sittings in a week for discussion. The Business Advisory Committee may be consulted for the allotment of time that is of one hour and normally Tuesdays and Thursdays are chosen for it. But in Rajya Sabha the Chairman may allot time in consultation with the leader of the house and here, the duration of allotted time may be of two and half hours. The only purpose is that ample light is thrown on a matter of urgent public importance. Half an Hour discussion : The members of the house may also demand discussion on some matter of urgent public importance and normally the last half an hour of the day is allotted for the purpose. Under Rule 377, a member of the Lok Sabha may raise any important matter in the house with the permission of the Speaker.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 99 7.7 Legislative Process: Ordinary Bill Legislative proposals are brought before in either houses in the form of a Bill. A bill is the draft of a legislative proposals, which when

passed by both houses of Parliament and assented to by the President, becomes an Act of the Parliament. There are Government bills and Private members bills. Bills may also be classified as Public bills and Private bills. A Public bill is one referring to a matter applying to the Public in general, whereas a Private Bill relates to a particular person or corporation or institution. The first stage of legislation is the introduction of the bill. It embodies the provisions of the proposed law.

If a Private member desires to introduce a bill, he/she must give notice of his/her intention to the Speaker. Every bill that is introduced in the house has to be published in the Gazette. There is provision however, for the publication of any bill with the consent of the Speaker even before its formal introduction. Usually, at the time of the introduction of the bill there is no debate. The person who is given leave to introduce the bill, if he/she so chooses, may make a short statement indicating broadly its aims and objectives.

SA

Political Process & Politics in India (EM).pdf (D139291481)

The introduction of the bill is also called the first reading of the bill.

The crucial stage in the life of a bill is its second reading. Now the bill is taken up for a detailed discussion. All principles of the bill are thoroughly debated. Amendments may also be moved. The house may take one of the four options. The four options are the following :- 1. The bill may be taken into consideration. 2. It may be referred to a Select Committee of the house 3. It may be referred to a Joint Committee of both the houses. 4. It may be circulated for the purpose of eliciting public opinion

SA

BPASE - 31 Indian Constitution.doc (D144112532)

In the case of every proposed legislative measure which is likely to arouse public controversy and agitate public opinion, resort to the last alternative is invariably made. But there are many bills which are of minor importance or pertain to routine matters, and others of an emergent nature, which may not therefore, permit any long delay. In their case one or the other of the first three alternatives is adopted. The Select Committee or Joint Committee is expected to give its report within a specified date. The members of the Select Committee are selected generally on the basis

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 100 of their ability or expert knowledge on the subject. The usual practice is that the mover of the bill will himself/herself propose the names of members of the Committee and the house adopts them. Members of the Opposition are well represented in the Committee. In the case of a Joint Committee, the concurrence of the other house is taken. Of the total number of members of the Joint Committee, two-thirds belong to the Lok Sabha and one-third to the Rajya Sabha. The Committee may give an unanimous report or a majority report. In the latter case, members in a minority will have the right to give "minutes of dissent". Submission of the report of the Committee may be taken as the beginning of the third stage. It is during this stage that members can send in their amendments to the different provisions of the Bill. The next stage is on a date fixed by the Business Advisory Committee, the bill is taken up for the third reading. This is the last stage and this is again a formality like the first reading. No discussion takes place and within a couple of minutes this formality is done. Thereafter, the bill goes to the second house where it passes through similar stages. In case the bill has been cleared by the Joint Select Committee of the Parliament, and then there is no need to refer to a Select Committee. The second house may pass that bill or return it with its recommendations. In that case the first house may pass it again after accepting the recommendations of the other house or not. The bill shall again go to the second house and in case it sticks to its earlier recommendations, there is a situation of serious disagreement or deadlock. The President may call a Joint Session of both the houses to resolve this crisis. Two important points should be kept in view here. First, while the Lok Sabha may delay the passage of the bill for any length of time, the Rajya Sabha has to pass it after it is passed by the Lok Sabha within 6 months. Second, the Speaker shall preside over the Joint sitting and the decision shall be taken by the majority of votes. But a Joint session can be held only in the case of a non money bill to be passed by simple majority. A bill that is finally passed by both the houses goes with the signature of the Speaker, to the President for his/her assent. This is normally the last stage. If the President gives his/ her assent, the bill becomes an Act and is placed on the Statute Book.

But even at this last stage, the bill can be stopped from becoming an Act. The President is empowered, if he/she so chooses to refuse assent to a bill that is placed before him/her. He/she may send the bill back to the Parliament for reconsideration. For instance, President Zail Singh returned the Postal Amendment Bill for reconsideration. This will reopen almost the whole process and to the President for the second time. At this stage the President shall not withhold his/her assent. After receiving the assent of the President, the bill becomes an Act and is placed on the Statute Book. 7.8

Legislative Process: Money Bill There is a special procedure in respect of financial business. A money bill is introduced in the Lok Sabha. Since it can be introduced with a prior recommendation of the President, it is always a Government Bill. Article 110 defines a Money Bill as one dealing with the imposition, abolition, remission or alteration of any tax or regulation or borrowing of money by the Government or the payment of money into or their withdrawals from the Consolidated or the Contingency Fund of India, or declaring a new item to be charge on the Consolidated Fund of India and the like. It is also given that in the event of any controversy as to whether a bill introduced in the Parliament is a money bill or not, the Speaker shall decide and his/her ruling shall be final. A money bill, like any bill, must be passed by both the houses of the Parliament.

The Rajya Sabha must pass it within 14 days. In case it returns the bill with some recommendations, the Lok Sabha may accept them, or not. The bill shall not be referred to the Rajya Sabha again. The President has no power to veto such a bill. The budget or Annual Financial Statement of the Government is presented in two parts. On some date in the last week of February, the Railway Minister presents his/her budget. But on the last day of this month the Finance Minister presents his/her general budget. He/she also delivers a long speech highlighting the salient points of his/her budget. After a gap of few days the Business Advisory Committee specifies a time of about 4 days for a general discussion of the Budget. The members have the occasion to speak in favour or against the provisions of the budget. It is followed by voting on the demands for grants. The budget has two sides namely revenues and appropriations. Thus, the budget is converted into two bills namely the Finance Bill and the Appropriation Bill. The Finance Bill incorporates all the financial proposals of the government for the ensuing year. Discussion on this bill covers matters relating to general administration. It must be passed by the Parliament and assented to by the President within a period of 75 days. The expenditure side of the budget is covered by the Appropriation Bill. It incorporates all the demands for grants voted by the Lok Sabha along with expenditures charged on the NSOU ? CC-PS-02 102 Consolidated Fund. Discussion on this bill affords another chance to the members of the parties in Opposition to criticize the administration in general. The Government sees to it that both the bills are passed by the Lok Sabha. The Rajya Sabha is given a chance to discuss the budget and pass the bills within 14 days. It may return the two bills with some recommendations which may or may not be appreciated by the Lok Sabha. Since both the bills are Money Bills, these receives the assent of the President. A pertinent question at this stage is to what would happen in case the budget is not passed by the Parliament before the commencement of the next financial year, or what would happen in case the government feels the need for more money to be raised and appropriated on certain unforeseen conditions as those of war and national calamity. Art 116 has a special provision for a vote on account. It empowers the Lok Sabha to sanction any grant in advance for a part of any financial year pending the completion of the budgetary process. Normally it is taken for two months and it should be roughly equal to 1/6

This period may be enhanced to 3 or 4 months in the case of special urgency. 7.9 Committee System One of the most crucial innovations to streamline the working of the Parliament in an increasingly complex political and administrative system is the Committee System of the Parliament. Most of the countries have adopted a welfare state system which resulted in an enhanced legal responsibility of the Parliament. So the legal responsibilities of the Parliament increases greatly. Keeping in mind the amount of legislation that takes place in a Parliament in modern times, a detailed discussion of the matter is not possible in the house. Further, the sessions in the Parliament is of short duration. What even makes things more difficult is the highly complexities of the law making procedure in India. It demands expertise knowledge over the issue. It would be wrong to expect such expertise knowledge on all matters from the general members of the Parliament. To overcome these limitations the significance of the committee system cannot be denied in a democratic state system. The importance of the committee system is manifold. For our convenience they can be discussed in the following manner :- 1. The Parliament can save its precious time through the committee system and it can ensure required consideration by the committee over different issues.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 103 2. Flawless, effective and high quality legislation is possible on part of the Parliament only due to the existence of the committee system. This is so since committees are usually composed by a selected few members of the Parliament who can ensure a detailed and a long drawn discussion. Generally it is Parliament through the Committee system that can assure a detailed discussion on all major issues which reduces the possibility of errors. 3. The members of the Committee are generally the experts of their chosen areas and they may discuss the matter in a committee room where they have more time to speak and also in most of the cases they are not bound by the party whips. 4. Parliament through their committees may control the activities of the executive. 5. The committees also help the Parliament to regulate the income and expenditure of the government. 6. The committees enable the Parliament to feel the pulse of the public on proposals of legislation that are introduced for its consideration. It affords a platform to the common people to participate in the decision making of the Parliament by giving written memoranda or oral depositions, as may be required, to the committees as and when asked for. 7. They also help to realize better and more constructive cooperation from the oppositions for various measures initiated by the government. To sum up one can say that they make parliamentary work smooth, efficient and expeditious. In India, the history of the committee system may be traced back to 1854, when the first legislature was established in the form of a Legislative Council which in turn appointed its own committees to consider what should be its standing orders. In post-independence period, Lok Sabha consisting of more than 500 members made situation being essential for the creation of Parliamentary Committees as well. Indian Parliament is composed of two houses namely Lok Sabha and Rajya Sabha. Several committees exist in both the houses. For the sake of convenience, all the committees may be placed into two categories namely Standing Committee and Ad hoc committees. Standing Committees Standing Committees are the committees elected by the house or nominated by the NSOU ? CC-PS-02 104 presiding officer each year or from time to time and they are in permanent in nature. These are– i) Financial Committees like Estimate Committee, Public Accounts Committee, Committee on Public Undertaking. ii) House Committees like Business Advisory Committee, Committee on the Absence of members from the sittings of the house, Rules Committee, Committee on Private members Bills and Resolutions. iii) Enquiry Committee as Committee on petitions, Privileges Committee. iv) Scrutiny Committee like

Committee on Government Assurances, Committee on Subordinate Legislation, Committee on papers laid on the Table of the house, Committee on

v) Service Committee like

MP's. Adhoc Committees Adhoc Committees are those committees that are constituted by the house or its presiding officer to consider and report on specific matters and which go after doing that job. A select committee or a Joint Parliamentary Committee or a Joint Committee on Offices of Profit may be referred here. The strength of the members of the committee varies. The Public Accounts Committee and the Committee on Public Undertakings consist of 22 members each and the Committees on Welfare of Scheduled Castes and Tribes have 30 members each. Generally there are 10 members in each of the Standing Committees in the Rajya Sabha. The members of the committee are elected by the house. They may also be nominated by the Presiding Officer. In case a bill is referred to a Select Committee, it invariably includes the minister concerned, if, it is a Government bill or the mover in case it is a private member's bill and the minister concerned may be included in it. In the case of a Joint Committee of the Parliament the members are appointed on a motion nominated by one house and agreed to by the other house. In the meetings of the committees the quorum is one third of the total strength of political parties in the house. As a result of this the ruling party has a safe position in the committees on account of being in majority in the house itself. In most of the committees

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 105 the ministers are not included unless so necessary. The whips are issued very sparingly. The backbenchers have a chance to play a noticeable role in the committees. On 29 th March, 1993, the Lok Sabha took a very important decision when it unanimously adopted a motion to set up a number of standing committees for examining grants and reports of all departments in order to ensure better and more effective parliamentary control over the functioning of the executive. Though the proposals had been hanging for the last 20 years, it could be cleared now when the rules committee of the house gave to it a final shape and the members accepted the view of the then Speaker, Mr. Shivraj Patil that this system should be given a chance for two reasons: first, it would mean better control of the Parliament over the working of all departments of the Government and second, it would reduce the burden of the business of Parliament. This motion was adopted by the Rajya Sabha as well. Accordingly, 17 Standing Committees each consisting of 30 members of the Lok Sabha and 15 of the Rajya Sabha were set up. Apart from demands for grants, these committees shall examine bills of a technical nature, annual reports and long term policies. Political parties shall have representation on these committees in proportion to their strength in the two houses of the Parliament. The concerned committees shall discuss the grants during the break period ie, when houses are adjourned and submit their reports within the time given to them. In respect of the bills the committees shall consider general principles and clauses of the bills referred to them and then make a report on them. The committees shall consider only such bills introduced in either house of Parliament and give their reports within the allotted time. Their reports shall be based on broad consensus and the member shall have the right to give his/her note of dissent. They may avail of expert opinion or seek public reactions before making their report. No committee shall consider a matter relating to the field of other committees. The noteworthy feature is that the members of the Council of Ministers shall not be included in these committees. Committee system exists as delegated legislation has become an absolute necessity in a modern state. Infact the utility of these committees is borne out by the fact that today most of the serious business of the Parliament is transacted through these committees. This has resulted in an innumerable increase in the numbers of committees. Delegated legislation has become an inescapable necessity in modern welfare state, as the Parliament has neither enough time nor unlimited ingenuity to make laws complete in all respects so as to require nothing by way of amplification or supplementation effected by the rule implementing organ

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 106 to the operation of its law. If delegation of legislative power to the executive department by the Parliament is unavoidable under the present conditions of Public administration, it is also required that the Parliament must keep control over the executive. For this purpose, the Lok Sabha set up its committee in subordinate legislation. The procedure of the committee on the subordinate legislation is governed by the instructions and directions issued by the Speaker from time to time. It is required that all rules and regulations made by the executive departments be laid on the table of the house within a period of 15 days after their publication in the Gazette in case the Lok Sabha is in session. Otherwise they are to be laid on the table of the house as soon as possible but in any case within 15 days of the commencement of the next session. A preliminary scrutiny is conducted by the Lok Sabha Secretariat which examines all the legislative notifications issued by the government. After preliminary examination, the Secretariat sends its comments to the departments concerned for the latter's explanation. It may however, seek the opinion of the experts on any point in case it does not feel satisfied with departmental action. Now let us examine the role played by some of the important committees in our Parliament. For the sake of convenience let us discuss them in the following manner :-

The Business Advisory Committee This committee is constituted at the commencement of the house with a view mainly to regulate the time table of the work of the house and has fifteen members. The Speaker is its Chairman. The Committee on Private Members Bills and Resolution This again is a committee of fifteen whose main function is to examine all private members bills from different points of view before recommending them to be placed before the house for its consideration. Select Committees on Bills The occasion for the appointment of a Select Committee on any bill arises as and when a motion that the bill be referred to a Select Committee is made. Members of a Select Committee are appointed by the house. A Select Committee may hear expert evidence and representatives of special interests affected by the measure before them, and submit its report to the house.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 107 The Committee on Petitions This committee is nominated by the Speaker at the commencement of the house and it too, has strength of 15 members. The financial business of Parliament is so complex that Parliament is unable to devote to it, the time and energy required for discharging satisfactorily its responsibilities for financial control. Hence, two committees have been set up to enable Parliament to discharge its functions in this connection more efficiently namely—The Estimate Committee and the Public Accounts Committee. The Estimates Committee The scrutiny of the expenditure proposed by the Government is made by the house in the informal atmosphere of a committee known as the Committee on Estimates or the Estimates Committee. After the annual financial statement is presented before the House of the People, this committee is annually constituted. It is in charge with the detailed examination of the budget estimates. Therefore, it has a powerful position to influence the activities of the Government not only in the financial field but also in other fields. There are four specific functions allotted to this committee. They are :- a)

To report what economies, improvements in organization, efficiency or administrative reform, consistent with the policy underlying the estimates may be effected. b) To suggest alternative policies in order to bring about efficiency and economy in administration. c) To examine whether the money is well laid out within the limits of the policy implied in the estimates, and d) To suggest the form in which the estimates shall be presented to the Parliament.

The committee has 30 members who are elected in accordance with the system of proportional representation from among the members of the Lok Sabha for a period of one year. One special feature of the work of the committee, is that, its work is not over with the final passage of the budget even though it is mainly concerned with the estimates. It goes on working all the year round selecting to its own choice, any department or agency of the Government for the purpose of its scrutiny.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 108 The Public Accounts Committee This committee is the twin sister of the Estimate Committee. If the latter is concerned with the examination of estimates, then the former is concerned with the manner and results of spending public funds. The Public Accounts Committee is not new to India. As early as 1923, a Public Accounts Committee was set up by the Central Legislative Assembly. So, consequently today, the Committee has behind it a set of well established traditions. The Committee consists of 22 members of whom 7 are from Rajya Sabha. The members are elected by a system of proportional representation. No minister can be a member of the committee. The term of office of the members is not to exceed one year. The function of the committee is the examination of accounts of the Government in all its financial transactions. In this respect, it is its duty to scrutinise

The committee should satisfy itself the following :- a) That the money shown in the accounts having been disbursed, were legally available for and applicable to the service or purpose to which they have been applied or charged.

is the guardian of the public purse and it is his/her function to see that not a paisa is spent without the authority of the Parliament. It is the business of the CAG to audit the accounts of the Union and to satisfy himself/herself that the expenditure incurred has been sanctioned by the Parliament and that, it has taken

The Committee of Privileges The Speaker nominates this committee at the commencement of the house and it consists of 15 members. It is concerned with the examination of questions of privilege and the determination of any breach of privilege in the case which are referred to it. The Committee on Subordinate Legislation The main function of this Committee is to scrutinise and report to the house whether the powers to make regulations, rules, sub-rules, bye rules etc. conferred by the Constitution or delegated by the Parliament are being properly exercised within the limits of such delegation. The Committee on Government Assurances to consider matters of procedure and conduct of business in the house and to recommend any amendments or additions to these rules that may be deemed necessary. The Committee is nominated by the Speaker and has 15 members. The Speaker is its ex officio Chairman. The Committee on Public Undertakings In November 1963, the Lok Sabha adopted a motion to set up a Committee on Public Undertakings consisting of 10 members of the Lok Sabha and 5 of the Rajya Sabha. The committee will examine the following :- a) The reports and the

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 110 A critical evaluation A critical study of the working of the Committee on Subordinate Legislation shows that it has done much useful service to the cause of parliamentary control over executive legislation in the country. By 1971, it has been rightly observed by scholars that the committee has done a formidable task during the first four Lok Sabha and earned appreciation as a vigorous and independent body. Yet, it cannot be denied that it has failed in some other respects. The members of the committees are ranked politicians who are much more concerned with the world of politics in which they remain involved all the time and for this reason they have very little time to perform their duties. Moreover, most of them are not legal experts and as such cannot understand the legal and technical aspects of the problems. 7.10 Conclusion Despite such criticisms, it cannot be denied that the committees have undoubtedly been an effective instrument in controlling the executive despotism. Infact the people, the press and also the Parliament have all their vigilant eyes on the executive and the rules framed by it. Infact the establishment of the Committee System has been taken as a sort of innovation in the parliamentary system of the country as a result of which a greater degree of transparency and accountability have been ensured in the functioning of the executive agencies. 7.11 Summing Up ? The significance of the Parliament consists in its multifunctional role. ? Of all the additional functions, that a Parliament takes up as a result of the complexities of modern Government, law making still remain its most important activity. ? The Parliament is also required to make laws within a definite constitutional framework. Law making in every country has to be done by a process prescribed under the Constitution of the country. ? Legislative proposals are brought before in either house in the form of a bill. A bill is the draft of a legislative proposal, which when

passed by both houses of Parliament and assented to by the President,

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 111 ? One of the most crucial innovations to streamline the working of the Parliament in an increasingly complex political and administrative system is the committee system of the Parliament. ? Indian Parliament is composed of two houses namely Lok Sabha and Rajya Sabha. Several committees exist in both the houses. For the sake of convenience all the committees may be placed into two categories namely Standing Committee and Ad hoc committees. 7.12 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1. Discuss the different legislative procedures practised in the Indian Parliament. 2. Evaluate the role of the Committees in Indian Parliament. Long Questions : 1. How many types of bills are there in the Indian Parliament? Explain how a bill is passed in the Parliament? 2. Examine the provisions of motions and resolutions in the Indian Parliament. Short Questions : 1. Write a short note on Question Hour. 2. Explain in brief, the role of the Estimates Committee. 7.13 Further Reading 1.

of the President shall be by secret ballot and in accordance with the system of proportional representation with single transferable vote.

It means that the voter shall be given a ballot paper having the names and party symbols of the candidates on the left side with blank columns on the right that he/she has to fill up by showing his/her preferences. The voter shall place the figures of 1,2,3 and so on in the blank columns to show his/her order of preferences after the polling is over, counting shall take place. First of all, invalid paper shall be rejected and electoral quota shall be taken out by means of this formula : Electoral Quota = Total number of valid votes polled ----- + 1 + 1 = 2 ÷

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 117 Then counting will begin. In case a candidate secures vote's upto the figure of electoral quota in the first round, he/she shall be declared elected. Otherwise, subsequent rounds shall be made to declare the results. A candidate having least number of votes shall be eliminated and his/her votes shall be transferred to other candidates according to second preferences. Thus, the votes of other candidates will be enhanced. The process will continue until the result is available. A historical study of the Presidential polls tells us that not first, second and third, but the fourth and fifth elections assumed unprecedented significance. The fourth election of 1967 and, shortly after that, the fifth one of 1969 made a history of their own in view of the dwindling position of the Congress Party heading towards an inevitable split. The fourth Presidential election witnessed a meaningful political contest between a united Congress and a more or less united Opposition. It looked like a straight fight between Dr. Zakir Hussain as the nominee of the Congress party and K. Subba Rao as a chosen leader of the opposition parties, excluding the leftist element. But a more significant episode took place in the fifth Presidential poll of 1969. It marked an unprecedented contest between a divided Congress and a dis- united opposition each thriving on the bickering of the other. The result was that no candidate could win in the first round and the victory of the unofficial Congress nominee (Mr.V.V.Giri) at the expense of the official candidate (Mr.N.Sanjiva Reddy) occurred owing to the process of elimination.

8.5 Evaluation of the method of election of the President A critical examination of the system of the Presidential election in India shows that there are certain serious loopholes in it though some of them have been removed in course of time :

1. The expression of Article 55(3) providing for proportional representation system is incorrect in the sense that there can be no proportion unless there are at least two seats. That is, the system of proportional representation cannot apply to a single member constituency. Prof. M.P.Sharma was the first critic to point out in 1950 that the nomenclature of proportional representation is incorrect. According to him, the question of proportion can arise only when there are at least two things to compare. Infact in his book entitled The Government of the Indian Republic, he argued in favour of preferential or alternative vote system.

The Constitution is not clear as to what shall happen if the Electoral College is in a lame-duck situation. The XI Constitution Amendment Act was rushed through in 1961 to provide that the election of the President shall not be invalid if there were some vacancies in the Electoral College. However, it does not lay down whether the election will take place if any state is under President's rule. It must also be noted that a new device of half state emergency was invented in 1966 to keep the Legislative Assembly of Punjab under suspended animation. The question arises as to what shall happen if there is no Legislative Assembly in a state. This controversy arose in 1974 owing to President's rule in Gujrat. The matter was referred by the President to the Supreme Court for its advisory opinion. The Court advised in favour of the Government desiring election without a State Assembly.

The present system of Presidential election hardly provides any chance for the election of a non political personality.

The prospects of victory are there for one supported by the party having its overwhelming majority in the Electoral College, or for one backed by a combination of parties, big and small, that somehow manage to come together for the purposes of having a friend of their own in the Rastrapati Bhawan.

4. The procedure of Presidential election is highly complex and is beyond the understanding of the ordinary citizens. If a political party ceases to have unanimous and absolute majority in both the houses of the Parliament and if, in such a situation many candidates of different political parties express their desires to contest for Presidential election then, there is no doubt that such a procedure of Presidential election is bound to be even more complicated.
5. Dr. K.V.Rao in his book entitled Parliamentary Democracy of India has mentioned the voting system of the President as highly unscientific. According to him, this system of election is more or less like a knock out tournament since in the method of proportional representation the first preference is given a greater value compared to the second one.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 119 On the question of Presidential election opinion in the Constituent Assembly was at first divided. There were those who advocated the adoption of the Presidential system of government prevalent in the United States of America and advocated in favour of the direct election. But they formed only a small minority and the overwhelming majority was decisively in favour of an indirect election. Several reasons were cited in this regard by the members. They are : 1. India has adopted a parliamentary system of government. The President is a mere titular head in such a system. If the President is directly elected then there might arise a possibility of conflict between the President and the Prime Minister. It is not desirable for the President to get involved into a conflict with the Prime Minister and Council of Ministers. 2. The role of the President in India is mere constitutional. It was also desired by some other members that, as the manner of direct election would amount to a colossal waste of time, energy and money and also would lead to immense political difficulties, the President should be elected by the member of the Parliament. 3. Incase of direct election of the President for two or more candidates there is a possibility of electing the one who has the support of the majority. As such what was finally accepted was the Nehru –Ambedkar formula of indirect election of the President by an enlarged electoral college consisting of

SA

14 Amir Ullah PLB 352 SLM CDOE AMU.docx (D144112225)

system. This formula, as stressed by Nehru and Ambedkar, had the support of three essential reasons- vast size of our electorate, strain on the administrative machinery and nominal position of the head of the State in our parliamentary form of the government. In this way, the principle of the indirect election of the President had its happy coincidence with the framework of our federal system implying division of powers between the Centre and the States with the President being a chosen nominee of both. Thus, it has been remarked that the method adopted for the election of our President "is an original contribution to constitutional practice."

As the Constitution says nothing regarding the number of terms that a person may avail of, it is clear that the President is eligible for any number of elections. The President may also resign before the expiration of his/her term of office for any reason. It is provided that his/ her resignation should be addressed to the Vice-President who is required to communicate it to the Speaker of the Lok Sabha. A voluntary resignation of the President may presumably be in any of the following four cases : 1. He/she may resign due to the reason of continued ill-health. 2. There may be a voluntary abdication in a case where the President may not be in harmony with the Council of Ministers and would prefer to quit rather than create a constitutional crisis. The resignation in such a situation may also be due to a directive from the high command of the party in order to avoid the likely conflict. 3. The resignation of the President may also be to avoid removal by impeachment when such proceedings seem to be in progress. The resignation of the President may also be a threat against the ministry or the majority party on some vital issue which might reveal something damaging to the ministers who can thus, be coerced to reconsider their stand, reconsider their differences, if possible, or offer themselves to resign. Infact a vacancy of

The President shall have a right to appear and to be represented at such investigation. If, as a result of the investigation, a resolution is passed by not less than 2/3 of the total membership of the house before which the charge has been preferred declaring that the charge has been sustained, such resolution shall have the effect of removing the President from his/her office with effect from the date on which such resolution is passed [Art 61]. Since the Constitution provides the mode and ground for removing the President, he/she cannot be removed otherwise than by impeachment, in accordance with the terms of Arts. 56 and 61. A critical examination of the procedure for the impeachment of the President shows that it is full of loopholes and inconsistencies which may be enumerated as under :

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 122 1. The phrase 'violation of the Constitution is delightfully vague. It is not clear as to what it includes and what it excludes. One may, and one may not agree with the view of Dr. Ambedkar that President's refusal to summon the Parliament, for example, on the advice of the Prime Minister constitutes a violation of the Constitution. Prof. B.M.Sharma feels, that any act of the President without or against the wishes of the Council of Ministers would amount to a violation of the Constitution. 2. The members of the state legislatures have been deprived of any part in this process in spite of the fact that they have their full part in the election of the President. There ought to have been some provision for the ratificatory role of the state legislative assemblies. 3. The provision of at least 1/4 members at the time of the initiation of the move in either house of the Parliament and of 2/3 majority of the whole house at the time of the adoption of the resolution include all the members of the house whether elected or nominated. One may ask, as to why the nominated members of the house have been given the right to take part in th impeachment proceedings when they have no such rights in matters of Presidential election. 4. The provision that the other house of the Parliament shall investigate the charge is understandable but it is not clear whether the house will do the tedious job itself or appoint some judicial commission for the said purpose. 5. It is not clear, as to what time the investigating house will give to the President for making his/her defence, since the term 'short notice' does not give any idea of specific time period and personal equation with the President and are more likely to influence the outcome. 6. As the President has the power to summon and prorogue the Parliament and dissolve the Lok Sabha, he/she might use these powers thereby delaying the process of impeachment. 7. The Constitution makes no mention of the disqualifications that a person shall incur after his/her removal from the office of the President. 8. Above all, the requirement of the 2/3 majority of the house makes the whole affair highly tedious that goes to the benefit of the President.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 123 8.7 Powers and Functions India is a democratic republic. As such, it has a democratically elected Government. the Constitution, the executive power of the Union vested in the President who is empowered to exercise it either directly or through officers subordinate to him/

her. Owing to the manifold expansion of the functions of the State, all residuary functions have practically passed into the heads of the executive. Viewed in this perspective, it appears that the President is the highest authority of the land in matters of executive as well as legislative powers. For the sake of convenience, the normal powers and functions of the President can be classified into five categories namely- Executive, Legislative, Financial, Judicial and others. Let us discuss them in the following manner :- Executive Powers :

The President is the chief executive of the Indian administration. The supreme executive authority of the Union is vested in him/her that he/she can exercise it either directly or through officers subordinate to him/her. The executive power may be enumerated in the following manner :- 1. The entire administration of the Union Government is conducted in the name of the President and all important decisions of the Government of India are formally taken by him/her. He/she makes rules of business whereby the work of the Government is conducted. He/she also allocates works among the Ministers. 2. for the consideration of the Council of Ministers in order to have the decision of the

Besides he/she has the power to appoint the Chairman and members of several commissions and statutory bodies like the Election Commission, Finance Commission, Official Language Commission and so on. He/she may also entrust the administration of a neighbouring union territory to the Governor of a state who will act according to the instructions of the President and not according to the Council of Ministers of his/her State. 5. By virtue of being the head of the State, the President maintains the foreign relations. All diplomatic business is conducted in the name of the President. All treaties and international agreements are negotiated in his/her name, though they cannot be effected unless ratified by the Parliament subsequently. 6. The President

The President has the power of making rules and regulations governing matters like the Joint Session of the Parliament, appointment of the officers of the Supreme Court, administrative power of the Comptroller and Auditor General and so on. Similarly the prior approval of the President is necessary for certain administrative actions or decisions of other authorities as those of the Supreme Court governing its procedure, determination of the forms of accounts by the Comptroller and Auditor General and Union Public Service Commission or Joint Public Service Commission serving the needs of some of the States. NSOU ? CC-PS-02 125 8. Finally, the President can issue directives to the State Governments whereby their administration should be carried on. In this direction, he/she has the power of exercising superintendence and control over the administration of the States. He/she can issue instructions which the State Governments must follow to ensure due compliance with the Union Laws and unimpeded operation of the union administration. In case a State Government fails to carry out the instructions or directions of the President, he/she may invoke Article 356 to take over its administration in his/her own hands. Legislative Powers : Like the British Monarch the President is the integral part of the Parliament. Our Constitutional arrangement like that of its English counterpart should be described in this connection, as the President in Parliament. The legislative powers of the President should be taken as a supplementary part of his/her formal powers vested in him/her as the Head of the State. The legislative powers of the President can be enumerated in the following manner : 1.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 129 provision of fundamental rights, or of the jurisdiction of the Election Commission and the Supreme Court. His/her prerogative of mercy covers the state of Jammu and Kashmir as well. 8.8 Emergency Powers The executive of Indian administration is assigned with certain special powers to meet the critical situation. This is required since normal powers do not help to face the abnormal or emergency situation. That is why, in most of the states at the time of emergency the chief of the executive is granted with certain additional special powers. This is more required in case of a federal system of administration since in a federation the power is decentralized. With decentralized power structure, it is not possible to overcome the emergent conditions. As such its definition and its nature cannot be determined. K.V. Rao in his book entitled, Parliamentary Democracy in India has stated that emergency situation creates such a dangerous situation that immediate action becomes inevitable. Such a situation as arisen is sudden and unexpected. The Government of India Act of 1935 has also mentioned about the system of rules related with the emergent situation. Article 102 of this Act grants the power to proclaim the emergency to the Governor General of our country. The administrative legacy of the colonial period finds its reflection in the Constitution of India as well. That is why, the President of India is granted with three kinds of emergency powers. The abnormal functions and powers of the President are contained in Part XVIII of the Constitution titled, 'Emergency Provisions'. The Constitution stipulates three kinds of emergencies namely the National Emergency caused by war, external aggression or armed rebellion, in the country (Art 352); State Emergency caused by the breakdown of constitutional machinery in a state (Art356) and Financial Emergency when the financial stability or the credit of India or any part thereof is in danger (Art 360). Let us discuss these three emergency powers of the President in the following manner :- National Emergency : Article 352 empowers the President to declare National Emergency whenever he/ she is satisfied that a serious situation has arisen, or is most likely to arise,

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 130 threatening

SA BPASE - 31 Indian Constitution.doc (D144112532)

the security of the country by war, external aggression or armed rebellion in the country. The satisfaction of the President, for all practical purposes, depends upon the advice of the Council of Ministers. It is, however, subject to the control of the Parliament. Such a Proclamation shall be laid before the Parliament and unless approved by it shall cease to have its effect. Such a proclamation can remain in force for a period of one month at the most, or its extension must be approved by the Parliament. The Constitution, further, provides that in case the Lok Sabha stands dissolved, the power of giving any approval shall be exercised by the Rajya Sabha. If the Rajya Sabha passes it, it must still be approved by the house within thirty days after the meeting of the new Lok Sabha. If the Rajya Sabha itself has not approved the proclamation, it will cease to be valid. It must also be noted that the power of the President to declare an Emergency may be made use of even before the actual occurrence of the aggression or disturbance, if the President is satisfied that there is imminent danger. The 44 th Constitutional Amendment Act of 1978 has made some important changes. Apart from substituting the phrase 'internal disturbance' by 'armed rebellion' and reducing the period of 'two months' by 'one month' at the most whereby the declaration of the President may remain imposed without the approval of the Parliament, it makes the following important arrangements :- 1. Such a proclamation can be made by the President on the written advice of the Union Cabinet. 2. The approval of the Parliament shall require adoption of the resolution in each house by a majority of the members, present and voting. 3. A specific time limit has now been set. It says that the extension of duration in one instance cannot be for a period of more than six months. However, no maximum time-limit has been specified. 4. It is also given that at least one tenth members of Lok Sabha may place a requisition of a special session at any time to reconsider the continuity of the proclamation. Such a notice shall be addressed to the Speaker (in case the house is in session) or to the President ( namely Executive ii) Legislative iii) Financial and iv) As to Fundamental Rights. For our convenience, we will discuss them in the following manner :- (i) Executive : When a proclamation of emergency has been made, the executive power of the Union shall, during the operation of the proclamation extends to the giving of directions to any state as to the manner in which the executive power thereof is to be exercised [

Art 353(a)].

In normal times, the Union Executive has the power to give directions to a state, which includes only the matters specified in Arts. 256-257. But under a proclamation of emergency, though the State Government will not be suspended, it will be under the complete control of the Union Executive, and the administration of the country insofar as the proclamation goes, will function as under a unitary system with local sub-divisions. (ii) Legislative : (a) While for a period not exceeding one year at a time and not extending in any case beyond the period of six months after the period of proclamation has ceased to operate. (b) During the operation of Proclamation of Emergency, Parliament shall have the power to legislate as regards State List as well [Art 250(1)] though the Proclamation will not suspend the State Legislature; it will suspend in order to carry out the laws made by the Union Parliament under its extended jurisdiction as outlined above, Parliament shall also have the power to make laws, in respect of any matter, even though such matter normally belonged to state's jurisdiction [Art 353(b)]. (iii) Financial : During the operation of the proclamation of Emergency the President shall have the constitutional power to modify the provisions of the Constitution relating to the allocation of financial resource relation between NSOU ? CC-PS-02 132 the Union and the States, by his/her own order. But no such order

SA

INDIAN POLITY book.docx (D57972790)

shall have effect beyond the financial year in which the proclamation itself ceases to operate, and further such order of the President shall be subject to approval by the Parliament [Art 354]. (iv) As regards Fundamental Rights : Articles 358-359 lay down the effects of a proclamation of emergency upon fundamental rights. With a proclamation of National Emergency Article 358 comes into operation automatically to suspend Art 19. Again the suspension of enforcement under Article 359 shall relate only to those fundamental rights which are specified in the President's order, excepting Articles 20 and 21. The President shall be entitled to suspend fundamental freedoms enshrined in Article 19 and their enforcement given in Arts 32 and 226 of the Constitution. He/she shall also be entitled for suspending the enforcement of any of the fundamental rights except those of life and personal liberty given in Articles 20 and 21. It is, however, required that such an order of the President shall be placed for the approval of the Parliament, as soon as possible. It does leave some option for the President to make reasonable delay in placing his/her order for the suspension of enforcement of fundamental rights before the Parliament for its approval. National Emergency has been declared in our country three times so far. For the first time, emergency was declared on 26 October 1962 after China attacked the Indian borders in the north-east. This national emergency lasted till 10 January 1968. For the second time, it was declared on 3 December 1971 in the wake of the second India-Pakistan war, and was lifted on 21 March 1977. While the second emergency on the basis of external aggression was in operation, third national emergency (called internal emergency) was imposed on 25 June 1975. This emergency was declared on the ground of internal disturbance.

Both the second and third proclamations were revoked in March, 1977.

State Emergency The provision of State Emergency is contained in Art 356 of the Constitution that empowers the President to take over the administration of any state in the event of the breakdown of the constitutional machinery there. Either on the report of the Governor of the state concerned or on the basis of his/her own satisfaction, that NSOU ? CC-PS-02 133 virtually implies the satisfaction of the Union Cabinet, the President may invoke this article of the Constitution.

