PREFACE
In a bid to standardize higher education in the country, the University Grants Commission (UGC) has introduced Choice Based Credit System (CBCS) based on five types of courses viz. core, generic elective, discipline Specific, ability and skill enhancement for graduate students of all programmes at Honours level. This brings in the semester pattern, which finds efficacy in sync with credit system, credit transfer, comprehensive continuous assessments and a graded pattern of evaluation. The objective is to offer learners ample flexibility to choose from a wide gamut of courses, as also to provide them lateral mobility between various educational institutions in the country where they can carry their acquired credits. I am happy to note that the university has been recently accredited by National Assesment and Accreditation Council of India (NAAC) with grade ''A''. UGC (Open and Distance Learning Programmes and Online Programmes) Regulations, 2020 have mandated compliance with CBCS for U.G. programmes for all the HEIs in this mode. Welcoming this paradigm shift in higher education, Netaji Subhas Open University (NSOU) has resolved to adopt CBCS from the academic session 2021-22 at the Under Graduate Degree Programme level. The present syllabus, framed in the spirit of syllabi recommended by UGC, lays due stress on all aspects envisaged in the curricular framework of the apex body on higher education. It will be imparted to learners over the six semesters of the Programme. Self Learning Materials (SLMs) are the mainstay of Student Support Services (SSS) of an Open University. From a logistic point of view, NSOU has embarked upon CBCS presently with SLMs in English/Bengali. Eventually, the English version SLMs will be translated into Bengali too, for the benefit of learners. As always, all of our teaching faculties contributed in this process. In addition to this we have also requisitioned the services of best academics in each domain in preparation of the new SLMs. I am sure they will be of commendable academic support. We look forward to proactive feedback from all stakeholders who will participate in the teaching-learning based on these study materials. It has been a very challenging task well executed by the teachers, officiers & staff of the of the University, and I heartily congratulate all concerned in the preparation of these SLMs. I wish you all a grand success. Professor (Dr.) Ranjan Chakrabarti Vice-Chancellor

the Discipline 1.6
Conclusion 1.7 Summary 1.8 Glossary 1.9 Model Questions 1.10 References 1.1 Objectives ? To understand the meaning and definition of Public Administration ? To spell out the nature of the discipline ? To delineate the scope of the discipline 1.2 Introduction Public Administration is both a discipline as well as a vocation. There is no denying that Public Administration matters. It virtually envelops our life and indisputably justifies the euphemism that from 'womb to tomb' Public Administration is there to bail us out. The present unit intends to introduce Public Administration as a discipline. Written in a lucid manner the present unit covers the following issues: first, Public Administration as an academic discipline has been suffering from a definitional distress as there is hardly any all-agreed definition crafted till date. Secondly, the definitional distress also contributing to the identity crisis of the discipline. Thirdly, in case of nature and the scope of the discipline a clear-cut division is visible among the scholars and the practitioners of the discipline. If we take up the term 'Public Administration' for analytical purpose, we can see that it is composed of two expressions: 'public' and 'administration'. For analytical convenience, let us set aside the prefix 'public' for the BLOCK – I

8 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) time being and concentrate on the suffix 'administration'. Though the term 'administration' is conceptualized in various ways, the proper understanding of the meaning of Public Administration requires etymological knowledge. Etymologically speaking, the word 'administration' has a Latin root, which means 'to manage'. Therefore, administration is at the heart of every organization, no matter whether it is privately owned or public in nature. The prefix 'public' on the other hand, has a special connotation, which relates anything directly or indirectly with state. Further, public interest is considered to be the distinguishing feature of the word 'public'. Hence, Public Administration essentially represents the state administration. 1.3 Definition of Public Administration There is no denying that the self-sufficiency of any budding discipline demands a comprehensive definition. Public Administration is no exception either. In fact, the identity distress of Public Administration as a self-sufficient discipline is often attributed to its lack of sound definition. Despite omnipresence of Public Administration in our day-to-day life, there is barely any mutually agreed definition till date. Several attempts have been made to craft an all-encompassing definition of the discipline. However, the discipline is still in search of an agreeable definition. Any attempt in this regard fails to provide any direction to the discipline. To paraphrase Dwight Waldo, it would end up in mental paralysis. A cursory glance at any standard textbook of the subject, no matter whether it is in the past or in the present, would corroborate the fact (Nigro: ibid; Caiden: 1971; Stillman: 2005). Some textbooks often put together a number of definitions to avoid the definitional dilemma of the discipline. However, the search for an agreeable definition is seemingly endless. If we look at the latest round of meeting of scholars and practitioners of Public Administration at Minnowbrook (2008) or what is popularly known as Minnowbrook III conference, we can identify such attempt on the part of the scholars to define Public Administration in the context of 21st century. The definition surfaced at the Minnowbrook III conference (2008), deserves some space here, which reflects changing nature of the discipline especially the phenomenon like socio-cultural diversity, which has so long been neglected by the scholars of the discipline. Scholars assembled at the Minnowbrook III conference had defined Public Administration as "a socially-embedded process of collective relationships, dialogue, and action to promote human flourishing for all". Beginning with a quest for the science of administration, the meaning of the discipline has been changing over the years in tandem with the socio-political transformations. Born out of the sheer concern of making impartial administrative policies, Public Administration initially was known as the executive branch of administration and any intercourse with 9 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) politics was strictly shunned for the sake of smooth administrative deliberations. However, the initial definition of the discipline based on clear-cut demarcation between politics and administration had eventually turned out to be a principle of public management under the aegis of administrative state. Until recently, the state was considered as the sheet-anchor in defining Public Administration. However, of late, the macroeconomic transformation in the form of globalization has put the entire definitional discourse of Public Administration under scrutiny as under globalization the state is supposed to have shared turf with a host of NGOs and civil society organizations. Hence, the discipline of Public Administration seems to have no escape from the definitional dilemma. Keeping the above problem in mind, this subunit will dwell upon a few important definitional attempts emerged out in course of its development in addition to an effort of making sense of public administration. If we take a look at the existing literature of Public Aministration, we can see that definitional attempts of the discipline have been centering around two different perspectives of Public Administration viz. managerial perspective and integral perspective. Picking a couple of definition here would elucidate the above argument. For example, when Luther Gullick defines '

Public Administration is that part of the science of administration which has to do with government, and thus concerns itself primarily with the executive branch where the work of the government is done, though there are obviously problems also in connection with the legislative and judicial branches', he was basically drawing on the managerial perspective of Public Administration. Almost in the similar vein, Herbert Simon had endorsed the managerial perspective in his attempt of defining Public Administration. By Public Administration, wrote Simon, is meant, in common usage, the activities of the executive branches of the national, state and local governments'.

Marshall E. Dimock on the other hand, took much broader (i.e. integral) perspective in defining Public Administration. To him

Administration is concerned with 'what' and the 'how' of government. The 'what' is the subject matter, technical knowledge of a field which enables the administrator to perform his tasks, the 'how' is the technique of management, the principles according to which cooperative programmes are carried to success, each is indispensable, together they form the synthesis called administration'.

Nigro and Nigro have discarded any one liner and come out with a checklist or sort to capture the essence of Public Administration. He has tried to confine meaning of Public Administration in the following points. ?

Public administration is a cooperative group effort in a public setting; ? It covers all three branches–executive, legislative, and judicial–and their interrelationships; 10

NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriculum (Dt. 17.10.2022) ? It has an important role in the formulation of public policy and thus a part of the political process; ? It is different in significant ways from private administration; and ? It is closely associated with numerous private groups and individuals in providing services to the community.

On reviewing the above definitions, the basic concern of Public Administration as a field of study should incorporate the followings: first, structures of public organization, especially the executive branch of organization; secondly, administrative processes involving communication, decision making and control; thirdly, bureaucratic behaviour; fourthly, organizations and structures and networks of various departments and organizations. 1.4 Nature of Public Administration As an independent discipline Public Administration can be approached from two different perspectives namely the managerial perspective and the integral perspective. The managerial perspective views the administration from the above and takes up the standpoint of those who are at the helm of affairs only. Hence, this perspective is rather narrow in nature. Under these perspectives, barring the managerial functions, rest of the functions of organization like the manual, clerical, and technical activities have been excluded from the purview of Public Administration. Luther Gulick had encapsulated the managerial perspective in an acronym, popularly known as POSDCORB view of administration. The POSDCORB sums up the carnal of public administration in the seven functions of the manager viz. P-Planning, O-Organizing, S-Staffing, D-Directing, CO-Coordinating, R-Reporting, and B-Budgeting.

The major proponents of this particular perspective were Luther Gulick, Henry Fayol, Herbert Simon, Donald W. Smithburg, and Victor Thomson. The integral perspective on the contrary, takes up a holistic view of administration and considers it as totality, comprising of all the activities viz. manual, clerical, or managerial that are envisaged in order to fulfill the objective of an organization. Hence, integral perspective conceptualizes administration as the sum total of all those who are involved in various capacities in the act of governing. Hence, viewed from this perspective, the entire workforce irrespective of their position is the part and parcel of administration. Therefore, from the peon to the secretary -all the government officials are the equal stakeholders of public administration. According to this perspective, success of any organization is contingent upon the contribution all the employees concerned. The major exponents of this school were Woodrow Wilson, L.D. White, Marshall E. Dimock, and John M. Pfiffner et al.
11 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) 1.5 Scope of the Discipline Like the nature and the definition of the Public Administration, the scope of it is also contested as scholars are divided on the issue. In common parlance by scope we generally mean the range of issues to be discussed under it. In Public Administration the scope involves the range of concerns and areas to be discussed under the rubric of Public Administration. Before we move on to explore the scope of Public Administration, it is worth noting that Public Administration has been conceptualized both as an activity as well as a discipline. Hence, one, who exposes to the discipline for the first time should be mindful of the said conceptualization when discussing the scope of Public Administration. Hence, exploring the scope of Public Administration as an activity is equivalent to map all the activities of the government.

Viewing from this perspective, Public Administration can be defined as the government in action. With the rising expectations of the people on government, the Public Administration has grown manifold over the years and entrusted with multifarious activities, ranging from welfare services to security. Consequently, the ambit of public administration as governmental activity gets widened to incorporate the whole gamut of public policy under its fold. Tracing the scope of Public Administration as a discipline, one would stumble into two divergent views of Public Administration viz. the POSDCORB view or the narrow view of administration and the subject matter view of administration. The POSDCORB view of administration, a brainchild of Luther Gullick presents a rather narrow perspective of Public Administration, confining it only to the executive branches of government at all the three levels. Under this perspective, all those procedures and methods, pertaining to organization have been taken up for consideration. Luther Gullick had encapsulated the crux of the administration in an acronym entitled POSDCORB, denoting the key components of administration viz.

Planning, Organization, Staffing, Directing, Co-ordinating, Reporting and Budgeting. Planning represents the chalking out of the detail outline of

the objectives to be achieved and the methodologies to accomplish the same. Organization stands for setting up of the formal structure of authority through which the work is defined, sub-divided, arranged, and coordinated. Staffing signifies the personnel policy involving recruitment and training of the personnel and the conditions of their work. Directing denotes the making of decisions and the issuance of orders and instructions. Coordinating indicates integration of various divisions, sections and other parts of the organization. Reporting means updating the superiors within the agency to whom the executive is responsible about what is going on. 12

NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Budgeting sums up fiscal planning, control and accounting. For Gullick, the POSDCORB activities constitute the essence of all organizations, regardless of the nature of the work they do. Hence, POSDCORB view provides certainty, and definiteness in handling organizational problems. However, the POSDCORB view of administration is not free from criticism. The approach has been subjected to severe criticism for its homogenous approach to organization especially for its apparent neglect of contextuality in addressing organizational problems. Critics argue that despite the tallest claim of encapsulating the essence of organization, the POSDCORB approach has rarely represented the totality of organizational reality. In fact, in pursuit of designing a common toolkit for organization, Gullick seems to have missed the centrality of socio-cultural milieu in constructing organizational realties. Moreover, the POSDCORB view of administration has also ignored

the study of the 'subject matter' with which the agency is associated. Another major drawback of the POSDCORB view, identified by the critics, is the absence of any reference to the formulation and implementation of the policy.

Hence, its instrumental value to top management not with standing, the scope of administration defined in the POSDCORB perspective is too narrow to look after the overall administrative problems. The subject matter view of Public Administration on the other hand has presented a much boarder and holistic perspective of Public Administration. Unlike the typical POSDCORB perspective of equating administration with a few processes' instrumental for the top management, the subject matter view of administration takes up the substantive matters of administration, like defense, law and order, education, public health, agriculture, public works, social security, justice, welfare, and so on. This perspective believes that for realizing the organizational goals dependence on mere techniques as enunciated in the POSDCORB perspective of administration is not enough. For, proper functioning of an organization calls for both the technique of POSDCORB as well as the specialized techniques of the specific administration concerned. In other words, specialized form of administration requires specialized expertise in addition to the general administrative knowhow encapsulated in the POSDCORB view of administration. For example, if you take instances of police administration, we can see that it has its own rationality and techniques of crime detection, control and maintenance of law and order, which cannot be performed by mere application of the general administrative principles like personnel management, coordination, finance and so on. It is true in case of other branches of administration as well. Hence, in sum it can be said that none of the aforementioned perspectives represents the entire administrative reality. In fact, individually no matter how rational it might be in its own way, presents only a truncated view of administrative reality. Therefore,

13 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) the study of Public Administration should adopt both the perspectives (viz. POSDCORB view and the subject matter view representing the substantive concerns) in its deliberations. In this context the statement made by Lewis Meriam deserves some space here. With an objective of elucidating

the scope of Public Administration Merriam wrote "Public Administration is an instrument with two blades like a pair of scissors. One blade may be knowledge of the field covered by POSDCORB, the other blade is knowledge of the subject matter in which these techniques are applied. Both blades must be good to make an effective tool".

Hence, following Herbert Simon the present discussion may be concluded with the observation that Public Administration comprises of two important components, namely deciding and doing things. Deciding constitutes the foundation of doing things as one can hardly conceive of a discipline without thinking or deciding.
So in sum Public Administration is a combination of both the broad-ranging and an amorphous combination of theory and practice. 1.6
Conclusion In the forgoing analysis an attempt has been made to introduce the discipline of Public Administration in a user-friendly manner. However, it is by no means an easy task as the discipline is beset with several confusions which often question its very claim as an independent and autonomous discipline. First, if we begin with the definition, i.e. the first convincing sign of any autonomous discipline, Public Administration fails to stake any credible claim in this regard. In fact, the discipline is still to settle for an all-agreed definition. The search for same can be discernible in the latest round of meeting of scholars at the Minnowbrook III conference. Secondly, the discipline, especially the scholars and the practitioners of the discipline, are divided on the nature of the discipline as to whether the discipline constitutes only the functioning of the executive branch of the administration or is it a sum total of all the activities and personnel involved in the act of governing. Thirdly, a similar kind of confusion is centering round the scope of the discipline as the scholars are bifurcated into two camps viz. POSDCORB view and the subject matter view. Fourthly, as a corollary of the above points it can be said that the above confusions together put a serious challenge to the identity formulation of Public Administration. 1.7 Summary ? In this unit we have discussed the definition, scope and nature of Public Administration as a discipline. ? We have also discussed the managerial perspective and the integrative perspective of Public Administration, and also the various controversies beset with the discipline.

To understand the closeness between the two types of administration in the light of global economic meltdown and public sector reforms 2.2 Introduction The present unit intends to lay out one of the protracted debates in the text book of Public Administration i.e. the relationship between the public and the private administration. The unit has illustrated both sides of the debate: whereas one the one hand, it dwells on the fundamental difference between the public and private administration; and on the other hand, it figures out the similarities between them. Finally, drawing on the recent developments of public sector reforms and New Public Management in the time of global economic meltdown, the unit shows that the two types of administration comes closer than ever before. The debate between public versus private administration seems to have plagued the discipline of Public Administration since its inception and contributing greatly to its identity distress. If one revisits the major arguments mooted at the Minnowbrook I conference, the above

17 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) debate would have been evident. Interestingly, the debate refused to die down even after 147 years of its existence as an academic discipline. Though a few attempts have been made after Minnowbrook I conference to distinguish Public Administration from its private or non-public counterparts, the distinction gets blurred once again with the onset of globalization. Interestingly, the nomenclature of Public Administration was a later addition. If we consider Public Administration both as a vocation as well as an applied principle of management it is as old as civilization. Public Administration then was primarily the principle of organization designed to cater the private business. Publicness of public administration was conspicuous by its absence. It was a later addition. In the early part of 20th century when the growth of capital was hit by roadblocks in the form of severe social backlashes, publicness of Public Administration was brought into being to salvage private business. Hence, public and private administration has an interesting relationship, which includes both the similarities as well as differences. Any cursory glance at the literature of Public Administration would have substantiated the said statement. Whereas a few schol ars like Herbert A. Simon, Paul H. Appleby, Peter Drucker et al have underlined the marked differences in the nature of two types of administration, others like Henry Fayol, Urwick, Pfiffner and Presthus have simply ignored the difference by underlining subtle commonalities between the two types of administration. The central arguments of those who have identified the marked difference between private and public administration are namely the scope of administration, motive of the administration, nature of operation, and so on. The other group of scholars, who have underlined the similarities between two types of administration, based their arguments on the following commonalities like similar hierarchical bureaucratic organization, similar working condition, similar set of rules, and so on. However, it would be grossly misleading to put them into two water tight compartments. In fact, it is better to consider them as 'two species of the same genus', with their respective differences.
In the following sections an attempt will be made to elucidate the above debate. 2.3 Differences between Public and Private Administration The present section draws on the differences between Public and Private Administration. John Gaus, Ludivig Von Mises, Paul H. Appleby, Sir Josia Stamp, Herbert A. Simon, Peter Drucker, etc., in their writings, have made distinction between Public and Private Administration. According to Simon, the distinction between Public and Private Administration relates mainly to three points: first, Public Administration is bureaucratic whereas Private Administration is business like; Secondly, Public Administration is political where as Private Administration is non-political; and, 18

NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) thirdly, Public Administration is characterized by red-tape where as Private Administration is free from it.
Almost in a similar vein Paul H. Appleby has made a distinction between Public Administration and Private Administration. According to him, "in broad terms the governmental function and attitude have at least three complementary aspects that go to differentiate government from all other institutions:

areas of activities and breadth of scope, impact and consideration; public accountability and political character. Public administration works in close proximity with politics and enjoys the benefit of political responsibility for administrative activities. Private Administration can remain away from politics and is directly and solely responsible for its own activities" Scholars those who believed in distinction between Public and Private Administration have underscored the following issues : First, the first and the foremost issue that distinguishes Public Administration from its private counterpart is public Administration's commitment towards public interest. Public Administration is known for its commitment towards public welfare. Whereas, the private / business administration is generally guided by the profit motive, Public Administration is driven by altruistic motive. Secondly, public administration also differs from Private Administration on ground of its scope or magnitude. In terms of scope or magnitude, Public Administration is far wider and diversified than its private counterpart. Public administration is very comprehensive in nature and covers all the activities of the government. The private/ business administration on the contrary is much more limited in its scope.Thirdly, public accountability is considered to be another redeeming feature of Public Administration. In Public Administration administrators or executives have to work under the strict public vigil. They remain answerable to the public for all their acts of commission and omission. The scope of public scrutiny gets widened these days with the promulgation of several path-breaking legislations like RTIs, in addition to existing mechanisms of public scrutiny like legislature, executives, judiciary, and press. However, private / business administration does not have to work under such stringent public vigil. There is no denying that there is a mechanism of internal audit and control in private administration, but its operation is not open to public scrutiny. In this context a comment made by Paul H.Appleby deserves some space here. To Appleby "

government administration differs from all other administrative work to a degree not even faintly realised outside, by virtue of its public nature, the way in which it is subject to public scrutiny and outcry. This interest often runs to details of administrative action that in private business would never be of concern other then inside the organization".

19 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Fourthly, transparency is another important component of Public Administration that differentiates it from Private Administration. The operation of Public Administration is by and large open and transparent. On other hand, private/business administration is known for its secrecy of transaction. General employees do not have any access to such information. Fifthly, unlike the control of investors on financial affairs in private administration, in public administration, there is public control over the finance. Hence, no financial autonomy is provided in case of public administration as state acts as a supreme repository of public finance. The state via legislative mechanism, budget and auditing keeps a tab on public administration. However, private administration is gifted with much financial freedom. Sixthly, Public Administration is also committed to treat clientele uniformly irrespective of their socio-economic and political background. Backed up by the principle of the rule of law enshrined in the constitution, Public Administration is assigned to deliver all the goods and services to the citizen. Private Administration, no matter whether it is associated with the delivery of any service, does not have any such obligation. Driven by the profit motive, private administration only pays heed to those consumers who have adequate purchasing power. Seventhly, political character is another important hallmark of Public Administration. Owing to its engagement in democratic process and its ever responsiveness to public interest, Public Administration has been a subject of relentless political direction and control. Private administration on the other hand, is relatively free from politics as it functions largely in tune with the market forces. In order to foreground the political character of Public Administration vis-à-vis Private Administration Paul H. Appleby has nicely captured the essence of Public Administration in the following words: "

administration is politics since it must be responsive to the public interest. It is necessary to emphasize the fact that popular political processes, which are the essence of democracy, can only work through governmental organization, and that all governmental organizations are not merely administrative entities, they are and must be political organisms."

Eighthly, Public Administration unlike its private counterpart has to work under a maze of rules and regulations. In Public Administration an administrator has to work under the paraphernalia of rules and regulations. The rationale behind designing such control mechanisms is to ensure that the administrative (public) activities are carried out in accordance with legislative and executive policies and any abuses of political power and public fund & may be curbed. However, Private Administrations do not have to work under such complex layers of rules and regulations.
20 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Ninthly, in Public Administration administrators generally remain anonymous. Drawing on Weberian characterization of ideal type bureaucracy, public administrator seem to have imbibed the spirit of anonymity in discharging his/her assigned duties. Though designed to infuse impartiality in administration, this anonymous character of public administrator has its serious drawback as it may shield any wrongdoer with impunity due to lack of his/her identity. Private administration on the contrary, does things on its behalf. Tenthly, in terms of efficiency and effectiveness private administration always fares better than public administration. Though, of late there is an increasing sensitivity among the public administrators regarding efficiency and effectiveness, efficiency has never been a strong point in public administration. In fact, it is only in the wake of NPM movement across the globe that efficiency becomes a major issue in public administration. Private administration on the other hand is hailed for its supposed efficiency and effectiveness. Eleventh, public administration has an inherent tendency to monopolize. Though, of late with the onset of globalization public administration has parted with several duties monopolized by it so long, conceptually it does not allow competition in the provision of goods and services to the people. Private administration on the other hand, is essentially competitive in nature. 2.4 Commonalities between Public and Private Administration Despite having differences between public and Private Administration, mentioned above, it would be completely misleading to consider them as diametrically opposite entities. In fact, a great deal of commonality exists between the two types of administration as both of these administration subscribe to some common principles of organization. A group of scholars like Henry Fayol, Urwick et al have denied the line of demarcation between private and public administration. To them administration is the unified entity, which has two different variants viz. Private and Public Administration. Urwick for example has shunned any such attempt. To him "the attempt to subdivide the study of management or administration in accordance with the purposes or particular forms of undertaking seems to many authorities equally misdirected.

They have much in common. POSDCORB techniques are common to both". Hence, as Fayol had cautioned us, "

we are no longer confronted with several administrative sciences but one which can be applied equally well to public and private affairs". Hence, the following commonalities can be identified between Public and Private Administration :

21 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) The first and the foremost commonality between Public and Private Administration one could identify is that both types of administration are equally committed to provide efficient , effective and prompt services to the people. Secondly, both types of administration have to work under the similar working conditions. In a democratic set up both Private and Public Administration have to deal with popular demands and to abide by similar legal constraints. Therefore, both types of administration have to relentlessly adjust to the changing socio-economic and political environment. Thirdly, both types of administration have to cater their own clientele. Hence, both types of administration want to keep the clientele in good humour by developing a continuous, cordial relationship. Fourthly, both types of administration are amenable to similar set of rules and regulations. Fifthly, the managerial technique applied for managing administration is common for both the Private and Public Administrations. Sixthly, both types of administration have to wrestle with hierarchical set up in administrative deliberations. Though there is a difference of degree of hierarchy between Private and Public Administration, both have to muddle through it in handling personnel policy. Seventhly, the line of demarcation is often getting blurred in management as several types of partnership between Public and Private Administration in the name of PPP models or leasing out of services are coming up to handle new Administrative realities. Eighthly, both Public and Private Administration have been relentlessly striving for the improvement of the goods and services being provided by them. This is more so in the era of globalization, when citizen centricity becomes the heart of any administrative deliberation be it private or public in nature. 2.5 Conclusion To sum up, it can be argued that the neither the difference nor the similarities between Public and Private Administration is absolute. In fact, in reality there are lots of intersections, overlapping and grey areas between them. For operational convenience, these two types of administrations do often interact. Therefore, it is not judicious to bank on either of the extremes. This is more so if we take a look at the world wide neoliberal agenda like public sector reforms, New Public Management etc. in the globalized world designed to salvage neoliberalism from a series of market debacles. On the face of successive market meltdowns across the globe, a realization sets in among the neoliberals that too much reliance on market and that too at the cost of public sector (state/government) is at best be avoided. Hence, there has been a renewal of interest in public sector among the neoliberals. With no visible respite in sight, the neoliberals have decided to take recluse in the strong arm of the state by reforming public sector with infusion of several market principles of efficiency and economy.

22 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Thus, for all practical reasons, the line of distinction between Public and Private Administration gets blurred. In today's world of heightened citizen-centricity several innovations like PPP model, contracting out of services, single window services etc, which have been made to provide efficient services to the citizen, have brought both the administration closer than ever before. Hence, there is no point in hammering at the differences between Private and Public Administration. 2.6 Summary ? In this unit we have understood one of the protracted debates in the textbook of Public Administration that is the relationship between the Public and Private administration. ? We have also explained the differences and similarities between the two types. ? Finally, this unit show us how the two types of administration come closer than ever before. 2.7 Glossary Altruistic : Behaviour is normally described as altruistic when it is motivated by a desire to benefit from one other than oneself. To provide with the historical background of both traditions of Public Administration– European and American 3.2 Introduction This unit intends to map the evolution of Public Administration. However, it is a daunting task as there is no unified version of the discipline. In fact, Public Administration is a contextually grown discipline. The present unit has the following arguments : First, the discipline has no authentic history to date. Secondly, there is no unified mass of Public Administration, no authoritative version of the discipline, associated with a particular geographical location, no authoritative commentator of the discipline and obviously no authoritative texts. Thirdly, since Public Administration is primarily a contextually grown discipline, there should be multiple versions of Public Administration with their respective histories, instead of one. Fourthly, there 24 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) has been a typical America-centricity or arguably parochialism in the epistemology of Public Administration. Several factors can be identified for such trends, which include among others the initial insularity of the American foreign policy, her apparent socio- economic and political stability during that phase, and the bailout package like Marshal Plan offered by the American government for the war ravaged Europe. Fifthly, the chapter also argues that we come across a new homogenizing version of Public Administration informed by New Public Management, heightened citizen-orientation, governance and so on since 1990s with the onset of globalization. However, this apparent familiarity of Public Administration does not automatically bring in a unified version of Public Administration. In fact, it is to be noted that relentless process of localizing is equally operational. Hence, the apparent projection of homogenous version of Public Administration needs to be customized in accordance with the local specificity. Sixthly, Public Administration, both as an academic discipline and a contemplative- cum-operational science of management has been wrestling with the intriguing question of identity ever since it came into being in 1887. Interestingly, more than hundred years down the line, the discipline is still in search of a stable identity. Seventhly, the discipline also lacks a coherent theoretical development. Eighthly, despite having an avowed applied directionality, the study of Public Administration mostly confines itself to several half-baked recipes of governance, constructs, approaches, concepts, models etc. for the want of an all-agreed homogeneous epistemology of Public Administration. 3.3 The Conceptual Mapping of the Discipline Here in this unit an attempt has been made to make sense of the development of the discipline, not just as a mere enumeration of the phases of its development. To begin this section one would invariably encounter a host of problems: first, why do we need a conceptual mapping of the discipline at the first place? How do we map the discipline? Which version of Public Administration should we take as authentic? Is there any authentic history of the discipline? Or there are histories of the discipline? And so on. Answering these questions would invariably draw us closer to the historical developments of the discipline, and its persistent identity distress. The discipline has no authentic history to date. In fact, the development of the discipline is largely context specific. Hence, instead of tracing the history of the discipline, we should look for histories of the discipline, spreading across the borders. Until recently, the discipline of Public Administration has been dominated by the American texts, leading to the resultant marginalization of the contextual development of Public Administration. It is quite interesting but true that despite adequate background for the flourishing and

25 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) dissemination, the British tradition of Public Administration could not develop its independent status. In fact, the American tradition had overshadowed the European tradition during the post-cold war period. Why this is so? Why most of the text books in the discipline are of American in nature? Is Public Administration developed and practiced in US alone? Is it practicable to draw on an American version of Public Administration as authentic? These are but few puzzles that bound to haunt the students of Public Administration. Thanks to the Marshal plan and other ways of establishing American hegemony, the US tradition had been popularized throughout the globe. It is true that as an academic discipline Public Administration is relatively younger compared to her mother discipline of Political Science. It is little more than hundred years old. But Public Administration as a systematic contemplation and execution of collective efforts of management is as old as human civilization. The roots of the discipline especially the practical operational part of it can be traced back to the era of hunter-gatherers. As an academic discipline, though its origin and development is often associated with US, the European contribution to it is no less important, especially if we consider the importance of bureaucratic theory of management or administrative law etc. Before we continue, a caveat needs to be sounded that Public Administration does not have any authentic account of its development. More than hundred years down the line, the discipline is still in search of a stable identity. The different spatial location of its development has further added to the confusion. There is a clear distinction between Anglo-American and European (French and German) variants of Public Administration with their respective priorities. Actually, the discipline has had a long gestation period and that predates even 1887 and spans across both sides of the Atlantic. Most of the texts chronicle the evolution of Public Administration in the overall background of America. Even the handbooks of the discipline from reputed publications are not also free from the American bias. Consequently, the contextual documentation of Public Administration has suffered from serious setback. The Anglo-American version of Public Administration seemed to have overshadowed the other versions of highly rich variants of Public Administration. Thanks to colonial expansion and the resultant dissemination of enlightened rationality across the globe, Anglo-American versions of Public Administration took up the centre stage. If one starts revisiting the very article which is often claimed to have given birth to the discipline of Public Administration (at least the American version of it) authored by Woodrow Wilson, he or she will find that Wilson was too modest to claim any credit of fathering the discipline. On the contrary, he had rather candidly acknowledged the French and German professors for it and called for a similar kind of 'science of administration' for the Americans. In fact, much before the Wilsonian advocacy of the

Ouriginal by Turnitin

26 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) science of administration, there was a well-established tradition of Public Administration in Europe A few commentators even have tried to locate the crisis of identity within the very article of Wilson, which was apparently ambivalent and had no precise outline of the nascent discipline. Even some of them refused to acknowledge Wilson as the intellectual founder of Public Administration. Notable among them was Van Riper who wanted to give the credit of fathering of Public Administration to Dorman Eaton. In fact, the term 'Public Administration' began to figure prominently in European discourse as early as 17th century to 'distinguish between absolutist monarch's administration of public affairs and his management of his private household', however, the official recognition did not come until World War-I, when the professional chairs were introduced and the instructional textbooks on the discipline were published. Even in the context of America, there is hardly any consensus on the exact date of birth of the discipline, as a few scholars have traced the beginning of Public Administration in the publication of the famous 'Federalist Papers' by James Madison, Alexander Hamilton and John Jay. Stillman II has shown that American version of Public Administration, unlike its European counterpart, has "bubbled up quietly and haphazardly from grassroots reform, imbued with protestant moral uplift and democratic idealism". In fact, it preceded the state formation. European Public Administration was, however, a natural outgrowth of nation-state formation and had a strong state tradition. Stillman II has nicely put such dichotomy in the following words: 'continental Europeans deduce Public Administration from reason of state, whereas America's missing sense of state forces us to induce state from Public Administration. This fundamental difference, a deductive vs. an inductive way of thinking about the field, stands as a great divide separating the two sides of the Atlantic.' Hence, two distinctive strands in the evolution of Public Administration can be identified viz. the European and the American. European Public Administration was, however, a natural outgrowth of nation-state formation. But the American tradition of Public Administration is bubbling up from the grassroots. The distinctiveness of the said two strands of administration is also discernable in their respective approaches to organization. The American Public Administration has a purportedly 'human processual approach', whereas the European counterpart relied on a typical `techno-structural' approach. Whereas the human processual approach 'focuses on people and their collective goals', the techno- structural approach `focuses on the structure, technology and environment of organization'. 3.4 European Origin The systematic study of the discipline began in Europe, much before the Wilsonian advocacy of science of administration. In fact, Wilson had categorical mentioned the

27 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) contribution of European scholars in the following words: 'No, American writers have hitherto taken no very important part in the advancement of this science. It has found its doctors in Europe. It is not of our making; it is a foreign science, speaking very little of the language of English or American principle. It employs only foreign tongues; it utters none but what are to our minds alien ideas. Its aims, its examples, its conditions, are almost exclusively grounded in the histories of foreign races, in the precedents of foreign systems, in the lessons of foreign revolution'. European origin of the discipline can be attributed to the 'bureaucratization of nation-state'. Initially, it was dedicated to the grooming of the upcoming public officials for public service in Prussia. Hence, it was confined to a kind of code of conduct which includes a few do's and don'ts, necessary to guide a public servant in running a public office. Hence the study of administration in European context was largely a part of vocational training programme for the budding public servants. The Prussian example was adopted in rest of the Europe as well, though it was mainly confined to the civil service aspirants among the intelligentsia. 3.5 American Origin Though Public Administration as an academic discipline is a late corner in the US, it reached its apogee in terms of academic sophistication within a few decades of its existence. Before we discuss evolution of American Public Administration, the distinctive features of American society and polity need to be discussed, that could possibly give us clues of the uniqueness of American Public Administration. First, unlike its European counterpart, the US had enjoyed a relative insularity of sort, which had its impact on the development of American Public Administration. Several factors were held responsible for such insularity in its first century of existence. They include among others- geographic isolation, agrarian self-sufficiency, absence of threat to national security and limited demand for public services. But the situation began to change from late 19th century as a host of new developments like technological innovations, growing involvement in the international affairs, and increasing participation in a democratic coupled with a vicious environment of governance at the local level seemed to have challenged the US government, forcing her to end the seclusion and to work for a separate discipline. A select perusal of Woodrow Wilson's celebrated essay would validate the point. Wilson wrote: "the poisonous atmosphere of city government, crooked secrets of the state administration, the confusion, sinecurism, and corruption ever and again discovered in the bureaus at Washington forbid us to believe that any clear conception what constitutes good administration are as yet widely current in United States". As a young scholar, Woodrow Wilson rose

28 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) up to the occasion with a forceful plea for a new discipline. Second, The US had a typical anti-statist political tradition, which had led to a stunted and cautious growth of Public Administration. This radical anti-statist tradition in the political culture of the US was evident in the constitution, which remained conspicuously silent about anything that even remotely smacked of state power and authority. Consequently the important issues like civil service, budgets, executive departments, planning and so on did not find any mention in the Constitution. Moreover, the framing document of American state, had stipulated additional measures like federalism, separation of powers, periodic elections, a bill of rights and the like in order to ensure the goal of 'life, liberty and pursuit of happiness' as enshrined in the Declaration of Independence. The following factors are held responsible for such anti-statist tradition in the American political culture (a) Philosophically, the anti-statist tradition had drawn its inspiration from the Lockean philosophy of individual liberty, and the 16th century Calvinist religion. (b) The immigration was also held responsible for anti-statism in America. "America's belief in anti-statism" as Stillman views, "was further soundly reinforced over more than three centuries by waves of immigrants fleeing all sorts of oppressive regimes, from the Puritans in 1960 to the twentieth-century's escapees from fascism, communism, and numerous other varieties of 'isms', all carrying a peculiarly virulent hostility towards statism". Owing to above reasons and specificities, the development of Public Administration in US had registered a delayed and hesitant start. In fact, the growth of Public Administration research and training in the true sense of the term began in 1930s. The interlude between the Wilsonian advocacy and the publication of the first text on the subject by L.D. White was marked by a discourse, popularly known as 'Politic-administration dichotomy'. Hence, tracing the evolution of Public Administration as a 'heuristic' discipline is a problematique proposition as the development of Public Administration is largely context-specific and dependent upon the differential practices of administration. However, saving the American version no other contextual history of Public Administration is available. The puzzle of the overwhelming presence of the American ideas in the epistemology of Public Administration despite Wilson's acknowledgement to the contrary, can be solved if we consider the international political and social contexts of 1930s and 1940s along with Second World War. The initial insularity of the American foreign policy and her apparent socio-economic and political stability during that phase had enticed the war- ravaged Europe to fall back on America for the bailing out package in the form of international aid. The America-centricity is quite revealing in the epistemology of Public Administration.
29 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) 3.6 Paradigm of Public Administration American-centricity in Public Administration is evident in a famous article where Nicholas Henry has equated American Public Administration with the discipline of Public Administration per se. In this celebrated article he had encapsulated the evolution of American Public Administration in form of five overlapping paradigms. A brief overview of these paradigms deserves some space here. Drawing on Robert T. Golembiewski's perceptive essay, which has understood intellectual development of Public Administration in terms of locus and focus, Nicholas Henry has identified five paradigms: paradigm-1 (The Politics-Administration Dichotomy), paradigm-II (The Principal of Administration), paradigm-III (Public Administration as Political Science), paradigm-IV (Public Administration as Administrative Sciences), and paradigm-V (Public Administration as Public Administration).

Paradigm I : The Politics/Administration Dichotomy (1900-1926) This paradigm marks the distinction between politics and administration. Though initiated by Woodrow Wilson in his path breaking article entitled 'The Study of Administration' in 1887, Henry had earmarked the publication years of two important publications by Frank J. Goodnow and L.D. White to identify this paradigm. Frank J. Goodnow was the first to theoretically substantiate the Wilsonian advocacy for separation between politics and administration in 1900 in Politics and Administration. For Goodnow politics should be concerned with the policies and the expression of state will; and administration with the execution of policies. The major thrust of this paradigm was the locus—where Public Administration should be. This dichotomous relationship had another strong advocacy in the first text book of the discipline— 'An Introduction to the Study of Public Administration' authored by L.D. White. White had categorically mentioned that there should not be any intrusion of politics in administration. Paradigm II : The Principles of Administration (1927-1937) The second paradigm is associated with the publication of F. W. Willoughby's book "Principles of Public Administration" in 1927, where he had called for the development of scientific principles of administration. To him mastering of these scientific principles would give administrators managerial edge over others. The birth of this paradigm had definite contextual underpinnings. Owing to their superior knowledge of management, Public Administrationists during 1930s and 1940s were the most sought after experts, both in industry and government. Consequently, the Public Administrationists started 'manufacturing' the scientific principles of organization with universal applicability, which had culminated to `the high noon of orthodoxy' with the publication by Luther 30 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) H. Gullick and Lyndall Urwick, entitled Papers on the Science of Administration' in 1937. A select perusal from one of the papers from the said publication by Urwick is indicative of the universal pretention and orthodoxy : "

It is
the general thesis of this paper that there are principles which can be arrived at inductively from the study of human organization which should govern arrangements for human association of any kind.
These principles can be studied as a technical question, irrespective of the purpose of the enterprise, the personnel comprising it, or any constitutional, political or social theory underlying its creation."
However, the heyday of the scientific principles of organization had come to an abrupt end during 1938 to 1950. The traditional ideas of Public Administration like politic/administration dichotomy along with the scientific principles of organization had faced serious rebuttals from the scholars like Robert A. Dahl, Herbert Simon, Waldo et al. However, the most damaging of these was the 'formidable dissection' (to paraphrase Henry) by Herbert Simon. Simon in his Administrative Behaviour in 1947 had questioned the feasibility of the scientific principle of organization. By the mid- century 'the two defining pillars of public administration.' namely the politics/ administration dichotomy and the principles of administration had been discarded by the scholars of the discipline. The loss of this two defining pillars of public administration had relegated the discipline from a distinctive epistemological identity to the margin. However, the traditional public administration had managed to withstand the assiduous attacks on its basic foundation. Interestingly enough for resurrection it had to rely upon Herbert Simon, who was actually instrumental in discrediting its very foundation. In fact, in a lesser known article, entitled "A comment on 'The Science of Public Administration' Simon argued in favor of pure science of administration on a thorough grounding in social psychology. However, such proposal of Simon of maintaining pure science on the plain of social psychology had all the likelihood of logically drifting public administration from its mother discipline, Political Science, which has been a rich source of human values for it. But owing to the following factors the ties between political science and public administration had remained intact: firstly, the public policy making process kept the linkages between Political Science and Public Administration. Secondly, political scientists have been resisting the growing independence of Public Administration, because political wanted to keep a dominant position over Public Administration. Thirdly, the precarious conditions of political science during post-second world war era had kept the ties intact as Public Administration had been the greatest drawing card for student enrollments and government grants.

31 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Paradigm-III : Public Administration as Political Science (1950-1970) Consequently, Public Administration had managed to keep its place within the discipline of Political Science. The third phase marks a consolidation of the strenuous relationship between Political Science and Public Administration. The outcome of this exercise was the 'defining away' the field in terms of priorities, essential expertise, area of interest, and so on. But the apparent bonhomie, as it were, between the disciplines in the early 1950s had evaporated with the end of the decade and deep- seated superiority complex of Political Science began to surface. Public Administration has been systemically dropped from different disciplinary committees of the American Political Science Association. Waldo had nicely encapsulated this big brotherly attitude of Political Science in the following words: "the truth is that the attitude of political scientists...is at best one of indifference and is often one of undisguised contempt or hostility. We are now hardly welcome in the house of our youth". Paradigm-IV : Public Administration as Administrative Sciences (1956-1970) Under this paradigm a desperate effort was evident among the scholars to get out of shadow of Political Science and to stake its claim as an independent discipline. Driven by the 'the undisguised contempt' expressed in the attitude of the political scientists vis -a vis Public Administration, Public Administrators began to search for an alternative in administrative science option. This paradigm almost coincided with paradigm III. Major concern of this paradigm was the loss of identity within the confines of an overarching concept. As a paradigm administrative science has a focus but the locus was not clearly defined. A number of developments have been registered in this phase as the business schools have offered alternative paradigm. A new journal called 'Administrative Science Quarterly began its journey during this phase to underscore the premise that administration is a universal construct, therefore making the distinction among public, business and institutional administration is wrong. This paradigm has also witnessed a rapid development of organizations. However, the major shortcoming with this paradigm was that though it fell short of claiming universal credential, believed that all organizations and managerial methodologies have certain characteristics, patterns and pathologies in common. 3.7 Evolution of Public Administration On the basis of the above rationale, Stillman II has traced the evolution of American Public Administration under the following heads : POSDCORB Orthodoxy (1926-1946)-Stillman II took

The POSDCORB is an acronym, which encapsulates the kernel of good administration viz. planning, organizing, staffing, directing, coordinating, reporting and budgeting. It was popularized by Luther Gullick in his famous book entitled 'The Papers on the Science of Administration'(1937). It arrived at a time when the US was reeling under the twin crises—the Great Depression and World War II and claimed to have bailed out the US from the said crises. However, the POSDCORB orthodoxy failed to impress the post war scholars. To them POSDCORB view was full of contradictions. Social Science Heterodoxy (1947-1967)— This phase had witnessed the waning of POSDCORB orthodoxy and the birth of social science heterodoxy. Contextually speaking, with the successful campaign against the twin challenges mentioned above, the US had emerged as a new leader in the post war world order. Soon the US had repudiated her century-old policy of seclusion and got embroiled in a protracted cold war with the communists. The POSDCORB perspective of administration found inadequate to meet the new realities as Robert Dahl and Herbert Simon had shown in their respective publications. Under the circumstance, the American had engaged into a 'self-protectionist's frenzy of administrative state-building'. And subsequently in the process it had encouraged a cross-fertilization of knowledge of social sciences. The social science heterodoxy was the outcome of such context. As a result American Public Administration becomes much broader and less parochial. The Reassertion of Democratic Idealism (1968-1988)— From the late 1960s to late 1980s the American society had witnessed a tremendous upsurge of democratic idealism in the form of anti-statism, which was culminated in two separate events viz. Minnowbrook Conference and the publication of Vincent Ostrom's 'The Intellectual Crisis in American Public Administration'. Stillman called them as the manifestation of 'democratic temper of the times'. The Refounding Movement (1989-to the Present Day)— The year 1989 had dawned a new era of US hegemony with the collapse of Communism. However, the dramatic event had also opened up floodgates of problems and challenges before the US government, which needed to be addressed at war footing. Public Administration, both as a contemplative and operational science of management, had geared up to the challenges and started refounding its basics. A few fundamental questions were re- excavated and the issues like public interest, accountability, responsibility, public welfare and so on had resurfaced in the discourse of Public Administration. Stillman has identified seven distinctive strand of thoughts engaged in this refounding exercise or movement viz. the reinventors, the communitarians, the VPI refounders, the 33 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curretion (Dt. 17.10.2022) interpretivists, the tools makers, new bureaucratic analysts, from management to governance. The Re-inventors— This group of thinkers had drawn their inspiration from a path-breaking publication by David Osborne and Ted Gaebler, entitled Reinventing Government (1992). Written in the backdrop of receding credibility of bureaucratic governance, Osborne and Gaebler, in their book did not repose their faith on the alternative market option. Quite alive to the weaknesses of both the alternatives, they came out with a third way'. Combining the best of government and the best of market, they suggested a hybridization of sort, what they called "the Entrepreneurial Government". The prescription put forward in the book was adopted by the Clinton administration to reform the federal government. However, from the late 1990s for various reasons, the re-inventing government had experienced marked decline. The Communitarians : Banking on the philosophy of communitarianism, a group of intellectuals like Etzioni, Selznick, Galston, Chrislip et al have actively campaigned for retrieving the value of community or communal living in order to counter the breakdown of society and social dislocation. The VPI Refounders : Unlike the above two schools, the Virginia Polytechnic Institute(VPI) refounders were mostly the insiders. They were mostly senior scholars of the discipline. With an objective of figuring out the future of the discipline they met at the French town of Charllott.The upshot of the meet, subsequently known as the Blacksburg Manifesto, came out in two successive publications under the following titles: "Refounding Public Administration"(1990) and 'Refounding Democratic Public Administration"(1996). The Interpretivists : Drawing on the philosophical principles of phenomenology and ontology, the interpretivist administrative thinkers sought to probe into some of the profound questions confronting the discipline. The Tools Makers : This school of refounders advanced new 'analytical methods' for 'weighing the costs and benefits of various delivery alternatives', without bothering about the ethical question of right and wrong. New Bureaucratic Analysis : This school contributes a rich literature of Public Administration, which relocates the fundamental issues pertaining to public bureaucracy viz. public accountability, oversight, control, power, institutional performance, responsiveness to democracy, to interest groups. From Management to Governance : This school has argued that the traditional top- down management practices have given way to new model governance.

Conclusion
In the foregoing analysis an attempt has been made to trace the evolution of public administration as a discipline. However, as evident from the above discussion, it is out and out a problematic proposition as there is no uniform version of Public Administration as practice is in place. In fact, owing to contextual variations Public Administration as a practice develops several variations. Hence, as a discipline Public Administration encounters difficulty of generalization in terms of its conceptual mass as well as its stages of growth. Hence, the need of the hour is to get out of typical Anglo-American periodization of the stages of growth of Public Administration and to customize it in accordance with the socio-cultural context. 3.9 Summary An attempt has been made to trace the evolution of public administration as a discipline. Indeed in the shift from the 'government in operation' to 'government in collaboration' Public Administration has traversed a long distance ever since it came into being. The present unit intends to take stock of the discipline especially in the era of globalization. There is no denying that globalization has brought a paradigm shift in the epistemic world, Public Administration as a discipline is no exception either. As a multifaceted phenomenon, globalization has literally challenged the very foundation of the discipline i.e. the sheet anchoring role of state in Public Administration. Conceptualized in different ways, globalization is essentially a neoliberal design of expanding the model of free market economy across the globe. For operational purpose, globalization calls for a radical restructuring of public affairs with the progressive downsizing of the state and the corresponding enlargement of the market.
37 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Such tectonic shift in the very conceptualization of public sector has a serious repercussion for public administration both as a discipline and as a practice as the scholars and practitioners had rightly cautioned us about the uncertain future of the discipline. But proving those apprehensions false, public administration has survived the onslaught of globalization and reinvented itself to cope up with the changes.

It has freed the discipline from the stifling regimen of structure and paved the way for more accommodative, less hierarchical type of a discipline based on networking and collaboration. The present unit will try to assess the impact of globalization on public administration. 4.3 Making sense of Globalization Before moving on to the next section for analyzing the impact of globalization on public administration both as a discipline and practice, this section attempts to make sense of globalization. As mentioned earlier, globalization has taken the globe by storm. As a multifaceted phenomenon, globalization has touched upon almost all the aspects of our life. Though the word globalization came into vogue in 1990s, the term was coined for the first time in 1959 by The Economist. Even the word global had a history of 400 years. (Water:ibid). Despite the centrality of the concept in our daily life there is hardly any all- agreed definition of it. The Handbook of Globalization, Governance, and Public Administration (2007) has rightly captured the essence of conceptual dilemma associated with the concept of globalization in the following words: "Globalization has meant many things to many people. The ideas are diverse, interchangeable, and broad, so much so that it is easy to fall into a definitional trap. For example-economists consider globalization as an advance step toward a fully integrated world market. Political Scientists view it as a march away from the conventionally defined concept of state with territorial sovereignty and the emergence of supranational and global governing bodies under a new world order. Business school scholars and consultants see globalization as unlimited opportunities in a borderless world'. Others view globalization as a phenomenon driven only by private sector corporations, not governments. These viewpoints reflect different lenses of seeing the world, and they promote the interests they are supposed to serve"(Farazmand and Pinkowski: 2007). The associated conceptual confusion notwithstanding, globalization is out and out an epoch making phenomenon that forces us to revamp our conventional worldviews on polity, economy and society. Moreover, the concept of globalization is projected with such a conviction that it may appear inevitable and the possibility of any alternative to it is literally nonexistent. However, critics have refused to buy the inevitability thesis by associating it with capitalist development. To them, globalization has been brought into being as an ideological smokescreen to clothe the real expansionist design of the capitalism. Drawing on the analysis by David Held and McGrew globalization can be conceptualized by a "tripartite cluster of forces viz. increasing global economic interconnectedness, repositioning of political space and national sovereignty, and last but not least the growing and deepening enmeshment of global and local cultures" (David Held and McGrew:2000). Hence, the concept of globalization comprises of three important dimensions, viz. economic, political and social/ cultural. Here an attempt will be made to discuss each dimension in a user-friendly manner. Economic Dimension Economic dimension of globalization stands for integration of national economics into international economic order marked by free trade, free flow of labour and capital, and free flow of technology. Essentially economic in nature it is associated with the modalities like Liberalization, Privatization and Globalization or what is popularly known as LPG. Though not necessarily happened in a sequential manner, success of globalization calls for proper implementation of the aforementioned modalities. Liberalization, one of the most important components of globalization points to the unlocking of the domestic market to open competition. Unlike the typical protectionist approach usually adopted by the national governments to salvage the domestic market from being exposed to the harsh external competition, liberalization process encourages bringing down of the tariff barrier between sovereign states. Jiblerto and Mommen have identified the following components of liberalization: "first, privatization of state and parastatal enterprises in order to reduce inefficiencies and government protection monopolies; second, high interest rates and credit squeeze in order to reduce inflationary tendencies; third, trade liberalization in order to open up the internal market and expose local industry to world market competition and boost foreign trade exchange; fourth, domestic demand management, leading to a lowering of state budgets and decreasing expenditure in the social sector; fifth, currency adjustment in order to improve the balance of payment by raising import prices and making exports more competitive; and sixth, free market prices in order to remove distortions resulting from import taxes on luxury items" (Jiblerto and Mommen: as cited by K.N. Kabra:1996). Another important component of the economic dimension of globalization is privatization. It calls for gradual relieving of the state from its duty of provisioning goods and services to the people with the corresponding enlargement of the role of private sector. However, privatization is not always a self propelled

39 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) proposition. In fact, the demand for privatization is raised due to several pressures, as Savas has mentioned four such forces viz. pragmatic pressure, ideological pressure, commercial pressure and populist pressure. Further, Savas has identified four 'interrelated and mutually reinforcing strategies' to put privatization in practice viz. load-shedding, devolution, user charges, and competition. And the final component of economic dimension is globalization itself. It signifies the unification of global markets. Three different kinds of infrastructures are believed to have been instrumental in implementing globalization, which include among others the physical infrastructure comprising of communication, transport and banking systems, normative infrastructure like trade laws and symbolic infrastructure like English as lingua franca (Held & McGrew: ibid). Political Dimension Though globalization indicates an economic project of unification of global markets, the success of the said project is contingent upon political dimension to a great extent. In order words, successful globalization called for a thorough 'reconfiguration of political space' so long dominated by Westphalian state-centric geopolitics. It is also said that globalization has dawned a post-Westphalian world order. The Westphalian 'constitution of world-order' was the product of the treaty of Westphalia signed at the end of thirty years' war in 1648. The treaty was famous for heralding a new era of sovereign nation-state system based on the three principles of territoriality, sovereignty, and autonomy. Globalization has not only brought a paradigm shift by ushering in an era of 'geo-centric global politics', but also infused a reasonable amount of apprehension and fear among the disciples of sovereign nation states. But proving those apprehensions baseless, nation states survive the so-called neoliberal onslaught of globalization, albeit in a new form. In fact, the onset of globalization has led to a re-positioning of the state vis-à-vis non-governmental sectors including market, NGOs, civil society organization, people's initiatives in the garb of governance. Social/Cultural Dimension The third and the most important component of globalization is the cultural or social dimension. Cultural elements play significant roles in sustaining the process of globalization. There is no denying that for successful globalization, economic integration of global markets and its political precondition of repositioning of political space should be backed up by cultural homogenization. However, it is very difficult to pin down the actual nature of cultural element, as it simultaneously represents the component and variant of globalization. Moreover, it would be prudent to understand the nature of cultural or social element of globalization as it represents two contradictory pulls

40 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) viz, cultural homogenization vis-à-vis cultural specificities in terms of localization. Hence, the successful completion of globalization is contingent upon relentless contestations between the two processes. Theoretically speaking, it is believed that the homogenization of global cultural space would bolster the unification of global capital, but in reality the cultural specificities in the form of innumerable cultural identities or what is popularly known as localization poses a serious challenge to the unification of markets across the globe. Consequently, there has been considerable convergence in global cultural practices, where global meets local, making a hybridization called 'glocalization'. 4.4 Impact of globalization on Public Administration It would not be an overstatement to say that globalization has brought a paradigm shift in Public Administration. This section tries to assess the impact of globalization on public administration. Globalization has not only unchained the discipline of Public Administration from structural reification, manifested in the form of the discipline's proclivity to rules, rigid hierarchy, centralization, unity of command and so on , but also given birth to an altogether new genre of Public Administration informed by flexibility, accommodativeness and entrepreneurship. Initially there was a lot of uncertainty relating to the future of Public Administration in the wake of globalization as a host of scholars and self styled experts sounds alarm for the future of the discipline. Some of the experts were of the opinion that Public Administration both as a discipline as well as practice was going to face an existential crisis, as state, the very fountainhead of Public Administration would come under serious threat. But proving those doomsday predictions wrong Public Administrations survived, casting aside the so-called apprehension of the neoliberal onslaught of globalization. However, Public Administration has experienced a metamorphosis of sort where the traditional version of Public Administration with a 'sheltered bureaucracy' has given way to a more flexible, less hierarchical, proactive and more entrepreneurial post-bureaucratic form of administration based on networking and partnership. However, the said transformation in Public Administration was not confined to structural level alone. From the functional point of view also Public Administration had experienced substantial changes especially in the area of delivery of public goods and services to the clientele. Unlike the typical public provisioning of goods and services in traditional Public Administration, Public Administration in the era of globalization has donned a new role of collaboration with numerous agencies and associations operational at the societal level, including the third sector for delivering public goods and services.

41 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Despite the perceptible shift in its role from the sole provider of goods and services to a mere facilitator of the entire process, Public Administration did not sustain the level of damage it was initially feared. In fact, Public Administration in the era of globalization had enjoyed almost the same kind of confidence as it used to enjoy during the era of traditional Public Administration. In fact, of late unlike its earlier version based on market fundamentalism, neoliberals had also appreciated Public Administration for its sufficiently legitimizing capacity to provide a humane face of market operations. Hence, Public Administration has retained its centrality in the era of globalization, albeit certain changes.

changes that had transpired in the discipline of Public Administration in the wake of globalization. Putting it broadly the impact of globalization on Public Administration can be categorized into three groups: structural impact, procedural impact and attitudinal impact. Structural Impact If one ventures out to assess the impact of globalization on Public Administration, it is the structural impact that would draw his attention first. The structural impact of globalization on Public Administration can be summarized in the following points: First, structurally speaking, globalization has brought a fundamental transformation in the very nature of Public Administration as the centrality of state in the discourse of Public Administration has undergone a sea change. The state-controlled and bureaucratically-managed paradigm of administration had given way to a more flexible, market-based administration. In other words, structural changes entailed 'reconfiguration of political power' in the form of re-positioning the state vis-à-vis the third sector including market, NGOs, civil society organization, and people's initiatives. Secondly, the structural alteration of Public Administration was also felt in the traditional bureaucratic notion of organization. The onset of globalization had brought a paradigm shift in organization with respect to boundary, and mode of operation, leading to the rise of post-bureaucratic organization. Thirdly, globalization had brought a complete structural shift in the process of governing through the introduction of a new governance discourse. Fourthly, the impetus of globalization has stimulated the demand for public sector reform movement across the globe in the form of 'reinventing the government' movement and New Public Management(NPM) movement; Fifthly, the demand for public sector reform movement has also mooted the long pending issue of civil service reform; Sixthly, globalization has blurred the line of demarcation between private and public administration by giving more elbowroom to the non-governmental and civil society organizations and the private sector.