The proclamation under Art. 356, shall remain in force for a period of two months at the most, unless the period of extension is approved by the Parliament. In regard to the duration of this type of emergency, the constitution provides that a resolution to this effect must be passed by each house in with simple majority. Incase the Lok Sabha stands dissolved the Rajya Sabha may pass a resolution to this effect. However, the duration so extended by the Rajya Sabha shall continue for thirty days at the most. The 44 th Amendment Act has once again restored the original position of six months. It means that a resolution of the Parliament can extend the duration of state emergency for a period of six months in one instance which may be further extended for the same length of time. However, the total period of state emergency cannot go beyond three years. It should carefully be noted here that phrase 'breakdown of the constitutional machinery in the states' as described by M.C.Setalvad, is of 'widest import'. It may mean anything from the actual disintegration of the state administration to the struggle for preventing the option from parties forming an alternative government. In June, 1977 it was invoked by the Janata Government to sack nine Congress Government on the plea that the Lok Sabha election results of March, 1977 had demonstrated loss of people's faith in Congress rule. The Congress (I) Government under Mrs. Gandhi took almost a similar stand some three years after. The scrutiny of the political development, in this direction, leaves this important impression that the rulers of the centre has largely may use of this important reserve power in the interest of their party politics. While factional rivalry between the two congress leaders like Gopi Chand Bhargava and Bhim Sen Sachar was enough to call for the invocation of the Art.356 in Punjab for the first time in 1951, smooth transfer of the assets and liabilities between the state of Punjab and the newly created state of Haryana warranted the imposition of state emergency in 1966. The extraordinary arrangement of half state emergency was withdrawn after the state of Haryana found its place in the political map of India. We find that the Centre has made use of this reserve power sometimes to remove a political deadlock and sometimes to maintain he status quo in its own favour, while at other times to frustrate the efforts of other parties to have the opportunity of making an alternative government. This constitutional provision has been said to be explained by the ruling party at the Centre according NSOU ? CC-PS-02 134 to its political expediency. That is why, a good number of states have come under the President's rule on several occasions. Again, one peculiar development that has taken place in this regard is the imposition of, what may be termed, 'half emergency'. It depends upon the will of the President to dissolve or suspend the State Legislative Assembly. In case the Assembly is dissolved, there is full state emergency and the way is cleared for the next general election, in case there is half emergency, it means that the Assembly is placed under 'suspended animation' and it depends upon the President to revive it or to destroy it. That is, half emergency may be converted into full emergency or non emergency. The effects of the imposition of emergency under Art 356 may be given below : 1. The President shall assume all functions of the State Government and conduct its administration through the Governor or administrator who may, or may not, be assisted with some advisors. 2. As the state legislature shall be out of work on account of being dissolved or kept in a state of suspended animation, the Parliament shall have the power to make laws or pass budget for that state. It should be noted here that the law made by the Parliament for such a state during this period shall remain in force unless withdrawn by it earlier, but cease to operate beyond a period of six months at the most after the revocation of the emergency. A State law already in force shall be treated as 'suspended' during the period of emergency to the extent it is repugnant to the law made by the Parliament. 3. In case

the Lok Sabha is not in session, the President may issue an order authorizing the expenditure out of the Consolidated Fund of that State subject to the eventual sanction of the Parliament. 4. The President may make any necessary or incidental or consequential changes in the provisions of the Constitution relating to the state authority so as to give desirable effect to the objects of the proclamation. The President either on his/her own initiative or on the resolution of the Parliament may confer powers or impose duties upon the Union, its officers and authorities. 5.

This type of emergency does not entitle the President to curtail or take away the powers of the High Court.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 135 Emergency under Article 356 was first imposed in 1951 in the state of Punjab. In 1959, Kerala was put under the President's Rule. There have been many cases of proclamation of state emergencies over the years like in Orissa in 1961, Haryana in 1967, U.P. in 1970, Tamil Nadu in 1976, nine states in India in 1977, Pondicherry in 1978 and so on. In fact emergency under Art 356 has been imposed in various states for one reason or the other for more than hundred times. However, after 1995 the use of this provision has rarely been made.

to issue directions for the reduction of salaries and allowances of all or any class of persons serving in connection with the affairs of the Union including the Judges of the Supreme Court and the High Court [

Art 360 (3) and (4)]. The language of Art 360 is delightfully vague. It is not clear whether proclamation of such an emergency shall apply to the whole of the country or to some of its part or parts. It may also be pointed out that while other types of emergencies shall be declared in the event of some factual situation, it might be invoked in the event of the opinion of

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 136 most formidable part of this provision finds place in its psychological impact. Instead of dealing with a situation of emergency, it might lead to the emergence of a situation of greater emergency. Finance is a very delicate matter and any declaration of emergency in this regard would create such a panic as any bring about a condition of economic instability. Till date the financial emergency has never been proclaimed in India. 8.9 Critical Appraisal of Powers The enormous powers of the President during the times of three kinds of emergencies have been studied by the critics with a sense of lurking apprehensions. These have been labelled as 'undemocratic' 'unfederal' and inherent with the possibilities of any amount of mischief. 1. It is pointed out that these provisions confer sweeping power on the President who may transform himself/herself from the role of a guardian to a power drunk ruler. Here, is discovered a very dangerous opening for the creation of an absolute State with unlimited sovereignty. 2. The emergency provisions are incompatible with the doctrine of federalism. The way Art. 356 has been invoked in the past bears a clear testimony to the fact that the ruling party at the centre has broken the tips of the State Governments in the hands of other parties and played havoc with the phrase 'breakdown of the constitutional machinery'. In fact on the unscrupulous use and deliberate misuse of Art 356, Prof. Rao comments that, no doubt, our constitution contains many unfederal features, but this Article "may be called the crown of all". 3. A deeper study of the provision of the State Emergency leads to the examination of many serious loopholes. If the people are the makers of the Government, they are capable enough to be also its unmakers, or the judges, or the controllers of its activities. Whenever there is a political crisis in a state, the people must look towards the centre to come to their rescue, or, they must create problems for the centre so that the imposition of the President's rule becomes unavoidable. The issue then becomes like a tussle between the centre and the people of the state.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 137 4. What is a matter of grave concern is that the duration of national and financial emergencies can be extended for any length of time and the government may not like to revoke it even when normal times may be said to prevail. 8.10 Position of the President In view of the powers of the President we need to analyse the position that he/ she occupies in the political system. The Indian Constitution has hardly any detailed explanation with regard to the real nature of the Indian Presidency. As such it has given rise to serious debates and controversy amongst the scholars on the Indian Constitution. An overall assessment however, suggests that in different aspects the President has been assigned with greater powers by the Constitution of India. Judged from a theoretical perspective this cannot be denied. Despite such enormous powers assigned to the President by the Constitution, yet like Pylee, we too fear whether these powers are at all to be exercised by him/her or not. On the answer to this question will depend the real position of the President in the governmental system established by the Constitution rather than what may appear from a literal reading of the Constitutional provisions. It is here, that we have to turn to the nature as well as the working of the Government of India. Infact to a great extent the position of the President depends on the nature of relationship which he/she shares with the Council of Ministers more particularly with that of the Prime Minister. To view the actual position of the Indian President it is essential for us to review the political system of the country. Along with it, is equally essentially to examine the vision or the objective which the framers had in their mind in creating the post of the President. In a Parliamentary form of government, the tenure of office of the virtual executive is dependent on the will of the Legislature while in a Presidential government the tenure of office of the executive is independent of the will of the Legislature. Thus, in the Presidential form, the model for which is the United States- the President is the real head of the executive who is elected by the people for a fixed term.

He/she is independent of the Legislature as regards his/her tenure and is not responsible to the Legislature for his/her acts. On the other hand, in the parliamentary system represented by England, the head of the executive i.e. the Crown is a mere NSOU ? CC-PS-02 138 titular head and the virtual executive power is wielded by the Cabinet, a body formed of the elected members of the legislature and is responsible to the popular house of the legislature for their office and actions. Being a Republic, India could not have a hereditary monarch. So an elected President is at the head of the executive power in India. The tenure of his/her office is for a fixed term of years as of the American President. But on the other hand, he/ she is more akin to the English king than the American President insofar as he/she has no 'functions' to discharge on his/her own authority. While the Cabinet of the American President is responsible to himself/herself and not to the Congress, the Council of Ministers of our President shall be responsible to the Parliament. The reason why, the framers of the Constitution discarded the American model after providing for the election of the President of the Republic by an electoral college lies in the fact, that in combining stability with responsibility, they gave more importance to the latter and preferred the system of 'daily assessment of responsibility' to the theory of 'periodic assessment' upon which the American system is founded. Under the American system, conflicts are bound to occur between the Executive, Legislature and Judiciary. What was wanted by the framers of the Constitution was that India on her attaining freedom after one and half century of bondage was a smooth form of government which would be conducive to the manifold development of the country without the least friction. Thus, parliamentary system was better suited than the presidential. In due time, a serious controversy had arisen with regard to the real position of the Indian President and the relation on which he/she shares with that of the Council of Ministers. A section of constitutional experts theoretically believed that the President is the real executive. They affirm that our President is much more than the mere replica of the English Monarch, since he/she is endowed with an area of discretionary powers whereby he/she may act like an independent ruler over and above the head of the Council of Ministers and the Parliament and he/she may choose to establish what may be termed as 'constitutional dictatorship'. On the other hand, there is a second school known as the Political School who believed that the President is the mere constitutional head. Infact, they designate our President as the prototype of English Monarch and carry their argument to the extent of treating him/ her as a powerless officer, virtually a constitutional non entity. Now, let us examine NSOU ? CC-PS-02 139 the logical arguments of each school one by one. The first or the legal school advanced several arguments to show that the President may enhance his/her authority to act like real executive. Such arguments may be enumerated as under :- 1.

According to

of the Indian Constitution the executive power of the Union shall be vested on the President and shall be exercised by him/her either directly or through the Constitution. According to Article 74

there shall be a Council of Ministers headed by the Prime Minister to aid and advice the President. To many constitutional experts, the subordinate officers as mentioned in Article 53 and the Council of Ministers as mentioned in Article 74 are replica of each other. So, the Council of Ministers are the officials placed under the President and it is the President who can exert his/ her commands over them. 2. According to Article 75(1), it is the President who appoints the Prime Minister and other ministers. Not only that, but they remain in their post at the pleasure of the President. Though it is mentioned in the Constitution that the President is to act on the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers still remains an area of what may be termed as prerogative powers where the President may act independently. He/she may at times use these prerogatives in the matter of appointment and dismissal of the Prime Minister and in a very limited measure in the matter of dissolution of the Lok Sabha. 3. When the Parliament is not in session, the President may promulgate an ordinance if he/she is satisfied that circumstances exists compelling him/her to take immediate action. A Presidential Ordinance has the same force and effect as an Act of Parliament.

The President may also withdraw the Ordinance at any time he/she likes. Nowhere in the Constitution is it stated that such Ordinances has to be promulgated on the advice of the Council of Ministers thereby indicating his/her power of discretion. 4. The entire administration of the country is carried out in the name of the President.

All the decisions and directions of the union government are taken in his/her name. How the directives are to be made effective depends on the NSOU ? CC-PS-02 140 rules and regulations which are being made under his/her name. Not only that but also so far as the legal aspect of these rules are concerned, it cannot be questions in the judiciary. So according to the Constitution, these directives as issued by the President are not created by the Council of Ministers but by the higher officials in the department of the administration. 5. Indian President is entrusted with certain constitutional powers which may fall under his/her power of prerogatives. The President may proclaim an emergency. Through such proclamation, the President may convert a democratic political system into a dictatorship in which he/she himself/ herself may emerge as dictator with immense power. He/she may in such a situation establish his/her constitutional dictatorship. Again, it must at the same time be noted that the President is the supreme commander of the armed forces.

All these may make out the passage for his/her despotic rule. 6. According to 42 nd and 44 th Constitutional Amendment Act the President is bound to act on the advice of the Council of Ministers.

Such advice tendered to the President cannot be inquired in any court. Though 42 nd Amendment Act has made the advice of the Council of Ministers binding upon the President, the 44 th Amendment Act has retained the language of Art 74(1) and added another provision i.e. the provision of asking for recommendation of such advice by the President to the Council of Ministers. So, a new power added to the list of powers enjoyed by the President. 7. It has been argued that if, the President declines to act in accordance to the advice of the Council of Ministers

then it is not clearly mentioned in either he 42 nd or 44 th Amendment Act the punishment which the President may entail. Though there is a provision of impeachment for the violation of the Constitution yet the required majority for an impeachment is not always available to the Union Ministry. Again the procedure of impeachment is also inherent with serious loopholes and an ambitious President may very well make use of them for the sake of his/her defence. 8. The President may want to know regarding an important decision of a minister or Council of Ministers. In this respect, it is the responsibility of the Prime Minister to make him/her acquainted with the decision and provide NSOU ? CC-PS-02 141 necessary information in this regard. This implies that he/she is not a mere titular head. He/she may seek for information with regard to the administration of the state. 9. According to Article 53(1) the Indian President has to act in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. Besides he/she takes an oath to preserve and protect the Constitution. If at any time, the President feels that any particular decision of the Union Cabinet is likely to undermine seriously the Constitution, then the President may reject such an advice and thereby, face the consequences. 10. On several matters like dismissing the ministry, if, it loses its majority in the Parliament , enjoying his/her discretion of appointing the Prime Minister or if none of the political party exerts their majority in forming the government, or even dismissing the Prime Minister, if he/she loses his/her command over the political party, dismissing the Lok Sabha, proroguing and summoning the session of the Parliament or if there is a coalition at the Union or if there is no party demanding majority in the house – in all such cases the President has an area of discretion in which he/she may act independently of the Council of Ministers. The above arguments show that the President is not a mere constitutional head like that of the British Crown. In contrast to the above arguments, the political school forward their arguments in establishing that he/she is a mere constitutional entity. They forwarded the following arguments in their favour : 1. It is an indisputable fact that India have adopted the parliamentary form of government on the lines of British constitutional system that places our President in the position of the dignified executive of the land. The real working head of the State is not the President but the Prime Minister who along with his/her

Infact, there remained no doubt at all when Dr. B.R.Ambedkar declared that in accordance with

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 142 Article 75(3) of the Indian Constitution. So, it implies that the Council of Ministers enjoys the real powers since without granting real powers the question of responsibility does not arise. Thus,

Council of Ministers. 5. Article 74(1) state that there shall be a Council of Ministers with the Prime Minister at the head to aid and advice the President in the exercise of his/ her functions.

Though nowhere in the original Constitution, it has been stated that the President is bound to act in accordance to the advice provided to him/her by the Council of Ministers headed by the Prime Minister but the 42 nd Amendment Act of the Constitution (1976)

SA THESIS FINAL.pdf (D16635872)

modified this provision to the effect that in the exercise of his/her functions, the President shall act in accordance with such advice. The 44 th Amendment Act however, added further to Article 74(1) according to which the President may, if require, ask

the Council of Ministers to reconsider such advice either generally or NSOU ? CC-PS-02 143 otherwise and the President shall act in accordance with the advice tendered after such recommendation. No court of law has the power to enquiry as to whether any advice was given by the Ministers and if so, what it was. So acceptance by the President of the advice tendered by the Council of Ministers has become obligatory, particularly, after the 42 nd and 44 th Constitutional Amendment. 6. It has been argued that the President is not directly elected by the people. So he/she cannot demand to be representative of the people. On the other hand, the Council of Ministers is constituted by the real representatives of the people. As such on the basis of people's representation, it is Council of Ministers and not the President who wield the real powers. The President has been made a formal or constitutional head of the executive and the real executive powers are vested in the Ministers or the Cabinet. 7. Again to say, that the President may go to the last extent of using his/her military powers to repudiate the control of the Cabinet and the Parliament is altogether implausible in view of his/her authority being very much tied by the Acts of the Parliament and other elaborate arrangements like those of the National Defence Committee. It is on record that President Radhakrishnan felt bewildered when he/she heard the news about the march of our armed forces into the Lahore sector in 1965. Thus, much could happen at the behest of the Prime Minister that he/she communicated to the President afterwards. 8. According to the Constitution, the decision with regard to the policy formulation and its execution is required to be intimated to the President. The President may even seek for information with regard to administration of the country. It is the responsibility of the Prime Minister to convey the decision over the policy formulation and execution to the President. The President may simply be acquainted with the decision. He/she cannot request the Prime Minister or give any advice to him. The decision are however, taken by the Council of Ministers headed by the Prime Minister thereby, making explicitly clear that the Prime Minister is the real executive while the President being the nominal head. NSOU ? CC-PS-02 144 9. Finally, the Supreme Court through its judgements in various cases however, has asserted that the role of the President in Indian administration is mere constitutional. For instance, in several famous cases like Ram Jawaya vs. State of Punjab in 1955, Samsher Singh vs. State of Punjab in 1974, the Supreme Court gave its judgement that India has the same system of parliamentary executive as in England. So, the role of the President like the British Crown will be mere constitutional. 8.11 Conclusion After examining the two sides of the controversy, to conclude we may say that while the Constitution places the President in the category of the English Monarch, much depends upon the personal equation of the holder of the office and the role he/ she plays in the moments of exceptional crises. The President is the head of the State. He/she is the guardian of the Constitution. But he/she is neither a real executive like the American President, nor he/she is a mere figurehead of no worth like the President of France under the Third and Fourth Republics. If the nature of Presidency is judged from a judicial perspective then the President may appear as a mere political non entity or just like a rubber stamp. But again, if we unfurl the pages of history and examine the role of different Presidents of India, then no wonder the tenure of Dr. Rajendra Prasad earmarked a difference. The way he/she acted in visiting the Somnath temple and then attending the funeral ceremony of Sardar Patel or visiting foreign countries like the Soviet Union or even showing resentment towards Nehru's China's policy when Tibet was raped and so on indicated his/her sensitivity in exercising his/her powers thereby converting the post from a mere non entity to a one with independent authority. Again, the inherent power of the great office could be noticed when the philosopher President Dr. Radhakrishnan occupied the post of a President against a weak Prime Minister Mrs. Indira Gandhi as she was then. If it is absurd to call the Indian President a rubber stamp, it is equally untenable to regard him/her as quiescent volcano. What is really expected and desired is mutual harmony and cooperation between the President and his/her Ministers. In fact

The framers of our Constitution intended that though formally all executive powers were vested in the President, he/she should act as the constitutional head of the Executive like the English Crown, acting on the advice of Ministers responsible to the popular house of the legislature.

In England, the Prime Minister is the keystone of Cabinet arch. Infact the position of the Prime Minister has been described by Lord Morley as primus inter pares i.e., 'first among equals'. In theory, all Ministers or members of the Cabinet have an equal position, all being advisors of the Crown, and all being responsible to Parliament in the same manner. However, just like in England, in India too, the Prime Minister has a pre eminence, by convention and usage. Art 74(1) of the Constitution expressly states that the Prime Minister shall be at the head of the Council of Ministers.

Almost all the powers enjoyed by the British Prime Minister through the conventions are in as much in general applicable to the Indian Prime Minister as well. The power of advising the President as regards the appointment of the other Ministers is, thus, embodied in Article 75(1). As to the function of acting as the channel of communication between the President and the Council of Ministers, Art.78 provides—it shall be the duty of the Prime Minister to communicate to the President all decisions of the affairs of the Union and proposals for legislation.

The written provisions of our Constitution in this regard are extremely sketchy. They do not cover the area of entire authority that the Prime Minister has to exercise. Moreover, like in England, the Indian Prime Minister is expected to play the role of the efficient executive in view of the paramount fact that the President constitutes the dignified part of the Union Executive. It should also be borne in mind that there are four important factors that either circumscribe the authority of the Prime Minister or force him/her to push back the barriers in order to play the role of a great national leader. These are written constitution, federal system, judicial review and multi-party system. The functions of the Prime Minister, thus, should be examined in the light of several limitations hedged around his/her office and the ability and the courage with which he/she discharges them for the ultimate good of the people without violating the provisions of the Constitution.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 149 Even then, over the years, the way the Prime Ministers have acted have surely pointed to the direction that the Office of the Prime Minister is significant as well as commands great respect and authority in relation to his/her Cabinet, Council of Ministers, Parliament as well as the President of India. 9.3 Selection and Appointment The Prime Minister is selected by the party commanding clear majority in the Lok Sabha and appointed by the President. Normally selection by the party comes first and appointment by the President afterwards. What really matters is not the action of the President in issuing invitation to form the government but the role of the party commanding absolute majority in the Lok Sabha that has to deal with the crucial issue of choosing its nominee. In such a situation, the President is expected to act very cautiously. He/she should either invite the leader of the majority party in case he/she is sure that the party has no other possible contestant. He/she must wait till the decision of the party in clear majority is available to him/her in case he/she finds that the battle for selection is impending. As an instance, it is worth to note that President S. Radhakrishnan appointed Gulzarilal Nanda as the officiating Prime Minister after the death of Nehru in response to the recommendations of the Emergency Committee of the cabinet. A new practice started henceforth, that in case of sudden vacancy, the senior most member of the cabinet shall have the chance to act as the officiating Prime Minister until the decision of the majority party is available. A fundamental change, in this direction, occurred in March 1977, when the acting President (B.D. Jatti) appointed Morarji Desai as the fourth Prime Minister of India. The election results registered thumping victory for the Janata Party (a combination of four parties namely, Bharatiya Lok Dal, Congress O, Bharatiya Jana Sangh and Socialists and also in alliance with the CFD, CPM, Akali Dal and the DMK). Infact, the problem of appointing the Prime Minister found its manifestation in the political development of July, 1979 when Morarji Desai, instead of facing the no-confidence motion tabled against his/her ministry by the then leader of the Opposition, Mr. Y. B. Chavan of the Congress (S) resigned. A section of the erstwhile Janata Party formed the Janata (S) and thus, under the leadership of Charan Singh staked its claim. The President gave the first opportunity to the leader of the NSOU ? CC-PS-02 150 Opposition. Since, Chavan regretted his/her inability, the claims of the Janata leader (Desai) and of the Janata (S) (Charan Singh) were carefully studied. Both leaders submitted lists of their supporters. Since the side of Charan Singh became heavier the chance of forming an alternative government was given to him by the President with a word of advice that he would seek the confidence of the Lok Sabha at the earliest possible date. However, this government failed to secure the vote of confidence. It fell after 24 days, when the Congress (I) decided not to support the confidence motion tabled by the Prime Minister. Once again, the war of succession ensued. The newly elected leader of the Janata Party (Jagjivan Ram) staked his claim without agreeing to submit a list of his supporters. The President thought mid-term poll as the only way out to solve the tangled issue. So, we see the President, for the first time, exercised his/her discretion and then won the applause of the people for taking the best possible action under the obtaining circumstances. On 31 st October 1984, President Zail Singh took a different step by appointing Rajib Gandhi within hours of Mrs. Gandhi's assassination on the advice of some very senior Cabinet Ministers. Subsequently, his name was approved by the CPP. Undoubtedly, the language of Art 75 (1) is quite vague in regard to the appointment of the Prime Minister by the President. It simply says that the Prime Minister shall be appointed by the President.

It therefore, says nothing about the discretionary authority of the Head of the Stat in this regard, nor does it lay down anything about the Prime Minister's being a member of the Parliament at the time of appointment.

It is further inferable from the said illustration that the President may perhaps be in a position to exercise his/her individual judgement under abnormal conditions, that is, in case no party secures absolute majority in the Lok Sabha. In fact an examination of the whole arrangement leaves an impression that the President may appoint anyone as the Prime Minister provided (i) he/she is able to carry the majority of the members of the Lok Sabha with him/her and (ii) in the event of being the non member of the Parliament, he/she is able to get his/her seat preferably in the Lok Sabha within the period of next six months as happened in the case of P.V.Narasimha Rao. 9.4 Term of Office Generally the Prime Minister stays in his/her office for a period of five years i.e. from one General election of the Lok Sabha till the next parliamentary election. NSOU ? CC-PS-02 151 However, at the time of extraordinary or emergency situation the period may enhance and so accordingly is enhanced the tenure of the Prime Minister. Again, if Lok Sabha is dissolved by the President before normal terms of five years then that too brings an end to the tenure of the Prime Minister. In other words, the term of Prime Minister actually depends on the term of the Lok Sabha. 9.5 Powers and Functions There is no doubt that the Indian Constitution confers a position of importance upon the Prime Minister but the Constitution does not confer on the Prime Minister of India any specific powers and functions. Actually, the powers and functions of the Prime Minister can be derived from two major sources. They are firstly, some through the constitutional provisions assigned for the Council of Ministers headed by the Prime Minister and secondly, the norms and conventions of the Parliamentary democracy. To analyse the real powers and functions of the Prime Minister we need to examine the relation which the Prime Minister shares with that of the President, Council of Ministers, Parliament, Political Party to which he/she belonged and the popular masses. For our convenience, let us discuss them in the following manner :- 1. Prime Minister and the President : As a chief advisor the President. On the basis of the advice provided to the President by the Prime Minister the entire administration of the country is carried out. It is on the advice of the Prime Minister that the President makes appointment of several important posts like the Governors of the State, Comptroller and Auditor General, Attorney General, the Chairman of Election Commission and so on. Again, the decision to proclaim an emergency is also done but in effect, it has virtually turned out to be the advice of the Prime Minister. For instance, it was on the advice of Mrs. Indira Gandhi that in 1975 the controversial decision to proclaim an emergency was made.

Prime Minister and the Council of Ministers : Conventionally, the position of the Prime Minister within the Council of Ministers is usually first amongst equals but in India this is not entirely true. According to Art. 74 of the Indian Constitution ministers shall be appointed by the President on the advice of the Prime Minister. The selection of the names and the distribution of portfolios among them is a matter of exclusive concern of the Prime Minister and the appointment of the ministers by the President is just mere observance of a technical formality. In a real sense, the function of the President is to accept the lists of the ministers with their portfolios submitted to him/her by the Prime Minister. While forming the Council of Ministers the Prime Minister enjoys the prerogative of selecting his/her colleagues so that he/she can retain his/her strong position within the party and also preserving comfortable majority in the popular chamber of the Parliament. The Indian Prime Ministers, authority in this respect is also circumscribed by various considerations

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 153 like administrative, political, territorial, religious and the like. Again, there are instances when we find the Prime Minister keen to experiment in forming a Cabinet of all talents. Such had happened in India at the initial stages when Pandit Nehru included in his cabinet leading Non- Congressman like Shanmukham Chetty (a man of parochial disposition by virtue of his intimate association with the Justice Party of Madras), Dr. B. R. Ambedkar (a leader of the depressed classes and highly critical of the Congress policies towards the untouchables), Dr. S. P. Mookerjee (a man of alleged Hindu communalist disposition by virtue of his long association with the Hindu Mahasabha), and John Mathai (an advocate of free enterprise). Again some of the ministers consider and claim themselves to be specially cut out for certain jobs and the Prime Minister has to take their claims into consideration in view of his/her awareness of the political fact that their exclusion may be a source of embarrassment. Some instances are available in our country like Sardar Patel insisted and got the portfolio of Home in the interim Government. Again, T.T. Krishnamachari declined the offer of Nehru to rejoin the cabinet after the third general elections of 1962 unless he was given the portfolio of Economic Coordination. Further, sometimes even the Prime Minister may be compelled by the demands of the senior members of the Party at a particular situation while forming the Council of Ministers. Infact, Mrs. Gandhi's preparedness to take Morarji Desai as her deputy Prime Minister with the portfolio of Finance instead of Home after the Fourth General election of 1967 may be cited as the most glaring case where a powerful party leader could tighten the hands of the Prime Minister resulting in the materialization of a package deal after a lot of intense and tough political bargaining. However, the authority of the Prime Minister with regard to the selection of his/her colleagues and distribution of portfolios among them however, ought to be studied in a very careful manner. True that the hands of the Prime Minister are sometimes tightened by the factors of party politics, it does not imply that his/her colleagues may have very much to say about their political assignments at every turn of movement. Authentic evidence illustrates the point that the party stalwarts, who stake their claims are not unaware of the fact that any serious point of difference with the Prime Minister must not be taken to an unpatchable extent as their dropping out from the first selection might entail their exclusion from office not merely for that term of the Parliament but for the good of all.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 154 Now if the Prime Minister enjoys the prerogative of making his/her Council of Ministers, he/she has the complementary power, equally discretionary in character to a quite large extent, of making changes in it subject to the political considerations before him/her and the circumstances in which he/she is caught up. He/she has the undisputed right to get appointed, reshuffled or even removed his/her colleagues in the interest of his/her effective and efficient administration. He/she may keep any department under his/her control or bifurcate even trifurcate a department to be placed under the charge of a different minister. He/she may, in a direct or indirect manner, demand the resignation of his/her ministers or even advise the President to dismiss one if he/she forfeits his/her confidence. Further, there may arise a situation when a reluctant minister may have no better course than to resign in order to save the position of the Prime Minister feeling equally reluctant to allow his/her colleague to go. It happened in the case of Defence Minister Menon in Jan, 1963 when Nehru yielded to the pressure of circumstances in first demoting and then removing his blue eyed son from his government. As the cabinet is a team of very important ministers the Prime Minister carefully includes only those who are his/her best confidants. Besides, as the element of confidence is quite unstable, changes in the ministerial assignments take place from time to time. However, this is not applicable to a coalition government in the like manner. The way Morarji Desai and V.P.Singh formed Council of Ministers in two installments' is a clear testimony to this fact that the hands of the leader of a coalition government are very much tied by the tugs and pulls of the intra party politics. 3. Prime Minister and the Party : The leader of the political party having a majority in the Parliament is appointed as the Prime Minister of the country. So, the party commanding a majority in the Lok Sabha is the very basis of his/her significant position. Practically, the powers of the President and his/her party are interrelated to each other. The Prime Minister is always very careful in retaining the dignity and image of the party both within the house and also outside it. He/she plays a special role in preserving the unity and fraternity amongst the party members. The party provides the Prime Minister with the required support and so in return the party expects a responsible leadership and also expects effort to fulfill the promises it had made to the masses before the election.

SA 14 Amir Ullah PLB 352 SLM CDOE AMU.docx (D144112225)

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 155 To a great extent the fate of the party depends on his/her potential to provide able leadership. The power of the party also depends on the personality and dignity of the concern individual who occupies the office of the Prime Minister. In fact the future of the party depends on several issues, such as, how the Prime Minister carries out the administration of the country, how far he/she succeeds in fulfilling the promises made before the people, formulating and implementing policies in this regard, how far could he/she popularize the governmental programmes and so on. He/she is required to play a lead role in the General Lok Sabha election so that his/her party could manage to win majority seats and thereby, form the Government. Here, it may also be noted that the personality, dignity and popularity of the Prime Minister are used as a means for propaganda for the upcoming elections. The relationship between the Prime Minister and the Political Party remains incomplete if we do not take into account the relation which the Prime Minister shares with that of the Party President. Although the two great offices of the President of the Party and the Prime Minister seem to be essentially complimentary in theory, the case is quite different in practice. Sometimes the Party President acts as a king maker. Such an incident was evident when the Congress President Mr. Kamraj played the role of a king maker in selecting Mrs. Indira Gandhi for the candidature of the third Prime Minister. However, this trend proved a short lived affair, as the influence of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi did not take long to over- shadow the influence of the king maker. It confirmed that the influence of the Congress President will depend upon not only upon her own leadership capacities but also upon the degree to which she enjoys the confidence of the Prime Minister. Again at times the party President surrenders all his/her authority in favour of the Prime Minister thereby, playing the role of an obedient student subservient to the Prime Minister. In this respect, the role played by Congress Party President Mr. Debhanta Barua at the time, when Mrs. Gandhi was the Prime Minister of India is worth mentioning. Again, there are times when the Party President and the Prime Minister are found to be in constant confrontation with each other thereby, balancing the political power to a great extent. As an illustration one can cite the relation between Mr. Kripalani and Pt. Nehru, Nehru and Tandon, Indira Gandhi and Nijlingappa and so on. Moreover, there are occasions when the same individual occupies both the

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 156 post that is the post of the Party President and that of the Prime Minister. For instance Nehru shortly after the defeat of his candidate, Kripalani in the party elections of 1949, by all means became the centre of power in his party as well as in his government after he virtually grabbed the highest office of the party by the apparently unanimous resolve of the AICC in its meeting held in New Delhi in Oct, 1951. Mrs. Gandhi in her second phase of Prime Ministership became very influential and established her authority over both the party and the government. Again, Prime Minister Rajib Gandhi also held the post of the President in the Party. 9. Prime Minister and the Lok Sabha : By virtue of being the leader of the majority party, the Prime Minister functions as the leader of the Lok Sabha as well. In this regard two practices have developed. First, in case the Prime Minister does not belong to the Lok Sabha (as Mrs. Indira Gandhi was a member of the Rajya Sabha at the time of her first appointment in Jan. 1966). Second, it has been the practice that during the protracted absence of the Prime Minister as in the event of his/her going abroad, the minister for Parliamentary Affairs in consultation with the Prime Minister intimates to the Speaker as to who would act as the leader of the house. Thus, the office of the leader of the house has a significance of its own as the Prime Minister is privileged with a dual capacity— leader of the Parliamentary Party and of the Lok Sabha- that makes him/her the central figure in the Parliamentary business. The functions of the Prime Minister as the leader of the house is very important. He/she makes proposals for the dates of summoning and proroguing the session for the approval of the Speaker. He/she has to draw up the programme of official business to be transacted in a session of Parliament- bills, motions, discussions on various important activities of the government and the like. He/she is the member of the Business Advisory Committee that determines the allocation of time for official bills and other business on the basis of suggestions made by him/her from time to time. He/she shapes the course and content of legislation in as much as often his/her is the final voice in deciding as to what amendments will be acceptable, what private members bill will receive support of the government and whether question should be left to a free vote or a whip be issued invariably. Though it is true, that the President alone can dissolve the house, but it can happen only on the advice of the Prime

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 157 Minister. However, two important points are taken for consideration by the Prime Minister and the President before resorting to this drastic measure. These are firstly; President must accept the advice of the Prime Minister only when he/she is not a defeated leader of the Council of Ministers and that there are no prospects of forming an alternative ministry. Second, having a multi – party system, the President should be guided more by the practices of the dominions than by the English convention alone. As the leader of the house, the Prime Minister deals with the procedural matters relating to the business of the house, and advises the house in moments of some difficulty or crisis. He/she can request the Speaker to fix a date for the closed session of the house or move a resolution that a seat of such a member be declared vacant under clause (4) of Art 101 or that the proceedings of the house of a secret session be no longer treated as secret. Two important points should be noted in this direction. First, while acting as the leader of the house, the Prime Minister not merely behaves like the leader of the majority party, it is also expected that he/she should behave like the leader of the house having other parties as well. Thus, the words of the leader of the house are sometimes taken as the voice of the mouthpiece of the whole house. Second, the Prime Minister by virtue of being the leader of the house, in a way becomes the guardian of the legitimate rights of the Opposition. He/she is expected to see as to what the Opposition leaders are really striving for and how far their demands can be conceded. It is therefore, clear that the Prime Minister by virtue of holding the office of the leader of the house functions vis-à-vis three important counts namely The Speaker, the Government and the Opposition. He/she assists the Speaker in maintaining order and discipline in the house so that parliamentary business is conducted smoothly. 5. The Prime Minister and the People: The Prime Minister is the real chief of the executive in India. In this respect he/ she is recognized as the mass leader. It is his/her responsibility to realize and understand the public mind and accordingly control it in his/her favour. It is through print and electronic media that propaganda regarding the personality, dedication to truth, bravery and popularity of the Prime Minister is highlighted. Accordingly, the

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 158 image of the Prime Minister is brightened. All these campaigns create a feeling of trust and attraction towards the Prime Minister. His/her political activity, public speeches, comments over various, issues even his/her dress code, attitude creates an impression in the minds of the people. The success and popularity of the Government to a great extent depends on the role played by the Prime Minister. His ability to lead the country at critical juncture of crisis helps him/her to strengthen his/her position as the Prime Minister. Infact, it is on the popularity of the Prime Minister that the popularity of his/her Government and his/her political party depends. As such he/she is always eager to create a favourable image for his/her Government as well as for his/her political party. The Prime Minister uses the mass media to meet this end. Through television, radio and public meetings the speeches of the Prime Minister reaches the masses. The Prime Minister made the people aware over important governmental socio economic policies of the country. At the time of socio-economic or political crisis the governmental concern over the issues, effort taken at the governmental level to resolve it and employment of governmental mechanisms in this regard is intimated to the public so that they are not panic stricken and feel relieved. Practically,

SA INDIAN POLITY book.docx (D57972790)

it is the sole responsibility of the Prime Minister to communicate to the people, the governmental opinion over important national and international issues. 9.6 Position of the Prime Minister The powers and responsibility of the Prime Minister are quite wide in a parliamentary democratic system of India. In reality, it is the Prime Minister who is the leader of the people. The success and failure of the Indian Government to a great extent depends on the leadership provided by the Prime Minister. It is argued, that, over the years the powers and position of the Prime Minister has been enhanced with the centralization of bureaucracy which is placed mainly at the disposal of the Prime Minister. As such many were of the opinion in calling Indian administrative system, instead of a cabinet system as the Prime Ministerial Government. However, in this regard, it is also essential to point out that the Indian Prime Minister cannot convert himself/herself into a dictator since not only the constitutional provisions but there NSOU ? CC-PS-02 159 are certain political limitations of his/her powers and authority as well. First of all, public opinion can serve as an important check on the powers of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister cannot ignore the desires and demands of the citizens, since it is on their electoral support that the future existence to political power will depend n. Again, the interest and pressure groups of our country are also eager in carrying out the demands in their favour. Similarly, the criticisms of the governmental policies by the opposition and mass media further checks and balance the powers and authority of the Prime Minister. What are perhaps more interesting lies in the fact that since nineties, due to the formation of coalition government at the centre, the role played by the regional parties has assumed a greater significance. Infact, these regional parties has opened a new vista of an era of political bargain which further restricted the powers of the Prime Minister. 9.7 Union

By virtue of this provision, Pandit Pant, who was not a member of Parliament, was appointed Minister for the Union and, subsequently, he secured a seat in the Upper house, by election. Even Dr. Manmohan Singh, when he assumed the office of the Prime Minister in 2004 was not a member of the Lok Sabha but that of the Rajya Sabha. Thus, the convention that the Prime Minister belongs to the Lok Sabha has not always strictly been followed. Earlier the Council of Ministers shall be under a constitutional obligation to resign as soon as it loses the confidence of the popular house of the legislature. The collective responsibility is to the House of the People even though some of the ministers may be members of the Council of States. This indicates that their tenure depends upon the support of the majority members within the Lok Sabha. So, long as they could retain their majority in the Lok Sabha the term of their office is ensured and secured. 9.8 Composition and Classification At this juncture of our discussion, it is essential for us to know what exactly is meant by the term Council of Ministers. According to Prof. D. D. Basu the Council of Ministers is a composite body, consisting of different categories.

The Constitution does not classify the members of the Council of Ministers into different ranks. All this has been done informally, following the English practice.

It has now got legislative sanction, so far as the Union is concerned, in Section 2 of the Salaries and Allowances of the Ministers Act 1952. Mr. Gopalswami Ayyenger in his report presented in the year 1949, classified the Ministers into three broad categories namely (1) Cabinet Ministers, (2) Ministers of State and (3) the Deputy Ministers. NSOU ? CC-PS-02 161 The rank of different ministers is determined by the Prime Minister according to whose advice the President appoints the ministers and also allocates business amongst them. While the Council of Ministers is collectively responsible to the House of the People, Art 78 (c), enjoins the Prime Minister, when required by the President, to submit for the consideration of the Council of Ministers any matter on which a decision has been taken by a minister but which has not been considered by the council.

practice, the Council of Ministers seldom meets as a body. It is the cabinet, an inner body within the council, which shapes the policy of the Government.

ministers attend meetings of the cabinet of their own right, ministers of state are not members of the cabinet and they can attend only if, invited to attend any particular meeting. A Deputy Minister assists the Minister in Charge of a Department of Ministry and takes no part in Cabinet deliberations. Let us examine these three types in the following manner :- 1. Cabinet Ministers : The first categories of ministers are the Cabinet Ministers. They are the members of the cabinet and are in charge of important ministries. They play a major role in the formulation and implementation of governmental policies. Generally, a cabinet is composed of the Prime Minister and the experienced members of the Council of Ministers. 2. Ministers of State : The second categories of ministers are known as the Ministers of State. They are not the members of the Cabinet. However, despite being non members of the cabinet they were called upon for attending cabinet meeting in case there is a discussion with related to their concerned department at the cabinet meeting. The Minister of State can be either entrusted with independent charge of a particular department or can be placed under a cabinet minister. 3. Deputy Minister : So far as importance and position is concerned, the deputy ministers occupies the third category of ministries. They help the departmental minister in carrying out the administration of the department. They never could attend the cabinet meeting.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 162 Accordingly, as observed by Prof. Pylee a three tier ministerial hierarchy was established, with the cabinet Ministers at the top, Ministers of State in the middle and Deputy Ministers in the lowest rung of the ladder. A clear distinction was drawn between Ministers who were members of the cabinet and others. The cabinet was composed of senior most ministers who were not mere departmental chiefs but whose responsibilities transcended departmental boundaries into the entire field of administration. It was, naturally, a smaller body and the most powerful body in the Government. Thus, the growth of the cabinet as a separate body from the Council of Ministers was only a natural product of the application of the administrative theory of organization. Soon, the cabinet became not only a distinct entity, different from the Council of Ministers, but also an institution with its own detailed organization. In the process, it has also taken over functions assigned by the Constitution to the Council. For instance, the constitutional responsibility of advising the President is the Council's. But this function, today, is exercised exclusively by the cabinet. Here, it must be noted that in recent years the authority of the cabinet is well established in India. Though theoretically, the real powers and responsibility of the executive are entrusted to the Council of Ministers but in reality it is the cabinet who wields the actual power. Many describe the dominance of the cabinet as the cabinet dictatorship. Consequently, Lok Sabha controlling the Council of Ministers has been converted into a mere myth. Lok Sabha cannot control the Council of Ministers instead it is the cabinet who regulates the Parliament. So, the first line of leaders belonging to a political party having a majority in the Lok Sabha together constitutes the cabinet who established their supremacy and dominance in the executive. The strength of the Indian cabinet today, is the result of support that it receives from the party to which it belongs and the overwhelming strength of the party in Parliament. With a stable parliamentary support, the cabinet, in reality, becomes the leader of Parliament. The initiatives for all the policies and programmes of the Government are in the hands of the cabinet. Nevertheless, it must be pointed out that the Indian cabinet has been treating Parliament with greater consideration and respect than is usual elsewhere under conditions of overwhelming parliamentary majorities. This has been mainly due to two reasons. First, on some occasions, on questions of

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 163 great importance which vitally affect the nation as a whole, the cabinet itself has given over the initiative to Parliament. The best example of this is provided by the initiative taken by Parliament in settling the question of reorganization of the state of Bombay at the time of adoption of the States Reorganization Act of 1956. Secondly, members of Parliament have often evinced a willingness to forget party affiliation when questions of purity in administration are brought before it. On such occasions, the Indian Parliament has shown that it is the mirror and custodian of public opinion in the country and a true representative of the electorate. The manner in which Parliament dealt with the allegations brought before it against a State enterprise like the Life Insurance Corporations in 1957 is a classic example in point. Parliamentary pressure has also brought about perceptible changes in later years in the policies of the government towards industry, labour, taxation, defence, etc. However, despite the threefold classification of the ministers, it is the Prime Minister who has the final say with regard to the composition, reorganization, distribution of portfolios and dismissal of a minister within the council. In the Indian Constitution there is no mention of the post of Deputy Prime Minister. But in the tenure of different Prime Minister a number of cabinet Minister has been appointed as the Deputy Prime Minister. Even in the report of the Administrative Reforms Commission the post of the deputy Prime Minister was supported. While unfurling the pages of history, we find that when Nehru was the Prime Minister, Sardar Patel was appointed as the Deputy Prime Minister. Again, at the time of Indira Gandhi, Morarji Desai was appointed as the Deputy Prime Minister, when Morarji Desai became the Prime Minister of the Janata Government there were two Deputy Prime Ministers namely Mr. Charan Singh and Mr. Jagjivan Ram and so on. 9.9 Powers and Functions Today the functions of the cabinet, for all practical purposes, are identified with those assigned to the council under the Constitution. For our convenience they can be summed up in the following manner :- 1. Determination and implementation of the policies: Theoretically in a Parliamentary administrative system, it is the Parliament

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 164 which determines the policy. On the basis of such policies the cabinet takes the official decision and accordingly directs the governmental works. So, cabinet is expected to act as a functional committee of the Parliament. But the real situation is somewhat different from the theoretical position. It is the cabinet who determines the policies. Such policies are recognized and ratified in the Parliament. The cabinet ministers are usually the first rank of leaders of the Party. That too of a party having a majority in the Parliament. So the policies as determined by the cabinet have therefore, the assurance of acceptance and getting ratified in the Parliament. In other words, the policies as determined by the cabinet are therefore, final and their ratification in the Parliament is a mere routine or official function.

2. Formulation of Laws : The Parliament is empowered to formulate laws but in reality it is on the initiative of the Council of Ministers that laws are being made. The number of Private Bills by an individual member is hardly any placed before the Lok Sabha. Infact, most of the bills are Governmental and are placed before the Parliament by the Minister. Even with regard to the formulation of the bills the primary role is being played by the cabinet members. The draft of the bills is made under the direction and supervision of the union cabinet. Since the cabinet members enjoyed the support of the majority in the Lok Sabha, so they hardly face any difficulty in passing the bill into a law.

3. Administrative Responsibility : The most important role of the cabinet is in the field of administration. Though the Indian Constitution has granted the executive power to the President of the country yet it is the Council of Ministers more particularly the cabinet who carries out the administration of the country. Through the permanent government officials of the various department the concerned ministers discharges the executive functions of the Government. So, the cabinet is the real administrative authority of India. Not only that, the cabinet also plays an active role in implementing the laws passed in the Parliament.

4. Financial Responsibility : One of the primary responsibilities of the cabinet is to determine the income and expenditure of the Indian Government. At the beginning of a financial year, an annual budget is presented before the Parliament. In this respect, the primary responsibility of the budget lies with the Finance Minister. But all the major financial issues like imposition of Income Tax, allocation of funds and so on are determined by the cabinet members.

5. Ensuring coordination : The cabinet coordinates between the Executive and the Legislature in the Parliament. The role played by the cabinet in this respect is highly significant. All the cabinet ministers are in charge of one and sometimes even more than one departments. Through the officials of the department the ministers discharges their responsibilities. Such a situation demands inter departmental coordination for the smooth functioning of the Government. It is the cabinet who takes serious initiative in retaining coordination amongst the department. For example, it can be cited that the cabinet creates opportunities for consultation and discussion amongst the departments, appoint inter departmental committees and so on. Here, the role played by cabinet Secretariat particularly the role of the Cabinet Secretary deserves a special mention.

the Governors of the States, etc. but in removing these officers he/ she has to act on the advice of the Council of Ministers. 7. Powers related to Foreign States : One of the principal responsibilities of the cabinet is to determine, control and execute the foreign policies. On the basis of political ideology of the existing ruling party at the union, the foreign policy of India is formulated and thereby executed. The External Affairs Department plays a crucial role and this department occupying an important position is placed under a cabinet minister. However, the Prime minister also takes eager interest in supervising and providing leadership in the formulation of foreign policies. Infact, the executive power relating to foreign affairs is exercised by the Council of Ministers in reality. All treaties and international agreements are negotiated and concluded by the Council of Ministers in the name of the President. Declaration of war and conclusion of peace are performed by the Council of Ministers in the name of the President. 8. Power related to Emergency : Though constitutionally it is the President who is empowered to declare an emergency yet he/she does so mostly on the advice of the Council of Ministers particularly the Prime Minister. So, the decision of declaration of emergencies, whether the cabinet is the steering wheel of the ship of the State. The cabinet is in practice the Government of India. The voice of the State at a given time, to all intents and purposes, is a voice of the cabinet. That is why S.L. Sikri in his Indian Government and Politics wrote that the cabinet is the core of the Indian Constitutional system. It is also the most powerful organ of the Union Government. Its functions are numerous and as varied as the functions performed by a country's Government.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 167 9.10 Conclusion Despite several limitations, the Prime Minister need not always be constrained and guided by the political situation of a time. Infact, much depends on the personal equation of the holder of the office of the supreme ruler along with the nature of the prevailing political situation. In case, the Prime Minister has been able to establish his/her legitimacy independently of his/her constitutional and institutional power structure he/she would be in a safe position to exercise more powers than a person whose support structure is coterminous with the legal and constitutional boundaries of the political system. Keeping in view the position of Mrs. Indira Gandhi, one may observe that, in case the Prime Minister succeeds in earning legitimacy from the people and establishes a sort of direct rapport with them then she would enjoy a comfortable situation of less constraints over her authority. 9.11 Summing Up ? Bicameralism implies that there are two houses or chambers in the NSOU ? CC-PS-02 171 Parliament namely Lok Sabha and the Rajya Sabha. As the Constitution established a federal system of government, there was almost unanimity among the framers for achieving a balance between the direct representation of the people and the representation of units as such, by setting up two houses, one representing the people as a whole and the other the federated units. Infact the Parliament of India consists of the President and the two houses. The lower house is called the House of the People while the upper house is called The Council of States.

Lok Sabha while the upper house is well known as the Rajya Sabha.

The names of the houses fairly reflect the character of their composition. The House of the People is composed of directly elected representatives on the basis of adult franchise and territorial constituencies. The Council of States is composed mainly of representatives of the states elected by the State Assemblies.

The President is an integral part of the Parliamentary Government. Although the President is not a member of the Legislature, his/her participation in the legislative process is ensured by making him/her a part of the Parliament. The fact that he/she is the chief executive authority and

also makes it necessary that he/she should become an integral part of the Legislature. Now before discussing the composition and functions of both the houses it is essential for us to know what prompted India to adopt a Parliamentary model over the Presidential one? The often repeated argument of the previous experience of the Indians in running the governmental system based on Parliamentary model, no wonder, is one of the reason but it is not the only factor behind its adoption. The adoption of the Parliamentary system of governance by the Constituent Assembly was more in keeping with the advantages expected to accrue from the institution of the Parliament in future than the familiarity of Indians with the functioning of representative bodies in the country in the past. First, as Austin pointed out, the framers sought to achieve the objective of unity in the country through the mechanism of popular government by uniting Indians into one mass electorate having universal adult suffrage and by providing for the direct representation of the voters in genuinely popular assemblies, the culmination of which are to be found in the Parliament.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 172 Second, the parliamentary system appeared to be the thing that could have accommodated all sorts of imperatives bothering the Constitution makers on the eve of Independence, quite evidently, along with the democratic system of governance, the federal nature of polity with the supremacy of the Constitution responsible for the successful functioning of other institution, independent judiciary—all these would not have been possible without the adoption of the parliamentary model. As against it, going in for a Presidential model for the sake of a strong executive to ensure the unity and integrity, if the nation may also have the dangers of the President turning into a despot as happened in many other newly independent countries including her neighbours. Finally, the institution of Parliament was probably the only operational guarantee which the framers could think of, to ensure the harmonious coexistence of the centre as well as the states under the overall rubric of the Union of India. Infact, the well thought out mechanism of ensuring the sanctity of federal nature of the polity and formulating the broad guidelines regulating the relations between the centre and the states was obtained in the form of the Parliament. The Rajya Sabha is the indirectly elected upper chamber. The upper house created with the aim of assuring a superior quality of debates and discussions. Structurally the Rajya Sabha is made a smaller house in comparison with the Lok Sabha. The Constituent Assembly was though unanimous about the usefulness and necessity of the Council of States as an integral part of the general scheme of the Union Government, there was however, divergence of opinion with respect to its composition, maximum membership and functions. Several suggestions were made in connection with the composition of the house. Some wanted equality of status among the states in the matter of representation while other denounced it a undemocratic and outmoded. Some were bitterly opposed to nomination of members while others wanted functional representation. While indirect election was opposed by some, election by the method of proportional representation was welcomed by others. Despite the large number of amendments based upon these and other ideas, the provisions embodied in the Draft Constitution were passed without any substantial modification except in regard to the method of the election of members.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 173 10.3 Composition The maximum membership of the Council of States is limited to 250, just about half of the maximum membership originally fixed for the House of the People. Its composition has unique features. Out of 250 members, there shall be 12 members nominated by the President and the remaining members i.e. 238 shall be representatives of the States and the Union Territories elected by the method of indirect election.

This is in accordance with Article 80 of our Constitution. For convenience let us examine the members of the Council of States in the following manner :- 1. Nomination : The 12 nominated members shall be chosen by the President from amongst persons having special knowledge or practical experience in literature, science, art and social service. The Constitution thus, adopts the principle of nomination for giving distinguished persons a place in the upper chamber. 2. Representation of States :

The representatives of each state shall be elected by the elected members of the legislative assembly of the state in accordance with the system of proportional representation by means of the single transferable vote. 3. Representation of Union Territories : The representatives of union territories shall be chosen in such manner as Parliament may prescribe [Art 80(5)]. Under this power, Parliament has prescribed that the representatives of union territories to the Council of States shall be indirectly elected by members of an electoral college for that territory, in accordance with the system of proportional representation by means of the single transferable vote.

Here, is an attempt to combine different principles of representation in the composition of the same legislative body. The American principle of equality of states in representation which has been followed by several federal constitutions and was rejected as undemocratic. At the same time, the election of the majority of its members by the state assemblies is intended to give recognition to the federal principle. Another principle that is given recognition in the composition of the Council of States is representation of talent, experience and service. The number of nominated members is constitutionally limited to 12. Such members would be provided that in order to be elected as a member of Rajya Sabha from a state the candidate must be an ordinary resident of that state. This qualification was deleted in 2003. The election to Rajya Sabha was done by secret ballot. By the same amendment Act in 2003 it was made an open ballot. However, regarding composition of Rajya Sabha several criticisms had been advanced by scholars which for our convenience can be discussed in the following manner :- 1. It is argued that enough justice is not done in keeping parity with the name i.e. Council of States and the nature of the house. It was assumed that the upper chamber of the Parliament is likely to be composed of representatives of different states but 12 members were nominated by the President.

the members of the Rajya Sabha are elected for six years. At the end of every second year, one-third of the members are re-elected. the Representation of the People Act, 1951. The representation of the People Act 1951

SA

Issues in indian polity.docx (D115818322)

and may tilt the balance in crucial moments of division. So, Rajya Sabha in real terms may not be regarded as the Council of States. 2. The composition of the Rajya Sabha is often viewed as against the conventions and structures of a federation. The composition is not done on the basis of population or area of a state. Many are of the opinion that such composition is unjust in the sense that it places bigger states of the Indian Union in a position of greater advantage.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 175 3. M.P.Sharma interestingly opined that Rajya Sabha represents neither the people, nor the Government nor the State Legislature. It may so happen that after the second annual election of the Rajya Sabha, General Assembly election is held in a state and there may occur drastic change in electoral seats in such an assembly election. Under such circumstances, the newly elected government in the state may not be able to control the members of the Rajya Sabha. 10.4 Debate related to bicameralism in India Now why India has adopted a system of bicameralism, its advantages along with its negative aspects are some of the essential questions which are needed to be answered at the very beginning of our discussion. On the basis of Indian Administration Act of 1919 bicameralism was first introduced in India. Later the Indian Administrative Act of 1935 has also retained this system. After achieving independence Indian Parliament too followed the legacy of the British era and established a bicameral legislature. Infact, during the days of the framing of the Constitution the problems related to bicameralism has not been discussed in detail. The scholars too seem to have divergent opinions with regard to the advantages of the bicameral system. There were many who were against it. This is perhaps one of the reasons, why many were reluctant to have a second chamber called Rajya Sabha along with the Lok Sabha in India. Many were even critical of the significance or the advantages in the very existence of the second chamber in India. However, in citing the significance of the second chamber in India several arguments were forwarded by one of the members of the Drafting Committee namely Gopalaswami Ayyenger. Citing him/her the following arguments can be advanced : 1. There is a fear that in case of a single chamber legislature a law passed may be a product of a temporary emotions and excitement. But if there are two chambers in a Parliament then a bill is likely to be passed with sufficient consideration and carefulness. A bill passed in a house is placed in before the second house in which it is thoughtfully re-evaluated. This might results in evolving a more accurate and error free law. So in a way, it helps to secure the national interest of the country. Again, the existence of the Rajya Sabha NSOU ? CC-PS-02 176 as an upper chamber plays the role of regulating and to some extent controlling the popular chamber of the Parliament. In doing so, it assumes a significant position in the liberal democratic country like that of India. It is through constructive debates, contradictions discussions and evaluation of both the houses that a law is evolved in our country. Consequently, it provides a greater assurance for an evolution of welfare and well thought law of our country. 2. The second chamber is composed of indirectly elected members along with a few nominated one. So several personalities who are well experts and experienced in respective field are usually the members of the upper house. They hardly want to get involved in the electoral process and contest election. So, it is expected to have the presence of these unassociated personalities as members of the house. In doing so, their skill and expertise knowledge may be found useful in the formulation of laws. In Lok Sabha only 12 members are nominated but in Rajya Sabha the composition of the house being different gives an opportunity to reasonable people

SA

who might be willing to participate in the debate with an amount of learning and importance not really associated with the House of the People. 3. The existence of a second chamber is regarded as inevitable, if one adopts a federal system of administration. The second house is also composed of the members of the federating units. This helps to reserve the interest of the states. Infact, there is a need to retain a balance between the interest of a nation and the regional interest within a federal system of government. The national interest is well represented by the popular or the Lok Sabha of the country while the member of the Rajya Sabha represents the interest of the states. So without Rajya Sabha the regional interest would not have been represented in the Parliament. 4. If there is a Unicameral Legislature then there is a possibility of the house to turn into a dictator. But, if Parliament is composed of two houses then the possibility of turning into a dictator is probably bleak. So the existence of two houses counter check each other. This enhances the liberty of an individual. According to Lord Acton the second chamber of the Parliament provides an inevitable security to individual liberty. So, Rajya Sabha can NSOU ? CC-PS-02 177 prevent Lok Sabha from turning into a dictator and it can also ensure the liberty of the individual. If the Lok Sabha takes an initiative to pass a bill which opposes individual liberty then the Rajya Sabha may take positive initiative in preventing it. 5. The responsibilities of the state have increased to a great extent in the recent years since it has declared itself as a welfare state. As a result, the workload of the Parliament has also expanded. A bicameral legislature to a certain extent may distribute the workload into two houses. So the pressure of the lower house is also shared to a certain extent by the upper house as well. The formulations of laws on comparatively less significant issues can be vested to the Rajya Sabha by the Lok Sabha. 6. One of the limitations of a liberal democratic system is that it tends to safeguard the interests of the majority. Keeping this in mind, it may be noted that the members of the Rajya Sabha are elected by means of proportional representation. As a result the minority communities in India also get an opportunity to send their representatives in Rajya Sabha. So the interests of the minorities are not only represented but also well preserved in the Parliament. 7. The debates and discussions that are likely to take place in the Rajya Sabha are expected to be rich in content since the members are renowned in their own distinctive fields and their expertise knowledge has a great educational value and therefore, its significance cannot be denied. Infact it was argued that

Astha final.docx (D105981986)

the second chamber was expected to hold dignified debates on important issues and to delay legislation which might be the outcome of passions of the moment

until passions have subsided and calm consideration could be bestowed before the Legislature. Now, if there are arguments showing the significance of the principles of bicameralism then there are also counterarguments as well to show the limitations of the system. Let us examine them in the following manner :- 1. As rightly being pointed out by Harold Laski, that legislation is not made out of clean sky, finds it a way to the statute book. The drafts of each bill are prepared by lawyers. After a thorough and careful evaluation and discussion

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 178 the bill is passed in the popular chamber. A bill in order to become an Act has to pass through several stages. At every stage debates, discussions and exchange of opinion takes place between the Government bench and the members of opposition. The crux matter of the bill is also communicated to the masses through print and electronic media. This helps in formulating a public opinion regarding the bill. The reaction of the people and an analysis of the nature of public opinion help in taking final decision regarding the bill. That is why, it is argued by many that a fear relating law to be enacted out of sporadic emotions is baseless. Infact for a well thought formulation of law the role played by Lok Sabha is sufficient and there is hardly any need of the second chamber. 2. Many critics argue that the composition of Rajya Sabha is undemocratic. This is so since the members of the Rajya Sabha are either indirectly elected through proportional representation or they are nominated by the President of India. At the other side, the members of the Lok Sabha are elected directly by the people.

So it is a democratic body in the truest sense of the term. In such a situation the interference of the Rajya Sabha over the decisions of the Lok Sabha implies opposing the democratic conventions. A question has been raised whether it is at all desirable by an undemocratic body like that of Rajya Sabha to do so for a highly democratic institution like Lok Sabha. This is perhaps one of the major reasons that in practice Rajya Sabha hardly succeed in obstructing a decision of the Lok Sabha against its will. So viewed from this perspective its existence becomes less meaningful. 3. One of the logical argument behind the existence of the Rajya Sabha lies in the fact, that it is composed of distinguished personalities from various fields whose expertise knowledge are applied in framing up of the laws. This argument too, has been discarded by many. They argued, even if the members of the Rajya Sabha are elected by proportional representation they are in reality being done on the basis of their party affiliation. Consequently, the possibility of electing an unassociated, impartial and experienced expert is nothing but a myth. Again, the members who are nominated by the President are actually being done on the basis of advice given by the Prime Minister to the President. This again implies that an expert is a one who is

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 179 in reality nominated by the Union Government or specifically the political party in power at the Union. As such K.C.Wheare remarked that, if second chambers are to be anything more than debating societies or discussion circles, party is bound to come in. Practically, the Rajya Sabha preserves the interest of a particular class. 4. The argument that Rajya Sabha preserves the right of the state has also been challenged. The Indian Constitution is a written one and is partially flexible. The distinction of powers between the centre and the states has been explicitly stated in the Constitution. Apart from that, the rights of the states from the clutches of the Union have also been protected in the Constitution. Further, the country also has a federal court known as the Supreme Court of India who along with other functions is also entrusted with the protection of the interests of the federating units. 5. Further, the members of the Rajya Sabha are elected indirectly by proportional representation on the basis of population of the state. This has resulted into a division among states on the basis of population. Densely populated states have a greater say as they are represented in more numbers in Rajya Sabha compared to the lowly populated states. This had adversely affected the federal structure of the country. So it is argued that the protection of interests of the smaller states is almost at a stake as even ignoring their interest and desires the bigger states can change the federal system of the country. 6. Rajya Sabha is expected to retain the interests of the minority communities. But this is also not acceptable entirely by many since minority based political parties do not always sent their representatives to the Rajya Sabha in adequate numbers. 7. Again, it is argued that the existence of Rajya Sabha does not enable the Lok Sabha to take quick decisions over an issue. Sometimes it becomes an absolute necessity on part of the Government to take swift decision which is not possible due to the mere existence of the Rajya Sabha. 8. Moreover, the expenditure incurred for maintaining the system of bicameralism is a huge one. As such expenses for the Rajya Sabha seems to be unjustified for many as they feel there is hardly any relevance of its existence. NSOU ? Powers and Functions For our convenience the powers and functions of the Rajya Sabha can be discussed under the following heads :-

Firstly,

SA

Issues in indian polity.docx (D115818322)

the Rajya Sabha has almost equal powers as compared to the powers of

Lok Sabha in non-money matters. It is provided that a non money bill may originate in either house of Parliament and that no bill can be taken as passed by the Parliament unless agreed to by both the houses. In the event of disagreement between the two houses, the President is empowered to call a joint session of the two houses in order to dissolve the deadlock.

In this way, the position of the Rajya Sabha is not weak like that of the English House of Lords that may do nothing else than to obstruct the will of the House of Commons by causing a delay of one year. However, it may be pointed out that the position of the Rajya Sabha, in this direction is not as strong as that of the American Senate. In the United States, it is provided that in the event of a conflict between the two houses of the Congress, the matter shall be resolved by the role of the conciliation committee having equaled number of representatives taken from both the houses and the decision of the committee shall be final.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 182 Different from this, in our country,

the position of the Rajya Sabha is comparatively weak due to three reasons. First, the Joint Session is to be presided over by the Speaker of the

the factor of numerical strength is likely to go in favour of

the initiative of calling a joint session or dropping the piece of controversial legislation depends upon the decision of the Council of Ministers that is collectively responsible to the Lok Sabha. Secondly, the Rajya Sabha has some executive powers. It is true to say that the Council of Ministers is collectively responsible to the Lok Sabha; it does not mean that the Rajya Sabha has no control over the Government. In fact the Rajya Sabha may exercise its control over the government by means of asking questions, tabling important motions, introducing resolutions and call attention motions and demanding half an hour discussions.

Thus, it has ample opportunities to criticize the policies and activities of the government. Thirdly, the Rajya Sabha is powerless in money matters.

A money bill can originate in the Lok Sabha alone and the Rajya Sabha has to adopt it within a period of 14 days.

In case it returns a money bill with some recommendations to the Lok Sabha, it depends upon the will of the lower house to accept them or not. Fourthly, the Rajya Sabha has some other powers where it has equal authority with the Lok Sabha. They are : 1. It has equal powers in matters of constitutional amendment where it is required that a bill must be passed by both the houses by special majority. Such a bill may originate in either house of President. It also applies to the passing of a special address to remove the Chief Justice and a Judge of a Supreme Court or High Courts or some High Officers like Comptroller and Auditor General of India. 3. A proclamation of emergency made by the President must be approved by both the houses of the Parliament.

In cases the government makes a proposal to take away an appointment from the purview of the UPSC both the Rajya Sabha in matters like setting up Martial Law Courts during National Emergency

SA Issues in indian polity.docx (D115818322)

the delegated legislation and the rules framed by various departments must be approved by both the houses. Finally, there are certain special powers which the Rajya Sabha exclusively enjoy and are not at all shared by the Lok Sabha. These are :- 1. The Rajya Sabha vide Article 249 may pass a resolution by its 2/3rd

It is the Rajya Sabha alone that can apply a democratic check on the exercise of the emergency powers of the President in case the Lok Sabha stands dissolved. 4. Finally, the Rajya Sabha alone can initiate proposals for removing the Vice President of India. 10.8

Relation between Lok Sabha and Rajya Sabha Discussion on the pros and cons of a bicameral system would make it much easier for us to analyse the relation between the House of the People and the Council NSOU ? CC-PS-02 184 of States. The relation between the two houses can be done from three perspectives in terms of exercising their powers in different areas. Broadly, there are three main ways through which the relation of both the houses is to be discussed. They are :- 1. Lok Sabha sharing equal powers with that of the Rajya Sabha. 2. Lok Sabha enjoying greater powers as compared to Rajya Sabha and 3. Rajya Sabha having certain special powers which Lok Sabha does not seem to enjoy. For our convenience let us discuss them in the following manner :- Lok Sabha and Rajya Sabha sharing equal powers Lok Sabha and Rajya Sabha shares equal powers with each other on the following :- a) On matters related to

Executive: The Lok Sabha exercises control over the Executive. According to the Indian Constitution the Union Council of Ministers headed by the Prime Minister shall be collectively responsible to the Lok Sabha. Infact Lok Sabha exercises exclusive power with relation to the formation of Council of Ministers, its existence and even demanding for its resignation before its normal tenure of five years. The Council of Ministers will have to resign if a vote of no confidence is passed in the Parliament. In case the Lok Sabha rejects a Government bill or a budget, or disapproves official policy, or shows its lack of confidence in the Government by making alterations in the policies and programmes of the Government against its wishes, it shall amount to the expression of a vote of no confidence. If a no confidence motion is passed in the Rajya Sabha, it will not have any impact upon the party forming the government and in power at the centre. Infact the Council of Ministers has every right to be fully informed of all matters connected with the government's activities which are raised on its floor. But it has no right to pass a censure motion against the Government of the day. The confidence of the Parliament means the confidence of the House of the People and the responsibility of the Executive means the responsibility to the House of the People. This principle can be justified only on the basis of the popular character of the house. How vulnerable is the position of the Rajya Sabha can be cited through an instance. In 1978, Rajya Sabha passed a proposal for forming an investigation committee against Kantibhai Desai, the son of then Prime Minister Mr. Morarji Desai. The Morarji Government ignored and rejected the proposal. So, it shows that the Rajya Sabha has the power to discuss and debate over matters of important issues but it can no way pass a vote of no confidence against it. So, the Rajya Sabha has hardly any power to control the executive of the country. Lok Sabha happens to be supreme in this domain. b) Money Bill: Rajya Sabha has no power related to money bill. As far as the financial power of the Lok Sabha is concerned

SA 16MB04IndianParliament.pdf (D22450078)

In case the Rajya Sabha returns the money bill with NSOU ? CC-PS-02 186 some recommendations of its own, it shall depend upon the will of the Lok Sabha to accept them or not. However, a money bill can in no case be referred back to the Rajya Sabha for a second time. Moreover, it is one of the powers of the Speaker to decide whether a bill is a money bill or not. It is therefore, clear that the Lok Sabha alone is powerful in the sphere of financial legislation. c) Ordinary Bill: In case of ordinary bill apparently, it seems that Rajya Sabha and Lok Sabha shares equal powers but in reality it is not so. An ordinary bill requires the approval of both the houses. It cannot be taken as passed by the Parliament unless it is so agreed to by both the houses of the Parliament. In the event of a difference of opinion between the two houses, the President is required to call a Joint Session for resolving the deadlock. A joint sitting is presided by the Speaker of the Lok Sabha. Again, the numbers of members are more in Lok Sabha than in Rajya Sabha. So naturally, even in a joint sitting the probability of retaining the decision of the Lok Sabha is therefore, much higher. However, there are certain instances of exception as well. In 1961, in a joint sitting of both the houses, one of the proposal of Rajya Sabha was included in the Dowry Prohibition Bill. But at the same time it must be noted that they are exceptions and rarely happens. d) Emergency: Lok Sabha shares with the Rajya Sabha authority in matters relating to the approval of the emergency declared by the President. But according to 44 th Constitutional Amendment Act of 1978, if, the Lok Sabha accepts the proposal relating to the dissolution of the emergency then the President is bound to abide by its decision and declared it as off. Again if 1/10 th members of Lok Sabha request to discuss on matters of emergency then the President is bound to summon a session and the Speaker is also bound to create an opportunity for its discussion. Here it must be noted, that Rajya Sabha has no powers relating to it. Domain locating Rajya Sabha enjoying more power than Lok Sabha There are certain provisions in the Constitution which confer upon the council as the sole representative of the states, powers in its own right and to the exclusion of the house. These are of considerable importance from a constitutional point of view. They are the following :- NSOU ? CC-PS-02 187 a) Under Article 249, the Council with the support of two-third of its members sitting and voting is empowered to declare that, in the national interests, Parliament should make laws with respect to a matter

SA Issues in indian polity.docx (D115818322)

SA BPASE - 31 Indian Constitution.doc (D144112532)

On the passing of such a resolution, it becomes lawful for Parliament to make laws with respect to that matter

SA BPASE - 31 Indian Constitution.doc (D144112532)

for the whole or any part of India for a period of one year. b) The second exclusive power of the Council is connected with the setting up of All India Services. The special characteristic of an All India Service is that it is common to the Union and the States. As such, the setting up of such a service affects the powers of the States. Therefore, here again, the Council is given the power to decide by a resolution supported by a two-thirds majority the question of setting up of an All India Service. Hence, any laws connected with such a service can be initiated only if, the Council passes such a Resolution. c) The Vice President by virtue of its position is the Chairman of the Rajya Sabha. He/She presides the meetings of the Rajya Sabha. The proposal relating to the removal of the Vice President can be initiated only in the Rajya Sabha and not in Lok Sabha.

For this reason, Rajya Sabha has special powers and dignity within the political system of the country. d) Along with the above mentioned constitutional provisions there is also an operational advantage of the Rajya Sabha which at critical juncture might enhance its power. The Council of States is a permanent body like the American Senate. This means it is a continuing chamber and not subject to dissolution like that of the Lok Sabha. Like the American Senators

the members of the Rajya Sabha are elected for six years. At the end of every second year, one-third of the members are re elected. This provision enables the Council to retain its political complexion in a more stable manner than the House of the People which after every election is a completely new house.

What is worth mentioning, is that, an unprecedented change takes place in the functioning of the Upper Chamber when a party has a comfortable majority in Rajya Sabha while it formed the Opposition in the Lok Sabha.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 188 Such an incident occurred in the year 1977, when the Congress had a majority in the Rajya Sabha while occupied the opposition bench in the Lok Sabha. It placed the then Janata Government in a very difficult position. The Non Congress government had the taste of its strong position when the Congress members stalled two official bills on April 11, 1977. Almost a similar situation can be traced in the recent years when the Modi Government despite its majority in the Lok Sabha finds it difficult to pass a bill in the Rajya Sabha. This creates a compelling ground on part of the Union Government to win over and maintain a fruitful relation with some of the State Government, so that, it could ensure their support in the Rajya Sabha. These provisions make the Council

It was not designated to play the humble role of an unimportant advisor, nor of an occasional check on hasty legislation. Its comparatively small and therefore, compact size, its permanent character which ensures a certain degree of stability and continuity in thought and action, and its having a large number of "elder statesmen" among its members, and its broad based representative character, all these, in course of time, should help to establish it not only as a respectable but also beneficial and influential body though not equal in power in all respects with the House of the People. In India, the Council of States in relation to the House of the People is nowhere near as powerful as the American Senate, nor is it at par with its Australian counterpart; but it is much more powerful than the Canadian Senate. It is true that the Constitution clearly recognizes the supremacy of the House of the People over the Council in certain matters but not in all. The co equal power of the Council on constitutional amendment is of great significance. It means that the Constitution cannot be amended unless the Council of States as the representatives of the States also agrees to such change. This provision alone will show the significantly important role the framers of the Constitution have assigned to the Council. Infact, what is perhaps required is the participation and collaboration of both the houses for all legislative activities. Without such collaboration practically nothing can be done in the legislative field. Infact a bicameral legislature was probably the only operational guarantee which the framers could think of, to ensure the harmonious coexistence of the centre as well as the states under the overall rubric of the Union of India.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 189 10.9 Evaluation of Rajya Sabha A critical study of the composition and working of the Rajya Sabha shows that it has neither proved itself like a mere ornamental chamber as is found in the British House of Lords nor has it been able to assert itself like a powerful upper chamber having a formidable replica in the American Senate. In fact what is interesting to learn, that it has never intended to be a pale shadow of the lower chamber. It has indeed provided occasional checks on the activities of the popular chamber of the Parliament but in doing so hardly created a deadlock situation thereby, obstructing the functioning of the government. It therefore, in a sense, has evolved itself into a house of action when situation so demands thereby, giving a unique Indian version of the institution. Let us enumerate certain points for a critical study of the Rajya Sabha in the following manner :- First, the mode of composition of this house is defective. As the name Council of States suggests it ought to have representatives from the states but it is surprising to see that it has members nominated by the President. So it is quite possible that the nominated members represent the centre and not the states and may tilt the balance in crucial moments of division. Second, the principle of distribution of seats according to the factor of population is unjust in a sense that it places bigger states of the Indian Union in a position of greater advantage. It therefore, violates the principle of uniformity that desires equal representation of the federal units irrespective of their geographical size or their demographic composition. Third, the method of indirect election by means of proportional representation with single transferable vote

and thereby, have the privilege of being a member of the Indian Parliament. Fourth, the indirect election enables even the minor parties to grab some seats in proportion to their strength in the State Legislative Assemblies. The Rajya Sabha thus, has the representatives indirectly elected by the State Vidhan Sabha's who are supposed to fight for the cause of their parties than that of the States as a whole.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 190 Fifth,

it is also possible that after the state general election the assembly may have a different party wise composition that might entail their loss of control over the representatives chosen by the previous house for a term of six years. The result is that the members of this house are the representatives of neither the state governments nor of the state legislature. Sixth, the actual working of the Rajya Sabha has failed to realize the expectations of the founding fathers who desire to give an opportunity to seasoned people more interested in participating in debates. Though we cannot deny the fact, that this house has seen several seasoned people but a matter of pity is that party politics has done a lot of damage to the high standards of this chamber. On several occasions, persons rejected in general polls but having very strong position in the party hierarchy or are close associates of the party chief has been inducted into the house without judging their abilities and efficiency so required in this regard. Finally, what is worth mentioning is that an unprecedented change takes place in the functioning of the Upper Chamber when a party has a comfortable majority in Rajya Sabha while it formed the Opposition in the Lok Sabha. Such an incident occurred in the year 1977, when the Congress had a majority in the Rajya Sabha while occupied the Opposition bench in the Lok Sabha. It placed the then Janata Government in a very difficult position. 10.10 Conclusion A thorough study of the Council of States suggests that there may be a huge gap between what the second chamber should be and what the present Council of States is. Yet, despite its weakness it cannot be denied, that it has succeeded in not letting the floor of the Council a battleground between centre and the states. Infact, what is therefore, desired that both the houses must act in close cooperation with each other as neither of the two houses by itself constitutes the Parliament. It is both the houses together that constitute

of India. 10.11 Summing Up ?

The concept of Judicial Activism and its overview. 11.2 Introduction Judicial System in India is one of the most positive and effective systems in the world. Like many other countries, the constitution of India also maintained mainly three independent organs which work in parallel and independently for protecting the rights of its citizen and making law and order system in the country. The legislative organ (The Parliament) makes laws for the country, the executive organ of the government enforces those laws, and the Judiciary act as the guardian of the constitution of India. The judiciary guarantees fairness and justice and protects the citizen from the despotism of the Government. There is no such democracy without an efficient and independent judiciary. Because judicial independence serves as a safeguard for the rights and privileged by a limited constitution and prevents executive and legislative encroachment upon those rights of the citizen. It also serves as a foundation for the rule of law and democracy. There are various levels of judiciary in India – different types of courts, each with varying powers depending on the tier and jurisdiction bestowed upon them. They form a strict hierarchy of importance, in line with the order of the courts in which they sit, with the Supreme Court of India at the top, followed by High Courts of respective states with district judges sitting in District Courts and Magistrates of Second Class and Civil Judge (Junior Division) at the bottom. Courts hear criminal and civil cases, including disputes between individuals and the government. The Indian judiciary is independent of the executive and legislative branches of government according to the Constitution.