42 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Procedural Impact Impact of globalization on public administration was not confined to structural level alone. In fact, much of the structural changes that had transpired in Public Administration were based on some procedural changes as well. The procedural changes that entailed in the wake of globalization may include among others contracting out of public services, introduction of the quality consciousness among the citizens in the form of quality cycles, Total Quality Management, performance measurement techniques, and empowerment of the citizenry via citizen's charter. Needless to say that the aforementioned procedural changes, which were largely remained unheard of till the onset of globalization, had changed the very contour of public administration. Attitudinal Impact Assessing the impact of globalization on Public Administration would have been grossly underestimated had we not mentioned the attitudinal transformation within its fold. First, the onset of globalization has engendered a new level of global consciousness for transparency, accountability and global justice, in administrative deliberations. Secondly, globalization had led to a virtual metamorphosis of sort in the strenuous relationship between citizen and administration, where both rediscovered their real worth in relation to each other. Thirdly, as a corollary of the previous point, another important impact of globalization on Public Administration is the empowerment of citizens. 4.5

complex correlation between globalization and Public Administration. Needless to say that it is a daunting task as the phenomenon of globalization is still in a state of unfolding. It had literally unlocked a floodgate of possibilities and problems for Public Administration ever since it came into being in 1990s. Despite apprehensions in the beginning, globalization did not sound death knell for Public Administration. Rather, globalization had

Public administration scholars and practitioners are increasingly concerned with the need to broaden the field's scope beyond particularistic accounts of administration in given countries. The fields of comparative public administration, development public administration and

46 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curretion (Dt. 17.10.2022) new public administration are thriving. Equally exciting is contemporary new public management scholarship. These sections would provide readers and opportunity to contextualize the fields 'growth and evolution. This chapter is organized around broad array of topics and themes that include the past and current concerns and interests of the discipline. 5.3 Comparative Public Administration Comparison is said to be a normal human instinct, which an individual resorts to make sense of his/her relative position vis-a-vis a person or situation. It is as old as human civilization. Aristotle had widely used the comparative methods and came out with his famous taxonomy of governments. Max Weber made use of this comparative research during 1895 to 1920. However, as a scholarly pursuit, it could not claim to have a long history as it draws academic attention only after Second World War. With an objective of developing administrative experiences in different contexts the concept of comparative Public Administration had been brought into being via the birth of the Comparative Administration Group (CAG) under the aegis of the American Society for Public Administration (ASPA). Though, the real impetus for comparative Public Administration came with the birth of CAG, it had its precursor in the form of a committee on comparative administration as early as 1953. The major intention of engaging into cross-cultural studies of administration was to find out any underlining patterns and regularities to be employed for making generalizations. It was argued that the comparative approach had imparted us the way of exploring, reflecting, and understanding the entire human experience without getting trapped into an ethnocentric perspective. It enjoyed huge financial support from the Ford Foundation until the disbanding of CAG in the post-Vietnam period (1971). From 1990s there has been a renewal of interest in the comparative studies in the garb of New Public Management (NPM) as the neoliberal dream of integrating markets across the globe required pool of comparative knowledge of administrations. 5.3.1 Distinguishing features The distinguishing features of comparative Public Administration can be summarized as follows : First, Its centrality in understanding the contextual administrative deliberations notwithstanding, as a future subfield of public administration, the comparative public administrative cannot boast to have a long history as it received due academic attention only after the second world war. Secondly, the said subfield was also marked by diverse and contesting approaches. Partly because of the keen interests the scholars

47 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curretion (Dt. 17.10.2022) share with the discipline and partly because of the fact that scholars of different disciplinary persuasions have forayed into the field, the discipline has registered a diversity of approaches. Thirdly, the subfield especially under the stewardship of Fred Riggs had also experienced a definite tilt towards scientific analysis especially the form of nomothetic and ecological approaches. Fourthly, another characteristic feature of this subfield was the predominance of the American scholars. In fact, the cross- cultural orientation of the subfield was primarily driven by the American interest. The liberal endowment by the Ford Foundation had further cemented the American presence in the comparative public administration. Fifthly, the attention of the subfield had been veering round a couple of objectives viz, theory building and administrative problem solving. 5.3.2 Major Proponents : There is no denying that comparative public administration had attained its distinct visibility under the tutelage of Fred Riggs. In fact, under his chairmanship the Comparative Administrative Group (CAG) became highly productive and engaged into comprehensive programme of research for attaining reliable generalizations about administrative theory and practice. Though popularized as an important subfield of Public Administration in the post Second World War, the roots of it can be traced back to Aristotle. However, Woodrow Wilson in recent past had underscored the importance of comparative method for developing scientific study of administration. Wilson in the seminal article, (which is said to have given birth to the discipline of Public Administration) entitled 'The Science of Administration' in Administrative Quarterly in 1887, had reposed his faith on comparative method. During the early part of 20th century Max Weber had also resorted to comparative method in differentiating three types of authority systems. However, the real boost in comparative studies was registered in 1962 with the birth of Comparative Administration Group(CAG), wherein a dedicated group of scholars decided to develop the comparative method as an important tool of measuring administrative development. This phase was primarily dominated by Fred Riggs and Ferrel Heady. Riggs had forcefully argued in favour of comparative method to make administration a truly scientific enterprise. Riggs believed that "Actually, all systems of government require comparative analysis if we are to understand cause/ effect relationships and achieve predictability. This applies as much to the study of American government as any other. Whenever we want to focus our attention on any country, we can easily use geographic terms to specify the context-e.g. Public Administration in Asia, Africa, Latin America, Europe, or the U.S." (2002). Ferrel Heady had identified five key concerns of comparative Public Administration, which included among others, the relentless search for theory, advocacy for practical 48 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) applicability, occasional contribution of comparative politics, interests of scholars pertaining to administrative law; and last but not the least comparative assessment of the persisting problems of Public Administration. 5.4 Development Administration Born at the critical juncture of decolonization, the concept of development administration was brought into being with an objective of bringing about rapid socio- economic development in the newly independent states of Asia, Africa and Latin America. Designed with an objective of catapulting the erstwhile colonies into the steady growth trajectory, the concept of development administration put lot of emphasis on development per se. It is essentially a government induced endeavor intends to bring about rapid socioeconomic transformation.

The term of 'development administration' was coined by an Indian civil servant, U.L. Goswami in his article entitled ' The Structure of Development Administration in India' in 1955, in the context of community Development Programme. However, it was the Western especially American scholars like George Gant, Donald C. Stone, F.W. Riggs and Edward Weidner et al have developed it into vibrant subfield of Public Administration. The state led development initiatives in the West had begun in the decade of 1950s. The intellectual roots of it in the West can be traced back to Robert Dahl's seminal article entitled ' The science of Public Administration: Three problems' (1947), where he had identified the inability of developing a comparative perspective as the major shortcoming of Public Administration. Conceptually speaking, the concept of development administration comprises of two distinct yet interrelated components viz. the administration of development and the development of administration. The administration of development stands for a particular type of administration which is dedicated to development alone. However, this definition is conceptually flawed as no administration can be designated as totally developmental in nature. In fact, in reality administration per se comprises of both the developmental as well as routine activities. Hence administration of development can be defined as the administration which lays special emphasis on developmental tasks in addition to routine tasks normally associated with any administration. The development of administration on the other hand is a boon in disguise as the prolong engagement of administration with developmental activities has led to development of administration in terms of acquiring new skills, techniques to deal with the realities of the newly independent states. Following George F.Gant, development administration can be defined as a complex of agencies, management systems and processes that a government establishes to achieve its goals'. According to him Several factors can be

49 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) held responsible for the birth of development administration, which include among others first, the exponential rise of newly independents states in Asia, Africa and Latin America during the decolonization phase; Secondly, the compulsions of the Western especially US scholars to explore the reasons behind the failure of the assistance programme to the developing countries have engendered an urge among them to understand the nature of governance in these countries; and thirdly, the formation of the Comparative Administrative Group had brought a huge fillip in the field of development administration as the scholars of Comparative Administrative Group took an active interest in the study of administrative systems in developing countries. At least two major contributions of development administration can be recognized viz first, it had identified the incommensurability of Western model of development and public administration to the needs of the developing countries. Secondly, the scholars of development administration had called for changes in the administrative systems and practices in order to manage the technical assessment programme. 5.4.1 Features of Development Administration Hence, it would not be an exaggeration to say the development administration is a qualitatively different genre of administration informed by change orientation, result orientation, citizen centricity, commitment to work and so on. The distinguishing features of development administration can be enumerated as follows: The first and perhaps the most important feature of development administration is the philosophy of change. In fact, change especially the socio-economic and political dimension of change constitutes heart of development administration. Here change orientation in administrative deliberations intends to bring about structural reorganization of administration including removal of unemployment, alleviation of poverty, introduction of innovative programme to augment production, and so on. Secondly, development administration is also known for its goal orientation. Unlike the routine administration, development administration is committed to the objectives of the organization. Thirdly, the client orientation is also held as one of the redeeming features of development administration. Though administration by nature is dependent upon clientele satisfaction, development administration has foregrounded the issue so that citizens may be roped in the developmental activities. Fourthly, the temporal dimension or the time orientation is another important feature of development administration. Completion of development projects within the stipulated time frame has always been concern for administration. Development administration puts lot of emphasis on timely completion of development projects. Hence, under development administration

50 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) development goals are laid out in a categorical manner with tentative time frame, so that all development projects attained its indented goals. Fifthly, another redeeming feature of development administration is the ecological orientation. Being an open system development administration is known for constant interaction between the administrative system and its environment, where change in one system has a corresponding repercussions and the vice versa. Sixthly, development administration by nature is an innovative administration which has been incessantly experimenting with the identification and application of new structures and methods, techniques, policies and programmes. 5.5 New Public Administration The New Public Administration (NPA) has dawned a new qualitatively different phase in the development of Public Administration by engendering a new genre of Public Administration infused by the political values like equity, social justice, change and professional commitments. This new phase is inextricably associated with the 'crisis of identity' of Public Administration as a separate discipline. In fact, the very urge for a new public administration was generated out of the obvious insecurity among the scholars and practitioners regarding the sorry state of the discipline. In fact, the discipline has been grappling with this crisis since its inception. It was a conference in 1968 at the Minnow brook conference site of Syracuse University which had acted as a triggering factor for the birth of a new public administration. The said conference had given a proper outlet to the simmering discontent of the scholars and practitioner alike. The scholars assembled for the conference expressed their dissatisfaction with the state of affairs of Public Administration as the discipline had been increasingly getting disassociated from society and engaged into meaningless theoretical exercises. Hence, new Public Administration was a wakeup call for the discipline that had been locked into a typical 'disciplinary orthodoxy'.

The NPA had reiterated the societal commitment of the discipline by identifying some core issues like relevance, change, equity, justice and so on. Originated in the backdrop of an academic conference, the NPA had represented a counterculture of sort against the disciplinary orthodoxy.

Any cursory glance at the presentation of papers, made at the conference (Minnowbrook I) would indicate four distinctive of New Public Administration, which include among others relevance, values, equity and change. In the following section an attempt will be made to explore the distinctive features of New Public Administration. 5.5.1

Features of New Public Administration Unlike the quintessential version of Public Administration obsessed with efficiency
NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022)
and economy, New Public administration intended to remind the discipline of its societal commitments. Dissatisfied with the sorry state of the discipline of Public Administration, especially with its disciplinary orthodoxies, a group of young scholars and practitioners had assembled at Minnowbrook conference centre of the Syracuse University at New York in l968 to officially register their discontent and anguish. Citing the example of the contemporary social upheavals in the form of ethnic skirmishes across the American cities, campus clashes, Vietnam war and its repercussions in American society and the like the scholars have argued that the discipline had lost its social relevance and confined to the respective departments. The New Public Administration wanted to bring back social relevance of Public Administration by giving primacy of politics in it. The major features of new Public Administration can be identified as follows: Relevance Making public administration more relevant is perhaps the most important feature of new Public Administration. It had demonstrated that in pursuit of disciplinary sophistication or what is often argued as disciplinary orthodoxy, public administration had lost its social mooring. Consequently, several political issues which required intervention on the part of the Public Administration remained outside the purview of Public Administration. The new Public Administration in a way had reminded Public Administration of its duty toward the society. Values Unlike the behavioural persuasion of political science and management oriented public administration, the New Public Administration lays emphasis on the centrality value in administrative deliberations. According to the scholars of New Public Administration, value neutrality in administrative deliberations is an impossibility. In fact, discarding the pretense of neutrality, New Public Administration wanted administration to be sided with the marginal and disadvantage sections of the society. Equity The advocacy for social equity is said to be another important hallmark of new public administration. The protagonists of the New Public Administration argued in favour of distributive justice in the governmental institutions in order to ensure social equity. Change Change orientation is an equally important feature of New Public Administration which intended to make an inroad into statusquoist and the dominant interest group entrenched in the society. 5.6 New Public Management

New Public Management (here after NPM) was born at a time when the public sector across the globe was reeling under series of crises. Putting it simply, NPM signifies a new kind of experimentations of introducing market principles of efficiency, economy and effectiveness in the public sector management to bail out the ailing public sector and make it more effective. It emerged in the realm of public sector management in late 1990s with an objective of rediscovering public sector in the changed perspective. It was an outgrowth of the initiatives of public sector reform sweeping across the Western part of the world since late 1980s. The re-inventing movement in 1992 with the landmark publication by David 'Osborne and Ted Gaebler had further intensified the NPM movements. It has brought a paradigm shift in the public sector management by removing overreliance of the discipline on the traditional Weberian and Wilsonian paradigm of Public Administration. Despite its centrality in the public sector reforms across the globe, there is hardly any all agreed definition of it as there are multiple even contradictory interpretations available on the subject. Whereas some of the scholars have hailed the NPM as a new found mantra of resurrecting public sector, others have rejected it as mere exaggeration. Christopher Hood, a leading expert, has succinctly captured the predicament that one would encounter in dealing with the subject : "Although ill-defined, NPM aroused strong and varied emotions among bureaucrats. At one extreme were those who held that NPM was the only way to correct for the irretrievable failures and even moral bankruptcy in the 'old' public management (cf. Keating 1989). At the other were those who dismissed much of the thrust of NPM as gratuitous and philistine destruction of more than a century's work in developing a distinctive public service ethic and culture (cf. Martin 1998; Northercote 1989b)". The NPM has proposed to take on 'sheltered 'bureaucracy' by replacing it with flexible market based Public Administration. In sum, NPM foregrounds a qualitatively different variant of Public Administration informed by minimum government, debureaucratization, decentralization, market orientation of public services, contracting out, privatization, performance measurement and so on. 5.6.1 Origin The origin of NPM can be traced back to a host of factors which include among others credibility deficit of state or public sector, the surfacing of New Right Approach;

emergence of Post-Weberian / Post-Wilsonian bureaucracy; and several administrative experimentations in advanced Western countries. Credibility deficit of the state : Among the several factors responsible for the birth of public administration, receding reliability of the state is perhaps the most important one. State as the major provider of social justice has come under serious challenges since late 1970s.A popular sentiment wsa that the state was no longer in a position to provide them services. Consequently, an alternative to the state had come into the scene to supplement state, if not totally replacing it. Emergence of New Right Philosophy : The birth of New Right philosophy is supposed to be another important impetus for the recent spurt of public sector reform across the globe. The New Right as a monthley group of ideas representing individual liberty and free market economy, intends to challenge Keynesian demand management and the egalitarian welfare package provided by the state. It came into being in late 1960s and early 1970s in the form of libertarianism, supply-side economics, monetarism, Thatcherism, and Reaganomics. However, it hogs the limelight under the tutelage of Ronald Regan and Margaret Thatcher. Despite the variations among the different strands of New Right, there is an overarching commonality regarding the role of the state in society. To them state has an inherent tendency, of monopolizing over economy, society, individual liberty and entrepreneurial spirit. Moreover, they believe that the overstretching role of the state in the social sector leads to oversupply, and wastage of public money. Emergence of Post-Weberian/Post-Wilsonian conception of Public Administration : The birth of post-Weberian/Post-Wilsonian variant of Public Administration especially in the wake of the pragmatic repudiation of Wilsonian politics-administration dichotomy has ushered in a paradigm shift in public sector management in the form NPM New administrative experimentations in advanced Western countries Recent administrative experimentations in advanced Western countries have also contributed to the development of NPM. According to Mohit Bhattacharya those administrative experimentation can be encapsulated as follows: First, structurally speaking there has been a clear shift from a rigid, hierarchical and bureaucratic form of Public Administration to one of flexible market-based form of Public management; Secondly, the role of government in society has also undergone a sea change. From a sole provider of goods and services the role of the state has reduced to a mere facilitator. And Thirdly, the citizen-government relationship has also witnessed a substantial transformation. Citizens in those advanced Western countries have been re-conceptualized from a passive recipient of goods and services to an active customer. 5.6.2 Five Fundamentals

Another expert of the field Nicholas Henry has identified 'five fundamentals' or 5As of NPM : ? Alertness– Government should improvise the problem and act before it actually hit the system, not the other way round. ? Agility– Government should be agile in the sense that it should be 'entrepreneurial, open, and communicative'. ? Adaptability– Government should be continuously engaged in improving quality of its programmes and services and thereby adjusting with demands. ? Alignment– Government should collaborate with other government, non- governmental and civil society organizations to achieve social goals. ? Accountability– 'Government should have a clear and compelling mission that focuses on the needs of the people (Henry: 2007) Another leading exponent Patrick Dunleavy has enumerated three key components of NPM viz. disaggregation, competition and incentivization. For the sake of operationalization Dunleavy has further fine grained the constituting elements of above components: Disaggregation means splitting up public bureaucracy into smaller components with underlying emphasis on flattening of hierarchies and 'flexibilization' in personnel, IT, procurement etc. Under this component a host of elements have been identified viz. purchaser-provider separation, agencification, decoupling of policy system, growth of quasi-government agencies, separation out of micro-level agencies, chunking up privatized industries, corporatization and strong single, organization management, deprofessionalization, improved performance measurement etc. Competition- NPM seeks to infuse competition among the potential providers. It includes among others quasi-market, voucher scheme, outsourcing, compulsory market testing, intra-government contracting, public/private liberalization, deregulation, consumer-tagged financing, user-control etc. Incentivization–favours providing pecuniary-based specific performance incentives for augmenting productivity in organization. This component has also several constituting elements as well viz. respecifying property rights, light touch regulation, capital market involvement in projects, privatizing asset ownership, anti-rent seeking measure, de privileging professions, performance related pay, private finance initiative, private-public partnership, united rate of return and discounting, valuing public sector equity, mandatory efficiency dividends etc. (Dunleavy: 2005).

Salient Features (i) Overhauling of organizational structure With an objective of facilitating organizational leadership, NPM calls for a thorough overhauling of the organizational structure. The organizational restructuring under NPM includes among others simplifying organizational procedures, flattening of hierarchies, etc. (ii) Empowerment of citizens The empowerment of citizens constitutes the heart of NPM. NPM unlike its traditional counterpart reconceptualizes citizens as 'active customers'. It signifies an enormous perceptual change of the public bureaucracy vis-avis citizens. Traditionally citizens were conceptualized as 'passive recipients' of the public goods and services, to be delivered by the state. The birth of NPM has expanded the freedom of choice of citizens to a great extent. Drawing on Albert Hirschman's conceptualization the expansion of freedom of choice under NPM can be crystallized under three specific freedoms viz. 'exit', 'voice', and 'loyalty'. Whereas the freedom of `exit' signifies the liberty of the customer to withdraw from any market transaction; the freedom of 'voice' describes the liberty of the consumer to raise his/her point of view either in terms of objection or complain so that he is able to complain in a way that may lead to some changes in services or products offered and the `loyalty' explains consumer's allegiance to a given supplier, regardless of the standard of services it provided. (iii) Greater autonomy for public sector manager NPM calls for more autonomy to the public sector managers. Unlike private sector, public sector managers have to work within a strict regime of laws and by-laws. Hence, they have no room for innovation and contemplation. NPM is in favour of greater elbowroom for managerial leadership by providing public managers with flexibility in personnel policy like contractual appointment, work place bargaining etc(Bhattacharya: 1998). (iv) Application of Rigorous Performance Measurement Technique Application of rigorous performance measurement technique is another hallmark of NPM. The root of performance measurement as a technique of quality assurance has its first forceful advocacy in the Scientific Management Theory of Fredrick Taylor. Though it has become a household name in private sector enterprises for quite some time, its acceptance in the public sector management is only a recent phenomenon. Thanks to the 're-inventing government' movement in the US in early 1990s, a host of performance measurement techniques like Total Quality Management, counter services, citizen's charter etc have increasingly become the part of bureaucratic parlance.

However, a caveat needs to be sounded regarding performance measurement technique. For, applications of performance measurement techniques like benchmarking, report card etc do not necessarily guarantee unadulterated success in terms of productivity in every situation. Sometimes, they are mechanically introduced without proper appreciation of the ground reality or problem (Campo-Sundaram: 2001) (v) Disaggregation of public bureaucracy Public bureaucracy has an uncanny knack of expansion and extravagance. The public choice theorist have shown how bureaucracy has blown out of proportion and eaten out the vitals of a given society. Parkinson has unpacked the intricacies of bureaucratic expansion by his famous Parkinson Law (Parkinson:). NPM suggests disaggregation of public bureaucracies into agencies, which will deal with each other in a user-pay basis (Hood:1991). (vi) Cost-cutting NPM is strongly advocating economy in public sector. Inspired by New Right philosophy NPM is in favour of cost-cutting in public sector. (vii)Goal-orientation Another important feature of NPM is its goal-orientation. NPM is exclusively committed to goal. (viii) Use of quasi-markets and contracting out

ix) Emphasis on managerial support service NPM asks for managerial support service to facilitate public sector managers reaching the pre-set target. Under managerial support service, an array of policies has been undertaken collectively known as human resource management. The basic objective is to draw best talents from the market in the public sector by offering attractive salary, parks, incentives and other benefits. Moreover, NPM is also suggesting regular periodic skill -improving training programming to hone up the competitive edge of the man power (Bhattacharaya: ibid). (x) Organizational and spatial decentralization NPM believes in decentralized form of governance. It encourages all kinds of organizational and spatial decentralization. 5.6.4 Implications NPM has engendered an administrative reform spree of sort across the globe. Ghuman has identified five broad categories of administrative reforms:

a) reforms aiming reorganization and downsizing of the government; (b) reforms aiming setting up of performance based organization; (c) reforms aiming to create Senior Civil Services(SCSs); (d) reforms emphasizing adoption of private sector styles of management practices; and (e) reforms aiming promotion of customer orientation of administration. (a) Reorganization and downsizing of government– Though NPM does not directly suggest down sizing of government, however, the elaborate reorganization and restructuring measures it prescribes, often lead to slimming of government. There are number of instances (b) Performance based organization- One of the direct implications of NPM for public sector management is to adopt performance as the basis of organization. (c) Creation of Senior Civil Services (SCS)- Under NPM the idea of unified civil service is repudiated by separating policy from administration. For effective implementation of policies, NPM proposed to contract out service delivery functions to non-governmental or quasi-governmental agencies and private service providers, saving the major policy making functions for core departments to be manned by seasoned public servants. Hence, it recommends forming a cadre of Senior Civil Servants (SCSs) based on written employment contracts and partly performance based pay for effective formulation of public policies. (d) Adoption of Private sector styles of management practices Another major implication of NPM is the adoption of private sector managerial practices in pubic sector management. NPM moved from bureaucratic model of Kanter's model of flatter (non-hierarchical) and more focused structure of organizations to an entrepreneurial form of governance as Osborne and Gaebler (1992) seemed to have suggested. Hence, NPM calls for greater synergy between public and private sector management. (e) Customer-Driven Administration- If there is any seemingly positive implication of NPM on overall governance, it must be the customer -orientedness of administration. NPM, unlike the traditional bureaucratically managed public sector management, elevates citizen to centre of discourse. Customer's satisfaction index is considered to be 'the' criteria of public service. Several procedural innovations like Citizen's Charter, citizen's report card etc are manufactured to reflect citizen's choice.

NPM—An All Purpose Garment NPM, especially the way it has been packaged and marketed, comes under serious challenge. The criticism against NPM is ranging from questioning its claim of universality (Hood: 1991) to the proclamation of its death (Dunleavy: 2005). In this section we will mainly concentrate on the major criticism labeled against it. The professed claim of universal applicability of NPM as a trusted antidote of any kind of ‘management ills’ irrespective of culture and contexts, is no longer found tenable. Christopher .Hood has enumerated some major objections: First, despite the initial hypes and hooplas, NPM seems to have worked only in superficial level, leaving most of the old problems and weaknesses intact. The only substantial change that has occurred is in the language that the public managers speak in public. Second, NPM 's claim of economy or cost cutting also sounds hollow as it failed to bring down the cost per unit of service. Critics argue that the net result of NPM is an ‘aggrandizement of management’ and 'rapid middle level bureaucratization of new reporting system', which in effect hampered public service. Third, NPM on the pretext of promoting public good actually serves the 'career interest of an elite group of new managerialists (viz the top managers, officials, management consultants, business schools). Fourth, NPM's claim of universal applicability is also not tenable as different administrative values call for different administrative design. (Hood : 1991) To the other extreme, critics like Patrick Dunleavy et al have written the obituary of NPM and proclaimed a post-NPM regime of digital era governance (Dunleavy : 2005). A few commentators, who are not willing to go that far, have identified 'one important shift in the thinking of NPM'. In its earlier Entrepreneurial Government version, the emphasis was on de-governmentalization and privatization. The government was supposed to be slim, smart and responsive. But considering the centrality of government in development discourse and nation building, the contemporary version of NPM emphasizes on better government, not on less government (Arora: 2007). 5.7 Conclusion fields of comparative administration, development administration, New Public Administration and new public management point to the dynamic nature of the discipline which keep changing with the evolving time. they also represent different temporal and locational positions. Public administration Scholars and practitioners are increasingly concerned with the need to broaden the field scope beyond particularistic

Political Science and Public Administration. ? To explore the interrelationship between Public Administration and Political Science 1.2 Introduction Public Administration is essentially interdisciplinary in nature as the discipline has taken its clue from a host of subjects in its formative stage. In fact, too much reliance on others' input has led to a serious crisis of identity for the discipline. The discipline has been grappling with a debilitating crisis of identity since its inception as it fails to devise its own tools and conceptual parameters. Too much reliance on Political Science and Management science for organizational principles in the initial stage of its growth has left the discipline with a stunted growth. Even the latest round of Minnowbrook conference (Minnowbrook III) fails to settle the issue of identity distress as the renewed attempt of defining Public Administration as "a socially-embedded BLOCK – II

62 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) process of collective relationships, dialogue, and action to promote human flourishing for all" is indicative of it. Hence, the random borrowings of principles, ideas, constructs from other sister fields of studies without proper planning and design have confused the discipline. 1.3 Social Phenomena: Their Integrated nature No social phenomenon can be properly examined in isolation without reference to other related ones, for example, the problem of the backward classes in contemporary Indian society. A proper understanding of the problem of backward classes requires us to view it from several perspectives, notably those of the social sciences and of legal studies as we are at every step confronted by the divergence between what exists as social reality and what ought to exist according to the laws and ethical standards we have created for ourselves. We are aware of the provisions of equality in the constitution of India. These provisions are both wide-ranging and varied. We cannot understand either their scope or their complexities in terms of purely formal principles. We can appreciate their nature and significance only by relating them to the historical background from which they have emerged and the social context to which they were designed to be applied. 1.4 What is Political Science and Public Administration Political Science and Public Administration are two closely related fields which deal with the scientific study of political and administrative aspects. The discipline of Political Science analyses the processes by which resources are allocated and values are developed and distributed within a political system. The discipline explores on one hand, concepts like power, authority, legitimacy, social class, gender, ethnicity, political participation and the like, and institutions like state, government, political parties, pressure groups and international organizations on the other. The discipline also deals with political ideas and idologies relating to issues like justice, liberty, democracy, morality, equality and so on. The discipline of Pubtic Administration analysis the processes by which public decisions and policies are formulated and implemented within administrative systems, particularly within the state. The discipline also deals with the practical side of government through the analysis of the institutions, management and implementation of public policies and public organizations at national and local levels of governments, which involves program management (that is planning, decision making, organizing, leading, implementing and evaluating) and resource management (human resource management, financial management and budgeting).
63 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) 1.4.1 Importance of Public Administration and Political Science Political Science and Public Administration are major social science disciplines which help us understand the political, social and economic processes and their transformation at local, national and international levels. The two disciplines expand our horizons by providing insight from scientific and enlightened perspectives and address several problems of everyday life. They prepare us to become more conscious, rational and effective citizens and more constructive participants in public affairs. These disciplines empower individuals by providing the knowledge and necessary skills to be professionals in the public domain. Since the study of politics and administration combines both theory and practice, studying Political Science and Public Administration is challenging but also rewarding and caters to the interest and capabilities of a large number of the people. 1.5 Closeness and Commonality Political Science and Public Administration both focus on the public arena of human society and by virtue of commonality of the subject matters are intricately related to one another. Public administrators and bureaucrats cannot ignore the political environment and context of public policies, as they are decided by various dynamics and interplay of political forces. Politicians cannot ignore the role of public administration and policy makers as public policies are implemented through the bureaucrats and administrators as an interplay within the political system. Political Science is the study of the state and system of government. It is concerned with power, authority and their influence. It ensures authoritative allocation of values to the various sections in society; Public Administration is very closely, if not indistinguishably connected with political science. Whereas Political science is connected with government, Public Administration is government in action. Dwight Waldo, an eminent thinker had pointedly observed the relationship between the two disciplines in the followin, words "The interface between the two (Political Science and Public Administration) becomes clear and vivid if we concur that both deal with political system or substantially are such common areas which are studied in both Political Science and Public Administration; there exits another point of close connection between the two disciplines; the political environment of a nation largely shapes the nature of the political system and activities of its administrative

and governmental system, its study calls for a good deal of preliminary knowledge of political institutions and ideologies and governmental activities. Hence, Dimock rightly points out that "understanding of politics is the key to an understanding of public administration."

Administration is regarded as a powerful agent of change in most of the developing countries. The nature of the state is that such countries are the root cause of poverty, inequality and injustice. In such cases we have to examine the prevailing political system before we can analyse the role of the administrative system in the concerned country, According to some critical observers, the separation of Public Administration from Political Science denies us the requisite 'political approach' necessary to the study of Public Administration. For instance, the study of the Indian political system, the historical evolution of the Indian administrative system, the debates in the Constituent Assembly and the basic constitutional law which are all 'subjects of political science' would alone provide an insight into the process and the working of the administrative system of the country. In fact, there are certain areas of study common to Political Science and Public Administration such as public policy, comparative constitutions, local government. Again, government is regarded as a continuous integrated process comprising different functions-legislative, executive and judicial as well as administrative. The scope of Public Administration, in this light, is not a routine process, but a dynamic process involving considerable practical discretion. Studies in administration, therefore, focus only on policy formulations, but also on political parties, pressure groups, public opinion, and the like. The methods and techniques of Political Science have been borrowed extensively by researchers of Public Administration which includes public policy, public welfare and public interest. The relationship between politics and administration is so close and interlinked that they may be regarded as two sides of the same coin.
65 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) 1.6 Relationship between Public Administration and Political Science Public Administration as separate discipline with a distinct disciplinary boundary, has been struggling hard to get out of demanding parental control of Political Science since its inception. Indeed, as a mother discipline Political Science had nurtured Public Administration a lot with maternal care in its adolescent days despite the Wilsonian advocacy of politics administration dichotomy, but the formal separation became inevitable as the later started demanding more space when it reached its adolescence. Actually, the relationship between the two has always been problematic as Waldo (1990) has categorized them as 'troublesome cleft'. Indeed, a kind of ego- centrism, (sometimes bordering on disdain of the practitioners of Political Science was implicit in the above tenuous relationship; for example, the president of American Political Science Association in late 1970 had purportedly relegated Public Administration as an intellectual wasteland' (Henry: ibid). The uneasiness in the said relationship is 'as old as the discipline of Public Administration itself (Whicker, Strickland, Olshfski: 1993; Chakraborty & Bhattacharaya: 2003). Had anybody referred to the evolution of Public Administration as a discipline, he would have appreciated the above fact. However, severing of umbilical cord as it were, does not mean that Public Administration has lost its ties altogether with the mother discipline. Rather, reunion was in sight as a host of theorists started questioning the very feasibility of complete separation between politics and administration at early stage of its development, which was later forcefully argued by a motley group of scholars, assembled at the Minnowbrook I conference. Indeed, history took a full circle when the contemporary experts of policy science started asking for a close interaction and cooperation between the two. Riggs has cautioned agains compartmentalization between Public Administration and Political Science as any such attempt would end up in frustration and futility. In fact, the core concerns of Political Science like democracy, plurality, equality before law, political participation and so on have been co-opted as cardinal features of Public Administration. The birth of public policy and policy sciences has further cemented the relationship between Political Science and Public Administration. Political Science, according to a social scientist, is concerned with the study of "authoritative allocations of values". It focuses on the relationship between the state and individual. It provides answers to questions concerning the origin and the nature of the State and also considers the institutions through which the members of society exercise power. For a long time Public Administration has been regarded as a part of Political Science. We know that the political system of every country is related to its administrative system. Indeed, it is the country's political system which creates its administrative system. Conventionally speaking, Political Science deals

66 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) with policy making and the implementation of policies is left to the administrators. Thus the administration is charged with the responsibility of translating the political will of a country into practical forms of action. However, this is easier said than done. Again, it would be noted that the administration plays a significant role in the formulation of policies also. It follows that the political system and administration influence each other to such an extent that it will be sometimes difficult to demarcate between the roles played by them respectively in the given case. In a parliamentary government like India, while the minister, as a politica leader and member of Cabinet participates in policy making, but as the top boss of the Ministry/Department, is also involved in administrative decision making. Similarly though the civil servants are supposed to administer/implement the policy-decisions, the senior administrators are also involved in policy-formulations by way of providing data/information/advice to the minister. 1.7 Distinction between Public Administration and Political Science

The founding father of Public Administration, Woodrow Wilson propounded politics— administration dichotomy which made a sharp distinction between politics and administration. According to this theory the domain of politics is policy making and that of administration is policy implementation. In other words, politics is concerned with laying down policies, whereas the administration is concerned with the execution of those policies with a view to cost effective measures. Woodrow Wilson further point that "Administration lies outside the proper sphere of politics, administrative questions are not political questions. All politics sets the task for administration, it should not be used to manipulate its officers. The field of Administration is a field of business, it is removed from the hurry and strife of politics and at the most common stands apart even from the debatable grounds of constitutional study.'' In brief, the various points of distinction between the two disciplines can be summarised as follows : ?

Political Science is macro in nature because it deals with the state and systems of government as well as bureaucracy and administrative processes while Public Administration is micro in nature because it deals with the bureaucrats and institutions which serve as the machinery of the state. 1.8 Conclusion The relationship between Public Administration and Political Science can be characterized as close, competitive based on a division of labour, and hierarchical, with the former subordinate to the latter. It is closed not only because research questions are related with the role of state in stitutions and the effects of state interventions are the focus but also in the sense that the respective scholarly communities do interact within permeable structures, often using the same when used for the presentation and publication of their research. Close ties are also founded at the individual level - at the same time scholars subsequently engaged in Public Administration as well as Politcal Science projects have to focus on domains of the two disciplines at the same time. It is self-evident that the borders are more appearent than real among those Political Science scholars and Public Administration scholars working on policy making, on national political system. The realationship is competitive with respect to establishing and entertiaining various academic programs, demonstrating relevance to society, attracting new scholars and students and struggling for resource from private actors and public authorities. The relationship is however, also based on a division of labour. Public administration focuses on intra organisational and procedural issues and its vantage point remains the authority and capacity of the state in a normative and empirical sense. Political science, in contrast, takes a broader perspective where a broad range of societal inputs and policy outputs are given much greater attention and it puts much more emphasis on the generalizability of knowledge and on theoretical advancement. Finally, if one accepts certain criteria for assessing the coherence and consistency of scientific disciplines, one is let to interpret the relative greater fragmentation, the missing methodological consensus, and absence of an overarching paradigm as indicators of Public Administration relative epistemological inferiority. Acknowledging this state, one cannot ignore that Political Science has difficulties and deficits of its own but the point is that Public Administration in

68 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) perhaps best seen as a profession that is primarily interested in instrumental knowledge, more akin to Engineering or other technical disciplines. If we were to reframe it, the aim of Public Administration would shift to optimising administration in the widest sense that is making the state work as legitimate, fair, as effective and efficient as possible. If one accepts these objectives for Public Administration as a whole other than engaging in multi-disciplinarity, it would appear to be the right strategy. In the absence of a unifying paradigm and a methodological consensus, chances for theoretical advancement in Public Administration will remain limited and more likely confined to discourses that originate in the respective parent disciplines and then get imported to Public Administration. In this sense, the various corners of Public Administration reflect a hybrid character. They are parts off Public Administration but are closely linked to the parent disciplines of Political Science Law, Management Studies and other Social Science disciplines. 1.9 Summary ? To provide a better understanding of Sociology and Public Administration and the dichotomy that they have in general. ? To familiarize the readers with the agencies of society and administration and how they coordinate to maintain balance in a harmonious way. 2.2 Introduction At the very onset one must familiarise with the conceptual understanding of Sociology and its interconnectedness to Public Administration. It is the state, the public sector and the public realm that unifies the subject of Public Administration and not its methods, theories and aims as Christopher Pollitt puts it. If we go by organisational terms then schools of Public Affairs or Public Policy, Schools of Public Administration or "John F. Kennedy School of Government" are affiliated to Public Administration. In the words of Yang, Sciology as a subject of Social Science primarily deals with social structure and its function, social process and its implications and societal laws

71 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriculum (Dt. 17.10.2022) as a whole which is derived from social relations and action. Sociology was introduced long back into two stages i.e., stage of subject capital construction and systematic research later transcending into a comprehensive and specific social science. Sociology is concerned with the scientific study of social structure. It is a science which studies the form of human actions in society. It also studies the inter-relatedness of the other Social Sciences, whereas administration as we are aware, operates in the context of the society of which it is a part. Hence, just as the society is concerned with goals, values, belief systems, so also should be the administration. There is a however a debate across national contexts whether Public Administration is an academic discipline or not. Thus, we notice a two-way relationship; administration exists in a social setting and the pattern of administration theoretically is decided by society. In order to understand its interdisciplinary relationship, we will further look into the relationship it shares. 2.3 Understanding Sociology Sociology is a comprehensive and specific Social Science discipline concerned with the scientific study of social structure. Sociology is concerned with people's interactions and behavior towards one another, as well as group conformity, development, foundation and purpose. We must also consider society's fundamental institutions. The family is the most basic form of social institution, followed by religion as the foundation for morals, beliefs and even ideologies, education as a source of knowledge and intellectual development for society's citizens, the economy as a means of allocating scarce resources and government as the body that legislates, executes and interprets the law, and extends its sovereignty throughout its territory. As a result, the government is an element of society that through the laws it enacts, impacts how individuals interact and behave with one another. Sociology can describe, analyze and predict social phenomenon that can alter in future. With the help of description, explanation and prediction, Sciology carries out social criticism, education and social norms. Sociology's subject cognition is practically divided into four types as Kapucu puts it. The first one focusses on representative characters such as August Comte, Emile Durkheim and Herbert Spencer whose objective lies in creating sociological tradition of positivism in Sociology and visualize whole society as a research model. The second one deals with creation of sociological tradition of humanism, Max weber is its representative figure and in this type individuals and their social behavior is the object of study. The next type is criticism-oriented which is about creating critical tradition of Sociology and its proponent is Karl Marx and the fourth one covers that part which does not fall into the above three types that includes

72 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriculum (Dt. 17.10.2022) "the surplus said", "the investigation says", "the discipline says" and so on. Sociology is a broad discipline that has various branches comprising of : ? Sociology : theory and methods ? Social Psychology ? Medical Sociology ? Development Sociology ? Rurall Sociology ? Urban Sociology ? Sociology of labor ? Sociology of Sports ? Sociology of Education ? Population Sociology ? Industrial Sociology ? Social Anthropology ? Family Sociology ? Social work ? Sociology of law ? Social investigation Apart from the instrumental nature, the humanistic nature persuades Sociology to delve into basic problems of society, people, culture, history, groups in order to establish solid foundation of the discipline. Sociology is incorporative of both theoretical and methodological approaches. Sociology arrives at abstract, generalized concepts, paradigms by transcending social phenomena. There have been many controversies on sociological research approaches. Sociological knowledge comprises of theoretical perspectives of Sociology which observe, analyze, describe empirical facts as the procedure to obtain knowledge. Theory is usually considered as the harbinger of knowledge and method constructs and develops knowledge. Sociology is therefore combination of theory and method. As described in 'Interdisciplinary relationship between Sociology, Politics and Public Administration : Perspective of theory and practice', Sociological research perspective can be classified into three levels, that is philosophy of science, comprehensive social science such as Law, History and the third one is single subject of Social Science for example Pedagogy, Politics, Psychology and Management. Moving onto sociological research approaches it includes macroscopic-microscopic approach, holistic-individualism approach, positivism-humanism approach. These can

73 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) be divided into three basic approaches that are social fact paradigm, social behaviour paradigm and social interpretation paradigm. Social fact paradigm focusses on large social structure and social system. Social interpretation pays attention towards action, interaction through observation, supplemented by theories like sociological action theory, phenomenological sociology, ethnology, methodology. Positivism methodology, anti-positivism methodology and historical materialism methodology are three types of sociological research methods. Positivism methodology aligns with the idea that social phenomena is associated to social types and social environment and society must be defined in sociological perspective. Anti-positivism methodology stands in contrast to natural sciences, it advocates subjectivity, creativity and consciousness of social actors. It anchors value-related, value judgement theories to be dealt separately. Explaining social phenomena and relations from outcome of economic conditions but also keeping in knowledge not to take economic factor as the sole determinant is the methodology of historical materialism. However, these approaches and research methods have considerable influence on the public administration domain. If we go by theoretical significance of Sociology, it aids Public Management to build up scientific social knowledge, sociological and anthropological analysis can channelize focus towards public property in Public Management. Further various research methods can be fruitful to pay heed towards public real life, social interaction and social mentality. The advantage Sciology adds up to Public Management is social facts rather than solely relying upon data analysis, provided that it can assist in improving existing social system. In a way, it keeps public administration stay grounded into realities of society, enhances its consciousness and consistency in accordance to regularity. 2.4 Relationship between Sociology and Public Administration As Prof. Dimock puts it, society is determined by patterns of administration and administration exists in a social setup. But sensitive administrative leadership only leads to change in society itself. The administrator is not only an executive, he must act as social engineer in order to help society fulfil, particularly in the developing countries of Asia and Africa. Public Administration is a medium to initiate social change. F.W. Riggs states that understanding of social environment gives impression about public administration in developing nations. Traditional social control exercised by agency of family, marriage and caste has started to be taken over by administrative controls. For example, marriage and family are affected by welfare, social security and taxation. The field of administration has drawn heavily from Sociology. The significance attributed to informal groups, initiating influence of group norms in the functioning

74 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) of an organisation and to understand organisational behaviour the behaviouralists applied methods and findings of Sociology. Because social science research may be utilised to convey information to legislators, policy can hopefully be guided by evidence and information rather than anecdotes or hollow rhetoric that is why Sociology is relevant to Public Administration. It is reasonable for legislators to conduct study into their constituents' interest, if they intend to serve those interests. A sociologist, for example, might undertake a poll on criminal justice, reproductive health, or gun control attitudes. It is the responsibility of the social scientist to conduct evaluative research after public and institutional policies have been passed. Is the law accomplishing what we wanted to do? Do we still agree with the law's underlying principle? Does the law have any unintended consequences? (Think of the war on drugs and the resulting overrepresentation of African American men in prison populations as one example). Another use of Sociology in Public Administration is to highlight societal problems and demographic trends that are not always "on track" but has the possibility to intrude into people's realities. Legislators, journalists and the general public do not always have the time or resources to do scientifically rigorous study on problems they care about. Scientists, economists, criminologists and sociologists are tasked with researching these challenges, synthesising their findings and presenting their conclusions. Public Administration as a discipline developed in the middle and late 20th century. It is entrusted with the responsibility to effectively distribute public goods and public services, to ensure public interests are fairly distributed and overall development is targeted through proper effective methods and public power. It is through administrative leadership the society may be influenced. Public administration is not infected by Pan- European identity crisis, across Europe it has been moulded differently by various traditional academic disciplines. For example—Public Administration has economics and management flavour in Central and Eastern European countries. In Denmark and Norway, it plays a role in Political Science departments and associated to Economics department in Crezch and Slovak Republics. In particular it is linked to reform trend that took place in 1980s-1990s that is New Public Management System (NPM). Comparative studies indicate that these reforms were implemented in different manners across different countries. New Public Management system was a dominant paradigm for quite some time. In the United States, Public Administration emerged in a period when state was considered critical and Public Administration had to have strong hold on individuals, interest groups and state-society interaction. In contrary to this, Public Administration is highly influenced by law in France and Germany, where the state of social and political development of both the countries act as the initiation for reflection on Public Administration as Hustedt, Randma-Liiv and Savi describes. In

75 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Central and Eastern Europe, public administration attempted to generate, sustain and handle newly democratic institutions after emerging out of post-socialist transformation. Sociology is concerned with the human behaviour in a group, the various types of groups and the ways in which they influence human instincts and activity. In a Pan- European survey that was conducted as part of the COCOPS Project, Political Science was ranked as the most important discipline by Public Administration scholars, next rank was assigned to Political Sociology and Business Management and in equivalence, Economics and Law. The study of human social relationship in totality is broadly under the banner of sociology. A man's social life has political, economic, familial, religious and other relationships. Sociology takes 'social man' as a unit to assess social structure, to explore the complexities of different behaviours in social activities which can help understand the impact of public management on the subject and the object of society. As a discipline with an avowed practical operational dimension, Public Administration is out and out embedded in society. In fact, the fate of three important functions of Public Administration viz. revenue collection, law and order and development are contingent upon societal responses. In other words, society's response to a given administrative measure determines the very fate of it. Hence, Public Administration has developed a close tie with Sociology, which was brought into being to study the underlying social structures and cultural patterns of the society. Sociology as a master science of society provides constant societal feedback to the practitioners of Public Administration regarding the feasibility of any given public policy. Hence, Sociology facilitates Public Aministration to implement public policies by customizing them in accordance with socio-cultural context. Sociology offers to Public Administration information about groups, their behaviour, and the way they affect social life. It is, therefore, not surprising that eminent in Public Administration primarily our to Sociology. Max.Weber's essay on bureaucracy has influenced many other writers in Public Administration. Some of the recent works in Sociology on status, class, power, occupation, family, etc., provide useful information and a theoretical base for the sociology of Public Administration. Sociologist Max Weber is attributed by many as the founding father of modern Public Administration presentive notion of ideal-type bureaucracy. The links established between Sociology and Public Administration has recently developed -at least outside France. This new institutional theory is referred to as "sociological institutionalism". The arrival of this new institutionalism serves as a theoretical framework to shape institutions, regulate organizations, culture and processes and their structure. The gap between institutional environment and organizations is bridged by new institutionalism making it attractive to Public Administration scholarship as it connects political

76 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) environment with administrative-organizational analysis. These connectedness between Sociology and Public Administration has potential for shared research interests and role of public organizations in society. With the various global challenges contemporary societies are confronted with such as migration, climate change, digitalization that are not only pressing problems in public policy domain, but these are pushing inevitable changes in social norms, changing social scenario and change in behaviour and expectations from government in problem-solving capacities and distribution of public service. Social changes also generate social conflict and fissures which pave the way for substantial intersections between these two disciplines. 2.5 Sociology and social work in public administration Public welfare administration cannot act detached from realities of day-to-day problems. The expansion of federal, state and local old agencies and other new agencies have been rapidly occupying the space in public welfare association. Beneficiaries in thousands have multiplied into millions which reflects the manifold growth in services of public agencies in a more specialized format. This specialization has induced coordination in the field of public welfare agencies. Public welfare administration is slowly evolving as a national function in states, localities and the federal government. Though its volume has increased and services has become varied but the nature has become professional which is evident from the numbers of social workers hired and the standard of guidance imparted. The Work Projects Administration is an example of an agency which has maintained its record in hiring trained personnel in supervisory and administrative positions. One can assert confidently that professional social workers are well suited for public welfare service. However, there is popular discussion as Anderson has described regarding popular opposition to hiring professional social workers which exist in the bigger picture. There are certain qualities and factors in addition to attitude and personality that agencies take into account before hiring trained workers. While these qualities are characteristics of professional worker there is still ambiguity if training at all is adding up value. There is dearth of information regarding the previous jobs, its nature and the experience these social workers have in the field. The ambiguity and the necessity to train these workers stems from the concern that public officials are held responsible by voters and unwillingness to pay unprofessional. This opposition towards social workers also emanates from uncertainty if they have failed to provide proper service due to lack of training. Criticism of these kinds has pushed towards the possible questions if the job responsibility is too big for many social workers as compared to their previous work experience.

77 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) There occurs a disparity which social workers feel when they get hired into public welfare after leaving their private welfare work background. Nonetheless the picture for social workers is not dark, the need is of adaptability. Public welfare work has ample opportunities to offer and social work has a role to offer. Infact social work has more to provide than any other profession. With the adaptation to dynamical changes in public welfare, social work has a hope but Nels Anderson heavily criticizes and argues that at present sociologists must question themselves about the direction they are moving forward in. He adds that a lot of sociologists have zero personal knowledge and lacks zeal to even know. They have little botheration towards people despite writing several books about social problems. He urges that sociologists must be able to contribute instead of standing detached from pressing problems of society. There is however plenty of space to assess this later. 2.6 Conclusion Sociology and social work are trying to keep up the pace with Public Administration. Despite the closeness, Sociology and Public Administration shares a dichotomy that exists in matters pertaining to family, tribe, society which doesnot seen to be a concern for Public Administration. Strategic planning, the distribution and management of resources (land, labor and capital), the zoning of industries and residences, the assessment of environmental effect, performance evaluation and issue mitigation are all duties that fall under the umbrella of public administration. Also, public administration is somewhat dissimilar to corporate administration; however, it has a broader scope, therefore it includes planning, organizing, staffing, directing and controlling. Sociology incorporates both organized and unorganized forms of social association whereas public administration is limited to organized political life. Sociology is general social science unlike Public Administration which is a specialized social science which makes it narrower in approach. The research of the theory and practice of Public Administration is oriented towards public interest whereas in Sociology the society is believed to be closely related area, no isolation between interaction of people and all forms of network relations. In this period the country is going through social transformation period with advancing reform measures initiated by government. Public management has been under considerable focus provided its demand has grown. However Public Administration has been strictly scrutinized because of its inability to guide the practice effectively.

There are numerous good historical books on Public Administration in individual countries or periods as well as from certain perspectives, but there are few universal assessments. Students are occasionally unsure of chronology of historical events such as whether Social Security was established during the New Deal or the Great society. Other times, the substance of key eras in government history, such as the Great Society's environmental impact is unclear. Most importantly, as Gladden puts it, students must often accept the existing relationship of the public sector to society- its size, functions and political standpoint- as a given, as "what is", since they have not investigated how it evolved over time.

81 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curretion (Dt. 17.10.2022) 3.3 Relationship between Public Administration and history Administration is just one of the many things that the government does. The term "government" encompasses a wide range of activities, including policy-making, law making, enforcing, maintaining, peace, adjudicating and numerous acts of communal engagement. Although, despite the widely accepted doctrine of separation of powers, it is not possible to assign exclusively each to its equivalent branch of government, these various activities are traditionally distributed among the three broad powers of the political - executive, legislative and judicial- as separate spheres. Furthermore, the tripartite classification does not account for acts of communal engagement that occur outside the government realm but have an impact on it, which are becoming increasingly important, particularly in democracies. While the legislative and judicial branches have relatively simple and well-understood functions-though even these tend to generate supplemental services-the executive branch has numerous features, ill-defined and if far from uniform. Policy-making, commanding, executing and maintaining peace are all basically executive duties. In actuality, the executive (to which the term government is frequently applied to distinguish it from legislature and judiciary) exercises legislative and judicial powers, while both the legislature and judiciary may perform responsibilities that would normally be allocated to one of the others. This broad functional range does not however exhaust the pattern of government complexity because government operates at several levels which are divided into both central and local levels, which are defined by population density, geographic distribution and other unique variables. Public administration at each of these levels, while adhering to the same broad principles has its own distinct characteristics. There are issues to resolve. To these regions of influence public administration must be added to the mix. International and supranational cooperations have always been crucial and are becoming so today. Students of public affair are aware of public administration being widely operative. Drawing a barrier between government and private activities based on some principle is no longer possible if it ever was despite political philosophers having suggestive answers. In the past, historians did not pay much attention to the social, political and economic development of the states. Administrative history is now being developed as a distinct discipline of history; hence this approach has altered. In the United States of America, the first attempt to compile a complete history of administration was made. Prof. Leonard D. White gives a detailed history of American administration in the first 48 years in his two volumes : The Federalists (1948) and the Jegersonians (1951). History instructs and advises administrators by highlighting the errors made by previous administrators that led to their downfall. Every country's public sector has

82 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) its own distinct history, one that characterizes, explains and defines how government can and does operate in the present. Understanding this history may help us better adapt management techniques to changing political and economic conditions. It can bring a sense of satisfication in knowing how do we fit into a greater cultural tale of public sector, in addition to practical benefits. The discipline of History has a close relationship with Public Administration. Though American Public Administration has had a tendency to downplay the importance of history, the European version of Public Administration has been inextricably associated with history. Indeed, any study of Public Administration would become meaningless until and unless it is studied in the context of history. For, history can only explain as to how administrative institutions in a country are evolved over the years. Further, administrative precedence which is considered to be an important element of policy making, is indicative of the importance of history in administrative decision making. The past administrative practices along with memoirs of administrators are considered to be the most important component of administration deliberations. According to E. H. Carr, 'history is a continuous process of interaction (between the historian and his facts) an unending dialogue between the present and the past'. History provides an insight into the past. The study of the historical background of a country enables us to understand its administrative systems. Historians have recorded not only political events like battles and the deeds of rulers but also particulars of Administration. For instance, L. D. White in his books on the early history of American administration, Administrative History of Medieval England provided useful material for understanding the systems of administration of those times. History tells us how administrative problems arose in the past and how they were solved. As a result, even if we agree that history is the ideal frame for bringing coherence to public administration studies, we are still faced with the challenge of designing a cohesive pattern for such a wide range of activities and approaches. Above all, two elements stemming from the nature of public administration must be considered : (1) its status as an integral part of government and (2) its necessary subordination in that framework. 1) While universal histories of government are rare, owing to the subject's vast diversity, general histories are invariably concerned with government, and wherever the context permits, these include a significant amount of information about public administration and its practitioners, particularly when they are important enough. This is clearly the case with the Oxford History of England, which devotes considerable, if variable, attention to such things in each of its sixteen volumes, but, of course, the administrative picture generated is inherently fragmented if not disjointed, being

83 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) auxiliary to the main theme. Even a broad image of the administrative world can be gleaned only after thorough probing in such histories, as detailed as they may be. There's no need for it to be any other way, because putting too much focus on the administrative components would inevitably throw the primary plot out of whack. There are a number of specialized histories dealing with certain administrative issues or sectors that, when considered as a whole - if that is possible - cover a significant portion of the broader ground. One aspect of the difficulty is coordinating these specialty accounts and filling in the gaps where possible. (2) Because of administration's intrinsic subordination and the fact that it does not exist on its own - administration for the sake of administration, as it were - its history should not be twisted in such a way as to give the idea that it is a fundamental or key subject. The history of Public Administration must be connected to governance in all of its forms. Because it is a specialist subject, this form of history will usually only interest experts, but given the enormous impact of public administration today on practically every sphere of human endeavour, it is becoming increasingly important that it be widely understood. In the contemporary setting, a current American business is particularly significant. The requirement for a more comprehensive and realistic approach to administrative history is highlighted in G.D.. Nash's Perspectives on Administration: The Vistas of History, published by the University of California, Berkeley's Institute of Governmental Studies, where the subject is being researched extensively. It is clear that there is no simple formula for selecting acceptable points of view from which a broad history of public administration can be successfully shaped. Nash presents a variety of different lines of approach in his thought-provoking study of the primary choices. These perspectives include institutional functional, Civil Service, biographical, psychological, anthropological, historical, entrepreneurial, ecological and intellectual approaches, all of which have been used by writers dealing with specialist administrative topics and none of which can be clearly distinguished from the others. Public Administration histories, whether confined to specific specialist fields or forming important elements in works of a more general nature, already exist in such universal activities as Public Finance and Diplomacy, and universal histories could certainly specialise in Central Government Administration, Local Government Administration, or the administration of such public activities as Police, Constructional Works, Defense, Taxation, Communications, Education, and Coordination. Nash's final summing up has two key points that can be usefully quoted: Historians can offer theorists with resources which are more varied in origin, more deeply anchored in human experience, and gathered from a wider historical span than those provided by academic evidence today.