Supreme Court The Constitution of India has established an integrated judicial system. Supreme Court at the apex of the Indian Judiciary is the highest authority to uphold the constitution of India, to protect the rights and liberties of citizens, and to uphold the values of rule of law. Hence it is known as the guardian of our Constitution. On 26 January 1950, the day India's constitution came into force, the Supreme Court of India was formed in Delhi. On January 28, 1950, the Supreme Court of India was inaugurated by the president, Babu Rajendra Prasad, Present on the occasion were Chief Justice Harilal Kania, along with Justice Fazal Ali, Patanjali Sastri, Mehr Chand Mahajan, B.K. Mukherjee and S.R. Das, Attorney General Setalvad, and Advocate Generals of different states. Also, present the first prime minister of India, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, his Cabinet colleagues, and members of the diplomatic corps. 11.4.1 Composition and appointment : The constitutional provisions related to the Supreme Court are contained in part V from articles 124 to 147.

The original Constitution of 1950 envisaged a Supreme Court with a Chief Justice and 7 puisne Judges-leaving it to Parliament to increase this number. In the early years, all the Judges of the Supreme Court sit together to hear the cases presented before them. As the work of the Court increased and arrears of cases began to accumulate, Parliament increased the number of Judges from 8 in 1950 to 11 in 1956, 14 in 1960, 18 in 1978, and 26 in 1986. As the number of Judges has increased, they sit in smaller Benches of two and three—coming together in larger Benches of 5 and more only when required to do so or to settle a difference of opinion or controversy. 11.4.2

Powers and Jurisdictions of High Court : The constitution does not attempt detailed definitions or classification of the different types of jurisdiction of the High Courts. It was presumed that the High Courts which were functioning with well-defined jurisdiction at the time of the framing of the Constitution would continue with it and maintain their position as the highest courts in the States. The Constitution, accordingly, provided that the High Courts would retain their existing jurisdiction and any future law that was to be made by the Legislatures.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 204 Besides, the original and appellate jurisdiction, the Constitution vested in the High Court's four additional powers : (1) The power to issue writs or orders for the enforcement of Fundamental Rights or any other purpose. (2) The power of superintendence over subordinate courts. (3)

The power to transfer cases to themselves pending in the subordinate courts involving interpretation of the Constitution; and (4) The power to appoint officers. A) Original Jurisdiction : The Constitution does not attempt detailed definitions and classification of the different types of the jurisdiction of the High Court as it has done in the case of the supreme court. This is mainly because most of the High Courts at the time of the framing of the constitution had been functioning with well-defined jurisdictions whereas the Supreme Court was a newly-created institution necessitating a clear definition of its power and functions.

The High Courts are primarily courts of appeal. Only in matters of admiralty, probate, matrimonial, contempt of Court, enforcement of Fundamental Rights, and cases ordered to be transferred from a lower court involving the interpretation of the Constitution their file, they have original jurisdiction. Formally, the High Court of Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras had both Original and Appellate jurisdictions. They could hear civil cases involving an amount exceeding Rs. 2000 (two thousand). They had original jurisdiction regarding criminal cases referred to as presidency magistrates. The new constitution has not withdrawn their rights. Every high Court has original jurisdiction regarding admiralty, will, divorce, marriage laws, fall outside their pale of influence. According to the Art. 225 the present Constitution has extended their original jurisdiction to revenue cases also. Besides passing the right to issue a writ of habeas corpus, High Courts have now been empowered to issue a mandamus, writ of prohibition, quo warranto, and certiorari to protect the fundamental rights of the citizen. NSOU ? CC-PS-02 205 B) Appellate Jurisdiction : The Courts, as stated earlier also, in the highest court of appeal in any State. It entertains appeals against the judgments of the subordinate courts.

If a Sessions Judge awards death sentence, an appeal lies to High Court. On the civil side, it entertains appeals involving an amount exceeding rupees five thousand.

of Superintendence and Transfer : Every High Court has a power of superintendence over all courts and tribunals throughout the territory concerning which it exercises jurisdiction, excepting military tribunals [Art. 227]. This power of superintendence is very wide in as much as it extends to all courts as well as tribunals within the State, whether such court or tribunal is subject to the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court or not.

Further, this power of superintendence would include a revisional jurisdiction to intervene in case of gross injustice or non-exercise of abuse of jurisdiction, even though no appeal or revision against the orders of such tribunal was otherwise available. However, this jurisdiction of the High Court has been taken away in respect of Administrative Tribunals set up under Article 323A, by the Administrative Tribunals Act. 1985.

If the High Court is satisfied that a case pending in a court subordinate to it involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution, it may transfer the case of itself. After the case has come to the file of the High Court, it may dispose of the whole case itself or may determine the constitutional questions involved and return the case to the court from which it has been withdrawn together with a copy of its judgment on such question and direct it to dispose of the case in conformity with such judgment.

The Constitution, thus, denies subordinate courts the right to interpret the Constitution so that there may be the maximum possible uniformity as regards constitutional decisions. It is accordingly, the duty of the subordinate courts to refer orders or writs, including writs like habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibition, quo warrantor and certiorari, or any of them, for the enforcement of any of the Fundamental Rights and for any other purpose. The Constitution by 42 nd . amendment omitted the provision "for any other purpose", but the Forty-fourth amendment has restored it. The peculiarity of this jurisdiction is that is conferred by the Constitution, it cannot be taken away or abridged by anything short of an amendment of the Constitution itself. Although the Supreme Court and the High Courts have concurrent jurisdiction in the enforcement of Fundamental Rights, the Constitution does not confer to the High Court's the special responsibility of protecting Fundamental Rights as the Supreme Court is vested with such a power. Under Article 32 the Supreme Court is made the guarantor and protector, of Fundamental Rights whereas in the case of the High Court the power to enforce Fundamental Rights as part of their general jurisdiction. The jurisdiction to issue writs under these Articles is larger in the case of High Court in as much as while the Supreme Court can issue them only where a fundamental right has been infringed, a High Court can issue them not only in such cases but also where an ordinary legal right has been infringed, provided a writ is a proper remedy in such cases, according to well-established principles. Judicial Activism : Meaning Judicial Activism means the rulings of the court based on political and personal rational and prudence of the Judges presiding over the issue. It is a legal term referring to court rulings based, in part or in full, on the political or personal factors of the Judge, rather than current or existing legislation. According to Black's Law Dictionary judicial activism is a philosophy of judicial decision-making whereby judges allow their personal views about public policy, among other factors, to guide their decisions.

The judicial activism was evolved through the process of judicial review which can be pursued from the unwritten constitution of Britain during the period of Stuart (1603-1688). In the year 1610, the power of Judicial Review was acknowledged for the first time in Britain through the activism of Justice Coke. The then Chief Justice Coke stated that if a law made by Parliament breached the principles of common law; and reason, then it could be reviewed and adjudicated as void by the judiciary. In the modern age, the concept of Judicial activism was reshaped in the US in 1947. It has been seen in India since the Emergency days. Judicial activism in NSOU ? CC-PS-02 208 India implies the authority of the Supreme Court and the high courts, but not the subordinate courts, to declare the regulations unconstitutional and void if they breach or if the legislation is incompatible with one or more of the constitutional clauses. A judiciary is an independent body that is even-handed, unbiased, and unprejudiced. It functions within the framework of the constitution, defined under the concept of the separation of powers. It interprets the supreme constitution and at times needed, supports the rule of law and the standards laid down in the constitution. The Supreme Court of India is considered the sentinel quiver and protects the fundamental and constitutional rights of the people. The Supreme Court of India in its initial years was more technocratic but slowly began to become more active through constitutional interpretation. The court became an activist through its involvement and interpretation of law and statutes but the whole transformation took years and it was a gradual process. The origins of Judicial activism can be seen in the court's premature and early assertion regarding the essence and nature of Judicial Review. India's Judicial activism can be positive as well as negative : 1. A court engaged in altering the power relations to make them more equitable is said to be positively activist and 2. A court using its ingenuity to maintain the status quo in power relations is said to be negatively activist. Judicial activism reflects the suggested patterns in the administrative namely : expansion of hearing privileges over administrative lapses, the extension of judicial control over discretionary forces, expansion of judicial review over the administration,

Constitutional interpretation. 4. Access to international statute for ensuring constitutional rights. 5. Supervisory power of the higher courts on the lower courts. 11.6.2 Some examples of Judicial Activism : After the independence, Judicial activism was almost silent for the first decade. The executive and legislative organs of the government actively dominated and intervened in the working of the judiciary. It was started in 70s when the Allahabad High Court rejected the candidature of Indira Gandhi in 1973. ? In 1979, The Supreme Court of India ruled that undertrials in Bihar had already served time for more period than they would have, had they been convicted. ? Golaknath case : The questions, in this case, were whether the amendment is a law; and whether Fundamental Rights can be amended or not. SC contended that Fundamental Rights are not amendable to the Parliamentary restriction as stated in Article 13 and that to amend the Fundamental rights a new Constituent Assembly would be required. Also stated that Article 368 gives the procedure to amend the Constitution but does not confer on Parliament the power to amend the Constitution. ? Kesavananda Bharati case : In the landmark Keshvananda Bharti case, just two years before the emergency declaration the apex court of India declared that the executive had no right to intercede and tamper with the basic tructure of the constitution. Though the exigency imposed by the then Prime Minister Indira Gandhi could not be prevented by the Judiciary, the concept of judicial activism started gaining more power from there. ? In the 2G scam, the Supreme Court cancelled 122 telecom licenses and spectrum allocated to 8 telecom companies because the process of allocation was flawed.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 210 ? The Supreme Court rolled out a blanket ban on firecrackers in the Delhi– NCR area with certain exceptions in 2018. Judicial activism is an effective tool for upholding citizens' rights and implementing constitutional principles when the executive and legislature fail to do so. Citizens have the judiciary as the last faith for protecting their rights when all other doors are closed. The Judiciary of India has also been considered as the guardian of the Indian Constitution. There are provisions in the constitution itself for the judiciary to adopt a proactive role. Article 13 read with Articles 32 and 226 of the Constitution provides the power of judicial review to the higher judiciary to declare any executive, legislative or administrative action void if it is in contravention with the Constitution. Judicial activism has also faced criticism several times. In the name of judicial activism, the judiciary often mixes personal bias and opinions with the law. Another criticism is that the theory of separation of powers between the three arms of the State goes for a toss with judicial activism. So many times, the judiciary, in the name of activism, interferes in an administrative domain, and undertakings into judicial adventurism. In many cases, no fundamental rights of any group are involved. In this context, judicial restraint is talked about. 11.7 Conclusion India, since independence, has remained firmly embedded in rule of law and democracy. In addition to devotion to the rule of law and principles of democracy, the presence of a strong and independent judiciary, free press, and the growth of a wide network of NGOs has contributed greatly to the awareness of human rights and the protection of human rights of individuals, groups, minorities, and others. Indian Constitution has given special status to the Supreme Court and High Courts. Indian higher judiciary has the power to review any legislative, executive, and administrative activities of the State. The Higher Courts in India entertain the petitions which are being filed by the public-spirited persons in the public interest. It is also true that it is all because of the judicial activism that the needy persons, members belonging to NSOU ? CC-PS-02 211 socially and educationally backward classes, victims of human trafficking or victims of a beggar, transgender, etc. have somehow been provided with adequate legal assistance in the process of the enforcement of their fundamental rights. Moreover, Article 142 of the Indian Constitution gives the Supreme Court the power to pass a suitable decree or order for doing complete justice in any pending matter. It is no exaggeration to say that the ability, wisdom, and patriotism of our future judges depends to some extent on the future of the rule of the law and parliamentary democracy in India.

11.8 Summing up ? One of the basic principles of democracy is the presence of a strong and independent judiciary. ? India has a strong independent judiciary. ? Indian Constitution has given special status to the judiciary. ? Article 142 of the Indian Constitution assigns the Supreme Court, the power to pass a suitable decree or order for doing complete justice in any pending matter. ? The judicial activism also supports needy persons, to provide adequate legal assistance.

After Independence, the Indian Parliamentary Democracy was established by the constituent assembly (1946-1950). This assembly was influenced by the various Acts of British Government ever passed to rule India from the

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 214 Regulating Act 1773 to the Government of India Act. 1935. The act of 1935 became the most influencing act for the constituent assembly as well as the Constitution of India; this was quoted by W.S. Mauris Jhons in his various research and findings. The constitution of free India comes into effect on January 26, 1950. One of the most important features of the Indian Constitution included the distribution of powers between the union and different state governments. It was considered prudent not to introduce the Unitary Government but only the Federal Government which was widely welcomed by all shades of opinion. The elements of the federation are present in the Indian Constitution, although the word 'federation' does not find a place in the whole text of the Indian Constitution. Articles 1 of

instead of a federation, though in India Federal form of Government has been adopted. The federal features which influenced the founding fathers of the Indian Constitution were mainly from American, Canadian, and Australian Federations. The framers of the Constitution were influenced by the federal principles, with exceptions and modifications of the US and Canadian constitutions. On the other hand, Indian Leaders like Jawaharlal Nehru who was a staunch supporter of liberal democracy was committed to democratic socialism and agrarian redistribution. For their policies to be successful, they believed that there should be a centralised direction for the establishment of a federal system in India. Dr. B.R. Ambedkar wrote "It will be noticed that the committee has used the term Union instead of Federation. Nothing much turns on the name, but the committee has preferred to follow the language of the Preamble to the British North America Act. 1867, and considered that there are advantages in describing India as a Union although its Constitution may be Federal in Character." 12.3 Federalism : Meaning The term federation is derived from the Latin word "Foedus" meaning 'Treaty or Agreement'. Hence it is the result of an agreement between two sets of governments, which is the Central or Federal government and State government. Historically, a federation means a union of some states brought about through the instrumentality of a treaty. Federation has come to mean a union of two or more states. In such a union there is a central government and there are state governments. Thus, there is a state authority, and NSOU ? CC-PS-02 215 the powers of the state are divided between the central and regional governments. The term 'federalism' has been used in a variety of contexts. Indeed, the extent of terminological and conceptual abuse has obscured its meaning. Like the word 'democracy, federalism stands to mean different things to different people. In principle, by federal concept is meant the idea of organization of state whereby a compromise is achieved between concurrent demands for union and territorial diversity within a society, by the establishment of a single political system, within which, general (Central) and regional (State) governments are assigned coordinate authority so that neither level of government is legally or politically subordinate to the others. 12.3.1 Definition : KC. Wheare, an authority on federalism says that "Federation is a system which consists of two sets of governments that are independent, co-ordinate, and distinct. Prof. A.V. Dicey, says : "Federation is a political contrivance intended to reconcile national unity with the maintenance of State Rights."

Dr. B.R. Ambedkar, "The partition of legislative and executive power of the centre and units is the main criteria of the federation." In 1961, M.J.C. Vile, attempted to substitute the idea of interdependence in the place of independence, and according to him, "Federalism is a system of government in which neither level of a government is wholly dependent on the other not wholly independent of the other." In 1964, W.H. Riker, pointed out that, "A constitution is federal if (i) two levels of government rule the same land and people and (ii) each level has at least one area of action in which it is autonomous, and (iii) there is some guarantee of the autonomy of each government in its own sphere." According to A.H.

Birch, "A federal system of government is one in which there is a division of powers between one general and several regional authorities, each of which, in its sphere, is coordinate with the other, and each of which acts directly on the people through its administrative agencies."

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 216 However, by 'federation', we mean, in short, a type of polity operating a constitution that works on two levels of government as a nation and as a collection of related, but self-standing units. And the main objective of a federation is to form a government for the people and by the people. 12.4 Features of Indian Federalism The Constitution of India is unique concerning its extreme detail and substance. It is the longest constitution in existence in the world totaling three hundred ninety- five articles and eight supporting schedules embraced in two hundred and seventy- two pages. Its uniqueness is attested to by its emphasis on constitutional detail, covering legislative procedure, administrative relationships between the Centre and the component states, and the inclusion of a constitution for the states with equal detail as that for the national political organism. The essential reason for this phenomenon is the basic distrust of the members of the Constituent Assembly of human beings, the communal ill-will prevailing between Muslims and Hindus, the fear of provincialism in the nation, and the need to empower the national government with sufficient strength to develop a national, industrialized economy from a backward state. The character of the Indian Constitution is in a federal form. Federalism involves the distribution of sovereignty between the national government and the constituent member states. Within each sphere, each government is supreme. The Indian Constitution itself does not characterise the form of government as federal, but rather, describes India (Bharat), as a Union of States (Article-1). However, the Drafting Committee of the Constituent Assembly referred to this when it reported the draft constitution to the Constituent Assembly stating that the committee preferred to follow the language found in the preamble of the British North America Act, 1867. The main features of the Indian Federal system are as follows : i) Division of Powers : One of the most important features in any federal system is the constitution. The constitution in a federal state constitutes the supreme law of the land. As Prof.

In a federation, the constitution should be the supreme source of strength, both for the centre as well as the federating units. Accordingly, the Indian constitution is also supreme and not the handmaid of either the centre or of the states. If for any reason, any organ of the state dares to violate any provision of the constitution, the court of law is there to ensure the Indian constitution is a written document containing 395 Articles and 12 Schedules and NSOU ? CC-PS-02 218 therefore fulfills this basic requirement of a federal government. The Indian constitution is the most elaborate in the world.

All the modern federations like the U.S.A., Australia, Switzerland, and Canada have hammered their constitutions, and they are 'written' in nature. However, it should be noted that in the U.S.A., in addition to the federal constitution, each state has its constitution. The Indian constitution demarcates the powers between the centre and the state. Dual polity and a clear written constitution are essential for the functioning of federalism. In a written constitution the central government will not encroach upon the state powers, and both have to work within their jurisdiction. The United States of America, Australia, Switzerland, Canada, and India are examples of a federal constitution. iv)

In a rigid constitution, the procedure of amendment is complicated and difficult. But this does not mean that the constitution should be legally unalterable.

The Indian constitution is partly rigid. All the provisions of the constitution concerning federal-state relations can be amended only by the joint actions of the state legislatures and the union parliament. Such provisions can be amended only if the amendment is passed by a two-thirds majority of the members present and by voting in the parliament, and is ratified by at least one-half of the states. However, in India, the constitution prescribes three different methods for amending the different provisions of the constitution. In the first category, it can be amended requires a simple majority in each house of the parliament. v) Independent Judiciary : Impartial and independent judiciary is essential for a federation. A Federal court is indispensable to a federation. It acts as the guardian NSOU ? CC-PS-02 219 of the constitution. Especially, this principle has been playing an important an key role in the working of the federal government. The judiciary has occupied a very important status in federal countries like the United States, Switzerland, Australia, Canada, and Parliament. vi) Bicameral Legislature : A bicameral system is considered essential in a federation because it is in the Upper House alone that the units can be given equal representation. The Constitution of India also provides for a bicameral legislature at the Centre consisting of the Lok Sabha and the Rajya Sabha. While the Lok Sabha consists of the elected

Nature of Indian Federal System The Indian constitution adopts the strict application of the federal principles, as a result, some of the political events would reveal that the states are not the agents or instrumentalities of the center. Despite, the strong central tendency the states have been able to assert their rights. There have been territorial disputes between Karnataka and Maharashtra; and Punjab and Haryana. Disputes, over sharing of water, took place between Karnataka and Tamil Nadu. Nagaland, Tripura, and Manipur have laid claims to each other's territory. A more stark fact supporting the existence of federalism is the spectacle of different parties in power in different states. In West Bengal and Kerala, the left front has formed the government several times. In Madhya Pradesh, Maharashtra, Uttar Pradesh, Himachal Pradesh, and Rajasthan the Bhartiya Janta Party-led governments enjoyed power. In Tamil Nadu and Andhra Pradesh, the local parties have been in the seat of government for a long time. And all this when a different party or coalition was ruling at the center. It is NSOU ? CC-PS-02 220 the success of federalism in giving effect to the aspiration of the people that there is a never-ending demand for the creation of new states. In the constitution of 1950, there were 9 Part A and 5 Part B states. As of today (after the abolition of Part B states), the total number of states is 28. Another piece of evidence is the loud clamor for obtaining more grants from the center and assertion of autonomy in matters about law and order (especially in West Bengal and Bihar). The central government has been paying more to the State government than recommended by the Finance Commissions appointed under Article 280. But at the same time, some principles of Indian federalism may be characterised as a prefectural federal system. some important constitutional provisions substantiate this idea. Under the Indian federal system, the Union is indestructible and the states are destructible. In other words, a "state's" identity can be altered or even obliterated, and 20 acts have been passed by Parliament under Articles 3 and 4 of the Constitution to bring about changes in the areas, boundaries, and names of states. Ascertaining the views of the concerned states by the President is not mandatory because he is competent to fix a time limit within which states must express their opinion. Moreover, Parliament is not bound to accept or act upon the views of the state legislature even if those views are received in time. According to Article 200 of the Constitution,

certain bills passed by state legislatures may be reserved by the governors for the consideration of the President of India. A governor's action in this regard has been held to be non-justiciable. Under Article 201, the President may give his assent to such state bills at any time, without time limit, or exercise his veto power over them. Ambedkar's argument that "the States under our Constitution are in no way dependent upon the centre for their legislative or executive authority"

is only a federal myth. Granville Austin has rightly pointed out that "in theory Articles 200 and 201 invalidate the division of powers for there is no means of overriding a President's veto in the case of State legislation." This un-federal provision has been used extensively by the Union government and thereby has undermined the legislative autonomy of the states. NSOU ? CC-PS-02 221 Through the office of the state governor, the central government can control and command the state governments. As nominees of the center, the governors act as their agents to send periodic reports to the President, dismiss unwanted state governments, and reserve state bills for the consideration of the President. Article 254(1) empowers the Union Parliament to exercise its "pre-emptive power" overstate legislation state legislature, and the state law shall, to the extent of the repugnancy, be void.

Although Clause (2) of this article grants the states permission to legislate under the Concurrent List even if some provisions of the law are repugnant to the Union law, the state is subject to two conditions : first, that the state legislature should have received presidential assent, and second,

the same matter, including a law adding to, amending, varying, or repealing the state law.

Articles 248 and 249 give further scope to the Union Parliament to establish its legislative supremacy. Under Article 248, Parliament has residual powers of legislation, and under Article 249 there is a possibility of its "big intrusion" into state legislative jurisdiction in the name of national interest based on a resolution passed by the upper chamber (Council of States). The arguments advanced by some state governments for the abrogation of Article 249 are worthy of consideration. The article short-circuits the amending process prescribed in Article 368 and enables one house to transfer unilaterally any subject from the State List to the Concurrent List. Also, the two-thirds majority in the Council of States may not necessarily reflect the consent of the majority of states through their representatives. Finally, the initial life of the law, though limited to one year, maybe extended indefinitely through successive resolutions of the upper house. Articles 256 and 257 place a mandatory duty on the states regarding the exercise of their executive power.

Article 256 states that if necessary, the central government can give directions to a state for this purpose. Article 355 empowers the central government to intervene in the affairs of states under three circumstances : external aggression, internal disturbance, and when a state government cannot be carried on by the provisions of the Constitution. The state emergency power or President's Rule provision of Article 356 empowers the Union government to use it as a bludgeon to threaten or supersede unwanted state governments. Instead of keeping it as a last resort, as visualised by the constitution-makers, to be used as a salvage operation in an ailing state, the Article has been wantonly and brazenly employed for partisan purposes on most occasions. The word "otherwise" in Article 356 gives wide scope to the center to dismiss any state government even without the governor's report. Emergency powers of the President contemplated under Articles 352, 356, and 360 can transform the federal system into a unitary system. be "both unitary as well as federal according to the requirements of time and circumstances."

said that rigidity and legalism were the two serious weaknesses of federalism. India adopted a federal structure as the different parts of the country were at different stages of development, and it would have been different to control from one center and to ensure minorities their due place. However, Indian federalism is unique because of its mode of formation, i.e., from union to states (creation of autonomous units and then combining them into a federation), and not vice versa. It is to be noted that the term "Union of States" and not "federation of states" is used in the constitution (the term "federal" or "federation" is not used anywhere in the constitution). In addition, the units have no right to secede (as in a confederation). In a classic federation, the federal government enjoys only those powers that are by an agreement surrendered to it by the units. Neither the parliament nor the state legislation is "sovereign" because each being limited by the constitutional provisions affecting the distribution of powers. The constitution enshrines the principle that despite federalism, the national interest ought to be paramount. Thus,

Conclusion The theory and practice of Indian federalism substantiate that the Union government functions under prefectural federalism that gives it a commanding NSOU ? CC-PS-02 224 position and overriding powers. The existence of states and the very survival of their elected governments is dependent upon the will of the Union government. The single Constitution for the whole country (except Jammu and Kashmir), the unilateral power of Parliament to amend it, the provision for supersession of state governments and centrally appointed state governors, the discretionary powers of governors to reserve state bills for the consideration of the President and his veto power over such bills, the prosperity of the Union government, the vertical planning system, and the centralised party system have been mainly responsible for the aberration, distortion, and perversion of Indian federalism. During the period of one-party rule (Congress dominance) from 1951 to 1967, center-state differences, if any, were resolved within the party. Jayaprakash Narayan observed : "Center-State relations were mainly a reflection of relations between the State branches of the Congress party and Central leadership. The federal structure never had a chance to operate.... If a particular state succeeded in enlarging its autonomy, it was because the local Congress leadership was in a position to browbeat the High Command..." The breakdown of Congress dominance in 1967 led to the emergence of strong regional parties and the formation of non-Congress governments in some states. Since 1967, center-state relations and state autonomy have become the cardinal issues of Indian federalism. An overcentralized federal system is incapable of dealing effectively with socioeconomic challenges and strengthening national unity. Hence, it is appropriate to restructure Indian federalism to make it more effective and promote center-state partnership. 12.7 Summing up ? One of the most important features of the Indian Constitution included the distribution of powers between the union and different state governments. ? Discuss the relation between center and State in India. 13.2 Introduction In every federal constitution, the central and state governments are firmly enclosed and the jurisdiction of the one excludes the other. Division of powers is an

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 228 important aspect of any federal political system and it is a typical feature of federalism also. The power is divided between multiple vertical levels of government like union or nation government, provincial or state government, district or local government which allows multiple access levels for citizens to approach. Federalism makes sure the independence and coordination go hand in hand between both union and state government ideally. The subject of federalism in any country covers a vast area, embracing legislative, executive, and judicial powers, as distributed between the union and its units. In India, the Union Government and different State governments are the two main parts to enjoy their power according to the constitution. There is also a provision for the allocation of the powers by the union to the states and vice versa. The forte and success of such a scheme require cooperation and coordination between Centre and States. There are different provisions to distribute those powers. 13.3 Origin of the division of powers in the Indian Constitution The division of powers, in general, follows the Government of India Act of 1935 both in form and substance. This Act having a proposal to establish an All India Federation which would comprise British India Provinces and princely States. The terms on which a state could join the federation were mentioned in the Instrument of Accession. It was at the discretion of the state whether it wanted to join the federation that was given by the Government of India Act, 1935. 6 Chief Commissioner's provinces and 11 Governor's provinces and some states who agreed to merge in the stated federation were constituent units of that federation. It had been proposed through this Act that if princely states were entitled to half of the state's seats in the upper house of the federal legislature

then the federation of India would come into existence. The part of the legislation that had not been implemented earlier was implemented after the first election under this Act was held. This legislation came into force in 1937 two years after the establishment of the Government of India Act, 1935. The approach to form the federation and implement provincial autonomy paved the way for the

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 229 division of subjects that were given by the Government of India Act, 1919 was revised and added some more subjects in it by this Act of 1935 and included

three lists. This act divided powers between the Centre/Federal and the provinces very clearly. Three lists gave the subjects under each government. These were : a) Federal List (for centre) b) Provincial List (for Provinces) and c) Concurrent list (for both governments). The Viceroy was vested with residual powers. This combined with the primacy of the federal law when federal and provincial legislation clash, gave it a quasi-federal nature. This Act centralised all the ruling power in one body, i.e., the Centre. Although the Centre possessed a lot of power, it could not interfere in the laws made on the subjects mentioned in the provincial list by the Provinces. This is because this Act gives the province the power of autonomy i.e., they can make laws on the subject matter of the provincial list and centre will not interfere in that particular law that is made. This is the power of 'provincial autonomy'. The Governor-General on behalf of Majesty utilises its power either directly or through the appointment of subordinate officer(s). But this power did not prevent the federal legislature from functioning upon subordinate authorities. This Act proposed that a Finance Bill could not be placed in the Central Legislature unless the Governor-General gives his assent or his consent. 13.4 Division of powers : Constitutional provisions After independence of India, the constitution of India came into effect on the 26 th day of January 1950. The scheme of division of powers into three lists (Federal, Provincial and Concurrent) of the Government of India Act, 1935 appears in the constitution of India. The Constitution of India has introduced its structure having a two-fold distribution of legislative powers :

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 230 a) Concerning territory and b) Concerning the subject matter. a) Territorial Jurisdiction : Article 254 (1) of the constitution says that the

As per Article 307, Parliament may by law appoint such authority as it considers appropriate for carrying out the purposes of the constitutional provisions related to the inter-state freedom of trade and commerce. Centre-State Relations during Emergency (i) During a national emergency (under Article 352), the state government becomes subordinate to the central government. All the executive functions of the state come under the control of the union government. (ii) During a state emergency (under Article 356), the president can assume to himself all or any of the functions of the Government of the State and all or any of the powers vested in or exercisable by the Governor or authority in the State other than the Legislature of the State. (iii) During the operation of financial emergency (under Article 360), the Union may give directions to any State to observe such canons of financial propriety as may be specified in the directions, and to the giving of such other directions as the President may deem necessary and adequate for the purpose. 13.5.3 Financial Relations : The Constitution deals with the centre-state financial relations in Article 268-293 of Part XII. Allocation of taxing powers. The Constitution has provided the union government and the state governments with independent sources of revenue. It allocates the powers to centre and the states in the following way : (i) The parliament has exclusive power to levy taxes on the subjects mentioned in the Union List. NSOU ? Article 268 states that duties are levied by the Union but are collected and appropriated by the States. ? Service tax levied by Union and collected and appropriated by the Union and the States (Article 268-A). ? Taxes levied and collected by the Union but assigned to the States (Article 269). ? Taxes were levied and collected by the Union but distributed between the Union and the States (Article 270). ? Surcharge on certain duties and taxes for purposes of the Union (Article 271). Under Article 275, the parliament is authorised to provide grants-in-aid to any state as parliament may determine to require assistance, and different sums may be fixed for different States. Under Article 282, the union or a state may make any grants for any public purpose, notwithstanding that the purpose is not one with respect to which Parliament or the Legislature of the State, as the case may be, may make laws. Under Article 352, during the operation of a national emergency, the distribution of revenues between the centre and the states can be altered by the president. Under Article 360, during the financial emergency, the executive authority of the Union shall give directions to any State to observe such canons of financial propriety as may be specified in the directions and to give the directions as the President may deem necessary and adequate for the purpose. NSOU ? The Indian Constitution aims to establish either collaborative or cooperative federalism. Through the division of powers between the Centre and the States, a certain autonomy is granted to the States to ensure that the administration at the grass-root level remains efficient. Simultaneously, the Centre exercises its power over the States to maintain a balance. There are several challenges in the way of maintenance of a federation but the key solution is healthy debate and discussion between the parties involved. 13.7

emergency provisions under British rule in India. ? Discuss the conditions in which the President can proclaim a national emergency under Article 352. ? Discuss the various effects of National Emergency relating to the executive, legislative, and financial matters, and fundamental Rights. ? Understand the process of approval of the parliament against the proclamation of national emergency. ? Explain the circumstances in which the President can proclaim 360. ? Discuss the effects of an emergency in the state or president's rule. ? Cite examples of national emergencies proclaimed in the country with their duration. 14.2 Introduction Almost all constitutions are intended to cope with uncertain times and events, therefore, emergency provisions are highly important. In constitutional terms, an emergency is a situation that includes 'some imminent danger to the life of the nation, requiring some immediate action' by the government to preserve the prevailing constitutional order. The concept of emergency has passed into political theory. However, the exercise of emergency powers is oftentimes curtailed by various conditions, both in theory and in practice. To guard against the accidental emergence of dictatorship as a result of war, external aggression, or internal disturbance, it is always desirable to make specific emergency provisions in the constitution. With this end in view, the Constitution of India has allotted a separate part altogether to emergency provisions. Part XVIII, therefore, is an element of modernism in our Constitution.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 248 14.3 Origin of emergency provisions under British rule in India Before the independence of India, the Colonial ruler has also introduced certain emergency provisions for the Governor-General and the Governors of Indian states for managing the affairs of the Indian Colony. In the Government of India Act. 1935, various provisions established the executive's supremacy over other branches of the government, especially through the execution of emergency provisions. The head of the executive was the Governor-General, a nominee of the British government, who had enormous powers over his dominion. emergency provisions in the 1935 Act were introduced not to preserve the constitutional order, but to provide an opportunity to the colonial rulers to declare a state of siege or to take extra-constitutional steps. Section 12(1) of the 1935 Act defines some special responsibilities of the Governor- General, including- (a) the prevention of any great menace to peace or tranquillity of India. (b) safeguarding the financial stability and credit of the Federal government. This section is the source for granting complete freedom to the Governor-General and the Governors of Indian states for proclaiming emergency and promulgating laws accordingly. The 1935 Act defined two types of emergencies : those emerging from a failure of constitutional machinery (Section-45); and those arising due to 'war or internal disturbance' (Section-102). In the case of failure of constitutional machinery, the Governor-General had vast discretionary powers to proclaim emergency at the Federal level. In contrast, the Federal Legislature was toothless and had no role to play in circumscribing the authority of the Governor-General either by ensuring that the emergency was proclaimed as the last resort or in checking the Governor General's law-making powers for the duration of the emergency. Nonetheless, the proclamation of emergency had to be approved by the British Parliament within six months of its proclamation, and this extended the period of the emergency for another year from the date of such approval. Overall, an emergency could not carry on continuously for more than three years. Thus, the Governor General's emergency powers were time-bound under the first kind of emergency.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 249 However, the laws made under the exercise of emergency powers could continue to have effect for up to two years after the emergency had expired, unless repealed or re-enacted by the Federal Legislature. Similar emergency powers vested in Governors in their respective provinces, empowering them to proclaim emergency at the provincial level (Section 93). In the second type of emergency, emerging from war or internal disturbance, the power of proclamation of emergency once again vested in the Governor-General without any checks and balances to ensure its use only in extreme circumstances. As with the first kind of emergency, the British Parliament had to approve the proclamation within six months. However, the second kind was not time-bound and was not subject to any form of legislative approval for continuance in force. Though, the law-making power with regards to provinces during the emergency was granted to the Federal Legislature. Still, the ultimate authority to repeal or approve a statute remained with the Governor-General. 14.4 Emergency provisions in the Indian Constitution The Indian Constitution is one of the few constitutions which provide some provisions for dealing with extraordinary situations. In doing so it follows the Government of India Act 1935, which embodied emergency provisions in section 45 in the case of the Centre and section 93 in the case of the Provinces. Moreover, present provisions for an emergency in India are borrowed from the Weimar Constitution of Germany. Emergency Provisions in the Constitution of India are contained in Part-18 and are embodied in 9 articles (352-360). Three types of extraordinary or crises are envisioned. First, when there is a war or external aggression has been committed or there is the threat of the same, or if internal disturbances amounting to armed rebellion take place. Second, when it becomes impossible for Constitution; and third, if the credit or financial stability of the country is threatened. In each case,

NSOU ? Also, with the amendments, it has now been mandated to present the declaration of emergency in the written form. 14.4.1 National Emergency (Article 352) Article 352 states that if the President

A proclamation of Emergency has drastic and wide-ranging effects on the political system. These consequences can be categorised into 3 groups : i) Effects on the centre-state relations : While a proclamation of Emergency is in force, the normal fabric of the Centre- State relations undergoes a basic change. this can be studied under three heads : Executive : Centre becomes entitled to give executive directions to a state on 'any' matter Legislative : The parliament becomes empowered to make laws on any subject mentioned in the state list, the president can issue ordinances on State subjects also, if the parliament is not in session. The laws made on state subjects by the parliament become inoperative six months after the emergency has ceased to be in operation. Financial : The president can modify the constitutional distribution of revenues between the centre and the states. ii) Effect on the life of the Lok Sabha and State Assembly : iii) While a proclamation of National Emergency is in operation, the life of the Lok Sabha may be extended beyond the normal term for one year at a time. However, this extension cannot continue beyond a period of six months after the emergency has ceased to operate. Similarly, the Parliament may extend the normal tenure of a state Legislative Assembly by one year each time during a national emergency, subject to a maximum period of six months after the emergency has ceased to operate.

the effect of a National Emergency on Fundamental Rights. These two provisions are explained below : 1. Suspension of Fundamental rights under Article 19 : According to Article 358, when a proclamation of National Emergency is made, the six fundamental rights under article 19 are automatically suspended. Article 19 is automatically revived after the expiry of the emergency. 2. The 44 th Amendment Act laid out that Article 19 can only be suspended when the National Emergency is laid on the grounds of war or external aggression and not in the case of armed rebellion. 3. Suspension of other Fundamental Rights : Under Article 359, the President is authorised to suspend, by order, the right to move any court for the enforcement of Fundamental Rights during a National Emergency. Thus, remedial measures are suspended and not the Fundamental Rights. 4.

This type of emergency has been proclaimed three times so far in 1962, 1971, and 1975.

All three emergencies were held between the years 1962 to 1977. The first national emergency was imposed on the country from October 26, 1962, to January 10, 1968, by then-president, Dr. Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan. It was regarding the rising external aggression during the Indo-China war. The second time, the national emergency was imposed from December 3, 1971,

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 253 to March 21, 1972. This emergency was imposed by the president, V.V. Giri. Here also, the reason was the external aggression but during the Indo-Pak war. The third time a national emergency was imposed by the President, Fakhruddin Ali Ahmed. Indira Gandhi, then-prime minister asked for permission from the president and was successful in declaring a national emergency. It lasted for nineteen months, that is from 25 June 1975 to 21 March 1977. Here, the reason was stated to be a clash between the legislature and the Judiciary. 14.4.2 Emergency in state or President's rule (Article 356) When the constitutional machinery breaks down in a state, the president's rule is imposed by centre. Financial Crisis and Financial Emergency in India : Financial Emergency has never been imposed in India to date. Though, India faced an economic crisis in 1991 and Covid-19 pandemic in 2020. The crisis of 1991, was the serious financial crisis in the history of India. The Indian economy was in a state of flux. The 1980s saw significant and increasing fiscal imbalances, which contributed to the economic crisis. The federal government's and states' combined

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 258 cumulative fiscal deficits increased dramatically. India's foreign exchange reserves had depleted to the point that it could only fund three weeks' worth of imports, because of this, the Indian rupee was devaluated sharply. The exchange rate of India was severely adjusted in mid-1991. But even in such a tough situation that took India to the brink of bankruptcy, the financial emergency was not declared. While this situation posed a classic cause for calling a financial emergency, it was averted by restructuring and devaluing the rupee. During the lockdown in March 2020, the Center for Accountability and Systemic Change (CASC) filed a writ petition in the form of Public Interest Litigation, requesting that a financial emergency be declared as a result of the Covid-19 outbreak. However, the plea was rejected because though courts have special authority, the law of separation of powers mandates that the president determine the viability of a financial emergency. The President has the authority to declare a financial emergency, the Supreme Court can only review such declaration. The petition stated that: covid-19 is the country's most serious emergency since independence, and it must be handled in accordance with constitutional laws by a joint command between the Union and state governments. It would help in the recovery of the economy after the nationwide lockdown is over. 14.5 Conclusion

Some members of the Constituent Assembly criticised the incorporation of emergency provisions in the constitution on the following grounds : i) The federal character of the constitution will be destroyed and the union will become all-powerful. ii) The powers of the State- both the Union and the Units- will entirely be concentrated in the hands of the union executive. iii) The president will become a dictator.

While defending the emergency provisions in the Constituent Assembly, Dr. Ambedkar accepted the possibility of their misappropriation. He observed, 'I do not altogether deny that there is a possibility of the Articles being abused or employed for political purposes.'

Having dealt with all the Emergency provisions, it is easy to see what the purpose was behind making such provisions available in the Constitution in the first place. But in reality, it has been seen that even if these provisions are provided for the security of the nation and also the protection of the people, the provisions in themselves give a lot of drastic discretionary powers in the hands of the Executive. It affects the federal structure of the nation essentially turning it into a unitary one while it seeks to safeguard the interests of the state and the people. It should be a system of check and balance brought into place so that unlike in the 1975 emergency, there is no misuse of power by the ruling party and the executive. Though suspension of Fundamental Rights has been time and again tried to be justified. It is true, that they are the most basic to the very existence of the citizens in a democracy. As the experience has been so far and observed in our study that inspires the safety measures that were added by the 44th Amendment to the Constitution in the emergency provisions there are still chances for the unjust violation of the fundamental rights. Therefore as there is a provision in the other federal constitutions such as of Australia and Canada the courts should be given the power to agree to the extent the Centre can expand its powers, as it will act as a built- in mechanism to check the arbitrary use of the discretionary powers available under the emergency provisions to the parliament and the executive. 14.6 Summing up ? In constitutional terms, an emergency is a situation that includes 'some imminent danger to the life of the nation, requiring some immediate action' by the government to preserve the prevailing constitutional order.

Explain the difference between the fifth and sixth schedules of our constitution. 15.2 Introduction In India, the number of individual ethnic groups notified as Scheduled Tribes is 705. Scheduled Tribe population is 8.6 percent of the country's population, that is over 104.3 million individuals according to the Census, 2011. Tribal societies are traditionally governed by customary laws of different tribes and have been historically isolated from mainstream societies. They are also backward in terms of socio- economic development and thus, they require special provisions for governance. Founding fathers of our constitution provide some provisions in the constitution to preserve their identity and indigenouness, and also improve their socio-economic conditions so that they could maintain their tribal identity without any coercion or exploitation. To serve those purposes, in our constitution make some arrangements through schedule fifth and schedule sixth. The fifth and Sixth Schedules were discussed and passed by Constituent Assembly between September 5-7, 1949. These days are remembered by tribal rights activists every year. The Fifth Schedule was planned by the founding fathers of the constitution as an innovative device for promoting the welfare and advancement of Scheduled Tribes and the administration of scheduled areas. It discusses special powers for governance in scheduled areas, on the governor of a state having scheduled areas. The basic thrust of the fifth and sixth schedule of the constitution is the protection of the cultural distinctiveness of tribal. The two schedules entail the details about the control and management of the Scheduled and Tribal Areas. 15.3 The Fifth Schedule [Article 244(1)] The Fifth Schedule is a very important provision of the constitution deals with the control and administration of the Scheduled Areas. Thus, article 244 confers plenary power on the Governor to bring independent legislations in respect of tribal affairs in consultation with the Tribes Advisory Council (TAC). Due to this, the role of TAC is very crucial in the governance of Scheduled Areas. NSOU ? CC-PS-02 270 the administration of the Scheduled and Tribal Areas. These councils envisage protecting and preserving tribal culture. The rationale behind the creation of Autonomous District Councils (ADC) is the belief that the relationship to the land is the basis of tribal or indigenous identity. The culture and identity of indigenous people can be preserved by ensuring their control over land and natural resources, as these factors to a large extent determine the lifestyle and culture of the indigenous people. However, this arrangement has resulted in the rise of conflict between different groups, for instance, tribal vs. non-tribal. Further, it undermines the social harmony, stability and economic development of the state and the region. Table-2 Tribal Area under Sixth Schedule Sl. No. State Tribal areas 1. The district and regional councils within their territorial jurisdictions can constitute village councils or courts for trial of suits and cases between the tribes. They hear appeals from them. The jurisdiction of high court over these suits and cases is specified by the governor. 15.5 Conclusion The basic thrust of the Fifth and Sixth Schedule of the constitution is the protection of the cultural distinctiveness of the Tribal population. Both provide protection to the tribals on account of their economic disadvantages so that they could maintain their tribal identity without any coercion or exploitation. The fifth schedule designates Schedule areas in large parts of India in which the interests of the Scheduled Tribes are to be protected. The Scheduled area has more than 50 percent tribal population. On the other hand, the sixth schedule related to the administration of north-eastern states (Assam, Meghalaya, Tripura, and Mizoram) has provisions for the formation of autonomous districts and autonomous regions within the districts as there are different schedule tribes within the district.

deals with the administration and control of Scheduled Areas as well as of Scheduled Tribes residing in any State other than the States of Assam, Meghalaya, Tripura, and Mizoram.

These two schedules provide for alternate or special governance mechanisms for certain 'scheduled areas' in the mainland and certain 'tribal areas' in northeastern India. It is true, special constitutional protections are indeed required for marginalised sections to ensure that historical wrongs done to them are reversed and not repeated, but it has denied justice to the non-tribals, who have lived in ADCs for generations but ended up marginalised. Hence, the government and other agencies need to win the confidence of the tribals and non-tribals within the region and bring a sense of security and belongingness among them to deal with this sensitive issue.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 278 16.2 Introduction The most important role of the State legislatures is to represent the people. It is, however, important to remember that in parliamentary polity the legislature has also to provide from within itself a representative, responsible and responsive government to the people. One way to judge whether the system is working well or not is to see whether it has brought into being governments that last their terms and succeed in providing good governance to the community. The overriding objective has to be to make both government and legislature relevant to meet today's challenges which bear little comparison to those faced by our society in the middle decades of the twentieth century. The fundamental challenges are economic and technological. The legislature has a decisive role in refashioning the national economy, keeping in the forefront the ideas of a self-reliant economy that serves the real needs and aspirations of our vast masses. State Legislature can play this historic role only if it consciously reforms its procedures and priorities its work. India is a Union of States. It means that there is one Union Government and several State Governments, it also means that Union (Centre) is more powerful than

States. At present, there are 28 States in the Indian Union and each one of them has a Legislature. The State Legislature is a law-making body at the state level. 16.3 Composition of State Legislature

In most of the States, the Legislature consists of the Governor and the Legislative Assembly (Vidhan Sabha). This means that these states have unicameral legislature. In a few states, there are two houses of the Legislature namely, Legislative Assembly (Vidhan Sabha) and Legislative Council (Vidhan Parishad) besides the Governor. Where there are two Houses, the Legislature, is known as bicameral. Six states have a bicameral, legislature (Andhra Pradesh, Karnataka, Telengana, Maharashtra, Bihar and Uttar Pradesh). The Legislative Assembly is known as the lower house or popular house. The Legislative Council is known as the upper house. Just as Lok Sabha has been made powerful at the Union level, the Legislative Assembly has been made a powerful body in the States.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 279 16.3.1 The Legislative Assembly (Vidhan Sabha) : Composition : There is a Legislative Assembly (Vidhan Sabha) in every State. It represents the people of the State.

the case of Lok Sabha, a certain number of seats is reserved for Scheduled Castes and in some States for Scheduled Tribes also. This depends on the population of these weaker sections in the State. The number of Vidhan Sabha members cannot be more than 500 and not less than 60. However, very small States have been allowed to have a lesser number of members. Thus Goa has only 40 members in its Assembly.

The Speaker and Deputy Speaker perform the same purposes in the Legislative Assembly. Therefore, Article 178 of the Indian Constitution has provisions about the same. The Constitution contains identical provisions relating to the Speaker and Deputy Speaker of the Lok Sabha and their counterparts in the state legislative assemblies. It lays down only the main duties and power of the Speaker. Which are as follows : 1. To permit a member who cannot adequately express himself in Hindi or English or the official language of the state, to address the House in his mother tongue. 2. To exercise

To determine whether a Bill is a Money Bill and to certify a Money Bill. 4. To preside over the House, whenever he is present in the House, excepting when a resolution for his removal from office is under consideration. 5. To adjourn the House when there is no quorum. The detailed duties and responsibilities of the Speaker are laid down in the Rules of Procedure which each House is empowered to make under Article 208 of the Constitution with, of course, the condition that such rules shall be "subject to the provisions of the Constitution". Though the Rules of Procedure vary from state to state, the position regarding the powers and functions of the Speaker is more or less identical, as generally the rules of the assemblies on this behalf are modeled on the Lok Sabha Rules. The more important powers and functions of the Speakers of state assemblies, in general, are briefly noted below. As the principal spokesman of the House, the Speaker represents its collective voice and is its sole representation to the outside people. His position as the presiding officer of the House is one of essential authority : ? He regulates the debates and proceedings of the House ? He is charged with the maintenance of order in the House and is equipped with all powers necessary for enforcing his decisions. ? He

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 281 Various powers are conferred on the Speaker about asking questions to Ministers. Though the guiding principles regarding admissibility of questions are prescribed in the rules and its interpretation is vested in the Speaker. whether a motion expressing want of confidence in the Council of Ministers is in order.

The Speaker has also the power to select amendments concerning Bills and motions and can refuse to propose an amendment which in his opinion is trivial. It is the fundamental duty of the Speaker to maintain order in the house. He derives his disciplinary powers from the rules, and the decisions taken by him in matters of discipline are not to be challenged except on a substantive motion. He/she may direct any member guilty of disorderly conduct to withdraw from the House, and name a member for suspension if the member disregards the authority of the chair and persists in obstructing the proceedings of the House. The Speaker also has the power that he/she may also adjourn or suspend the business of the House in case of grave disorder. To enable the Speaker to deal with unexpected situations and regulate matters of detail, the rules expressly vest "residuary powers" in him/her. In fine,

the Rules of Procedure and Conduct of Business in the state assemblies confer wide discretionary powers on the Speaker. The rules have been codified on the premise that the Speaker's chair would be occupied by scrupulously dispassionate and impartial persons. The Speaker's supreme authority inside the House is based on his absolute and unvarying impartiality and all the powers vested in him are intended to enable him to ensure the smooth functioning of the House. Therefore, in no case would it be justified for a Speaker to use his powers arbitrarily or in such a manner as to prevent the House from functioning. 16.3.2 The Vidhan Parishad (Upper House of the State Legislature):

Vidhan Parishad is the upper House of the State Legislature. It

The Governor cannot withhold his assent, as money bills are introduced with his prior approval. Control over the Executive : The control of the legislative Assembly over the Council of Ministers is real and complete. The Minister is drawn from the majority party in the assembly over the Council of Minister is real and complete. The Ministers are drawn from the majority party in the Assembly. Constitution holds them collectively responsible to the legislature. The term responsibility implies that the Ministry can remain in the office during the pleasure of the Assembly. It can make its influence felt by accepting adjournment motion, censure motion, a cut in the Minister's salary, or by rejecting a Government Bill. case of the Parliament, if there is a disagreement between the two Houses over an ordinary bill, the President summons a joint sitting of both the Houses and if the bill is passed there by the majority of votes, the bill is taken as passed by both Houses of the Parliament. But this provision of joint sitting does not exist in the States. Although an ordinary bill can originate in either House of the State Legislature, yet both Houses have unequal powers. If a bill is passed in the Vidhan Sabha, it is transmitted to the Vidhan Parishad for consideration. When it is passed by Vidhan Parishad without any amendment, the bill is sent to the Governor for his assent. In case, the bill is (a) rejected by the Parishad or (b) more than three months elapsed without the bill being passed by the Parishad, or (c) bill is passed with an amendment to which the Vidhan Sabha does not agree, the Vidhan Sabha may pass the bill again in the same or the subsequent session. After that, the bill is again sent to the Vidhan Parishad. If the Vidhan Parishad does not return the bill within one month, the bill is deemed to have been passed by both Houses of the State Legislature and is sent to Governor for his assent. Thus the Vidhan Parishad can delay the bill for a maximum period of four months. The State Legislature consists of the Governor, the Legislative Council (Vidhan Parishad) and the Legislative Assembly (Vidhan Sabha). In most states, there are unicameral Legislatures. These State Legislatures consist of the Governor and the Legislative Assembly. The Parliament is empowered to set up or abolish the Vidhan Parishad in a State. The Vidhan Parishad is partly indirectly elected and partly nominated. It is a permanent House like the Rajya Sabha. It is never dissolved. The tenure of its members is six years. One-third

Members of the Vidhan Sabha are directly elected by the people of the State based on universal adult franchise. Its tenure is five years, but the Governor can dissolve it earlier on the advice of the Chief Minister. In case of constitutional breakdown, it may be dissolved by the President. The powers of the State Legislature are law-making, control over the finances, and the executive, electoral functions and constitutional functions 16.7

The legislature, executive and judiciary are the three organs of government. Together, they perform the functions of the government, maintain law and order and look after the welfare of the people. The Constitution ensures that they work in coordination with each other and maintain a balance among themselves. In a parliamentary system, the executive and the legislature are interdependent : the legislature controls the executive, and, in turn, is controlled by the executive. In this unit, we shall discuss the composition, structure and function of the executive organ of the state government. India is a federation having governments at two levels : state level and union or central level. Every citizen is related to and influenced by the governments functioning at both levels. We are all guided by the laws made by state and union legislatures, administered by both the governments and get justice from courts at both levels. All the three branches of government, executive, legislature and judiciary exist and function at both levels. The executive is the branch of government responsible for the implementation of laws and policies adopted by the legislature. The executive is often involved in the framing of policy. The official designations of the executive vary from country to country. Some countries have presidents, while others have chancellors. The executive branch is not just about presidents, prime Ministers, and Ministers. It also extends to the administrative machinery (civil servants). While the heads of government and their Ministers, saddled with the overall responsibility of government policy, are together known as the political executive, those responsible for day-to-day administration are called the permanent executive. 17.3

The State Executive The State executive consists of the Governor, the Chief Minister, and the Council of Ministers and Advocate-General of State. 17.4

Governor The Governor, as President, heads the state government. Article 153-167 in the Indian Constitution deal with the provisions related to the state governments of the NSOU ? CC-PS-02 291 country. Governor is a titular head or nominal executive head and also the constitutional head of the state. He/she forms an important part of the state executive where he acts as the chief executive head. Central Government nominates the Governor for each state. Normally, the Governor exercises all his/her powers on the advice of the Council of Ministers. 17.4.1 Appointment : Constitution of India lays down for the office the Governor of each State." However, one person can also function as a Governor of two or more states (Article 153). The President of India appoints the Governor of each state and while doing so he acts upon the advice of the Prime Minister. Two important practices regarding the appointment of a Governor : i) The first practice is that the person being appointed as the Governor is mostly not a resident of the state for which he is appointed. ii) Before appointing a Governor, the Union Governments consults the concerned State Government particularly the Chief Minister of that State. It is now a respected rule. Along with these two healthy practices, an unhealthy practice has also developed. Sometimes 'defeated' or very old political leaders are appointed as Governors. Further, sometimes the unhealthy practice of wholesale transfers or removals of Governors takes place after a change of government at the Centre.

Discuss the functions of different levels of Panchayat Raj Institutions in West Bengal.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 302 18.2 Introduction Democracy is considered one of the best forms of government because it ensures participation and control of governance by the people of the country. Such participation is possible only when the powers of the state are decentralised to the district, block, and village levels where all the sections of the people can sit together, discuss their problems and suggest solutions and plan to execute as well as monitor the implementation of the programs. It is called the root of democratic decentralisation. Panchayat Raj is an interconnected and interdependent pattern of democracy, a system of sharing powers and responsibilities with the people. The Panchayat system is the prototype of all forms of Self-Government and democracy that have ever been evolved in various parts of the world. India is a vast agrarian country, it needs some healthy institutions to work or administrative, economic and social development to the people living in widespread villages Panchayat Raj Institutions (PRI) are successfully meet up those needs.

Panchayat Raj provided a system of self-governance at the village level or grass-roots level. It is a complex unit of Local Self Government consisted of popular representatives and exercising the function of coordination and possessing a degree of autonomy. The institution of Panchayat Raj has been the main pillar of rural social structure also. In India, there was the option to introduce panchayat, but after the 73rd amendment (1993) of the constitution, it is mandatory and gets constitutional status. West Bengal has also introduced the panchayat system after independence. 18.3 Panchayati Raj : The Concept Democracy at the top could not be a success unless it was built on the foundation below. In India, Mahatma Gandhi, Jawaharlal Nehru and Jai Prakash Narayan described democracy as the government that gives 'power to the people. Gandhi said : "True democracy could not be worked by some persons sitting at the top. It had to be worked from below by the people of every village." Nehru also advocated democracy at the lower levels when he opined: "Local self-government was and must be the basis of any true system of democracy. People had got into the habit of NSOU ? CC-PS-02 303 thinking of democracy at the top and not so much below". Jai Prakash Narayan also favoured power to the people of the village along with the government at the centre when he remarked: "To me the Gram Sabha signifies village democracy. Let us not have only representative government from the village up to Delhi, one place, at least let there be direct government, direct democracy. The relationship between the Panchayat and the Gram Sabha should be that of Cabinet and the Assembly." Mahatma Gandhi's vision was that democracy through people's participation could be ensured only by way of 'Gram Swarajya'. Wanted Gram Swarajya in villages where there will be a village republic and the management of the village would be done by the people themselves. They would elect their president and common decisions would be taken unanimously by the Gram Sabha of the village. According to Gandhiji's Gram Swarajya, "every village should be a democracy in which they will not depend even on neighbour for major needs. They should be self-sufficient. For other needs, where cooperation of others would be essential, it would be done through cooperation. It will be swarajya of the poor. No one should be without food and clothing. Everybody should get sufficient work to meet one's necessities. This ideal can be asset only when the means of production to meet to the primary needs of life are under the control of the people. True swarajya cannot be achieved by power to a few people. People should have the capacity to prevent misuse of power. People have the capacity to get hold of power and regulate it." The late Prime Minister of India, Lal Bahadur Shastri, was also opined that only the panchayats know the needs of villages and hence the development of villages should be done only by the panchayats. Prosperous people in villages should ensure that powers given to the panchayats are used in the interest of the poor. The panchayats are the foundation of democracy and if the foundation is based on correct leadership and social justice, there can be no danger to democracy in this country. The theoretical assumptions underlying thinking can be classified into four categories: i) That Panchayati Raj will enable the people to effectively participate in politics; ii) That by making the local community the author of the change, and by awakening plan-consciousness among the people, it will make economic development both speedy and efficient;

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 304 iii) That the 'transference' of power to village panchayats will enable basic institutions—the cooperatives, the community development centres and the Jojana Samiti to usher in a new social order. Panchayati Raj, in other words, will pave the way for a Sahakari Samaj; and lastly iv) That based on common and shared experiences among the people at large, such a system of political organisation would lead to genuine national unity. In sum, Panchayati Raj is conceived as the closest approximation, under existing conditions, to the ancient concept of direct democracy as practiced in Athens and, also in ancient India as well. On this conceptual basis, in the discussion of the constitutional Assembly, Gandhiji's dream of building democracy at and from the bottom was sought to be fulfilled. But the Draft Constitution of independent India framed by the Drafting Committee, of which Dr. Ambedkar was the Chairman, contained nothing about the village Panchayats. In the Constituent Assembly Dr. Ambedkar, in justifying this deliberate omission, condemned these villages in very strong terms. He said: "That they have survived through vicissitudes may be a fact. But mere survival has no value. The question is on what plane they have survived. Surely on a low selfish level. I hold that these village republics have been the ruination of India. I am, therefore, surprised that those who condemn provincialism should come forward as champions of the village. What is the village but a sink of localism and a den of ignorance, narrow-mindedness and communalism? I am glad that the Draft Constitution has discarded the village and adopted the individual as its unit". Perhaps Dr. Ambedkar, though correct to some extent, carried things to an excess and his statement raised a storm of protest and reaction in different quarters. All felt that Dr. Ambedkar did not attach proper value, and significance to the role the villages played in the past and are expected to play in the future. The Constituent Assembly then started the discussion of the Directive Principles during which an amendment was moved for inserting a provision regarding the panchayat. Dr. Ambedkar accepted the amendment, and it is finally enacted as a Directive Principle of our Constitution that "The state governments shall take steps to organise Village Panchayats and endow them with such power and authority as may be necessary to enable them to function as units of self-government" (Article 40 of the

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 305 18.4 Development of PRI in India (since independence) India made its Constitution and was implemented in 1950. After its independence. Under the Indian Constitution article 40 states that the state must encourage the introduction of independent bodies as Gram panchayats. The first five-year plan mentioned the dissemination of the powers reflecting the concept of development of rural and urban development. There were various committees set up regarding the local self-governments : Balwant Rai Mehta Committee : It was established in 1957, it showed the insistence of proper functioning elected organisation at the ground level and recommended a three-tier system of governance. Ashok Mehta Committee : It was incorporated in 1977 and suggested the need for 2 tier system at the ground level of governance. Sarkaria Commission : It was incorporated in 1983, it observed that dissemination of the powers to the ground level will not be effective until the management of villages i.e. rural areas is improved. GVK Rao Committee : It submitted its report in 1985 and put forward the problem that election in local governments is required to be conducted regularly. L.M. Singhvi Committee : It was the most significant committee in the upliftment of local self-governments, in 1987 it emphasised the need for constitutional recognition of the local self-government. To protect their autonomy and systematically providing monetary assistance. The 73rd Amendment (1992) : The 73rd Amendment added have upgraded them from non-justifiable to justifiable part of the constitution and has put a constitutional obligation upon states to enact the Panchayati Raj Acts as per provisions of Part IX. However, states have been given enough freedom to take their geographical, politico-administrative and other conditions into account while adopting the Panchayati Raj System. The basic features of the 73 rd amendment are : ? Establishment of 'Gram Sabha' at the village level comprising

18.5The Panchayati Raj Institutions (PRI) in West Bengal Since independence, all these attempts has been done all are tried to improve and renewed emphasis on the revival of the panchayats. Different states have enacted the necessary and relevant laws and now there is panchayat legislation in all the states of India. West Bengal is also taking various initiatives after independence. The West Bengal Panchayat machinery, as envisaged under the Act of 1957, is a two-tier system-the Gram Panchayats and the Anchal Panchayats. After that, The NSOU ? CC-PS-02 307 West Bengal Panchayat Act of 1957 was passed for establishing Panchayats in the state. The Act recommended the constitution of four-tier bodies by splitting the earlier Union Board into Gram Panchayat and Anchal Parisad. In 1963 West Bengal Zilla Parishad Act was passed to replace the District Board with Zilla Parishad and provided for the constitution of Anchal Parishad at the block level. However, the system never took root because of a lack of political will resulting in the little assignment of responsibilities and flow of funds to those bodies as well as political unrest during the period. Ultimately, all the representatives of 15 Zilla Parishads and 315 Anchal Parisads were removed in the year 1969 and Administrators were engaged. All those local bodies remained under the Administrators till the election was held in the year 1978. The legal framework for the second generation of Panchayats was established through the passing of the West Bengal Panchayat Act, 1973. The Act provided for the establishment of three-tier Panchayats. Thus, Gram Panchayat (GP) was to be constituted for a cluster of villages; Panchayat Samiti (PS) was to be constituted at the Block level and Zilla Parishad (ZP) was to be constituted at the District level. NB-I : All the Panchayat Samitis within the geographical limit of a district come under the said District Panchayat or Zilla Parishad.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 308 NB-II : All the Gram Panchayats within the geographical limit of Panchayat Samiti come under it. Panchayat Samiti and Development Block is co-Terminus. NB-III : A Gram Panchayat will have at least five and a maximum of 30 members. Each member has a specified area and voters (constituency) that he/she represents which is called Gram Sansad (village parliament) The main features related to the legal framework of the Act were : i) Members will be elected directly for each tier from respective constituencies. ii) Candidates may contest the election with their party symbol. iii) The members will elect their Chairperson and Vice Chair-Persons for each Panchayat to be called Pradhan and Upa-Pradhan for the GP; Sabhapati and Saha Sabhapati for the PS and Sabhadhipati and Saha Sabhadhipati for the ZP. iv) Vertical division of power was made by assigning different duties and responsibilities to different tiers of Panchayats. v) Within each tier responsibility was divided among various Standing Committees (for ZP and PS) and UpaSamitis (for GP) to deal with different subjects. v) There has to be an election after every five years. vi) Direct accountability to the people at the Gram Sansad level for ensuring their participation in the functioning of the Gram Panchayat. However, election to the three-tier Panchayats was conducted based on the new Act in the year 1978 only and elections are being held regularly after every five years. Many of the State Government employees were given a dual role by giving them responsibilities for working for the Panchayats in their ex- officio capacities. 18.5.1 The Gram Panchayat (GP) Composition and Functions : Gram Panchayat is the primary unit of Panchayati Raj Institutions (PRI) or local self-government. It is the Executive Committee of Gram Sabha. Out of three institutions established under the Act, the Gram Panchayat (GP) constitutes the most effective tier of PRI. Every GP is a body corporate with perpetual succession, capacity to acquire, hold, transfer the proper and authority to enter into contracts. It functions as a unit of local self-government with the participation of people. All

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 309 villages do not have Panchayats as some of them are very small. That is why some very small villages are clubbed to make a Panchayat. A Gram as defined under the Act (meaning a village or a cluster of villages) is divided into a minimum of five constituencies (again depending on the number of voters the Gram is having). From each of these constituencies, one member is elected. The body of these elected members is called the Gram Panchayat. The size of the GPs varies widely from state to state. In states like West Bengal, Kerala etc. a GP has about 20000 people on average, while in many other states it is around 3000 only. In most of the states, each constituency of the members of the Gram Panchayat is called the Gram Sabha and all the voters of the same constituency are members of this body. In West Bengal, it is called Gram Sansad (village parliament). Gram Sabha in West Bengal has a different meaning. Here all the voters of the Gram Panchayat as a whole constitute the Gram Sabha. Under the Constitution, there can be only three tiers of the Panchayat. The Gram Sabha is not a tier of the PR system. It does not have any executive function and operates as a recommending body only. Every Gram Panchayat shall, at its first meeting at which a quorum is present, elect, in the prescribed manner, one of its members to be the Pradhan and another member to be the Upa-Pradhan of the Gram Panchayat. Gram Unnayan Samiti (GUS) : Gram Unnayan Samiti (GUS) (Village Development Committee) is a small committee constituted by Gram Sansad and chaired by the elected GP member of the same Gram Sansad. Its function is to help the GP prepare village level plan execute them through social mobilization etc. Generally speaking, the functions related to a particular locality are entrusted to the village panchayat. This is the reason why the functions of panchayats in most of the states are similar. The provisions of panchayat acts of the various states relating to the functions of the panchayats in India are not identically worded. Functions : The functions of the GUS are to help and assist the Gram Sansad in the preparation of its perspective plan for five years and annual plan as a part of the same, for achieving the economic development and social justice, mobilization of revenue from the Gram Sansad area etc. So that the entire population, irrespective of their political identity or orientation, can work together the GUS is to be constituted based on consensus between the elected and the opposition member and there should be fair representation from all the categories of people living in that

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 310 area. However, the overt or covert political rivalry has dampened the spirit of bringing all the people together to work for their development. Where the GUS has been formed and functioning well they are also allowed to open a bank account and receive fund from the GP for taking up petty works Gram Sansad : Gram Sansad is the assembly of all the voters of a polling station and is the forum for direct accountability of the GP to all its voters. Meetings of the Gram Sansad are to be held in every Gram Sansad twice a year and the date & time of the meeting is to be publicized at least seven days before the meeting. The Gram Sansad will guide and advise the GP regarding the schemes to be undertaken and identify or lay down the principles for the identification of beneficiaries. A Gram Panchayat shall not ordinarily omit or refuse or act any recommendations of the Gram Sansad. The proper functioning of the Gram Sansad is very important for effective local governance. Necessary information as mentioned above has to be disclosed to the public by circulating printed booklets. Ideally the same should be published well before the meeting or the documents should be available in the rural library for wider dissemination. However, the same is hardly done and people are not in a position to participate with prior information about the functioning of the Gram Panchayat. Participation of the people in the meeting is also important, which is still quite low and on the decline. Powers and Duties of Gram Panchayat : Obligatory duties of Gram Panchayat : (1) A Gram Panchayat shall function as a unit of self-government and, to achieve economic development and secure social justice for all, shall, subject to such conditions as may be prescribed or such directions as may be given by the State Government. (a) Prepare a development plan for the five-year term of the office of the members and revise and update it as and when necessary with regard to the resources available; (b) Prepare an annual plan for each year by October of the preceding year for the development of human resources, infrastructure and civic amenities in the area; NSOU ? But it was precisely the need for such initiative that led to the advocacy of the new system. Functioning of the Panchayats critically depends on proper understanding of roles and responsibilities of all the Panchayat functionaries including the employees and competence of discharging their assigned responsibilities. The ordinary elected member should also have adequate knowledge for playing their role. In addition to that, it is the ordinary citizen who needs to participate in various affairs of the Panchayats and keep a vigilant eye for ensuring that the Panchayats are working in their interest. Out of all those, the most crucial is the capability of the elected functionaries. They need to understand the basic rules related to the functioning of the Panchayats, their powers and limitations, the accountability mechanism in the system and the need for maintaining the transparency of functioning etc. They should also internalise the essentiality of functioning based on rules and laid procedures and to always maintain objectivity in decision making. They, therefore, need to be trained on those issues in adequate depth, which is quite difficult. The problem is aggravated by the fact that most of the members change after the election due to rotation in the reservation as well as other factors and many of them are being associated with the public office for the first time. Thus, there is little accumulation of experiences. In fact, out of all those members elected during the general election to Panchayats in 2008 only around 23% had some training on the functioning of Panchayats before

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 326 being elected. In addition to that the individual capacity to learn about the governance and functioning of Panchayats varies widely due to variation of their personal background. Therefore, building individual capacity through training as well as improving institutional capacities through various methods like clearly prescribing procedures, reengineering the processes involved in the functioning of the Panchayats and introduction of Information and Communication Technology (ICT) is a tremendous need. All the Panchayat functionaries are, therefore, given training after taking responsibility as well as subsequently. To augment the training infrastructure, District Training Centres (DTC) are being established in every district in addition to strengthening the State Institute of Panchayat and Rural Development (SIPRD) and the five Extension Training Centres (ETC) of the SIPRD. All the employees working for the Panchayats are also trained regularly and the process needs to be strengthened for equipping them in carrying out their responsibilities. Special measures are also taken for capacity building under the BRGF and the ISGP as mentioned earlier. Training a huge number of personnel who are associated with the functioning of the Panchayats is also attempted to be addressed by the satellite-based communication channel through which training can be organised in distance mode with a classroom at the Block Development office and the ETC/DTC and teaching end at the PRDD Headquarter. The PRDD also takes measures for improving understanding of the ordinary rural people to know better about the Panchayats and how they can participate better in the functioning of the Panchayats. One such initiative is the weekly radio programme which propagates important information on the institutional aspect as well as the implementation of various programmes related to Panchayat and Rural Development.

18.7 Summing up ? Panchayat Raj is an interconnected and interdependent pattern of democracy, a system of sharing powers and responsibilities with the people. ? The Panchayat system is the prototype of all forms of Self-Government and democracy ? In India, Panchayat Raj provided a system of self-governance at the village level or grass-roots level. ? In India, Mahatma Gandhi, Jawaharlal Nehru and Jai Prakash Narayan described democracy as the government that gives 'power to the people.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 327 ? Mahatma Gandhi's vision was that democracy through people's participation could be ensured only by way of 'Gram Swarajya'. ? Under the Indian Constitution article 40 states that the state must encourage the introduction of independent bodies as Gram Panchayats. ? The Constitution (Seventy-Third Amendment) Act, 1992, which came into force w.e.f. 24th April, 1993, inserted Part IX in the Constitution of India and accorded Panchayats a Constitutional status as institutions of local self-governance for rural India.

Understand the composition and function of the Municipal Corporations 19.2 Introduction In the developing countries, the Colonial Governments during the period of their domination established several statutory institutions. Among them Urban Local Self-Government institutions are most prominent. Ever since the establishment of Madras (Chennai) Municipal Corporation four centuries ago, there has been a proliferation of municipal bodies to manage the town and city. Lord Rippon's resolution in 1882 sought to place these Urban Local Government institutions on a sound organisational footing. They have been working with different degrees of success in administering the city. In this Unit, we shall examine the nature of urbanisation in India, different NSOU ? CC-PS-02 330 types of urban local bodies, administrative structure, the role of bureaucracy, municipal finance, control over local bodies ,and their problem areas. Two common forms of Local Self-Government are Urban Local Self-Government and Rural Local Self-Government. We have Panchayati Raj Institutions in the rural areas. In the urban areas - in the cities and towns -there are Municipal Corporations and Municipalities. According to the 74th Constitutional Amendment the Urban- Local Self-Government has been classified into three types, that is, Municipal Corporation, Municipal Council, and Municipal Committee. Far-reaching changes have been brought about for both Municipal Government and Panchayati Raj Institutions through the two Constitutional Amendments: The Seventy-third (73rd) Constitutional Amendment Act, 1992 for Panchayati Raj, and the Seventy-fourth (74th) Constitutional Amendment Act, 1992 for Municipal Bodies. The Constitution of India now provides for three types of institutions of Urban Local Self-Government. These are Municipal Corporations in larger urban areas, Municipal Councils in urban settlements, and Nagar Panchayats in 'transitional' areas, which are neither fully urban nor fully rural. In addition, it provides for decentralisation of municipal administration by constituting Ward Committees in territorial areas of such municipalities, which have more than three lakh populations.

The Constitution (74th Amendment) Act, 1992 is a landmark initiative of the Government of India to strengthen local self-government in cities and towns. The Act stipulates that if the state government dissolves a Municipality, election to the same must be held within six months. Moreover, the conduct of municipal elections is entrusted to statutory State Election Commission, rather than being left to executive authorities. The mandate of the Municipalities is to undertake the tasks of planning for 'economic development and social justice and implement city/town development plans.

The main features of the 74th Constitutional Amendment are as under : a) Committee : Committee means a Committee constituted under article 243S of the Constitution. b) Metropolitan area :

Metropolitan area. c) Municipal area : Municipal area means the territorial area of a Municipality as is notified by the Governor. d) Municipality : Municipality means an institution of self-government constituted under Article 243Q of the Constitution. As per Article 243Q, every State should constitute three types of municipalities in urban areas. Provided that a Municipality under this clause may not be constituted in such urban area or part thereof as the Governor may, having regard to the size of the area and the and iii) Municipal Corporation : A Municipal Corporation is constituted for a larger urban area. The Governor declares a transitional area, or smaller urban area or larger urban area based on the

the economic importance or such other factors as he may deem fit, specify by public notification for the purposes.

19.3Municipal Corporations : Composition and Functions The administration of civic affairs in a city is a challenge. The distinct characteristic of a city is the huge concentration of population within a limited area. The NSOU ? CC-PS-02 332 management of civil services, therefore, requires an effective organisational structure, adequate finance, and efficient personnel. The Municipal Corporation as a form of city Government occupies the top position among the local authorities in India. Normally, the Corporation form of urban Government is found in major cities like Mumbai, Delhi, Kolkata, Chennai, Hyderabad, Bangalore, etc. Municipal Corporation is established through a special statute, which is passed by the State legislature. In the case of Union Territories, they are established through Acts passed by the Parliament. Such legislation may be enacted especially for a particular corporation or for all Corporations in a State, for example, the Mumbai and Kolkata Corporations were established through separate legislation. Whereas in Uttar Pradesh and Madhya Pradesh, the State level legislation governs the constitution and working of the Corporation. The Municipal Corporation generally enjoys a greater measure of autonomy than other forms of local government. In almost all the States, the Municipal Corporations have been assigned numerous functions such as the supply of drinking water, electricity, road transport services, public health, education, registration of births and deaths, drainage, construction of public parks, gardens, libraries, etc. These functions are normally divided into obligatory and discretionary. In Haryana, there is only one Municipal Corporation (MC) that is in Faridabad with more than 5 lakhs population. MC is constituted for governing the area. It has both elected and nominated (ex-officio) members. MC, Faridabad has at present 24 elected Councillors. Under the amended municipal law of the State, election to the municipal bodies must take place every five years, unless a municipal body is dissolved earlier. The Mayor elected by the members of the Corporation from amongst themselves is the first citizen of the city and presides over the meetings of the city Corporation. Because of the importance of the city, the Mayor who is the first citizen of the city is a Political Head. He presides over the meetings of the Corporations and generally exercises limited administrative control over the working of the Municipal Corporation. The general pattern in India is that the Council elects the Mayor for a term of one year and he can be re-elected. Normally, the Mayors are ceremonial Heads without any executive authority.

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 333 West Bengal has seven Municipal Corporations at present (2021) Sl. No. Name of the Municipal Corporation District 1. Asansol Municipal Corporation Paschim Barddhaman 2. Bidhan Nagar Municipal Corporation North 24-Parganas 3. Chandernagore Municipal Corporation Hooghly 4. Durgapur Municipal Corporation Barddhaman 5. Howrah Municipal Corporation Howrah 6. Kolkata Municipal Corporation Kolkata 7. Siliguri Municipal Corporation Darjeeling Municipal Corporation : It is the topmost of urban local government and is for an urban area/centre with a population above 3 lacs. As an institution, it is more respectable and enjoys a greater measure of autonomy than other forms of local government. It is set up under a special statute passed by the respective state's legislature. However, in an exception, in Delhi (due to it being the National Capital Territory), the power to set up a Municipal Corporation lies with the Union Parliament. 2. Councillor : Members of the Municipal Corporation are elected based on universal adult suffrage for five years and they are called Councillors. These Councillors collectively called the Municipal Council, exercise deliberative functions and the executive functions are performed by the Municipal Commissioner. 3. Municipal Commissioner and Mayor : He is an Indian Administrative Services official appointed by the state government and has the executive powers of the government of Municipal Corporations. The other executives known as the Mayor and deputy Mayor are political executives elected for a period of one year by the members of the Corporation. The Mayor is the titular head of the corporation and presides over the meetings of the corporation. These Municipal Corporations are in charge of Wards (subdivision or district of a town/city) according to its population and representatives are elected from each ward. The Municipal Corporation of Greater Mumbai which is the civic body that governs Mumbai city is divided into 6 zones each consisting of 3-5 wards each. Individual wards or collections of wards

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 334 within a corporation sometimes have their own administrative body known as ward committees. The basic objective of an urban local government has changed from the maintenance of law and order in the early years to the promotion of the welfare of the community in recent times. The State Municipal Acts provide an exhaustive list of functions, which are classified into obligatory and optional or discretionary functions. The former has to be necessarily performed by the local government and for which sufficient provision in the budget has to be made. Failure to perform any of these functions may compel the State government to supersede a municipality. Discretionary functions may be taken up depending upon the availability of funds. Municipal functions listed in the State Municipal Acts generally fall in the following broad categories: (a) public health and sanitation; (b) medical relief; (c) public works; (d) education; (e) development; and (f) administrative 19.4 Municipalities : Composition and Functions Composition of Municipalities : Article 243R of the Constitution makes the provision for the composition of Municipalities.