84 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) At this point, Guy Thuillier and Jean Tulard's recent article on Problems de l'histoire de l'Administration, makes an important contribution to the problem, as it covers a colloquium held in Paris on the subject of French administrative history since 1800. Their statement of six principles for the historian of administration to follow in approaching the subject is worth studying in depth, but at least one of them must be disputed right away. This is the idea that this kind of history is based on a regressive process, in which present-day experience is used to explain the past. As a result, the administrative historian is unable to be objective. Such a mindset is an insidious flaw that historians must combat in all domains. In reality, it's tough for us to put ourselves in the other person's shoes, especially when he's been dead for a long time and the available information is incomplete, if it exists at all. However, the historian must always put forth an effort, acting as an artist when science has little to say. Otherwise, identifying the underlying tendencies that can provide important future signposts while also justifying our looking back will be very impossible. Regressive history, as stated, can do little more than reinforce our errors rather than help us figure out why we keep making the same mistakes. Initially, it appeared that a universal history of Public Administration would have to be set in the context of the principal activity - government - as well as against a broad historical backdrop that would account for time and space. It would have to be shaped on three levels to account for (i) the administration's essence, (ii) its governmental environment, and (iii) a minimal number of historical indicator points or map references, to put it another way. Covering the entire span of universal history - from cave man to computer - on these, or any other, lines would obviously necessitate the dedication and perseverance of a large team of experts, with plenty of time and plenty of financial and resource support, and the results could only be adequately deployed in a long series of volumes. It was much too big a mission for one under-resourced researcher. 3.3.1 Historical Approach The historical approach is essentially based on the belief that knowledge of History is absolutely essential for an in-depth study of any subject. For a proper under standing of the public administration of a country, it is necessary to link it up with a spatio-temporal frame. For example, in order to study the background and the growth of the administrative system in modern India, a historical perspective is essential. To understand the evolution of the administrative system in India, the characteristics of Indian administration during the British period and also the pre-British period have to be studies. Thus, the historical approach studies organization in a chronological order and comparative context. People who work in or study public organisations may not consider history to be

85 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) very important. Public Administration is an applied professional subject that deals with real time issues like money, organizational structure and programme management. We know that recent events can influence today's decisions, yet events from the past may appear to be entirely irrelevant when it comes to developing and implementing public policy in the present. Below we will discuss how history is still relevant to daily work of public sector professionals. By focusing on times of substantial change in the function of government in society, Essential history for Public Administration explores the culture that surrounds and shapes the American public sector. The book's concept is that understanding the cultural context can help students of public affairs better grasp the topics they're learning about in class and it can also help practicing public officials plan and manage successful initiatives. Each narrative describes how cultural understanding evolved in public sector. 3.4 The cultural context and the common themes, then and now People who work in the public sector are not just machine-like tools used to implement policies, as the case for the importance of history begins. Instead, their actions are influenced by the surrounding society's political, social, environmental and economic factors; they provide input to elected officials and interested citizens that might lead to policy change; and they use professional judgement in everyday decision making. Political leaders use it to generate public support, legislators sense it while considering changes in public policies and programmes and individuals may have it in mind while voting, the strength of the cultural view of government can have important effects. The public sector's cultural perspective did not emerge out-of nowhere in the last few decades. It originated in the years leading up to during the nation's formation, when individuals fled Europe to avoid tyranny of monarchical governments and religious constraints. It influenced the formation of government institutions and continues to affect how Americans think about government, public policy and the proper role of unelected career public servants in American society. As a result, the term "cultural" is particularly well suited to describe a viewpoint on the public sector's position in the United States. It is not a result of recent events or generational perspective but rather a continuing characteristic of the national political landscape. While the cultural perspective continues to shape public opinion and policy, it adapts to new circumstances brought about by political movements, economic situations and technological advancements. This is especially true during periods of rapid social change such as economic crisis, war, wealth and power disparities, social injustices and environmental degradation, all of which ignite public desire to act collectively. This means that public sector's connection with the rest of the society isn't set in stone 86 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) and will change as people act to tackle current challenges. People who advocate for change face pushback from those who use their power to hinder or weaken new policy measures, therefore bringing about change in these areas sometimes takes years. Successful adjustments in the role of the public sector become culturally embedded and largely stable elements of governments operation over time. There is of course difference in present-day issues and challenges in the public sector from the days of past. Despite differences in social conditions in earlier period, today's issues and problems are parallel which is striking. As Box describes, in American society, these includes themes like public versus private interest, concentrated wealth and power, relationship between "insiders" and "outsiders", the size and the cost of the government. There are six approaches as Gladden has described about general history associated to public administration. These are: ? Direction and Top Management- Most administrative history is found at this level and this is where the majority of historians and other researchers set their interests. It is here that rulers and governors communicate their decisions to their administrative assistants in the form of instructions and it is here that the latter arrange their activities for moulding and operating the administrative machine to achieve the desired results. Naturally, the distinction between the two sorts of actions is seldom evident. In smaller systems, kings are usually actively involved in administration, even to a great extent, although in bigger realms, rulers may choose to engage, as in the case of King John of England and Philip II. ? Function and Organization- an approach which is extension of the previous approach. In this true administrative realm where administrative function (i) develops as a factor of government from its original undifferentiated form, (ii) divides into specific activities through the division of labour, which has been a fundamental component of all social change and (iii) evolves the appropriate structure to shape and activate the emerging services. The functional foundation will be determined by the ruler's policy decisions, which will be based on their perception of the situation's demands and the availability of resources, while the actual organisation will vary greatly depending on the social context and government style. ? Personnel matters- when the ruler has to choose helpers, personal issues become more important, and they grow more complicated when he has to delegate some of his obligations to deputies. The authentic world of the officials has arisen where such deputies are involved mostly or entirely in administration and it

87 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curretion (Dt. 17.10.2022) would be quite fair to focus administrative history on the responsibilities, power and conditions of service of these officials. ? Techniques used by public officials must be kept in mind under each of the three preceding sections as well as being considered separately. These activities include not only basic administrative practices in their especially public form, but also actions related to the provision of the large variety of services that governments and their auxiliary agencies are responsible for. Before expanding the scope of their operations, governments must ensure that there are people available who can operate the essential procedures, if not among current officials and servants, then in the general public, as embalmers in Ancient Egypt and clerks in Medieval Europe did. Public Administration like many other Social Sciences, has recently rekindled its interest in its own history, not just in the history of administration but in the history of the discipline's evolution as a whole. The distinction between the history of long associated practices with the government process and the history of modern professionalism of those practices is tough and nuanced but is a significant if not necessary, distinction to make. 3.5 Conclusion History gives us a glimpse into the past. The study of a country's historical background allows us to comprehend its administrative structures. Historians have noted this, not only political events such as battles and rulers' action but details of public administration too. More importantly, the professionalization of administration engendered national interests among administrative professionals, detaching them from the local ties that their forefathers had so well understood. Professionalization has created a challenge for American society as a whole because specialization did not give an alternative value system. 3.6 Summary ? So far we have learned that, the history of wars and dynasties is of the utmost importance to public administration, on the other hand, it is concerned with countriy's social, Economic, and policical existence. ? We understood that history is mainly concerned with the past. It is unrelated to the present or the future. Public Administration is more concerned with the present and the future and only uses the past as a lesson for the present. ? Lastly, History is broader when compared to Public Administration because the former encompasses considerably more larger domain of human existenc.

To explain the interrelatedness between Public Administration and Economics. 4.2 Introduction What is the role of the state in economic development? This question has puzzled thinkers since Adam Smith and other economists even to these days, who continue to ponder on this question. We will learn about the contemporary discourse over the state's capacity in development and other activities or resource allocations. We can begin by exploring these questions, by conversing along Adam Smith's claim for the need of a "tolerable administration of justice" 4.3 Understanding Economics Economics permeates each and every sector of human activity and interaction. It is about how limited resources are used to create wealth. In the contemporary world, public administration plays a critical role of providing direction in terms of how that

90 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) wealth should be distributed, although its involvement in the economy differs from one country to another depending on a particular economic system at play. The public administrators are therefore faced with the challenges of taking decisions within the context of economic realities of their communities. They often make decisions in the face of limited resources. This is a fundamental economic challenge. A sound knowledge of the fundamentals of Economics is, therefore, essential for all public administrators and policy makers in the business of government. The fundamentals of Economics include, among others, inflation, unemployment, poverty, national and international trades, fiscal and monetary policies, and the economic behavior of households and organizations in the private and public sectors. Knowledge of Economics is important in understanding various phenomena that impact on the survival of human beings. Its teaching, particularly at the institutions of higher learning, is fundamentally important and should form an integral part of the curriculum of even those specialized instructional offerings that fall outside its formal purview as an academic discipline. Engineers, lawyers, medical doctors, nurses, social workers and physicists, just to mention but few, also invariably need some degree of understanding of Economics to efficiently carry out their specialized functions. Including Economics as an "anchor subject" in all set of courses that are being pursued for various professional and academic qualifications in the social and natural sciences is a sound approach to curriculum development as it would ensure that institutions of higher learning produces the caliber of graduates that are well-rounded and could easily understand the economic dynamics that underpin human actions. This is, however, often disregarded in various curriculum development endeavours. In this article curriculum development in the field of Public Administration at the universities of technology in South Africa is critically analyzed to determine the extent of the recognition of economics as a twin- science that should go together with the science of public sector governance. For, as pointed out above, public administration plays a critical role of providing direction in terms of how wealth should be distributed. 4.4 Relationship between Economics and Public Administration There is also a great deal of complementarity between Economics and Public Administration as Economic science facilitates Public Administration especially in the implementation of public policies with the sophisticated techniques of Pareto optimality. Preoccupied primarily with public interest, Public Administration has drawn its sustenance from Economics, which is solely concerned with the problem of allocation of limited resources. In fact, the root of the complementarity between

91 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Economics and Public Administration can be traced back much before the formal birth of the said disciplines. In fact, there has been a long tradition of economists advising governments on macro-economic management of the country. For example, Adam Smith in his magnum opus The Wealth of Nations had underscored the close relationship between political economy and state/government. Similarly, J.M. Keynes, another important economist had made a strong advocacy for collaboration between Public Administration and Economics. In fact, Keynes in a correspondence to the then Prime Minister of the United Kingdom Ramsay Macdonald, had advised to form a standing advisory committee of economists to guide the policy makers. As an arch rival of the orthodox laissez faire doctrine, Keynes intended to salvage the traditional theory of money from the clutches of long-term equilibrium situation and to ground it on a more realistic problems of economic management. Keynes in his landmark book The General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money, had categorically suggested that government should engender demand by deploying mechanism of fiscal and monetary policy. Further, public finance is another domain where economic and public administration collaborate. Public policy makers constantly are required to make choices and should be properly equipped to do so. Basic training in economics is therefore essential because every choice has costs and benefits associated with it. By making a choice, the decision maker has decided to employ scarce resources in a certain way, forcing other opportunities. Without a foundation in fundamental economics, less than optimal policies often result in under development. "Economics is a science concerned with those aspects of social behaviour and network of institutions which are involved in the use of scarce resources to produce and distribute' goods and services in the satisfaction of human wants. This understanding of Economics may be said to have been modified by the well-known economist, L. Robbins, who defines it as "the science which studies human behaviour as a relationship between ends and scarce means which have alternative use:' These definitions suggest that Economics is as much concerned with human behaviour as any other Social Science.' The major objectives of administration during 18th and a good part of 19th century were maintenance of law and order and collection of revenue. In the wake of Industrial evolution there occurred a radical transformation of the concept of the State. This was due to its being compelled to become more responsive to the needs of the masses, especially the working classes than ever before. Industrial Acts fixing working hours and minimum wages extended an enormous pressure on the administration. Goals like the -establishment of a socialist society led to the expansion of the role of administration in development. Those industries which had been hitherto managed by the private sector had come under the direct administration of the

92 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) government. The fast growing public sector (i.e. industries directly under the government) illustrates the relationship between— Economics and Public Administration. Indeed, the expanding role of the Public Sector and a direct intervention of the government to regulate extreme swings in the economy place a great burden on Public Administration. Planning has been chosen as the means to realise the goal of Socialist society, Since efficient implementation of plans ensures goal attainment, the task of the administrators is to choose methods for effective implementation of plans. The administrators today have been entrusted with the responsibility of managing railways, insurance companies and tackling ' issues concerning agriculture, banking, etc. They, therefore, have got to have an understanding of the economic problems of the country. The ancient classic Arthashastra is not only a treatise on the art of administration but also a reference book on Economics. In several other respects Arthashastra points out the close relationship between Public Administration and Economics. 4.5 Impact of Economics on Administration and Policies with examples The knowledge of both Public Administration and Economics is important in assisting government official to improve and reform their governance system and administrative institution, strength their policy making capacity and improve overall efficiency of the government machinery. In the context of the current developmental challenges that South Africa faces, dropping Economics in the Public Administration curriculum does not make any sense. What informed this curriculum direction in the field of public administration is misinformed about the development trajectory that South Africa is pursuing. The strategic focus of government at this epoch that dawns the second decade of democracy in South Africa is on building and consolidating a developmental state. Maserumule & Mathole point out that the imperatives of a developmental state necessitate that the quality of life of the citizens must be enhanced through an improved service delivery of public services and the creation of appropriate environment to maximize the participation of the citizens in the mainstream economy particularly those that were previously marginalized by the apartheid system. Improving service delivery and creating a befitting climate for equitable citizen participation in the mainstream of economy are two-pronged challenges confronting the government. These challenges necessitate the calibre of government officials who do not only master the art and science of governance, but also of Economics. Given the emergence of public

93 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) expenditure concept as an integral component in the economic studies between the period 1960s and 1970s, the foregoing is even more important. The concept of public expenditure focuses on the demand for and supply of government goods and services as well as resource allocation in the public sector (see Economics and Public Administration, undated). The knowledge of both Public Administration and Economics is important in assisting government officials to improve, strengthen and reform their governance systems and administrative institutions; strengthen their policy making capacity; and improve overall efficiency of the government machinery. The societal problems are solved by Public Administration and Economics explain choices. This means that Public Administration identifies normative rules that would lead decision-makers to make optimal decisions whereas economics identifies rules that decision makers are likely to follow. Of more importance in this "public administration- economics nexus" is the ability of government officials to identify and effectively respond to emerging global trends and challenges. The current global financial crisis threatens the economies of the countries of the world and impacts negatively on the efforts to realize the Millennium Development Goals. This necessitates high calibre of government officials with sound economic knowledge to make informed decisions, particularly in dealing with the challenges as brought about by the global economic meltdown. Since the inception of the democratic dispensation in 1994, South Africa has committed itself to correcting structural injustices and improving the living standards of the people and recognises socio-economic rights (access to basic services such as housing, health and education) enshrined in the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa as an integral component of developing the country. The government, therefore, embarked on a variety of development initiatives clearly expressed in the Reconstruction and Development Programme (RDP), developed back in 1993, Growth, Employment and Redistribution Strategy (GEAR), in 1996, and Accelerated and Shared Growth Initiative (ASGISA), in 2006. All these development initiatives, with huge economic implications on the country, are aimed at addressing the socio-economic challenges such as poverty, unemployment, and unequal distribution of resources that face the country and public administration is expected to play a leading role in ensuring their successful implementation. In the context of South Africa, the knowledge of economics is even more essential for Public Administrators as it would provide a theoretical framework to understand these contemporary development initiatives. RDP is an integrated policy framework for socio-economic renewal, transformation and empowerment to establish a systematic approach to the democratization and development of the South African society. Its central thrust is to reduce the poverty of the majority of South Africans and make services of an economic nature accessible

94 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) to all. To give rise to ample employment opportunities and a redistribution of resources, GEAR was developed as a strategic intervention aimed at accelerating the pace of realizing the objective of RDP. As a result of an increase in unemployment (from 26 % in 1994 to 30.5 % in 2002), the government committed to achieve the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) set in 2000 (Development Report 2005), which is to halve poverty and unemployment by 2014. The government introduced ASGISA as another intervention to accelerate the pace of development. ASGISA focuses, in particular, on fast job creating growth, ensure availability of the needed skills, create opportunities for those marginalised, and maintain policies that brought macroeconomic stability. The theoretical antecedents of these development initiatives are embedded in the science of economics. Therefore, the "brightest and best servants" that the imperatives of a development state needs should not only be schooled in the science of governance but of economics as well. This would ensure that various programs of government, largely those that are aimed at eradicating poverty and unemployment, are properly managed by people with rounded-knowledge. Economics is extremely important for governments and policy makers as it provides comprehensive and in- depth knowledge to analyze the economy in terms of these development initiatives which are very significant in the provision of quality public services. Economic decisions and actions are taken every day by economic agents such as individuals, governments and firms and economics is the study of these decisions and actions and of the way economic processes work. Economics therefore provides knowledge of regional and municipal development, Public Administration and Economics, and prepares graduates for careers in local, municipal and central authorities of government administration, as well as various institutions. In a developmental state, government establishes social and economic goals. Factors of production are privately owned but the government must always intervene and influence the direction and pace of economic and social development rather than leaving them to the dictates of the markets to ensure that the national interests are always realized. This needs a "strong state capacity", which is achieved through the creation of inexpensive, efficient and effective public service staffed by the nation's brightest and best servants functioning without constraints and capable of being innovative in addressing the social and economic needs of the citizens. It is in this context that public administration and economics [should] go together as twin-sciences for rounded-knowledge. An omission of Economics in the Public Administration curriculum at the universities of technology following the re-curriculation exercise of 2000 is therefore a gross mistake, which its effect is mass production of graduates whose knowledge profile do not adequately befit the orientation of a developmental state. Much of knowledge that the universities

95 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) of technology create through the current Public Administration curriculum is skewed towards the science of governance and economic science is underplayed. In one of the modules called Public Resource Management in Public Administration curriculum, consideration of economics in Public Administration is only limited to normative values of efficiency, effectiveness and productivity in governance. The theories of economics, which constitute its scientific essence, are not covered. A concern is always being raised in government circles about the quality of graduates that the institutions of higher learning produce. This is an indictment on the quality of knowledge that the Public Administration educational programs produce through their curricula that are narrowly focused. Economics has recently emerged as public administration's preeminent paradigm and is much more directly relevant to the concerns of public administration and to solve real life economic problems. 4.6 Conclusion Public Administration is a very new discipline. It got separated from Political Science a few decades ago. It has very close relationship with all other social sciences. Public Administration cannot be appreciated without an understanding of social reality around it. Works of sociologists like Max Weber influenced the theory and practice of Public Administration. The fact that the modern administrator is known as a social engineer, confirms the close relationship between economics and Public Administration. With the advent of planning the relationship between Public Administration with Economics has grown stronger, and the present-day administrators ought to know the economic aspects of the polity for effective implementation of policies. 4.7 Summary ? So, in this unit we have learned how Public Administration is related to Economics just like any other social science. ? Public Administration along with Economics plays an important role in the implementation of financial development and social infrastructure of the state. 4.8 Glossary ? To understand the relationship between Psychology and Public Administration. 5.2 Introduction Before outlining how Public Administration research may benefit from Psychology, it is worth showing how this idea is rooted in the scholarship of early Public Administration. We do not have to search long or in obscure corners of our field: discussions about the cross-fertilization of the two disciplines were central to many seminal figures in Public Administration scholarship. The most obvious early attempt can be found in Herbert Simon's seminal work Administrative Behaviour (Simon 1947). Today, Simon's scholarship is mostly credited with introducing the concepts of bounded rationality and satisficing into the study of Public Administration (e.g., Meier 2015). While these concepts clearly draw on insights from cognitive and social psychology, they are just examples of how Simon envisioned a much more general and tight integration between the two fields. In his Nobel Prize speech of 1978, he cited how his 1947 book grew out of the conviction "that decision making is the heart of administration, and that the vocabulary of administrative theory must be derived from the logic and psychology of human choice" (Simon 1978, 353).

Simon reiterated this view in an exchange with Robert Dahl (1947) in Public Administration Review over the fundamentals of Public Administration as a science (Simon 1947b). While Simon and Dahl disagreed on a range of issues, they both acknowledged the importance of understanding human behaviour in public administration. For instance, Dahl noted that a science of Public Administration must be based on an "understanding of man's behavior in the area marked off by the boundaries of Public Administration". He therefore argued that Public Administration must work together closely with fields that focus on human behaviour in other areas, including Psychology and Sociology. Simon's sentiment reflects the idea that Public Administration is subordinate to Psychology, as administrative decision making must be studied as a special case of the many forms of decision making studied by psychologists. Thus, one of the founding fathers of contemporary Public Administration saw the field as, ideally, an applied subfield within Social Psychology. However, Simon also noted that Public Administration cannot merely be a passive user of Psychology but must aim to also contribute to it. A decade later, Simon still saw a great distance between Public Administration and Psychology, and he recognized that Psychology also could learn something from Public Administration and thus "a marking stone placed halfway between might help travelers from both directions to keep to their courses". In other words, Simon envisioned a two-way street between the two fields. Simon and Dahl were not the only prominent Public Administration scholars interested in Pychology. In The Administrative State, published in 1948, Dwight Waldo, who in the 1960s spearheaded the "behavioral revolution" in political science, discussed the connection between Public Administration and Psychology. He noted how psychologists see "that man is in small part rational" but rather is motivated by emotional drives and urges. Despite this, he also notes that Public Administration has been little touched'' by ideas from Psychology. Waldo subsequently evaluated the extent to which psychological by insights had penetrated Public Administration and came to a similar conclusion. Calls for integrating insights from Psychology into public for adopting Psychological public opinion research in Public Administration. Frederick Mosher, for instance, discussed the role of Public Administration in relation to other social sciences and pointed out that there should be more interaction between them, in particular public administration and the field of Psychology. Along the same lines, scholars in the 1950s and 1960s argued for a tighter integration of the fields (e.g., Honey 1957; Verba 1961). Yet, until recently, these calls have been largely unheard.
100 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) 5.3 Relationship between Psychology and Public Administration Public Administration as a discipline is concerned with human behaviour in the institutional setting. It is indebted to Psychology for availing inputs of organizational management. As a science of human behaviour, Psychology helps us to uncover nuances of individual cognitive processes like attitudinal changes, cognitive dissonance and so on. Though the classical theorists of administrative management like Fayol, Taylor, Gulick were busy with the mechanical aspects of the process and structuring of organization. It was late 1920s and early 1930s organizational management had undergone a sea change as human psychology came into the Centre of the discourse via the Hawthorne studies. Consequently, the human factor became the centre stage of organization. Moreover, several contemporary individually oriented psychologists like Maslow, Herzberg have contributed to organizational management. Hence psychology has a close interrelationship with Public Administration. Modern behaviourism which developed in the late 1930's is mainly concerned with the scientific study of human behaviour in diverse social environment. In Public Administration behaviourism as a distinct line of study started in 1930's with the Human Relations movement and was later developed by Chester Bernard, Herbert Simon, Herbert Dahl and others. They observed that administrative behaviour is a part of the behavioural sciences and study of Public Administration should involve the study of individual and collective human behaviour in administrative situations. The behaviourists sought to adopt an integrated and interdisciplinary approach for according to them all human actions are motivated by social, economic, political and psychological environment from which they emanate. This approach aims at substituting empirical and realistic judgements for the purely value oriented one. It also emphasizes a scientific approach to the study of administrative problems and their solution. The scholars in the field of Public Administration have made cross-structural, cross-cultural studies of administrative behaviour. This has helped in the development of knowledge of Public Administration in the comparative context. But the behavioral approach has been criticized for having limited utility in the analysis of all types of administrative phenomena. Therefore this approach appears to be of limited relevance in dealing with all types of administrative problems and their solutions, since their complexity and variability of human nature, motivations and behaviour are far from attaining precision as is possible in physical science. Value oriented or normative problems and issues of organization cannot really be explained or interpreted in terms of the behavioural approach.

In order to systematically assess the extent of recent Psychology informed Public Administration research, some researchers conducted a systematic analysis of all articles published in three top-tier journals in the field of Public Administration Public Administration Review, Journal of Public Administration Research and Theory, and Public Administration–from 1996 to 2015. They chose to analyze 20 years given that this is a substantial time frame that is sufficient to identify potential trends in Public Administration research. Furthermore, there was also a more pragmatic reason, as the Scopus database only allows word searching within the body text and references from 1996 and onward. Furthermore, even for some years after 1996, the Scopus database seems incomplete, and therefore the total number of articles reported here may not completely reflect the total number of articles published in each journal. However, the data are suitable to provide an overview of the development in Phychology informed Public Administration research over time. A total of 1,807 articles were published in PAR. Among these articles, identified 216 articles containing the word "psychology" in either the title, abstract, body text, or references. This amounts to about 12 percent of all articles. Based on their reading of the articles, they identified which ones made substantial use of psychology (e.g., by using various psychological theories). The coding identified 63 psychology-informed articles, which amounts to 3.5 percent of the full body of articles in the 20-year period. The mean share of articles for the last six years has more than quadrupled compared with the mean in the period from 1996 to 2009. The manual coding also included the area of research in Public Administration. They categorized the articles based on the Piblic Administration categories developed by Groeneveld et al. (2015). Most of the articles focused on the broad category of public management, for instance, articles on public service motivation and leadership. A smaller share analysed topics related to policy and politics or looked at networks. 5.5 Two-Way Street between Psychology and Public Administration They argued that Public Administration scholars could benefit from integrating Psychology informed theories into their projects. What does this imply for research practice? First of all, it implies an open attitude toward theories and methods that are
102 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) not initially developed for studying research questions that arise in an administrative setting. Specifically, this entails that a research project in behaviorual public administration not only draws on the best available knowledge within Public administration, abut also from state-of-the art knowledge from psychology. By studying concepts derived from Psychology in Public Administration settings, behavioural public administration will also be better positioned to provide constructive and critical contributions to Psychology. Yet "it takes two to tango," and therefore behavioural public administration should be a two-way street for scientific discovery. Theories in Psychology are often backed by experiments conducted with a student sample in a highly controlled environment such as the laboratory. A political administrative setting provides a real-life laboratory to study human judgment and decision making in which the ecological validity of practical implications of psychological theories can be tested. Certain concepts from Public Administration, such as public service motivation and red tape, can further inform thinking in Psychology. Public Administration can actively contribute to Psychology by highlighting the interplay between psychological processes among citizens and political actors. For instance, psychologists have identified a "left-most digit bias" in humans' processing of numbers, which posits that humans are overly influenced by the digits they first encounter when relying on a multidigit number. Public Administration research has also shown that politicians can actively draw on citizens' left-most digit bias in order to provide a more favourable view of performance to the public. That is, Public Administration provides psychology with novel ways of linking micro-level processes to macro-level variation in how politicians, managers, or organizations behave. 5.6 Conclusion One of the reasons why Whitehead approach to moral psychology is so appropriate for Public Administration (and other professions, as well) is that it recognizes that the concern of morality is all of reality, not just humanity; that is, human beings have moral relations with all in the environment and not merely among themselves. The authentic moral psyche is morally related to the environment, as well as to other individuals in the community. Formalists and utilitarians have only problematically attempted to bring moral obligations to non-human life under the rubric of their systems. Even in John Rawls' theory of justice, for example, there is no indication that plants and animals hold any higher status than merely serving the interests of human beings. Do all moral relations with nature reduce to human utility? According to Tribe's argument, this approach is a distortion from a more fundamental feeling of empathy and obligation toward non-human life around us. If he is right, there is more

106 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) 1.2 Introduction Basically administrative structure builds with the cooperation and cohesion among staff and workers, working at different levels with different responsibility and duties, determined by the boundaries made by the administration. But the apparent differences of level and responsibility are cohered in one uniform decision to comply with the vision and mission of administration as a whole. By definition, administration is coordination among responsibilities and efforts of a group of people to achieve a particular goal which have bsically a common objective endorsed by legislature. In fact administrative machinery is built up in order to attain the desired goal envisaged by the constitution and effectuated by the legislature in parliamentary democracy and by the President and the legislature in a presidential form of govern formed with the elected members. The basic purpose of the administrative organization is to build the working process for proper utilization of man, materials and money for the desired accomplishment of its defined purpose. Thus, it is said, "organization is the basic tool by means of which the administrative processes are kept operating."( Dimock and Dimock). Organization is a planned system of human association which unite the cooperative efforts of each and every part of the association. The members, at any level, of the association have the training to recognise the role to perform their duties and tasks to pursue. The performance is largely made by the recognised authority, which primarily the arrangements of works at different level, are defined and coordinate for the defined objectives. Different people defined the basic concepts of operation of administration like, Centralization, Decentralization, and Supervision etc. from different perspectives. These structural arrangements within the administration as a whole are used in three different senses : First, the act of designing the administrative structure, Secondly, both designing and building the administrative structure, and third basic administrative structure. But these views represent a mechanistic (structural) view

relationship. The basic concepts of different administrative processes have some essential characteristics which we use to understand the nature and functions of different organizations that perform the functions. The different organised pattern of administration, like centralized or decentralized pattern, the unique pattern of power, delegation from higher rank to lower rank, or the pattern of supervision etc. have certain basic characteristics which enable them to do their schedule work within the larger administration. These organisational patterns work with a definite purpose.

107 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriculum (Dt. 17.10.2022) These are generally formed with a definite aim and mission, which they perform with complex human collectivism and these groups of human workers and staff are not in any way personally related to each other. Their relations within the organization are secondary and impersonal. All of them are individually expected to be specialized in their job and responsibility. They are also given special training for specialized job. But their training and specialization are altogether directed for limited goals, which can only be attained by their cooperative activities. They are being a part of the larger society; primarily provide their service and product of their work to the society at large. in return they also want feedback from the society, because their existence largely depend upon this feedback from the environment. These administrative organizations have definite purpose, process, person and place. The basic purpose of these organization are suited their functional performances, for example, different organizations like Defence, Health, Education etc., have their own purpose, which is, at least, outwardly different from others. But at the end, these different purposes are expected to give a coherent mission of the executive branch of the government. To make the mission coherent and systematic, they avoid of eliminate overlapping or duplication of work, but their basic aim is to develop a good coordination among different departments or organizations. Purposes of these organizations are tuned in a way to build up technique and specialized skill of the members of the organization for performing their work perfectly. Specialized technical skill enables the staff to use all probable and available technical means for better result. Use of technicality has another aspect of departmental functioning. It encourages coordination in the technical work. It is also essential to select right person or staff with comfortable technical knowledge, to work for some particular department or organization. There are some governmental departments, which have some definite clientele, such as, Tribal Welfare, Women Empowerment Department or Rehabilitation Department. A particular group of people of the society always depends upon the perfect bearing of responsibility by the departmental agents and if the agency of the department can establish a close relationship with their clientele, then only the benefit of the interested group of clientele, could be ascertained and maximum benefit could be achieved. So at the beginning of formation, department tries to establish close relationship with the target groups, and then tries to approach the problem of those within the context of larger social problem. Each organisation has its own area of operation where it actively operates. For example, Railway Department, or D.V.C, have their specific area of operation, and their attempts are to establish a coordinative and cooperative relation with other related service provider, for purpose of serving their own area of operation. Such departments are also responsible to serve the national demand through their work schedule.

108 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Thus the government builds up its organisation, basically with the concept of creating the machinery and procedure for implementation of policies by the legislature. Government operates through multiple administrative departments, organised to serve some basic functions, namely, maintenance of law and order, protection of rights and liberties of the people, collection of revenue and mobilisation of resources for nation building and for upholding the soverign existence of the nation and dignity of the citizens, But these functions have multidivensional and complex performance levels, which include resource / asset management, project / performance management and strategic management. Administration or management is a complex activity that involves policy makers workers executers at different levels and position contextualised by socio-economic, political and cultural environment of a country. Depending on this contexts and on organisational dimension, as well as on organisational structure and attitude. 1.3 Centralization and Decentralization Some analysts of Public Administration identify at least five different aspects of extralised decentralized form of administration, of which two are administrative aspects and others are, political, geographical and functional.Depending on the nature of the political system and historical context of a country, public administration is made centralised and decentralised in structure and function. In any public or private administrative structure neither centralisation non decentralisation can exist is absolute form and they can never be identified in ideal functional terms. The degree to which a system is centralised or decentralised, defines the nature and scope of an organisation. Hence, in an organise in which formal authority of decision making is concentrated to a larger extent at the apex, is called a centralised system. Centralisation is an administrative structure in which key decisions, such as resource allocation, man management etc. are made by the top ooficials and primary strategic direction and planing are set at the apex of the liherarchy. Centralisation makes the structure pyramidal with a top authority, entruste with the responsibility to make decisions to fulfil the goal of the organisation. In a centralised system information flows from the top to bottom. Advantages of Centralisation A centralised administrative structure with a higher degree of concentration of power and authority maitains a distinct chain of command and this unity of command makes the decision making system focussed and goal oriented Scaler chain and unity of command, the cardinal principles of Fayol's nation of administration facilitates 109 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) unity of direction in an organisation, enabling the organisation to attain its target in a less cumbersome way and makes the focus of accountability more prominent. Clear plan of delegation in accordance with the strategic planning help the system to attain its goals and fulfils its mission more effectively and consistent. Distinct line of communication and delegation of power reduces administrative expenditure and reduces the possibility of duplication of functions and overlapping. Centralised mode of administration reduces the possibility of occurance of conflict, helps to prevent lengthier decision making and implementative process, improves quality of work and sets the tune for standardisation of work. Advantages of Centralisation Centralisation is suitable in a relatively smaller units of administration. In a large multidimensional organisation. Centralisation to a mider extent may not be able to produce good results; contrarily it may lead the way for dictatorial form of leadership. Rigid hierarchy may induce corruption, may lower the spirit of notivation among the lower level performers and may adversely affect output. Uni-directional communication may ignore the quality control mecahnism and may make the system stereotypically less creative. In today's fast economy, centralisation may not produce desired output, or it ignores the efficiency of the lower stratum of kers and may nurture delayed performance. Conflict and ego-clashes between the top and lower levels of the organisation may create hidreances in unfilling the target of an organisation. Fayol suggested that there should be a proper balance in the degrees to which a system is centralised or decentralised, to facilitate proper and timely performance and to encourage innovation and creativity. Dispersal of authority at the lower levels may make the top management more effective by reducing burden of responsibilities. However, at each level, accountability must be properly ascertained to make the system efficient. Decentralisation The system in which power to make decisions is given to the person or group of persons who are performing to affair a defined goal, is known as decentralised system. Decentralisation refers to a specific form of organisational structure where the apex body an authority disperses a particular degree of authority and responsibilities to the appropriate sections an individuals according to the vision of the organisation. Decentralization creates an apparent autonomous authority, which takes decision, generally not referring, and occasionally referring to the apex authority. In fact,

110 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) process of decentralization, by its own signifies that power and control of the activities of an organisation are given to the lower stratum of the organisation department by the senior oficer of the stratum, to take and implement decision, The dispersion as distribution of power and authority, allied with certain responsibilities is referred to as decentralisation. Decentralisation means a strategic and clear division of function and authorities among the lower levels of the organisation to make the system of functioning more goal and action oriented. In seem to be an effective mechanism for better management, as it nurtures the spirit of inclusiveness to suit the needs of attainment of organisational goals. Bether communication among all the levels encourages creativity and an urge for better performance. The degree of decentralisation, howerver, depends on some crucial factors, like, organisational goal and philosophy, nature and size of the job performed by an organisation, efficiency of the lower level works as well as of the top coordinators, degree of diversification geographical dispersion, technical complexity, cost effectiveness, motivation of the subordinates and of course historical cultural contexts. The issue of centralization and decentralization particularly needs to be assessed in terms of the relation on between : (1) Superior and subordinate officer of the department; (2) Head Office or apex of the department and its component departments or parts at the lower stratum; (3) Official and non-official element; (4) headquarter at top and field officers who actually implement or execute the plan and decision of the Headquarter; (5) lastly, between Chief Executive and functional department or agencies. In the decentralized structure of administration, lower levels of administration are allowed the discretion to decide in most cases which come up to them. They only refer those cases and problems to the higher author, which they feel urable to resolve or mitigate. Thus, the essence of centralization or decentralization is the administrative norms and system of administrative distribution of power of decision making among the layers of departmental stratum. Keeping a fewer section of decision making power, the administration under federal structure distributes most of the decision making resoponsibility to the different periphery or layers of the administrative structure. It shoud also be mentioned that the difference between centralization and decentralization is one of degree rather of kinds, because no administrative structure can be found which is completely or absolutely centralized, even the same is true for decentralization. Chif or Head of Executive requires to share the burden of his work with subordinates. In case of absolute centralized administration, sometimes the Chief may become overwhelmed with work-load, which may effect his efficiency. Thus, the degree centralization and decentralization is to balanced be for better and efficient administration. So, we found that centralization denotes that the decision-making power ultimately

111 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) lies with the highest authority of the administrative system. Decentralization, in opposite to the centralization, means dispersion of same authority among corresponding lower layers according to necessity and eligibility. Thus, these two concepts, centralization and decentralization are basically related with the exact location and upward and downward responsibility of decision-making power in the administrative system. In the Centralized form of organization, the lower levels do not work on their own initiative, rather they only carry out the orders and instructions, percolated to them from the higher levels. They are always required to refer their field-observations and problem to higher centralized authority to get back further decisions and instructions. In a centralized administrative process, lower rank of the organization only act as implementing units, mastered by the higher units. In a way, the lower units of the administration act virtually as an agent of materializing the decision of the higher body. Their responsibility is only to carry out the orders, not to look for the result of the decision. The effect and result of all these are borne and measured by the authority which dictates as well as supervise the decisions. On the contrary, In decentralized administration, the lower units of administravie departments act on their own initivative, taking decision, within the frame of their responsible zone or periphery. Of course, in maintaining their responsibility, they follow the procedure and rules of performing the work, determined by the highest authority. Thus the essence of decentralization, is vesting of decision making poer in the hadns lower level of the head-quarters. Thus to define centralization, decentralization,

L. D. White stated, ‘‘The process of transfer of administrative authority from lower to a higher level of government, is called centralization :

the converse is the system of decentralization.'' Henry Fayol, defined, the decentralized administration presupposes the importance of subordinate units to take part in framing and implementing the decision. But, under they system of centralized administration, power and authority of making and implementing decision rest on the hands of a single authority. It, along with making decision, also makes out the plan of implementing through lower aengts under it supervision So, in a single word, decentralization presupposes the increase and importance of subordinate authority, while transfer of administrative authority to the highest body denotes centralization. Broadly speaking the decentralized administration may be at political, territorial and functional level. Territorial centralization may compared with vertical distribution of power and authority, while functional decentralization distributes power horizontally. Political decentralization is mostly seen in federal countries like India and provinces of Canada. Specially in India, the Constitution itself, by its provision listed the power and responsibility into three segments : Central List, State List, and Concurrent List. In case of Concurrent list, the Constitution has affirmed the supremacy of the Union
112 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Law [Art 254(2) has stated regarding the power of making law of the State legislatue, that ''With respect to one of the matters enumerated in Concurrent List contains any provision repugnant to the provision of an earlier law made by the Parliament or an existing law with respect to that matter, then, the law so made by the Legislature of such State, if it has been reserved for the consideration of the President and has received his assent, prevail in the State.'' Apart from this example of procentralized tendencies in Indian federalism or decentralized administration, it has also been stated that in case of overlapping of any Power and Authority stated in three lists, law made by Parliament shall dominate. But in any way, not only the founders of Indian Constitution, founders of U.S.A. Constitution also suggested political decentralization in applying executive power. The Constitution of different Countries have set the example of establishing City Government in U.A.S., Panchayat Raj and Municipal Corporation in India, County Government in Britain, as a positive attempt of Furthering the process of decentralization—political as well as executive. Apart from political decentralization, there are also horizontal decentralization, there may be territorial decentralized administration, where higehr authority judging the necessity and convenience determines the area of administration. These areas are defined either by political or geographical or functional administrative convenience. As for example, State administration divides the state into district, Panchayat, taluk or Circle. These divided units are empowered to take decision within particular specified limits and thus function in an independent manner. Eve, as we said earlier the function or particular responsibility of the administration is fixed up on the basis of functional specialization of a particular unit or to newly formed units where experts on the matter are assembled. The Government, for example, creates some professional or technical bodies, like University Grant Commission, Flood Control Board, Central Welfare Board, etc. This matter of relationship between the Headquarters at the apex and outlying field agencies and officials or between the central government (or State government) on the one hand and local bodies on the other, from the cardinal point of discussion in the debate on centralisation vs decentralisation or centralisation and decentralisation. 1.4 Approaches to the Issue As a popular federal process of administration, the decentralization have different approaches. These approaches haved defined the process in different ways. One of the known approaches in ''Doctrinal Approach.'' This approach denotes, that, the system of decentralization is used as an end in itself, not as a means to realise goal. Because

113 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) it is not use for any temporary period, rather it is used in an orderly manner to establish a certain pattern of administration. So the idea of making administration decentralized, is basically an idea in mind, which help to set a cultural pattern among social men, to support and cope us with this process. Naturally as a cultural system, the clients of administration in the systeme for their needs and desire. Some authors have also approached the decentralized process as a political outcome of constitutional system. They claim that the creation of decentralized system of administrative operation with a set of departmental autonomy, is primarily governed by the political factor. There is another approach to confirm the utility of the concept of decentralization. The approach is popularly known as political approach. It says that decentralization with a set of operational autonomy given to the units, is governed by the policy makers and has a political overtone. Regarding administrative approach to decentralization, it is said that the formation of autonomous decentralized units, are made to improve the efficiency of administration. Decentralized at decision the lower levels leads a perfect decision, taking all aspects into consideration properly. It enables the apex body to take an overview of all problems of all units along with their suggestions. Only for this reason apex decision making body divides and distributes power and autonomy way for among regional, divisional, sub divisional, Circle levels, within the country state Headquarters. Dual role approach of decentralization conceives decentralization as a method of resolving conflicts in the field of administration. This sometimes becomes the cause of changing traditional beliefe and culture of administrative method. The usage of status quo oriented field administration cannot fetch desired result in a changing pattern of socio economic reality. The basic problem that arise in the dichotomy of relation between centralization and decentralization is the relation of superior and subordinate officers within an organization. In other words, this form of subordinate and superior relation, expressed through the formal relation between official and non official elements, between the headquarters and the field officials and finally between the Chief Executive and the functional departments or agencies construct the context of centralisation and decentralisation. Generally those departments are called centralized where most of the power of decision is vested at the top of the departments, and lower layers of the administration refer all the problems to the apex or immediate superior and wait for the final decision along with the direction of implementation from them. L.D.White defined the same in a new way. He argued that there are some constitutional arrangement where the power and authority rest with the elected bodies, where fundamental source of power is Constitution. These systems of administrations are called decentralized, although the apex bodies do not determine the structure, it only makes necessary

114 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) functional arrangement for proper operation of authority and power. But if constitution empowers the executive authority to delegate or not to delegate the power and authority, then there will be much probability for the development of centralization. At the end of his short discussion on centralization and decentralization, he summed up the matter, in the way, "Transfer of authority from lower level to the higher, is centralization, the reverse is decentralization." Professional heads of different units have some specific way of defining the features of decentralization, vis-a-vis centralized form of administration : I. Most of the decisions in centralized form are taken at the apex. Thus, the efficient, trained and educated staff and officers are selected to cope up with the problem, on its perfect merit; at the point of selection process, the Board of Selectors judge the merit of the staff on that basis. II. The decentralized system ensures active participation of the people in the field themselves. Other than their compliance with decision, taken at a particular layer of the administration, the spontaneous cooperation with the administration is also essential. Naturally the main beneficiaries of the administrative decision, taken at any level are local people. These benefits stimulate their interest to identify with the interest of the State or any organisation. The general state administration should take the benefit and advantage of this identification of 'general people with local administrative decision. This sometimes appears not possible in centralized type of administration. III. State and its people in different parts always look for cooperation among various agencies in the field. They also are habituated to believe that central cooperation and frequent interference causes jealousies, unnecessary delays and jurisdictional disputes. Generally, maker of the Constitution, consider four factors before incorporating centralization and decentralization as a fundamental process of administration. These are:- (1) the factor of responsibility; (2) administrative factors; (3) functional factors; (4) external factors. A Country or an organisation follows centralised on decentralised mode of operation depending on some other factors as well. the size of the organisation, need for dispersal or distribution of power, degree of diversity, Mind set of top executives nature of functions to be undertaken by the organisation, efficiency and skill of the lower ladder staff, mode of communication, planing and strategic deployment procedure, other constitutional as legal formalities as constraints and so on determine the degree of centralisation or decentralisation. In a large organisation with a complex set up and perform complecated works, usually decentralisation seem to be profitable; contrarily, in a small organisation, performing straight simple roles contralisation is preferred to

115 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) same time and money. Geographically scattered organisations prefer to opt for decentralisation, the reason which inspired India or USA to adopt federal constitutions. In this technologically driven global world, market economy demands high level of standardisation in producing goods and services, for which even the federal nations are now going in the track of centralised administration in the name of renewed coordination. Further, continous innovation and use of technology has enhenced the need for unified decision making a group of skilled officials, for which countries and organisations are found to be inclined towards centralisation to a higher degree in major fields. The factor of responsibility of administration is a major deterrent to decentralization, because policy makers psychologically argue in favour of centralized administrative structure rather than decentralized structure. To them, it is better to keep the final authority in the hands of central Chief Executive, so that total control can be established equally on all the bodies below the Chief Executive. The administrative factor is related with the issue like stability and general policy of the government. Above all the success of decentralization is heavily dependant technical knowledge and skill to handle in internal and external communication of the staff at different level of administration. In absence of such system, centralization is inevitable. The actuality of administrative factor making for centralization or decentralization is thus only illustrative and by no means exhaustive. The functional factor of administration influences to build up centralized or decentralized administration in many ways. In an organisation an department with an intense requirement for technical know-how technical departments enjoy huge autonomy as most of the senior staff are still lagging behind, so for as technical knowledge in concerned. There are some tyupical extrnal factors, which determine the issue of centralization or decentralization. If popular or local support for any particular programme is required, or desird, as for xample, som local development programme or scheme, decentralization is essential to securee it. 1.5 Centralization in Positive Sense Modern administration always urges for centralization in administration. Developed and developing countries in the urge to expand globally prefer centralisation for aggession into global economy. The propagators of centralized form of administration, cite the reference of the ''President's committee on the Administrative Management'' and the same was referred to ''Report of the Hoover committee''; both of them suggested centralized administrative

116 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) structure. It is also true that to augment the centralized hegemony. Centralization and integration are also believed to be economicaly riable, because they reduce the overhead cost. State, provinces, district, county, all remain dependent in varying measures upon the central financial grant, for their caily expenses. Where the government at the apex, pays for their maintenance, then it can also claim the right to call the tune and thus centralization results. In some administration structure, only absolute centralization is usual process. In modern defence, or economic planning, centralization is normal alternative. As like national defence against any enemy state planning has also become necessary concomitant of national economic policy in all countries, require central directive and management for the sake of ensuring uniformity in effort, and to prevent local indifferences and probability of inaction. It is also believed that centralization can attack the attention of general people to the National problem and prosperity. 1.6 Negativity of Centralization In spite of some positive ends of centralization, it sometimes create bottleneck by congesting all the administrative liabilities and business, which may become the cause of delays in making and implementing decision. Apart from being far away from local and state people, the central authority cannot have adequate knowledge of actual condition and problem. It is also alleged against centralization, that , it is only to keep an absolute hegemonic control over every aspects of administration, curtail or reduce the scope of popular initiatives as well as participation in local or district level administration. This naturally hinders the full flourishment of democracy and thus to weaken it. One of the prominent demand of the Centralized administration, that it can impose economic distribution equally in the country as a whole. But one cannot claim with certainty, the same equal distribution of economic revenue is never done in decentralized administration. Because objectively good government and self government are not incompatible, and even if they were, the former must make road for the latter in the interest of democratic way of administration. 1.7 Scalar Process and Delegation The administration mainly runs with a hierarchy, where higher authority controls the lower authority. Hierarchy also denotes a graded form of administrative rule where it is normally taken as inevitable norms, that lower unit will act in subordination to

117 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) its immediate higher authority. Prof Mooney called it an universal principles of organization. Even the apparent exception to it, such as regulatory commission, local bodies and other independent establishment have it running through their internal structure, though externally they do not form the links of a scalar structure. Thus the scalar principles used as an integrating mechanism, binds the various levels and units of the organization with a continuous chain of authority. The essence of the administrative process is that, here all authority at all levels of hierarchy stems from the law. Even the head of the administration also gets its power from source of "administrative law". On the basis of same logic, the lower unit of the hierarchy, although remain under the control of its higher unit, yet the authority and official status of the subordinates also emerged from the same administrative law. Administrative law provides sufficient authority to the employees to enable them to do their assigned duties and job. It is, therefore, the responsibility of the head of the organization, to make the defined authority of subordinate available to them, but without parting it from the total authority. Here the basic process followed in administration, is delegation. Thus delegation is an administrative mechanism by which the authority of doing a job or a part of the job is conferred to the subordinate by the higher authority. So

right of supervision and control. Here we should remember that the delegated authority by de jure belongs to the higher authority, but its de facto exercise is only allowed to subordinates. It can also be compared with "division of administrative power" which enables the superior authority to transfer power and duties to his assistants without losing the ultimate power of revision, supervision and control of him. By administrative law, delegation of power involves two fundamental responsibilities, (1) job is delegated to the subordinate, is to be done by him; (2) the superior remains responsible to get the work done by the subordinate. Thus this relation indicates to a continuous administrative relationship between superior and subordinate. Further delegation of power assumes, firstly, that the superior or chief has the right to all authority, but he for the benefit of administrative smoothness, delegate a part of it under his supervision; secondly, to perform or to realize same job, of planned nature or routine nature, it assume scertain power and authority, and also determines some person who exercises that power and authority. Now, it is the option of that person, to whom the power and authority given, whether he would delegate it to his subordinates or not. However, in this connection we should remember that there is a sharp difference between, delegation and legal transfer of power. Delegation by nature is subject to supervision, but the legal transfer of authority and power completely vests in the possessor as his own administrative right and duty.
118 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) 1.8 Reasons of Delegation Mainly for two reasons are there behind delegation of power and authority : a. If head of administration remains legally obligated and bound to perform all the duties and responsibility then certainly he would be overwhelmed with the pressure of detail power and authority. Further requirement of technical know- how necessitates delegation. b. Thus delegation is essential to enhance the potentiality, at the same time to get the job done from the subordinate. Delegation of power and authority is essential, for responsibility for doing a thing implies the authority or power to do it. Complexity of the nature of job often demand delegation. 1.9 Problem of Delegation Some time excessive delegation creates the problem of increasing some unnecessary burden, layers and formalities in administration, which cause unwanted delay in doing a job as a whole. It is said delegation creates the formalities of office like note writing in the file, submission of that note to the higher authority, through file "movement", for his perusal and opinion or approval or suggestion, ultimately getting, affirmation from the superior, and in case of any difference of opinion, necessitate long or short discussion between superior and subordinate. All these processes or formalities are done to reach at a point of agreement before final application of decision. Sometimes it is seen that, the failure to trust subordinates and delegate results in the work having to be done twice, once by the subordinates and then by the superior, causing unwanted delays and taking the organisation away from its mission or goals. 1.10 Forms and Measures of Delegation 1. Delegation may be made full or partial. It indicates the extent of delegation. Full delegation means complete conferment of power (not authority) on the subordinate. As for example, in parliamentary democracy, the Parliament, during any ongoing process of diplomatic dialogue, delegate the Foreign Minister with the full power to continue it and to fetch positive result in favour of National interest. In turn, the administrative officers of Ministry are given partial power and authority to fix up the venue and agenda on the proposed discussion and dialogue. 2. Delegation may be conditional or unconditional. Conditional delegation gives more power and authority to the superior to confirm and revise the action

119 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) and responsibility of subordinate at any point of time decided by the superior, while unconditional delegation is apparently free from such change. In case of unconditional supervision only, the power to revoke or annul the delegated authority is left to the superior authority, but during the period of its currency, the subordinate cannot otherwise be interfered. 3. Delegation may be formal or informal; May be embodied in some written rule, by law, or order or Office file note'. Generally the delegation of work found in departments or in other organization. Often marked as informal, which are mainly' based on custom and mutual understanding within the department. So each members, within the department understand the common norms of delegated power and responsibility, although it is not recorded anywhere. It is almost like unwritten constitution, where no scheme of delegation is either recorded or approved by the administrative law. 4. By nature of its content, delegation may be downward, upward or outward. In case of downward delegation, the power and authority goes from superior authority to subordinate units. This type of delegation is made frequently in different governmental departments. Upward delegation occurs where the delegator delegates authority over himself to his political representatives in the Parliament. Outward delegation means, the delegation has made to some outside organization or agency for a particular nature of technical or specialized work. As for example, Kolkata Metro Rail Authority delegates the power of applying technical know - how to build up tunnel through Ganges, for the purpose of erecting the rail connecting East -West Metro Rail. They were only empowered to make the tunnel and erect the rail and then to hand over the construction (not the technology) to the Metro Rail Authority. 5. Delegation may be direct or immediate, or indirect, or mediate. In direct or immediate delegation, no third party or intermediate link between the two parties to the delegation exists, while the cases of indirect or mediate delegation, is made through some third person or intermediate. As for example, in the case of indirect election process for Indian President, the second process is applied. Basic Features of Delegation : By our previous discussion we found that, delegation of power and authority is more than simple assigning duties to others following the administrative norms, tradition and practice. The essence of delegation is to confer discretions upon others and virtually allow him to apply his judgement in the course of his work or in view of any problem faced during performance of duties and responsibilities, of course, within the frame–work of his stipulated and delegated areas.

120 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) 1.11 Features Prof Mohit Bhattacharya has excellently earmarked four basic and fundamental features of delegation which actually frame the bases of delegation of power and responsibility. I. It is a process or administrative system by which the superior authority assigned certain duties and responsibilities, following the official method, to the subordinate. In spite of this, delegations by the delegator, the delegator remain responsible for supervising the work of delegation. II. The subordinate staff or delegate does his duties and responsibility with the power and authority delegated to him by the delegator and for administrative reason delegate does not have any power to cross the limit of responsibility assigned to him by the delegator. III. The delegation is generally done to fulfil the needs of administrative body. Thus to facilitated the quick fulfilment, the administration uses the method o division of work both horizontally and in particular vertically. Especially vertical distribution is made with the help of the process of delegation from superior to subordinate, and in this process delegate remains duty bound to complete the work. IV. Once the delegation is made, that should be maintained ritually. The delegated power and authority cannot be further delegated

by the delegate to his subordinate. It must be stated here that delegation of power and authority is subject to the supervision and control by the delegator. As it has been mentioned, the delegator may enhance or reduce the responsibility and related power of the delegate, even it can be withdrawn. While the superior authority delegates his power, authority and responsibility, he being the delegator can neither transfer his final authority nor abdicates his ultimate responsibility.

In this regard administrative theorist

Terry observes, "it is something like imparting knowledge you share with others, who then possesses the knowledge you still retain the knowledge."

In fact many administrators opine that, the concept delegation is a myth of organizational structure and administrative theories. The concept delegation does not make any particular administrative personnel especially authoritative and powerful, because the superior does not share his authority or power to his subordinate. Actually the delegator delegates the authority and power of a job to the delegate, and the delegate remains responsible for that job which has been delegated to him. His authority and power remain with him so long he keeps himself involved in doing that job. So the actual power and authority belongs neither to delegator nor to the delegate, 121 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) but to the job. Hence one who does the job, must have the authority whether his superior likes it or not.

Thus responsibility of doing job and the job related authority and power can only be delegated, but the 'job' as a whole or as a structural form of administrative output can never be delegated partially. so the term "delegation of authority" is thus an obsolete expression.

The main proposition is that, the authority must be functional and functional authority carries with it responsibility. Delegation and decentralization are not synonymous word. Even it is not synonymous with devolution and deconcentration of power and authority. These words are functionally different from each other. As for detail example, meaning of the word deconcentration is based on administrative work, like the building of District Collectorate is an administrative process of deconcentration. Devolution of power and authority is absolutely a political and legal measure, generally seen when any particular authority is transferred to State from the Centre. Decentralization is also a political, legal and administrative action. For example, Panchayat Raj signifies such decentralization of power and authority from the State to the Local Self Government. 1.12 Advantages of Delegation There are some fundamental advantages of delegation of power. In the course of our discussion, we have made several references of advantages of delegation as a process of administration. To make it more clear, the advantages have been serially arranged below : A. It reduces the burden of the superior. The superior, to get out from the overwhelmed burden of routine 'file work', 'preparation of draft for official correspondences', 'maintenance of office records', etc., are delegated to the subordinate staff. It helps the superior to concentrate more on policy making activities. Thus the system of delegation of power cuts down the burden through the method of dividing work from above to below. B. Delegation of power helps to avoid delay in administrative process. Excessive burden on a single authority may become the cause of delay. So dividing it or delegating it, and making a chain of controled relation between the delegator and the delegate, the administrative authority tries to quicken its function of implementing decision of the legislature. C. Sometime delegation of implementation works are required to have proper adjustment of policy and programme, considering the local condition and situation. In fact, in many cases, policy making authority uses the delegation as a policy to involve the local people in any developmental programme, especially where the local people remain as a main stake holder to the state or central legislature.
122 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) D. This process of dividing responsibility and authority is also used to train the subordinates in the art of sharing responsibility and making decision or sharing the process of decision making. E. Sometime the administration suffers from duel leadership, or from attempt of growing up parallel second line leadership within the department. This generally happens from unwanted craziness for power and authority. To avoid such problem, department in some cases uses the process of delegation. F. By using delegation of power, administrations in many cases try to overcome the complexity and concentration of power and authority in a single handed administrative authority. Moreover in some cases it is also found that to bring the specialist into the process of administrative work for the better result in its policy implementation delegation becomes necessary. G. Delegation of power and authority increases

the sense of responsibility and interest in the employees. H. The congestion of work at the top of the administration creates positional and authority oriented conflict among the top level administrative officer. To avoid this problem, the delegation method is used. 1.13 Limitations of Delegation In spite of advantages and essentialities of delegation as an administration process, there are also some limitation, which is mainly related to the query as to the extent of desirable delegation of power and authority by the superior delegator to his subordinate delegate. It is commonly stated that superfluous power and authority or any special technique and skill based work power can be delayed for better performance of the work. It is commonly believed that no superior can render himself superfluous by delegating entire authority vested in him.