Urban governments are the organs for promoting grass-root democracy and providing not only civic services for the welfare of the local people but also for carrying out the task of urban development and planning. In this context, the proper functioning of the municipal corporation for large cities and municipalities in urban areas must be monitored for enduring free fair and transparent public service delivery. 19.6 Summing up ? Two common forms of Local Self-Government are Urban Local Self- Government and Rural Local Self-Government. ? Lord Rippon’s resolution in 1882 sought to place these Urban Local Government institutions on a sound organisational footing. ? In contrast to ordinary legislation, a Constitution embodies the fundamental choices made by a country and its people that establish the basis for political and social, and economic life. Constitutions

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 341 establish the system of government, distribute and constrain power, protect the rights of citizens and deal with various additional issues of identity or substantive policy that are considered foundational in the specific context of a particular country. But the question is whether it should be rigid or flexible. Generally, constitutions are classified as 'flexible' or 'rigid' depending upon the process through which they can be amended. Prof. A.V. Dicey defines two types of constitutions—the flexible as 'one under which every law of every description can legally be changed with the same ease and in the same manner by the same body, and the rigid constitutions as 'one under which certain laws generally known as constitutional or fundamental laws, cannot be changed in the same manner as ordinary laws 'The United Kingdom having an unwritten constitution, is the best example of an extremely flexible constitution. As opposed to the U.K. system, the constitutional amendment has an important place under a written constitution like that of the U.S.A. Its importance increases where the system is federal. In most of the written constitutions, the power to amend the constitutions is either vested in a body other than the ordinary legislature or it is vested in the ordinary legislature, subject to a special procedure. In a federal system, additional safeguards like the involvement of legislatures at the state level, are also provided to ensure that the federal setup does not get altered only at the will of the federal legislature. In the case of the Indian Constitution, neither purely flexible India 20.3Flexibility of the Constitution Explaining why it was necessary to introduce an element of flexibility in the Constitution, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru observed in the Constituent Assembly : " While we want this

Constituent Assembly and the Constitutional Amendment Procedure in India The makers of the Indian Constitution were neither in favour of the traditional theory of federalism, which entrusts the task of a constitutional amendment to a body other than the legislature nor in prescribing a rigid special procedure for such amendments. Similarly, they never wanted to have an arrangement like the British set-up where the Parliament is supreme and can do everything humanly possible. Adopting the combination of the 'theory of fundamental law', which underlies the written Constitution of the United States with the 'theory of parliamentary sovereignty as existing in the United Kingdom, the Constitution of India vests constituent power upon the Parliament subject to the special procedure laid down therein. During the discussion in the Constituent Assembly on this aspect, some of the members were in favour of adopting an easier mode of amending procedure for the initial five to ten years. Dr. P.S. Deshmukh was of the view that the amendment of the Constitution should be made easier as

It is proposed that the Constitution should be amendable by a simple majority at NSOU ? CC-PS-02 343 least for some years. The argument is subtle and ingenious. It is said that this Constituent Assembly is not elected on adult suffrage while the future Parliament will be elected on adult suffrage and yet the former has been given the right to pass the Constitution by a simple majority while the latter has been denied the same right. It is walked as one of the absurdities of the Draft Constitution. I must repudiate the charge because it is without foundation. To know how simple are the provisions of the Draft Constitution in respect of amending the Constitution one has only to study the provisions for amendment contained in the American and Australian Constitutions. Compared to them those contained in the Draft Constitution will be found to be the simplest. The Draft Constitution has eliminated the elaborate and difficult procedures such as a decision by a convention or a referendum.... It is only for amendments

few—that the ratification of the State Legislatures is required. All other Articles of the Constitution are left to be amended by Parliament. The only limitation is that it shall be done by a majority of not less than two-thirds of the members of each House present and voting and a majority of the total membership of each House. It is difficult to conceive a simpler method of amending the Constitution.

Categories of Constitutional Amendments in India We have had the benefit of a galaxy of visionaries who were definitive about the path we should chart out for ourselves and were fully conscious of the enormity of the task involved in drafting the Constitution for a newborn nation. It is due to their sagacity and statesmanship that special provisions for 'amendment to the Constitution were incorporated in the Constitution. These provisions enabled Parliament to amend periodically the Constitution to meet the changing needs of the time. In our Constitution, Parliament has been empowered to amend any provision in compliance with the procedure laid down in article 368. Besides procedural limitations under article 368, the Supreme Court has, by judicial innovation, enunciated the 'Basic Structure Doctrine, i.e., if a Constitution amendment seeks to alter, take away or destroy the basic structure or framework of the Constitution, the Court has the power to declare it void or ultra vires.

The basic features are not finite and have been spelled out in different rulings, with the Supreme Court itself asserting that the claim of any particular feature of the Constitution to be a basic feature would be determined by the Court in each case that comes before it.

INDIAN POLITY book.docx (D57972790)

NSOU ? CC-PS-02 344 The Constitution of India provides for a distinctive amending process as compared to the leading Constitutions of the world. It may be described as partly flexible and partly rigid. The Constitution of India provides for a variety in the amending process—a feature which has been commended by Prof. K.C. Wheare for the reason that uniformity in the amending process imposes "quite unnecessary restrictions" upon the amendment of parts of a Constitution. The Constitution of India provides for three categories of amendments namely— First, those that article 368 which is the specific provision in the Constitution dealing with the power and the procedure for the amendment of the Constitution. Second, those amendments that can be effected by Parliament by a prescribed 'special majority; and Third, those that require, in addition to such 'special majority', ratification by at least one-half of the State Legislatures. The last two categories being governed by article 368. In this connection, it may also be mentioned that there are, as pointed out by Dr. Ambedkar, "innumerable articles in the Constitution" which leave the matter subject to the law made by Parliament. For example, under article 11, Parliament may make any provision relating to citizenship notwithstanding anything in articles 5 to 10. Thus, by-passing ordinary laws, Parliament may, in effect, provide,

Since such laws do not make any change whatsoever in the letter of the Constitution, they cannot be regarded as amendments of the Constitution nor categorised as such. 20.5Amendment to the Constitution of India : Procedure In so far as the constituent power to make formal amendments is concerned, it is article 368 of the Constitution of India which empowers Parliament to amend the NSOU ? the constitutional validity of the Tenth Schedule of the Constitution was inserted by the Constitution (Fifty-second Amendment) Act, 1985 was challenged. In this case, the decisions of the Speakers/Chairmen on disqualification, which had been challenged in different High Courts through different petitions, were heard by a five-member Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court. The Constitution Bench in its majority judgment upheld the validity of the Tenth Schedule but declared Paragraph 7 of the Schedule invalid because it was not ratified by the required number of the Legislatures of the States as it brought about in terms and effect, a change in articles 136, 226 and 227 of the Constitution. State Legislatures in certain cases, and the mandatory assent by the President, a Bill for amending the Constitution is dealt with the Parliament following the same legislative process as applicable to an ordinary piece of legislation. L.C. Golak Nath vs. State of Punjab (1967) the Court held that an amendment of the Constitution is a legislative process. A Constitution amendment under article 368

is "law" within the meaning of article 13 of the Constitution and therefore if a Constitution amendment "takes away or abridges"

a Fundamental Right conferred by Part III, it is void. The Court was also of the opinion that Fundamental Rights included in Part III of the Constitution are given a transcendental position under the Constitution and are kept beyond the reach of Parliament. The incapacity of Parliament to modify, restrict or impair Fundamental Freedoms in Part III arises from the scheme of the Constitution and the nature of the NSOU ? CC-PS-02 348 freedoms. In His Holiness Kesavananda Bharati Sripadagalvaruv. that the expression 'amendment' of this Constitution in article 368 means any addition or change in any of the provisions of the Constitution within the broad contours of the Preamble and the Constitution to carry out the objectives in the Preamble and the Directive Principles of State Policy. structure of the Constitution remain the same. The theory of the basic structure of the Constitution was reaffirmed and applied by the Supreme Court in Smt. Indira Nehru Gandhi vs. Raj Narain (1975) case and certain amendments to the Constitution were held void. Subsequently, on the basis of the Court's view in Kesavananda Bharati's case, upholding the concept of the basic structure, the Supreme Court in Minerva Mills Ltd. vs. Union of India (1980) declared section 55 of the Constitution (Forty-second Amendment) Act, 1976 as unconstitutional and void. The power and procedure for the constitutional amendment in India have some special points of interest : (i) There is no separate constituent body for the purposes of amendment of the Constitution; constituent power also being vested in the Legislature. As a result, the Constitution is amended roughly twice a year. 20.9 Summing up ? A proclamation of Emergency may be revoked by the President at any time by a subsequent proclamation. Such proclamation does not require parliamentary approval. The emergency must be revoked if the Lok Sabha passes a resolution by a simple majority disapproving its continuation. 14.4.1.3

A proclamation of Emergency has drastic and wide-ranging effects on the political system. These consequences can be categorised into 3 groups : i) Effects on the centre-state relations : While a proclamation of Emergency is in force, the normal fabric of the Centre- State relations undergoes a basic change. this can be studied under three heads : Executive : Centre becomes entitled to give executive directions to a state on 'any' matter Legislative : The parliament becomes empowered to make laws on any subject mentioned in the state list, the president can issue ordinances on State subjects also, if the parliament is not in session. The laws made on state subjects by the parliament become inoperative six months after the emergency has ceased to be in operation. Financial : The president can modify the constitutional distribution of revenues between the centre and the states. ii) Effect on the life of the Lok Sabha and State Assembly : iii) While a proclamation of National Emergency is in operation, the life of the Lok Sabha may be extended beyond the normal term for one year at a time. However, this extension cannot continue beyond a period of six months after the emergency has ceased to operate. Similarly, the Parliament may extend the normal tenure of a state Legislative Assembly by one year each time during a national emergency, subject to a maximum period of six months after the emergency has ceased to operate.

the effect of a National Emergency on Fundamental Rights. These two provisions are explained below : 1. Suspension of Fundamental rights under Article 19 : According to Article 358, when a proclamation of National Emergency is made, the six fundamental rights under article 19 are automatically suspended. Article 19 is automatically revived after the expiry of the emergency. 2. The 44 th Amendment Act laid out that Article 19 can only be suspended when the National Emergency is laid on the grounds of war or external aggression and not in the case of armed rebellion. 3. Suspension of other Fundamental Rights : Under Article 359, the President is authorised to suspend, by order, the right to move any court for the enforcement of Fundamental Rights during a National Emergency. Thus, remedial measures are suspended and not the Fundamental Rights. 4.

The primary function of the State Legislature, like the Union Parliament, is law- making. The State Legislature is empowered to make laws on State List and Concurrent List. The Parliament and the Legislative Assemblies have the right to make the laws on the subjects mentioned in the Concurrent List. But in case of contradiction between the Union and State law on the subject, the law made by the Parliament shall prevail. Bills are of two types—(a) Ordinary bills and (

Money bills. Ordinary bills can be introduced in either of the Houses (if the State Legislature is bicameral), but the Money bill is first introduced in the Vidhan Sabha. After the bill is passed by both Houses, it is sent to the Governor for his assent. The Governor can send back the bill for reconsideration. When this bill is passed again by the Legislature, the Governor has to give his assent. You have read when the Parliament is not in session and if there is a necessity of certain law, the President Issues Ordinance. Similarly, the Governor can issue an Ordinance on the State subjects when the legislature is not in session. The Ordinances have the force of law. The Ordinances issued are laid before the State Legislature when it reassembles. It ceases to be in operation after the expiry of six weeks unless rejected by the Legislature earlier. The Legislature passes a regular bill, to become a law, to replace the ordinance. This is usually done within six weeks after reassembly of Legislature. Financial powers : The State Legislature keeps control over the finances of the State. A money bill is introduced first only in the Vidhan Sabha. The money bill includes authorisation of the expenditure to be incurred by the government, imposition or abolition of taxes, borrowing, etc. The bill is introduced by a Minister on the recommendations of the Governor. The money bill cannot be introduced by a private member. The Speaker of the Vidhan Sabha certifies that a particular bill is a money bill. After a money bill is passed by the Vidhan Sabha, it is sent to the Vidhan Parishad. It has to return this NSOU ? CC-PS-02 285 bill within 14 days with, or without, its recommendations. The Vidhan Sabha may either accept or reject its recommendations. The bill is deemed to have been passed by both Houses. After this stage, the bill is sent to the Governor for his assent. case of the Parliament, if there is a disagreement between the two Houses over an ordinary bill, the President summons a joint sitting of both the Houses and if the bill is passed there by the majority of votes, the bill is taken as passed by both Houses of the Parliament. But this provision of joint sitting does not exist in the States. Although an ordinary bill can originate in either House of the State Legislature, yet both Houses have unequal powers. If a bill is passed in the Vidhan Sabha, it is transmitted to the Vidhan Parishad for consideration. When it is passed by Vidhan Parishad without any amendment, the bill is sent to the Governor for his assent. In case, the bill is (a) rejected by the Parishad or (b) more than three months elapsed without the bill being passed by the Parishad, or (c) bill is passed with an amendment to which the Vidhan Sabha does not agree, the Vidhan Sabha may pass the bill again in the same or the subsequent session. After that, the bill is again sent to the Vidhan Parishad. If the Vidhan Parishad does not return the bill within one month, the bill is deemed to have been passed by both Houses of the State Legislature and is sent to Governor for his assent. Thus the Vidhan Parishad can delay the bill for a maximum period of four months. On the other hand, if the bill is first passed by the Vidhan Parishad and rejected by the Vidhan Sabha, the bill is rejected and cannot become a law. Like in the Lok Sabha, money bill is introduced first in Vidhan Sabha. It cannot be initiated in the Vidhan Parishad. The Speaker of the Vidhan Sabha certifies whether a particular bill is a money bill. After the bill is passed in the Vidhan Sabha, it is sent to the Vidhan Parishad. The Vidhan Parishad gets 14 days to consider the bill. If the Parishad passes the bill, it is sent to the Governor for his assent. If the bill is not returned by the Vidhan Parishad within 14 days, it is deemed to have been passed by the Vidhan Parishad. If it suggests certain changes in the bill and sends to Vidhan Sabha, the Vidhan Sabha may accept or reject the changes suggested by the Parishad. The bill is then sent to the Governor for his assent who is bound to give his assent.

Only the elected members of the Vidhan Sabha are entitled to participate in the election of the President of India. The members of the Vidhan Sabha do so in their capacity as members of the Electoral College. But the members of the Vidhan Parishad are not entitled to vote in the election of the President. Members of the Rajya Sabha from each State are elected only by the members of the Assembly and not of the Council. The above NSOU ? CC-PS-02 287 discussion makes it clear that the Vidhan Parishad is a powerless and non influential House. It has become a secondary House. Thus many States prefer to have

The State Legislature consists of the Governor, the Legislative Council (Vidhan Parishad) and the Legislative Assembly (Vidhan Sabha). In most states, there are unicameral Legislatures. These State Legislatures consist of the Governor and the Legislative Assembly. The Parliament is empowered to set up or abolish the Vidhan Parishad in a State. The Vidhan Parishad is partly indirectly elected and partly nominated. It is a permanent House like the Rajya Sabha. It is never dissolved. The tenure of its members is six years. One-third

It is proposed that the Constitution should be amendable by a simple majority at NSOU ? CC-PS-02 343 least for some years. The argument is subtle and ingenious. It is said that this Constituent Assembly is not elected on adult suffrage while the future Parliament will be elected on adult suffrage and yet the former has been given the right to pass the Constitution by a simple majority while the latter has been denied the same right. It is walked as one of the absurdities of the Draft Constitution. I must repudiate the charge because it is without foundation. To know how simple are the provisions of the Draft Constitution in respect of amending the Constitution one has only to study the provisions for amendment contained in the American and Australian Constitutions. Compared to them those contained in the Draft Constitution will be found to be the simplest. The Draft Constitution has eliminated the elaborate and difficult procedures such as a decision by a convention or a referendum.... It is only for amendments

[1] PREFACE In a bid to standardize higher education in the country, the University Grants Commission (UGC) has introduced Choice Based Credit System (CBCS) based on five types of courses viz. core, discipline specific, generic elective, ability and skill enhancement for graduate students of all programmes at Honours level. This brings in the semester pattern, which finds efficacy in sync with credit system, credit transfer, comprehensive and continuous assessments and a graded pattern of evaluation. The objective is to offer learners ample flexibility to choose from a wide gamut of courses, as also to provide them lateral mobility between various educational institutions in the country where they can carry their acquired credits. I am happy to note that the University has been recently accredited by National Assessment and Accreditation Council of India (NAAC) with grade "A". UGC (Open and Distance Learning Programmes and Online Programmes) Regulations, 2020 have mandated compliance with CBCS for U.G. programmes of all the HEIs in this mode. Welcoming this paradigm shift in higher education, Netaji Subhas Open University (NSOU) has resolved to adopt CBCS from the academic session 2021-22 at the Under Graduate Degree Programme level. The present syllabus, framed in the spirit of syllabi recommended by UGC, lays due stress on all aspects envisaged in the curricular framework of the apex body on higher education. It will be imparted to learners over the six semesters of the Programme. Self Learning Materials (SLMs) are the mainstay of Student Support Services (SSS) of an Open University. From a logistic point of view, NSOU has embarked upon CBCS presently with SLMs in English / Bengali. Eventually, the English version SLMs will be translated into Bengali too, for the benefit of learners. As always, all of our teaching faculties contributed in this process. In addition to this, we have also requisitioned the services of best academics in each domain in preparation of the new SLMs. I am sure they will be of commendable academic support. We look forward to proactive feedback from all stakeholders who will participate in the teaching-learning based on these study materials. It has been a very challenging task well executed, and I congratulate all concerned in the preparation of these SLMs. I wish the venture a grand success.
Prof. (Dr.) Subha Sankar Sarkar Vice-Chancellor

Is to familiarise the learners with the meaning and evolution of the term freedom. ? They shall also be given a brief idea about the different conceptions of freedom and its critiques. 1.2 Introduction Liberty and freedom are often used interchangeably though for many, freedom refers to a situation while liberty symbolizes a state of mind. Berlin declares that the NSOU ? CC-PS-03 8 two words 'mean the same' but clarifies that liberty tends to be used in legal and political contexts while the term freedom is used in philosophical sense. A more appropriate difference is provided by Pitkin who being influenced by Arendt points out that while liberty implies protection from state interference, freedom generally means active involvement in politics. Freedom is a complex concept that contains within it two basic ideas, both independent and interdependent. One meaning of freedom is autonomy or rightful self-government. The other meaning is the overall ability to do or choose or achieve things that can be called 'optionality'. Freedom, may thus be defined as a quality of human being, as in only a human being as distinguished from other living beings, is capable of enjoying freedom. Freedom may also be defined as a quality of human being manifested in man's capacity for obtaining scientific knowledge of laws of nature and applying them for the benefit of mankind. In other words, human being's ability to gain scientific knowledge is the source of their freedom. Freedom may also be perceived as a human condition marking man's ability to fulfil his self-appointed goals and the state is not expected to interfere in this matter or should help in developing people's ability by setting up a welfare state.

1.3.1 Rousseau's concept of freedom Notion of free will and freedom forms the bedrock of western political theory and society. One of the earliest conceptions of freedom defines it as obedience to a higher authority espoused by collectivist thinkers of both left and right. The earliest exponent of this view is Rousseau, for whom true freedom consists in obeying the general will that is devoid of particularistic and selfish elements and expressed in a democratic assembly of equals. A deviant is compelled to obey the law or 'forced to be free'. An important prerequisite for his conception of freedom is a substantive measure of social and economic equality.

end of law is, not to abolish or restrain, but to preserve and enlarge freedom."

Locke gave an economic dimension to liberty when he explained labour as the unquestioned property of the labourer and said that each person

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 9 has the right to property by the virtue of his labour. He considered the relationship of individuals with the political authority as moral and deriving from God, who had created them and to whom they owe the duty to preserve themselves, thus explicitly excluding the freedom to kill one self or others or enslave others. Locke reiterated that personal independence – the right to live with dignity and with reasonable economic comfort is a fundamental human right. He emphasized on consent as the basis of legitimate political authority, thereby specifying the limits of political power and the ambit of personal liberty in a liberal society. He portrayed the liberal state as a minimal and constitutional state, based on rule of law.

1.3.3 Montesquieu and Adam Smith on freedom Montesquieu underlined the importance of safeguards like the written constitution, separation of powers, checks and balances, precise legal procedures, clear specification of crimes and independence of judiciary for the preservation of liberty. Adam Smith linked freedom with opulence, regarding the two "as the greatest blessings" that human being can possess. He held that true freedom is possible through commerce. He considered dependency as degrading, thereby equating freedom with independence.

1.3.4 Hegel's concept of freedom For Hegel, the state is always infallible and only the state knows what is in individual's interest. The state is divine and therefore, the individuals have no rights outside the state or against the state. Freedom of the individual lies in the complete obedience of the laws of the state. State is a super organism in which no one has any individual preferences different from those of the state. Real freedom of the individual can be realised only in the state.

1.3.5 Socialist and Marxist concept of freedom While the liberal view of freedom is essentially freedom from interference, the Marxist view drawing upon the philosophies of Spinoza, Rousseau, Kant and Hegel defines freedom as self-determination and as self-realization. It sees freedom as a removal of obstacles to human emancipation allowing the full flowering of the human powers. For the socialists, only when class divisions and wage labour based on private property leading to competitiveness and selfishness are abolished, a truly human society based on fellowship, love and cooperative instinct may be created. Only collective efforts can overcome such hurdles and freedom as self-determination, is collective in the sense, that there is an organized human effort over both nature and social conditions of production. To Marx and NSOU ? CC-PS-03 10 Engles, destruction of capitalism and creation of communist society embodies collective control, collective individuality and personal freedom. Marxist concern with a wider and richer view of freedom leads the Marxists to underestimate the nature and extent of civil and economic freedom that the individuals enjoy in liberal – capitalistic societies. Marx had very little faith in mechanisms like constitution, rule of law or charter of rights. He dismissed these as a façade of bourgeois exploitation and did not acknowledge even in limited sense, the protection they lend to individual against arbitrary rule and physical harm. The Marxists therefore tend to forget that these civil freedoms were earned as a result of centuries of unremitting popular struggles. Miliband, therefore, rightly pointed out that the task of Marxist politics should be to defend these freedoms; and to make possible their extension and enlargement by the removal of all sorts of obstacles. Socialists and Marxists of all shades regard economic freedom as primary and consider political and civil liberties to be possible only with the abolition of the class boundaries. Many western socialists argue that political freedom is valuable and ought to be coalesced with welfare measures. The socialists believe it is not the state, but rather economic exploitation that presents challenge to individual's self-realisation and material sufficiency. They profess a more deterministic view of human nature than liberals and deny a direct co- relationship between choice and freedom.

1.3.6 Anarchist notion of freedom The extreme left wing ideology, anarchism desires to do away with all forms of authority, whether that of a state, church or a parent, since authority and discipline, imposed from outside always curtail freedoms. Like the Marxists, the Anarchists too desire the abolition of state power after the destruction of capitalism and describe the post capitalist Anarchist society as being truly free. However, Anarchism remains untested in practice.

1.3.7 Libertarian notion of freedom Libertarianism considers subjective freedom as the highest social and political value. It believes in freeing people not only from traditional political institutions but also from the constraints imposed by the importance they attach and the power that they attribute to ineffectual practices and institutions namely, religion, family and social customs. Libertarians demand maximization of the realm of individual freedom and minimization of the scope of public authority.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 11 1.3.8 Feminist notion of freedom The feminists on the other hand accepts the intrinsic link between freedom and equality. The early liberal feminists like Wollstonecraft and Mary Astell used the idea of equality to demand recognition of women as human subjects with agency and intellect, an aspect which J.S.Mill later acknowledged. Contemporary feminism defines freedom as empowerment, requiring both negative liberty's absence of constraints and positive liberty's community assistance.

1.4 Safeguards of Liberty To preserve personal liberty in modern democratic state system many safeguards have been adopted. These safeguards have been won after long struggles against authoritarian rules. They are as follows:

- 1) Rule of Law- Professor Dicey has described the rule of law as the best safeguard of liberty. It means supreme importance of law and equal treatment of all according to the prevailing law. All the people are subject equally to the law of the land and within the state all are entitled to enjoy equal freedom. Nobody is above the law. The Marxists however emphasise that in order for the Rule of Law to be successful, economic inequalities must not persist.
- 2) Written Constitution- To safeguard individual liberty a written constitution, enshrining clearly the laws of the land is necessary. It should embody the fundamental rights and duties of the citizens. It must also include the provision of resort to court if the government encroaches upon people's fundamental rights. It is expected that the democratically elected governments would strictly function according to the rules enshrined in the constitution.
- 3) Independent and Neutral Judiciary- To protect the citizen's liberty a fair, independent and neutral judiciary is must. Especially, in the federal set up, a neutral judiciary ensures harmonious functioning of the central and state governments as is manifested in the United States of America. The American Supreme court has the power to declare any law that contravenes the constitution as ultra vires or unconstitutional.
- 4) Responsible Government- A democratically elected government, presence of a strong opposition and regular elections ensures that the governments do not misuse NSOU ? CC-PS-03 12 powers. A strong opposition and its constant surveillance and criticisms can ensure the growth of public opinion not favourably disposed to the government in power. In India, the imposition of emergency rule in 1975 by Mrs. Indira Gandhi and its criticism had subsequently led to the downfall of her government. 5) Separation of Powers- French philosopher Montesquieu, felt that separation of power was an important mechanism to safeguard individual liberty. Separation of Power implies that power of the three organs of the government, i.e., the legislature, executive and judiciary must be clearly demarcated and each organ should strictly function within the power assigned to it under the constitution. This mechanism was adopted in USA, France and Mexico. However, in practice it has been observed that complete separation is not feasible and many political scientists opine that it is not mandatory for safeguarding individual liberty. 6) Direct Democracy- As was evident in ancient Greece and in modern Switzerland, direct participation by the citizens in the affairs of the state like law making etc fosters individual liberty. In Switzerland, direct democracy is practiced through employment of methods as referendum, initiative and recall. However, in modern times, where countries have huge populations, direct democracy is not very practicable. 7) Alert Public- The more the citizens are conscious of their rights and are vigilant about the activities of the government the safer is their liberty. People must be collectively ready to fight for their freedoms. Indeed, the old saying remains true till date that 'eternal vigilance is the price of liberty'. 8) Decentralization of Power- Lord Acton had said, 'power corrupts and absolute power corrupts absolutely'. The more the power is concentrated in the hands of a government the more corrupt it becomes. Therefore, decentralization of power to the various tiers of government can act as a bulwark against corruption and encroachment of individual liberty. 9) Free Mass Media- Today we are witnessing the 'Information Society' or the 'Network Society'. The presence of internet has made possible wide circulation of information within a very short span of time. By mass media we mean the television, radio, newspapers and magazines along with the internet. The mass media is indeed the fourth pillar of democracy and can keep up constant surveillance on the governmental activities, thereby acting as a safeguard of individual liberty.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 13 10) Civil Society- For Hegel, the civil society is the link between the family and the state. Gramsci reiterated its importance by saying that the civil society acted as a sphere where hegemony is generated and internalised by the people thereby helping in the functioning of the state. Of late in modern democracies, civil societies act as a bulwark against the excesses of the state. At other times they aid in various functions of the state. The civil societies also act as a medium of educating the citizens about their democratic rights and duties. 1.5 Conclusion It can be safely concluded, that as long as the more experienced, more learned, competent and prudent manage the common affairs for common good, men do not lose their freedom in obeying commands. However, in actual practice it is often observed that, the strong, selfish and shrewd persons acquire dominant position and special privileges in the society. As a result, the society gets divided between the exploiter and the exploited, the dominant and the dependent groups. The privileged classes want to maintain the status quo, as it benefits them. Thus the privileged classes have always stood in defence of the status quo- or no change in the existing situation. It is only when the subjugated sections, become conscious of their oppression and rise in revolt against the dominant sections, demanding their freedom (economic, social and political) that the social change takes place. Freedom therefore has inspired many a revolution and has been a harbinger of social change. 1.6 Summing Up ? The terms liberty and freedom are often used inter- changeably. ? Freedom contains within it two basic ideas, one is autonomy or rightful self- government and the other is the ability to do or choose. ? Freedom may be defined as a human quality that seeks completion of human purposes by gaining mastery over nature. ? Freedom also means ability to fulfil one's self chosen goals ? For the liberals, freedom is only possible within the framework of laws and institutions. They prioritise political freedom above all other values.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 14 ? The Socialists and the Marxists accord supreme importance to economic freedom. They argue that without real economic freedom all other freedoms are meaningless. They further opine that only with the complete breakdown of the capitalist mode of production and the abolition of the class system shall true economic liberty be possible for all. ? The Anarchists oppose all forms of authority that are externally imposed from above, be it parental, religious and state's authority as they feel it is antithetical to freedom. ? The Feminists uphold the intrinsic link between freedom and equality and demand recognition of women as human subjects with similar agency and intellect like men. ? Rule of law, written constitution, independent and neutral judiciary, and responsible government, separation of power, direct democracy, alert public opinion, decentralized power, free mass media and active civil society are the vital safeguards of individual liberty.

1.7 Probable Questions Essay Type Questions : 1) Explore the idea of freedom as described by Hegel. 2) Elucidate on the Socialist and Marxist notion of freedom. 3) Describe the various safeguards of liberty. Long Questions : 1) Discuss the idea of freedom as explained by Rousseau. 2) Write a note on libertarian conception of freedom. 3) Can Locke be considered as a champion of Liberty? Explain. Short Questions : 1) Define the idea of freedom. 2) Explain the concept of General Will. 3) What do you understand by the term Separation of Powers?

2.1 Objectives ? To illustrate to the learners, the meaning of the term negative freedom and how it is intricately linked with negative liberty. ? The learners shall also be given an idea of the evolution of negative freedom by studying the ideas propounded by scholars like Hobbes, Locke, Bentham, J.S. Mill and contemporary theorists like Isaiah Berlin, Robert Nozick, Milton Friedman. 2.2 Introduction By negative liberty one usually understands the absence of restraints or absolute non- interference. Negative liberty is very closely associated with negative freedom. The question is: what is the actual extent of the area or the realm, where an individual is absolutely free

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 17 to do what he pleases, without any external interference? Perhaps, negative freedom is best understood in the words of Berlin, as he seeks answer to the question, 'Over what area am I master?' It basically rests on two basic premises; a) Each person knows his interests best. It is based upon the assumption that every individual is a rational agent capable of deliberations and making informed decisions. b) The state should not interfere unnecessarily in an individual's life, neither should it try to dictate ends and purposes to the individuals. 2.3 Basic features of negative freedom as enunciated by the liberals Liberal writers often use the term liberty and freedom interchangeably. For them, liberty is of supreme importance and they want all public policies to be solely guided by it. Of all forms of liberty, the liberals value the individual liberty above all. The essence of the liberal thought is perhaps best captured by the Atlantic Charter (1941) which contains the declaration of the 'Four Freedoms'. These are: freedom of speech, freedom of worship, freedom from fear and want. The first two freedoms embody the negative aspect of liberty, i.e., it prohibits or restricts the state from meddling in individual's life and preventing him from achieving life goals determined by him. The concept of negative liberty or freedom starts on the basic premise that the individual is the best judge of his interests and most capable of choosing his life goals. It evolved as a consequence of long struggle against the tyrannical and unjust powers of the state. The individual had to put up a long fight to carve a private sphere for himself, both in the economic and political sphere. Hobbes, Locke, Montesquieu, Bentham, Henry Sidgwick, Herbert Spencer, J.S. Mill are all classical theorists of the concept of negative liberty. In the contemporary times, the idea has again been brought to lime light by libertarian theorists like Hayek, Nozick and Milton Friedman. 2.4 Hobbes's concept of freedom Hobbes defined freedom as private pursuit of the individual, i.e., within the framework conceded by the state authority, where an individual is free to pursue his own life goals chosen by him. Though Hobbes vested a lot of importance to law, he defined liberty as whatever

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 18 the law permitted and to be operative in all the spheres where law is silent. Hobbes conceded that right to private beliefs or religion or conscience was beyond the realm of the state and the person should be free to choose whom and in what way to worship. However, Hobbes's 'all powerful Leviathan' retains the power to command his subjects to perform ceremonies that are necessary for public worship. 2.5 Locke, Bentham and Sidgwick's concept of freedom Locke too believed that an individual's right to life, liberty and property is very sacred, bestowed to him from the nature and the state has no right to interfere with these sacred rights, they were basically considered to be inviolable. The government according to Locke, is created for upholding and preserving these individual rights and is basically supposed to act as a trust. If the government fails to perform its duties, Locke conceded the right to resistance against it to the citizens. Bentham emphasized on the importance of law, for the conditions created by the law made it possible for the individuals to enjoy civil and political liberty. Through the enactment of civil laws, a legislator bestowed the right to property on the individuals, prevented unnecessary interference, simplified judicial proceedings and encouraged healthy economic competitiveness. By enacting a proper criminal code, by maintaining a reasonable police force and courts, legislator ensured that the people are free from crimes. In the realm of constitutional law, the legislator protects the individual against misrule, abuse and arbitrary exercise of power. Bentham felt social utility could provide the necessary balance between freedom and restraint. For Sidgwick, the value and sanctity of a contract is absolute. He argued that once an individual voluntarily enters a contract, the onus is on him to maintain it, even if it is inimical to his interests, as it demonstrates individual choice. It is also the duty of the state to enforce the contract, to ensure that it is honoured. Therefore, according to Sidgwick, a person's liberty may be considered to be the realm, where he is supreme to pursue his interests without pondering over its quality and consequences. 2.6 J.S. Mill's self-regarding and other regarding actions In J.S. Mill's writings we witness a transition from being a champion of negative liberty to that of positive liberty. He presented a very strong defence of individual liberty, manifested

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 19 in the freedom of thought and expression in his classic book, On Liberty (1859). Mill strongly advocated a person's right to his freedom and brooked no interference from the society. He wanted to accede the greatest amount of freedom for the pursuit of individual's creativities and wanted to keep free all channels of individual's avenues for self-development. To strike a harmonious balance between the individual and interests of the community, he came up with a novel concept of self-regarding and other regarding actions. Mill described as self-regarding action these activities which solely affect the individual himself, in which his freedom was absolute. The sphere, where he had supreme control over his own body and mind. By other regarding actions he meant those actions which impacted other individuals of the community. J.S. Mill realised that external coercion did more harm than good and as he judged individuals to be the best judge of their interests and perceived the individuals to be diverse in their needs and capacities, he felt complete freedom in the individual sphere was necessary for the full blossoming of their personality and development of their rational and deliberative capacities. However, he circumscribed individual's liberty by accepting reasonable interference on the part of the society to prevent harm to other people. Mill was such an ardent supporter of freedom of thought and expression that he believed that a person should also possess the right to express incorrect opinions through free exchange of ideas and dialogues. In this way the individuals could contribute to the great advances of the society. The early liberals value liberty for the sake of efficient government, whereas for J.S. Mill, liberty is priceless for its intrinsic good. It helps in the development of moral, rational, capable persons and also helps in creating an efficient society. Mill got perturbed by witnessing the spirit of conformity prevalent in Victorian Britain and got apprehensive of tyranny and intolerance of the majority. He considered it to be a singular threat to individual liberty. He advocated absolute liberty of conscience, belief and expression as essential to human progress. He ardently believed that liberty and individuality was only possible in a free society. Mill extended liberty to only mature individuals and withheld it from children, invalids, mentally handicapped and barbarian societies. Negative liberty had played an instrumental role in the development of capitalism in Europe. Its exponents were the liberal-individualists who emerged as the spokesperson of the newly emerging bourgeois class and sought to establish a laissez faire or free economy against the mercantile policies of the state. They demanded liberty in the form of freedom of contract, trade and enterprise along with the free play of the market forces, amenable to only the laws of demand and supply. The state was perceived as a necessary evil, tolerated as it protected the people and their property from the attacks of others. J. S. Mill

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 20 had started his political journey as an advocate of laissez faire individualism and negative liberty but he was quick to comprehend the harm it unleashed as it paved the way for economic exploitation of the poor by the rich and he realised that state intervention was necessary for the upliftment of these backward sections of society. Popper too defined freedom as non-interference and felt the aim of the public policy should be to absolve people of avoidable suffering rather than to promote happiness. 2.7 Hayek's concept of freedom Friedrich Hayek, the Austrian –British economist, used the term liberty and freedom interchangeably and placed it above all other ideals. To Hayek, liberty was a negative concept as it implied the absence of all obstacles created by other men. He defined liberty as a state where man is not subject to coercion by the 'arbitrary will of another'. Hayek considered law and liberty to be consistent. He wanted individuals to be guaranteed equality under law, freedom from arbitrary arrests, right to own private property, accompanied by freedom of movement, freedom to select one's own profession etc. He did not support the idea of governmental interference under the pretext of increasing individual freedom nor did he support the idea of inner freedom, associated with the conceptions of positive liberty. Hayek, pointed out in his book, Constitution of Liberty, that law, liberty and property are inseparable and gave a picture of liberal society that minimises coercion and deliberate interference and guarantees material benefits to its citizens through safety nets outside the market. Hayek explained that as the conception rests on the premise of law, therefore when people obey laws, in the sense of general abstract rules, they are not subject to other's will and are in fact free. 2.8 Nozick's conception of freedom In his Anarchy, State and Utopia, Nozick follows Locke's method and claims that all individuals had inherited certain rights from the state of nature. People used to hire protective associations for safeguarding their property and with time, the most dominant among them emerged as the state. To Nozick, acquisition or transfer of property without force or fraud is just and he argues out that the state exists to protect the property rights of the individuals. He advocates for a minimal state that would not try to redistribute wealth among the