So even in case of delegation of power and authority,

he has to retain some important powers to exercise effective control over the functioning of the organization or department. Thus in reality the superior does not determine the extent of delegation. It is actually determined by the nature and load of work. Even before delegation of authority and power, the delegator is required to judge and measure the capabilities of the delegate, because unplanned delegation may create problem to the organization as well as to the departments. There are, as has been sated earlier, some powers and authority which cannot be delegated. ? In case of smooth and effective delegation of power and authority, supervisor needs to play a definite and positive role in respect to the subordinate or

123 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) delegate. First hand supervision makes the delegate to become more careful in his duties and responsibility. ? The power and responsibility, as we stated earlier, of approving financial fund or to include the expenditure in the budgetary heads, can never be delegated to other. Even in case of delegation, the delegator keeps watch on the expenditure and fund utilization of delegate as a matter of general routine supervision. ? Even in framing of policy and general plan of action, the supervisor does never delegate his power and authority or allow the delegate to interfere in the policy making process. The superior policy making body not only decides new plan and policy of work, but also decides the level of departure, if any, from the old one to incorporate new policy. This power and authority emerge from his position in the administrative hierarchy. ? In view of both making new policy and plan the superior authority enjoy the authority of making rules and laws in unification with the change that has been made. This power and authority again can never be delegated to the subordinate. ? Regarding appointment to a new post or against the existing vacancies, the detail norms and mode of appointment are decided by the superior authority. Even in case of departmental promotion or transfer of staff from one place / position to another place / position, is also decided by the superior authority. The superior authority also maintain the record of Official "C.R." of all the subordinate staffs, and this certainly have great bearing on the service, promotion, increment, etc., of the subordinate staffs in general. ? The superior authority enjoys the privileges of necessary departmental arbitration. So the superior authority is the authorized person to hear appeals, as a part of arbitration against any immediate subordinate staffs. 1.14 Hindrances There are two types of hindrances in the process of delegation of power and authority: Organizational hindrances and Personal hindrances. 1.14.1 Organizational Hindrances : ? There are some departmentor organizations where the norms, methods and procedures, of delegation are neither stated nor specified. But to make the process successful, the methods, norms, and division of work and responsibility have to be determined before implementation of the process of delegation in any organization. Otherwise routine delegation of unstable and non repetitive work will fail the main purpose of delegation. This process further magnifies
124 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) to a large extent, when the organization or the department lags from establishing easy means of internal communication. In such cases the superior authority does not get any easy and workable channel of supervision over the delegates. ? Some department by its nature and objective of work requires strong centralized function and control over its plans and action. Delicate planning in the departments requires centralized administration. Even in many cases, delegation of power appears impossible due to the location of the department within a small geographic area. Apart from that, it may also be found that due to minimum area coverage of departmental work, delegation of responsibility appears unworkable. ? If any department fails to establish coordination among its staff, or if there is any lack of well defined position in terms of responsibility and authority, then the delegation may not produce desirable result. ? The incompetency and low calibre of lower personnel are one of the major hindrances for implementing delegation. Relativly new start-ups or organisation prefer not of to go for delegation, due to unpredicability in the nature of job. 1.14.2 Personal Hindrances Apart from organizational hindrances, there are also some personal hindrances. As for example, extreme egotism of the supervising authority, sometimes refuses to adopt the process of delegation. Egotism provokes one to keep all power and authority in his own fold and to play bossism on all subordinate staff. They are even afraid that others are incapable of taking proper decision or are unable to carry out their work in a desired way. Even egoistic authority fears that by delegation of power and necessary authority, a disloyal and subversive power centres will develop among strong subordinates. There are some office superiors, who are by nature speedy and systematic in office work. Such superiors, with strong vigorous and highly motivated personality always become impatient with the slower pace and unnecessary indecisiveness of subordinates. There are some administrators are by their cultural heritage, authoritarianism and special preferences for patriarchal type of ledership. Their cultural belief and attitude establish authoritarian leadership, which may a big hindrance to apply delegation process successfully. So without changing their belief and attitudinal pattern and culture, they will never accept delegation process as a method of functioning of the department. The act of delegation requires a cultural belief pattern which apparently is not commonly found among all administrations.

125 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) 1.15 Principles of Delegation At the end of our discussion, we will specify some basic principles of delegation, which are also the preconditions for its ultimate success. These are : I. Delegation should be specified with written and recorded documents. Norms are to be determined by tradition and precedents of the organization and department. II. Delegation of power and authority is made not to any individual but to a position created and established the organization and department and in the course of delegation, the competence and eligibility of the incumbent are to be judged carefully, otherwise the purpose of delegation will remain unresolved. It is further to be noted, the delegator should delegate power and authority among his subordinate staff, the distribution of responsibility should be coterminous and coequal, otherwise power will make number of layers among the staff delegated a at the lower level of administration. Thus to make the delegation coterminous and coequal, there should be a definite plan of distributing the power and authority among the subordinates. Actually, one of the basic aims, of delegation is to make a definite and well defined chain of command to enable the process of continuous supervision at all point of delegated power. III. To enable supervision on the delegated power and authority, the policies of delegation along with regulation and procedure should be well defined, and communication system among superior and subordinate level should be kept free and open and systematic reporting system should also be adopted. Only easy communication and systematic reporting can make the process of Unity of Command possible and effective. IV. Further, there are two other preconditions to make the delegation process effective and result oriented. One the delegation should be followed by a performance appraisal system; and Second, delegation should be backed by adequate resources. 1.16 Conclusion Delegation is the process by which works on assignments are divided in a way to enable the designated staff to perform only that part of work which has been assigned to him because of his unique organised placement and expertise for which he will be able to fulfill organisation's targt effectively. Delegation is an administrative mechanism to get things done by the subordinat by giving them bounded responsibility. Some 126 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) principles of delegation, if followed religiously, make the purpose of delegation truthful; they are as follows : ? Both the delegator and the delegated staff must know that it is a 'Forward Step'. ? Both must be aware of the expected outcome ? Delegator must be aware of the skills and abilities of the subordinates to make delegation effective. ? A clear idea about performance standards would make delegation effective. ? Process of delegation must be equitable to make unity of direction and unity of command to run successfully. ? Delegated staff must be given sufficient authority. ? Rules of conduct must be clea and codifid. ? Both ways assistance and accountability must be ensured. In the era of globalisation and technological revolution, the systematic and consistent reservation of authority at the apex to make major policy decision, especially regading economy and intervational relations has become obvious. But at the same time developing countries like India are trying to push down the decisions of local development to the peripherial authorities to releare the excessive barden of work from the centre. There is a unique complication which has occurred in these countries, as central authorities need to cater to the macro and micro requirments of the society and to balance between the aggression of market economy and the need to provide utility services to the socially I economically down trodden people an marginalised community. Therefore, in some areas like health, education, basic subsistence etc. instead of decentralisation, i.e., creating antonomous and self-sufficient units or divisions, delegation, i.e., some rights and duties are transferred for cost effective performance. Further, technical innovation and digitisation have rached to height that data integration has become inevitable. Often control and chain of actions become absolutely unavoidable to deliver public services. In such cases delegation is preferred to decentralisation so as to merge the needs of globalisation with localisation. These three mechanism are not to be viewed in absolute or infallible terms. they are to be examined in terms of requirements of dispersal of responsibility, authority and accountability as and when required in any organisation. In fact, accountability cannot be delegated, neither decentralisation can relieve the top authority from accountability. Responsibility and authority may be transferred downward, but accountability always move upward. In modern complex administration delegation seenes to be the extension of centralisation and decentralisation. Fayol conceived it as a measure of degree, as to him everything that increases the inportance of the roles

127 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) of the subordinates is decentralisation and that goes to reduce it is centralisation. Effective coordination is required in each case. 1.17 Summary ? In this unit an attempt has been made to explain the concepts of centralization and decentralization and the differences between them. ? This section also examines the principles of delegation and its inherent logic. ? In this section it has been examined as to whether decentralisation or delegation of authority can ensure effctive managemnt, development of the employees and consequently that of the organisation, whether there principles can heighten the motivation of employees and can lead the way for better coordination. 1.18 Glossary ? Centralization : Means concentration of power and authority at the top level of the administrative system. ? Decentralization : Means dispersal of power and authority among the lower level of the administrative system. ? Delegation : The act of empowering to act for another. 1.19 Model Questions ? What is Centralization? How the concept has been elaborated by different analysis? ? Write a detail note on Centralization and Dcentralization. Make a comparative evaluation of centralisation and decentralisation. ? Discuss the advantages and limitations of delegation. ? How is the scalar process related with delagation? ? What are the forms of delegation? How can they be measured? ? Discuss the basic features of delegation. ? Write a note on the reasons of delegation. ? What are the hindrances of delegation? ? Write a note on the basic principles of delegation.

To introduce the concept 'supervision' and its various aspects ? To identify the ingredients and the duties of supervisor 2.2 Introduction The word "Supervision" is a component of two words or terms, related with administration. These are "Super" and "Vision", which originally mean, overseeing the matter by the superior authority. Thus supervision denotes an administrative relation between subordinate and superior. Supervision is a specific role of superior management which is meant to provide direction and guidance to the subordinates to ensure quality of goods and services to be produced and thus to control and coordinate the work for effective functioning.

130 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Supervision involves the process of monitoring the quality of job and to direct the organisation to work on the feedback for better performance. Effective supervision depends on the level of efficacy of communication, confidence, motivation, Sharing of responsibility and so on. A good superviser must be good listener, must be able to motivate others, must create an environment of mutual responsibility and must have confidence in taking timely dicisions. Consistency, active participation, positive thinking, respectfulness for others and diligence one the basic attribute of a good superviser. This act of directing or guiding a person or a group of persons or subordinates works well in clinical management, line management and in academics. Supervision, not only establishes relation between superior and subordinate through direct or indirect control from above to below, but also it has a distinct directive role over the subordinates. Thus it is an inherent part in hierarchical structure of the organization, which directly brings almost all the staff under it. However, at all levels it is subject to the supervision of his / her immediate superior. From one particular point of administrative structure, supervision runs up the hierarchy to its highest levels– as for example bureau chief, supervise the supervision section as its head, which controls the rank and file of the department. So, all persons in authority who control the work of others are supervisors, irrespective of their position in the official hierarchy of the organization. 2.3 Conceptual Framework Luther Gulick explained the concept of supevision in terms of POSDCORB– Planing, which nees forsight organisation, with an ability to assign task. Staffing, with an eye toselect right person pur the right job Directing, with controlling ability coordinating, with an ability coordinating, with an ability to elicit cooperation Reparting, with commnication and Network skills, Budgeting, with an ability to sketch cost benefit analysis. A good supervisor is responsible for accomplishing the ansigned job. Luther Gulick identifies the problem of supervision, in different ways. He identified four essential competing principles of organization. These are:- (1) the purpose, the organization at the outset serves its essential purpose in executing the decision; (2) the process, the organization employed its designed and planned process to execute its major plan of action in view of its responsibility, to execute the decision of the authority, through its own chain and plan of decision making frame work; (3) the persons or members of the administrative units, who are actually dealing with the matter; and (4) the area on which the effect of the decision acted. All these four areas of principles are fully managed and monitored through supervision of the supervisor

131 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) on their subordinates. Thus any principles of functional allocation and decisions for implementation, require, political management and administrative supervision. The leader of the organization or the person, who leads the organization, does not keep himself within the boundaries of the department. The Chief Supervisor, who leads the process and planning of the organization, is not only designated as President or Chief Manager of the organization, rather he acts as a mentor, advisor and path maker of the department. It is also seen that they leader does not keep himself confined within the periphery of advising the members of the organization, rather he leads the process from the front of his staff and line units. He keeps not only the strong vigilance to the activities of the department or organization but also he acts as principal path finder in performing the assigned duties of the organization. He equally determines the internal aim and purpose of the organization. Because only perfect determination with established aim and purpose, can help the organization to get its work and responsibility done. This is one of the main reasons, why a leader or Chief architect of an organization is designated as Chief Executive. The major function of the Chief Executive or Supervisor in an organization primarily starts with the allocation of work among the departmental staff, considering the skill and ability of the concerned staff. It is actually the function of leader who supervises the work, to assess and understand the capabilities of each individual staff. The entire system of administration can be viewed as a continuum divided up in two interlocking ways, managerial coordination and control. All the functions must be allocated among organizations and its staff, and then the rationale of every organization has to be supervised perfectly to maintain balance between projected responsibility and its actual performance. 2.4 Three types of Supervision 1. Horizontal supervision of department and agencies at each level of staff, follows the response to functional specialization. In fact different departments are formed with a mixture of functional and managerial reasons, to obtain considerable internal functional specialization. 2. Vertical arrangement of specialized functions from lower to higher level of the organization or departments are made to shift many functions from smaller to the larger units of organization or departments. 3. Sometimes instead of centralized supervision on the subordinates, leaders of the organization create a semi detached ambit to carry out particular tasks. This type of reorganization within the department is generally made for a mixture of political and managerial reasons. Generally when such types of 132 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) ambits are made under the supervision of a particular skilled supervisor, the usual reason which plays the prominent role, are the inadequacy of local resources to support some major development or for some innovative infra - structural work, as for example, in case of digging tunnel through the river Ganges, for the purpose of building up East - West Metro Rail, the total supervisions were left to the foreign expert. Even same type of detached or semi - detached supervision are seen in remote regional hospitals too, where civic facilities are not available easily, or any such other local bodies. Thus in simple way, the supervision can be defined as a different types of direction and leadership, accompanied by authority, to monitor the work of others. It means guiding and directing efforts of subordinate employees and other available resources, to accomplish stated designed and planned output. In the larger sense, supervision is a process by which workers are officially guided by the called supervisor by designation. The primary task of the supervisors is to learn and train the subordinates according to their needs. The prime intention of the supervisor is to help and assist the skilled subordinates

to make the best use of their knowledge and skill, to improve their own skilled ability, so that they do their jobs more effectively and with increasing satisfaction to themselves and the agencies. 2.5 Functions of Supervisor The functions of a supervisor can be discussed in terms of following aspects. I. The primary and most essential aspect is the technical efficiency and know- how, to lead and substantiate own role among the suborinates. The efficient leadership of the supervisors help the workers to do their work perfectly. When the workers remain confident, that their supervisor knows the technique and know - how of the work, their speed and perfection of work reach to the highest level of their ability. II. A supervision must have clear knowledge about the vision, mission, objectives and goal of the organisation on department which will help him to exert his leadership with utmost efficiency. Organisation's plan, policy, proceduce etc. must be in the grip of the supervison, so that the subordinate staff may find themselves comfortable to work under his guidance. III. To get efficient and spontaneous work from the worker to achieve designed goal of plan, the supervisor is required to maintain personal and human relation with his subordinate. Only the personal and human relation can help the supervisor to get desired result in view of the desired goal of the organization

133 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) or department. This personal and human relation of the supervisor with his subordinates, enable the supervisor or leader to handle the workers cum subordinates, and to bring out their best ability of work to fulfill the mission of the organization or department. It is the relationships, which actually motivate the working group to perform its tasks within the framework of policies and procedures. IV. One of the primary functions of the supervisor is to establish coordination among the component parts of the organization or department. This is mainly because, no work can be done by single handedly, and only well knit coordination can bring out successful implementation of planning. V. One of the main duty or responsibility of the supervisor or leader of an organization or department is to ensure that each unit of an agency or department accomplishes the task, that each has been assigned. When all parts or team will do their work, then only the total work will be successful. 2.6 Functional Aspects of Supervision Prof. G.D.Halsey very distinctly defined and identified the ingredients of supervisor along with their duties to perform those ingredients into job or objective reality. 2.6.1 Ingredients of Supervisor are : A. Leader or supervisor should primarily select the right person for the right job considering the skill and efficiency according the nature and requirements of the job. B. After selection of men, objectively examining their skill and intensity for work, they must be given special technical and mental training to boost up their interest for the work as well as to make them fit and acquainted with the process and technique of work. C. Only training is not sufficient for raising the motivation of the workers. requires examining and rating the performance level, to use the best capacity of the workers, for the benefit of attaining the goal of the organization or department. This helps the supervisor to utilize the best skill more effectively. D. The supervisor's vigilance on his subordinate working forces is essential for perfect continuation and ultimately completion of work. Thus he should always be ready to administer the work and to extend necessary technical correction and / or other kinds of help, where necessary and if necessary transferring the concerned employee to a more suitable position in a more comfortable place

134 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) of work, because prime intention of the Chief Supervisor or leader of a job, is to get best result from his co - employees. But if it is found that the lapses are caused due to the inefficiencies of the worker himself, naturally chief supervisor cum leader or main executor of the job should have the authority to take disciplining action. E. The supervisor cum leader is always expected to approciate the quality performers, which act as incentive. Such acceptance and appreciation by the higher authority made the subordinates tolerant to the commands of the higher authority. F. One of the basic functional aspects of the supervisor is to select the appropriate person for appropriate work. In fact this most essential for the completion of planned work. Not only the quality and skill of the selected employee is important, but the required quantity of man power and other resources are also important for the benefit of the work. 2.6.2 Duties : Administrative theorist Nissen identified at least eleven duties of a supervisor cum Leader of the organization, in view of the ingredients of the post or position of supervisor. 1. Initially it is the primary expectation on the part of the post of the Supervisor, that he should have a clear understanding of the duties and responsibility of his own position. Without this knowledge and awareness, he will note be able to apply himself to his subordinate. 2. Before taking the responsibility of leading a team or staff, to fulfill the porpose of work and mission of the project, the supervisor should make a definite planning for execution of entrusted work. 3. A good and intelligent supervisor must be able to read the intention, motivation and effciency of the workers, so that right person can be selected for the right job, considering their personal capabilities and skill. After distribution of work and allied responsibility, the supervisor instructs and direction them, how the work could be done. 4. At the time of assigning the work and responsibility schedule, the supervisor is also expected to exercise his own innovative skill, to improvise the working procedure and methods. This makes the work enjoyable to the workers. 5. In fact for innovative improvisation, the supervisor is also required to improve his own knowledge, before preaching it to the workers or subordinates.

135 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) 6. At any point of time during the continuous processing of the work, the supervisor should take care as well as necessary initiative for updating the skill and technical knowledge of his subordinates to enable them to cope up with the fast changing technique. So the supervisor should arrange necessary skill training programme even during the ongoing process of the work. 7. The result of the training should be viewed and judged very carefully, to evaluate the skill and technical performance of the workers. This will indirectly force each one to take care of his performance. 8. Observation and continuous assessment of training and its projection on the performance will help supervisor to make necessary correction of mistake and solving problems of the employees 'and developing discipline among them. 9. It is one of the prime duties of the supervisor to the subordinates in his team to remain informed about policies and procedures of the organization. 10. Supervisor, actually acts like a bridge between top policy maker and with those who are directly involved with process of implementing it. Supervisor brings the plan of work along with the technique of objectification to the employees for their cooperation and active involvement with the plan of work. Even, the supervisor should always be ready to open his mind and attention for any advice and special assistance from the workers. 11. Apart from giving due importance to the suggestion and advice of the employees, who are actually doing the work with hand, the supervisor is also expected to remain open to accept their complaints and should try to resolve those as soon as possible. 2.7 Types and Procedure of Supervision There are three types of supervision, which follow different procedure also. ? Single and Plural : There are some organizations which are supervised by only one supervisor. This type of supervision is known as single supervision. On the other hand, when a member of an organization is supervised by various supervisors at various levels of activities, it is then called plural or multiple supervision. The first one is controlled through the system of "Unity of Command", and the second one is based on the principles of "Functional Foremanship". ? Line and Function : The line supervision means the control exercised by the people in the line command. Line supervisons supervise the employees' inmediate work on the line, check their schedule and monitar performance to 136 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) assure quality. Line superisors are expected to have good communication skills, ability to motivate, strong I & and EQ, technical know-how, strategic planning ability, coordination ability, critical thinking ability, conflict meanagement skill, good sense of time manangement, sense of priority, sense of diversified knowledge, problem solving ability, presence of mind, mentoring skill, bearing and listening skill etc. Planning, ensuring standardisation, screening performance are among the major responsibilities of line supervisor. One of the examples of this type of supervision may be seen in different academic departments of educational institution, where internal departmental works and plan of teaching is maintained by the departmental heads. It is direct and commanding in nature and involves authoritative direction. The functional supervision, on the other hand, means the control exercised by the subject- matter specialists, like Foreman, Engineer, Auditor, so on. ? Substantive and Technical : Supervision may also be classified into substantive or technical.

The former deals with the actual work done by an agency, while the latter is concerned with the methods by which the work is done. 2.8

Techniques of Supervision There are also some techniques of supervision, which are seen to be followed by the supervisor of different organizations. These techniques are mainly related with the process of approval, preparation of budget, reporting to the higher authority, etc. The details of those techniques are discussed below. A. Prior approval of individual project : To start a project, the proposal of subordinate authority is submitted to the top level management or decision making units. Unless it is not approved by the top-level authority, the project would not be started. So the top management is required to approve the details of the proposed project, before actual initiation of the work. Without any primary approval from the higher authority, the subordinate proposer cannot proceed with his proposal. The subordinate proposer prepares the project after thorough field survey and the proposal should include details of the need and viability of the proposal. This is submitted to the superior authority. Any further step on the proposal or any initiative to include the new proposal as a part of the policy is taken after the final approval of the project proposal. In India, the development projects are not only requiring previous permission of departmental heads, but also that of finance department for approval of necessary fund for the project. This system of prior approval, policy has been 137 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) adopted to enable the Superior authority, to know details about the information regarding the intentions of the operating units and to inciude the approved project as part of the future projection of plan and development. Apart from that, it also helps the superior authority to exercise detail control over the operation of the project. B. Promulgation of service standard : Before initiation of any project, the superior authority, at the time of giving its final approval and budgetary support from finance department, the superior I technical authority, also promulgate its suggestive direction on the way of functioning and some fundamental technical suggestion. The superior authority may also prescribe certain standard as well as target of progress and finally the time or year of accomplishment of the work. It is believed specially in democratic set up, that such service standards are necessary in order to ensure that work is done promptly and properly

by the operating agencies. C. Budgetary imitations upon the operation : The budgetary allocations, or at the primary stage of the project, the budgetary provision is most important to sustain the project either for initiation (in case if allotment is made) or for future projection (in case, the provision for further funding is made by the budget). But in both cases, the finance departments tentatively fix up specialized time period for the operating unit. Any sort of extension of the specialized period, the operating unit is required to take prior approval not only from its superior policy making authority, but also from the finance department, where the allotment is made for one calendar year only. Due to this financial control through fund allotment process, the operating authority does not enjoy the right to spend money by his discretionary authority. Further, there is a clear administrative link between the superior policy making authority and finance department, the budgetary provision is made on the basis of high level consultation between political administration and permanent administration. Actually the link between policy making and financial allotment process has been made as a method of sharing responsibility to encourage the developmental activities through local based project, keeping central control over the magnitude of operation unit. D. Approval of subordinate personnel : The control is not only imposed on the approval of project proposal an allotment of fund by the finance department, the superior authority can also apply its control over the subordinate authority by giving instruction on the method of appointing or selecting subordinate staff, specially related with project. Especially for some key posts the higher authority not only interfere the selection process, other terms and conditions, 138 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) like qualification, length of experience in similar types of job, age, specialized technical knowledge etc., are also determined by the superior authority. The higher authority places its position in such a way, that it can supervise the recruitment process at the operating level and to enforce its own standard of competence among the operating agencies. E. Reporting on progress of work : The operating system, by the terms and conditions laid down during the sanctioning of the project, is required to submit periodic or special report about their activities. The report is submitted to the superior authority, which on the basis of that supervise and scrutinize the activities of the line agencies. The superior authority evaluate the performance of the operating line agencies on the absis of the information provided through this report and exercise their operation. There are also other ways or methods of inspection. Actually supervision through inspection of work of subordinate by the superior is an age old administrative practice. Traditionally, it is considered as an integral part of the administrative control. Mainly inspection of the projected work is done to acquire information on the progress of work, and to guide the line unit staff to follow the plan and estimate, because the audit work on project expenditure continues even during the work. The supervision through field inspection is also done to know, how much the existing rules and regulations and procedure are observed. In many occasions inspection is done for long period, where the main intention of the supervisor is to build personal relationship of mutual acquaintances and confidence. It is believed that this type of personal relation improves the efficiency of the operating units. Thus, traditionally it is seen that the supervision through inspection facilitates the management, to have direct and first-hand knowledge of the work and progress of project, and the role of subordinates involved with the work. However, it is usually used for the purpose of fact-finding, rather fault finding. It should clearly be remembered that investigation and inspection are not the same. Both have not only different motive, but the methods are also different. Prof. Millet says, ‘‘The purpose of investigation is to inquire into some alleged or suspected incidents of an abuse of management. It is concerned with the personal wrong-doing, often of criminal nature.’’ Millet further adds, ‘‘Inspection is only a part of the process of supervision.’’ Thus, by nature former is negative character having post factor review in nature, whill the latter is positive one, mainly concerned with a particular stage of action taken during the on-going process. Prof. Rensis Linkert made an empirical study on the style and level of supervision. In his observation, he found that general type of supervision by the supervisor himself on his own fetch better productive level than any audit level or policy maker’s

139 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) supervision. But if the supervisor supervises his working force, the output of the work lowered down. He also found that the employee-oriented supervisor, who has a genuine concern for the employees and with whom the employees can connect their interest more easily; The primary concern of the supervisor is to make external pressure on the employees to increase out-put with a predetermined prescribed standard. Human resource management is a major skill of a supervisor. 2.9 Conclusion From the above discussion it becomes clear that supervision involves dirction, guidance and control of the working subordinates to execute the plan of work within stipulated time. Supervisor assures quality of production in an organisation. Clinical, Line managemnt, academic management etc. give stress on the role of the supervisors. Supervisors are expected to act as mentors and motivators, must be able to create an environment of shared responsibility, must be able to maintain rgularity give leadership, solve problems and be proficient with the skill of human resource management. Supervisor's technical knowldge, administrative experience, confidence, ethical value etc. determine the level of success of an organisation. A good supervisor must acquire the skill of critical thinking, creativity, must be able to exhibit empathy, support, concrn etc. Inability of micromanagement and lack of leadership quality can create challenge for the organisation. The role of the supervisor is to be understood in terms of the reciprocal relationship with the workers and the organisation. Supervision can be seen as having three aspects : administration (normative), education (formative) and support (restorative). In this unit an attempt has been made to explain the principles, types, functions and procedures of supervision Also the role of supervisor has been discussed. 2.10 Summary ? In this unit we have identified the ingredients and the duties of supervisor. ? We have focused on the various types, functions, procedure, techniques of supervision. ? The unit presents a theoretical perspective of supervision and its various functional aspects.

A two-way process, communication comprises the following elements: sender, message, channel, receiver, feedback and context.

142 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) 3.3 Nature and Significance of Communications There are some conceptual and functional differences between Communication and Information. Information is a thing or news which is transmitted through the process or channel of communication. Communication channel is a bridge between sender and receiver. Theoretically the sender primarily determines the matter and then he places it in the channel of communication, to send the information to his predefined person. He makes this communication by using verbal words, letters, symbols or some other means to send information. The method or use of code, letter etc., is made to arrange information before communicating it, depends on the convertibility of the object or person at the other end, who will be the final receiver of the information. Thus, communication implies at least three essential characteristics. First to interact with others, we need to use words, letter or symbols; secondly, communication by its name indicates, that it establishes relationship between more than one person or at least two persons are involved in communication; thirdly, the interaction between two or more persons are initially required to be motivated by sharing of information towards common end. For an organization, communication is not only the concept, sometimes it is considered as principle of organization, which the organization or department uses to realise its most essential objective. So some administrative theorists describe communication as the blood stream of an organization or, it may also be called the heart of organization. Once Charles Bernard, during the course of his discussion on administration and its relationship with communication, opined that, the first exective function of the administration is to develop and maintain a system of communication. In his opinion, it is the foundation of cooperative group activity. It is believed that good inter and intra departmental communication is the fundamental foundation for smooth and sound administration. This is because the success of framed plan and way of action largely depends on the ideal coordination among inter and intra departmental staff, and the foundation of coordination can only be achieved by the easy and well- knit communication among the staff. So communication is used as a cement to make the rational bridge within and between departments. Terry, so observed, communication serves as a lubricant, fostering the smooth operation of the management process. By theory of "Entropy", every organization and department have some natural tendencies towards disorders and disintegration. The natural tendency can only fight back by using the method of information processing and channelled those processed information to the highest policy making body through communication channel. The reverse process is also used by the policy making organ through percolation to the down ward of the department again by using the same communication channel. So,

143 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) the organization continuously collects and processes the information to transmit those to the appropriate authority to arrest the tendencies of disintegration. Traditionally it is believed that man can try to control and modify his environment only when the proper and processed information reach to him before the actual occurrence of incident. If the proper and processed information reaches to him through uninterrupted communication channel, then only he can fight back against the probable disintegration. So, the primary attempt of man, since the primitive age is to establish communication channel and proper monitoring system of the channel. Initially the man of primitive age used hand, pictures, drum signals to make communication. Gradually, with the more and more modernization, the techniques of sending signals and the way of building communication have changed very first. The theorists of modern age are now continuously trying to build up new and modern models of communications. The basics of those models generally comprises with the following vital ingredients : 1. Source : Generally, the sources of information which leads to form communication are the staff of different level and layers in the department. Their daily work performance and official and personal interaction, generate sources of information, which in turn used as matter of information. 2. Encoding : Collected information is formed with a coding method, and then transmitted to other place. The encoding form may be Language, or any other Number. Encoding through number is called numerical code. Ultimately encoded information are sent through message, mail, or through phone, video, WhatsApp, Twits etc. 3. Product : Information converted in message (in any form), becomes a product of relation or interaction and then transmitted as physical product through communication channel. 4. Channel : Channel is the actual carrier of message sent from the sources of information and encode the information to the final end of the receiver. The message can be sent as letter, mail, telephonic conversation, etc., in various ways. 5. Receiver : The receiver, after receiving the message initially decodes the message. The receiver decodes message in the light of his own understanding and necessity. On the basis of that he uses the message to serve his purpose. He fixes his purpose in view of his previous experiences and frame of references. 6. Feedback : Feedback loops are generated from the receiver end. The reactions of the receiver of the messageare sent back to the surce, through advice for further information or as decision against the received information.

144 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Sometimes it is also seen, that the source of information burdened with lot of unnecessary information, which he never uses at his attempt of encoding the message. Such unnecessary information is called "Noise of Information". Excessive "Noise" factors in information, distort the quality of the information signal and reduce the fidelity of information and sources of information. However, in the administrative process information and accumulation of information strain out the noise part, and play an important role. Functioning of the administrative structure almost wholly depends on the information received by the plan-makers through communication channel. Actually, everywhere individual reads any situation from his own emotion, needs, culture, value and interest. These create perception of an individual which is generally different from others' perception and reading of situation. So, the perceptual positions actually create important differences in the way, two people view an incident and create information within one own self. The communication is also made on the basis of information gathered. Communication is made between two persons of unequal perception. So, when information passes through communication channel, the meaning of the information also may take different vibration to the receiver. So, it is said, how one perceives the 'others' in the interaction process, vitally affects how one will interpret the communication (See, Sheldon Zalkind and Timothy W. Costello: "Perception: Some Recent Research and Implications for Administration", Administrative Science, Quarterly, Vol.7 No 2, September 1962, pp. 218-35) 3.4 Definition of Communication Latin word 'communise' mean 'Common' in English. The word communication has been derived from the word 'commons' meaning that when the general common perception-oriented information are transmitted to other, we will call that transmission of information, communication. So, the communication is the process of passing information and understanding to another. So, it is an exchange of facts, ideas, opinion and emotions between two or more persons. The exchange should be meaningful one; otherwise there will be no effective and meaningful communication. This is because communication gets shape through letter, symbols, message or mail. So, if that fails to become meaningful to the receiver, then it would be deleted as spam or noise. So, the primary intention of the sender of information is to make his information meaningful to the receiver and that also be useful to him. So broadly speaking, the communication is a meaningful interaction, through which the receiver will be able to perceive and understand the sense of communication as well as the intention of the sender. So, communication is shared understanding for a shared purpose. its underlying aim is to

Peter F. Drucker, in his book The Practice of Management :

Heinemann, 1955, stated that, "Communication is the ability of the various functional groups within an enterprise to understand each other and each other's functions and concerns." So, the essence of communication is understanding information, not the only transmission of information. This is because, transmitting a noise information is not actually any communication to the receiver. 3.5 Types of Communication Generally, we see there are three types of communication. The communication can be made internally among the staff of a same department. We call it internal communication. When the communication is made externally between two separate departments of a same organization or with same type of organization, we call it external communication. Communication can also be made between two employees of same department. In such cases, we call it interpersonal communication. Generally, the upward communications is seen, when the subordinate staff communicates his problem or necessity with the superior authority. Sometimes higher management of any department seeks information from the supervisor, regarding detail of working skill, ability and behaviour of any subordinate staff; the supervisor uses the upward channel to send the report, as a matter of his routine or entrusted work. The supervisor in his statement can also state his own perception and evaluation. The superior authorities in view of the report/ statement, submitted by the supervisor, take action and give his instruction to his subordinate especially to the supervisor. As there are upward or downward communication as two basic ingredients of internal communication, there may also be a third dimension of communication, called across communication. Across communication is horizontal in nature. Across communication makes link or relationship between the staff of same stature and position. So along with vertical communication between superior and subordinate, there is also horizontal communication between two or more staff of same position. 3.6 Media of Communication Generally three types of media are used for communication. Although the effect of media does not theoretically determine the information transmitted for

146 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriculum (Dt. 17.10.2022) communication, but in reality definitely the media has a great role and impact on the subject matter of information among the news-seekers or population. Each media has separate audience and sepurate population. Generally, we use three types of media: a) Audio; b) Visual; and c) Audio-Visual. The example of audio media is Radio, Conference, Interviews etc. Similarly prominent Visual media are, a) Circular; b) Reports; c) Picture form; d) Hoarding; e) Newspapers; etc. Audio-Visual media is Television, Sound Motion Pictures. Apart from those, some other Audio Visual media for quick and person to person or between friends and viewer, have been added through popular use of I Phone or Mobile. There, the users frequently use Face book, Twitter or WhatsApp. The general users of Mobile can quickly create information and transmit through this domain of these applications. Even members of Political Parties or Party Leadership are also seen to use these media for communicating ideas and information and get very quick responses. Apart from this one to one, or one to group/friends or viewers, the administration till now largely prefers to use the formal method of communicating their major plan and policy or way of functioning. This formal method of communication is conference. It is still believed that conference method of communication avoids delay, reduces red tapism and minimises the effort of one to one or departmental communication. It is also believed that conference method of communication has some positive advantages, which are as follows:- 1. Conference has the capacity to generate quick response among the participants. The authority can also pose problems and their suggestions more easily, clearly and directly to the participants. These also increase the awareness among the participants of the conference. 2. The conferences are generally participated by the superior authority, departmental or organizational subordinates. Subordinates taking the facilities of the presence of superior and policy making authority can more easily get way to resolve their working problems from them. So the conference is an important media which helps the participants to solve the problems related with their function. 3. Generally, the superior authority or policy makers place the future plan, policy along with their review of existing working pattern through their speeches or addresses to the audience. They also get the opportunity of placing their suggestion and advice. Similarly, the subordinate staff also gets free opportunity to meet the superior authority and they also get chances to place their observation on departmental or organizational plan, programme and policy. These direct conversations actually help the department or organization to proceed with their policy. Recently, Information Technology Department of organization very frequently use this method of meeting either with the staff of any particular 147 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) project, or with client of the project and related developer and other managerial staff. The participants are selected on the basis of the need of the project. 4. This type of face to face interaction among the total member staff of the organization promotes a sense of unity among official working group within a same structure to materialize one plan, one policy and one programme. This "sense of unity" among member staff as a whole is essential, not only for smooth functioning, but also to establish the strength of the department. These are the reasons, why department wants to meet each other in a conference or meeting (may be off line or on-line) in a particular place or time on a predetermined issue. 5. It is very often seen that the host departments of the conference (of any form:- off line or on line) want to make their endeavour, inter departmental, instead of intra departmental. Inter departmental conference encourages an exchange of information among administrative personnel, as well as between subordinate staff of different department. 3.7 Different Theoretical Clarification of the Concept: Communication Henry Fayol, one of the well-known and respected administrative theorists, gave much importance on speedy communication in an organization. In his opinion, communication can only find out a meaningful solution to any problem through conversation. He opined that basic problem of any organization is to decide upon the plan, policy and programming process to materialize the desire or mission of the organization or department. For that reason, he preferred horizontal communication as an important process than vertical communication, because in latter case, communication channels are mainly used to percolate the decision from superior authority. In fact, organizations or departments are by nature built up through cooperative system, where there are three fundamental elements, viz., 1) Common purpose; 2) willingness to contribution to fulfil the common purpose; 3) finally communication of the purpose to all the member staff and open opportunity to everyone, so that, each member can optimise his scope of contribution to the common purpose. So, in this network of cooperation, communication plays the vital and dynamic role to shape up the behavioural pattern of the organization. In absence of proper technique of communication, the organization or department can never take any purposive plan and programme. Herbert Simon opined that the authority transmits its decisional premises from one to another through communication. Herbert Simon also gave stress on the informal

148 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) channel of communication. The informal channel is built up through social relationship of the members of the organization. So, he advised the administrator to listen to the communication of general members of the organization, to blot out those factors which may cause disruption in planning and programming. Norbert Weiner used the word ‘Cybernetics’ as an important ingredient of communication channel. He said that every organization has a tendency to move towards the direction of positive "entropy". This is because the natural tendencies of organizations are to move towards disintegration and self- destruction. These tendencies can only be arrested through methodical information process. This information is antidote to positive entropy and enables the organizational system to reach a state of negative entropy, which is moving towards order and integration. 3.8 Channels of Network Basically, there are two types of network channels of communication : informal and formal. Formal Channels of communication are established by management of the department or organization. This channel is used exclusively for official purpose. An informal channel of communication, on the other hand is an unofficial channel and is the result of the operation of social forces at the work place There are six types of Formal Communication Network. The probable pictorial formulations of all those types have been shown in other pages. Those types are identified with a definite name to make the idea clear to the readers, viz., 1) Chain Type; 2) Star Type; 3) Circle Type; 4) All Channels Type; 5) Inverted "V" Type; 6) "Y" Pattern Type. Chain Type Star Type Circle Type All Channel Type Inverted V Y Pattern

149 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) 3.8.1 Types of Formal Communication Network I. Chain Type : Here the flow of information remains limited within upward and downward movement in the hierarchy of the organization. Main command comes from the superior authority, and superior authorities equally receive feedback communication from subordinate. There is easy one to one communication both from above to below and below to above in Chain Type of communication. II. Star Type : In this communication pattern, the information and message flow among group-members, not individual, through leaders of the group. Leader of the group stays in the central points of organization. He initiates communication with other groups and groups give their feedback to the central point, not with other groups. III. Circle Type : In this type, group members only interact and communicate with adjoining group. The information and message, in this type, is transmitted laterally among group members. IV. All Channels Type : This is an example of democratic type of communication system. Here all the members of the group freely and actively communicate with each other. These types are generally in decentralized organization. It is also known as "completely connected network". V. Inverted "V" : Here subordinate communicates with his immediate superior as well as with the superior of his superior. But the immediate superior chooses and picks up communication information, received from his subordinate, and then transmits only the selected information to his superior. So, the middle range superior in the hierarchy plays important role this communication system. VI. "Y" Pattern : In this system of communication, two subordinates separately use the hierarchical chain of communication with their superior. In turn the superior who is above of him transmits the same as matter of routine work. The network by its character is less centralized than "Star Type" of communication system Like formal network system, there is also Informal networking system, which is named as "Grapevine Relation" by some administrative theorists like Keith Davis etc. The reason of naming the Informal networking as grapevine is simple that the informal relation or network connection among social individuals grow like a grapevine, which can never either be abolished or rubbed out or hidden under the "social carpet". Even the informal relation among social members can neither be chopped down by the political or social authority nor be tied up with any hegemonic supremacy. It is like pumpkin creeper, which can never be kept in a particular place, if it is tied up,

150 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) it pop in another place. So, if any authority tries to put control in one place, it immediately moves to another place. It's like the 'channel searching' in Television. Four types of Informal networks are seen, viz., 1) Single Strand; 2) Gossip; 3) Probability; 4) Cluster. 3.8.2 Types of Informal Communication Network 1. Single Strand : In this type of information network, information passes one to one, that one man generates information which he transmits to the person; in this way the information spread. 2. Gossip : Under gossip type, the person parses sandomly to other. 3. Probability : Under this probability type network, the information passes according to law of probability, that is one person or social member communicates randomly with other, who in turn communicate to some other. 4) Cluster Network : In cluster network member passes any information to his selective person or group with a note to keep it limited within selective group or person. So, trust plays an important role during passing information in clustered informal network system. 3.9 Problems of Communication There are five basic problems in communication system. Some authors call these problems barriers, because they create with their own characteristics some distortion in information. These are as follows:- Single Strand Gossip Probability Cluster 151 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) a) Semantic Barriers : The language is one of the main causes of semantic barriers. These occur, due to the differences of individual's language and his own way of interpreting the words and symbols used in the process of either forming or decoding the communication. It is very often seen that the basic texture of official language and its process of using logic of communication, many time becomes an impossible task for a common man to follow and understand. b) Ideological Barriers : It is quite natural that all the members of an organization do not share the same ideology. So, their thinking perspective and believe orientation are also different. These natural differences affect their believe process, opinion and process of communication. The basic causes of this differences, stem from differences of education, social upbringing.These create the political and social views and it is difficult to overcome these differences. c) Filtering : The basic content and character of communication greatly depend on the sender's purpose of sending the information, and the interest of the receiver. Filtering of information mainly depends on the sender's structure through which the inforthation would pass through. Especially when the information passes through the vertical structure, the chances and probability of filtering become higher than the situation of horizontal transmission of communication. d) Dogmatism : The attitude, opinion and belief system of a person, decide how and when information he will collect for transmission. Even these also affect the behaviour of their receiver. e) Halo Effect : This has an unique effect on communication. On some occasion, we may find that the communication remains limited only within 'Right' or 'Wrong', 'Good' or 'Bad' or in a word, "Black" and White". These two- dimensional information carry less information more value added news. The danger here is that most situations are not dichotomous, and therefore, such thinking may over simplify the actual situation. 3.10 Conclusion In this unit we have seen how most aspects of human life and activity depend on communication. The fact that communication is interdisciplinary necessitates a study of its core ideas and problems. Communication is an essential individual and collectively necessity. Human beings cannot be properly functional without communication. Communication is a fundamental human right that must be preserved because it is essential to human growth and development as well as the social context in which

This unit has provided a basic understanding of communication, including the definition of the term, its various forms, and its various models and many variables that affect how people communicate in society. We have understood the essence of communication as fundamental element of coordination, decision- making, efficient management, cooperation and peace, boosting morale of employees and so on. 3.11 Summary In this unit we have learnt ? Focuses on meaning, nature, types, medium, and significance of communication ? Presents theoretical perspective of communication and also its network channels, both formal and informal 3.12 Glossary Formal Communication : Refers to the flow of official information through proper, predefined channel and routes. Formal communication follows a hierarchical structure and chain of command. Informal Communication : Casual communication between co-workers in the workplace,unofficial and outside of the normal hierarchy of business structure. 3.13 Model Questions ? 155 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) 4.2 Introduction The structure of any organisation or any department has at least two aspects. The first aspect is related with its micro environment or position, which actually build up its internal aspects. This aspect is mainly identified with the job descriptions, which in fact, determine the position of an individual in the internal departmental structure of organization. The basic ingredients of micro environment of an organization are, job definition and distribution of departmental work responsibility, the intra relation between colleagues. The number of position and staff and their interaction depends upon the size and span of responsibility of the department. The shape of departments mainly depends on sharing of work programme. Traditionally the departments were arranged with multifarious job responsibility. Actually, traditional thinkers were in search of designing the departmental shape and size. Gradually, the specializations and technicalities come up to define and determine the shape of department depending upon skill of the position and staff at the micro level in the departments. The second aspect raises the issue of structure, relating it with the major operating features such as the degree of specification, technical skill, and formation of authority pattern. The pattern of authority depends on the character of power and responsibility structure. The power and responsibility structure may be decentralised or dispersed, or it may be centralized and hegemonic. In fact, the nature of control exercised by the authority is determined by the objective of the organization, and how the top policy makers of the organization wants to exercise that objective, plan and programme. So the first aspect of the organization determine the anatomical character and structure of the organization, while the second part is organization's physiological features. Both these aspects build up the static part and dynamic part of the organizational structure. Both these aspects also determine and expresse the objective of socio political needs of the organization, as well as its uniqueness in the society. In recent times, it is also said, that basic structural aspects and the objective aspects of an organization is the main guiding track of the organizational role and the way to the staff to achieve job satisfaction and motivation to work. Job definition and utility in the process of achieving organizational goal are two basic aspects of managing the work process. Defined job responsibility is one of the basic criteria to get maximum performing ability from a staff. When any department or organization becomes complex, many different tasks are performed by only one person. But in a large organization, these tasks are divided among separate entrusted staff who are given special job oriented internal training on their assigned job, for getting special and skilled work from him.

156 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) One of the prime issues or problems in determining the plan of work and to entrust the work on someone to the able preson. The primary question to the planner and programmer of an organization is to decide, how many tasks a person should be asked to perform. In modern administrative system, each organization tries to limit and mark the job and responsibility on the basis of specialised skill and interest. It has been observed that, only skilled and interested person may give his all effort to settle down the responsibility. Even in modern administration two new systems have been introduced: Job Enlargement and Job Relation. This system initially marginally alters the content any responsibility, to taste the suitability and skill improvement efforts of the concerned incumbent. Sometimes the system of rotation is used among the staff of equal rank or dignity. Manager or Chief Executive is secretary rotate the authority and power of the department, keeping the basic dignity and position of other persons of equal rank, same as before. This method of rotational authority is used, firstly to extend the scope of skill of Secretarial management of the department and secondly, to verify the personal management ability. The Rotation of authority mainly operates within the ranks, placed horizontally in the organization. This also creates an ambiance of enlargement of official authority to the rank and position holder who is being entrusted with the rotational headship. Thus modern administration have recently introduced these methods to alter the content of job. The actual problem of defining the job and job criteria is difficult for the lower subordinate staff. Although the post in the lower rung is very much determined by a definite denomination of the post, like Head Clerk, Accountant, Cashier, Clerk, Typist, Steno Typist etc., but their job in many occasion do not go with the denominational designation. Especially, in case of Clerks or Head Clerk and Accountant, often they are seen to do the official work crossing the designated boundaries of their post and responsibility. But this overlapping is only possible, when the superior authority promulgates such order or instructions. Otherwise the job profile of the subordinate staff like Clerk, Typist or Steno Typist, are fairly defined by the laws and custom of the administration, and scope of any radical change from that defined structure, is very limited even in the hands of the superior authority. But if we move up the hierarchy, the job profile at the managerial level, it becomes difficult to define their precise job content. As for example, the actual job content of Secretary or Principal/Secretary cannot be determined by the custom and tradition of administrative law. One of the basic reasons of that, they plan and create job and decide the programme for implementing those plan and programme. In this vital process, they remain liable to distribute the work and remain responsible to get it done with the help of different parts of the organization. According to modern administrative theories, the organizational expectation can better be served, if the jobs of different incumbents within organization are defined

157 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) precisely and perfectly. This is because, precise and perfect job definition can more easily enable the job holders to communicate with their superior authority, which in turn affect his activities. This should always be remembered that job is not only important to an employee, it is also important to the organization. Thus management is expected to arrange the ambience of job structure, so that the workers feel at home in their working place. Many time it is seen, dissatisfaction over the way job are structured, which leads to conflict and tension in the organization. 4.3 Definition of Hierarchy The word hierarchy means, literally, the rule or control of higher or superior authority over subordinate lower authority. In administration, the word hierarchy is used to mean the structure of position of staff in different profile and their different position in the graded format of the department or organization. Staff in a department are posted and placed in different grade, arranged by successive steps or levels, in which each of the lower levels is immediately subordinate to next higher one, and through it , to the other higher step right up to the top. Conversely, in such a hierarchical organization, authorities, control and command come down or descend from top to his lower level by the process of rigid downward stepping to the bottom of the organization. So the system is popularly known as ascending up or descending down in the departmental ladder of authority, control and command. There is no intermediary step which can be jumped up or stepped down without changing basic and traditional structure of hierarchy in the administrative system. The hierarchical system in administration follows the rule of "through proper channel". The imaginary structure and nature of functioning of hierarchy may be illustrated by the following diagram : O A B is the head of the organization, x1, x2, x3, etc., are his immediate subordinates. Similarly x3 is x1's immediate subordinate but is also mediate subordinate to 0 through x1. x5 is immediate subordinate to x3, but mediate also x3 and O. Finally A is immediate under x5, but mediate also under x3

and xl. The same applies to letters shown along the other arm of the angle. If "O" issue an order affecting "A" or "B", it must descend to "

A or "B" through x1, x3, x5 and on the other side x2, x4 and x6. If "A" or "B" addresses communication to "0" it must travel up the line x5, x3, x1; and on the other side x6, x4, x2. Thus this line between "0" and "A" and "B" represent the line of authority linking the organization together. In the technical language of administration, the hierarchical principle is also called the "Scalar Principle or Process". The discussion on hierarchy as an important structural form, connects subordinate with superior, which is between "O" and "A" and between "O" and "B". Whenever there is any communication between "A" and "B" or between any cell in "O" and "A" wing and "O" and "B" wing, it is done or placed through "O". More precisely, all communication within the structural frame of hierarchy, through proper channel". The line of authority (the chain of command or line of command, control and authority) linking entire organization is represented in the above diagram.

This diagram also has depicted some basic functional principles in the above drawn pyramidical form. These are:- 1. The hierarchical organization runs with the principles of "through proper channel". It denotes that all communication and command should by principle pass through a particular proper channel which the organization establishes as its essential part of structure. In this well knitted structural bond and system, no intermediate level can be skipped in transacting official business. 2. The hierarchical structures follow a definite principle of intra and inter departmental correspondence through the channel of communication. This 159 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) principle of correspondence specifically denotes that responsibility of work is coequal among all related departments and also coterminous at all level of the organization. Traditionally it is believed that (which has been accepted by almost all theorists on different occasion and context) "

authority without responsibility is dangerous and responsibility without authority is meaningless". 3.

The hierarchical structure of an organization also draws our attention to the concept "unity of command". The basis of unity of command is, a subordinate should receive order through appropriate and pre determined channel, from his immediate superior authority only, and in turn he will remain responsible for carrying out the order directly to his ascended authority and ultimately to the top of the organization. 4.5 Hierarchical Pattern of Organization Hierarchical pattern of administration is mainly run by the horizontal division of work and vertical distribution of responsibility. So the authority and controlling powers are divided horizontally and that power and authority and that gradually deployed vertically among the subordinates. These horizontal and vertical differences and deployment, actually is the basic structural life line of hierarchical pattern, which ultimately creates the different levels in an organization, and it takes the shape of a pyramid through vertical and horizontal distribution of work which may also to call be called responsibility. In this pyramid type of structure, the subordinate remain accountable to its one step superior at each level and levels move up in successive layers. Equally the structure follows the same order of enforcing control and authority of the superior authority on their arrayed subordinate. The subordinate has the scope of moving upward in the pyramid through promotion. As one move upward in the structure of the pyramid, his status, authority, salary and perquisites etc., also go on increasing at successive levels. Hierarchy demands certain basic characters in the administrative structure. As for example:- I. Hierarchy signifies certain qualitative changes in works of organization. II. Hierarchy signifies the differences of position and work responsibility. III. The demands and responsibility of the post is determined as per position in the hierarchical structure. IV. Power, authority and responsibility of a post increases with its upward movement. V. Hierarchical pyramid remains as a static structure in an organization, it becomes 160 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) operative, when the person staying at particular layer, does his official function and execute his official responsibility. VI. In the structure, each higher level decides the work schedule and programme, with the recommendation of dividing the work schedule among the cells or individual. The decision of work schedule sometime changes or rearranged in compliance with the ability and skill of the concerned layer. VII. Thus the upward movement (which we generally call promotion) or downward movement (which we call demotion) also change the pattern and nature of duties. Any movement demands higher or lower order of supervision. VIII. The primary and vital functions of the higher level in hierarchical order remain responsible to supervisor as well as to arrest failure of its lower level staff and members. IX. Better competency of serving the assigned responsibility and duties are the basic precondition of the success of hierarchical structure in any organization. There are also some disadvantages in continuing with the hierarchical system in administration. Following are the most visible demerits of hierarchical structure. I. Hierarchy and its pyramid type shape make an organization tall and create an unusual distance between top management and lower level subordinate staff. II. Organization grows up by the internal relation among the staff. This relational bond is a vital criteria for an organization to achieve its planned goal and mission. III. This is because the tall shape of The lengthy hierarchy of an organizational structure sometimes becomes the cause of losing touch with the men at the bottom. IV. It is also said that hierarchical structure, authority and privileges are sometime unequally distributed among member staff of corresponding layers in the structure. V. Since there is inequality in privileges and authority, especially at the top of the hierarchical pyramid, the effect of this also subsequently percolate to the lower layer and gradually create a "Yes Man" flattering group in the lower range. VI. As a result the nature and trends of relationship among staff of all levels trend to become conditioned by this inequality and "Yes Man ship". This in turn extends the possibilities of spreading administrative corruption within the organization. VII. This gradually creates a conflicting environment within the department or organization, especially when and where the positions at higher levels are occupied by incompetent officer as head of the organization.

161 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Thus to make the hierarchical administrative system successful, formal and actual superiority one is required to be matched perfectly as well as by professional competence in organization. This problem was first raised by Henry Fayol. He said that in general occasion even, the hierarchical pattern of administration causes unnecessary delay in disposal of public services an work. In some occasion, the tall (which we already have discussed) and over extended organizational structure becomes the cause of losing touch with the incumbents at the lower level. In view of this and some other problems of hierarchical structure, Henry Fayol suggested an alternative route called "Gangplank". He expressed his believe that this would spread up the flow of public works and would help to avoid delay in disposal of administrative decisions.

The concept "gangplank" stands for establishing a communication channel with an employee of the same level

following the horizontal way of communication system. 4.6 Fayol's Scalar Chain Following the above diagram, "Favol's Scalar Chain", "x3" communicates with "x6" which goes through "x2" and "x3" to "O" and then "x4" and back again to "x6. According to Fayol it is much simpler and quicker to get directly from "x3" to "x6" 162 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) through the way of "gang plank" (Literally the term "gang Plank" is used generally by the passengers to board or disembark from a ship or board). But this could only be possible if superior authority of "x1", "x2" "x3" and "x4" "x5" and "x6", approve this attempt of gangplanking. Thus this new addition of Henry Fayol, with the existing structure,

agreed that the departed authority and control in any organization, no doubt, can bring problem to the homogeneity of organizational planning, but absolute disintegration within the organizations among different cells and individual incumbent may create greater problems which may even detrimental to the normal business of the organization. It is fact that every organization maintains an internal scalar chain for the sake of administrative discipline. The organization also follows the norms of draining out unnecessary information. It restricts spreading of authority in every corner of its structural frame. It is believed that this may create disruptions within the organization. Even then, the constant use of one drain channel for every communication of authority and order may cause overloading of single drain system. So Fayol searched out an alternative system for smooth functioning of organizational structure as well as the hierarchical system. Very recently a new structural concept has been built up by some administrative theorists, and they made the claim that the new structural concept is free from the points of demerits of existing structure of hierarchy. This, they named as "Fan-like Organization", which is , to a large extent free from the rigid superior -subordinate relationship. 4.7 Control and Leadership Leadership at the outset signifies a philosophy of control over subordinate by the efficient and eligible use of managerial position, which determines the limit of the controlling power of the superior over subordinate in administration. The fact in administration is that, in almost all the occasions, the subordinate always remain at the receiving end, and react to the control of superior leader, by their varying process of expression. Even then his position and official responsibility does not permit him to defy absolutely the controlling order of superior. Under such situation, if the superior finally ables to retain his order, then only the control or leadership gets its shape in the organization and heads over his subordinates. Thus pattern of control and its way of enforcement characterised the leadership of the organization.

163 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriculum (Dt. 17.10.2022) 4.8 Classification of Leadership On the basis of predominant leadership, within the organizational structure, the leadership quality can be classified into three basic types. These are specially seen through the exhibited behaviour of a leader, which are generally visible during the interaction of the leader with his subordinates or during the inspection of the work of the supervisors. These are also called the style of behaviour of the leaders, viz. 1) Coercive style or Autocratic style of leadership; 2) Utilitarian style or Laissez Faire style of Leadership and 3) Normative style or Democratic Style of Leadership. 4.8.1 Coercive Style or Autocratic Style of Leadership : This style of leadership is also known, authoritarian or directive type of leadership. The basic proposition of this type is that here authority remains concentrated in the hands of a single leader, who enforce his authority with the blind support of his close group of supporters. The authoritarian leaders decide all policies and direct the group of supporters to implement these and demands complete obedience from them. Any sort of disobedience meets with punishment from the leaders. Following diagram explains this style of leadership. Coercive Style or Autocratic Style Here the leaders are often seen to use physical and state based power to establish its control over the 'society' and especially over the agitated mass and opposing group; we call him "Coercive Leader". Coercive leader, instead of opening the channel of discussion or method of persuasion, use actual physical means. Here leader only looks for his hegemony and absolute power of control. Utilitarian Style or Laissez Faire Style

164 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriculum (Dt. 17.10.2022) 4.8.2 Utilitarian Style or Laissez Faire Style of Leadership : Generally this type of leadership is popular in Western liberal democratic system. Here leader in general extends complete (but not absolute in the Philosophical sense) social and economic independence to its subordinates, and state itself to the society, in their use of individual liberty. The administrative, as well as, state leadership allow its staff and subject respectively, to set their goal within the limit of their goal and ambition to achieve them fully. In other words, this style involves complete freedom for group or individual decision with no or minimum participation or interferences of the leader. The only job of the leader is primarily to protect them from social or other hindrances and then to ease their ways to get various materials, instrument etc., asked by them to achieve their goal. Following diagram explains this style of leadership. Utilitarian style or Laissez Faire style of leadership is far more acceptable than coercive control and leadership. The utilitarian leaders generally use the method of control over the society and mass by providing some basic material needs of social members. Initially the intension of the utilitarian leaders is to keep the society and opposition forces satisfied with affordable opportunities and advantages, so that the, sporadic social protests or opposition could be checked and control with minimum civic administration. 4.8.3 Normative style or Democratic Style of Leadership : This is a type of leadership where the members of the administrative organization or citizens of the state get maximum opportunities to participate in the decision making process. Leaders welcome their subordinates to participate. So participants

165 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) take all decisions through discussion among themselves. The opinion of the majority at last prevails over the minority and implemented as a unanimous decision. The communication between different ends, flow freely through multi dimensional channels. In administration, this style was very popular during last twentieth century. Following figure explains this style of leadership. Normative Style or Democratic Style of Leadership Normative style or Democratic style of leadership is different from other two types of leadership. Normative or democratic leader and method of his control is absolutely different from coercive and utilitarian leaders. Normative leader uses the administrative organization as a symbol of nationality and prestige. Social members get themselves attached with leader with affection and esteem. Leaders also predominantly use these to establish his control and to achieve their obligation to the nation and state administration. Ideal normative leadership is rare in this power oriented political and administrative ambience. Still all democratic people always seek to establish normative type of leadership. However, specific structure of power, state and socio-economic conditions evoke a particular type of leadership and its involvement and response to the society and to the state administrative organization. As for example people especially the opposition groups are seen to involve negatively to the coercive leaders. In fact coercive structures of leadership by its very nature alienate the general people from the administration and from its leader. So the obligation to the state, which they show or pretend to show, is not their actual mental or psychic involvement. They are actually forced to show obligation and support. So whenever they get any chance against the leader, they instantly withdraw their support and obligatory submission. Same psychological alienation is not seen in the case of utilitarian leadership. But it is also seen that the obligation in utilitarian leadership is not always spontaneous, rather it is seen to be calculative. The staff in general in administration work against remuneration or any other kind of special financial incentives. They don't work for any intrinsic love or spontaneity for utilitarian leaders. The same is also true for

166 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) general social members. They also do not feel any mental attachment with the leadership of the state and administration. So long leader keep and takes are on their interests, their obligations remain undisturbed. Normative administrative structure with normative or democratic type of leadership and control generates a social sense and psychology of involvement among citizens in general and beneficiary of administration in particular, and creates social environment of moral involvement. This is because the citizens in general and beneficiary in particular perceive the works and mode of treatment of administration intrinsically good and valuable for their social and personal demands. So they involve themselves with the state and administration in a spirit of social and moral duty. They feel both the state and administration as their own. It is very rare to see in any organization that all these three characteristics of leadership and control structure are operating together. Although it is true that in some occasions, leadership may require using a particular form to cope up with any special socio-economic situation. But the basic nature of leadership generally characterised by its predominating nature, so it may be said that most organization and its leadership are predominantly any of these three types. Some administrative theorists have tried to mark some administrative structure with particular character as its base. In their opinion organizations like prison or concentration camp or Police Department will fall in the category of coercive leadership with coercive control while religious organizations like "Moth", Temple etc., are likely to fall in the category of normative leadership with normative control. But if we look into these organizations with more attention and deeper insight, we will find that their outward natures do never fit with their inward behaviour. 4.9 Nature and Character of Leadership It is universally accepted that the nature of control and its structural form, that is, leadership provides the basic character of influence and act in organization. The control structure of organization creates a vital attribute to make leaders in organization, because the nature of control structure determines the personality, behavioural pattern and personal positional character of leader. Socially and organizationally Leadership is status position among the group and its members. The position may be determined either formally or informally. Generally in an unstructured social group, the leaders are selected spontaneously by the assembled members of the group. But in a formal structure, like administrative organization, the post of leader is created by following the hierarchical structure and norms of administrative law and system. As for example, Secretary, Joint Secretary, Director, etc., fall in the category of leaders in the administrative structure. Their power, control over subordinates all are determined by

167 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) the fixed and established norms of administrative law. As per, the functional description of power of a leader, he is the person who controls and manages all the affairs of the department or organization. There is one most essential feature which a leader should possess, that is the capacity of pursuing his subordinate to do work or duty according to the plan, mission and program of the organization. It is considered as a special capacity of a leader, if he car persuade his subordinate to do the work and duty enthusiastically. If he does it with coercive threat on his subordinates we call that leader, coercive in nature. Etzioni called this ability, "the hallmark of leadership". The gradation and character of leaders are determined by this hallmark. 4.10 Bases of power and influence of leadership Organizationally a leader uses his power with some bases of administrative norms and rules. Keith Davis has described those bases with five categories:- l) Reward; 2) Coercive action; 3) Legitimate responsibility and power; 4) Referent of previous action; 5) Expert knowledge over subordinate. First three bases or types are derived from the formal organization, sources and norms. ? Rewards are of material types as for example incremental benefit, promotional benefits are given to the subordinate in appreciation to their achievement and official performances. The achievements and performances of subordinate staff are assessed by the superior leader of the organization, and he decides the reward and process of conferring the same to the concerned officials. ? In converse to rewards there is a system, called coercive action against any incumbent for his negligence or inaction to work or to carry out the orders or directions of the superior authority. The administrative law up certain methods of coercive activities against any staff or incumbent. The administrative ruler have categorically mentioned some measures, like Show-Cause, Notice, Stopping of increment, stopping of benefit of promotion etc., or at an extreme level, suspension from the post, and/ or Service. In democratic forms of administration, the rules also give the opportunity to the incumbent to defend himself from such coercive step of the superior authority, either through administrative tribunals or through administrative court of law. But this opportunity is not available in all types of political systems. Especially under dictatorship or in authoritarian State system, administrative rule does not provide such scope of self defence against the coercive step of the superior authority against a subordinate employee. ? The word legitimate leadership is used to mean the character of 'power' of the person who holds the position in the administration. The legitimate word also
168 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) denotes the meaning of "formal nature" of power of leader. The administrative rule actually determines the legitimacy of exerting power of the position. Other two bases of leadership, 'referent' and 'expert' have not been included in administrative rule. ? Referent is a process or power in the hands of leadership by which a superior informs his likings or impression regarding his subordinate to other superior. ? Expert signifies the expertise or skill of a superior or which influence the behaviour of the subordinates. In fact leadership in an organization does never do the function of supervision over his subordinate constantly; rather he does it with help of his subordinate supervisors. The main function of the supervisor is to supervise the work of his subordinates, as a matter of his routine work schedule. But the leadership has a definite incremental influence over the total hierarchy. The leadership also enjoys the liberty to go beyond the norms and some part of rule to get better result for the organization. This is very much expected from a perfect leader, that he would be a creative man, who would by using his position in administration, redefine the public interest and services. He will not only redefine the interest of the people, but also create an ambiance to make the organization a perfect embodiment of those redefined interest and services. This responsibility of the leader of an organization has made four tasks essential for a leader as key tasks of the position. I. The leader is expected to determine and define the mission of the organization, as well as, its role to achieve those missions. II. The leader is the person with his positional advantages in the organization and he is also responsible to make out the structural plan of organization, so as to serve the mission of the organization as an embodiment of purpose. III. Society as a whole expects integrity and involvement of the organization with the needs in general. Leader is a first man of an organization who will defend, protect and enhance the integrity of the organization. IV. Internal conflict, mutual envy or rivalry is very common among the staff at subordinate level. One of the basic responsibilities of the leader is to harmonise the efforts and skill of the subordinate, keeping all types of conflict, envy and rivalry away from their daily work schedule. For that he may be required to make a bridge of harmony and good official relation among his subordinate staff. This is, in any way, is not the function of the supervisor. So successful functioning of a leader is indispensible for an organization. The perfect functioning role of a leader, in fact, is to decide the possibilities of attainment of goal, mission and objective of an organization. It is fact that only perfect leader

169 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) in an organization can turn the muddle of men, machines and missions into a perfect harmonious organizational structure. Leader can only by his successful role, transform the muddle etc., into an organization. We should, in this context, also note that leader and manager are neither synonymous nor identical or interchangeable. The role of a leader in the organization goes beyond the boundary of the managerial role, when he rises to the level of influencing the behaviour of one towards the goal and mission of the organization. So to be more precise, the leader is not expected or required to perform all the functions of a manager. One of the basic hallmarks of a leader is his capacity to influence others to follow the mission, determined by him. 4.11 Position of Leader Many writers of administrative process and theories have defined the position of a leader from the different perspectives. Dimock and Dimock, in their work, categorically stated that leadership is not only position in the organization and to the society, which have power, dominance, social superiority or anything else, which help the position holder to enforce own control over the followers. Leadership is a capability of influencing one, on his behaviour, without exerting any direct power over him. So leadership establishes an interpersonal relationship between two ends where one influences other and the related one is being influenced. The resources or power of influencing capacity are unevenly distributed in the society, so the capacity varies from person to person. Thus, that individual is considered as leader, who is more influential than other, or who has more influencing capacity than others.This uneven distribution of influence is making one leader and simultaneously others as followers. Here influence is the coercive power; rather it is a qualitative attribute of an individual. This qualitative attribute is rare, so the influence is a rare qualitative power. Leader, by dint of his position and quality, enjoys the channel of communication, through which he uses his capability and positional advantages to attain his goal of influencing others. Thus the essence of leader is his capacity of influencing the action of others. The basic quality of a leader is his capacity to convince others to behave according to his desire and goal, leader also persuades his followers, to help him to get his plan and program successful. so the single defining quality of leader is their ability to create and realise a vision set by the leader. So the primary task of a leader is to set the goal and vision of the organization. After setting goal and mission of the organization, leader persuades and influences others to adopt the goal and mission. But success of achieving the goal persuading by the followers essentially depends on, how much he could percolate his mission and goal down to the social structure of organization. The

170 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) percolation of mission is important, because, to execute the mission, the cooperation of the organization as a whole is necessary. The leader initially elaborates the purpose of mission that has been percolated. The speed and motivation of being involved with the organizational plan, depends largely upon, how the same has been elaborated. Thus the core of involvement of the organization with any plan and program depends upon how the thought process of the institution has made them convinced and influenced with the mission of organization. It is believed, even in modern administration, which the leader of an organization has to maintain the core value of the organization and its distinctive identity. There are many competing interest existing within and outside the organization. The primary duty of the leader is to maintain a balance of power, especially among the staff and workers of the organization, to appropriate the fulfilment of key commitment of the organization made to the society and especially to its own stake holders. So in a word, we mean by the term 'leadership', specially 'organizational leadership', the top decision makers, who also set the process of achieving the goal or decision of the organization. It is the basic responsibility of the leader to watch over the performance of the workers and to steer them to the correct and desired direction for achieving the goal of the organization, because the leader of the organization ultimately remains responsible for success or failure of the organization. Karz and Kahn in their work on administration have identified three distinct levels of leadership. These three levels have been differentiated by them on the basis of the effect of leadership on the structure of organization. A. Institutional Level : At this level the basic function and rsponsibility of the lader is to build up the structure of the organization. In the process of building up the structure leader takes maximum care on the policy and program of the organization, because structure, to a large extent ensures the probability of achieving the best result from policy and program. B. Leader also takes care to build up the lower level supervisory group from among the skilled eligible and efficient subordinate staff. The supervisors stay at the intermediate level of the organization and look after the work and progress of work on behalf of the leader. But the functions of the supervisors are limited within the boundary of the general policy implementation factors. They perform this duty under direct or, in some cases indirect instruction and supervision of the leader from the top level. Even on some occasion, leader delegates some authority to the supervisor to distribute the workload at the subordinate level to improvise some better result for the organization. Thus if there is any incompetence in the structure and functional allocation in any organization, the supervisory staff cover that gap by their skill and supervision.

171 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Here the function of the supervisor is like the interpolators, who cover the gap of leadership. C. At the lower level of the organization, the main target of the leader is to find out the best ways to utilise all the available resources of the organization. It is often seen that mainly in operative level, there may be some vital resources, which remain unavailable to the leader. Even he has to make an honest attempt to attain the mission and goal of the organization with those resources which are only available to him. Some authors of Administrative theories have opined that the role of leader is not limited within the boundaries of organization, where individuals are only considered either as worker or as an official staff. The authority goes beyond the boundaries of the organizational staff and worker, and touches the periphery of their family and social life. Psychologically social and familial motivations also have a substantial bearing on the working life of an individual worker. In this context, the leadership and its basic character can be distinguished between two different but internally related types : Transactional or performing role, and Transformational or role through which leader change an individual to a eligible working force with necessary skill for performing the assigned duties. The performing role or transactional role of leader gives prizes, rewards, promotional benefit, reallocation of more important responsibility etc., as a token of appreciation and skill of the workers. Efficient and effective transactional role of a leader, certainly improve the mentality and working habits of the workers, which in turn improve the working environment of the organization. It also improves the general performance level among supervisory and subordinate staff, because the transactional nature of the leader helps the worker to satisfy their needs and desire. Leader by his transformational role, changes an individual to make him skilled one. This character of a leader in a very nuance way changes the interpersonal, interdepartmental relations between supervisor and subordinate, and the mission and goal of the organization. Prof. Warren Bannis, in his one of the Article ('Transformative Power and Leadership' in Thomas J-sergiovani and John E Coreally [Eds] Leadership and Organizational Culture: New perspective on Administrative Theory and Practices, University of Illinois Press, 1984) wrote that, "Transformational leadership is the ability of the leader to reach the souls of others in a fashion which raises human consciousness, builds meaning and inspires human intent that is the source of power." Thus the transformational role of leadership controls the instrumentality of action and simulation of coordinational action.

172 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) 4.12 Leadership and Group One of the basic criteria of a leader is to activate the group functions within his organization. Leader personally does not create any group, but plays the role of an instrument for functioning of the group activity with the mission and goal of improving the performance of the organization. Researchers of behavioural science opine, the power or ability of the leader to make the function of the group effective for the mission and goal of the organization, is essential for organizational success. So researchers on administrative structure and function, primarily focus their attention on the ability of leader. There are four dimensions that can help one to measure this ability. ? First : Leadership from the very beginning of initiating the process of implementing program and mission of the organization encourages and promotes closer and satisfying relationship among the member staff of the organization. Close relation among staff is an extra motivation among them to involve their skill and ability to work with the declared mission and goal of the organization. ? Second : Sense or feeling of self importance and self contribution in achieving the goal and mission set by the top policy maker or leader, is a vital motivation to a workers to exert one's own skill to the optimum level. There is no doubt about it, that such self extensional motivation of a worker is considered as an asset to the organization. Leadership has certainly a positiv role to create this feeling among the members of thee organization. ? Third : Workers at the initial stage, require motivation for work according to the interest of the organization. It this stage, the basic role of leader of an organization, is to encourage the members to employ their best ability and skill towards organizational mission and to work for its fulfilment. Basic expectation from a leader of an organization is that he would take control over the psychological gear of organization to steer the members of the staff to work for increase of productivity of the organization. ? Fourth : Leader, as a top policy maker of the organization, determines the policy and mission of the organization. At the same time leaders takes initiative to make all resources and other technical means require attaining the goal and mission of the organization. The successful work performance and application of optimum skill of the workers largely depend upon the availability of resources and scope of applying the skill. To fulfil this criterion, the leader is expected to look into some vital aspects related with the successful implementation of organizational plan and program, like easy and continuous supply of input

These and others are essential for the success of plan and program and mission of an organization. 4.13 Conclusion Hierarchy, as an administrative structure, is universally accepted by small to large organization. Different organizations have applied the structure in their own way, considering the needs and purpose of their organization, to arrange their administrative activities. Basically the structure signifies the relationship between superior and subordinate, and form number of levels of responsibility with post and position based authority. Both responsibility and authority are vested on incumbent through descending way and ended through ascending process; it comes from top to bottom and the result moves from bottom to top. So it is built up on an effect of many different individuals who are at the end, remain chained within the triangle of the hierarchical structure.

Both in the single unit organization and in a complex large scale organization, the structural pattern is arranged hierarchically and work schedule. The responsibility is divided on the principle of hierarchy. The individual, being incumbent within the organization, are arranged in grade, position etc. Max Weber described it as, "

The organization of offices follows the principle of hierarchy, that is, each lower office is under the control and supervision of higher one." So hierarchy is a rank and position based structure along with a descending scale from the top to the bottom of an organization.

To sum up the concept 'leadership', it can be said that the existence of leadership depends on the existence of followers or subordinates. So both leader and followers or subordinate form a 'dyad' in the organizational structure as well as in its function. Leader initially requires followers whose spontaneous response, will help the leader to create and build up his plan in objective world and would help him to keep his commitment. 4.14 Summary ? 177 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) 5.2 Introduction Outwardly the concept, 'Unity of Command' appears to be unassailable by any other system of administration because of its strong theoretical ground. But while this administrative process puts in action in any department or among the administrative behaviour between superior and subordinate, we find some vital exception. Very often, it is found that the order to the subordinate always does not come from a single superior authority; rather, it emerges from a source, where more than one administrative superior take an equal part. Normally sources of authority are built up jointly with administrative and technical personnel. The employee, thus almost in all cases remains responsible to carry out both administrative processes in doing the technical responsibility confered on him. Technical personnel of all organization, in reality works under the co mmand of vertical superior or manager as well as of horizontal manager. So they are, as a matter of fact subject to the dual control of administration. Technical superior from horizontal position, instruct the technicalities of a project, and superior placed vertically controls the administration of the project. Sometimes it is found that for some specific reasons this type of dual leadership are seen to operate in organization. One of the prime reasons for such arrangement is the difficulties in finding a superior or supervisor who is equally able to act as a competent technical advisor as well as is capable to administer working process. But Unity of Command as an administrative process signifies something else than dual leadership or dual command both from horizontal line and vertical line of command. As Henry Fayol defined Unity of Command, it shows that this implies

for any action whatsoever, an employee should receive orders from one superior only, at the same time every member of an organization should also report to one and only one leader.

The unity of command and chain of command are both corollaries to each other. In both cases, the major principles in both cases are that each employee should have only one boss or superior. In other words, it emphasises that no employee should be subjected to the order of more than one superior. Thus it stands for single superior for each person and their obedience on mono command of the superior. 5.3 Some Advantages of Unity of Command Administratively it is true that the observance of unity of command essentially helps the subordinate to get away from confusion of carrying orders of the superior. Scondly, duality or multiplicity of command for a same job or assigned responsibility, keep the employees under confusion and in a self conflicting situation. In such 178 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) circumstances, any claver and neglectful employee can play the hoax game with his superior by evading the order of one superior against the name of another supervisor's order. This ultimately creats problem to the organization to achieve its goal and mission, and undermines its purpose. One of the prominent advocates of the process of unity of command was Henry Fayol. He asserted that if the process unity of command is not followed by any organization, then the 1. Probability of violating the order would be easy for an employee. 2. The violation of order primarily will undermine the purpose of authority and ultimately it will be the cause of undermining the purpose the organization. 3. The internal staff discipline will be jeopardised. 4. Departmental discipline will be disturbed. 5. The stability of the department as well as of the organization will be disturbed and threatened. Henry Fayol stated 'as soon as two superior, wield their authority over some person or department, uneasiness makes itself felt and should be the cause persist, the disorder increases, the malady takes on the appearance of an organization troubled by foreign body, and the following consequences are to be observed; either dual command ends in disappearance or elimination of one of the superior and organic well being is restored or else the organism continues to wither away. In no case, is there adaptation of the social organism to dual command'.

So Fayol believed that the multy command is the cause of uneasiness and maladministration, because in most of the cases the subordinate could not follow whom to follow and what to do to satisfy the superior. Decision in administration are taken by the officials who are placed horizontally in the administration, and the plan and future program. Among the vertically placed staff, there are supervisor, equally placed in their horizontal bench from where they do the works with the help of the subordinates, and at the comepletion of work report goes back to the superior. The concepts act in the manner as shown below :

Dividing up Authority : Dual command, from the apex source, not only creates problem of obeying the command, it confuses the subordinates, Even when the authority of issuing command becomes dual, the purpose and motive of command also becomes multy faced. This may create problem to the organization to achieve single goal and mission. Thus dual commands not only create confusion among the subordinate staff, it also divides the authority in apex unit of the organization, causing confusion in mission and goal of the organization. II Imperfect Demarcations of Department : Organization generally formed with different departments, dividing the responsibility of serving purpose and goal. To get perfection in result, organizations not only divide its internal structure in different department, it also allocates the function and responsibility of each department, where posting and recruitment of staff are made through scientific analysis of the proposed purpose of those departments. Especial cares are taken on skill of the staff, required for the purpose of the department, so that the recruited and posted staff could understand the purpose of the department. It helps the department to confirm its identity to its clients. So if these persons are asked by the authority to do work, which does not match with skill and compatibility, then naturally purpose of the organization would be failed. So Fayol suggested maintaining a strict line of demarcation of each department. III. Constant Linking up of Department : Unplanned division of function and distribution of those functions between different departments are one of the basic reason of natural intermeshing of work and duties. Such types of intermeshing affects badly the efficiency of the staff in general. It is expected that each staff should know his assignments properly. These principles of working as well as administrative processes were also supported by other thinkers like Urwick or Luther Gulick. They also used to believe that, one person should neither be ruled nor be instructed differently by two bosses or superiors at a time for a single job. That is why, any well-managed administr ation in any organizational unit or frame, in both the government sector or private sector are seen to be controlled by single administrator, and the job responsibility are distributed either to a single man or to any particular unit, headed by one superior authority. Although it cannot also be denied that any rigid adherence to the principles of unity of command, as a ritualistic process, may have its own absurdities. Administration is basically a science of man management, mainly depends on the subjective knowledge and objective efficiency of a worker to understand the order and his capabilities to unimportant in comparison to the certainty of confusion, inefficiencies and irresponsibility which arise from the violation of the principles. 5.4 Arguments against Unity of Command The concept Unity of Command, as a process of administration is not equally accepted by all the thinkers. Especially administrative thinkers, like Hudson has aptly asked a simple question, that whether this process of administration is possible in a private company or public organization, because organization itself is structured with different layers? One boss one order, in a sense was once possible when administration and organization were not empowered to function in a complex society. So in modern administration, one superior and one order, bonded with a chain of command, is very seldom found. There may along within a department, between staff and superior along the horizontal line many interrelationship above the staff, and this can never be brought under the strait line of command and obedience. So both superior and subordinates are required to work and send report through this complex line of interrelationship. Especially in government administration, there are many superior staying on a virtual horizontal line and subordinate staff cannot neglect any one of them. Thus there are number of thinkers, who advocate the process of dual supervision, (they generally did not use the word 'Command'), which they call 'unity of command'. There are differences between 'commanding' attitude of the superior and supervision of work by the superior's supervisor. However, it should be remembered, that, "Political pluralism views society as composed of competing groups and interest and accepts or recommends that the administrative systemshould mirror those social demands".(Peter Self: 'Administrative Theories and Politics'; S.Chand & Company Ltd. 1981, p.89). There are various agencies or administrative departments, whose prime function is to respond to the demands of pluralistic society. The demands are required to resolve not only through administrative measures, but in most of cases the technical and professional roles are also equally essential. So to reconcile the demands and civil necessities, dual supervision is essential as a recognised process of supervision. The supervision is concerned with the professional competence in performing the assigned Job. Herbert Simon, in this context, very categorically mentioned that Unity of command, in its very process conflicts with the principles of specialization. According to him one of the most vital task of an organizational authority, is to include the specialised knowledge, as much as possible, in the decision making process. Each decision taken 182 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) by experts of different wing will be rational and the involvement with the decision making process will be increased. Simon gave an example of an Accountant and of a Teacher of an Academic Institution, and he compared and tried to find out the link. It would be wise for a theacher to utilize the fund in consultation and guidance of the accountant. Simon comments that unity of command down the relation between technical dirctor and administrative director.The unity of command by its very technical characteristics always ensures the command of a single person over his subordinate with single intention that only his order would be carried out. Even more, the single authority will also be empowered to enforce his order with the expectation of mono dimensional obedience. F.W. Taylor also rejected the concept or principle of Unity of Command, as it is ‘‘military type of foremanship or supervision" which is not applicable in a civil organization, where a worker or employee normally work under at least a group of minimum eight supervisors, which he denominated as : (1) Gang of

Boss; (2) The speed Boss; (3) The inspector; (4) The repair or maintenance Supervisor; (5) The order of work and route clerk; (6) The instruction clerk; (7) The time and cost clerk; (8) The shop disciplinarian.

Of these eight categories of supervisor first four types of supervisor directly work and involve with subordinates in the factory, while last four categories operate from the planning room, sending their orders or instructions in writing. These processes objectively facilitate the unification of different type of supervision and on the other hand, enable to divide the functions of supervision among different departments. 5.5 In defence of Principle of Unity of Command Of course there are also some arguments against defects of "Unity of Command" shown by different writers and thinkers. Essentially the basis of administrative theories have divided the total working strength of an organization into two different units, line unit and staff unit. The members who are technical experts in administration do not really exercise any independent authority and rather they remain concerned with the technical work only. This staff section mainly works as advisors, helper etc. of the administrative line staff and this unit in fact exercise the authority and control. So if we consider this division in administration, as an important part, then there is no violation of the principle of unity of command. The fact is that the administrative chief may not even know or understand what the technical experts in their several lines are doing or demanding.

unity of command. The principle of unity of command is only violated when a man receives an order on some matter or issue from more than one superior. Thus the approved violation of principle of Unity of Command disappears upon a more minute, and detail analysis. Of course there may arise sudden and occasional violation or overlapping of orders, and there may also create some temporary conflict between various kinds of supervision, but if we think of them in detail, we will find that it is not impossible to demarcate the proper areas of each superior. 5.6 Meaning and Importance of Units and Agencies By the term "Unit" we mean the lowest or subordinate part of division or subordination as a whole. From this point of view "post" or "position" is the lowest unit on which the structure of organizations are built up. And the organization on the other hand, is the summation of different post and position, which acts as an interrelated part within the structure of the organization. Although unit primarily means the smallest or lower post, but it is often use to mean a section and some type of nature of job or responsibility. There are two types of units in an organization, and they differ from each other especially in two respects: (1) in kind or quality, an (2) in size or comprehensiveness. The differences of kind or quality arise from the nature and character of job or function, it performs. Similarly, differences in size or comprehensiveness are decided by the position of post and responsibility in the organizational hierarchy. However, the general explanation or organizational structure, as we use to give, is that, administrational structure is built up with three types of agencies: Line Unit; Staff Unit; and Auxiliary Unit. The line of distinction between these three types of administrative units are drawn in view of the nature of work done in the administration. The the staff unit performs the role of advising and assisting the activities of the staff of line agencies. The auxiliary agencies provide common housekeeping services to the line agencies. Like staff agency, auxiliary agencies also assist line agencies. Auxiliary agencies is not an advisory body, it assists line agencies by providing their daily requirements like tools and other necessary aid to perform their duties. Their purpose is to help the line agencies to help in accomplishing the organizational mission. The staff belonging to auxiliary agency do not come in direct connection with the clientele. But there is some differences of auxiliary agencies with that of staff agencies.

184 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) 1. The staff agency advices and assists the line agency, while the auxiliary agencies provide common housekeeping services to the line agencies. 2. The staff agencies do not have any direct responsibilities in accomplishing the purpose of the organizations. Although the auxiliary agencies do not give any advisory instruction or they are not directly related with the clientele, but they have to bear operating responsibilities because they remain in charge of doing the housekeeping role for the staff of line agencies. 3. Staffs of staff agencies have neither the authority of exercising command on the line agencies nor have direct role in making decision on the purpose and process of function of an organization. But the staff of auxiliary agencies exercise limited authority and make decision in their own sphere. 4. However, although the staff agencies do not take direct part in performing the organizational purpose - based activities, but they have multiple types of other functions and their working jurisdiction is much wider than the auxiliary agencies. The auxiliary agencies are mainly concerned with the function of providing of aid to the line agencies, to maintain the normal and smooth functional process. L. D. White mentioned and discussed it in detail in one of his articles on Function of administration and role of staff, line and auxiliary agencies' in accomplishment of functional process of the administrative organization. L. D. White mentioned that, organizations primarily build an age - old relation between superior and subordinate, and the staffs are categorically arranged follo wing the norms and pattern of skill and efficiencies on a particular specialized area. The norms of arranging the central hierarchy, comprises the line staff on the one hand and staff assisting the line on the other. There are various units, concerned with advice and assistance and preparatory operation, of which a group of staff get involved with advisory functions, while other group are doing the housekeeping activities, which are called auxiliary staffs. The line comprises the central element of any administrative organization. The staff and auxiliary agencies are mostly essential in a large and" complex organization, but generally we may see that in a complex organization, the staff agencies and auxiliary agencies are outwardly considered as, secondary in nature. They are formed mainly to serve or help the line agencies to fulfil the purpose of the organization. In some occasion line units are called, the staffs, directly related with the purpose of the organization', while staff and auxiliary agencies as, 'staffs indirectly related with the organization', to keep the functioning of the organization constantly operative. In view of the position and role of the Line and Staff units in an organization, it

185 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) can easily be felt that both are inevitable and inalienable part of the organization, but their 'direct' and 'indirect' role with the purpose of the organization have made their role contradictory, and it has become a problem for an organization to maintain a balance in such contradictory relation between these two units. The right adjustment between line and staff, constitute one of the major difficult area of management. It is fact, that, if any management successfully can establish a coordinating relation between line and staff, then the achievement of purpose becomes easy for an organization. Staff and line have their own hierarchical pattern in organization, and their hierarchy does not play or impose their authority horizontally over each other. Only at the top, where Chief Executive or Director operates, there both these units horizontally come closer to each other. So staff and line are actually a typical characterization of authority relationship, and not departmental activities. 5.7 Line and Staff Units Within the structure of administrative organization, both line unit and staff unit operates simultaneously keeping the mission and purpose of organization in their sight. Basically their functional difference is qualitative, not quantitative. By function, we do not mean only their activities, related with official responsibility. The function of an organization is more abstract and fundamental which brings the 'state' like abstract concept, real to the general public through its service activities. State appears to the society through its service for initiating and spreading of education, health, defense, communication, and trade for the better growth of country's economic strength. These service orientation as well as economy, agricultural service oriented works are done by organizations, where both line and staff units work as a complimentary elements to each other. A tentative diagram may be drawn to identify staff and line unit separately as well to show the point of their meeting where both unite as factually complimentary. James Mooney divided the functions of the Constitutional society in three different segments: Legislature, Executive and Judiciary or advisory or assistance functions. The line function mainly deals with the execution of policy and program determined and decided by the legislation unit of the government and in the process of execution of purpose and program, the judicious assistance and necessary advice given by the third unit. So in a simple way of expressing the function and processes of these two inalienable units of organization, we can make the statement that the line unit is the unit of execution and remain involved opening or producing of various services, which people always expect from the government, and in this process of execution

186 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) staff unit gives its advice and provides necessary assistance to line for keeping the production system operative, as well as to people to train them how to enjoy those governmental assistance for their benefit. Staff unit does this through planning, research, coordination among the demands of the society and finally supervision on the distribution of service output created by the line unit. When both these efforts of two units coordinate and complement to each other, the government as a whole gets the power to fight back against the health problem. Sections Individual Post

187 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) During 90's of the last century, the Prime Minister's Secretariat in Indian administration was gradually upgraded to the layers of Chief advisory department. Few other departments like Planning Commission, Department for De Industrialization, etc., act as Staff agencies. They are mainly concerned with advice and assist the function of the Prime Minister and line departments in various ways. In fact, the existence of such departments and their functional process are vital examples to us to understand the difference between staff agencies and line agencies. Although there are some clear points of distinction between line and staff agencies, even then, these two units are not seen to be organized separately. Both of them coexist with their importance and with their respective boundaries of functional process in a department, or, in other words, departments are built with those two agencies. So the existence of either staff agencies or line agencies cannot be found singularly in any department. Even an outsider will be, in many cases, able to understand, with which agency, the department is actually functioning. In reality, department works with its staff, which are outwardly not, separated distinctly in staff or line units. But within the department, their particular nature of job signifies their character as line staff or staff unit's member. There are also different types of staff function, which some thinkers, distinguish between three varieties: (a) general staff; (b) technical staff; (c) auxiliary staff ; business administration recognizes four different kinds of staff works and units, namely, (a) control; (b) services; (c) coordinative; and (d) advisory. 5.8 Different Kinds of Line Units As we have drawn in the diagram, Line units have three varieties : (a) Department; (b) Government Corporation Department; (c) Independent Regulatory Department. These distinctions have been made on qualitative basis. But these distinctions are not absolutely functional, but there distinctions are structural and relational. One of the important varieties of line units in India is "The Department". The department is the largest unit and traditionally accepted unit of line. Until recently, the whole line agencies were under the structure of department. Even today, the bulk of the functions of line unit are done through departmental structure. The basic characteristics of departmental structures were total subordination of line staff to the Chief Executive or Director of the Departments. Director establishes his link of authority even up to the lowest employee. It is this absoluteness and continuity of control from top to bottom, facilitating the maximum of unification and coordination, which is responsible for such a wide prevalence of the departmental organization.

188 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Other two types of varieties are generally not found in India or any other newly Independent (during 40s to 50s of 20th Century), or partially feudalistic economic pattern, where the Government are still accepted the constitutional responsibility to provide number of socio- economic services to the society in general. However, there are certain unique features of line agencies, which specially differentiate it from the functional process of staff agencies. The prime characteristics of Line agencies are that, it mainly bears the responsibility of accomplishing the main objective of organization. For that, line agencies are required to carry out directly the functional processes of organization. Line units also put their total control and leadership in the functional process. However, for the benefit of accomplishing the objectives of the organization, the Line Units are having full authority to make decision and issue necessary directions to the concerned staff. The Head of the Line agencies take full control on their staff. The functional processes of the Line staff are directly related with the services of the social people in general. These services include education, health, transport, etc., directly related with consumers' benefit, etc; they are very closely related with the daily life of the civil societies. To perform and monitor those functional processes, the line units are required to maintain an executive set up in its organizational frame, either in the form of department, or section or sub-section or even in the form of government or independent corporation, which divide the responsibility of accomplishment of service. This division of functional process is done following a definite plan and program. But above all these divisions of departments, sections or subsections etc., are ultimately steered by the Chief Executive from above, and he controls and manages the efforts and skill of his subordinate by a plan and programme. This plan and program stays above every other plan and programs at subordinate level, which are ultimately formed by the direction of the plan and program determined by the Chief-Executive. This total control is materialized through, (1) making decision; (2) taking responsibility; (3) interpreting and defending policy and operation; and (4) maintaining production and seeking efficiencies and economy. 5.9 Staff Agencies By the nature of formation and related working pattern, Cabinet Secretariat, Prime Minister's Office, different Cabinet Committees, Planning Commission, Department of Economic Affairs, etc., are some of the inalienable parts or units of Staff agencies. The staff agencies have certain basic characteristics, which make it different from the line agencies and their function process. It has also three structural varieties, these are,

189 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) (a) General Staff; (b) Technical staff; (c) Auxiliary Staff. These varieties have some characteristics features which made staff agencies separated from Line agencies. 5.9.1. Features of Staff Agencies I. Basic functional processes of staff agencies are supportive and advisory. Its function is to provide all sorts of support and assistance to the staff of line unit. So support and assistance based on organizational framework, is one of the sources of beginning the functional process of Line Units. So these two inalienable units cannot be thought separately. II. Staff actually do not enjoy the privileges of making or materialize the decision, even do not enjoy the authority of issuing order and directives to the members of Line Unit. The role of staff agencies is, as we mentioned earlier, `advisory', but in the process of giving advice and assistance, they, in many cases do influence the authority in its process of making decision for accomplishment of the purpose of the organization. III. As the staff agencies remain involved with providing advice and assistance to the Line Unit, they do not have any scope to come in direct contact with clientele of the organization. For that staff units are enjoying the- privileges of being autonomous. It is said, that members of staff agencies enjoy a passion for their role as well as for their autonomy. In connection with this features of staffs agencies, a few important functions are attached with its domain of activities. These are : A. The primary function of the staff agencies is to provide information and assistance to the Line Unit. For that, the members of the staff agencies collect information and scan it before forwarding it to the Chief Executive, Departmental or organizational Research Units etc. This naturally ensure the Chief Executive, that he is taking decision or action on the course of action for organization, after being aware on adequate information on current problems and demands of the clientele. B. Staff agencies have two basic important and prime jobs, (1) It advises the executive in making decision, and (2) it assists and helps the Chief Executive or Director of the organization to foresee problems and planning on future programme. The advice and assistance also help the executive to ensure that, the matter which will come out from his decision will promptly and effectively. protect him against any hasty and ill judgment, because the decisions are taken on the basis of meaningful advise of the staff agencies.

190 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) C. The staff agencies also perform supervisory jobs and prepare progressive report of the works that are going on. It forwards the same to the Chief Executive or Director for their perusal and for thinking on future progress on functional process. Thus reporting and preparing note on the progress of work, naturally help Chief Executive or Chief Supervisor to make decision on implementation or rectification the functional process of Line Units. This also helps the superior at the apex, to exclude unnecessary matter that create future problem. It initiates and motivates the staff of the Line Unit, for successful accomplishment of plan of the organization. So some time such comments are made that Staff and Line Units are actually the "alter ego" of the Chief Executive of any organization, which seek to accomplish some goal or mission. D. The staff agencies assist the Chief Executive in his administrative work because it helps him to collect information from different sources. Especially it keeps watch on the function and speed of work of Line Unit. It is said that the staff units actually perform the function of a filter and funnel to the Chief Executive. Technical Adviser unit is also a variety of staff agencies. The prime function of this unit is to provide technical advice to the Cheif Executive, especially on technical matter. It also helps the Chief Executive to make necessary staff arrangement to supervise the technical matters on behalf of the Chief Executives. This special wing of staff units are also known as special staff or OSD (Officer on Special Duty), who are generally transferred from different general staff unit for any particular type of job. They form the technical staff group in the General Department. E. These technical staff are actually doing a major part of the "House Keeping Job or Services". There are few important departments which are mainly doing vital works, which are not directly related with social clientele, but the government cannot avoid those functions, as these jobs are indirectly related with the social reliability of the government. These departments are, Law Department; Finance Department; Information and Broadcasting Department; Audit Department Parliamentary Affairs Department, etc. These departments are the essential part of staff agencies of the Government; some of their functions are absolutely technical in nature. These departments being the important part of the government give necessary advice to the Line Units in the process of the effort to accomplish the purpose and mission of the organization. But in spite of their functional and technical importance, they never serve the social clientele directly, like Line Unit staff.

191 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) F. Although auxiliary agencies are part of the staff agencies, and perform almost the same function like the staff of the staff agencies within the structural framework of organization. But the point where it differs exactly from an ideal staff agencies, is that the members of a few departments (name of which have stated above), apart from giving advice to the staff agencies, they also take a role and responsibility in operating part of the Department. 5.10 Relation and Contradiction Between Line and Staff Unit Traditionally in administration the co-existence of Line Unit and Staff unit is itself a contradiction within the Organization. These contradictions sometimes reach to the extent where it appeart as an almost A unreasonable and irresolvable controversy on the issue of their importance in the functioning of the organization. The controversies are also on the issue of identification of the domain of their activities within the organization, as well as on their role in accomplishing the goal and mission of the organization. The issue has generally been commonly described by the thinkers, as, 'the Line units are directly related with the functions of accomplishing the purpose of the organizations, but the success of their attempt of accomplishment depends on the assistance and advice along with the housekeeping activities of auxiliary units of the Organization. So no unit can singularly be the performer of the mission and goal of organization. It is a collaborative work done by the united efforts of all the sections and units of an organization. One very simple example is the working of Irrigation Department, where Engineers are directly engaged in building the Irrigation Dam, following the sanctioned Plan and Drawing and estimated cost. These team of Engineers and Supervisors although directly belong as Line Unit Staff. Procurements of material, as per the demand schedule of the field of operation, are actually done by the staff of auxiliary and staff agencies, under the supervision of technical assistance of the Staff Unit. On the second phase of the work the procured materials are kept in the ware house, where the stock of materials are maintained strictly following rule and schedule of the organization. These works are also done by the staff either of ‘staff unit' or ‘auxiliary unit’. Thus traditionally line units are directly related with the functional procss of the organization, while the Staff and Auxiliary Units mainly play the supportive role through providing necessary assistance or by doing housekeeping activities. But neither staff nor auxiliary units deal directly with the demands of clientele of organization. The functions of the Line unit, on the other hand, run vertically and uninterruptedly, and always touch the bottom line, clientele, of the society.

192 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Luther Gulick once described the functions of the staff unit, by using an unused pretty one word which by itself does not carry any meaning, or so to say the word is actually a meaningless word combines the first letter of different functions of staff agencies. The word is P O SD CO R B. The word has made with the first letter of the following meaningful word : P = Planning; O = Organization; S = Staffing ; D = Directing; CO = COrdinating; R = Reporting; B = Budgeting.

These are the functions, which are actually done by the staff agencies, as we discussed earlier, can be classified into three broad categories: Advisory, Assistance and Housekeeping. On the basis of these classified work of the staff units, three types of departments or staff function have been identified : I. Personal Staff : It includes those staff members who are generally It with daily office work, keeping daily schedule of working, schedule of meeting among superior authorities, or between the supervisors of different unit and layers, maintain engagement schedule of superior authority, reviewing or receiving messages on behalf of superior officers and issue and circulate orders and instructions of the superior officer to his subordinates in the departments. In a word the function of personal staff is like the function of the Personal Secretaries of P.A. 2) Specialized Staff : The major functions of the specialized staffs are to look after personal administration, maintain personal service records of staff in general, including the staff related with Line Units. Apart from that they also look after the cash collection, maintenance of Accounts and supervise the Budget allotment for any particular working scheme as well as the Budget regulation for the department as a whole., maintenance of Store Accounts and supplies of essential requirements. 3) General Staff : General staff basically assists the Chief Executive in his process of implementing the policy. For that they gather data and analysis it to prepare report on it for the executive. In a broader sense the general staff mainly do the housekeeping activities. Outwardly relationship between Line Unit and Staff Units is not always happy in many organizations. The tendency of the staff of the Line Unit is either to suspect or to dominate the staff Unit members, which are usurping their legitimate power and authority and responsibility of the member staff of the Line unit. The members are in habit of using the advantages of being closer with the Chief Executive. Even it is alleged that staff Units on some occasion, showing down their influence and power

193 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) in procuring the stock materials and sometime try to disturb functional efforts of the Line Unit either by slowing down or stopping the supply of materials require for any project. The Staff members have also an indirect control' over the Budget allotment. They even try to spying over the activities of the staffs of the Line Unit. The perspective in an organization is that the staffs for their position generally remain outside the main functional boundaries of the organization, where as the function of the Line Unit staffs begin with the accomplishment of mission and functional goal of the organization. As for example, Teachers in an Academic Institution mainly deal the functional job of imparting knowledge and testing the position of its clientele (in this case Student) through academic Examination etc., while the office staffs (members of Staff Unit) remain busy with daily maintenance of the Institution only, without having any direct relation with the Students or clientele of the Institution. Hence the positions of these two Units are not identical either with the mission and goal or with the clientele. This is the main cause, why both the Units of the organization generally try to maintain their own single dimensional track, and do not bother for other's dimension. Even on any time, any wrong or worse happen to any organization for any social, political or judicial reasons, the Staffs of Line Unit at the first instant put the blame on the members of staff units and very tactfully try to keep themselves away from any sorts of responsibility. Sometimes this conflicts between Line Unit and Staff Unit, are became the cause of unnecessary delay in making and implementing decision and plan of any organization. And it is especially true for a governmental organization. There are numbers of such stories and fact that the engineer, designers prepare a useful project, along with its probable budget. Then they send it to the finance department for necessary sanctioning of the estimated fund. But on many occasion Finance Department, silently keep it pending for their own reason. Later this delay in giving sanction of the fund, may cause hike in the estimated cost, submitted before. Even then these two Units are inalienable and unavoidable part of an organization. But keeping their inner differences and uneven competition, newer modes of integration are being suggested by many administrative thinkers, and their intension is to lower the range of competition and complexity in relation. 5.11 Necessity of Control in Organization The discussion on decision making or communicating the decision to all concerned corners of the organization and structural units, are actually flow through "Controlling

194 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Machinery" of an organization. So long the size and span of organization remain limited, the control device remains as a normal part of the organization. But with the expansion of the size of organization and extension of its scope, span and activities, the necessity of building up the control machinery with extra leverage and importance become an essential part of the duty and planning of the apex body of the organization, where plans and actions are determined and thus circulated to the subordinate level. in fact the superior apex body, with the extension of organization and its work and responsibility, also do it with necessary urgency. Outwardly, the word control and its span of activity denote a negative feeling and restricted activities of the member staff of the organization. But none can deny the importance and necessity of implementing control devices especially as a means for checking and verifying organizational goal achievements, via, production of intended result. Primarily, control is a technical device which always put forward the logic of its own application. Initially it does not create any physical resistance, rather its aim is to implement control through technical and well designed declared means or by framing new rules of the organization. Essentially control is a technical means in an organization which is used to achieve and fulfil the goal, mission and purpose of the organization. The existence of control device evokes different kinds of responses from the human participants in the organization. The prime intention of control is to maintain a stable line and speed of progress in the organization, and with that, the other purpose of control is to guard the functional process of the staffs, from experiencing any type of failure, or deviation from accomplishment of goal and purpose. To ensure the success of organization, the control machinery from the very beginning assured to maintain the standard of total workability of an organization. The prime aim of this effort is to establish the reasons or justification of the organization for serving the social needs. 5.12 Control and Its Span Control is a type of supervision which is made by a superior authority on the work performance of subordinates. Thus the control in any organization is established following the scalar method, where superior supervises and controls the activities of subordinates. Now the questions on which most of the discussion on control or span of control revolves round, are, how many subordinates can be supervised with equal observation by how many number of superior supervisor? The ability and span of control mostly depend upon the total number of employees at the bottom, to be supervised and controlled, and the number of subordinates upon which each supervising

195 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriction (Dt. 17.10.2022) officer can effectively supervise. A hypothetical calculation may be made in the following "step based" diagram. A) One Inspector General of Police (Is Expected to Control Greater than or Equal to < =) ? Six(6) Deputy Inspector General of Police B) One Deputy Inspector General of Police (Is expected to control or supervise effectively on < =) ? Five (5) Superintendents of Police.(06 × 05 = 30) C) Thirty (30) Superintendent of Police (One (1) Superintendent of Police is expected to control and supervise effectively < =) ? 196 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriction (Dt. 17.10.2022) of Police, the limit of the span of controlling group has increases to Six (6) from Five (5). Some time new posts with separate designation are created, to divide and lessen the burden of work and responsibility. But when the separate designations are created, the expansion of control span also increases. A) One Inspector General (One (1) Inspector General is expected to control and supervise directly maximum < =) ? Six (6) Deputy Inspector General : (01 ? 06 = 06) B) Six (6) Deputy Inspector General (One (1) Deputy Inspector General is expected to control and supervise directly Maximum < =) ? Thus the main problem in 'span of control', as we understand or like to guess, is the number of subordinates what an officer can effectively supervise. It is also an admitted fact, that there is a limit to the span of control of every office bearer, either superior, or supervisor or subordinates. Some analysists called it a psychological problem; even then they agree that none can attend more than a certain number of subordinate at a time. The number, to which one can successfully attend and can effectively control their job, is one's own span of control, and capacity to enforce control. So span of control is in other word, span or capacity of concentrating attention, and the ability of applying that concentrated attention to the work of supervising other's job, performances etc., and thus to put control over the subordinates. Authors and their analysis of administration have never been agreed about the exact limit of span of control. Most of them advocated that in civil administration one can effectively supervise six to seven subordinates at a time, especially when their work pattern are seen either to be interlocked or interrelated. But theorists have agreed to the point that in case of simple, normal or routine work, the number of object of supervision may; be raised from seven to eight or ten subordinates at a time. But this cannot be a regular incident, that one supervisor could easily supervise the work of eight to ten subordinates, working on different technical platform. However, it is often

198 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) seen that the Chief Executive could supervise ten to twelve subordinates in different layers of the hierarchy, without being excessively burdened. A. Span of Control and capacity of enforcing the power of control, does exist at each level of supervision and it should be kept limited and cannot exceed or cross the normal limit of human being. When mechanically we increase number of subordinates, we also mathematically increase the numerical complexity in the combination of relation with the geometrical progression of administrative control. So a span of control universally exits and control be transgressed with impunity. B. This has to be accepted that control and its use and implication as well as its span, depend and veary with four different factors, like, (a) functions and its nature on which the span of control is extending; (b) personality of the individual who is in reality imposing the control; (c) time— that is when and on which, the span of control is using. So the intensity and character of control varies with four factors: (1) Function; (2) Personality; (3) Time; and (4) Space. Luther Gulick described these four factors as, (i) 'Function of control is largely determined by the type of work; (ii) personality refers to efficiency and effectiveness of the supervision; (iii) time indicate the age of the organization, because, the character of implicating or using the method and technique, control largely depends on the age; and lastly (iv) space implies the place where the work is to be supervised and where it is located.' It is easy to control those whose works are homogenously interrelated. As for example the work of engineers or the supervisor, who supervise the engineering works can be controlled more easily than groups of workers, where working relation has been framed with heterogeneous nature of work (as for example, where some are engineers, others are medical practitioner and others are Educationist. It is generally presumed that, imposition of control is much easier in a homogenous group rather than in heterogeneous group, where people of different interests and skill are assembled. It is also believed that, the task of supervisor to impose his control becomes easy when the functions of the group are limited by the routine work. But the imposition of control on those groups who are dealt with some unique and un-routine work, which are heterogeneous in nature. This is because, the necessary 'change over' time from one mental frame of reference to another, substantially reduce the forces of control span. C. Sometime we may find some interpersonal relations between the workers. It is said the interpersonal relation between supervisor and supervised, influence the workability of control of supervisor over supervised subordinates. But there are also such examples where the supervisors intentionally try to establish 199 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) relation with his supervised staff giving some personal touch with it. On many occasions this interpersonal relation works effectively to work out the span of control, especially during any sort of crisis period. D. The quality and time span of control is also dependent upon the nature and quality of supervised staff. The supervision on the work of a group of efficient, energetic and gifted workers is much easier than implying the control over any less efficient, energetic and partially or fully unskilled workers. As regards the time and use of controlling process, the method can be more rapid and effective in an organized sector, which has established earlier and acquire a long experience of maintaining its functional process. E. But in case of newly established organization which are still in the process of forming its structure, as well as in the process of establishing the rationale of its function in society, the precedents of control and methods of implementing and establishing as norms and system of organization are absent and workers remain partially informed regarding the rules and regulation of serving the organization. So workers are also used in the process of being controlled by the partially formulated norms and system. F. It has been suggested that, the supervision becomes easier and quicker and effective, if the subordinates, who are to be supervised, stay or work under the same roof with the supervisory units. Thus the span of control varies with four essential factors, like, function; personality time and space. But in modern age we are, on many occasion experiencing some radical change or revision of idea of control and its span. These changes are mainly due to the following factors:- 1) Recently most of the maintenance based and project oriented IT Sectors have brought a new form of control which are mainly based on mechanism and automation. These automated and mechanised implementation of control mechanism, has changed the older types to a large extent. Bio-technical attendance, CC TV surveillance, Net-Based job, has lessened the personal relation among the staf. All know each other either ID number or through chatting in web-site. Here the location of an employee / developer is not important to the management, because all sorts of working corners and sites are connected through net work and they work through cloud based server operation. The character of administrative management has also changed itself, and presently it is called "human Resource" or HR Section. Now HR Section controls staff management, recruitment and other service related matter. But 200 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) all these are controlled through automation, as a result the man to man relation has substantially been minimised within the IT based organized Sector or structure, which are mainly non-manufacturing maintenance based job-provider organizations. 2) A new revolution has completely changed the relation between management and other staff of different types and layers. This is best known as "Management Information System" or MIS whose main corporate functions are based on "Customer Relationship Management" job or CRM Job. 3) The demand, for specialist in technical work, Computer based program maker, professionally equipped to maintain program, etc., have been increased rapidly. Their roles are also getting more priority in professional service sectors. The demand for applied computer based technological knowledge has recently been enhanced and demand for core-based technology have been substantially decreased. 5.14 Span of Control and Hierarchy : Relation The control over the subordinate actually emerged from the apex body of the administration, which gradually comes down to the level of subordinates at the lower rank. The hierarchical order and span of control have some administrative relationship as well as similarities in operation. Structurally hierarchical administrative structures use the control mechanism on subordinates and obviously judge the capacity or span of a supervisor to enforce his control over his subordinate. Any wrong calculation of superior, staying at the apex, may cause disruption in functioning the normal and expected functional process of the organization. So for this reason, the number of levels in hierarchical, (or sometimes called 'Scalar'), organization depends upon the span of control of a superior officer. Sometimes superior authorities, for the sake of close and face to face control, narrow down or decrease the number of subordinates by increasing the number of supervisor in the chain of hierarchy. Naturally the organization intentionally narrow down the span of control, then the number of level of supervisor increases and that increase in number makes the structure of organization, comparatively taller than the previous-one. So many changes in the pattern of span of control instantly bring change in the structure of the organization too. Equally, on the contrary, when the span of control widens that is, when the span of supervising area are being widened and in consequence of that, when the number of supervisor decreases, the structure of the organization also becomes flat.

201 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Theoretically span of control is also related with span of attention, that is, the capacity of a supervisor to keep constant or necessary watch on the works of the number of subordinates. Even social and a administrative psychologists admit that each individual has a special and separate capacity to administer. This capacity is neither unlimited nor determined or stretchable to the extent of wish of the supervisor. So it is difficult to frame an unique number or boundary for each supervisors. Rather the superior authority before framing the structure of span of control, should judge his supervisor separately before assigning the responsibility of control. According to some administrative theorists, there is a limit to the number of things one can attend to at a particular or same time slot. To explain the above differences, we may site the example American, theorists, who generally believe that one supervisor could supervise minimum three (3) to maximum five (5) subordinates at a time. But the British administrative theorists found that a supervisor can supervise the work of five (5) to six (6) subordinates at a particular frame of time. In general, the administrative theorists of different countries, to name some of them like, Lyndall, Urwick, or Luther Gulick, believe that the capacity of controlling the subordinates varies on the layer of operation. At the higher and technical level, one technician or technical supervisor can effective supervise five to six subordinates at a time. In case of unskilled workers, the capacity of supervisor automatically raises to the extent of ten (10) to twelve (12) subordinates staff workers, because in such cases the supervisory work is simpler and more routine oriented. The working spans of Chief Executive or Directors are something different. They are not only required to supervise the work of his immediate subordinates, but they also keep watch over the functioning of the total organization. The span span of control can more easily be handled and extended, if the system of regular reporting of the subordinates to their superior supervisor is implemented. This will naturally increase the relational dialogue between subordinate and superior. Actually, supervision and control, both are, not only related with vertical dialogue between two ends, but also supervision and span of control are built up with numerous types of permutation and combination of mutual relationship between subordinates and supervisor. 5.15 Conclusion Unity of command results in less confusion and chaos.It indicates an integrated system of instructions, so as to enforce to command. The process of span of control

202 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) is used to determine the management style and it also defines roles within the organization. Though we find that there is no unanimity among writers over laying down the number constituting the span of control, but there is a common agreement among analysts, that shorter the span or boundary of control, the greater will be the net work control between superior or subordinates, and greater will be their relation control. This will, obviously ensure the quality of control of the superior over subordinates. Most of the analysts also are in opinion, that qualitatively strong controls ensure the effectiveness and efficiencies of both the subordinate and the superior. But with this conclusion, it is also true that, some dangers are also inherent in excessive limited span of control. Very close and constant supervision on work may make a skilled worker to expose and apply his inherent skill with the work. In such cases, he will give more preference to follow the instruction of superior than to apply his free and self-earned skill. 5.16 Summary In this unit we learnt— Unity of command, line and staff and the span of control-these three basic concepts have been dealt with systematically to provide a comprehensive understanding of the administrative process in a modern complex organization. 5.17 Glossary ? Unity of command: A principle of management which states that each employee in the organization should receive orders only from one supervisor. ? Principles of line- staff: Introduce flexibility into hierarchical lines of authority while trying to preserve unified command structure. 5.18 Model Questions ? The learners will develop an understanding of what is politics and what is considered to be administration, its institutions and processes. ? The learners will be acquainted with the relationship between politics and administration. ? The learners will be capable to find a nuanced balance between the dichotomy as well as find a harmony between politics and administration. 1.2 Introduction At the very beginning, before understanding the complex multi-dimensional relationship between politics and administration, we must develop a conception of what is politics and what administration is all about. So, this module begins with the question what is politics and the answer is not a simple one. Politics encompasses a number of concepts, issues, institutions and processes, thus to understand what is politics also requires the coverage of a broader spectrum of issues. Logically, this module would next address the conception of administration, particularly from the point of view of management of government and public institutions and the administrative processes. Although administration encompasses all organizations, both BLOCK – IV

Finally, after developing ideas about politics and administration individually, we will examine the relationship between the two and address the issues of politics-administration dichotomy, harmony and symbiotic interrelations between them, and understand their present nature of complex correlations. 1.3 Understanding Politics The term 'Politics' emerges from the Greek word 'Polis' which meant 'city states'. Thus, politics was essentially concerned with the affairs of the states. However, in the modern day, we know that 'Politics' has a much broader application from the realm of public affairs and matters of states and governments to the individuals' private life and may even be applied in their day to day personal affairs. There is no single answer to ‘what is politics’, because politics is a loaded term. Understanding politics requires the grasping of its conceptions along a spectrum from narrower to broader conceptions of what constitutes politics. It includes ? politics as that which concerns the state ? politics as a (non-violent) method of conflict resolution ? politics as an arena for conflict ? politics as the exercise of power ? politics as a social activity ? politics as a public activity ? politics as dependent on context and interpretation ? politics as struggle over the meaning of political concepts. The definition of politics varies from time to time and from place to place. For instance, in the nineteenth century the arena of business and commercial affairs was not considered the legitimate sphere of politics as it is today. According to Heywood, ‘Politics’ is defined in such different ways: as the exercise of power, exercise of authority, the making of collective decisions, the allocation of scarce resources, the practice of deception and manipulation, and so on. US political scientist David Easton (1979), defined politics as the 'authoritative allocation of values'. Thus, for Easton, politics encompasses the various processes through which government responds to pressures from the larger society, in particular by allocating benefits, rewards or

207 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) penalties. 'Authoritative values' are therefore those that are widely accepted in society, and are considered binding by the mass of citizens. However, if we move to a broader understanding, politics expands beyond the realms of government into public affairs and public life. In Politics, Aristotle declared that 'man is by nature a political animal', by which he meant that it is only within a political community that human beings can live the 'good life'. From this viewpoint, then, politics is an ethical activity concerned with creating a 'just society'; it is what Aristotle called the 'master science'. On the. other hand, politics can be broadly understood as the means to, and the manifestation and contestation of, power. It transgresses beyond any particular sphere (the government, the state or the 'public' realm). In this broader view politics is at play in all social activities and in every corner of human existence. As Adrian Leftwich proclaimed in What is Politics? The Activity and Its Study (2004), 'politics is at the heart of all collective social activity, formal and informal, public and private, in all human groups, institutions and societies'. Politics is thus, in essence, power: the ability to achieve a desired outcome, through whatever means. This notion was neatly summed up in the title of Harold Lasswell's book Politics: Who Gets What, When, How? (1936). 1.4 Understanding Administration The term administration comes from the latin word 'administrationem' (nominative administratio) and noun of action from past-participle stem of `administrare' which means "to help, assist; manage, control, guide, superintend; rule, direct". From the latter half of the 17th century, it came to signify "management of public affairs" which broadly get translated into the executive powers of the government. For Hamilton, The administration of government, in its largest sense, comprehends all the operations of the body politic, whether legislative, executive, or judiciary; but in its most usual, and perhaps in its most precise, signification, it is limited to executive details, and falls peculiarly within the province of the executive department. For the learners of public administration, the word administration would be appropriately connected to the sphere of government activity or public affairs, however one must keep in mind that the degree and extent of jurisdiction of various administrative institutions and authorities varies with location, time and space. For example, the executive powers of a government, as exercised through its administrative branch, is far greater in case of states which are either autocratic or dictatorial in nature, or maintain a façade of democracy like in the case of North Korea or China. On the other hand, nations like the United States, United Kingdom, India and many others where prevalent democratic ethos and values, dominate the society and such regimes are in control of the government, the outreach of the administration is limited and is

208 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) reasonably restricted by law. Let us look at a few different understandings of ‘Administration’- ? According to Simon, "

Administration can be defined as the activities of groups cooperating to accomplish common goals" (Simon, Smithburg, Thompson, 1950). ? In another definition, administration is defined as "an activity or process mainly concerned with the means for carrying out prescribed ends." (Pfiffner and Presthus,1967). ? According to

Waldo "administration is a type of cooperative human effort that has a high degree of rationality." (Waldo,1955). Sometimes, the term "administration" is used in the meaning of "organization" or the "management" of an organization. These are actually the institutions that carry on the task and processes of administration. So let us try and understand what an organization is perceived to be- ? For Scott, Organizations may be defined as "collectivities that have been established for the pursuit of relatively specific objectives on a more or less continuous basis." (Scott, 1964) ? According to Pfiffner and Presthus "organization is the structuring of individuals and functions into productive relationship" (Pfiffner and Presthus,1967) The terms "administration" and "management", are generally used synonymously, and meaning the same thing. But the term "management" is generally identified with private sector organizations and used with reference to such organizations. The term, "administration" on the other hand, is used with reference to public organizations. Such a usage should not give one the impression that managing a private organization is completely different from administering a public organization. Public or private organizations are social units established for accomplishing pre- determined objectives, and in accomplishing their objectives, they both employ the very same techniques and processes. In this sense, administration is a universal phenomenon. But this does not necessarily mean that there are no differences between public and private organizations with regard to their administration. So, to sum up if we consider administration to be an 'activity or process mainly concerned with the means for carrying out prescribed ends' as stated earlier, we can identify organizations to be those institutions and agencies and domains where the activities and processes of administration takes place in order to meet the desired ends. 209 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) 1.5 Politics and Administration Woodrow Wilson outlined what later happened to be called the politics-administration dichotomy, a theoretical model that emphasizes distinct features of public administration vis-a-vis politics. In Wilson's words, public administration "lies outside the proper sphere of politics". The politics-administration dichotomy rests on a functional-structural view of government, dividing governmental authority between elected and administrative officials along functional lines As such, Demir points out that the government is conceptualized as though it has two discrete domains as politics and administration, with each one occupied separately by elected and administrative officials. To better understand the relationship between politics and administration, we can discuss their correlation from various perspectives: Separation of Politics and Administration- This school of thought treats public administration as a world in its own with values, rules, and methods divorced from those of politics. As understood by the separation school proponents, primary values that guide public administration include neutrality, hierarchy, and expertise, which altogether refer to a defining feature of public administration: neutral competence. The overarching goal of public administrators is to provide neutral and competent policy advice to elected officials. In Kaufman's (1956) words, neutral competence is "the ability to do the work of government expertly, and to do it according to explicit, objective standards rather than to personal or party or other obligations and loyalties". Three constitutive components of neutral competence, neutrality, expertise, and hierarchy, help public administrators maintain distance from politics while ensuring their contributions to policymaking process. The proponents of the separation school express support for a clear structural division of authority between elected and administrative officials to eliminate or minimize undue political influences on public administration as well as potential conflicts. For example, Svara emphasizes the strength of a structural division (best exemplified in council-manager form of 3 government), "in council-manager cities, friction is reduced when responsibilities are divided in a way that limits interference by one set of officials in the activities of others. In such a system of divided authority, Montjoy and Watson (1995) state, "neither individual members nor the whole council bypass the manager in giving directions to the staff". Hierarchical nature of the administrative organization helps minimize undue political influences over public administrators, while policymaking prerogative of elected officials proves to be highly effective in resolving conflicts on disputable policy issues (e.g., Abney and Lauth 1982; Koehler 1973; Svara 1990; Miller 2000). Political 210 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) influences on public administrators are considered to be leading to corruption, that is, making of administrative decisions on the basis of partisan political considerations. Martin posits that the leading assumption that inspires the proponents of this school is that "politics and administration work best as independent variables, capable of being improved in isolation without endangering or interfering with the other side". The school draws attention to the potential negative consequences of free interaction between politics and administration. Svara notes that "there are cases of cities controlled by an appointed manager who cannot be challenged because of longevity or community support." In his words, "the manager has become the master to whom the board defers out of respect and dependency". On the other end of the spectrum, we have another school of thought which rejects the separation of politics from administration but emphasizes and supports a broad policy role for public administration. Tansu Demir calls them the scholars of the political school, those who acknowledge and second the role of politics in administration. The political school proponents consider public administration as an inseparable part of the political process. The political school takes administrative discretion as a point of departure to rationalize the policy role of public administrators. Of many reasons, vague and ambiguous legislations, lack of technical knowledge and resources available to elected officials, and difficulties in monitoring and controlling bureaucratic behaviour are a few used to signify the critical role of public administrators in the policy process. Consequently, for political school proponents, there are strong grounds to view public administrators as policy makers (e.g., Lipsky, 1980). Some public administration scholars, representing the political school, rest their arguments on pragmatic grounds. In their view, political power in the U.S. governmental structure is widely diffused, and this fact makes it essential for public administrators to engage in politics, and build and maintain coalitions (e.g., Long, 1954). Abney and Lauth, among others, even argue in favour of interest group-public administration interaction on the belief that interest groups complement the electoral process, which has certain deficiencies. Finally, we must consider another school of thought that proposes a limited yet meaningful interaction and positive relationship between politics and administration. This school's viewpoint is best reflected in the opinion of Van Riper who believed- As we all should know by now, politics and administration are inextricably intermixed. Both are central to effective action. One problem is to bring them together in a symbiotic association yet keep each in its proper place. The other is to understand that the "proper place" of each will vary through time. There is no permanent solution, no fixed paradigm, to this or any other ends means continuum. The interaction school allows a broader policy role for public administrators for mostly pragmatic reasons. 211 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Our attention, by this school, is drawn to the increasing complexity and dynamism in the political, social, and economic environment of policymaking, a fact that makes intense interaction between elected and administrative officials an essential requirement for success. In the ideal world of political-administrative world, as envisioned by the interaction school, public administrators maintain a productive partnership with elected officials, partnering with, informing and helping them in the policy process, yet remain accountable and responsive to their elected officials. Cognizant of the risk that intense interaction between elected and administrative officials may fuel negative dynamics that might eventually lead to political corruption or administrative tyranny, the interaction school finds the assurance in the interaction process itself, that is, in the interplay of different roles creating a restraining effect of reciprocating values. As such, in the end, one should expect both administrative competence and political responsiveness to reach their fullest potential. 1.6 Conclusion We have so far seen the broad spectrum of politics and various perspectives of what it entails, ranging from the broader realm of state and power to the narrower individual, personal level and we focused more on the 'public' nature and domain of politics. Likewise, we have seen that administration too is a complex process which often goes hand in hand with management and governance of organizations, and the focus of this module has been on public administration and public organizations. Finally, we have dealt with three schools of thought related to the relationship between politics and administration, and perhaps finding that a healthy, positive, progressive interplay between them, is necessary for the proper development of the system and delivery of welfare services. 1.7 Summary ? In this unit, we understood that politics requires the grasping of its conceptions along a spectrum from narrower to broader conceptions of what constitutes politics. ? Along with the conceptions of politics, we also understood the various notions of "administration" and the meaning of "organization" or the "management" of an organization. ? We analysed the relationship between politics and administration and examined how politics-administration dichotomy and politics-administration support for a broad policy role, both play an important role.

However the fulfilment of demands require extensive planning, careful implementation, monitoring and evaluation of various programmes, and requires technical and practical expertise which the politicians may not have. To help them in their efforts, the bureaucrats and the bureaucracy provide the essential backbone needed to manifest into reality the broad vision of the parties and politicians. However, this does not necessarily mean that bureaucrats are subservient to politicians in all circumstances. Ideally, they work hand in hand with the politicians who win elections, to help realize the demands of the people. Politicians who do not form the government, also play a valuable role of

215 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) maintaining vigil and balance in democracy. In this unit we will familiarize ourselves with the role of politicians, the role of bureaucrats and examine the essential relationship between the two. 2.3 Who are the politicians? A politician is someone who may be involved in the governance of a country, or at the least, the politics of the nation. He or she is a member of a political party. In democracies, politicians are mostly elected or those who contest elections with the hope of coming to occupy state power. Their role as elected representatives makes them very important, since they provide a 'reality check' on policy and decision- making. Political leadership within government department represents the crucial element of democracy, which separates government departments from the mere function of administration. The role of ministers, as politicians, is therefore a critical and necessary element of governance. Politicians can bring a range of skills and attributes to-public policy, including decisiveness, ideological cohesiveness, political understanding, leadership, partnership, communication, the ability to balance interests, accountability, legitimacy and insights from their experience as representatives. First and foremost, politicians are meant to be the guardians of democracy. In practice, though, being rsponsible for everything is not an easy task. Various constitutional provisions or the lack thereof, may restrict the accountability of legislators and politicians. Secondly, politicians are expected to apply their knowledge and political ideology to policy making. However, the bureaucrats do enjoy a near monopoly on policy advice, and ministerial engagement is generally confined to being presented with blue- print of plans at the last minute. Thirdly, politicians are expected to use their vast experience and knowledge gained as constituency MPs to inform on public policy decisions. However, when taking office, their experiences may be restricted; their diaries may be filled by bureaucratic advice and engagement, and they may lack the time and resources to drive transformation in society. Politicians bring a wide range of abilities, experience, and personality traits to solve a problem. Some of the characteristics that set politicians apart from other authorities have little to do with their skills and abilities, but rather with the unique nature of their position. Decision making ability or being decisive, is another crucial characteristic of politicians. The ability to bring insights from their political philosophy, a sense for what is politically necessary, practical, and acceptable, providing leadership, forming 216 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) partnerships, political communication, the ability to balance interests, accountability legitimacy and insights from their role as an MP, such as case work and constituency encounters, all make them invaluable within the polity. It is unrealistic to expect a single minister to be proficient in all of these areas. However, because the successful delivery of public policy and services is dependent in part on the exercise of these skills, it is critical to consider not only how to improve politicians' skills, but also how to ensure that both the pool from which ministers are drawn and the methods of recruiting and promoting ministers meet this need. Politicians who are not affiliated with the government also have a huge impact. They make up the opposition to the prevailing government and act as a political counterweight to it. The opposition's major role is to question the present administration and hold it accountable to the public. This also helps to correct the flaws of the ruling party. The political leaders of the opposition bear equal responsibility for safeguarding the best interests of the country's population. In the West, the concept of resistance is rarely questioned. It is supposed to facilitate representation and channel a variety of needs in favourable directions. The opposition plays a crucial role in representing individuals who have been marginalised by the ruling party. One of the hallmarks of democratic administration is that, while it serves all interests simultaneously, it does not favour one group over another for lengthy periods of time. A politician in the opposition aims to represent interests as the basis for the survival of the ideals to which they adhere, rather than opposing government on moral grounds. It can do so by advocating the rights of those who have been deprived and offering the government alternative policies. The opposition provides information about public opinion on a topic that would otherwise be unavailable to the administration. In many such ways, politicians of the opposition too plays an effective role on the adoption of official policies. 2.4 Who are the bureaucrats ? A bureaucracy is a system for administrating huge groups of individuals who must collaborate. Bureaucracies are essential to the functioning of both public and private sector organisations, including colleges and governments. The term "bureaucracy" literally means "ruling by desks or offices," a meaning that emphasises bureaucrat's typically impersonal nature. Despite the fact bureaucrats can appear inefficient or wasteful at times, they help to ensure that thousands of people work together in a harmonious manner by outlining everyone's tasks within a hierarchy. Government officials are responsible for a wide range of responsibilities. Bureaucrats aren't just paper pushers; they also battle fires, teach, and keep track of how federal

217 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriculum (Dt. 17.10.2022) politicians gather money, among other things. A bureaucrat's job is to put government policy into action, to put laws and decisions made by elected authorities into action. Bureaucracy and its advantages ? Power division: Facilitates decentralised work and encourages functional specialisation. ? Productivity: Competence is developed, and work is carried out efficiently under the direction of direct supervisors in the hierarchy. ? Accountability and compliance: Ordinary citizens have the ability to hold government officials and bureaucrats accountable for their actions while performing their duties. Various instruments like RTI, institutions like Lokpal, have empowered the citizens to keep a vigil. ? Decision-making authority: Bureaucrats are typically delegated decision-making authority by their immediate superiors, while senior management officials are delegated decision-making authority by those higher up in the hierarchy. ? Rules and regulations: A collection of clearly defined rules and regulations makes adherence to them an obligation within the bureaucratic system, restricting the scope of noncompliance with the framework of rules and protocols. ? Ease of management: Makes administration easier by logically organising the organisation in a hierarchical structure. Because of the organization's size, maintaining control of management, making required changes as needed, and adopting new regulations as needed is made easier under a bureaucratic structure. Lacunae or disadvantages of Bureaucracy ? Red tape: Bureaucracy, by definition, is governed by a set of rules and regulations. This leads to a lack of flexibility and, more often than not, inefficiency. ? Bureaucratic delays: The complex set of regulations that govern a bureaucratic system frequently results in lengthy delays. ? Corruption at the highest levels of government: Corruption at the highest levels of government can be tremendously damaging to the economy and society. ? Goals shift: Working in a bureaucratic system may be inefficient with the changing of targets, and maintaining rules and regulations frequently takes precedence over the end result. ? Documentation: Even for seemingly simple procedures, a significant amount of documentation may be required. ? Segmentation: Because jobs are divided into specific groups, collaboration and completion of work in other categories are restricted.

218 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriculum (Dt. 17.10.2022) ? Nepotism: Nepotism is a problem in many bureaucracies. Top executives may favour their own and help them advance more quickly than more deserving individuals. ? Decision-making: Decisions are made according to a set of rules and regulations in the bureaucracy. This rigidity frequently leads to the adoption of pre- programmed decisions rather than the exploration of other options and practical out of the box solutions. 2.5 Relation between the Politicians and Bureaucrats The relationship between politicians and bureaucrats is crucial because they jointly make up the government's executive branch and also work for public good. The administration does not run well if there are issues in the relationship between the two. We take a deeper look at the connection between politicians and permanent officials ie. bureaucrats via three lenses: relationship during policy formulation, relationship during policy implementation, and overview of their relationship problems. Previously, it was thought that policy was formulated by politicians, and that there was no separation of functions. Reportedly, projects are sanctioned faster in constituencies with strong party ties, this suggests that bureaucrats perform better in areas where politicians have a larger chance of winning. These findings are consistent with the dynamic contracts mechanism when combined with the results of the natural experiment: legislators in low-competition constituencies have longer tenures and have access to dynamic contracts that provide stronger incentives to bureaucrats. As a result, bureaucratic performance improves. However, if the chances of winning become nil, the promise of future benefits becomes untrustworthy, and officials take longer to approve projects. This is true in case of most countries: politicians and bureaucrats work together on policy formulation and implementation. It has been well established that the bureaucracy plays a crucial role in policy formulation, particularly in developing countries. Public policy emerges from interactions between individuals and groups, on the one hand, and politicians and bureaucrats, on the other. All of these actors try to influence each other and communicate for the achievement of theirs aims, during their interaction. Politicians maintain regular contact with the public, and citizens attempt to voice their specific interests through interest groups. Still, the truth remains that political parties and politicians play a crucial role in organising the people and giving voice to their demands and frustrations. As a result, sometimes politicians are perceived as being aligned with specific groups and interests. However, the bureaucracy is often

219 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) regarded as neutral, although it too works for public interest, it does not have the incentive to work for particular interests groups at the cost of others. Sometimes interest groups and municipal and panchayati raj institutions may be weak, in such cases the bureaucracy acts as the primary conduit for relaying the public's perceived requirements to the government. As a result, while both politicians and civil officials serve as links in the communication line between the public and the government, bureaucrats frequently regard politicians as their masters, due to their positions in various ministries. Politicians, on the other hand, have a tendency to feel that bureaucrats are unresponsive and indifferent to the people's issues and requirements and therefore they tend to give orders to the bureaucrats for effective implementation of policies. The cultural and status gaps between the senior bureaucracy and the general public exacerbate this view. At the same time, political and bureaucratic communication channels do cross paths at various locations. As a result, despite their rather disparate duties and perspectives, politicians and bureaucrats must work together at all levels of the government and even at a broader societal arena. Politicians and bureaucrats are both reservoirs of many forms of data and have a plethora of experience, and both are required in the creation of policy and such formulations. Civil officials typically have more experience and maintain their mastery of organisational memory in the form of files and other records. As a result, they can provide useful feedback on the outcomes of previous initiatives as well as ongoing programmes. Based on these findings, policy can be developed: changes can be made to avoid previous errors or difficulties. Politicians, on the other hand, are more likely to accurately judge public sentiment; in particular, they are expected to know what the real demands are, and what the public would not tolerate. Following the assessment of the ruling politicians, bureaucrats can proceed to give policy suggestions concrete form in the form of new programmes or budget proposals. If politicians' assessments are incorrect, voters may punish them in the next election. The successful functioning of local self-government authorities such as municipalities and Panchayati Raj bodies required cooperation between politicians and public officials. However, in developing nations like India, these committees are often so weak that makes then rely on civil workers who work for the state government. As a result, local politicians may have limited authority over the permanent bureaucrats who serve local governments. When various parties are in power at the state and local levels, state officials tend to use the bureaucracy in the field to further the party's political agenda.
220 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) However, it is beyond doubt that, the bureaucracy is primarily responsible for providing legal form to a policy. The various ministries prepare a draft of the law when the cabinet approves a policy. The idea is next assessed by bureaucrats and the ministers who made the proposal. While cooperation between politicians and government workers is essential, it is also critical to recognise the value of those who design the legislation. The legal terminology of the bill determines the specifications of the policy as it is implemented. While politicians play a prominent role in policy making, the bureaucracy plays a larger role in execution and implementation of the same. Bureaucrats work at all levels, but politicians only head departments as ministers. Top-level bureaucrats advise ministers and administer ministries, middle-level bureaucrats supervise field officials and keep the top informed of developments of various programmes, and field officials such as cops, tax collectors, and factory inspectors implement the law at the grassroots. It would be a mistake, however, to believe that politicians play no influence in implementation. The minister is the department's political leader, and he is responsible for the department's policies as well as their implementation. If something goes wrong, he is questioned before the legislature about the intricacies of implementation. 2.6 Conclusion We can understand that politicians and bureaucrats both play a significant role in the determination, implementation, and performance of public policies. The politicians who are elected to the government must work hand in hand with the bureaucracy to effectively implement their vision and serve the demands of the public. On the other hand, the politicians who do not get elected, also serve as a check and balance by creating pressure on the government and bureaucracy to perform and serve the needs of the public. Thus, both politicians and bureaucrats serve the needs of the nation and need to work transparently with each other for the progress and success of various programmes and meeting the demands of the populace and the interests of the nation. 2.7 Summary ? In this unit, we understood who are the politicians, their role and functions, ? Along with the conceptions of politics, we also understood the role of the bureaucrats and the "administration". ? We understood some of the key advantages and disadvantages of the bureaucracy.

States are not keepers of the law and order. States nowadays not only protect and restrain but also promote and foster. Even in Western developed nations a policy battle has started since 2008, for which the function of ministers working for the states has grown critical. Ministers may or may not be the epitome of knowledge and competence. Anyone over the age of twenty five can be elected to Parliament and if luck favours then a minister afterwards. A person who is socially visible and skilled at canvassing or manoeuvring can sweep the polls. Administration necessitates knowledge that a minister may lack. As a result, he relies on his secretaries, who have undergone rigorous training after their recruitment and experienced the inside out of department. Secretaries and other high-ranking officials in the department provide the ministers with sound advice. In fact, they set the policy, and the minister usually signs on the

223 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) dotted line. Though the secretaries chalk out the details, he sets the broad strokes of policy. Political execution also takes tact, courage and talent, all of which the civil service possesses in spades. If they find a proposal unsustainable, they can point out shortcomings to the minister without hesitation and offer policy changes. The political and permanent executive pillars underpin the government's operation. The seamless operation of this system is dependent on both of them having a cordial working connection. In recent years, the administrative and political climate have altered, causing problems in the interaction between the two groups. Issues are likely to arise as a result of their diverse functions. Politicians represent the people and watch out for their interests; permanent officials, on the other hand, provide expertise and experience. As a result, their recruitment techniques are different: politicians are elected, whereas bureaucrats are appointed. This helps to explain their differences in social background. While the majority of officials in emerging countries like India come from the paid or professional urban middle class, many politicians originate from the rural, agrarian class. Differences in their perceptions are caused by a variety of factors, including their roles and social backgrounds. As a result, it can be challenging to work with others at times. Let us begin by looking at the connection between the political executive and civil officials, and lastly assess their relationship in the context of public administration. 3.3 Ministers and Civil Servants In a parliamentary style of government, such as India's, there are two sorts of relationships that must be maintained in order for the government to work smoothly and efficiently. The ministers and the civil servants the two pillars of the parliamentary form of government, and any weakness in either of them will have a negative impact on the government's performance. In theory, political and permanent executives have different roles in government, but in fact, their responsibilities often overlap, making it difficult to distinguish between them. As a result, while both politicians and civil officials serve as links in the communication chain between the public and the government, civil servants frequently regard politicians as little more than rabble rousers. Politicians, on the other hand, have a tendency to assume that bureaucrats are unresponsive and insensitive to the public issues and demands. The cultural and status gaps between the upper bureaucracy and the general public exacerbate this view. At the same time, political and bureaucratic communication channels must cross paths at various locations. As a result, despite their rather disparate duties and perspectives, politicians and civil workers must work together at all levels.

224 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Politicians and civil officials must also work together on the ground. A Deputy Commissioner and a Member of Parliament, for example, are both concerned with the many policies relating to the development of a specific area. Despite the fact that district planning has yet to become a reality, district politicians and civil workers do make ideas that are considered by higher-level authorities. Politicians and government servants working together yield better results. The successful functioning of local self-government authorities such as municipalities and Panchayati Raj bodies requires cooperation between politicians and public officials. However, in developing nations like India, these committees are frequently so weak that they must rely on civil workers who work for the state government. As a result, local politicians frequently have limited authority over the permanent bureaucrats who serve local governments. When various parties are in power at the state and local levels, state officials tend to use the bureaucracy in the field to further their own party's goals. The ultimate solution to such issues is the strengthening of local governance. This is a key part of the political growth that is required. Politicians and civil servants are both reservoirs of many forms of data, and both are required in the creation of policy. Civil servants typically have more experience, and they also maintain track of their organizational memory in the form of files and other records. As a result, they can provide useful feedback on the outcomes of previous initiatives as well as ongoing programmes. Now, based on these findings, policy can be developed: changes can be made to avoid previous errors or difficulties. Politicians, on the other hand, are more likely to accurately judge public sentiment; in particular, they are expected to know what the public would not tolerate. As a result, providing more or better social services, such as education and health care, would require money that would have to come from the people in the form of taxes. Following the assessment of the ruling politicians, civil employees can proceed to give policy suggestions in concrete form i.e., in the form of new programmes or budget proposals. It is critical to recognize that the majority of the issues that arise in developing countries such as India are mostly due to underdevelopment. The sevral characteristics of underdevelopment are linked. Underdevelopment in the economic, social, political, and administrative realms all impact and are interlinked as cause and consequence. As a result, the solution to administrative difficulties can rarely be treated in isolation. 3.4 Relationship between ministers and civil servants : Some cases In practice, there is a lot of distrust, tension, unease, and unfaithfulness in the relationship between the minister and the civil servant. For a developing country like

225 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriculum (Dt. 17.10.2022) India, it is even more critical that all parties work together in harmony, with complete respect for one another, in order to reach a common goal. Interference by ministers and other politicians in administrative tasks on behalf of their party members, friends and relatives is a major source of low morale in the civil service. The civil worker's approach to lawmakers and political bosses for postings, transfers and promotion complicates the relationship between ministers and civil servants. Although the occurrence is not very common it does exist. However, it is at best a half-truth, as it simply presents one side of the story- that of the politician. In reality, it takes two to make a deal, and in some circumstances, the legislator contacts the other party first, while in other cases, the civil servant approaches first. However, it is often assumed that the legislator approaches the official for some favour, both being aware of the former's political clout. When a government official helps him, it's normal for him to expect something in return. While politicians play a prominent role in policy making, the bureaucracy plays a larger role in execution. Civil employees work at all levels, but politicians only head departments as ministers. Top-level bureaucrats advise ministers, middle-level bureaucrats supervise field officials and keep the top informed of developments and field officials such as cops, tax collectors and factory inspectors implement the law. It would be a mistake, however to believe that politicians do not influence implementation. The minister is the department's political leader and he is responsible for the department's policies as well as implementation. The minister's job is to make sure that civil officials in their department follow the law and that no one, whether a client or a bureaucrat is treated unfairly. The minister must guarantee that policies are implemented legally, effectively and efficiently. If the minister tries to impose his or her will on officials performing quasi-judicial functions, such as serving on a tribunal, if he/she withdraws assigned powers from officials in specific circumstances and if he or she acts in a partisan or selfish manner, the minister merits censure. There are certain areas where politician and civil servants collectively carry out tasks of government such as— i) Rule implementation and making— while the legislation grants the government the power to enact rules and regulations, this power is primarily exercised by civil servants. The rationale for this is because public officials have the specialized knowledge, experience and extensive information required to draught rules. The minister is unlikely to have either the specialized knowledge or the time to do this himself, he is preoccupied with his political responsibilities, such as dealing with delegations of the people, investigating complaints and so on. ii) Supervision and Evaluation— In India's government, monitoring is often lax. The fundamental reason for this is because superior authorities have very little real 226 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) influence over their subordinates in terms of rewarding or penalizing them. Promotion is primarily based on seniority, especially at lower levels and superiors cannot grant any other incentives. In terms of punishment, the process for instituting disciplinary action is lengthy, taking months, if not years before a final decision is reached. Another and perhaps more crucial cause for today's weak oversight is the protection that politicians frequently provide to government officials over the heads of their supervisors. Politicians frequently offer such assistance to civil officials in the hopes of gaining their support during election season. Every programme should be assessed once it is completed to ensure that the objectives were met, that the job was completed efficiently and that no dishonesty occurred. Superior officials in the department are the ones who make the evaluations first and foremost. If the minister takes interest in the review, makes time to see the reports and requires an explanation for non-performence the evaluation will be more effctive. The Planning Commission, for example, was an overhead (or staff) agency that used to evaluate policies and programmes. As a result, the Planning Commission was to review previous policies in the document containing the new plan at the start of each plan period. The Planning Commission was made up of politicians and specialists, with high-ranking bureaucrats assisting them. The Planning Commission has now been replaced by Niti Aayog, a now State Resource Centre. Niti Aayog is new serving as the apex public policy think tank of the central government fostering the notion of cooperative federalism using a bottom-up approach to cater to demographic dividend and socio-economic requirements. This body is made up of political and non-political wings of govrnment providing directional and policy inputs. iii) Administrative management— The overall management of an organisation is referred to as the administrative management. The ministries or departments of finance, planning, personnel and administrative reform or reorganization (in the Union and state governments, respectively) are the primary agencies in India for this purpose. The Planning Commission as well as state planning boards and Public Service Commissions play a role in controlling the governmental organization as a whole. While line agencies such as the Ministries of Defense, Industry and Health are responsible for the management of programmes or projects that help the government achieve its substantive goals, administrative management is concerned with the organisation, financing, planning and staffing of ministries and departments in general. Effective administration management is required for effective policy and programme implementation. Administrative management is often overlooked because more essential concerns such as defence, employment and maintaining law and order are prioritized. Administrative management does not get the attention it deserves at the political level.

227 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) As a result, many of the Administrative Reforms Commission's recommendations have yet to be implemented. As we already discussed inspite of harmony that exist, there are distrust and areas of tension too. Take for example, the event that occurred in 1966, when Home Minister Gulzari Lal Nanda criticized the Home Secretary for non-cooperation and demanded that he be replaced by the then Prime Minister; however, the request was denied, and the Home Minister resigned from the cabinet. In 1971, a disagreement arose between Railway Minister K. Hanumanthaiya and Chairman of the Railway Board B.C. Ganguli over the railway's financial administration. The government terminated B.C. Ganguli's services in this case. Rajiv Gandhi, the then-Prime Minister, clashed with the Agriculture Department Secretary (C.S. Shastri), the Rural Development Secretary (D. Bandyopadhyay), and the Foreign Secretary in 1987. In 1993, there was also a disagreement between the Home Minister and the Home Secretary, which resulted in the latter's resignation. The following are the grounds for the relapse of this connection between ministers and public servants: a) Interference complex- Fred Riggs created the phrase 'interference complex' to describe politicians' complaints about 'bureaucratic intervention' and 'administrators' counter-complaints about 'political interference'. These politicians frequently allege that the bureaucracy sabotage progressive social change ideas and programmes. Civil servants on the other hand, frequently claim that legislators and ministers engage in patronage by interfering with the recruitment, selection, transfer, and advancement of government personnel in order to gain support during election season. Both of these complaints have some merit. The urban professional middle class ornaments the majority of the seats of our higher bureaucracy. As a result, the majority of the population which consist of farmers and labourers remains underrepresented on it. As a result, the bureaucracy's attitude may differ from the aspirations of the majority of the population. To some extent, the solution to this problem resides in the implementation of tests for assessing various intellectual physical and psychological aspects of the candidates' personalities at the time of initial selection. Strengthening interest groups and political parties can help to solve the problem of political patronage to some extent. b) Bureaucratic power- Authors like Riggs, Weidner and Heady observed that bureaucracies in underdeveloped countries tended to be more powerful than those in rich countries. The stronger the bureaucracy's influence, the more difficult it is for politicians to exert control over it. As a result, the civil and military bureaucracies in developing countries have a proclivity for dictatorship.

228 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) The bureaucracy must be appropriately managed by elected representatives of the people in democratic administration. c) Civil servants should be evaluated objectively and this will only be possible if ministers have the will, as well as the talent and sense of direction, to steer the administrative horse in the right direction; only then will the system work smoothly, Members of the bureaucracy should be dedicated to buman and constitutional principles as well as national goals, They're expected to be immuned from the influence of the political parties. However, in the recent past, there have been concerns that certain powerful politicians have demanded loyalty from the bureaucracy for their party and themselves. As a consequence of this, members of the bureaucracy hav complained that theey were unable to freely express their opinions with the ruling politicians during the emergency. Some civil servants, due to compromised accountability have failed to balance between the values of The Shah Commission in this regard noted that in some situations the administration and administrators ceased to be insulated from politics with fatal results. This is a reality in USA also, where public service is often a political creation. d) The power game in politics has increased in India since the 1980s, when the Era of Coalition Governments began. Money and criminals gained more clout in politics as a result. The 1993 Vohra Committee Report focused on the criminalization of politics. This committee has noticed that criminals got rich benefit from the ruling party's patronage because they helped them win elections. Ministers and civil servants also join forces to commit grand theft. Moreover, Ministers in a coalition government are preoccupied with maintaining their majority in the Lok Sabha. As a result, they offer their departments less attention. The legislative process is also unclear and full of varied viewpoints due to the involvement of a number of parties with opposing viewpoints. As a result, ambiguous language is frequently employed to keep the coalition together, and administrators must interpret the policy based on their own assumptions. 3.5 Conclusion For effective and efficient administration, cooperation between politicians and bureaucrats is required. Both serve as conduits for information between the government and the general public. Civil employees receive crucial feedback while politicians gauge the public sentiment. Civil officials conduct a variety of technical reviews of proposed programmes. Politicians, primarily in the cabinet, and civil officials, through staff agencies, coordinate policies and programmes. Laws are mostly drafted by government workers, although they are passed by legislators.

Problems in their interaction can be resolved in the long run by increasing local self- government, interest groups, and political parties, or in other words, by developing these areas. 3.6 Summary ? So far we have understood that the relationship between ministers and civil servants is of mutual dependence. It has to work collectively to not only implement policies but also evaluate and to monitor them. Administrative management is one key area which needs focus from both the parties. ? Though there are certain drawbacks in terms of interference, impartiality and power game in politics there is still scope for improvement in areas of governance. ? We also understood that none of the parties can act in isolation in matters pertaining to public because both the parties are at the service of public which needs proper guidance to meet the demands. 3.7 Glossary ? In the wake of 'grey government' by bureaucrats where great days of legislature and executives seems to have passed, there has been a shift which various scholars and writers refer to as: technocracy, mandarin power, administrative state, bureaucratic government, managerial professional state, technocracy to name but a few. The common key idea is that there has been a dynamic change in domain of public and in bureaucracy which no longer adheres to traditional models of state and party which has therefore called for need to formulate new policies congenial to modern state. Generally old models perish but few nor die nor fades away which is

232 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) true in case of models of democratic government that associates significance to formal representative bodies in formulating policy which designate public bureaucrats to compliant roles as mere administrator. B. Guy Peters argues that European juridical tradition of public servant and American tradition of civil servant renounce active role of civil servant in policy-making. He further adds that this myth serves politician in justifying their role and to bureaucrats in averting responsibility for actions. Adequate conceptualization of this shift in power and institutional politics is yet to develop. The rise of the bureaucratic organization in modern governments has paved the way for a cadre of government employees who work for the government full-time. The mere presence of such trained professional body is intended to have a rational influence on the entire policy-making process. This unit will attempt to demonstrate that the government is heavily reliant on bureaucracy in formulating policy for public. We'll talk about what bureaucracy means, its roles and importance. Further its relationship with the public will be discussed. 4.3 Concept of Bureaucracy Vincent de Gournay (1712-1759), a French civil official and physiocrat, is credited with coining the term 'bureaucracy'. In 1745, he coined the term bureau mania to describe the French administration, which was plagued by red tape, formality, hierarchy, and laziness. Prior to Weber's development of the notion of bureaucracy in the 1920s, Georg Wilhelm, Friedrich Hegel and Karl Marx had proposed the term. The theory of bureaucracy was developed by Hegel in his concept of the idealist state. He did not, however, propose a well-structured idea of bureaucracy; in fact, for some, it is as broad as Weber's. Hegel, like Marx, was not particularly interested in bureaucracy, but he developed it as part of a greater interest in investigating the essence of the state. According to Hegel, the state is the final evolution in a succession of logical social structures, with the family and civil society being the other two. Once the state is created, it is expected to offer the conditions for the unconscious and specifically oriented acts to become self-aware and public-spirited over time. The prince, the estates' deputies, and the bureaucrats are all political actors in Hegel's eyes. He elevated the concept of bureaucracy to abstract heights in his Philosophy of Right (1921), describing it as a transcending entity, a mind above human brain. He defined it as civil society's 'state formalism' and state authority as a company. The Marxist Point of View : Karl Marx's writings do not provide an in-depth treatment of bureaucracy. Because of his concentration with political economics, he couldn't even attempt a systematic analysis of the state. However, his first substantial work after his doctoral dissertation, "Contribution to the Critique of Hegel's Philosophy of

233 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) Law" (1843), is primarily concerned with the state. We can discover some brief remarks on bureaucracy in this book. Marx looked at bureaucracy in the framework of the capitalist state and its bureaucracy. He derived the concept of bureaucracy from the connection between power-holding institutions, particularly the state, and the social groups that were subservient to it. The significance of Marx's critique of bureaucracy resides in his assertion that bureaucratic organisations do not automatically reflect, but rather corrupt and disfigure, the underlying social power relations. Thus, bureaucracy is the picture of a dominant social authority, distorted by its universality claim. The Weberian Bureaucratic Model : Max Weber, a German historian and sociologist, is credited with developing a theory of bureaucracy. His idea of bureaucracy laid the groundwork for a slew of future works on the subject. Max Weber was the first to mention bureaucracy as a significant improvement over government. He gave a thorough analysis of the nature of bureaucracy, as well as the various forms of bureaucratic organisations and thought. Bureaucracy, he said, is one of the most sensible and efficient ways to organize power. Weber discussed bureaucracy as part of a larger discussion of power, authority, and legitimacy. It's worth mentioning that he distinguished between power and authority based on legitimacy. According to him, if the people who are subjected to the power (even if it is exerted against their choice) regard it as proper or appropriate, it becomes legitimate and becomes the shape of authority. The distinguishing characteristics of bureaucracy according to Weber, set it apart from other sort of organisations based on nonlegal forms of authority. The advantage of bureaucracy, according to Weber is that it is most technologically proficient type of organisation, with specialized competence, certainty, continuity and unity. The rise of a money-based economy (which eventually led to the creation of capitalism) and the concomitant necessity for impersonal, rational-legal transactions ushered in the rise of bureaucracy as a favoured form of organisation. Instrumental organisations (e.g., public-stock commercial corporations) emerged quickly as a result of their bureaucratic structure which allowed them to handle the different demands of capitalist production more efficiently than small scale producers. Nonetheless, the terms bureaucracy and bureaucrat are frequently associated with negative connotations. They evoke images of bureaucracy, numerous rules and regulations, a lack of creativity, a lack of individual discretion, central control and a lack of accountability. Far from being portrayed as competent, popular modern depictions frequently portray bureaucracies as inefficient and unadaptable. Because the features that constitute bureaucracy's organizational advantages also include the potential for organizational failure, both flattering and unpleasant portrayals of bureaucracy can be valid. As a

234 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curretion (Dt. 17.10.2022) result, the qualities that make bureaucracies effective may also cause organizational disorders. 4.4 Notion of the Public The concept of the 'public' is the most basic of all political concepts, because it is only through the shared relationship it creates between rulers and ruled that government becomes more than just dominance. It's hardly surprising, then, that the subject of how to define the public sphere has occupied political intellectuals from Plato to more current philosophers like Hannah Arendt. Although the answers they have given have varied widely, what is relevant in the present context is simply the idea that there could be an answer, which has been held for well over two thousand years. What is novel today, on the other hand, is the growing realisation that political theory cannot, in principle, provide philosophical guidance of any kind about how the public realm can be finally and definitively identified, in a way that clearly distinguishes it from the private realm and thus allows an unquestionable limit to the proper scope of politics and state action to be set. Take a look at some of the most prevalent distinctions made between private and public codes. Access and visibility in both places are governed by laws. The public realm is often open to all members of the general public. Of course, who is to be classified as a member is a determining factor. It is objective, frequently incorporated in the constitution and protected by law, and it does not rely on arbitrary instantaneous judgements. Access to the private realm, on the other hand, is determined by the owner's subjective discretion. One must knock before entering a private home. Following this line of logic, one can look for comparable terminology in the public and private sectors, respectively. The public is impersonal and signifies separation, whereas the private implies closeness and solitude. Predetermined laws and bureaucracy define the public domain, whereas creativity defines the private sphere. The private market is a free-flowing "persons" exchange. It is a public activity in which individuals' representatives make decisions that influence collectives and individual groups (person). True, state authority is frequently referred to as 'public' but it is this aspect of the public realm that gives it primary responsibility for the well-being of all residents. Only when the exercise of political control is properly subordinated to the democratic demand for public access to information does the political public sphere achieve institutionalized authority over the government through the instrument of law-making bodies. The duty of criticism and control that a public body of citizens undertakes informally and formally in periodic elections against the ruling structure established in the shape of a state is referred to as "public opinion."

235 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriculum (Dt. 17.10.2022) 4.5 Relationship between the Bureaucracy and the Public As the concept was developed by Weber, bureaucracy was meant to be the highest level of development of rational-legal governance. He said, bureaucracy must impart greater equality and greater transparency as compared to traditional forms of governance which it has replaced rather than oppressing the public. Bureaucracy is a link between the public and private sectors. It's critical for managing contracts and collaborations, as well as establishing link between social actors' networks and the public sector. Finally, it's helpful to envisage life without bureaucracy in order to appreciate its benefits. It would be a world without consistency, without continuity, and without competence. Although we loathe bureaucracy, we would despise a world without it even more. Bureaucrats undertake both 'output' functions, such as implementing policies and programmes, and 'input' functions, which include not only policy making but also shaping public perceptions of the government. The bureaucrats' main responsibilities are to: (i) carry out the government's policies and instructions, (ii) maintain and keep in order the general administrative apparatus under its official charge, and (iii) provide advice to the political executives on norms of procedure, regulation, and so on. Most developing countries' administrative systems follow the colonial administration's model. Several countries, however, have recently made significant reforms to restructure their administrative organisations. This has been impacted by a variety of domestic causes, such as the desire to fulfill the government's responsibility in providing services to the people, as well as external forces, such as increasing regional and international interactions and the impact of globalization. Similarly, the requirements imposed on developing countries by donor countries and agencies have attempted to modify the administrative characteristics of these countries, particularly the relationship between public officials and politicians. Some of these initiatives, however, have yet to generate the expected results, owing to distrust generally associated with ideas and recommendations from external parties, particularly former colonial powers. Second, because most donor-driven reforms are based on incorporating private sector practices into public sectors, the limited success can also be attributed to a simplistic approach that ignores the private sector's understanding and practice, as well as its limitations in developing countries. As a result, efforts to limit the influence of politics and political elites in the bureaucracy have made little success in industrialized countries as well as in developing countries, one of the fundamental features of contemporary government is the growth of public sector or government. It is however impractical to scale up the growth of government. Economics in this case can get insights from the measure of public expenditures which is usually the most visible part of government activity. Bureaucracies usually have the experience

236 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) and expertise needed for effective policy making. In the opinion of some Public Choice economists, the growth of public expenditure and government is directly proportional to public bureaucracy. Expansive set of bureaucracy is one of the stereotypes associated to public bureaucracy. Any simplistic model cannot be sufficient to depict role of public bureaucracy in policy making. William Niskanen's bureaucratic theory believes in the idea that public sector bureaucracy is non-profit body financed fully or partially by grant or periodic appropriation. He argues that in case of private sector, managers of these firms can retain profit which bureaucrats in their public sector cannot. Niskanen model of a bureaucratic behaviour is based upon several assumptions; self-interest primarily motivates bureaucrats, public sector receives its finances from sale of output and from other sources and it is a non-profit organization, lastly bureaucrats enjoy monopoly over information related to real costs of supply. He therefore adds that one of the key differences between exchange relation of market and bureau rest on fact that bureau in exchange of budget offers total output, where as market organization offers price of output units. Patronage is a key characteristic of bureaucracy-politics connections in underdeveloped countries. While this is a trait that even rich countries have faced in the past, it is the scope and slow progress in dealing with the offenders of such crimes in developing countries that causes anxiety. Most emerging countries did not have a well-developed private sector capable of employing a large number of people when they gained independence. As governments strove to live up to the dreams and aspirations of their people during the war for independence, combined with the euphoria that came with independence, the public sector became the major employer. As a result, employment in the public sector has become a political instrument for elites to reward their supporters. Furthermore, the lack of significant reforms in the civil service to implement a merit-based recruitment and promotion system lies at the heart of the patronage problem. This blemished the public sector in emerging countries resulting in lower productivity and triggering a vicious cycle of poverty, underdevelopment, political favoritism and inefficiency. Contrary to this, developed countries continue to profit from civil service reforms that not only allow employment of some of the best and the most qualified persons in public service delivery, but also for the separation of politicians and bureaucrats. The strong ties that exist between political elites and bureaucrats have resulted in significant economic and administrative issues. One of them is that it allows unfettered corruption to flourish, which is still a problem in developing countries. Worse, people responsible for the misappropriation of public funds, whether through thefts or dubious initiatives with no economic value, do not accept responsibility and are frequently recycled across government offices. It's no surprise that the top 20 worst-performing countries on the corruption ranking are from emerging countries which lose more money than

237 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) they borrow from donors for development purpose. Most administrative units in poor nations have become inefficient and characterized by impunity as a result of corruption. The second aspect that determines the relationship between bureaucracy and politics is representation. Public workers are meant to represent the public views, goals, interests and aspirations while remaining neutral. However, representation may take on a distinct meaning in poor and rich countries alike. Identity-based representation, whether ethnic, religious, racial or clan based is a typical trend in developing countries in this scenario. Job opportunities in the public sector have become a tool for promoting one's own support base and an important means of shaping attitudes and opinion of their support base as a result of weak institutions and polarizing political processes, while also strengthening control of the country's political and bureaucratic spheres. Not only has this resulted in horizontal inequality, but it has also served as a trigger for civil conflicts. The third factor is career advancement and civil service recruitment. Individuals must be recruited and promoted on the basis of merit as Weber's ideal bureaucracy believes in. In the absence of merit-based recruiting, the civil service is characterized by corrupt, inexperienced, and inept bureaucrats, who rely on the political elite's backup to stay in power. Therefore, there is presence of merit-based recruitment processes so as to maintain quality of public service personnel. Interests, values and drive are the fourth factor impacting ties between bureaucrats and politicians in developing countries. While politicians have been examined for their self-motivation and desire in improving public well-being, same traits can also be found among bureaucrats. Some relationships and values are also strengthened by networks formed at elite schools and universities, whose alumni appear to dominate top administrative and political posts. If the actors come from various backgrounds, some of them adopt similar ideologies and mentalities, which might either prevent cooperation or generate rivalry. Politics and bureaucracies in most developing nations are dominated by persons of a specific bloodline or class, which tends to define their relationships. Public bureaucracies have been mostly disregarded in most political communication research, although there has recently been an uptick in interest in their efforts. 4.6 Conclusion The emphasis on procedural regularity, a hierarchical system of accountability and responsibility, specialization of function, continuity, a legal-rational basis and inherent conservatism are thus the most essential features of pure bureaucratic organization. The rise of capitalism and the preference for standard money transactions over barter systems necessitated the adoption of bureaucratic organizational structures in both the private and governmental (public) sectors. Management in the public sector is usually

238 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Currection (Dt. 17.10.2022) hard than the private sector because of certain major issues like transparency, absence of control over budget and personnel systems. The critical parts o bureaucratic type of organization, on the other hand can conflict with one another and are frequently at the root of accusations of bureaucracies as dysfunctional. To summarize, the same factors that make bureaucracy function can also operate against it. 4.7 Summary ? We discussed the Weber's model of bureaucracy and the broad spectrum of public in general. ? So far we have understood that bureaucracy is an essential link between public sector and the public which bridges the gap between the two. ? Likewise, for managing contracts and partnership and to act as the linkage between networks of social actors and the public sector. ? We have also discussed in length the responsibilities of bureaucratic organisation and the relationship it shares with politics. 4.8 Glossary ? Bureaucracy: Refers to body of administration, social system or government that has a hierarchical structure regulated by rules and regulations ? Bureaucratic Model: refers to organizational structure that follows a pattern of organizing people in hierarchy which has division of labor and procedures to operate. ? Weber's theory: Bureaucracy, according to Max Weber, is a highly ordered, formalized and impersonal entity. He also came to believe that an organization must have a stable hierarchical structure as well as defined rules, laws and lines of authority to govern it. 4.9 Model Questions ? What is your understanding of public? Describe in detail what does it mean in public administration. ? How public realm is different from private realm? ? Briefly discuss Hegel's idea of bureaucracy. ? Do you agree with Marx's idea of bureaucracy? Give reasons to substantiate your answer.

To develop a notion of constructive relationship between civil society and administration. 5.2 Introduction At the very beginning, before understanding the multi-dimensional relationship between administration and civil society, we must develop a conception of what is civil society and how it is pivotal in influencing the administration. So, this unit begins with the question what is civil society and the answer is not a simple one. Logically, this unit would next address the various conceptions on society-administration relationship. Although administration encompasses all organizations, both public and private, including religious, political and other undertakings, for our purpose we shall consider administration from the perspective of carrying out or executing or implementing policy decisions, or to coordinate activity in order to accomplish some common purpose, or simply to achieve cooperation in the pursuit of a shared goal, particularly from the point of view of the state. Finally, after developing ideas about civil society and administration respectively, we will examine the relationship between

241 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) the two and understand the complex nature of their relations which in turn affects the functioning of administrative organizations and meeting the needs of society and the public. 5.3 Concept of Civil Society The term "civil society" can be traced back to the works of Aristotle and Cicero, two classical Greek and Roman thinkers. In fact, Aristotle is credited with coining the term "koino – nia politike – " for the first time, which denoted a form of 'political community'. In the modern discourse, the term, which was once considered identical with political institution, has taken a completely different shape and meaning, and is now referred to as an autonomous entity separate from the state and family. The late-eighteenth-century Scottish and Continental enlightenment age gave birth to the contemporary concept of civil society. Political thinkers from Thomas Paine to George Hegel created the concept of civil society as a parallel but distinct entity from the state. Civil society, according to them, is a sphere in which persons associate based on their shared interests, and desires. Changed economic realities, such as the growth of the bourgeois, private property, and market competition, reflect this new school of thought. Charles Taylor defined civil society as "a web of autonomous associations independent of the state, which bind citizens together in matters of common concern, and by their existence or actions could have an effect on public policy". As per Sussane Haber Rudolph "civil society... includes the idea of a non-state autonomous sphere; empowerment of citizens; trust building associational life; interaction with, rather than subordination to the State". Dipankar Gupta defines civil society, as "not a thing but a set of conditions within, which individuals interact collectively with the state." For Larry Diamond, it is the "realm of organized social life that is open, voluntary, self-generating, (largely) self-supporting, and autonomous from the state, bound by a legal order or a set of shared rules. It is distinct from the 'society' in general in that it involves citizens acting collectively in a public sphere to express their interests, passions, and ideas; exchange information, achieve mutual goals, make demands on the state, and hold the state officials accountable. Civil society is an intermediary entity standing between the private sphere and the state. Civil society is concerned with public rather than private ends... civil society relate to the state in some way but do not aim to win formal power." According to Jeffery Alexander "civil society is an inclusive, umbrella-like concept referring to plethora of institutes outside the state." Niraja Gopal Jayal envisions civil society to cover "all forms of voluntary associations and social interactions not controlled by the state." To Michael Bratton civil society is a "social interaction between the household and 242 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriection (Dt. 17.10.2022) the state characterized by community cooperation, structures of voluntary association, and networks of public communication." A definition of civil society produced by a number of renowned research centers has been endorsed by the World Bank, which is "the term civil society refers to a wide array of non-governmental and not-for-profit organizations that have a presence in public life, expressing the interests and values of their members or others, based on ethical, cultural, political, scientific, religious, or philanthropic considerations. Civil society organizations (CSOs) therefore refer to a wide of array of organizations: community groups, non-governmental organizations (NGOs), labor unions, indigenous groups, charitable organizations, faith-based organizations, professional associations, and foundations." The European Union (EU) considers CSOs to include "all non-State, not-for profit, non-partisan, and non-violent structures through, which people organize to pursue shared objectives and ideals, whether political, cultural, social or economic .... These CSOs are membership based, cause-based, and service oriented. Among them are the community-based organizations, NGOs, faith-based organizations, foundations, research institutions, gender based organizations, LGBT organizations, cooperatives, professional and business associations, media, and non-for-profit organizations. Trade unions and employers' organizations, the so-called social partners, constitute a specific category of CSOs." 5.4 Understanding Administration In the earlier unit, there has been a brief discussion on what administration is. Administration is basically concerned with the formulation of the objectives, plans and policies.

Administration lays down the fundamental framework of an organization, within which the management of the organization functions. The nature of administration is bureaucratic. It is a broader term as it involves forecasting, planning, organizing and decision-making functions at the highest level of the enterprise.

Though often management and administration are considered synonymous, there are differences between the two.

Management is a systematic way of managing people and things within the organization. The administration is defined as an act of administering the whole organization by a group of people. Management is an activity of business and functional level, whereas administration is a high-level activity. While management focuses on policy implementation, policy formulation is performed by the administration. Functions of administration include legislation and determination. Conversely, functions of management are executive and governing. Administration takes all the important decisions of the organization while management makes decisions under the boundaries set by the administration.
NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriculum (Dt. 17.10.2022) Theoretically, it can be said that both are different terms, but practically, the terms are often interchangeable. Often a manager performs both administrative and functional activities. Although the managers who are working on the top most level are said to be the part of administration whereas the managers working on the middle or lower level represents management. So administration represents the top layer of the management hierarchy of the organization. 5.5
Relationship between Civil Society and Administration In the globalization context, 'governance' is not just confined to either only state or market. Instead, these two actors are collaborating with each other to provide goods and services. With the reappearance of a vibrant civil society, this process has now become multiple actor-centric with NGOs, CBOs, Self-help groups acting as responsible stakeholders with the State and market in the process of governance and development. The two ways of governance—Keynesian Welfare State and Neo-liberalism have not produced the desired results, Anthony Giddens observes "A fundamental theme of third way politics is rediscovering an activist role for government, restoring and refurbishing public institutions. Reforming the State is far from easy in practice, but the aim should be to make government and State agencies transparent, customer- oriented and quick on their feet". Reform of government and the state is the first priority. The state should not dominate either markets or civil society, only regulate the both. The core role of the civil society has to be realized. Without a developed civil society there cannot be an effective market system or well-functioning government. Let us now look at the various endeavours in the area of civil society and see how these can be tapped to facilitate development and governance. There is an urgent need for the government, civil society and private sector to work as partners in crucial areas of participatory development. Without a civil society to nourish engaged citizens, it has been observed, politicians turn into 'professionals', out of touch with their constituencies; while citizens are reduced to mere antagonists or turn into ungrateful clients of government services that they readily consume without being willing to pay for. Market-State endeavours have overwhelmed the economy in the recent past with many public sector enterprises divesting and opening up to private entrepreneurs. There have been successful ventures between the state and civil society, especially in the areas of Information Technology and resource management. It has to be seen how market can fruitfully associate with the State as well as civil society in the future. The convergence between NGOs and informal profit-oriented enterprises, as has been

244 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriculum (Dt. 17.10.2022) observed, offer some promise for building a different model of society. Since profits generated within this new 'non-profit-for profit' nexus are invested in public as well as private goods and services. Recent decades, points out Scholte (2000), have brought a general retreat from centralized governance with trends toward devolution, regionalization and globalization. Governance has shifted from a unidirectionality of statism to a multidimensionality of local, national, regional and global layers of regulation and meeting the specific needs in each of these levels. Although large-scale globalization has not dissolved Nation States, this form of collective identity is slowly losing its previous position of primacy. In the late 20th century, world politics is also being deeply shaped by sub- state solidarities like ethno-nations and by non-territorial, trans border communities based on class, gender, race and religion. There is a strong emphasis on community not as a social or geographical construct, but as a virtual space of shared cultural and moral affinities that express the ethics of self-governance. As per the Human Development Report (1999), the focus is on the fair, rights-based, practical shaping of daily institutional practices in each sphere of individual life. Informal community initiatives are now being organized all over South Asia, with or without government help, and they have often succeeded in serving those vulnerable sections of society that governments find quite difficult to reach. By opening spaces for civic engagement, civil society organizations, households, businesses and the media can contribute to governance processes for human development in general and an improvement in the lives of local communities in particular. The emergence of the self-instituted civil society as an independent social partner alongside formal political and economic structures has a potential for thoroughly modifying governance systems. In July 2002, the World Civil Society Forum met in Geneva to discuss issues that would help in strengthening international cooperation between civil society and international organizations. The implications of this type of global civil society are not so clear but encouraging nevertheless. Some ponderable could be: (i) Will huge networks and coalitions of citizen activists come to rival international governmental organizations (IGOs) in the next century as leading vehicles of transnational cooperation, (ii) Will new democratic processes arise at the worldwide level that can offset the clout of global capital, and (iii) Will national public policy debates increasingly be influenced by social and economic norms that hold sway globally. NGO's and social movements must keep in mind that their influence on the process of global governance will remain quite limited unless they succeed in effectively channelling their national governments' action as well as influencing the allocation of

245 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriculum (Dt. 17.10.2022) resources mobilized by governments and multilateral institutions. The new trends in globalization cannot be a remedy for all ills. Socio-economic development has to be indigenous, contextual and innovative. Especially, in the developing countries, where community plays a pertinent role in production of goods and services; more so, at the micro-level, the solution lies in what has been called 'localization'. There is a need for more research in the areas of community building, democracy and citizenship, role of global civil society and collaborative networking among the NG0s. It has been pointed out that village councils in which women and Dalits have a central place will be a genuine indigenous institutional innovation. They can give a new lease of life to democracy in India. An alternative paradigm that treats citizens as equal partners in development with due regard to goals of equity and social justice is therefore needed. The retention of high levels of autonomy and self-organization will be important if these agencies are not to be flooded by distorting State power. Established traditions of participative planning and community development can be complemented by experience in direct democracy (Ferlie and Fitzgerald, 2002). With the recent formation of the Confederation of NGOs in rural India, several hundreds of NGOs working in the remote areas can now express their ideas, suggestions and grievances on institutionalized lines. The Council for Advancement of People's Action and Rural Technology (CAPART) is playing the role of facilitator in this regard with emphasis on transparency, expeditious disposal, flexible and innovative approach towards projects for the poor in rural areas through NGOs. These NGOs will have representation at the district, state and national levels. In a number of countries, we can witness strong political efforts to reaffirm the position of the citizen in relationship to public administration such as Citizens' Charters in Britain, Charter for Right and Freedom in Canada and new Chapter in Constitution on Human Rights in Sweden. We have discussed various civil society endeavours earlier and it is important to acknowledge them as important efforts in the areas of participatory governance. In a sincere bid to open up a new democratic terrain, it has been rightly pointed out that the core justificatory principle is that major arenas of social, economic and political power (power over people's lives and power that shapes the life of society itself) should be harnessed to a doctrine of democratic responsibility. This is a responsibility that acknowledges a framework of obligations and accountability recognizes a range of legitimate stakeholders and seeks ways in which these stakeholders can have an effective voice. An approach of this kind will not be able to serve the purpose if attempts to construct iron walls between 'public' and 'private' centres of power are made. Instead, the doctrine of responsibility should be applied to both.