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 21 citizens. Nozick felt that the people differ in their talents and efforts so it would not be just to interfere in properties acquired by them under the guise of removing social inequalities as it would kill initiative and the urge to progress. 2.9 Milton Friedman on freedom Milton Friedman, in his seminal work, Capitalism and Freedom, identified capitalism as a necessary condition of freedom. He defines freedom as the absence coercion on man by his fellow beings. He suggests that a 'free private enterprise. exchange economy' or 'competitive capitalism' is both direct components of freedom and a necessary though not sufficient condition of political freedom. His disdain for equality is amply manifested in his conception of freedom. He emphasizes that to enhance individual's freedom, the governments should only be allowed to handle those matters which the free market will not be able to handle. In Friedman's scheme of things, the state was only required to supplement the market society and nothing else. 2.10 Berlin's exposition of negative freedom Berlin defined negative liberty as the opportunity to act and not the action itself. He propounded an 'opportunity concept of freedom' which lays more importance on availability rather than exercise of opportunity. The main problem with this conception is its indifference to action. It does not distinguish between one's desire to write poetry and to kill himself. Berlin describes negative liberty as presence between alternatives. For Berlin, negative liberty has three characteristics. First, it implies freedom from interference with regard to one's capacity to choose and absence of restraints. Berlin is of the opinion that the individual is the best judge of his interests and must be free to pursue his desires without any interference from others. Negative liberty may be understood best by asking two pertinent questions, i.e., freedom from what and whom. Berlin described negative liberty as freedom from any form of interference. He felt that the concept of negative liberty is distinctively modern concept and its second distinct feature is its emphasis on autonomy. He opined that it is most amenable to the liberal concerns of diversity and toleration. Negative liberty also concerns itself with deliberative acts of omissions and interventions. Described as choice among options, 'unhindered by any form of obstacles, it is debatable as to what may be regarded as a hindrance. Berlin's third proposition with regard to

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 22 negative liberty is of supreme significance for it emphasises that negative liberty is not incompatible with certain forms of autocracy nor is it intricately linked with the concept of democracy and self-government. Berlin aptly pointed that negative liberty or freedom to choose is an inalienable trait of a human being and essential for his self-development. 2.11 Conclusion It can be thus concluded that the concept of negative liberty or freedom is an offshoot of liberal traditions, which firmly believes that individual is ultimately the best judge of his interests and therefore he should be left free to choose and pursue his life goals without unnecessary interference or hindrance from others. It emerged at a very important historical juncture, when the power was slipping away from the hands of feudal lords and industrial revolution was taking place in Europe marking the emergence of the bourgeois class. It was a time of massive social, political, scientific and religious transformations. Enthused by the happenings of renaissance, reformation, man basked in his new found confidence and learned to value the virtue of his new found freedom above all. The concept of negative liberty thus evolved through the writings of great scholars like Hobbes, Locke, Montesquieu, Bentham and Sidgwick. They made a powerful plea for the individual's private space, where his decision would be supreme, both in the political and economic spheres. The two world wars and the great economic depression had tarnished its value. It witnessed further decline with the rise of Keynesian welfare state, however of late, popularized again through the writings of libertarian scholars like Hayek, Nozick and Friedman. There is again a renewed emphasis on individualism, negative liberty and demand for the curtailment of the state powers. The libertarians reiterate the supreme significance of human freedom and firmly believe that the man is best judge of his interests and should therefore be left free to pursue his chosen life goals. They profess a very limited role for the state and posit that government is best which interferes least except promoting and protecting property rights and commercial interests of the individual. 2.12 Summing Up ? Liberals use negative liberty and freedom interchangeably. ? Negative freedom emphasises absence of restraints or non-interference

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 23 ? Hobbes, defined freedom as the private pursuit of the individual, which implies that each person can create his own conception of freedom. ? Locke emphasised that the right to life, liberty and property was derived from the state of nature and was sacred and inviolable. Governments were created to preserve these liberties of man. ? Central to Bentham's understanding of civil and political liberty is the security that the legislator secures through law, making it possible for the individual to enjoy liberty. ? 3.1 Objectives ? The main aim is to help the students grasp the idea of positive freedom by familiarizing them with the writings of positive freedom theorists as J.S.Mill, Marxists and the Neo Marxists. ? The section shall also endeavour to familiarize the students with the conception of freedom as development as enunciated by C.B.Macpherson and Amartya Sen. 3.2 Introduction Positive liberty signifies the freedom 'to do' certain things and pursuing of rational goals and ends. It assumes that the individuals possess a higher self and a lower self. For positive liberty to blossom, the higher rational self should prevail over the lower self. Its essence is wonderfully captured in Berlin's words, "The positive sense of the word 'liberty' derives from the wish on the part of the individual to be his own master...I wish above all, to be conscious of myself, as a thinking, willing, active being...", bearing responsibility for his choices and able to explain them by reference to his own ideas and purposes. Therefore, it implies not only freedom from external interference but also the idea of self-mastery where the higher self is expected to be in command of the lower self. Unlike negative liberty, it is also amenable to the idea of directing the individual by the law or elite. It surmises that as long as the law directs the individuals to rational ends and goals it does not oppress them, it can act as an agent of liberation. 3.3 J. S. Mill's concept of positive liberty Positive freedom builds upon the idea of collective control over common life. It is acknowledged that it might involve certain degree of coercion, however it is justified by the larger social good expected to be gained. J.S.Mill compared the development of an individual to that of a plant and firmly believed that individuals like the plants must be allowed to develop independently of their own accord following their inner logic. J.S.Mill opined that personal growth must be innate, i.e., it must emanate from within the individual and must never be externally imposed. Though, the emphasis on non-interference portrayed Mill to be a negative liberty theorist, later he realised that it resulted in the suppression of the economically vulnerable classes and with time changed his stance. He later acknowledged that certain amount of external interference could be permitted if it resulted in cultivation of certain desirable faculties in man. He also believed in elite guidance as he felt the educated were better endowed to guide the rest. This opened the possibility of projecting him as a propagator of positive liberty too. 3.4 Marxist notion of positive liberty The Marxists believe that common good can only be achieved by creating socio- economic conditions conducive to the enjoyment of freedom within the society. These conditions involve material means of satisfaction of wants and opportunity for self-development. The key to freedom lies in establishing a just system of production that shall ensure equitable distribution of goods for the satisfaction of everybody's needs. The Marxists opine that the capitalist mode of production is not at all conducive to the conditions of human freedom. It is characterized by constraint or necessity. Necessity denotes conditions under which the life of man is governed by the laws of nature, which exist independently of man's will. Engels aptly pointed out in his Anti Duhring, '...Freedom does not consist in any dream of independence from natural laws, but in the knowledge of these laws...'. Engels further felt that it applied to both the external laws of nature and our internal laws. He thus wrote, 'Freedom, therefore consists in the control over ourselves and over our external nature...'. The Marxists came up with a scientific analysis of forces of production which revealed that only socialization of the means of production can help society to tide over the crisis created by inequality and various 'non freedoms'. Marx, in his Economic and Philosophic Manuscripts, laid down the foundation of ethical basis of socialism and the humanist foundations of freedom. He was very critical of capitalism for its dehumanizing effects. He felt the capitalist system deformed the productive capacity in various ways. It transformed men into mere machines and made it emotionally impossible for him to relate to his family, friends, work, creation and nature. Only by replacing the unjust and dehumanizing capitalist mode of production, with the socialist system of production could the true conditions of freedom be achieved. 3.5 Mercuse's concept of positive liberty Herbert Marcuse, a self-professed Marxist, gave a brilliant analysis of the problem of freedom as was being witnessed in the contemporary Western world. In his seminal work, One Dimensional Man: Studies in the Ideology of Advanced Industrial Society, Marcuse studied in depth the causes of alienation in the contemporary western society. He felt that capitalism alongside its monopolistic control of means of production and distribution was also manipulating the mass media (i.e. the television, radio, newspapers, magazines, movies etc) and creating senseless and unending desire for commodities that are really not required for men's inner development or true purposes of life. Consumer capitalism through its emphasis on swanky goods and by linking them with social prestige is in fact blinding man to the original causes of their discontent. It is creating an unbidden desire for trivial material things thereby

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 28 dampening the urge for genuine freedom. The alienated human beings are actually unaware of their alienation. Mercuse felt, these slumbering and indifferent masses should first be awakened and made to comprehend their alienation before putting them back on the path to achieve actual freedom. According to Mercuse, true emancipation means to free people from unnecessary social, political and legal restrictions that are considered to be degrading and unnecessary. The Neo Marxists point out that in modern times though the workers in the factories are legally free they are in reality bounded by the unjust market conditions. The Neo Marxists stresses on the mindless consumerism that capitalism has unleashed. It is manifested in situations where people might not have enough to eat but they are bent on buying costly mobile phones or other electronic gadgets. All the shades of Marxists possess one common belief, that the overthrow of capitalism can only create the conditions of true freedom. In the modern times there is much talk about the emancipation of women as throughout the world they are subject to many forms of legal, social and moral bondage. The subaltern groups, in the various parts of the world are too awaiting their emancipation. The Indian constitution has reserved seats in various government educational institutions and jobs as well as other political institutions for the adequate representation of these marginalised groups. The idea of 'freedom as development' opposed to the libertarian view of freedom, contemplates a situation in which the disadvantaged sections of the society would be able to improve the quality of their lives by the means of their talents and efforts. It does not seek the mercy of the rich for the poor, but it wants to create avenues of self-development for the deprived sections, so that they can lead a life of dignity and self-esteem, while pursuing the course of their self-development. The idea of freedom as development finds best expression in the writings of two famous political theorists, C.B. Macpherson and Amartya Sen.

3.6 C. B. Macpherson's Idea of positive freedom C.B. Macpherson, a Canadian political philosopher, who does not claim to be a Marxist but is one of the most vocal critique of capitalism, opined that developmental power denotes a person's ability to use his own capacities for the fulfilment of his NSOU ? CC-PS-03 29 self-appointed goals. In the capitalist society by possessing the material power, the rich can effectively buy the manual and intellectual capacities of the others for their self-benefit. So, the working class, who do not possess control over the means of production can only benefit if they win developmental power for themselves. According to Macpherson, developmental power denotes the power of a person to develop his true human capacities. Examples of such capacities are capacity for rational deliberation, moral judgement and action, aesthetic and artistic activity and the capacity for materially productive labour. The concept of developmental power treats the individual as a 'doer and a creator'. It signifies that a person should not face any constraints or impediments while developing his human capacities or self-determined goals. Macpherson identified three impediments to the enhancement of a person's developmental power: a) lack of adequate means of life; b) lack of access to the means of labour; c) lack of protection against invasion by others. Macpherson is of firm conviction, that these problems cannot be solved within the framework of market society. He suggested that the solution to these problems can be found in a new system which would combine the protection of civil liberties with the socialist mode of production.

3.7 Amartya Sen's concept of 'freedom as development' Amartya Sen came up with the 'capabilities approach' to champion the cause of everybody's share in the process and fruits of development. This approach insists on allocation of various goods and other benefits according to differential human capabilities of its beneficiaries. Each person is to be given adequate additional resources to enable him to develop his capabilities so that he can lead a respectable social life. The impact of this approach has been so pervasive that it got reflected in the United Nations Development Programme, which adopted certain 'capability indicators' to gauge human development in various parameters. Sen lamented that while the world is witnessing flourishing of wealth, improved life styles and the ideals of political liberty has gained wide recognition and acceptance

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 30 complimented by the values of democracy and human rights, a vast section of the humanity is still immersed in the sea of deprivation and denied elementary freedom. They remained shackled in the chains of poverty, social deprivation, and political tyranny. The world is still held hostage to famines, widespread hunger, violation of human rights, degradation of environment and ill treatment of women. People struggle to get access to clean potable water, children are dying due to malnutrition, and high maternal mortality is still a social reality. Sen persuasively argued that freedom is the ultimate goal of all the social and economic arrangements and the most efficient means of realizing general welfare. Sen posited that the various social institutions like the market, political parties, legislatures, judiciary and media contribute to the development of man by enhancing his freedom and these are in turn sustained by the social values. Sen, tried to link values, institutions, development and freedom in an elaborate analytical framework.

Development in this sense refers to the removal of various types of unfreedoms that leave people with little choice and opportunity of exercising their potential combined with the faculty of reason. Therefore, in Sen's view, political and cultural factors apart from the economic criteria comprise significant criteria of freedom. In short, Sen equated freedom with the notion of social justice. 3.8 Conclusion Positive freedom or liberty is thus self-mastery, where the individual's higher self has full control over his lower self and man's transient irrational desires are subordinated to his genuinely rational desires. Positive freedom may also be defined as the condition, where the individuals lacks the means of pursuing his self-appointed goals, and the state comes to play a positive role by helping him develop those capacities by providing means as education, employment, health care, means of recreation, cultural development and so on. Positive freedom therefore includes the idea of collective control over common life. While it might involve a certain degree of coercion, it is usually justified by the larger good involved. However, many liberals, including Berlin has warned that the idea of positive liberty carries with it a danger of authoritarianism.

The students will be familiar with the different types of equality like the formal equality, political equality and equality of opportunity. 4.2 Introduction Equality has occupied a pivotal position in the history of moral and political philosophy and Aristotle had warned rightly that it had been a cause of many a wars.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 35 According to Richard Henry Tawney, who was greatly influenced by Rousseau, felt that inequality was very easy and it was akin to floating with the tide, whereas, equality was much more difficult as it was like swimming against the tide. Sartori, described equality as a protest par excellence, for it epitomised and stimulated revolt against fate and chance, against accidental disparity, which crystallised privilege and unjust power. Equality is a very complex concept, implying on the one hand sameness and justice on the other. One should comprehend at the outset that demands for equality never embodies desire for absolute equality. In the demand for equality, there is a burning desire to undo the social and economic disparities that has been caused by unjust social arrangements, without disrespecting the natural differences in human capacities and talents. Sushila Ramaswamy pointed out, that the concern of most political theories is how to create equality while accepting the natural inequalities and to try and ensure equality without violating on infringing on liberty and individuality. 4.3 Liberal notion of Equality Ancient societies were very divided and unequal. It regarded some as more equal than the rest. Equality never implied sameness in various capacities or abilities, as manifested in intelligence, wealth, social status and power. The modern era with its emphasis on rationality makes people comprehend that man in reality differs little, it is the situation or the circumstances which creates the difference. Despite the differences in human beings pertaining to their physical features and mental endowments, it is still claimed that ‘all are created equal’. This claim is elucidated by Hobbes who felt that in spite of the natural differences in physical powers and mental endowments, all were equal in their ability and also equal in being able to attain the ends they aspired for. He aptly pointed out, that even the weakest among men is capable of killing the strongest by the use of his cunning. Rousseau, on his Discourses on the Origin of Inequality, pointed out two types of inequalities observed in social life. One was natural inequality, created by nature that made some men stronger, intelligent, and benevolent than others. Apart from it was

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 36 the conventional inequality, which was created by man himself, which was reflected in the differences of social wealth, prestige and glory. Recognition of this conventional man made inequalities provided for the scope to review the basis of social distinctions and to restructure social relations according to the new concepts of social justice. Rousseau’ thoughts inspired the French

The Stoics and Cicero advanced a claim to equality on the basis of common human nature. The natural rights theorists advanced a case for equal rights on the basis of equal ability of all to understand their rights and obligations thereby mounting an attack on the paternalistic governments. Ideas of Kantians, Marxists and Tawney on Equality The Kantians defends the proposition of equal moral worth of each individuals stressing on the need to treat each individual as ends in themselves and not as means only. They presume that being of equal moral worth, each individual is capable of formulating and adhering to moral laws. The Marxists accept equality on the basis of labour that each human being is capable of rendering and their power to reproduce their own species. Exponents of equality like Tawney, emphasised on the need of various social institutions to accentuate and reinforce the 'common humanity' that unites people. 4.6 Idea of Formal Equality When applying the principle of equality to the various spheres of social life we come across various forms of equality. For instance, when all people are subject to NSOU ? CC-PS-03 37 similar rule, without any form of discrimination it is a manifestation of formal equality. For example, people forming a queue to buy movie tickets. They stand according to their turn. Nobody is differentiated on the basis of caste, class, gender, social class, ethnicity etc. It is essential to distinguish between formal and substantive equality. While formal equality implies absence of any form of discrimination in making things available to all, substantive equality reserves certain benefits for the weaker and deprived sections with lesser effort or at lesser cost. When the facilities of education, medical benefits, transportation and entertainment are open to all who can afford to pay for it, it is an example of formal equality. When the state pays scholarships to the needy students or provides free medical facilities and vaccines to the poor, it is an example of substantive equality. Broadly speaking, both legal as well as political equality comes within the purview of formal equality. 4.7 Idea of Political Equality We shall now concentrate on political equality. It denotes equality of political rights of the citizens. It is manifested in the demand for equal rights for all to vote and select their own representatives and to be elected to various public offices. It therefore stresses that nobody shall be debarred from voting or holding public offices on the

etc. It further demands that there shall be no privileged classes and the rules would not bestow special favours to any particular class in the society. Political equality is based on the assumption that all men are rational being capable of making deliberations and informed choices irrespective of their physical and mental capabilities, educational qualifications etc. It also proceeds from the assumption that when equal political rights are extended to all individuals they will be able to attain general welfare and shall be able to prevail over the policy makers to make laws securing common good. The demand for political equality originated along with legal equality and was undifferentiated in the beginning. D. D. Raphael pointed out that when the French revolutionaries were demanding equal rights they were in fact demanding political equality as they were demanding removal of special privileges confined to the wealthy and the propertied. Of late, political equality has come to encompass universalization of franchise, equal democratic rights of the citizens, equal freedom to hold and

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 38 express political opinions without fear and favour along with equal right to form associations to influence political decisions. In fact, the desire for political equality led to the establishment of democracy with its emphasis on equal human rights in the western world. However, only political equality seemed hollow and meaningless without being accompanied by socio-economic equality. It had been anticipated by Alexis de Tocqueville, who realised that only political equality without accompanying socio-economic equality would not be acceptable. He had predicted that the democratic revolution, would be followed by a second phase, marked by the struggle between haves and the have not's. Thus Tocqueville had anticipated the growth of socialist and Marxist theories, whose sole aim is to correct the prevailing socio-economic injustices and disparities. 4.8 Idea of Equality of Opportunity Equality of opportunity is mostly associated with the liberal democratic tradition. It implies that access to important social institutions shall remain open to all on universalistic grounds. It would be prudent to distinguish between equality of opportunity and that of outcome. Equality of outcome is the demand of hardcore egalitarians, since men differ not only in their family and social backgrounds, but also in terms of their talents and efforts. Equal distribution of rewards is bound to kill the incentive among the more meritorious. This would end up in lesser production and lower level of excellence, ultimately resulting in the impoverishment of the society. This line of argument compels people to favour 'equality of opportunity' to 'equality of outcome'. The American and French revolution gave further impetus to the demand of a career open to talent. They favoured acquired status i.e., administrative and professional positions open to all with talent irrespective of their birth and family status, over ascribed status. Plato may be heralded as the earliest exponent of this theory, as he proposed meritocracy in the form of philosophic rule, which was to be realised through an educational system that was to provide equal chance to the talented children of all classes to achieve unequal social positions. The debate on equality of opportunity has also helped in the development of modern educational institutions

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 39 and meritocracy that recruits and promotes people on the basis of their intelligence and talent regardless of their family connections and wealth. O. P. Gauba argues that the principle of equality of opportunity may be applied in two distinct situations. A) a competitive situation and B) a non-competitive situation. In a competitive situation, equality of opportunity implies access to scarce good or prize. In a non-competitive situation, it implies equal access to essential goods and services depending on one's ability and effort. Success in any field, like law, medicine, academics is its example. In a competitive situation, all the competitors should be placed in identical or near identical situations. For example, all the sprinters have to undergo compulsory drug tests to ascertain they have not taken drugs and are therefore not gaining undue advantage. In a non-competitive situation, all participants should get a minimum support plus 'separate plus equal' facilities to prove their worth. Advocates of equal opportunity argue that the government's task is to create equal opportunities for its citizens. It is up to the individual to decide, whether to use an opportunity or discard it. Equality of opportunity is not likely to result in equality of outcome. In short, equality of opportunity calls for creating conditions in which everyone has the same starting point or equal life chances. It seeks to reduce impact of inequalities attached to social, cultural and economic backgrounds of various persons but agrees to give them differential rewards according to their differential talents, skills and efforts. It also implies that those who had a poor start in life because of long standing social inequalities, to be given some special concession, such as waiver in educational fees, relaxation of age limits in case of competitive exams and promotions or reservation of seats or posts. It wants constructive and effective steps to be taken by the state to ensure educational and cultural development of the marginalized sections of the society along with their economic upliftment. In this way, equality of opportunity calls for extending the process of 'equalizing' to the roots of our society. 4.9 Conclusion Equality is one of the most prominent ideals of the present world. Liberty and equality together describe the conditions of human emancipation. Together they

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 40 represent the voice of the oppressed. Equality is more of a prescriptive term than a descriptive one. It basically upholds the faith that since the physical, emotional and intellectual needs of all men are similar, hence all must be treated equally. It presupposes the equal moral worth of all individuals. There are various dimensions of equality. The notion of formal equality treats everyone equally, irrespective of the differences in the people's background. It implies application of similar rules to all persons, without any discrimination. Legal and political equality are its components. Legal equality grants equal legal status to all irrespective of the differences in their birth, physical and mental capacities and other differences. Political equality grants every one the right to vote someone into public office and the right to compete for the office. Political equality has been achieved after a long struggle. At present there are no discriminations in respect of voting right in a democratic state based on gender, social back ground and property considerations. Equality of opportunity is usually associated with the liberal democratic tradition. It implies in principle that access to important social institutions shall be open to all universally giving recognition to achievement and talent. It gained popularity during the American and French revolutions. It has helped in the growth of modern educational institutions based on meritocracy, as people are now recruited and promoted on the basis of their talent regardless of their family connections and wealth. It is to be noted, however, that equality mostly means equality of condition and not that of outcome. Ironically, the more is the equality of condition the more is the inequality in outcome, exemplified by the existence of the richest families in the world. To change the scenario, the need of the hour is sweeping governmental policies and actions.

4.10 Summing Up ? Equality is a complex concept, encompassing two components. In one sense it implies sameness or identity and in another sense justice.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 41 ? It seeks to undo the large varieties of socio-economic disparities prevalent. ? Hobbes was of the opinion that all men were equal as even the weakest had the ability and the cunning to kill the strongest. ? Stoics and Cicero forwarded the case for equality on the basis of common human nature. ? The Utilitarian's believed that all human beings have equal capacity for experiencing pain and pleasure and so should be regarded as equals. ? The Kantians believed that all the individuals were of equal moral worth and therefore should be treated as ends in themselves. ? The Marxists too accept the equality of human essence that is manifested in labour and people's capacity to reproduce themselves. ? There are many dimensions of equality. Under formal equality all the people are treated equally, i.e., same rule is applied to all despite the differences in their back ground. ? Political equality has been won after prolonged struggle. It implies the right to vote someone into office and the right to stand for office oneself. ? Equality of opportunity is associated with the liberal democratic traditions. ? It implies that access to all important social institutions shall be open to all on universalistic ground on the basis of achievement and talent.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 44 5.2 Introduction Egalitarianism is a political philosophy that favours equality of some sort: that people should be treated as equals in certain aspects. Egalitarianism presumes that all human beings are equal in their moral worth and it derives inspiration from the Christian notion that God loves all human being equally. Reduction of inequalities may be considered as the primary aim of equality. However, despite its attractions, uniformity cannot be the end of equality as it militates against what people deserve by way of differential talents, skills, occupations and efforts. Uniformity can at best be applied to procedures to ensure they are free. The egalitarians stress that equality is sometimes required in order to be fair. For example, if there are benefits and burdens to distribute, then other things being equal, it is unfair to distribute them unequally. Secondly, the egalitarians hold that equality is necessary for self-respect. People may belong to different positions in society; however, that should not have a bearing on how they perceive each other. Thirdly, equality enjoins a duty to show respect to others. Showing equal respect implies recognizing that all people have capacities to deliberate for themselves and to engage in activities and relationships that are considered intrinsically valuable. Lastly, it is an important means to foster fraternity. Egalitarians argue that conditions of equality induce some measure of solidarity among the inhabitants of a society by removing systemic barriers to social intercourse thereby promoting greater social cohesion.

5.3 Early liberal's conception of Equality Hobbes and Locke defend human equality as a foundational concept. Hobbes succinctly pointed out that human beings not only aspires for similar things but are equal in their capacities to achieve them. Locke believed that all individuals inherited equal natural rights from the state of nature, i.e., the right to life, liberty and estate. However, things changed with the introduction of money. Locke believed these rights to be inalienable. Bernard Mandeville, Hume and Kant defend inequality on the ground that it produces talent and that leads to progress. Kant on the contrary upholds the equal moral worth of the individuals. Adam Smith accepted the deepening of social inequality as a consequence of capitalism; however, he ignores it as he is overwhelmed by the notion of economic growth and development. However, Smith recommended that the state maintain public works and public institutions, thus providing for a generous and compassionate government compatible with the competitive market economy.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 45 Social Darwinism with its belief in the survival of the fittest encourages the inegalitarian tendency as it postulates that some individuals are inferior and offering any protection or compensation to them, weakens the society as a whole. Fascism and Nazism borrow heavily from social Darwinism to justify their policies of racial purification and extermination. Going back to the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, a number of theorists wrote about the historical foundations of the human inequality, prominent among them were Rousseau, Ferguson and Miller.

5.4 Rousseau on Inequality Rousseau attacked the modern society as highly unequal one. He pleaded for equality as a basic moral value and regarded natural equality and compassion as the bases of natural rights. To Rousseau, civilization, made possible by the discovery of metals and agriculture had a corrupting influence on the individuals. Rousseau was very critical of modern civilization as he felt it was a highly unequal one that reinforced not only natural inequalities but also artificial inequalities. Rousseau pointed out two categories of inequalities. The first is the natural inequality between the young and the old, weak and strong, intelligent and the foolish. The second is the one that resulted from rewarding those who render special service to the community. Rousseau jeered at the idea that social inequalities were a reflection of natural inequalities of talents. Rousseau wanted all to enjoy equality of respect as human beings. He went beyond equality of opportunity and believed that certain benefits like basic education, medical care and legal services must be made equally available to all. Rousseau rejected wealth and power as principles of distribution. In similar vein, Ferguson argued that specialization of professions degraded lower segments of commercial society and threatened to morally corrupt the upper echelons. Miller too was sceptical about the moral consequences of commerce.

5.5 The Early Socialist and Marxist notion of Inequality The early socialists argued for the abolition of property rights since all individuals have an equal right to wealth of the earth. They perceived private property as a source of inequality and the likes of Plato, Moore and Winstanley demanded its abolition and replacement by common ownership. St. Simon was an exception. He did not recognize equality as an ideal. He comprehended the hierarchic nature of the industrial- scientific society and regarded the scientists and industrialists as persons of special excellence. He was against levelling and accepted differentiation in terms of distribution

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 46 of material rewards as a feature of the new society thus anticipating contemporary arguments on just meritocracy. Marx regarded inequality not as an outcome of personal defects or attributes like laziness or thrift but as a characteristic of the society as a whole. He too firmly believed that inequality arose with the institution of private property. Marx and Engels firmly believed that primitive societies were communal and the subsequent ones exploitative because of the rise of private property. Therefore, Marx and Engels envision the future communist society to be property less and thereby classless and equal.

5.6 Weber and Tawney's conception of Inequality Weber, presented an alternative to the Marxist view by accepting social stratification and hierarchy as functionally necessary and inevitable. He pointed out that the social classes do not arise from the underlying modes of production but from the distribution, consumption and the market. Weber recognized the existence of multiple classes. He did not agree that differences in power and prestige were a reflection of the differences in property and economic wealth. Neither did he accept that social inequality and conflict arose from the economic factors. He accepted inequality as a feature of all human societies as groups and individuals have been struggling for scarce resources from times immemorial. Tawney was critical of both the capitalist and socialist ideals as he felt they lacked a moral basis. He believed that the claim of equality rested on the idea of common humanity and on equal moral worth of all the individuals. Common humanity never emphasised equal capacity or equal potential but put its faith that all the human beings shared a fundamental moral equality as under god they all suffered from equal limitations. Therefore, equality for Tawney denotes a basic value and not a distributive ideal. He proposed radical democratisation of society and dispersal of power. He further pointed out that greater dispersal of power was only possible through greater social and economic equality. Interestingly, he came up with the suggestion, that the talented should use their talent in the service of the working class, an idea that Rawls later integrated and developed in his theory of justice.

5.7 Rawlsian Paradigm The Rawlsian paradigm has revived the quintessential debate on equality versus inequality, in modern political theory. Rawls acknowledged that strict equality was NSOU ? CC-PS-03 47 inefficient and that inequality was an unavoidable truth of the society. The most innovative part of his theory was that he felt inequality was justified if it led to the elevation of the worst off. His effort was to justify the level of morally acceptable inequalities within the advanced affluent societies with a pragmatic approach to achieve tangible, substantive and long term equality. Through his famous 'maxmin' or the difference principle he aims not at the mere guarantee that the poor will remain above the social minimum, but rather advocates elevation of the life prospects of the least well off. Rawls was significantly influenced by Kant and believed that all individual talents and aptitudes have a social origin. He believes that the liberal idea of equality of opportunity applied to people with extraordinary abilities, ignoring the ordinary. Through the second part of his second principle, he tried to uplift those disadvantaged by birth and social circumstances. His brilliant idea combined together the principles of growth and equality. Nozick rejected Rawlsian argument that the better off would accept and cooperate to elevate the worst off. He was against the talented being taxed to sponsor the needy as he felt it would dampen individual efforts to achieve more success. Hayek reiterated the classical liberal formulation that inequalities due to inheritance, upbringing and education as permitted by the ideal of liberty was designed to benefit the society as a whole. Inequality, they believe is good in itself.

5.8 Dworkin's resource egalitarianism Dworkin distinguished between inequalities that were 'endowment sensitive' from those that were 'ambition sensitive'. The former referred to the advantages that one enjoyed as a result of arbitrary distribution of resources while the latter related to those actions of a person that made him successful. Dworkin suggested a two stage process a) an ambition sensitive auction and b) an insurance scheme. He used a story to hammer in his point. He asked people to presume that they were ship wrecked and stranded in an island. Each person on the island was to be given hundred clam shells to bid for whatever they preferred (Auction). If all are given the exact same number of shells and they can bid for anything up for sale in the market then it represented a perfect competitive market. Some might buy agricultural land, others cattle to set up a dairy farm while some might buy a part of the beach to laze around. Each shall bid for different resources according to one's preferences. If no one desires others bundle of goods then it can be presumed that the envy test has been met and people has been treated with equal consideration. Therefore, different resources are a reflection of their different ambitions.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 48 The requirement of choice in the conception of resource egalitarianism has been met. However, all are not similarly endowed in the world. Some may be handicapped and required to spend her resources to meet her special needs. Dworkin thus pointed out that the people's fate in distribution scheme was also determined by their circumstances. So, he came up with the insurance scheme where people were expected to put aside twenty five to thirty clam shells for the disadvantaged. The insurance scheme in the real world is the reflection of progressive taxation. Taxing the rich more than the poor would enable the state to secure welfare of the disadvantaged. The resourcist conception of the state laid emphasis on the centrality of state responsibility towards remedying the unequal circumstances among people. By making this distinction, under Dworkin's scheme, there could be no unjust entitlements.

5.9 Amartya Sen's Capability Approach Economist Amartya Sen asserted that distributional equality should concern itself with equalizing people's capabilities, instead of emphasising on resources or incomes. He said that the notion of wellbeing should be understood in terms of functions. He focused on capabilities, which is basically the ability to achieve a certain form of function. Sen stressed that policy makers should amass maximum information and try to equalize people's capabilities. Social policy should be attuned to human diversity.

5.10 Michael Walzer's notion of Complex Equality Lastly, Michael Walzer came forward with the idea of complex equality. In spite being an egalitarian, he finds himself ill at ease with intellectual enterprise involved in identifying the single most important metric of equality- be it welfare, resources or capability. He pointed out that egalitarians harp on the principles of distribution but ignore the meaning people attribute to goods. He said it is important

People give meanings to goods, determined through their social values. The same goods have different meanings in different societies. He insisted that there could not be any universal set of basic goods that have that same value to all the people. Therefore, Walzer felt that Rawls was not grasping the problem correctly, when he was presenting a case for a set of primary goods to be fairly distributed across the societies. Walzer categorically stated that 'all distributions are just and unjust relative to the social meanings of goods at stake'. These meanings keep changing across time and space. For example, some societies value the domestic chores performed by women, where as others value women venturing into the public sphere and performing professional jobs thereby helping to implement the family income. Walzer stated that each sphere should have its own internal principles of distribution. Economists may be right when they impute certain measures of rationality and acquisitiveness to the behaviour of peoples in markets. However, it does not hold true in social domains like family. Parents are expected to be loving and altruistic, resources within families are not distributed as wages. Walzer further pointed out that spheres of market and political power were, for example, distinct. Each has its own norms for distributing goods. Walzer opined that there could be inequalities in various spheres, as the hard working could be rewarded more compared to the lazy. This inequality is acceptable with the caveat that hard work at times went unrewarded in some societies. What is unacceptable is that people who enjoy dominance in one sphere got disproportionately rewarded in the other. That would result in tyranny, which Walzer described as disregard of distinctness of spheres and principles internal to it and ways in which it multiplies inequality. Further dominance would result when people monopolise goods in one sphere and then use their monopoly to achieve unequal distribution of goods in other spheres. Complex equality is opposite of tyranny.'

It establishes a set of relationships such that domination is impossible. In formal terms, complex equality means that no citizen's standing in one sphere or with regard to one social good can be undercut by his standing in some other sphere, with regard to some other good.'