246 NSOU ?CC-PA-01 D: \ Suvendu \ NSOU\ HPA (CC-PA-01) Dummy Curriculum (Dt. 17.10.2022) This new thinking should not be seen as a shift in power from the state to civil society, but rather as the natural evolution of the relationship between those who govern and those who are governed. Couched in positive terms, governments are learning to govern better through heeding the popular voice; and citizens are learning to be better citizens through exposure to the regular rules and disciplined practices of associations of civil society. The private sector has a large stake in the expansion of civil society because civil order fosters economic growth. The synergies arising out of the emerging relations between the State, private sector, and civil society must thus be put to practical use. This is a relevant but difficult goal to achieve. Civil society organizations are necessary in the present context to ensure effective, responsive and efficient governance based on viable State-society and Society-market partnerships. 5.6 Conclusion We have seen that administration too is a complex process which often goes hand in hand with management and governance of organizations, and the focus of this module has been on civil society and its impact on administration. The basic concepts of state, civil society, and the administration and administrators, as well as their interrelationships, have been brought out and examined. The interconnections between society and government, particularly between administration and civil society has been discussed with light on essential conceptualizations of society-administration linkages. 5.7 Summary ? Civil society acts through social capital and the capacity of people to act together willingly in their common long term interest. Social capital is strong in a homogeneous, egalitarian society. ? Civil society as a whole is, therefore, unable to pay its full potential role in enforcing good governance except when extraordinary leadership overcomes narrow loyalties, or when an issue is of common, major concern to all sections. Smaller units of governance and decentralization of governance are, therefore, indispensable. ? Individual cannot take on the huge political bureaucratic machine that the government is, nor can the entire civil society act on behalf of every citizen. Civil society therefore has to operate through compact, focused organizations based on strong social capital.

In a bid to standardize higher education in the country, the University Grants Commission (UGC) has introduced Choice Based Credit System (CBCS) based on five types of courses viz. core, discipline specific, generic elective, ability and skill enhancement for graduate students of all programmes at Honours level. This brings in the semester pattern, which finds efficacy in sync with credit system, credit transfer, comprehensive continuous assessments and a graded pattern of evaluation. The objective is to offer learners ample flexibility to choose from a wide gamut of courses, as also to provide them lateral mobility between various educational institutions in the country where they can carry their acquired credits. I am happy to note that the University has been recently accredited by National Assessment and Accreditation Council of India (NAAC) with grade "A". UGC (Open and Distance Learning Programmes and Online Programmes) Regulations, 2020 have mandated compliance with CBCS for UG programmes for all the HEIs in this mode. Welcoming this paradigm shift in higher education, Netaji Subhas Open University (NSOU) has resolved to adopt CBCS from the academic session 2021-22 at the Under Graduate Degree Programme level. The present syllabus, framed in the spirit of syllabi recommended by UGC, lays due stress on all aspects envisaged in the curricular framework of the apex body on higher education. It will be imparted to learners over the six semesters of the Programme. Self Learning Materials (SLMs) are the mainstay of Student Support Services (SSS) of an Open University. From a logistic point of view, NSOU has embarked upon CBCS presently with SLMs in English / Bengali. Eventually, the English version SLMs will be translated into Bengali too, for the benefit of learners. As always, all of our teaching faculties contributed in this process. In addition to this we have also requisitioned the services of best academics in each domain in preparation of the new SLMs. I am sure they will be of commendable academic support. We look forward to proactive feedback from all stakeholders who will participate in the teaching-learning based on these study materials. It has been a very challenging task well executed, and I congratulate all concerned in the preparation of these SLMs. I wish

However, such effort immediately encounters several challenges as there is hardly any uniform commentary on it. In fact, it is scatter along with severaled scholars. This unit tries to come out with an exposition of classical theory organization by assimilating the commonalities among the scholars. The unit has the following sections: section- l To introduce the learners with the Classical Theory l highlights the major principles of Classical 'Organization Theory'; l Give a brief exposition of the works of Fayol, Gullick and Urwick Unit-I Classical Theory Basic Tenets 1.2 Introduction The Classical Theory of Organization believes that for smooth functioning of organization a general theory can be devised, which will have universal applicability, regardless of the situation or context. It defines organization as a universal structural construct, susceptible to some basic principles of organization. The protagonists of this approach were of the opinion that organizations across societies have certain structural commonalities, which are amenable to some common principles of organization. Hence, the control over these common principles of organization would provide a greater command over the organization.

NSOU ● CC-PA-02 8 The classical thinkers argued for hierarchy believing that it would increase production and give managers more control over their employees. There are two key assumptions that underpin these ideas. The first is it is conceivable and desirable to establish a closed organisation with internal operators that are mostly unaffected by external factors. And Secondly, human beings may be trained and led to do a good job if they are financially compensated. The focus and locus of the field of Public Administration were stressed in classical theories. The competence in the form of If we look at the works of the distinguished scholars belonging to this school, we will find that there had been a relentless effort on their part to encapsulate organization with list of organizational principles with a view to augment industrial productivity. The Classical Management Theory was created in the mid-nineteenth century in response to issues with factory systems that arose during the industrial revolution. There was a need to create a management system that would allow industries to perform at their best. As a result, it was widely acknowledged that employees' primary requirements are economic and social, with social needs and job happiness receiving minimal attention. Planning is one of the dimensions of the classical theory of management, and it entails formulating goals and deciding on a path of action. As a result, it is necessary for the managers to be able to make sound decisions about the company's operations and resources. There are several dimensions to the planning part of management. The first is strategic planning, which entails a competitive examination of the organization's threats, opportunities, strengths, and weaknesses. Then there is tactical planning, which is creating plans for putting the strategic plans into action. Finally, there is operational planning, which is concerned with short-term planning in order to support strategic and tactical objectives. The other function is organizing, which entails management involvement in the creation of an organisational structure as well as the allocation of human resources in order to promote the achievement of stated goals. It is through it that the organization's functions are coordinated. A group of writers in the first part of the twentieth century pioneered a broader approach to organisation, focusing primarily on formal organizational structure and the basic management process. This set of knowledge has been dubbed 'administrative management theory' by March and Simon. Mechanical theory, Classical theory and Structural theory are all terms for the same thing.

Reiley, M.P. Follet and Shelton are among the most prominent proponents of this theory. These authors claim that administration is administration, regardless of the type of work or context in which it is carried out. The articulation of specific universal organizational principles is the most significant concern of this theory.

NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 9 administrative principles was the emphasis of the field. The field's locus could be found everywhere. The principles of administration are principles because these can be successfully implemented in any administrative situation, regardless of culture, traditions, environment or mission. The organisation was characterized by classical thinkers in terms of how work was divided and how task specialization could be accomplished. The foundation of an organisation was division of work and the very reason of its creation. In the study of formal organisations as units of analysis classical theories played a key role. Hierarchy, foundation of departmental structure, unity of command, span of control, delegation and decentralization and other principles are found in the classical approach. Each of these concepts is designed to create connections between distinct functions at various levels of an organisation. Improvement of organisation's efficiency is goal of each principle. Human beings must be organized in order to achieve this goal. The notion of 'hierarchy' is used in this procedure to organize human beings into various levels and to determine who should give instructions and who should obey them. These principles dictate how labor is distributed based on the job one has and level of skill one possesses. People with higher degree of specialization have higher positions whereas those with a lower degree of specialization hold lower positions. The classical approach emphasizes that a group's effectiveness is determined by the type of structure in which they operate. They have a basic structure that any collaborative endeavor should have. They believe that the structure is capable of decreasing human variability and fitting individuals into a pattern where they must answer to the organisation's wants and demands. It also believes that a human beings will alter and adapt to the organisation's demands and expectations. The classical approach's claims to theoretical rank are based on the belief that the enunciated principles are universally valid. In Mooney's opinion principles of industrial organisation is present in all spheres and it would be a mistake to infer those principles of organisation are borrowed from older forms. He emphasizes on the idea that universal principles if in actual is a principle then it needs no borrowing. It just has a way of applying itself and this is always true, regardless of what we label it. On the other hand, formulation of classical methods principle are predicated on the assumption that the underlying processes in the organizational structure and its operation are universal. It is claimed that there is certain area in an organisation that can be removed from its environment and developed in such a way that it can be applied universally. The organizational concept was created via experience in military and industrial organisations. These concepts were advocated by those with extensive expertise in a range of operations. They came up with them after a lot of experience working with human groups. In other words, the principle has emerged through rigorous scientific observations rather than philosophical exercises or figments of the imagination. As a result, the NSOU ● CC-PA-02 10 classical approach is predicated on the assumption that these ideas are scientifically accurate. Gulick and Urwick developed the classical theory of organisation inspired by earlier management thinkers such as F.W. Taylor and Henry Fayol on the basis of their belief that a science of administration can be developed if certain principles are developed based on the practical experience of administrators. However, one noticeable trait of these two author's beliefs is that they overemphasize the structure and process of organisation while placing little emphasis on the individual beings who work in them. Purpose, Process, Person and Place are the four pillars of departmental organisation, as described by Gulick. Fayol was one amongst all who worked on general theory of management. He claimed that there was a single 'administrative science' that could be applied to government, religion and other institutions and not just confined to business. According to Fayol, understanding of administration rather than technical expertise is required at higher levels of an

Luther Gulick and Lyndall Urwick collectively published 'Papers on the Science of Administration'. This seminal study by these two philosophers elevated the status of Public Administration. These papers attempted to comprehend the fundamental reason behind human beings' need for organizing. Luther Gulick agree that division of labor was the most important factor in the formation of an organisation. In his opinion every large scale or any big enterprise needs a mass workforce of men to carry it ahead among which work can be divided. "Organising" has to do with framework of coordination imposed upon enterprise work-division units. As a result, this makes it difficult for an activity to structure without addressing how work would be spilt. Gulick argued that work division is the cornerstone of organisation as well as the purpose of organisation. Hence, he envisaged for split in task and claims that division of labor was the catalyst for emergence of organisation. In opposition to Gulick argument, James D. Mooney argued that underlying basis of any human organisation was co-ordination. Even when more than two persons are not involved, principles that govern an organisation are present in concerted human activity. 1.4 Principles and pillars of classical theory As we know Fayol was one of earliest to have worked on general theory therefore let us first look into Fayol's way of dividing activities followed by Gulick, Urwick, Mooney and Reiley and Follet. In six groups Fayol divided activities in an organisation. These are; technical activities, financial activities, commercial activities, accounting activities, managerial or administrative activities and security activities. The five NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 11 elements in administration according to Fayol are Planning, organizing, co- ordination, control and command. Fayol viewed administration from the perspective of a manager, focusing his investigation on top management duties. His thesis is widely regarded as the first comprehensive management theory. Fayol also listed out the attributes managers should have which are physical, moral, mental, general education, experience and special knowledge. Fayol's book has outlined principles of an organisation which are-mutual commitment and pride) These principles meant to raise management to level of science. While Taylor was concerned with shop level worker Fayol was concerned with manager's task and management as a whole. Fayol was also a forerunner in advocating for structured administration training. He claims that training is a never-ending process that begins with an organisation's personnel. Every superior officer in an organisation, he believes is a teacher to his direct subordinates. Fayol talks about 'gangplank'. In a hierarchical organisation, it simply refers to the need for 'level jumping'. Fayol is aware of the hazards of obedience to hierarchy and formalism, despite his emphasis on formal structure. With the help of the following diagram, he demonstrates the problem:

If 'F' follows the principles of good communication channel, he must deliver his message or file to 'P' via 'E', 'D' and so on, covering nine levels. It is feasible, however for 'F' to use 'gangplank' to avoid travelling via 'A' and all other intermediary layers. Only when the immediate superiors (in the case of a disagreement between 'F' and 'P' they must turn the subject over to their superior) can resort to 'gangplank'. However, it needs to be mentioned that while suggesting gangplank Fayol was cautious that it will be less relevant to private organisation. Fayol's ideas were further carried forward by writers, such as Luther Gulick and Lyndall Urwick. In the phrase 'POSDCORB', Luther Gulick summed up the ideas of organisation. He used this term to indicate those universal function that an administrator must fulfill. His renowned POSDCORB acronym is made up of the first letters of seven administrative tasks: Planning: The creation of a general overview of the activities to be carried out and the procedures to be used in order to achieve the enterprise's goal. Organising- The process of establishing a formal authority structure on which work subdivisions are built and coordinates in order to achieve a specific goal. Staffing- The full personnel function of hiring and training employees, as well as ensuring safe working conditions. Directing- Making judgements and enacting them in specific and broad commands and instructions is the continual task of directing the enterprise. Coordination: The crucial task of connecting the many aspects of the project. NSOU ● CC-PA-02 12 Reporting: The task of informing supervisors about the status of work via reports and records. Budgeting entails the planning, accounting and control of a company's finances. Apart from this, Luther Gulick have advocated several principles of organisations which are listed below: ● Division of work ● Hierarchy based coordination ● Basis of departmental organisation ● Coordination through committees ● Decentralization ● Staff and line ● Unity of command ● Delegation ● Deliberate coordination ● Span of control Gulick emphasizes division of labor as one of the 10 principles of administration outlined. Vast-scale organisation, he claims necessitate a large number of men to complete their various jobs. When a group of guys works together, the best results are attained when the task is divided among them. As a result, the theory of organisation is concerned with the upgradation of coordination among various units of an organisation as a result of the division of labor concept. Hence Gulick is of the opinion that in the process of civilization mankind lifts through division of work and integration. Followed by Gulick next, we have is Lyndall Urwick who has also listed out eight principles of administration. ● Principle of objectives which refers to clear goal that an organisation should have. ● Principle of correspondence where authority and responsibility is equivalent. ● Principle of responsibility where superior is accountable for work of subordinates. ● The scalar principle which advocates for a pyramidical structure of an organisation ●

The classical organization theory is based on four pillars of organization viz. division of labour, the scalar and functional processes, structure and span of control. Hence, the major principles of the classical organization theory may be described as follows: Division of Labour – The organisation must split tasks in order to achieve clear specialisation and boost individual worker performance. Without a doubt, the division of labour is the most important of the four aspects. The other elements flow as corollaries from it. Scalar and functional growth, for example, necessitates function specialization and departmentalization. The path in which specialisation of operations travels in the development of a firm is inherently based on the structure of the organisation. Finally, breadth of control issues arises as a result of a manager's responsibility for a large number of specialised functions. Scalar and Functional Processes – A scalar chain is a succession of superior- subordinate relationships in an organisation that runs from top to bottom. It makes delegation of power or command, communication or feedback, as well as corrective action or decision, much easier. The scalar and functional processes deal with the organization's vertical and horizontal growth, respectively. The scalar process entails the expansion of the chain of command, delegation of authority and responsibility, command unity, and reporting obligations. The functional process includes the segmentation of the organisation into specialised components and the regrouping of the parts into compatible units. In a formal organisation, this process focuses on the horizontal evolution of the line and employees. Structure – The logical relationship of functions in an organisation is known as structure. Furthermore, these functions are organised for efficient goal achievement. The logical relationships of functions in an organization's structure are structured to efficiently implement the company's objectives. System and pattern are achieved through structure. The line and the staff are the two basic structures used in traditional organisational theory. Committee and liaison duties, on the other hand, easily fit within the umbrella of structural considerations. Structure, once again, serves as a conduit for establishing logical and consistent linkages among the many functions that make up the organisation. Span of Control – This is the maximum number of subordinates a manager can supervise efficiently. The concept of span of control refers to how many subordinates a manager can effectively supervise. Regardless of how it is interpreted, breadth of control is important for the evolution of the organization's

NSOU ● CC-PA-02 14 shape as it grows. A flat structure is produced by a wide span, while a towering structure is produced by a short span. Furthermore, the span notion draws attention to the organization's complexity of human and functional interrelationships. 1.5 Critical Assessment Despite its relevance to organisational theory, the Classical Theory of Organisation has been criticised for focusing too much on institutional form and ignoring the human aspects of the organization. The classical theory is widely seen as out-of-date in today's environment. The most basic point made by Simon is that Gulick and Urwick's administration principles are actually a collection of contradictory proverbs that are only legitimate as universal statements about organizations and their operations. He also claimed that there would be equally acceptable contradicting principle for almost every concept. He also criticized unit of command, span of control, hierarchy of authority, four bases of departmental organization and specialization. According to Simon, all modern companies are characterized by greater specialization and workers frequently take orders from specialists as well as supervisory personnel, either directly or indirectly. Organizations too are vulnerable to underlying internal problems that traditional philosophers eventually overlook. The internal consistency of classifying companies according to the four methods namely, purpose, process, clientele and location was pointed out by Simon. Because they are mutually competing bases with the fourth's benefits. Simon also claimed that defining exactly these four things signify is quite difficult. The classical theory's principles aren't really scientific, and they haven't stood the test of time. They were based on an individual's empirical observations and logical inferences rather than actual scientific inquiry and proof. True, classical organization theorists were fixated on structure and institutions, and they overlooked the human element of organization at their peril. It considers an organization to be a closed system, disconnected from and unaffected by its surroundings. It is more preoccupied with what should be, which has steered it away from studying real organizational behavior. This theory is not well suited to organizations where changes occur on a regular basis, and the majority of the theory's features are not backed up by empirical evidence. Also, the notion that all organization can be managed by the same set of rules and principles does not hold good. That said, the value of Classical Organization Theory cannot be overstated. It is, in fact, at the very heart of modern organizational philosophy.

Organizational behaviour became more predictable and stable as administrative procedures were better coordinated and roles were clearly defined. Despite the fact that classical theory has been attacked as antiquated and has passed into history, it remains the most popular school of thought and the most common type of management found in today's company structures, even if it does not reflect universal application and appeal. 1.7 Summary In this unit, we have- ● Understood Classical Organisational Theory and how its idea evolved with various perspective of its proponents. ● Learned that classical approach places prime importance on organisation, division of labor, hierarchy, supervision and lot of other principles for effective functioning of an organisation Have a broad overview of the contributions of the classical thinkers such as Fayol, Gullick and Urwick, and also examined the criticism of their works. 1.8 Glossary ● Classical Theory: This theory projects Public Administration as a science. Fayol was born into a French bourgeois family and ascended through the ranks of a mining company to become the managing director. Fayol established a systematic philosophy of organisation based on five key cannons of administration: planning, organizing, command, coordination, and control, based on his personal experience as an engineer cum manager. Fayol had also produced various papers and books on mining, engineering, and organisation, based on his personal experience as a professional engineer. NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 18 2.3 Henry Fayol and his Management theory Fayol has popularized the concept of administration. In contrast to the typical image of administration in the English-speaking world, especially the way it was segregated from management, Fayol emphasized the ubiquity of administration in all human action. Administration, in his opinion, is a shared activity that applies to all human endeavors, whether they are domestic, commercial, or government- related. Good management is required for any company that wishes to be effective and achieve its objectives. Without someone in a position of leadership, there would be chaos in the organisation, with no structure and little, if any, concentration. Employees in the company would be absolutely bewildered as to which obligations they should take on. Employees will struggle to have a sense of direction and strive toward common aims and objectives if the organization's goals and objectives are not clearly stated by someone in a position of authority. Fayol attempted to create a management theory that could be utilized as a foundation for formal management education and training in his writing. Fayol began by categorizing all organisational activities into six categories: a. Technical: engineering, production, manufacture, adaptation. b. Commercial: buying, selling, exchange. c. Financial: the search for optimum use of capital. d. Security: protection of assets and personnel. e. Accounting: stocktaking, balance sheets, costs, statistics. f. Managerial: planning, organizing, commanding, coordinating, controlling. Although each of the first five functions is well understood in and of itself, none of them considers: developing a broad plan for where the business is going and how it will operate, organizing people, coordinating all of the organization's efforts and activities, and monitoring to ensure that what is planned is actually carried out. As a result, Fayol's sixth function serves as a capstone to the prior five. Fayol argued that to manage is to: Plan: A good plan of action unifies the organization by focusing on the nature, priorities, and state of the business, as well as longer-term industry and economic projections, key thinkers' intuitions, and strategic sector evaluations from specialist staff groups. In order to plan well, managers must be talented in the art of dealing with people, have a lot of energy and moral fortitude, have some tenure, be aware about the organization's specialized requirements, have general business experience, and the capacity to produce creative ideas. Organize: Lines of duty and authority are just as important as communication flow and resource allocation when it comes to organizing. According to Fayol, Managers have the following essential; organizational responsibilities:

Here Fayol takes pains to point out that any decision to separate with an employee should be the result of careful thought, that the employee should have had fairly assigned work for which (s)he was trained, that (s)he was fairly and objectively appraised and honest feedback was provided, that (s)he had been given every opportunity for additional training, offered guidance and that, where possible, (s)he was re-assigned to alternative work. Fayol also mentions procedures involving written warnings and protection against bias and 'inequities'.

He presented a broad theory that can be utilized at all levels of management and in every department. The Fayol hypothesis is used by managers to plan and regulate an organization's internal activities. He focused on increasing managerial effectiveness. The fourteen management concepts devised by Henri Fayol are outlined below. 1. Division of Work Henri thought that dividing duties among workers in the workplace would improve product quality. Similarly, he discovered that work division increases worker productivity, efficiency, accuracy, and speed of employees. They'll need specialised knowledge and skills for this. Subdivision simplifies and increases the efficiency of each task. Individuals gain speed and accuracy in their performance by repeating a tiny portion of their tasks. Fayol emphasized that any organisation, large or small, should place its personnel based on their specific talents and expertise. 2. Authority and Responsibility The right of a superior to give commands to subordinates, make decisions on specific matters, use organisational resources, and lead and govern subordinate behaviour is referred to as authority. According to Fayol the right to make orders and the capacity to obtain obedience is also authority. Official power and personal authority were the two sorts of authority he distinguished. Personal authority is obtained via one's talent, knowledge, experience and intellect whereas official power is legally granted to a person. According to Fayol, authority must be proportional to responsibility, hence initiatives must be taken to encourage people to take responsibility. This can be accomplished by entrusting responsibilities to all people in an organisation who exert authority at various levels. These are the two most crucial qualities of leadership. The authority of management allows them to function more efficiently, and their responsibility holds them accountable for the work done under their supervision or direction.

21 NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 3. Discipline Without discipline, nothing can be accomplished. It is the most crucial part of any project or management strategy. Good performance and proper interrelationships make management work easier and more comprehensive. Employees' good behaviour also contributes to their professional development and advancement. Discipline, according to Fayol is a requirement for proper authority exercise. Discipline has two aspects. To begin, only follow commands when the management is competent. Second, imposing discipline on subordinates from above would make it one-sided affair. 4. Unity of Command This indicates that an employee should report to and follow only one manager. A conflict of interest emerges when an employee is expected to report to multiple superiors, which can lead to misunderstandings. Taylor's notion of functional authority opposes Fayol's principles of unity of command. Fayol was opposed to a dual command system because he believed it would lead to uncertainty in authority channels and ambiguity in responsibility patterns. 5. Unity of Direction Everyone engaging in the same activity should have the same goal in mind. This means that everyone in a company should be working toward the same goal and be motivated in the same way, making work easier and reaching the stated goal faster. For a set of activities with the same goals, Fayol highlighted that there should be a single superior and a uniform plan of action. He recognized that a company with two CEOs will not last long. As a result, the unity of direction concept highlights the importance of common goals under single leader. 6. Subordination of Individual Interest Management, according to Fayol, must ensure that the organization's goals take precedence over individual's interests. Individuals should keep aside their own ambitions and prioritize that of the organization. This suggests that a company should collaborate for the greater benefit rather than for personal advantage. To be obedient to the goals of an organization. This refers to the complete chain of command within a firm.
NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 22 7. Remuneration This is critical for motivating people in a business. Money and non-monetary compensation are the two types of remuneration. It should, however, be in accordance with a person's efforts. The wage practices in an organisation, according to Fayol's conceptualization, should be rational and provide maximum pleasure to both the employer and the employees. This notion is essentially compatible with one of Taylor's scientific management's key assumptions that employee motivation is primarily based on monetary incentives supplied by management. 8. Centralization If senior management retains the majority of decision-making authority, centralization is said to exist. According to Fayol, the degree of centralization or decentralization in an organisation is determined by the organisation's stage of development as well as the abilities and qualities of its employees. Fayol believes that centralization cannot be imposed indiscriminately. It was due to the natural order of things which included intellect and wisdom. According to Fayol, a company should strive for a balance of perfect centralization and decentralization. In any organisation, the management or any authority in charge of the decision- making process should be unbiased. This, however, is depending on the size of the organisation. The significance of maintaining a balance between hierarchy and power division was stressed by Henry Fayol. 9. Scalar Chain or Hierarch The lines of authority from superior to subordinate are referred to as the scalar chain. It provides authority channels as well as communication and decision-making goals. Fayol advocated for a chain of command which should be strictly followed unless it is damaging to the organisation's objectives. Fayol is also aware of the flaws in the governmental organisation's communication system which cause significant delays in decision-making. Fayol emphasizes that the hierarchical steps should be taken from top to bottom in this regard. This is required so that every employee knows who their immediate supervisor is and how to reach them in the event of an emergency. 10. Order The notion of order in Fayol's conceptual framework centres upon his view that everything has a place in the organisation and that everything has a role in the organisation. He argued that good orders save time and resources but that social

23 NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 order necessitates a careful balance of wants and resources. Individual pieces of work should be allotted to each individual, and they should be available at the specific place of work, according to social order. To have a positive work culture, a corporation should have a well-defined work order. More positive productivity will be boosted by the good attitude in the office. 11. Equity All employees should be treated with respect and on an equal footing. It is the manager's responsibility to ensure that no employees are discriminated against. Fayol stressed the significance of the human dimension in the workplace. To some extent, this concern is reflected in his emphasis on promoting the notion of organisational equity which according to him, includes human qualities such as kindness and fairness. 12. Stability Fayol underlines the need of having an effective and stable management team in place. Fayol assets, which is critical given the time and price required to develop strong management employees. The length of time spent in a position should be determined. Getting used to work can take some time. If an employee feels safe in their employment, they will provide their best. It is the management's responsibility to provide job security to their personnel. 13. Initiative Employees should be supported and encouraged to take initiative in the workplace by management. It will assist them in increasing their interest and increasing their value. Initiative must be promoted by management at all levels, according to Fayol. The process of percolating this spirit down to the lowest levels necessitates managers sacrificing their 'personl vanity'. Managers should be willing to share some of their decision-making authority with their subordinates because the initiative generated would be a source of strength for the firm. 14. Esprit de Corps Management's responsibility is to motivate and support its employees on a daily basis. Building trust and mutual understanding can lead to a beneficial outcome and work environment. Esprit de Corps, according to Fayol is the presence of harmony among all members of an organisation. Employee morale must be boosted by harmonizing their nativities, fostering close inter personal cooperation and

NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 24 rewarding each employee based on his or her merits without prejudice. Competing enterprises should create good connections and handle problems through mutual agreements as Fayol suggests. The 14 management principles are used to run a corporation and are effective for prediction, planning, decision-making, organization and process management, control, and coordination. 2.5 Influence of Henry Fayol's Theory Fayol's influence on management theory - especially management thinkers - cannot be overstated. Known as the Father of the Administration School because he was the first to look at an organisation from the 'top down' to recognize management as a process, to break that process down into logical subdivisions, and to lay out a set of principles for making the best use of people, resulting in the establishment of a management education syllabus. The influential (albeit somewhat prescriptive) classical management formula POSDCORB, which stipulates that manager should Plan, Organise, Staff, Direct, Coordinate, Report, and Budget, is clearly based on Fayol's works. However, if we look at the details and descriptions of Fayol's five managerial activities, we can see that the tensions and worries, responsibilities and obligations, styles, and challenges he articulated 100 years ago are still relevant today. The last two management activities described by Fayol, command and control, have also been used to describe the hierarchical structure and management style adopted by large organisations from the 1950s to the 1980s. Again, if we look closely at what Fayol actually says - particularly concerning command - it isn't that far from today's notion of an empowering, not a 'commanding' manager. Fayol's views have been criticised for lacking in analysis and assessment, for overlapping principles, aspects, and responsibilities, for confusing structure with process, and for relying too heavily on top-down bureaucracy. Although he was chastised for his lack of clarity, his management concepts are quite similar to Max Weber's description of the features of formal organisations, or bureaucracies. His status as the first person to characterise management as a top-down process based on planning and human organisation will ensure his prominence among students and practising managers alike. 2.6 Critical Evaluation Fayol's theory was subject to criticisms. First and foremost, they argue that Fayol's theory is just too formal to be applicable to informal organizations. His notion is overly restrictive, and it will only work in a formal organizational framework.

25 NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 Second, his Functional Theory is overly management-oriented, and it frequently overlooks worker well-being. Workers are frequently treated as if they were mechanical instruments, with their main focus being how to carry out orders. Many current management perspectives have criticized this notion, pointing out that workers are humans who require the flexibility to participate in decision- making. It will be impossible to completely control workers' movements. In addition, modern management perspectives criticize Functional Theory, stating that it is only beneficial in a stable and predictable environment. In today's tumultuous world, managers must include democracy as one of the management factors. Managers must pay closer attention to human behavior and, where necessary, provide motivation and persuasion in order to complete the task. Every goal, according to Mintzberg and Fayol, begins with planning. Fayol's planning role is undeniable, as it is something that all managers must undertake ahead of time in order to create a successful path. There are five positions in Mintzberg's 10 roles that have a comparable meaning to Fayol's planning function. Furthermore, Mintzberg stated in his "folklore" paper that every manager must devote a significant amount of effort to dealing with high levels of disruption. For example, most managers don't just focus on their personal paperwork; they also have to deal with unexpected phone calls and, on sometimes, subordinates who walk into their office for a meeting. As a result, managers have a responsibility to act as a disruption handler. Mintzberg's words, on the other hand, sound a lot like Fayol's control and coordination function. Apart from that, Mintzberg is unable to completely exclude the presence of an organizing role in management. When it comes to managing an organization, most theories recognize the necessity of organizing and identify it as a critical component. 2.7 Conclusion Fayol had the mindset of an upper-level administrator. He believed that general management is responsible to take forward the enterprise towards its goal by making optimum use of resources that are available. He highlighted the need of accomplishing common goals through good collaboration and maximizing productivity by utilizing available resources to their full potential. The executive authority is in charge of all organisational responsibilities, including the plan of action, staff selection, performance evaluation, and ensuring and controlling the implementation of all activities. After identifying Fayol's concepts and elements of management, the management process and organisation theory emerged. He concentrated on establishing approaches that might effectively aid in the management of various businesses, drawing on a variety of backgrounds and

It is this backdrop we will delve into his contribution in the following unit. 3.3 Gulick's Principles of Organization Luther Gulick was heavily influenced by Taylor and Fayol. Gulick used Fayol's five elements of administration viz., Planning, Organisation, Command, Coordination and Control as a framework for his neutral principles.

Their first concept

in allocating functions to groups of people is homogeneity, which is based on the identity or simplicity of four factor or Gulick's 4P formula: Gulick has given 4P formula regard with the establishment of departments, universally. ● P- purpose ● P- process ● P- person(s) ● P- place Gulick however suggest that while subdividing work or while establishing work one must make a choice amongst these principles to fit in relevant. Let us now understand them one by one. a) Purpose based organisation: Organization indicates a group of people who have come together for a certain objective, achieving a particular purpose. The organization's functions and goals can be used to create departments in any organization. Departments such as the welfare department, sanitation department, and others were founded for specialised purposes. In such departments, coordination is rather simple. However, such a classification may have certain drawbacks as well. These include issues encountered during work division, a lack of opportunity for varied specialists, and so on. b) Process based organisation: It refers to the organization in which the processing is mostly carried out by various sub-divisions, such as the ministry of law, the statistics department, and the accounting department, among others. Another criterion for developing departments is the processes or talents required in the department's operation. All tasks that need the same knowledge, skills, or processes can be grouped together and formed into a department. Such a department can perform tasks that are also requested by other departments. As a result, it saves time and energy for other departments to do similar things. For example, the O & M division of the Department of Administrative Reforms in the Government of India monitors and advises modifications to various departments' work procedures. c) Person based organisation: Person based organizations are designed to assist a specific target group, community, or society, such as the department of scheduled castes, minorities, and so on. Departments can also be developed based on the type of clientele they serve, such as the old age welfare department, which only assists elderly people. The main advantage of these types of departments is that the staff who work in them learn how to deal with a specific clientele. Other types of clients, such as women, the handicapped, and children, might be used to construct specific departments. The fundamental problem of such departments is that their functions overlap and duplicate one other. d) Place based organisation: They are mostly founded to service a certain territory. Districts, tribal territories, and hilly locations could all be good starting points for new departments. All of the functions that are created in a given area are grouped together. This aids in the area's intensive development and fosters specialization as well as coordination. The aforementioned departments' foundations have been questioned for being incompatible with one another. Some of the bases overlap, such as the engineering department, which might be categorize as both process and purpose based. Furthermore, the nature of procedures in government organizations is sometimes so complicated that it is not always viable to categorize distinct operations on such simplistic principles. There are ten principles of Luther Gulick theory as he advocated these are- 1) DIVISION OF WORK OR SPECIALISATION According to Gulick, the foundation of any organisation and the cause of an organisation is work division. The notion of work division was also a major tenet of other classical intellectuals' theories. Work division is crucial as because man varies in nature, talent and capacity and it through specializing that they can gain much in dexterity. The division of labour indicates that work must be split in order to achieve clear specialization and so increase the organisation's performance. The more specialised a person is in his or her job the more efficient the organisation as a whole will be. To divide work, you must first identify the tasks that must be completed. 2) BASES OF DEPARTMENTAL ORGANISATIONS Gulick has put forward 4P formula with regard to basis of establishment of organisations as we have already discussed before, that are purpose-based organisation, process-based organisation, person based organisation and placed based organisation. 3) COORDINATION THROUGH HIERARCHY Gulick points out that if sub-division of work is inescapable then coordination becomes necessary. This can be achieved through organisation, which entails connecting sub-divisions of work by allocating them to people who are correctly situated in the authority structure, so that work can be coordinated through commands that go from top to bottom of the organisation. Secondly through the supremacy of idea, that is the creation of intellectual singleness of purpose into the vision of those who are working will voluntarily and enthusiastically integrate his duty into the whole. 4) DELIBERATE COORDINATION It emphasizes on co-operation among employees after thorough consideration. Deliberate coordination becomes a necessity for different departments so that they can collectively meet the needs of the organization as well as that of their individual departments. 5) COORDINATION THROUGH COMMITTEES For better performance of work and for effective cooperation among workers coordination must be maintained across committees. 6) DECENTRALISATION The transfer of administrative authority to local agencies (who works autonomously) from the center falls under the concept of decentralization. 7) UNITY OF COMMAND Gulick and Fayol were of the same view regarding this principle. They were of the opinion that a workman subjected to orders from two supervisors will lead to lot of uncertainty, confusion and irresponsibility and hence they supported the idea of workman subjected to take orders from one supervisor that will be more efficient and responsible. However, Gulick is aware of dual control in some of the field offices and suggests a framework of 'integrated dual supervision' in such cases. 8) STAFF AND LINE- STAFF AND LINE Gulick adapted the concept of staff from the military's line and staff system. Staff officials assist the chief executive in removing needless work off his or her plate so that he or she may focus on the organization's core responsibilities. Staff experts must dedicate their time solely to the knowing, reasoning and planning functions as Gulick suggest. They should not be granted any administrative authority or accountability but to arrive at results 'authority of ideas' must be used. As a result, they emphasized the importance of specialized personnel to help senior leaders who form part of the 'line' and perform functions of central tasks of the organization, control and coordination and the core functions of the agency. The general and special staff relieve the chief executive of the 'line' of the heavy minutiae of administration, allowing him to focus on the most important responsibilities and wield a broader range of control. 9) DELEGATION- It refers to a person's right of supervision and control being delegated to an agency or subordinate. It is a function-based distribution of power rather than a distribution of authority and responsibility. 10) SPAN OF CONTROL- This principle states that a supervisor cannot control more than an optimum no of workers at a time. When the number of sub- ordinates increases arithmetically then the number of relationships increases geometrically. This shows that at supervisory levels there remains a problem of managing the sub- ordinates. Knowledge, time and energy restrictions as well as different types of work and organisation sizes, all contribute to the control limit.

It stems in part from individual executive disparities in capabilities and work habits and in part from the non-comparable nature of labour. As a result, the principle of span of control is governed by the elements of function diversity, time and space. The principle's scientific validity is hampered by a failure to place adequate emphasis on these elements. Gulick urged more research into the issue, but found that an organization's chief executive can only deal with a few immediate subordinates. The number is defined not only by the nature of the task, but also by the executive's capacity and the number of immediate subordinates: the organisation's stability and proximity geographically. Even though he was less certain about the number of subordinates, he was convinced in the principle's general validity. 3.4 Seven Principles of Administration Luther Gulick outlines the Seven Elements of Administration (or the Chief Executive's Function) into famous acronym POSDCORB which are as follows: P---PLANNING: This is the process of laying out in broad outline the tasks that must be completed and the procedures for completing them in order to achieve the enterprise's goal. Managers are responsible for not just deciding what to do, but also planning it into the agenda. Planning necessitates insight. This encompasses weekly, monthly, and quarterly planning, as well as annual, medium- term, and long-term planning (looking ahead with a time line of 3 years). The organization's direction is determined by planning. A predetermined time frame, on the other hand, indicates that when the timer runs out, whatever result is available at the moment must satisfy. This timeline's progress must be continuously monitored.

33 NSOU ● CC-PA-02 O---ORGANISING: This is the process of establishing a formal authority structure through which work sub-divisions are organised, defined, and coordinated to achieve the set goals. Managers are responsible for not only assigning activities, but also for allocating these duties to their departments and personnel. The manager will require the essential resources, such as budget, raw materials, staff and their skills, technology, and machines, to achieve the desired outcome. To reach the desired outcome, he or she will have to organise a variety of tasks. It is critical that the employees' division of labour fits the end objective and end result as closely as feasible in order to get started as quickly as possible. S---STAFFING: This encompasses the entire personnel function of hiring, training, and maintaining favourable working conditions. This section is about an organization's personnel policy and any related actions. For an organisation to run efficiently, it needs good and capable staff. The manager's initial responsibility is to determine the expertise, abilities, and experiences required for certain positions. Job profiles are created based on this, and employees can be hired. This staff policy governs the entire recruitment, selection, and training process, ensuring that the proper sort of employee is in the right place. D---

company's leader. The manager, of course, is in charge of direction; he or she is the one who bears ultimate responsibility and is held accountable for it. In practice, this means that the manager is in charge of all operations. Furthermore, the manager not only supervises but also motivates his people. He or she instructs them on how to accomplish their jobs best, encourages them, and motivates them to take on new tasks. CO---COORDINATING: That is the crucial task of connecting the many aspects of the work. The manager's job with this notion is to connect diverse sectors and achieve cooperation. A good manager has what's known as a 'helicopter vision' which allows him or her to see what's going on and what still has to be done. He is able to coordinate tasks and supervise his personnel from this vantage point. It is his/her responsibility to synchronize various departments and bring them together with a common aim in mind. R---REPORTING: That is, keeping those that the executive is accountable for informed about what is going on. This includes using records, research, and inspection to keep oneself and one's subordinates informed. There is no evidence without reporting. A detailed report keeps lines of communication open throughout

NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 34 the company. Managers serve as a link between the management team and the constituency, which consists of their own personnel. Reporting gives you an idea of how things are going, and it's also a good method to keep track of agreements. Reporting also makes other critical information transparent, such as personnel difficulties, new processes, performance interviews, and sales numbers. Involved parties can also access archived reports instantly. B---BUDGETING: All of the things that come with budgeting, such as fiscal planning, accounting, and control. Any organization's lifeblood is finance. The manager is in charge of the department's budget management, expenditure, and control, as well as keeping track of tax details. In addition to employee compensation, it is the manager's responsibility to keep track of other expenses such as materials and investments. The manager is accountable for taking action if unnecessary spending, overruns, errors, or even fraud are identified. 3.5 Critical assessment Herbert Simon slammed some of Classical Organisation Theory's accepted administrative assumptions, including the separation of responsibilities, unity of command, span of authority. He claims that division of responsibility and specialisation can be done by function, process, objective or location, referring to the 4 'P's. Classical theory, he claims has provided no guidance as to which base is best in any given situation. In terms of sphere, the notion of unity of command is likewise problematic for him. In vast and complicated organisation, Gulick's line and staff functions are simply out of touch with reality. Even more perplexing and deceptive is the span of control theory. The Graicuna mathematical formula of 'five or more likely four' is primarily to blame for this blunder.

The authoritarian idea that the top executive must have some type of relationship with everyone below him in the organisation is the basic fallacy. The principles of administration of Gulick and Urwick were heavily criticised since they did not explain what they meant by the 'principles' having universal validity. Simon believed that administrative principles are best criteria for characterizing and diagnosing administrative circumstances. They only propose working norms of behaviour that appear to have been validated by extensive experience. The theory has been criticised for being atomistic, in that it views individuals in isolation from their coworkers. It's mechanical since it doesn't account for the dynamics of organisational behaviour. It is both static and logical. It also makes no mention of non-monetary incentives. It is more interested in the job than the human beings who performs it. The human factor and human behaviour were undervalued. Human beings are regarded as merely cogs in the organisation's wheel.

35 NSOU ● CC-PA-02 3.6 Conclusion Classical management thought is till prevalent among many practicing administrators today, despite the fact that it was originally articulated in the first two decades of this century. The concern with the formation of organisational principles is the most defining element of classical theory.

The classical theorists endeavored to identify the true foundations on which work division in organisations might be carried out and to find efficient methods of coordinating work. They emphasized the clear delineation of distinct activities and their interrelationships, as well as the use of authority to get things done through a system of checks and controls over the people working in organisations. As a result, Classical Organisational Theory has a formal design and planning structure. The idea promotes a set of organisational principles according to which organisation plans are created to match the needs of a specific purpose or function, and then capable persons are chosen to carry out the predetermined plan. This method carries with it task of seeking precision as engineer wants, logical organisation, best way to accomplish phase and at last tying up these pieces into a whole. As a result, the theory clearly demonstrates four characteristics: work division, hierarchy, impersonality and efficiency that are factors to consider. 3.7 Summary ● Luther Gulick's priceless contribution to the field of administration which includes focus on principles to increase efficiency of an organization. ● Gulick's POSDCORB forms the backbone of modern administration. 3.8 Glossary POSDCORB- Acronym that stands for Planning, Organising, Staffing, Directing, Coordinating, Reporting, Budgeting. 4Ps'- Bases of departmentalization; Purpose, Place, Person, Process Formal organisation- an organisation where emphasis is on structure and design.

Urwick served as a Lieutenant Colonel in the British Army during World War I, was a member of a number of international management associations, and was regarded as an exceptional industrial management consultant. He has written several books, including Management of Tomorrow, The Making of Scientific Management, The Elements of Administration: The Patterns of Management and Leadership in Twentieth Century organisations.

A recurring theme in these authors' writings is the importance they place on

the structure of administration while almost completely overlooking the role of men in the organisation. Urwick has been one of the most important figures in the development of modern management practices and thought. Central to his work was a passion for spreading the gospel of systematic and 'scientific' management through his activities as a management consultant, through his efforts in developing management institutions, and perhaps most of all, through what he later called his 'mission at large' in taking 'modern' management to managers and the wider public.

NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 [CPP] 38 In all, Urwick wrote some 280 books, pamphlets, and articles on an eclectic range of management topics, and gave talks running into the thousands aimed at a wide range of audiences. Organization theory was his particular concern and provides his main standing in history. The principles were based broadly on managerial tasks, together with some general organizational precepts such as the correspondence of authority with responsibility. Though his name became co-terminus with Gulick for their joint publication, Urwick's individual contribution to the theory of organization is no less important. He has several publications to his credit, which include among others 'The Meaning of Rationalization' (1929), 'Committees on Organization' (1930), 'Management of Tomorrow' (1933), 'The Elements of Administration' (1944), 'Notes on the Theory of Organization' (1952), 'Patterns of Management' (1956). 4.3 Importance of Organization Along with Luther Gulick, Urwick was very much interested in analyzing the intricacies of administration as a whole, and he dealt mostly with the technical aspects of formal organisation. Organization is a structure formed with some persons who have assembled with a similar mentality of doing a purposive work or mission. Administration is built up in that organizational structure to materialize the mission or design of work. The similarities between live beings and organizations are striking, particularly when examining highly evolved organisms like the human body. As a result, whenever an organization fails to fulfil its function and mission, an organizational symptom or sickness may appear; as a result, a wide range of organizational symptoms and diseases can be examined. Recent research has tried to determine analogies between the human system and a social order such as an organization, in order to identify analogous malfunctions and ailments and develop guidelines for the prognosis of organizational symptoms and diseases, as well as their remedies and treatments. Urwick was heavily inclined to formalism in organization theory. The formulations of Gulick and Urwick which became popularly known as 'universal' principles of organization became an integral part of public administration and these formulations are popularly called 'classical theory' of organization. They are also known by different names such as '

administrative management' theory, 'mechanistic'. theory, etc. The classical theory is so called because it is one of the earliest formulations based on systematic analysis of organizations; it is dominant in the field of administrative theory; and finally, because it is long established and generally accepted in administrative literature. They sincerely believed that a science of administration can be developed based on some principles and based on the experience of administrators. Thus, the administration which was considered hitherto an art developed into n science.

NSOU ● CC-PA-02 39 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 Urwick had elaborated on the role of organizations as social groups and in that he found it to be like a living body. According to him the appropriate analogy must be analogy with the living beings which is biological parallel and for this reason the mechanistic parallel can be very crucial in discussing organization. Engineering approach is another name of it. In tune with the classical theorists of Public Administration like Gulick and others, Urwick too attached much importance to the structures of organization than the role and agency

of the people in the organization. In short, Urwick traces a very large proportion of the friction and confusion in the society, with its manifest consequences in the sufferings of human beings, and connects them to the problematic and futile structural arrangements in organizations. Thus, for a problem free environment and a less chaotic society, Urwick stressed on the importance of design in organizations. He remarks it is impossible for mankind to progress its knowledge of organisation unless the structural aspect is isolated from other concerns however unnatural such separation may appear. He links a huge share of societal friction and confusion to important repercussions, as well as fault structural structures in organisations. Urwick

in his book,'Elements of Administration'' defines organization as determining activities vital to any purpose and structuring them in groups assigned to individuals.

He adds that whole arrangement must be undertaken in a "cold-blooded, detached spirit", like the preparation of an engineering design, without any reference to the individuals in the organization. Therefore, it is cleared than like the classical theorists, Urwick laid much importance in organization, particularly the arrangement and functioning of the structures of organization. 4.4 Principles of Organization True to the tradition of the classical organization theory, Urwick considered administration and management are inseparable and a ubiquitous phenomenon.

He did not make any distinction between public and private administration.

Urwick identified eight principles of administration applicable to all organisations. The principles are: i) The Principle of Objective that all organisations should have a purpose. ii) The Principle of Correspondence' that authority and responsibility must be co-equal. NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 [CPP] 40 iii) The Principle of the responsibility of higher authorities for the work of subordinates which is absolute in nature. iv) The Scalar Principle which refers to the

pyramidical type of structure in an organisation. v) The Principle of span of control. vi) The Principle of Specialisation that refers to limiting one's work to a single function. vii) The principle of Coordination that focusses on coordination among the organisation. viii)The "principle of Definition" which highlights clear prescription of every duty. Urwick, like other classical thinkers, believed that an organization's structure was more significant than its personnel's role. In short, Urwick believes that organisational structure arrangements are responsible for a considerable portion of societal friction and uncertainty, as well as its obvious consequences in human misery. Urwick emphasized the importance of design in organisation, claiming that unless this feature is isolated, mankind will be unable to advance in its understanding of organisation.

He further considered lack of design as "illogical, cruel and inefficient".

Discussion of Urwick cannot be done without mention of Gulick. As Gulick and Urwick stated, there are administrative entities in the government that are well supervised

are almost without exception headed by single administrators. They were anti-boards and anti-commissions. When compared to a plural body leadership is vested in one person. They repeated Fayol's command unity maxim recognizing that strict devotion to it may lead to absurdities. According to them, a man is not capable to serve two masters. A worker who is ordered by multiple supervisors will get confused and act irresponsibly whereas a worker who is only ordered by one superior will be methodical, efficient and responsible. The Gulick- Urwick's notion of staff aid to the executive as well as the relationships between line and staff officials, deserve special attention. They drew on their previous expertise in military administration to develop these concepts. In civilian organisations, however no management theory has yet clarified significance of line and staff principle. They underlined the need for specialised personnel to help the upper management. Because public officials donot have time to read, think or interact with their subordinates on a daily basis, they require aid with their central tasks of command, control and coordination. This type of assistance should be provided by NSOU ● CC-PA-02 41 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 general staff who will coordinate the activities of staff specialists. As a result, the general and special staff relieve the top executive of the heavy minutiae of administration allowing him to focus on the most important responsibilities and wield a broader range of control. Lyndall Urwick was the first to systematically apply the concept of span of control to business. According to Urwick, eliminating less important daily chores is critical for enhancing the human touch that makes a business executive an effective leader. Urwick claimed that limiting the number of subordinates reporting to an executive (i.e. limiting the span of control) can improve executive effectiveness, reduce pressure, inefficiency, and incompetence, improve employee cooperation, and boost morale and unity within the organisation, based on the work of General Sir Ian Standish Monteith Hamilton. Control is limited due to knowledge, time and energy constraints as well as differences in task types and organisation sizes.

It stems in part from individual executive disparities in capabilities and work habits and in part from the non-comparable nature of labour. As a result, the principles of span of control are governed by the elements of function diversity, time and space. The principle's scientific validity is hampered by a failure to place enough emphasis on these elements. Following a conversation with Urwick, A.V. Graicuna wrote "Relationship in Organization," which was published in the Bulletin of the International Management Institute in 1933. According to Graicuna, superiors must be aware of not just their direct ties with their subordinates, but also the cross relationships between subordinates and other subgroupings. Graicuna then utilized a mathematical formula to show how increasing the number of direct ties by one resulted in a 25% increase in delegation power and a more than 100% rise in supervision and coordination costs. Urwick went on to say that "no superior can supervise directly the work of more than five or, at most, six subordinates whose work interlocks"

based on his observations. According to Urwick in many countries' government machinery is unable to keep up with the current technology. Improved communications have made the world enormously smaller in just half a century. Nations are much closer together now which means there are so much potential for miscommunication. Both their inter social organisation and international economic interactions have become much more complex as a result of the development of power-driven technology and the industrial system. Despite, in the vast majority of situations, they are seeking to address these much more complex issues of government using the constitutional and executive structures of the previous century. Both politicians and officials are frequently overworked, with the result that they can only effectively attend to a small portion of their vastly increased responsibilities. As a result, he argued that government should develop their own corps of professionals in scientific NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 [CPP] 42 management but make them fully independent of typical civil service establishments as an alternative to hiring outside consulting firms. As a result, such a service may be established as part of the Prime Minister's personal staff. However in such circumstances it would be necessary to: i) create three or four posts at the top of such department that are at least equivalent to those of a secretary; otherwise the new service would not attract enough good men; and ii) ensure that the terms and conditions of entry into the service are equivalent of those offered to an under- secretary. It would be necessary to attract men of substantial ability with prior experience in Scientific Management; iii) to move a fraction of such personnel to Civil Service positions or to provide them with the chance to gain outside jobs in business after five to ten years of service. Such employee transfers are both common and important in all private management consultant endeavors in order to keep the staff fresh and prevent the work from becoming monotonous. The greatest concern, however is that such an official management consultant agency would believe that part of its job includes being critical of the departments or services it investigates. As all private management consultants are aware, being critical in this way renders people who publish their comments are unable to undertake successful reorganization work in the departments of other units they have criticised. Scientific management must be implemented in any organisation through constructive and persuasive leadership not authoritarianism or witch-hunting. It's even possible that Parliament may try to use this new tool in the wrong manner, using it as a whip or good rather than a stimulant, rendering it incapable of completing its job properly in the only way it can be done. Whatever option is chosen, it is critical for countries starting on economic growth programmes to make greater use of Scientific Management ideas in their government apparatus, particularly if they have moved a significant portion of their economic life to public management. 4.5 Criticisms of Lyndall Urwick's Theory Urwick's use of the span of control in business was not without controversy. Herbert A. Simon questioned the concept's theoretical viability, claiming that a limited span of control would result in excessive red tape. This complaint was disputed by Urwick, who stated that if span of control is properly implemented, this will not happen. The span of control, according to Burleigh B. Gardner, prevents democratic participation inside the corporation. Urwick responded to this critique by stating that having too broad a control span weakens democracy by preventing subordinates from having meaningful interactions with superiors. Other researchers have criticised the principle as wrong, citing examples of effective organisations with a broad range of control. Urwick responded to this issue by stating that the work of subordinates in these cases did not overlock. As a result, these organisations were outliers.

This advocacy and clout extended to important aspects of accounting theory and practice. Contemporary accounting theorists, text writers, and practitioners promote and use concepts and techniques that have a lengthy history of development and historical precedents in many cases. Urwick's enlarged articulation of information-based planning and control is one of them. This study shows Urwick's broader reach, which includes financial management, financial accounting, and management accounting, rather than being limited to operational management. The impact of his ideas, albeit indirect and underappreciated in the accounting world, deserves more recognition. The Scientific Management school of thinking is seldom included in today's management and accounting textbooks, if at all. Not surprisingly, some of the fair critiques levelled at the school's philosophy and impacts on organisations and their workers could be one of the reasons for its absence. The majority of accounting books, conference papers, and journal articles make no mention of these forefathers of modern management and accounting theory and practice. Taylor and Fayol are frequently the only ones to get credit. Urwick's contribution to accounting is even more under-appreciated. Nonetheless, Taylor, Fayol, and later Urwick assigned accounting a significant and convincing role. Given the dominance of scientific management in early twentieth- century business and government, as well as its influence on management and accounting thinking long after its initial dominance had waned, a strong case can be made that the above approaches to financial management, planning, and control can still be found in contemporary accounting today, reflecting especially Urwick's advocacy over a long period of time. Our current expanding of financial and management planning and control approaches almost unintentionally reflect components of what Urwick and other Scientific Management pioneers proposed. For two reasons, it is an unintentional reflection. For starters, it stems from a lack of understanding of accounting and scientific management history. Second, it is the result of a misunderstanding of what Urwick recommended in the first place. His perspective on planning and control differed from the way it has been stereotyped in the past. Instead, it was a more flexible, ecologically conscious, and contextualized approach to planning than most accounting experts and practitioners recognize NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 [CPP] 44 today. His approach to company and budgetary planning was both comprehensive and contingent, with planning and control being equally important and inextricably intertwined. This emphasis and effort have perhaps been rediscovered and renewed by contemporary accounting researchers and practitioners. Today's accounting is rife with hidden scientism. It manifests as out croppings of philosophical layers accumulated during 150 years of Scientific Management development and promotion. Scientific management, on the other hand, remains a distant memory for the vast majority of today's accountants, whose continued influence is a mystery. We need to revisit and reinterpret the original works of such major pioneers in order to better comprehend present accounting difficulties and practices, as well as to better inform our endeavors to manage organisational and global change. Lyndall Urwick, among those whose thoughts are still reflected in our thinking today, demands our full attention. 4.7 Summary ● So far, we have learned about Urwick's contribution in the field of administration in which we discussed in detail about significance associated to organization. ● This unit covered all the principles of an organisation, his idea of span of control, his similarities with Gulick and the criticism he has received from Simon who argued limited span of control as proposed by Urwick will lead to excessive red tape. Nonetheless his ideas are still relevant to comprehend present circumstances. 4.8 Glossary Span of control: Urwick's principle envisage the idea that no supervisor should supervise more than 5-6 line reports whose work is interlocked. Organisation: To Urwick it referred to the idea that an organisation must have a clear goal. 4.9 Model Questions ● Give a brief background of Lyndall Urwick. ● Briefly mention various principles of organisation as proposed by Urwick? ● What are the key similarities that Luther Gulick shares in common with Lyndall Urwick? ● What are the suggestion of Urwick towards government machinery to keep up with the current technology. ● On what grounds Urwick's theory is criticised? ● What are the contributions of Urwick in the field of Public Administration. ● Briefly discuss Span of Control, as discussed by Urwick.

The competence in the form of administrative principles was the emphasis of the field. The field's locus could be found everywhere. The principles of administration are principles because they may be used successfully in any 47 NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 [CPP] administrative situation, regardless of its culture, traditions, environment or mission. The organisation was characterised by classical thinkers in terms of how labour was divided and how task specialisation could be attained. So as to understand what classical thinkers had to offer in the field of administration we will look into the contributions of Fayol, Urwick and Gulick. 5.3 Contributions of Fayol Fayol attempted to create a management theory that could be utilized as a foundation for formal management education and training in his writing. Fayol began by categorizing all organisational activities into six categories: a. Technical: engineering, production, manufacture, adaptation. b. Commercial: buying, selling, exchange. c. Financial: the search for optimum use of capital. d. Security: protection of assets and personnel. e. Accounting: stocktaking, balance sheets, costs, statistics. f. Managerial: planning, organizing, commanding, coordinating, controlling. 5.3.1 Henry Fayol's 14 Principles of Management Fayol, the 'Father of Modern Management Theory' presented a broad theory that can be utilized at all levels of management and in every department. His fourteen management principles are outlined below. 1.Division of Work He thought that dividing duties among workers in the workplace would improve product quality. Similarly, he discovered that work division increases worker productivity, efficiency, accuracy, and speed of employees. Fayol emphasized that any organisation, large or small, should place its personnel based on their specific talents and expertise. 2. Authority and Responsibility The right of a superior to give commands to subordinates, make decisions on specific matters, use organisational resources, and lead and govern subordinate behaviour is referred to as authority. According to Fayol the right to make orders and the capacity to obtain obedience is also authority, for Fayol, authority must be

NSOU ● CC-PA-02 48 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 proportional to responsibility, hence initiatives must be taken to encourage people to take responsibility. 3. Discipline Discipline, according to Fayol is a requirement for proper authority exercise. Discipline according to Fayol has two aspects. To begin, only follow commands when the management is competent. Second, imposing discipline on subordinates from above would make it one-sided affair. 4. Unity of Command This indicates that an employee should report to and follow orders from only one manager. A conflict of interest emerges when an employee is expected to report to multiple superiors, which can lead to misunderstandings. 5. Unity of Direction Everyone engaging in the same activity should have the same goal in mind. This means that everyone in a company should be working toward the same goal and be motivated in the same way, making work easier and reaching the stated goal faster. 6. Subordination of Individual Interest Management, according to Fayol, must ensure that the organisation's goals take precedence over individual's interests. Individuals should keep aside their own ambitions and prioritize that of the organization. This suggests that a company should collaborate for the greater benefit rather than for personal advantage. To be obedient to the goals of an organisation. This refers to the complete chain of command within a firm. 7. Remuneration Money and non-monetary compensation are the two types of remuneration. It should, The wage practices in an organisation, according to Fayol's conceptualization, should be rational and provide maximum pleasure to both the employer and the employees. 8. Centralization If senior management retains the majority of decision-making authority, centralization is said to exist. According to Fayol, the degree of centralization or decentralization in an organisation is determined by the organisation's stage of development as well as the abilities and qualities of its employees. According to Fayol, a company should strive for a balance of perfect centralization and decentralization.
49 NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 [CPP] 9. Scalar Chain or Hierarchy The lines of authority from superior to subordinate are referred to as the scalar chain. It provides authority channels as well as communication and decision-making goals. Fayol advocated for a chain of command which should be strictly followed unless it is damaging to the organisation's objectives. 10. Order The notion of order in Fayol's conceptual framework centres upon his view that everything has a place in the organisation and that everything has a role in the organisation. He argued that good orders save time and resources but that social order necessitates a careful balance of wants and resources. 11. Equity All employees should be treated with respect and on an equal footing. It is the manager's responsibility to ensure that no employees are discriminated against. Fayol stressed the significance of the human dimension in the workplace. To some extent, this concern is reflected in his emphasis on promoting the notion of organisational equity, which according to him, includes human qualities such as kindness and fairness 12. Stability Fayol underlines the need of having an effective and stable management team in place, which is critical given the time and price required to develop strong management employees. The length of time spent in a position should be determined. Getting used to work can take some time. If an employee feels safe in their employment, they will provide their best. It is the management's responsibility to provide job security to their personnel. 13. Initiative Employees should be supported and encouraged to take initiative in the workplace by management. It will assist them in increasing their interest and increasing their value. Initiative must be promoted by management at all levels, according to Fayol. 14. Esprit de Corps Esprit de Corps, according to Fayol is the presence of harmony among all members of an organisation. Employee morale must be boosted by harmonizing their nativities, fostering close inter-personal cooperation and rewarding each employee based on his or her merits without prejudice.

factor or Gulick's 4P formula: Gulick has given 4P formula regard with the establishment of departments, universally. ● P- purpose ● P- process ● P- person(s) ● P- place a) Purpose based organisation: indicates a group of people who have come together for a certain reason, such as conducting coordination. b) Process based organisation: refers to the organisation in which the processing is mostly carried out by various specific divisions, such as the ministry of law, the statistics department, and the accounting department, among others. c) Person based organisation: organisations designed to assist a specific target group, community, or society, such as the department of scheduled castes, minorities. d) Placed based organisation: are mostly founded to service a certain territory. Districts, tribal territories, and hilly locations could all be good starting points for new departments. All the functions created in a given area are grouped together. 5.4.1 Gulick's theory of organisation Let us discuss briefly the ten principles of Luther Gulick theory of Organization: 1) DIVISION OF WORK OR SPECIALISATION According to Gulick the foundation of any organisation and the cause of an organisation is work division. Work division is crucial as because man varies in nature, talent and capacity and it through specializing that they can gain much in dexterity. The division of labour indicates that work must be split in order to achieve clear specialization and so increase the organisation's performance. 2) BASES OF DEPARTMENTAL ORGANISATIONS Gulick has put forward 4P's formula with regard to basis of establishment of organisations as we have already discussed earlier, that are purpose-based organisation, process-based organisation, person-based organisation and placed based organisation.

 3) COORDINATION THROUGH HIERARCHY Gulick points out that if sub-division of work is inescapable then coordination becomes necessary. This can be achieved through organisation, which entails connecting sub-divisions of work by allocating them to people who are correctly situated in the authority structure, so that work can be coordinated through commands that go from top to bottom of the organisation. 4) DELIBERATE COORDINATION It emphasizes on co-operation among employees after thorough consideration. Deliberate coordination becomes a necessity for different departments so that they can collectively meet the needs of the organization as well as that of their individual departments. 5) COORDINATION THROUGH COMMITTEES For better performance of work and for effective cooperation among workers coordination must be maintained across committees. 6) DECENTRALISATION The transfer of administrative authority to local agencies (who works autonomously) from the centre falls under the concept of decentralization. It given the local authorities sufficient powers to effectively meet the demands of the organization, at their own level. 7) UNITY OF COMMAND Gulick opined that a workman subjected to orders from two supervisors will lead to lot of uncertainty, confusion and irresponsibility and hence they supported the idea of workman subjected to take orders from one supervisor that will be more efficient and responsible. 8) STAFF AND LINE Gulick adapted the concept of staff from the military's line and staff system. Staff officials assist the 'line' chief executive in removing needless work off his or her plate so that he or she may focus on the organization's core responsibilities. The general and special staff relieve the chief administrators of the 'line' of the heavy minutiae of administration, allowing him to focus on the most important responsibilities and wield a broader range of control. 9) DELEGATION It refers to a person's right of supervision and control being delegated to an agency or subordinate. It is a function-based distribution of power rather than a distribution of authority and responsibility. 10) SPAN OF CONTROL This principle states that a supervisor cannot control more than an optimum no of workers at a time. When the number of sub- ordinates

NSOU ● CC-PA-02 52 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 increases arithmetically then the number of relationships increases geometrically which becomes a problem of managing the sub-ordinates. 5.4.2 POSDCORB P---PLANNING: This is the process of laying out in broad outline the tasks that must be completed and the procedures for completing them in order to achieve the enterprise's goal. Managers are responsible for not just deciding what to do, but also planning it into the agenda. Planning necessitates insight. This encompasses weekly, monthly, and quarterly planning, as well as annual, medium-term, and long- term planning (looking ahead with a timeline of 3 years). The organization's direction is determined by planning. A predetermined timeframe, on the other hand, indicates that when the timer runs out, whatever result is available at the moment must satisfy. This timeline's progress must be continuously monitored. O---ORGANISING: This is the process of establishing a formal authority structure through which work sub-divisions are organised, defined, and coordinated to achieve the set goals. Managers are responsible for not only assigning activities, but also for allocating these duties to their departments and personnel. The manager will require the essential resources, such as budget, raw materials, staff and their skills, technology, and machines, to achieve the desired outcome. To reach the desired outcome, he or she will have to organise a variety of tasks. It is critical that the employees' division of labour fits the end objective and end result as closely as feasible in order to get started as quickly as possible. S---STAFFING: This encompasses the entire personnel function of hiring, training, and maintaining favourable working conditions. This section is about an organization's personnel policy and any related actions. For an organisation to run efficiently, it needs good and capable staff. The manager's initial responsibility is to determine the expertise, abilities, and experiences required for certain positions. Job profiles are created based on this, and employees can be hired. This staff policy governs the entire recruitment, selection, and training process, ensuring that the proper sort of employee is in the right place. D---
company's leader. The manager, of course, is in charge of direction; he or she is the one who bears ultimate responsibility and is held accountable for it. In practice, this means that the manager is in charge of all operations.
53 NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 [CPP] Furthermore, the manager not only supervises but also motivates his people. He or she instructs them on how to accomplish their jobs best, encourages them, and motivates them to take on new tasks. CO---COORDINATING: That is the crucial task of connecting the many aspects of the work. The manager's job with this notion is to connect diverse sectors and achieve cooperation. A good manager has what's known as a 'helicopter vision' which allows him or her to see what's going on and what still has to be done. He is able to coordinate tasks and supervise his personnel from this vantage point. It is his/her responsibility to synchronize various departments and bring them together with a common aim in mind. R---REPORTING: That is, keeping those that the executive is accountable for informed about what is going on. This includes using records, research, and inspection to keep oneself and one's subordinates informed. There is no evidence without reporting. A detailed report keeps lines of communication open throughout the company. Managers serve as a link between the management team and the constituency, which consists of their own personnel. Reporting gives you an idea of how things are going, and it's also a good method to keep track of agreements. Reporting also makes other critical information transparent, such as personnel difficulties, new processes, performance interviews, and sales numbers. Involved parties can also access archived reports instantly. B---BUDGETING: All of the things that come with budgeting, such as fiscal planning, accounting, and control. Any organization's lifeblood is finance. The manager is in charge of the department's budget management, expenditure, and control, as well as keeping track of tax details. 5.5 Contributions of Urwick Urwick was heavily inclined to formalism in organization theory. The formulations of Gulick and Urwick which became popularly known as 'universal' principles of organization became an integral part of public administration and these formulations are popularly called 'classical theory' of organization. He became the organisational secretary for Rowntree and Company, a confectioner, after serving in the First World War. He went on to become Director of the International Management Institute in Geneva in 1929. When the institute's life was cut short by the Great Depression, Urwick moved to England and founded a management consultancy.

Urwick identified eight principles of administration applicable to all organisations. The principles are: i) The Principle of Objective-

this principle refers to the idea that all organisations should have a certain purpose to achieve. ii) The Principle of Correspondence'- it refers to the key idea that authority and responsibility must be co-equal in terms of operating. iii) The Principle of Responsibility- refers to the idea that it is the responsibility of higher authorities to look out for the work of subordinates, which is absolute in nature.

iv) The Scalar Principle- this hint towards pyramidical type of structure in an organisation. v) The Principle of span of control-.

Urwick claimed that limiting the number of subordinates reporting to an executive (i.e., limiting the span of control) can improve executive effectiveness, reduce pressure, inefficiency, and incompetence, improve employee cooperation, and boost morale and unity within the organisation vi) The Principle of Specialisation -that refers to limiting one's work to a single function who are specialised in it. vii) The Principle of Coordination- that focusses on coordination among the organisation for better efficiency. viii)The Principle of Definition - which highlights clear prescription of every duty do that it does not create confusion among people working.

55 NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 [CPP] Urwick had elaborated on the role of organizations as social groups and in that he found it to be like a living body. According to him the appropriate analogy , must be analogy with the living beings which is biological parallel and for this reason the mechanistic parallel can be very crucial in discussing organization. Urwick, like other classical thinkers, believed that an organization's structure was more significant than its personnel's role. In short, Urwick believes that organisational structure arrangements are responsible for a considerable portion of societal friction and uncertainty, as well as its obvious consequences in human misery. Urwick emphasized the importance of design in organisation, claiming that unless this feature is isolated, mankind will be unable to advance in its understanding of organisation. 5.6 Limitations of the Classical thinkers There are several limitations to these thinkers. Some of the critics have argued that Fayol's concepts are descriptive, while others are prescriptive, according to them. Structuralists opposed Fayol, claiming that he completely neglected an organisation's structure, making it flawed to some level. It is a mechanical approach to study of organisations, according to Peter Drucker. Scholars from the socio-psychological school claimed that Fayol overlooked the psychological components of human beings completely. The detractors of the traditional approach also criticised Fayol's theory for its volume judgements, which are not experimentally valid. Despite the fact that Gulick and Urwick's classical theories had a considerable impact on administrative theory, they were heavily criticised by various scholars for their flaws and failings. The concepts of administration proposed by classical thinkers like Gulick and Urwick in particular were savagely criticised. Herbert Simon questioned the classical theory's assumptions one by one. The basic point made by Simon is that Gulick and Urwick's administration principles are actually a collection of contradictory proverbs that are only legitimate as universal statements about organisations and their operations. Most of the limitations arise from the fact that the human dimension is ignored. The sociological and psychological aspects in principles are overlooked. This approach only sees economic motive as a motivator for workers. It does not believe that employees are emotionally tied to their employers. It ignores the impact of social organisations on human (voluntarism). The mechanistic explanation of organisation behaviour fails to explain dynamism. Workers are treated as gears in a machine. The focus is on prescriptive or normative aspects and descriptive theory is absent. This approach treats the organisation as though it were a separate system from the rest of the world. The subjective aspect of rationality is not taken into account, i.e., organisational behaviour differs from real conduct and it solely concentrates on the organisation's structure.

NSOU ● CC-PA-02 56 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 5.7 Conclusion The classical method is mostly a reaction to the rise of capitalism in the western world. It has been proposed as a way to increase manufacturing efficiency and economics. It's a near revolutionary endeavour to systematise human organisational experience. The principles of organisation are derived from empirical observations. Their contribution bridges the gap between older administrative theorists and subsequent scholars, such as Herbert Simon, who advocated for a more empirical and analytical approach to administration research. Although there are valid objections to Gulick's, Fayol's and Urwick's views these criticisms cannot overshadow the importance of these thinkers' contributions to the development of administrative theory. 5.8 Summary ● So far, we have seen Fayol and Gulick’s contributions in terms of principles for organisation, POSDCORB, their theory of management has been enormous which have stood the test of time. ● These contributions have now become part of modern management concepts. Frederick Winslow Taylor(1856-1915) is regarded as the father of this Scientific Management theory. Taylor was the first thinker in Public Administration who adopted and implemented the scientific methods in management and industrial work process. Scientific The main objective of Management theory economic efficiency, especially labour is to improve productivity. It was one of the earliest attempts to apply science to the engineering of processes to management.

The major principles of Scientific Management theory are- (a) standardization of Work Methods (b) scientific selection and training of industrial workers (c) equal division of work between workers and management (d) mutual collaboration of workers and management. Before Taylor's attempt few scholars and thinkers like Charles Babbage, Henry R. Towne and Henry Metcalfe tried to implement scientific process in the field of industry and management. But Taylor's contribution was distinctively important because he tried to implement it methodologically and scientifically. The Scientific Management approach in its literal sense means a scientific way of managing an organization. His theory helped pave the way for many modern management approaches and techniques, some opposed him whereas some supported him but there is no denying that his theory was the one that started their very existence. The theory of Scientific Management, Scientific Management is a micro level theory. Its unit of analysis is the physical activities of work. It deals mainly with the relationship of a worker to his or her work. Emphasis remains on man-machine relationship with the objective of improving performance of routine, repetitive production tasks. 1.3 Origin of Scientific Management theory The origin of Scientific Management theory was related with industrial revolution. The Midvale Steel company ''one of America's great armorplate making plants'' was the birthplace of scientific management. F.W Taylor at the age of 22 started his job at that company. During his job he gained some experience which tried to shape his idea later.

new problems of industrial planning and management. The working conditions in the factories were very much chaotic. The work methods, tools and procedures were neither standardized nor planned for efficiency.

Choice of methods of work was mainly left to the workers themselves resulting in considerable ad hoc planning and inefficiency. There was a need to increase productivity which required in the long run a more rational and integrated approach to managerial problems. Rapid industrialization had given rise to a new managerial class who were being called upon to face new problems not encountered earlier. It was mainly to fulfill this need and find ways to raise industrial productivity that Taylor came out with his ideas on Scientific Management, a term coined by Louris D Brandies first and subsequently used by Taylor in his widely known book, Principles and Methods of Scientific Management. Horace Bookwalter, in his 1918 work, Scientific management: A History and Criticism, identified seven other leaders in the movement, most of whom learned of and extended scientific management from Taylor's efforts: · Henry L. Gantt (1861–1919) · Carl G. Barth (1860–1939) · Horace K. Hathaway (1878–1944) · Morris L. Cooke (1872–1960) · Sanford E. Thompson (1867–1949) · Frank B. Gilbreth (1868–1924). Gilbreth's independent work on "motion study" is on record as early as 1885; after meeting Taylor in 1906 and being introduced to scientific management, Gilbreth devoted his efforts to introducing scientific management into factories. Gilbreth and his wife Dr Lillian Moller

Taylor believed in finding the right job for the right worker and paying that worker well for the increased output rather than simply paying for the job. ·· In 1910, U.S. Supreme Court Justice Louis Brandeis cited Taylor's work in U.S. Interstate Commerce Commission hearings as a progressive management technique that could raise pay and reduce the physical strain on workers while simultaneously increasing profits for business owners. It was Brandeis who created the term “scientific management” to refer to Taylor's research. Taylor summed up his own work with these words: “true scientific management requires a mental revolution on the parts of management and of workers.” Harrington Emerson (1853–1931) began determining what industrial plants' products and costs were compared to what they ought to be in 1895. Emerson did not meet Taylor until December 1900, and the two never worked together. Emerson's testimony in late 1910 to the Interstate Commerce Commission brought the movement to national attention and instigated serious opposition. Emerson] contended the railroads might save $1,000,000 a day by paying greater attention to efficiency of operation. By January 1911, a leading railroad journal began a series of articles denying they were inefficiently managed. When steps were taken to introduce scientific management at the government-owned Rock Island Arsenal in early 1911, it was opposed by Samuel Gompers, founder and President of the American Federation of Labour (an alliance of craft unions). When a subsequent attempt was made to introduce the bonus system into the government's Watertown Arsenal foundry during the summer of 1911, the entire force walked out for a few days. Congressional investigations followed, resulting in a ban on the use of time studies and pay premiums in Government service. Taylor's death in 1915 at age 59 left the movement without its original leader. In management literature today, the term "scientific management" mostly refers to the work of Taylor and his disciples ("classical", implying "no longer current, but still respected for its seminal value") in contrast to newer, improved iterations of efficiency-seeking methods. urgently required new techniques of management. Taylor's principles of management were “scientific” to the extent that they were based on first hand experimentation in, and observation of, work procedures and conditions in industrial enterprises. The major goals of scientific management were to raise industrial output by systematic application of the methods of science, to managerial book made certain fundamental assumptions. They were: (a) industrial processes can be made open for scientific observation and experimentation. The work procedures of labour can be reduced to basic motions to ascertain the longest, shortest and average time needed for each motion; (b) The standard time prescribed for each operation can be produced at a designated standard of efficiency and economy; (c) The workers can be trained by the management in the best methods for achieving the industrial objectives. 1.4 Conclusion It is true that although Scientific Management led to a reform movement which tried to eliminate industrial problems but it was equally opposed by many scholars and critics. While it was prefigured in the folk wisdom of thrift, it favored empirical methods to determine efficient procedures rather than perpetuating established traditions. Thus it was followed by a profusion of successors in applied science, including time and motion study, the Efficiency Movement (which was a broader cultural echo of scientific management's impact on business managers specifically), Fordism, operations management, operations research, industrial engineering, management science, manufacturing engineering, logistics, business process management, business process re engineering, lean manufacturing, and SIX SIGMA. There is a fluid continuum linking Scientific Management with the later fields, and the different approaches often display a high degree of compatibility. 2.3 Objectives of Scientific Management (a) elimination of discrimination in wage rates and elsewhere; and to eliminate factors of the environment which are irritating and harmful. (Chakraborty and Chand, 2012) Taylor rejected the notion, which was universal in his day and still held today, that the trades, including manufacturing, were resistant to analysis and could only be performed by craft production methods. In the course of his empirical studies, Taylor examined various kinds of manual labor. For example, most bulk materials handling was manual at the time; material handling equipment as we know it today was mostly not developed yet. He looked at shoveling in the unloading of railroad cars full of ore; lifting and carrying in the moving of iron pigs at steel mills; the manual inspection of bearing balls; and others. He discovered 65 NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 many concepts that were not widely accepted at the time. For example, by observing workers, he decided that labor should include rest breaks so that the worker has time to recover from fatigue, either physical (as in shoveling or lifting) or mental (as in the ball inspection case). Workers were allowed to take more rests during work, and productivity increased as a result. Subsequent forms of scientific management were articulated by Taylor's disciples, such as Henry Gantt; other engineers and managers, such as Benjamin S. Graham; and other theorists, such as Max Weber. Taylor's work also contrasts with other efforts, including those of Henri Fayol and those of Frank Gilbreth, Sr. and Lillian Moller Gilbreth (whose views originally shared much with Taylor's but later diverged in response to Taylorism's inadequate handling of human relations). Scientific management requires a high level of managerial control over employee work practices and entails a higher ratio of managerial workers to laborers than previous management metho. Such detail-oriented management may cause friction between workers and managers. Taylor observed that some workers were more talented than others, and that even smart ones were often unmotivated. He observed that most workers who are forced to perform repetitive tasks tend to work at the slowest rate that goes unpunished. This slow rate of work has been observed in many industries and many] countries and has been called by various terms. Taylor used the term "soldiering", a term that reflects the way conscripts may approach following orders, and observed that, when paid

the same amount, workers will tend to do the amount of work that the slowest among them does. Taylor describes soldiering as "the greatest evil with which the working-people ... are now afflicted".

This reflects the idea that workers have a vested interest in their own well- being, and do not benefit from working above the defined rate of work when it will not increase their remuneration. He, therefore, proposed that the work practice that had been developed in most work environments was crafted, intentionally or unintentionally, to be very inefficient in its execution. He posited that time and motion studies combined with rational analysis and synthesis could uncover one best method for performing any particular task, and that prevailing methods were seldom equal to these best methods. Crucially, Taylor himself prominently acknowledged that if each employee's compensation was linked to their output, their productivity would go up. Thus his compensation plans usually included piece rates. In contrast, some later adopters of time and motion studies ignored this aspect and tried to get large productivity gains while passing little or no compensation gains to the workforce, which contributed to resentment against the system.Taylorism led to productivity increases, meaning fewer workers or working hours were needed to produce the same amount of goods. In the short term, NSOU ● CC-PA-02 66 productivity increases like those achieved by Taylor's efficiency techniques can cause considerable disruption. Labor relations often become contentious over whether the financial benefits will accrue to owners in the form of increased profits, or workers in the form of increased wages. As a result of decomposition and documentation of manufacturing processes, companies employing Taylor's methods might be able to hire lower-skill workers, enlarging the pool of workers and thus lowering wages and job security. In the long term, most economists consider productivity increases as a benefit to the economy overall, and necessary to improve the standard of living for consumers in general. By the time Taylor was doing his work, improvements in agricultural productivity had freed up a large portion of the workforce for the manufacturing sector, allowing those workers in turn to buy new types of consumer goods instead of working as subsistence farmers. In later years, increased manufacturing efficiency would free up large sections of the workforce for the service sector. If captured as profits or wages, the money generated by more-productive companies would be spent on new goods and services; if free market competition forces prices down close to the cost of production, consumers effectively capture the benefits and have more money to spend on new goods and services. Either way, new companies and industries spring up to profit from increased demand, and due to freed-up labor are able to hire workers. But the long- term benefits are no guarantee that individual displaced workers will be able to get new jobs that paid them as well or better as their old jobs, as this may require access to education or job training, or moving to different part of the country where new industries are growing. Inability to obtain new employment due to mismatches like these is known as structural unemployment, and economists debate to what extent this is happening in the long term, if at all, as well as the impact on income inequality for those who do find jobs. Though not foreseen by early proponents of Scientific Management, detailed decomposition and documentation of an optimal production method also makes automation of the process easier, especially physical processes that would later use industrial control systems and numerical control. Widespread economic globalization also creates opportunity for outsourced to lower-wage areas, with knowledge transfer made easier if an optimal method is already clearly documented. Especially when wages or wage differentials are high, automation and off shoring can result in significant productivity gains and similar questions of who benefits and whether or not technological unemployment is persistent. Because automation is often best suited to tasks that are repetitive and boring, and can also be used for tasks that are dirty, dangerous, and demeaning, proponents believe that in the long run it will free up human workers for more creative, safer, and more enjoyable work. The early history of labor relations with scientific management in

[However] One of the best known experts once spoke to us with satisfaction of the manner in which, in a certain factory where there had been a number of union men, the labor organization had, upon the introduction of scientific management, gradually disintegrated. ...From 1882 (when the system was started) until 1911, a period of approximately thirty years, there was not a single strike under it, and this in spite of the fact that it was carried on primarily in the steel industry, which was subject to a great many disturbances. For instance, in the general strike in Philadelphia, one man only went out at the Tabor plant [managed by Taylor], while at the Baldwin Locomotive shops across the street two thousand struck. ...Serious opposition may be said to have been begun in 1911, immediately after certain testimony presented before the Interstate Commerce Commission [by Harrington Emerson] revealed to the country the strong movement setting towards scientific management. National labor leaders, wide-awake as to what might happen in the future, decided that the new movement was a menace to their organization, and at once inaugurated an attack... centered about the installation of scientific management in the government arsenal at Watertown. In 1911, organized labor erupted with strong opposition to scientific management, including from Samuel Gompers, founder and president of the American Federation of Labor (AFL). Once the time-and-motion men had completed their studies of a particular task, the workers had very little opportunity for further thinking, experimenting, or suggestion-making. Taylorism was criticized for turning the worker into an "automaton" or "machine", making work monotonous and unfulfilling by doing one small and rigidly defined piece of work instead of using complex skills with the whole production process done by one person. "The further 'progress' of industrial development... increased the anomic or forced division of labor," the opposite of what Taylor thought would be the effect. Some workers also complained about being made to work at a faster pace and producing goods of lower quality. The Watertown Arsenal in Massachusetts provides an example of the application and repeal of the Taylor system in the workplace, due to worker opposition. In the early 20th century, neglect in the Watertown shops included overcrowding, dim lighting, lack of tools and equipment, and questionable management strategies in the eyes of the workers. Frederick W. Taylor and Carl G. Barth visited Watertown in April 1909 and reported on their observations at the shops. Their conclusion was to apply the Taylor system of management to the shops to produce better results. Efforts to

Workers complained of having to compete with one another, feeling strained and resentful, and feeling excessively tired after work. There is, however, no evidence that the] times enforced were unreasonable In June 1913, employees of the Watertown Arsenal petitioned to abolish the practice of scientific management there. A number of magazine writers inquiring into the effects of scientific management found that the "conditions in shops investigated contrasted favorably with those in other plants". A committee of the U.S. House of Representatives investigated and reported in 1912, concluding that Scientific Management did provide some useful techniques and offered valuable organizational suggestions, but that it also gave production managers a dangerously high level of uncontrolled power. After an attitude survey of the workers revealed a high level of resentment and hostility towards scientific management, the Senate banned Taylor's methods at the arsenal. Taylor had a largely negative view of unions, and believed they only led to decreased productivity. Efforts to resolve conflicts with workers included methods of scientific collectivism, making agreements with unions, and the personnel management movement.

Frederick Winslow Taylor, (born March 20, 1856, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, U.S.—died March 21, 1915, Philadelphia), American inventor and engineer who is known as the father of Scientific Management. His system of industrial management, known as Taylorism, greatly influenced the development of industrial engineering and production management throughout the world. Taylor was the son of a lawyer. He entered Phillips Exeter Academy in New Hampshire in 1872, where he led his class scholastically. After passing the entrance examination for Harvard University, he was forced to abandon plans for matriculation, as his eyesight had deteriorated from night study. With sight restored in 1875, he was apprenticed to learn the trades of patternmaker and machinist at the Enterprise Hydraulic Works in Philadelphia. Three years later he went to the Midvale Steel Company, where, starting as a machine shop labourer, he became successively shop clerk, machinist, gang boss, foreman, maintenance foreman, head of the drawing office, and chief engineer. Taylor was born in 1856 to a Quaker family in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. Taylor's father, Franklin Taylor, a Princeton-educated lawyer, built his wealth on mortgages. Educated early by his mother, Taylor studied for two years in France and 72 NSOU ● CC-PA-02 Germany and traveled Europe for 18 months. In 1872, he entered Phillips Exeter Academy in Exeter, New Hampshire, with the plan of eventually going to Harvard and becoming a lawyer like his father. In 1874, Taylor passed the Harvard entrance examination with honours. Instead of attending Harvard University, Taylor became an apprentice pattern-maker and machinist, gaining shop-floor experience at Enterprise Hydraulic Works in Philadelphia. He left his apprenticeship for six months and represented a group of New England machine-tool manufacturers at Philadelphia's centennial exposition. Taylor finished his four-year apprenticeship and in 1878 became a machine-shop labourer at Midvale Steel Works. At Midvale, he was quickly promoted to time clerk, journeyman machinist, gang boss over the lathe hands, machine shop foreman, research director, and finally chief engineer of the works (while maintaining his position as machine shop foreman). Earlier at Midvale, working as a machinist, Taylor recognized that workmen were not working their machines, or themselves, nearly as much as they could (which at the time was called "soldiering") and thought that this resulted in high labor costs for the company. When he became a foreman he expected more output from the workmen. In order to determine how much work should properly be expected, he began to study and analyze the productivity of both the men and the machines (although the word "productivity" was not used at the time, and the applied science of productivity had not yet been developed). His focus on the human component of production Taylor labeled scientific management. He was a plant manager in Maine. In 1893, Taylor opened an independent consulting practice in Philadelphia. His business card read "Consulting Engineer - Systematizing Shop Management and Manufacturing Costs a Specialty". Through these consulting experiences, Taylor perfected his management system. His first paper, A Piece Rate System, was presented to the American Society of Mechanical Engineers (ASME) in June, 1895. Taylor was forced to leave Bethlehem Steel in 1901 after discord with other managers. Now a wealthy man, Taylor focused the remainder of his career promoting his management and machining methods through lecturing, writing, and consulting. In 1910, owing to the Eastern Rate Case, Frederick Winslow Taylor and his Scientific Management methodologies became famous worldwide. In 1911, Taylor introduced his "The Principles of Scientific Management" paper, eight years after his Shop Management paper. On October 19, 1906, Taylor was awarded an honourary degree of Doctor

In his second paper on Shop Management he discussed at length workshop organisation and enlargement. He focussed attention, in this paper, on his philosophy of management as given below: *

The objective,of management must be to pay high daces and nave low unit production costs to achieve the increased industrial efficiency. Management has to apply scientific' methods of researcl.1 and experiment to the management problems. Standardisation of working conditions and placing the workers on the basis of scientific ' criteria. Management must give normal training to workers and specific instructions to perform the prescribed motions with standardised tools and materials. e Friendly cooperation between workers and management on the basis of scientific systemof labour organisation. Taylor

the 'linear' system or the military type of organisation in which each worker is subordinate to only one boss. He replaced this system with what is called 'functional foremanship1 in which the worker receives orders from eight narrowly specialized supervisors. He divided the work not only among workers, but also at the supervisory level. Of the eight functional bosses, four will be responsibility 'or planning and the remaining four for execution: 'The gang-boss, the repair-boss, the speed-boss and the inspector are the four bosses for execution. The order la work and route clerk, the instruction card clerk, the time and cost clerk, and the shop disciplinarian are the four planning bosses. Taylor believed that in this functional type of organisation, the foreman can be trained quickly and specialisation becomes very easy. The concept of division of work between 74 NSOU ● CC-PA-02 planning and execution was incorporated in line and staff concept, wit11 line being the executing agency and staff being the planning agency. Taylor also specified nine qualities which will make a good 'foreman'. They are: education, special or technical knowledge, manual dexterity and strength, tact, energy, grit, honesty, judgement and good health.

The major principles of Taylor's

Scientific Management theory are as follows: Standardization of Work MethodsTaylor's first principle is related to the development of a scientific method for each task which would replace ad hocism and selection of work procedures. This could be achieved, he said,

by scientifically investigating the working conditions and the total quantum of work to be undertaken in any enterprise in a given period; and then fixing daily task assignments so that the workers may work in a planned way.

It is only through enforced standardization of methods, enforced adoption of the best working condition, and enforced cooperation, he observed that this faster work can be assumed. The duty of enforcing the adoption of standards and of enforcing this cooperation rests with the management alone.

Scientific Selection and Training of Workers Taylor's second principle is related to the selection, placement and training of workers in a scientific manner. Standardization of working conditions will be crucially served by selecting and placing worker on jobs for which they are best suited by their physical and intellectual abilities. Moreover, it is the duty of the management to train workers for their task and providethem all facilities for the development of their personalities.Equal Division of Work between Management and Workers Taylor's third principle was an open advocacy of an equal division of work and responsibility between management and workers.

Taylor had noted in his observations the unhealthy trend of the managers to place increasing burden on the workers, while assuming for themselves only minimum responsibilities. In this context, Taylor advised that half of the workers' work should be taken over by the management. The management had to undertake the functions of planning. organizing, controlling and determining the methods of work and the like for which it was best suited. Mutual Collaboration of the Workers and Management The last Taylorian principle requires active cooperation and cordial relations between management and workers. There should be mutual faith and trust,he said. According to Taylor, efficiency and productivity can best be promoted by creating a healthy and congenial environment in the organization which is the joint responsibility of both the workers and the management. (Basu,2018) Apart from these four basic principles Taylor also expressed concern about the following in the process of Scientific management: ● Mental Revolution:

He advocated a change in
75 NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 the attitudes of workers and management towards each other and their responsibilities. Managers should stop worrying about accumulating the most and instead focus on generating the most that will lead to more funds for them. The workers should stop worrying about increasing wages without putting in extra effort and instead increase their responsibility and efficiency and increase production that will definitely lead to raise in their salaries sooner or later. ● Division of work: Planning function to be taken over by management who were appointed for the same as they have been trained and skilled for the same and workers to concentrate on completing their functional task as per the rules and guidelines and methods planned by the former Thus,each doing the job for which they have been appointed and are best skilled for. ● Selection and training of workers: Taylor advocated the selection and training of workers for best performance of the work in an organisation. Right person for the right job. This is the duty of the management to choose a candidate for a particular job on the basis of his nature,character and capacities and also provide for formal training and clear instructions to them to perform prescribed motions with the standardized tools and materials. ● Work study and work measurement: Work should be studied systematically and scientifically and various laws and rules are to be applied to everyday work to find the one best way to do that job. Taylor studied each and every movement of the worker with a stop watch and removed all the unnecessary movements and found out the minimum time required for each job. This not only helped reduce time but also slow movement and fatigue of workers thus increasing efficiency and production leading to great profits for the organisation. ● Work as an individual activity: Taylor never advocated group work/activity. He asserted that people were only motivated by personal ambition and tends to lose his individuality/individual drive in a group setting. He stated that workers should have no verbal interaction as it leads to undue personal pressures. ● Development of management thinking: He viewed scientific management as a medium to develop management as a science. It means that specific laws and rules could be derived for management studies and practices

and those laws relate specifically to wage rates and way of doing work to increase the rate of production. Taylor advocated the use of standardized tools and equipment as well as methods. ● Standardisation of tools: Taylor himself developed and invented many standardized tools to increase production and efficiency and those after a successful stint became the benchmark to be used for those particular jobs. One of his most famous studies involved shovels. He noticed that workers used the same shovel for all materials. He determined that the most effective load was 21½ lb, and found or designed shovels that for each material would scoop up that amount. Taylor was able to convince workers who used shovels and whose compensation was tied to how much they produced to adopt his advice about the optimum way to shovel by breaking the movements down into their component elements and recommending better ways to perform these movements. This led to huge increase in efficiency and 76 NSOU ● CC-PA-02 production. ● Task prescription: It means that a worker should get a clear prescription and description of what task is to be done by them in clear language and instructions that is understandable by him/her by the management through proper planning, ● Trade unions: Taylor was against trade unions or group activity as mentioned earlier as he believed that it was unnecessary since the goal of the workers and management was the same. As scientific management would make everything crystal clear for everybody in the organisation ridding it of any conflict and with fair wages there is no need for trade unions. ● Incentive scheme: Taylor suggested a piece work rate incentive for workers. That means if a worker achieves a greater output than the target assigned to him he/she would then receive a bonus payment for each piece extra. And the bonus should be generous and consistent to encourage the workers to produce more. 3.4 Taylor's Functional Foremanship Taylor's Functional Foremanship Taylor developed the system of

considered the philosophy of scientific management much more important than to create mere mechanism of work. His major contributions were : Motion and time study or technical Standardization Techniques Work instructions Piece-rate wage systems 77 NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 Modern cost systems Specialization Planning Slide rule and other work-saving implements Work standards Product and implement classification systems The following chart illustrates the functioning of the scheme of the functional foremanship: Point to comment: The scheme of functional foremanship results in a complete violation of the principle of unity of command as advised by Fayol; because in this scheme, a worker is subject to the control and superintendence of eight foremen. The scheme, therefore, involves multiple commands as against a single command. (5) Differential piece-rate system of wage-payment: In order to motivate workers positively as also negatively to produce the standard output, Taylor devised a scheme of wage payment, known as the 'Differential piece-rate system of wage-payment.' The inherent features of this scheme are: (i)A standard output for each worker is determined in advance through scientific work studies. (ii)Two rates of wage-payment (based on piece rate system) are established- (a) A higher rate per unit of output; and (b) A lower rate per unit of output. (iii)Workers who produce the standard output or exceed the standard are paid according to the higher rate for all the units produced by them. Those workers who are unable to come up to the standard are paid according to the lower rate for all the units produced by them. Let us take an example to illustrate the working of this system of wage payment. Suppose the standard output is 25 units; and the two rate of wage payment are – Rs.2 per unit (the higher rate) and Rs. 1.80 p. per unit (the lower rate). Now, if a worker produces 25 units or more; he would be paid on total production done by him according to Rs.2 per unit. If, on the other hand, a worker produces only 24 units (taking the extreme case); he would be paid on all the 24 units produced by him, according to the lower rate i.e. Rs. 1.80 p per unit. In the latter case, the worker is not only suffering a shortfall of payment on one unit produced less by him as against the standard of 25 units; but also suffering a shortfall of payment of 20 p. per unit on all the 24 units produced by him. Thus there is a severe penalty for the inefficient worker in being paid according to the lower rate on total production done by him. 3.5 Time and Motion Study

The development of the shop system Taylor wished to know that under optimum conditions, how long a man or a machine would or should take to perform a given task, in a specified process, using specified materials and methods.

Taylor

used scientific fact-finding methods to determine empirically the right ways to perform tasks with the help of stop watch. Taylor also recognised the need for 78 NSOU ● CC-PA-02 scientific method of selecting the right men for the right jobs considering their initial qualifications and potential for further learning, effective supervision of a worker and his working conditions after placing the worker in the right place: Taylor wanted to lay down the foundation for sound personnel management to match the worker's abilities to the job.

Time and motion theory is a totally researched based work. Time and motion study was one of the major experiments conducted by Taylor. In these experiments he made use of motion and time study and analysed how workers handled materials, machines and tools.

Taylor observed that a worker of Bethlehem Steel Corporation lift 12.5 tons of iron per day whereas following some techniques and methods a worker of Dutch industry lift47.5 tons of iron per day. This kind of experiments identified the role and necessity of training in an industry. Time study is the technique to be employed for determining the time-content of a job. Motion study involves which is the observation of all the motions that comprise a particular job and the determination of the best set of motions. Scientific management addressed itself to the problems of the 'Shop Floor', that is, the bottom part of an organization, where the work performed is of a repetitive and routine nature.

He used scientific fact-finding methods to determine empirically instead of traditionally the right ways to perform tasks with the help of stop watch.

According to Taylor time and Motion both are important for the development and success of an industry. Time and motion study are important for Taylor's thesis for the following reasons, (a) This is the ideal way of an worker in an industry. (b) Division of labour. (c) Try to eliminate unnecessary work. (d) Experts should observe the workers work on the help of time clock. (e) Training and recruitment of the workers are very much important. (f) Additional work and additional incentives must be given to the worker according to skills and merits and also time of work.. Leisure of a worker in a industry is also a important task for the betterment of the worker. 3.6 Conclusion Taylor's Scientific Management theory helped management in many organisations overcome worker issues in the US, successfully and for the long term. That is why his ideas spread to all parts of the world and also to socialist countries. This shows its importance and relevance to organisations irrespective of the nature of economy. Taylor's theory brought a practical solution to the enormous problems of complex and growing organization in the industrial revolution peak and also lead to alleviate many problems of workers as well as management and also the issues between the two.

79 NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 3.7 Summary Taylor's work was popularised in the US by the American Society of Mechanical Engineers (ASME), and by a spin-off association, the Society to Promote the Science of Management, which was later re-named the Taylor Society to recognise his contribution. The development of university-based business schools which taught aspiring managers was also crucial to making the link between the principles of scientific management and their application in real work scenarios, and the importance of these schools increased rapidly after 1920. As public interest in Taylor's methods was amplified, it attracted consultancy firms to promote Taylorite methods. Taylor's writings were soon published worldwide. In the UK, Taylor's methods were slow to be implemented by leading industrialists who followed a more paternalistic tradition. Scientific management attracted criticism from the likes of Edward Cadbury, who argued in a 1914 article for the Sociological Review that since unskilled labour was already monotonous, 'any further sub-division of labour in the direction of eliminating any little judgement initiative as to the methods of work, valuable as it might be in its immediate impact on production, would almost certainly in the long run produce effects which would lower the whole capacity of the worker' At the time of his death in 1915 Taylor's work was the subject of much debate, both for and against it. By 1930, a new generation of social scientists were producing strong critiques of his ideas. Taylor was one of the first true pioneers of management through his scientific examination of the way work was done. His led directly to the achievements of other management gurus like Max Weber and Henry Ford. Along with Lillian and Frank Gilbreth (see Related Thinkers), Taylor is also recognised as a major contributor to time and motion study. This involved examining workers' movements in detail and using the results to streamline work and conserve effort, but the approach has now fallen out of fashion. In many ways Taylor's philosophy lies in direct opposition to today's best practice. The most common criticism of Taylor is that his approach is too mechanistic - treating people like machines rather than human beings. with the result being a one-size-fits-all approach to people management and training that fails to recognise the complexity of human motivations. ●

The Scientific management emerged at a time when capitalist development had reached the state of requiring organisational changes in the functioning of industrial enterprise. The crities considered that the scientific management helped more the owners of industries than the workers. ● The major criticisms of Scientific Management are as follows. 1. Many scholars think that the scientific management viewed man as a machine. This is a rather degrading view and unacceptable to modern industrial ethics. 2. Workers were opposed to time study procedure and standardization of all aspects of their performance that Taylor emphasized. Greater resistance came from the labour leaders who found in Taylorism a threat to their role and to the growth of trade union movement. 3.

Managers who wanted quick promotions to the high managerial position without any merit based on higher education opposed Taylor's stand, which advocated training by highly trained experts. 4. The management thinkers charged that Taylor's Scientific Management was NSOU ● CC-PA-02 82 impersonal and under emphasized the human factors important in industrial management. 5. It has been alleged that the movement was mainly concerned with organizational efficiency viewed in purely mechanistic terms. Labour's opposition to Taylorism led an investigation by Prof Robert Hoxie on behalf of the United States Commission of Industrial Relations. The main criticism of Hoxie was that the basic ideals of Scientific Management of Taylor and trade unionism were incompatible. Scientific management concerned itself mainly with production, efficiency and managerial problems, without touching on the psychological and emotional problems of the workers expressing concern over the routine and dullness of monotonous work and also uncertainty of employment etc. 4.3 Criticism of Taylor

There were many criticisms on Taylor's concept. The criticisms primarily came from: 1. Trade Unions and

Organised Labour 2. Managers 3. Human. Relations Theorists and Behaviouralists The trade unions were against the modern methods of increasing output by the introduction of the premium bonus system. The labour leaders considered then not only responsible for destroying trade unionism but also for

destroying the principle of collective bargaining. They thought that the system was a menace to the community at large as it causes continuous increase in unemployment. Trade unions felt that Taylor was more interested in the mechanical aspects of work and not which with the total work situation. A number of agitations by the labour organisations and their representations to the American Congress, led the House in 1912 to appoint a Special Committee of the House of Representatives to investigate into Taylorism. Although the report of the committee favoured neither the labour nor Taylor, the trade unions in 1915 succeeded in getting an amendment to Army Appropriation Act, forbidding the use of stop watches or the payment of premiums or bonuses in Army Arsenals. Trade Union's opposition to Taylorism also led to an investigation conducted by Robert Hoxie for the United States Commission on Industrial Relations. Professor Hoxie in his report criticised Taylor's scientific management and Taylor's approaches as they were concerned only with mechanical aspects and not with the human aspects of production. The report also stated that the basic ideals of scientific management and labour unionism were incompatible. Taylorisrn was also attacked by the managers. Those who wanted quick promotions tb the high managerial positions opposed Taylor's stand, which advocated training by experts. The managers "did not appreciate his scornful comments on rule of thumb method. Those who had fought their way to high managerial positions without the benefit of higher education were sensitive to Taylor's stand that unless assisted by highly trained experts they were unqualified to manage". It is very interesting to note that Taylor had to resign from both Midvale Steel Works and Bethlehem Steel because of the friction with the company managers. Among others who criticised Taylor include Oliver Sheldon, a British Management thinker, Mary Parker Follett, an American business philosopher, Sam Lewisohn, Elton Mayo, Peter Drucker and others. They chassed that Taylor's Scientific Management was impersonal and under emphasised the human factor. This criticism led to a series of experiments in industrial sociology and social psychology.

classic Hawthorne Experiments of Elton Mayo and other research studies on human relations and group dynamics in industry rejected Taylorism.

96% MATCHING BLOCK 116/133 W

Another criticism of Taylor is that he did not properly understand the anatomy of the work. His emphasis on the minute division of work and specialisation was severely criticised on several grounds. Firstly, the work gets depersonalisedand the worker becomes a mere cog in the machine. Relations between the worker and manager become. remote as a result the worker loses the sense of participation in the work. More than anything, the worker finds no outlet to exhibit his abilities and potentialities. Secondly, it may even lead to automation of the workers which may have physiological and neurological consequences.

Thirdly, Taylor's division of work into planning and executive divisions has severely been criticised. It is argued that in such situations it is difficult to develop proper team spirit, and if planning is totally divorced from execution it is difficult to secure the participation of the workers in the progress of-the firm. It has also been argued that Taylor: overlooked the fact that the principle of division and sub- division of work into minutest parts is subject to the law of diminishing returns. Thus, Taylor's philosophy was summarised in the following words: "First, he confuses the principle of analysis with the principle of action .... Second, planning anti doing are separate parts of the same job; they cannot be totally divorced". Behaviouralists charged that Taylor's methods of scientific management sacrifices the initiative of the worker, his individual freedom and-the use of his intelligence and responsibility. Herbert Simon and March have described the scientific management as the 'physiological organisation theory'. Braveman characterised Taylorism: (a) as abstracting the craft skill from the worker and housing it in a system of control, and (b) using this knowledge so gained to legitimise control of the worker. The second point about legitimizing the managerial control of the worker has been expanded by Whiteaker. He asserted that it is an effort by capitalist philosophy to'resolve the contrast between representative political

NSOU ● CC-PA-02 84 the appointed on-responsible authority in business and industry' in modern industrial societies. Sam Lewisohn and Oliver Sheldon, both management thinkers, also criticized certain aspects of Taylor's work. Sheldon stressed the human aspects of managerial problems, whereas Lewisohn emphasized the maintenance of good human relations in an organization. The worker, according to Lewisohn, wanted justice, status and opportunity above everything else, and hence simply a rise in wages would not automatically lead to added efficiency. The general allegation that Taylor had neglected the human factor in management led to a series of psychological and sociological studies with special reference to these factors. The Hawthorne experiment (1927-32) and post-World War II researches in group dynamics and human relations in industry helped in establishing to a great extent that psychological and emotional factors were no less important than economic in explaining workers' behaviour and determining organizational output and efficiency. Thinkers like Oliver Sheldon, M.P. Follet, Elton Mayo criticizes Taylorism as a inhuman theory and self neutral. They thought that Taylorism did not emphasize the responsibilities and liberty of a worker. Few scholars of public administration express the view that Taylorism has denied the prospect of collective bargaining and the possibility of the loss of employment is feared in it. 4.4 Limitations & Disadvantages of Scientific Management Scientific Management suffers from some common disadvantages like Limitations of scientific management are as follows: Exploitative devices. The benefits of increased productivity were not shared with the workers, therefore there was no change in the economic condition of the workers. Depersonalised work. The workers were doing the same kind of work every day, which led to monotony Undemocratic: There was no rotation of work, challenging tasks were performed by a specific group of workers while others were burdened with routine work. Unrealistic: The scientific management theory focused mainly on the financial and physical needs of the workers, while ignoring the ego needs and social status of the workers. Requires huge capital: Setting up of work study, planning department and training of workers involves considerable amount of investment. Autocratic: It provides total control to the superiors in the way they manage the subordinates. which leads to dissatisfaction among workers. However, more specifically we may examine the specific disadvantages from three distinct points of view:

NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 85 Disadvantages of Scientific management from Employers point of view: Most of the employers are highly reluctant to adopt the principles of Scientific Management. They object the introduction of the principles of Scientific Management on the following grounds. 1. High Costs It is a costly affair A thorough overhauling of the existing plant and organizational structure is highly expensive. Time and motion studies as well as other improvements involve a heavy initial outlay of capital. 2. Unsuitable for Small Firms Since the introduction of Scientific Management involves huge expenditure, small firms cannot afford to adopt it. 3. Response from the workers The system can be successfully implemented only with the heart felt co-operation of the workers. If they fail to respond favourably. the system shall fail to bring the desired results. Disadvantages of Scientific Management from Employees point of view: The principal objections raised by the organized trade unions and the labour class are as follows: 1. Loss of Individual's Initiative The leading objection to Scientific Management that comes from workers is that it leads to excessive job standardization. Under Scientific Management. methods of work are all standardized and instructions are given to the workers by the foreman. The workers are supposed to perform the work in the same style and carry out the instructions given by the foreman. This tends to destroy the individual worker's initiative. renders their skill useless, makes their work monotonous and converts them into automatic machines. 2. Speeding up of Workers Scientific Management aims to speed up the workers, not consideration of their health and wellbeing. Mere speeding up of the workers without corresponding structural changes in the organization and working conditions shall not lead to higher output but create only harmful mental conditions in the workers. 3. Autocratic Control of Functional Bosses Another severe objection raised against the Scientific Management is that it is undemocratic in nature as it gives absolute control to the functional bosses and lessens the interest and responsibility of the workers. The workers ought to obey the orders and the instructions given by the superior or the foreman. 4. Creation of Unemployment The critics of scientific management also argue that scientific management creates unemployment and hits the workers hard as a consequence of the adoption of labour saving devices both in the machinery and in the arrangement of work. 5. Unfairness Another objection is that it tends to be unfair to the workers. A lion's share of the additional profit arising out of increased efficiency does not go to the workers but goes to the coffers of the employer. It is also stated that the introduction of Scientific Management, has the effect of lowering the wages of the workers. But it is not true because Taylor himself has proved with statistical data that workmen in

NSOU ● CC-PA-02 86 the scientifically managed companies received wages 35% higher than those doing the same job in other companies. 6. Monotony Separation of planning function from that of doing, and excessive specialization, reduces the work to a mere routine. It would create monotony. Monotony refers to a mental state of slackness, inefficiency and a loss of interest in the job. 7. Opposed by Trade Unions under Scientific Management, the dominant issues of wages and working conditions are scientifically determined. This aspect embraces the workers and tries to introduce ideal conditions of work. Such a thing will naturally upset the very basis of the trade union movement. 8. Absence of Non-financial Incentives Absence of non-financial incentives is another drawback of the Scientific Management. Non-financial incentives can do many things more than what financial incentives can do. Finally, it is also pertinent to understand the disadvantages of Scientific Management from the point of view of industrial psychologists: The objections raised by the industrial psychologists are mainly based on the human element involved in the management. They view that Taylor's principles are too impersonal and undermine the importance of the human factor. The following are the main objections raised by them: 1. Workers are human beings and cannot be standardized in the same way as machines and materials. Any attempt to standardize their activities will not result in a success. 2. The Scientific Management places emphasis on discovering the one best way of doing a work without considering the individual difference of the workers. Each human being has his own genius, abilities, style and mode. Hence, the best can be obtained only by giving scope to shape their carrier according to their carrier abilities and aptitudes. 3. Payment of wages on piece rate basis will make the workers disappointed, particularly the beginners and untrained workers. 4.5 Braverman's take on Scientific Management Braverman argued that Taylor's principles of scientific management can be better defined as 1. Dissociation of the labour process from the skills of the workers achieved through extreme division of labour. It put management in control of the work process and diminished the autonomy of workers. Additionally, it leads to deskilling that reduces the skills needed for a given product or service and/or can involve loss of skill as a result of failure to exercise them. Additionally, deskilled workers have little power as they can be easily replaced leads to worker alienation. 2. By separating conception and execution it created dehumanizing
NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 87 conditions by separating mental and manual labor. When workers are completely excluded from the process that governs their behavior, how can it be considered 'the science of work? Additionally, why does the work need to be studied by management and not by workers? Why not scientific workmanship rather than scientific management? Braverman argues that the only reason this is done is to establish management control and cheapen the worker's effort or labour. 3. Monopoly over knowledge to control each step of the labour process and its mode of execution. The rise of management has been systematically associated with rendering conscious the tendencies of capitalist production. This ensures that as the craft declined, the workers sink to a level of general and undifferentiated labour power, adaptable to a greater range of simple tasks, while the process knowledge is concentrated in the hands of management. Overall, scientific management resulted in a massive transfer of power to management from the workers, reduced the autonomy of workers, eroded working conditions, and threatened unemployment. Braverman argued that scientific management undermined cooperation between managers and workers. 4.6

Conclusion The above discussion on scientific management shows that the Taylor's scientific management was responding to the problems of the early industrial organisations. Taylorism provided certain practical solutions to the problems of industries and they got benefited from scientific management. Taylor firmly believed that there is a best method" for doing any work. One has to find out the best method by systematic study of work. Taylor emphasised that the management has to take up equal responsibility for the work done in the organisation. He also emphasised that there is a need to select the right type of persons to perform the job and also train them in improving the performance. Apart from systemic study of the work, the standardisation of tools and procedures are necessary. There is also a need for complete understanding and cooperation between the worker and the management. They should instead of focusing on increase in the wages and profits; they should give importance to increase the production.

Harry Braverman, maybe, was one of the sharpest critics of Taylor. He provided systematic criticism of scientific management. First, Taylor made several assumptions about human behavior But his principles of scientific management only addressed and directed management intervention toward the systematic problem of ill-designed organizations and not the human condition. Braverman argued that "scientific management lacked the true characteristics of science. He argued that unlike true science, scientific management does not attempt to discover the causes of the antagonistic social relationship between the management and the worker.
NSOU ● CC-PA-02 88 Other criticism of scientific management includes a very a-social view of workers Scientific management treats workers as a mere instrument of production reducing them to a cog in a machine. Such an outlook represents a capitalist viewpoint rather than a human viewpoint. It does not investigate labour conditions but rather works on labour adaptability to the needs of capitalists. Taylor desired absolute control of the work process to dictate the precise manner in which work is to be performed. To this end, he pioneered a far greater division of labour than anyone else to establish the "work ethic. In another criticism of scientific management, scholars argue that the idea about a fair day's wage for a fair day's work is also ill-defined. In reality, a 'fair's day's work' was the maximum amount of work a person could do without collapsing. Why a fair day's work defined this way was never made clear One can argue that a fair day's work can be equated to the amount of labour necessary to add to the product a value equal to the worker's pay. But this is not how it is defined. Why? There can't be any profit under such conditions. Thus, there is