Walzer). 5.11 Brief outline of the concept of differential treatment and affirmative action The feminist political theory from its inception stressed on the need for equality between men and women and demanded justification for the differential treatment they received in legal and political spheres. The liberal and socialist feminism demand equal political rights and access to resources to women within the liberal capitalist state. The liberal feminists want to reform the traditional family and accord women dignity and self-respect. The socialists and the Marxist feminists propose the abolition of nuclear family along capitalism as they found it to be wasteful, inefficient and oppressive. They propose that women should be relieved of domestic chores by setting up communal kitchens and child rearing processes. The radical feminists note that even in case of gender neutral laws, women remain at a disadvantage. They want the attention to be drawn to the domestic spheres, where women are silently subjected to suffering. Of late there have been many other schools of feminism flourishing, like

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 50 the postcolonial and the environmental schools of feminism. Though it is acknowledged lately that women cannot be treated as a homogenous category but all agree to one basic premise that women want to be treated equally as men in all the spheres, despite the differences in their physical attributes. Preferential treatment may be considered to be an important component of differential treatment. Thomson and Nagel defended the use of preferences on different grounds. In the American context, Thomson endorsed job reservation for women and African-Americans to redress their past exclusion, from educational institutions and work place. Preferential policies, according to her were a kind of justice. Nagel on the other hand argued that preferences might work as a kind of social good, without doing violence to justice. Institutions they believed could depart from standard meritocratic selection criteria because the whole system of tying economic reward to earn credentials was itself indefensible. Justice and desert lay at the centre of subsequent arguments. Several theorists took to task Thomson's arguments that preferential hiring makes up for the past wrongs. They point out that it is not defensible as it often benefits the individuals of creamy layer, who are least likely to be harmed by past wrongs while burdening the innocents, in these cases they are talking about the younger male applicants. The critics argue instead of doing justice, preferential treatment violates rights, the right of an applicant to 'equal consideration' or the right of every one to 'equal opportunity'. Further they point out that it grossly neglects desert by delinking reward from a person's talents, choices and abilities. Defenders of preferences are also quick to enlist justice and desert in their cause. Marry Anne Warren for example argued that in the context of entrenched gender discrimination, gender preferences might improve the overall fairness of job selections. Justice and individual desert need not be violated. Similarly, James Rachels defends racial preferences to neutralize unearned privileges by the whites. In India the question of differential treatment has taken the form of affirmative action. The question of reservation has created considerable controversy in recent times. A major argument in favour of reservation is the history of past deprivation and systematic discrimination. To undo the historic wrongs, reservations are made in the educational institutions and jobs for the hitherto marginalized sections of society. Of late it has come under criticism that that the rich and the socially favoured sections or the creamy layer, corner all the advantages rather than the poor. The controversy further centres on whether the benefit of reservation should have an individualistic economic basis or a collective one. There is a strong case against collective reservation as it may kill the desire to strive for excellence. Apart from it reservation also has a psychological dimension, that it grossly violates the principles of self-respect and human dignity.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 51 5.12 Conclusion The concept of equality lies at the heart of normative political theory. The history of political theory is replete with references to the ideal of equality. From its inception in the Greek civilization to the twenty first century it remains a burning issue evoking strongest human passions. Thinkers like Aristotle, Hobbes, Rousseau, Marx deserve special mention for playing decisive roles in shaping the basic concept of equality. Aristotle defended the concept of natural inequality, arguing that nature divided the people into two segments, the ruling and the ruled. The ruling category possessed rational, deliberative and authoritative faculties. Hobbes believed in natural equality between all human beings in the state of nature. He felt along with mental faculties' prudence was also equally bestowed. And Rousseau and Marx pointed out that the institution of private property, laws and labour created various inequalities. Later Marxists as Gramsci pointed out how by using hegemony, the ruling classes legitimately perpetuated the system of economic exploitation. The Marxists of all shades believe that the question of human emancipation is linked with freedom from economic inequalities. Tocqueville pointed out that equality as an ideal especially appealed to those who wished to escape servitude and dependence. In democracies he believed men preferred equality to liberty. However, he cautioned that single minded pursuit of equality may prove to be detrimental to the democracies. Reduction of inequality may be considered to be the primary aim of equality. The invocation of the idea of uniformity does not help much, as it militates against individual talents and efforts. Uniformity to certain extent may be applied in procedures. Equality must be fair, and is necessary for the development of self-respect and is helpful in fostering fraternity. In contemporary political philosophy, a lot of debate revolves around 'equality of what'. It mainly concerns distributional equality. Scholars generally identify three metrics of equality; of welfare, resources and capabilities. The Utilitarians represent the school demanding equality of welfare. They argue distributional equality amounts to distribution of welfare. '

The resourcist conception lays emphasis on the centrality of state responsibility towards remedying unequal circumstances by distribution of certain primary goods. Finally, Amartya Sen brought to attention the idea that distributional equality must concern itself with equalizing people's capabilities, instead of focusing on people's incomes and resources. He said we must focus on functions or capabilities, which is the actual freedom people enjoy. Sen felt social policies should therefore focus on increasing people's capabilities. Further he pointed out that social policy must be attuned to human diversity. The conception of equality is further enriched by the complex equality proposed by Michael

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 52 Walzer, where he stressed that people give different social meanings to goods they create and that distributions are just or unjust relative to the social meaning at stake. He pointed out that each distinct sphere should have its own principles of distribution and people dominant in one sphere must not be able to control the other spheres. Politics of egalitarianism had been responsible for the genesis of the welfare state. However in the 1980's the ideal of egalitarianism suffered a setback with the rise of right wing governments in the West who believed in tax cuts and rolling back the frontiers of the state. Another distinct feature of the contemporary world is the political struggles of the various identity groups, who were hitherto marginalized and deprived of the fruits of development, like the women across the world, the African Americans in U.S.A. the Dalits and the Adivasis and other tribal groups in India. The debate within the egalitarian school is witnessing a shift from 'equality of what?' to 'equality of whom?' It has spurred the demand for differential treatment and affirmative action for the various marginalized groups. 5.13 Summing Up ? NSOU ? CC-PS-03 56 6.2 Introduction Just society and just state are basic essentials for good living. It means justice is one of the fundamentals of human life and harmonious living. However, to understand justice is a complex process as human civilizations of all ages and continents offer varied meanings of justice. For instance, to someone, justice means giving others what they are due or entitled to. In modern society, on the other hand, justice is a distributional concept and it is concerned with distribution of scarce resources. If resources are abundant and people are benevolent, David Hume observes, "justice and injustice would be equally unknown among mankind". Indeed, historical context and ideologies give justice complex and counteracting connotations. In other words, justice is a dynamic concept. Yet we need to know it because we need to live with it. Primarily, justice is a moral concept but it also a political concept because without political will and institution it could not be delivered to all in a human society. In fact, the derivative meaning of justice is 'to bind or to tie together'. 'Jus' also means 'Tie' or 'Bond' as well as right or law. So, the state plays a great role as right or law cannot be guaranteed without this powerful political institution. Similarly, the state cannot be a humane institution without justice. St. Augustine, like Plato and Aristotle, rightly enquired upon 'justice removed, then, what are kingdoms but great bands of robbers?' It is an age-old tradition that views justice as basic to the validation of political authority. The same tone was reflected in the writings of Manu, "Do not destroy Dharma, so that you may not be destroyed". The main objective of this essay is therefore to understand this prime thing of human life, justice – its meaning, features, and different views of justice. Justice is also required to synthesize different political values. Ernest Barker points out that all values like liberty, equality and fraternity are to be adjusted and readjusted with reference to contexts. As claims of one value may contradict others, adjustment is indispensable for harmonization of different values as well as different aspects of society. He opines that the primary function of justice is synthesis of liberty, equality and fraternity. It is 'the union and adjusted whole of all political values which are staking a claim for recognition'. In this way, equal conditions for the development

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 57 of personality of all can be ensured. So, justice is the great balancer, adjuster, reconciler and synthesizer of values. In fact, it goes beyond these values and balances each of them. 6.3 The Meaning of Justice through the Ages Justice is the basis of good state and it is also a pillar of ideal society. The ancient Indian scriptures gave utmost importance to justice. So, the king should favor and deliver justice to its subjects. In other words, 'Nayadharma' or justice was the basis of human life in the Indian tradition. It is later reflected in the Gandhian concept of 'Ramarajya' and in AmartyaSen's idea of justice. Justice tries to reconcile the individual rights with the social good. It reconciles the claims of one person with another. 6.4 Greek concept of Justice However, the concept of justice takes different meanings in different historical context. Since the age of Plato (427 BC-347 BC) right up to the 21st century, it has been defined in various ways. Plato equates justice with discipline, judiciousness, self-control, bravery and loyalty. Yet, Plato was convinced, despite the individual views offered by Cephalus, Polemarchus and others, that Justice is the mother of all virtues and it will be achieved through dutifulness to one's own class functions. So, for Plato, justice is a virtue that can establish a rational order – each one should perform its appropriate role without meddling with the function of other parts. In Aristotle's opinion, justice denotes what is lawful and fair, that is, equitable distributions and the removal of what is inequitable. It is called corrective justice. For him Justice lies in incorporating concerns of equality, proportionality and maintenance of equilibrium in society. 6.5 Roman and Medieval concept of Justice Cicero observes, "Justice is intrinsic goods". It remains implicit in our values and cannot be detached from life and society. Carrying on the Greek tradition, Augustine

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 58 argues 'justice is the constant and perpetual will to render to each his dues'. So, in delivering justice each person matters and all persons should be treated equally or with consistency. However, besides consistency, relevance is another important condition of justice: for relevant reasons a person may be treated differently rather than equally. To Aquinas, justice is that rational mean between opposite sorts of injustice, involving proportional distributions and reciprocal transactions. 6.6 The Liberal concept of Justice With the advent of materialist tradition in the West, the meaning of justice acquires complex undertone – while going through a process of secularization, justice has been conceptualized with reference to the class interests of the dominant groups or ethnocentrism. Far Hobbes, justice is a simulated virtue but is a necessity for civil society and it can be actualized through the function of the voluntary agreements of the social contract. The early utilitarian, like Hume argues that "public utility is the sole origin of justice." So, to them protecting property is a noteworthy public utility service of justice. In consonance with the spirit of individualism, Kant observes that justice is a virtue by which people respect others' freedom, autonomy, and dignity by not interfering with their voluntary actions, so long as those do not violate others' rights. The liberal proponent like J.S. Mill again views justice in terms of social utilities that foster and protect human liberty. What does remain implicit in these views is the insistence to judge justice in terms of legality. It branches out of monistic concept of sovereignty. Thinkers like Hobbes and Austin uphold the view that 'law is the command of the sovereign' and is the primary source of justice. So, Leviathan can never be unjust and it is the 'creator of right and justice'. Bentham's utilitarian stance never disregards this sovereign monitor of pain and pleasure. He, for instance, argues that morals should not be the basis of justice and so also the natural law. In fact, the liberal thinkers, of whom Bentham is one of the forefathers, applaud law or legality as the basis of justice. While the sovereign state controls everything through law, legality as well ensures individuality: liberty of man, free market and constricted state. Mill said justice is a collective name for the most important social utilities, which are conducive to fostering and protecting

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 59 human liberty. Both idealism and liberalism evince justice by the instrument of law. Therefore, equality before the law and equal treatment by the law is the basis of just society. However, Laski thinks that law devoid of justice might tend to debar sociological and ethical consideration of justice. It is equally important that the socio-economic basis of justice cannot be undermined because actualization of justice is conditioned by these factors. Rawls tries to mitigate the contradictions in his own way. He analyzes justice in terms of maximum equal liberty pertaining to basic rights and duties for all members of society. In his writings, justice involves fairness; so the basic question of distributive justice is how resources and opportunities are divided up among the members of society. However, Rawls' conception of justice is deontological as it views priority of right over the good. The post-Rawlsian philosophers propose alternative conceptions of justice. 6.7 The Marxist concept of Justice To Marx and Engels, justice can be ensured only through realization of economic and social equality. Legal justice, a mainstay of liberal justice, is not an accepted form of justice because justice in capitalist society reflects class relations and so also protects class contradiction and private property. So, justice is an integral part of the superstructure. Marx believes in substantive justice which is the basic condition of economic justice. As surplus value, which is actually appropriated by the capitalists, is a means of exploitation of the working class in capitalist society, economic justice can only be ensured by creation of classless society through proletarian revolution. However, in the socialist society, due to the existence of the state, justice cannot be ensured in the true sense of the term. According to Lenin 'the first phase of communism, therefore, cannot yet provide justice and equality; difference, and unjust differences, in wealth will still persist, but exploitation of man by man will have become impossible because it will be impossible to seize the means of production'... In 'Critique of the Gotha Programme', Marx offers a principle of justice, 'from each according to his ability, to each according to his needs'.

disregards merits or deserts, rights, entitlements, etc., as criteria for distribution of benefits and resources.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 60 Rather, needs or necessity should be the distributive principle. Hence, Marxian theory of justice stresses on the distributive nature of justice in its own way. In his words, justice entails “a fair distribution of proceeds of labour.” Thus, every member of the society without any discrimination while enjoying the benefits of society must bear the burdens within the society. Or else, Marx considered justice as a sham, a mask which facilitates capitalist exploitation. The emphasis on earnings rather than liberty exposes the inner contradictions between capitalist and socialist views of justice. 6.8 Alternative views There are others who prefer to recommend a pluralistic view of justice. The communitarians’ ideas of justice prefer the collective pursuit of virtue rather than the defense of individual rights as a principle of social order. Sandel maintains that rights and justice depend for their justification on the moral importance of the ends they serve. ‘Justice is not only about the right way to distribute things. It is also about the right way to value things’. On the other hand, to Michael Walzer, justice is a human construction, and it is doubtful that it can be made in only one way. The principles of justice are themselves pluralistic in form;

all these differences derive from different understandings of the social goods themselves.

There are other alternative conceptions of justice that challenge conventional liberal ideas of justice and even disregard the view that justice is anthropocentric. The first among them is the global or cosmopolitan theory of justice. It suggests that justice should not be applied to people within a specific sovereign boundary. So, it argues that application of justice must not be limited to one national boundary but it is to be extended beyond national boundaries. In fact, increasing interdependence or interrelations among the peoples or sovereign bodies require refurbishment of the idea of justice. Particularly, the North-South divide strengthens the argument for global justice. Besides, a new futuristic study of justice could be found in the Green or ecological political thought. For a secured future of mankind, one must need to understand the

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 61 justice-ecology interface. In other words, demand for applying justice for (a) living being other than human and (b) the nature as a whole is becoming a strong trend. The Green political thinkers in actuality are concerned with the application of justice to biodiversity. Arnold Brecht tries to understand this multifaceted idea of justice with reference to the values people uphold from time to time. In his words, “One who changes from one conviction to the other will thenceforth have a different idea of justice”. For instance, an authoritarian thinks of leadership as an ultimate value, so following leaders is justice. For those who uphold equality as the highest value preserving equality is justice. This again is contradicted by libertarians who give liberty not equality as the highest value. Accordingly, to the hedonist, pursuing happiness of the greatest number is just; to some, majority will is just; to some others, duty not right is just. So, the idea of justice is basically dynamic and plural in meaning and content. 6.9 Characteristic features of Justice Justice determines the way how individual people are treated. The questions of justice arise in circumstances where people put forth their claims to get freedom, education, opportunities, resources, and others. But these claims are potentially contradictory, so people can plead to justice to resolve such contradictions by determining what each person is properly entitled to have. So, justice is a form of claims which can be duly made against the agent dispensing justice. The agent might be a person or an institution. Further, justice is a matter of obligation for the dispensing agent to provide with what is due to the masses. It is a marker of justice that the obligations it creates should be enforceable. So, justice requires an agent whose determination alters the circumstances of its objects. Again, the agent might be an individual person, or it might be a group of people, or an institution such as the state. There is a relationship between justice and the impartial and consistent application of rules. Justice is epitomized in the rule of law — as general rules impartially applied over time.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 62 The features of Justice are the following : 1. The sources of justice are values and traditions of society. Not only that justice is a primary value and it has an enduring relation with other values like liberty and equality. 2. Justice is universal –it is related to all aspects of human behavior in society. It has an overarching value that synthesizes different aspects of human life. 3. Justice stands for mutual relationships of persons living in society. It is a principle of balancing or reconciling human relations in society in such a way as to enable each one to get his due rights, rewards and punishments. 4. Further, the function of justice is to harmonize individual interests with the interests of society. 5. Aim of justice is to provide equal rights, opportunities and facilities to all in a fair way. 6. Justice is a matter of each individual person being treated in the right and non-arbitrary way; there should be consistency in treatment – benefits or punishment. Accordingly, justice has to follow rules or apply laws to maintain consistency. 7. Application of justice further requires relevance. That is, justice requires equal treatment but if there are relevant reasons it may discriminate or be treated differently. 8. Again, treating differently for relevant reasons should be guided by the idea of proportion. For the sake of justice, reward and punishment is to be proportionate to work done. 9. Further, the nature of justice often evolves out of context – justice is contextual. Situation or circumstance must be taken into consideration to deliver justice. 10. Justice has several dimensions: social justice, economic justice, political justice and legal justice.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 63 6.10 Conclusion Justice is, therefore, an indispensable part of social life in general and human life in particular. Justice stands for rule of law, absence of arbitrariness and a system of equal rights, freedoms and opportunities for all in society. In other words, justice secures and protects rights of all in a fair way. It stands for harmony among all members of a society. Justice encourages bonding or joining or organizing people together into a right or fair order of relationships. This fair order in society again demands the regulation of selfish actions of people for securing a fair distribution, equal treatment of equals, and proportionate and just rewards for all. It tries to reconcile the interests of society and individual interests. Raphael rightly opines, “Justice protects the rights of the individual as well as the order of society.” These varied meanings of justice and polemics it engenders further reflect the inherent plurality of the concept of justice. The dearth of one universally agreed definition of justice points to the fact that the idea of justice is conditioned by context. Justice is a way of understanding of the world around individual – its structure and the way to restructure it with reference to context. However, this plurality again shows the values and extent of a concept in a democratic society.

social justice. ? Recognize its various attributes. ? Find out its relevance to our social conditions. 7.2 Introduction The concept of social justice first surfaced in Western thought in the wake of the industrial revolution and the parallel development of the socialist doctrine. It emerged as an expression of protest against what was perceived as the capitalist exploitation of labor and as a focal point for the development of measures to improve the human condition. It aimed to create more egalitarian societies and remedy for capitalistic NSOU ? CC-PS-03 68 exploitation of human labor. It intends to protect human rights and dignity, basic human equality and intellectual and moral freedom irrespective of gender, religion, birth, class, caste, colour etc. It shows that social justice originates from the principles of social equality. It emerged as a revolutionary slogan embodying the ideals of progress and fraternity. Following the revolutions that shook Europe in the mid-1800s, social justice became a rallying point for progressive thinkers and political activists. Proudhon, identified justice with social justice and identified social justice with respect for human dignity. Tocqueville observed that democracy nurtures the enthusiasm for social justice. Truly, the emergence of liberal-capitalist ideas promotes the demand for social justice. By the mid-twentieth century, the concept of social justice had become central to the ideologies and programmes of virtually all the leftist and centrist political parties around the world, and few dared to oppose it directly. Marx, Weber, Barker – all believe that contract-based equality produces social justice. Social justice represented the essence and the raison d'être of the social democratic doctrine and left its mark in the decades following World War II.

Elements of Social Justice Hobhouse summarizes the following elements of social justice: (i) Institutions are not ends but means. Politics is subordinate to ethics. (ii) One of the principles of harmony is that common goods cannot be opposed to individual goods or individual set-up against the common goods. Right implies duties. (iii) Moral freedom; (iv) Social and political freedom; (v) Equality; (vi) Personal justice; (vii) Equal payment for equal service; (viii) The assignment of property should be so conceived as to secure freedom for the individual and power for the community; (ix) Social and personal factors in wealth; (x) Individual organization; and (xi) Democracy. A Report of the United Nations observes that economic justice is considered an important element of social justice.

Economic justice, defined as the existence of opportunities for meaningful work and employment and the dispensation of fair rewards for the productive activities of individuals, will be treated here as an aspect of social justice. The customary distinction between economic justice and social justice is intellectually unsatisfactory, as it serves to legitimize the dichotomization of the economic and social spheres. This tendency can seriously limit the potential for the advancement of justice, particularly within organizations that exercise a normative function with regard to matters of development.

Nonetheless, overall economic justice is hampered by the concentration of wealth and power that seem to accompany the dissemination of the capitalist ethos. In addition, while apparent progress has been made in achieving equality of rights, there have been notable setbacks in connection with the basic rights of individuals, who in some settings have been subjected to discrimination and even torture. According to David Miller, social justice "is realistic attempt to bring the overall pattern of distribution in a society into line with principles of society." He points out three important principles of social justice: a) social justice as distribution according to needs (for instance, Marx and Rawls), b) social justice as distribution according to rights/entitlements, (Nozick) and c) social justice as distribution according to merits/ deserts. The functionalists, on the other hand, put emphasis on the functional

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 70 importance of works as criterion of distribution. So, rewards should be distributed in terms of uniqueness of performance of the persons concerned. However, these rights/ entitlements, deserts/merits and functional importance may shield unequal distribution of rewards and resources. It results in injustice. 7.5 Features of Social Justice 1. The normative criterion or principle is the basis for social justice. People generally speak about principles of justice, of moral foundations, etc., where something is deemed just or unjust if it agrees with or is against such principles. 2. Social justice is multidimensional, including at least three types of institutions or dimensions: economy, culture and politics, without any of them in particular being more basic on a universal scale than the others. 3. Social justice is flexible to diverse frameworks or political units, such as state-nation, or smaller units (due to decentralization processes) and larger units (due to globalization processes). 4. Keeping in mind the morals, process efficiency and results, social justice utilizes conservative and radical strategies to satisfy its demand. 5. Besides society, social justice takes nature or ecosystem into consideration as an equally fundamental scenario that offers moral and efficient limits to human action. 6. Social justice is defined historically and contextually on the basis of a democratic process, which, to the extent possible, is increasingly more participatory in its interpretation and implementation. 7. Earlier, social justice meant economic equality. Nowadays, this concept has gone much further than just the economic and egalitarian meaning. Social justice has now taken on the idea of preventing or reducing widespread wrongs provoked by machismo, racism, xenophobia and homophobia, among others. 8. The meanings of social justice are far reaching and indistinct and translating it into concrete practice is full of several challenges. For instance, political theorists, philosophers, and social workers alike have tried to explore what should be the "right relationship" between and among persons, communities, states, and nations.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 71 9. Some students of social justice consider its meaning in terms of the tensions between individual liberty and common social good, arguing that social justice is promoted to the degree that we promote collective good without infringing upon basic individual freedoms. Some argue that social justice reflects a concept of fairness in the assignment of fundamental rights and duties, economic opportunities, and social conditions. 10. Social justice entails not only approaches to societal choices regarding the distribution of goods and resources, but also consideration of the structuring of societal institutions to guarantee human rights and dignity and ensure opportunities for free and meaningful social participation. 7.6 Conditions for Social Justice a) Advancements in social justice require pressure from organized political forces. b)

justice. The myriad difficulties and uneven progress notwithstanding continued pursuit of these ideals is essential. 7.7

Friedrich Hayek on Social Justice In the opinion of the libertarians, trouble with "social justice" begins with the very meaning of the term. It is thought that everyone will recognize an instance of it when it appears. The concept of social justice has become a common part of the political lexicon in recent years, with political activists identifying it as a key goal of its social strategy. A common criticism from the non-left is that social justice appears to have no stable or concrete meaning. Hayek points out that whole books and treatises have been written about social justice without ever offering a definition of it. This point features prominently in the critique articulated by Friedrich Hayek in The Mirage of Social Justice, in the second volume of his Law, Legislation and Liberty. Hayek struggles to find a clear definition of what people mean by the term. To the extent that social justice operates as a catch-all justification for any number of programs that range from extensive income redistribution and anti-discrimination policies, there is little doubt the phrase is used in a bewildering number of often contradictory and not especially coherent ways. the application of social justice requires a geographical, sociological, political and cultural framework within which relations between individuals and groups can be understood, assessed, and characterized as just or unjust. In modern times, this framework has been the nation-State.

David Miller observes that social justice points to a set of social and political institutions that will ensure the just distribution of benefits and costs throughout society. So, it requires the state to become much more closely involved in distributive issues. Thirdly, the libertarian theories reject obligations for equal and equitable distribution of resources contending instead that each individual is entitled to any and all resources that he or she has legally acquired. For them social justice is not only corrosive of personal freedom but also of the economic freedom that a market economy requires. They emphasize individual autonomy and the fundamental right and they seek to protect individual freedom from encroachment by others. Proponents of this school support minimal state responsibility for protecting the security of individuals pursuing their own separate interests. Hayek further observes that it is erroneous to talk about social justice as justice is basically a property of individual actions. However, social justice is concerned with distribution of resources like, money, property and others

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 73 across a society resulting from actions and decisions of thousands of separate people. In this situation, it is difficult to say that this distribution is either just or unjust. Fourthly, Hayek argues that if one tries to match the process of distribution of resources with the principle of distributive justice it would wipe out economic freedom. It is tantamount to killing the goose that lays the golden eggs. Hayek can be countered on two points. In spite of his doubt over the issue of social distribution by a single agency, people are habituated with its own creation – the state like institution and rules – for distribution of social resources. It is seen again that people often obey the decisions relating to resource distribution of these political institutions elected or controlled by people. On the other hand, distribution of social resources should be under collective control in a democratic society.

7.8 Social Justice in India

In India, the idea of social justice became an important index to judge the performance of the post-independent state. The leading figure of the Constituent Assembly, B.R. Ambedkar viewed social justice as the vital prerequisite of democracy. The pillar of social justice is equality – human equality. Social inequality based on caste, class, religion, etc., make a fragmented India. Due to the relentless effort of Ambedkar, the Constitution of India for the sake of social justice, like abolition of untouchability. However, to some people, it is a clear violation of deserts/merits based principle of justice. Ambedkar rejects Gandhian principle of social justice implied in the idea of SarvodayaSamaj because of three main reasons: (1) That it is based on the division of labour which forms the cornerstone of Varnashram Dharma; (2) That it regards the role of Daridra Narayan (God's grace to weaker sections) as an important one for maintaining of justice; and (3) That the theory of 'trusteeship' has been highlighted to redress the economic ills of society, which is just like making the cat to look after the milk or to give a lamb under the guardianship of a wolf. Contrarily, Ambedkar views, social justice as: the unity and equality of all human beings, the equal worth of men and women, the respect for the weak and the lowly, the regard for human rights, benevolence, mutual love, sympathy, tolerance, and charity towards fellow being, human treatment in all cases, the dignity of all citizens, the abolition of caste-distinctions, education and property for all, goodwill and gentleness. In short, Ambedkar sought social transformation through the establishment of social democracy in which equality, fraternity and liberty would prevail in each and every spheres of life of all members of society.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 74 P.B. Gajendragadkar, former Chief Justice of India, once observed, "The concept of social justice is (thus) a revolutionary concept which gives meaning and significance to the democratic way of life and makes the rule of law dynamic. It is this concept of social justice which creates in the minds of the masses of this country a sense of participation in the glory of India's political freedom" Not only that, He advises further, "Social justice must be achieved by adopting necessary and reasonable measures with courage, wisdom, foresight, sense of balance and fair-play to all the interests concerned. That shortly stated, is the concept of social justice and its implications." In the modern context, those concerned with social justice see the general increase in income inequality as unjust, deplorable and alarming. It is argued that poverty reduction and overall improvements in the standard of living are attainable goals that would bring the world closer to social justice. Social justice may be broadly understood as the fair and compassionate distribution of the fruits of economic growth. However, there is little indication of any real ongoing commitment to address existing inequalities. In today's world, the enormous gap in the distribution of wealth, income and public benefits is growing wider, reflecting a general trend that is morally unfair, politically unwise and economically unsound. Injustices at the international level have as well produced a parallel increase in inequality between affluent and poor countries.

7.9 Conclusion

There is no doubt that social justice is a contested concept and lacks precise connotation. Not only a definitional problem, its proper realization by the state is also a matter of great debate. In spite of these limitations, indispensability of social justice cannot be ignored. The concept of social justice is far more widened concept than any other concepts of justice. And its sensational presence in people's mind shows that social justice is almost organically related to the life experiences of human beings. Jatava argues that "Social justice is so wide concept that it includes all other kinds of justice in its sphere. It gives a vivid depiction of the whole of human society. It is like a looking-glass wherein one can find the picture of a country or of a society. Its subject matter is a sort of study, which is related more to practice than theory. That is why social justice is different from the well-established social sciences and other studies of human life". He further adds, "Nietzsche, like Manu, was an embodiment of social inequality and both of them upheld the interests of one class only, which was quite contradictory to the spirit of social justice." To conclude, a reference of Brecht can be more appropriate as he talks of universality of human needs and so the universal of justice. He says: "the universal term justice responds to a universal

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 75 human need of expression, not only in acquiescence with existing laws but also in criticizing them for lack of justice, and that this universal need relates to the feeling that has at least some elements in common. We have good reason for supposing, further, that these elements must be very important for human nature, since they are tied up with such passionate feeling". 7.10 Summing Up ? Concept of Social justice emerged in Western thought in the wake of the industrial revolution and with the advent of socialist thought. ? Basic aim of social justice is to remove imbalances in the social, political and economic life of the people. ? Social justice can be defined as a set of ideas and values which ensure economic and political security of all the people. ? Social justice contains normative principle; ? It denotes threedimensions – economy, culture and politics; ? Social justice is flexible to diverse frameworks or political units; ? Social justice utilizes conservative and radical strategies to fulfill its demands; ? Social justice stresses on nature which limits human action; ? It is defined historically and contextually with a view to become more participatory; ? Social justice always seeks economic equality; ? The meanings of social justice is far reaching in the sense that it faces several challenges; ? It is often considered in terms of tensions persists between individual liberty and common social good; ? Social justice advocates social institutions to guarantee of human rights and dignity. Distribution of such resources is again a problem affecting all levels of society. It is a standard practice to evaluate the process of distribution with reference to justice or fairness. Fairness is an important factor that affects feelings and actions of people as it has been linked to satisfaction with and acceptance of decisions and perceived legitimacy of the authority.

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 78 8.3 Meaning of Procedural Justice The doctrine that justice is not fairness of outcome but fairness of procedure is called the procedural justice. So, the concept of justice as fairness also denotes "procedural fairness". Procedural justice concerns the fairness and the transparency of the processes by which decisions are made. The notion that fair procedures are the best guarantee for fair outcomes is a popular one. In other words, the perceptions of fairness are driven not only by outcomes but also by the fairness and consistency of the processes used to reach those outcomes. In short, procedural justice is concerned with making and implementing decisions according to fair processes. Hence, it may be contrasted with distributive justice, which stresses on the fairness in the distribution of rights or resources.

and 4) being impartial in decision making. However, the four principles—or pillars are complimentary to one another. The process of decision making should have transparency and candidness; the decisions should be open and the reasoning behind decision making should be explained clearly when appropriate. Citizens want an opportunity not only to understand what is happening but also want their voice to be heard. No one likes to leave their future is being decided upon at another person's whim; rather, people want voice or representation in decisions that may directly affect them. Further, the decision making is to be guided by impartiality for ensuring biasfree decision and outcome. Truly, justice of a procedure is largely a function of the justice of the outcomes that it tends to produce when applied. For instance, the procedures that produce a fair trial are justified because they produce outcomes in which the guilty are punished and the innocent are acquitted. The idea of procedural justice could be traced back to ancient Roman law and in the modern times to the Lockean concept of social contract. Procedural justice opposes substantive justice because it is based on end-state principle. Here, the state stands for deliverance of justice. Contrarily, both Locke and Nozick give emphasis on private property to define justice. In legal terms, procedural justice is that of common-law court rather than equity. In economic terms, procedural justice is that of markets against states. In fact, procedural justice has certain organic relation with the functioning of the market economy. The supporters of this type of justice believe that unrestrained trade practice, that is, trade activities free of state control, are just and beneficial for society. The principles of desert or need are inapplicable in such a framework. It is in actuality a variant of distributive

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 79 justice. Procedural justice is concerned with the perception of fairness in the use of processes, procedures and methods in making outcome decisions. In Anarchy, State and Utopia (1974), Robert Nozick has restored procedural justice, as against substantive or end-state principle of justice, with his entitlement theory of justice. So, procedural justice never supports the justice of a gospel wealth which, observes that a rich man should "give back to the community some of what he has taken". Nozick responds that a millionaire has a natural right to his wealth if he acquires it without force or fraud. The state discriminates against those with better voluntary exchange outcomes in favor of those inferior voluntary exchange outcomes. Autonomy of individuals should always be respected. Only the individual person can reasonably decide what to do with his talents, abilities, and the products of his talents and abilities. He gives stress on the historical theories of justice — a historical theory asks about the process by which the final outcome has arisen. The theory of procedural justice observes that each person has entitlements which are individual in character and never dependent on any abstract principle of distribution. So, the state should not interfere in matters of entitlements as it would mean grave injustice. In his discourse on distributive justice, John Rawls reviews the concept of procedural justice. He classifies it into three types: perfect procedural justice, imperfect procedural justice and pure procedural justice. If a procedure ensures just outcome it is called perfect procedural justice; for instance, the person who cuts a cake to take the last slice himself (Rawls' illustration). In case of imperfect procedural justice, the procedure followed is likely but not certain to produce the just result. In case of pure procedural justice, there is no independent way to evaluate the outcome, coin-tossing for example — one may call it just, it is only on the grounds that it has come about by following the relevant procedure. It shows therefore, that procedural justice is a normative judgment of the fairness of the process of decision-making.

8.4 The Features of the Procedural Justice

1. Procedural theory of justice is based on rights. The rights come from entitlement. This entitlement is characteristically individualistic and never depends on any abstract principle of distribution taking into account the society as a whole.
2. The state, therefore, has no authority to interfere in the matter of entitlement. Procedural theorists favour the concept of minimal state that has to maintain law and order, to take action against violence, to fight the foreign aggressors, to stop theft and fraud and to implement all sorts of contracts. They believe NSOU ? CC-PS-03 80 that greater the functions of the state the greater are the infringement of rights of the individuals.
3. For a better and illuminating formulation of a theory of justice Procedural theory of justice has followed the historical principle rather than end-result principles. It says that the justness or unjustness of a distribution can be decided by the fact that whether it is historical or not. Historical principle means how does it come about? Past records will show to what extent a distribution is able to satisfy the requirements of justice.
4. Procedural theory of justice has an organic link with the workings of the market economy. It believes that only through free market resources could be used at its best. Otherwise it would be damaging for all.
5. It also rejects the principles of need or desert. The supporters of this theory observe that it is hardly possible to agree upon what constitutes needs or just desert.

8.5 Robert Nozick's Theory of Entitlement

The exposition of the theory of justice cannot be complete without reference to Nozick's entitlement theory because the theory of entitlement is a good example of procedural justice. However, it should be kept in mind that Nozick's libertarian perspective of justice comes out of critique of Rawls liberal theory of justice. In fact, his Anarchy, State and Utopia is the only discourse that has never been followed by any notable academic works in later days. His entitlement implies three principles of justice: a) A person who acquires a holding in accordance with the principle of justice in acquisition is entitled to that holding. b) A person who acquires a holding in accordance with the principle of justice in transfer, from someone else entitled to that holding, is entitled to that holding. and c) No one is entitled to a holding except by applications of (1) and (2). It shows that justice begins and ends with the ownership of property and the owner of property has the right to use it according to his or her own wish. This property can only be taken from its owner through just compensation. This notion property ownership is the legacy of Locke's theory of appropriation proposed in his Second Treaties. To Nozick, any attempt to redistribute property even through taxation, NSOU ? CC-PS-03 81 a form of forced labor and is unjust. However, he suggests that acquisition of wealth or property should not be detrimental to the well-being of other people. In Nozick's opinion, a distribution of resources is said to be just if everyone within its scope is entitled to what they now own, having acquired it by legitimate means. So, according to Nozick, justice is entirely a matter of the sequence of prior events that created it. So, his own theory is "historical" theory of justice. In his words, "the Entitlement theory of justice in distribution is historical; whether a distribution is just depends upon how it came about". Here, the original emphasis on a right to equality is transferred to a right to equal opportunity, based on values of individual liberty and property rights. He hopes that only within the minimal state individual liberty would be protected forever. He further promotes a system in which the role of the institutions of state is limited to the guardian of property. To be specific, the state should not do more than protect individuals from violence, theft and breach of contract. So, some men might legitimately be the owners of large quantities of land and other properties, while others would have to offer labor for conveniences of those owners. If all competitors comply with the rules in the true sense of the term liberty of individuals will be safeguarded. This ultimately helps to develop a libertarian justification of large and unequal capitalist property rights and wage labor relations. Nozick indeed believes that all taxation for the purpose of redistribution is theft – it takes, by force, what belongs to one person in order to give it to another person. Indeed, Nozick's conception of justice begins and ends with the ownership of property.

8.6 Critique of Procedural Theory of Justice

1. Robert Nozick has given undue importance to the procedural aspect of justice. Through the entitlement of holding he has built up the entitlement theory. Entitlement of holding may be in the form of acquisition or transfer or rectification of injustice. These are all about cases of distribution but what about production? Procedural theory of justice unjustifiably does not make any distinction between production and distribution. Both production and distribution are closely connected and to ignore one will lead to an incomplete theory.
2. He was in favor of a minimal state which is equivalent to the night watchman state. It means that in any society the state has to play a minimal role. Nozick's theory does not make it clear what role the state will exactly play in establishing justice.
- NSOU ? CC-PS-03 82 Moreover, since Procedural theory of justice falls into the category of distributive justice, the state, through its elaborate machinery, must ensure proper distribution of holding, and at the same time entitlement to holding. If legal and other problems arise on the way of acquisition or transfer or rectification of previous wrongs, who will take the responsibility of rectifying this or solving the problem? It remains unresolved in Nozick's theory of justice.
3. Nozick has taken it for granted that people will strictly adhere to Locke's proviso that enough will be left for the use of others and the situations of others will not worsen. This implies too much reliance on the rationality of holders or users of property. But we cannot say that all the property owners will resist them from acquiring property/holding beyond their necessity. If this happens in the real world, no doubt, there will be no necessity of state or enforcing authority. Even the Utopian socialists could not imagine such a situation.
4. It is unfortunate that Nozick has offered a theory of justice which he wanted to apply in a society plagued by class divisions. If a society is divided into two opposing classes, and if one class is economically dominant the comparatively weak class would definitely be deprived of justice. For a real theory of justice there shall exist equality in its various manifestations.
5. Nozick, in his thorough analysis, wants to draw the attention of his readers to the politics of liberalism. However, the liberal philosophy in spite of its many good aspects, its black spots and irritating aspects can not to be ignored. The consequences of liberal political philosophy prevailing in the USA, Britain, and other states is not unknown to all. So it can be said Nozick's theory of justice is meant for capitalism.
6. Justice can be divided into social, economic and political and all are connected with each other. Nozick's theory of justice speaks least about their interconnectedness. The liberal political philosophy, the main intellectual source Nozick, hardly pays attention to this interconnection.

He again thinks that rights, merits, skills and abilities of individuals have no relation with socio-economic order. Here, Nozick seems to be an advocate of existing inequality in society and awfully indifferent to mentally and physically unable people who cannot compete in the market for abilities, merit and skills. Nozick's ideas of justice may easily remind us of Spencer's crude state or of its proximity to social Darwinism. This further provides a philosophical basis from which one can develop libertarian justification of large and unequal capitalist property rights and exploitation of wage laborers. 8.8 Summing Up ? It stresses on fair processes in making and implementing decisions. ? Make a critical evaluation of Rawl's Theory of justice 9.2 Introduction In all human societies distribution of essential resources is a problematic issue. People often evaluate the distribution of scarce resources in terms of justice or fairness. A resource distribution or allocation process consists of an authority (persons or institution) and one or more recipients of allocated resources. The authority divides the resources through use of certain rules like equality, equity and need. Distributive justice is, therefore, concerned with the fair distribution of benefits and burdens, such as income, taxes, etc. The classical view of distributive justice was found in Aristotle's observation: 'equals should be treated equally and unequals unequally'. Or it would bring injustice. It would further mean 'equal distribution of income

NSOU ? CC-PS-03 86 among the equals only'. Almost a decade before John Rawls, C. J. Chapman in one of his articles, 'Justice and Fairness' (1963), tried to combine the idea of justice with three things – 'the economic rationality of man', 'consumer's sovereignty' and 'moral freedom of individual'. Similar attempt is made by Rawls through idea of fairness and rational choice in original position.

Rawls (1921-2002) is primarily concerned with defining the principles of justice that would regulate an ideal society, rather than with describing how justice may be restored in an unjust society. His justice as fairness theory argues for equal rights for all social beings and injustice towards any people is to be justified only when this injustice is required to prevent an even greater injustice. Further, Rawls's theory justifies an egalitarian society. It is indeed a liberal principle of justice that never prescribes discrimination of human beings in terms of race, class, income or any other factors. 9.3 Rawls on Justice Rawls tries to develop a method through which acceptable principles of justice could be arrived at. He develops a contractarian theory of justice in the tradition of Locke and Rousseau. Like the contract theory, Rawls's justice veers around a central point that is, the institutional arrangement for a society. It is called 'transcendental institutionalism'. It bears two discrete characteristics: a) this approach concentrates on the idea of perfect justice and is least interested in the comparison of justice and injustice; and b) in the process of attaining perfection one should give attention to right institutions rather than to the specificity of emerging societies Rawls is also indebted to the Kantian exposition of justice. Both original position and veil of ignorance – the conditions of Rawlsian justice – have certain proximity to Kant's interpretation of justice. For instance, the original position should be analyzed as a procedural explanation of Kantian conception of autonomy. In his attempts to construct a theory of justice, Rawls makes an estimate of the efficacy of utilitarian mode of explanation of justice. To Rawls, equality of basic rights for all individuals should be the fundamental principle of justice – 'justice as fairness'. To the utilitarian thinkers, violation of rights of some individuals may be justified to secure the greatest amount of happiness for the greatest number of individuals. Rawls rather prioritizes the principle of equal rights for all, not for one particular group over another group, unless it would do grave injustice to individuals. Rawls' 'Theory of Justice' is a product of crises of the Western world: on the one hand, uncertain future of liberal political theory and philosophy as well as behavioral and post-behavioral debate and fuming debate over American imperialist design in NSOU ? CC-PS-03 87 Vietnam, unemployment, gender movements, civil rights movement, and social unrest due to black liberation movement on the other. A man of modest and witty mind, he tries to counter this challenge by offering a moral theory of justice. The question he is trying to answer in his 'A Theory of Justice' is 'What is the most appropriate moral conception of justice for a democratic society?' Accordingly, Rawls tries to combine liberal and socialist egalitarian views of justice in his unique ideas of justice: 'justice as fairness'. It means, "

However, he clarifies that justice and fairness are not the same. Rawls constructs two basic principles of justice as fairness: (a) the equality principles: '

Each person is to have an equal right to the most extensive basic liberty compatible with a similar liberty for others.' and (b) the difference principle: 'Social and economic inequalities are to be arranged so that they are both to the greatest benefit of the least advantaged and attached to positions and offices open to all under conditions of fair equality of opportunity.'

In other words, the equality principle is concerned with citizens' equal rights to basic liberties such as the right to vote, freedom of conscience, etc. and the difference principle, on the other hand, deals with redistribution. The first principle of justice (a) is 'the principle of greatest equal liberty'. Rawls further argues that this first principle is logically prior to the principle (b); so principle (a) must be satisfied before principle (b) to attain justice. It entails that any breach of basic rights should not be validated by arguing that such a breach may produce economic and social advantages. The second principle of justice (b) has two parts:
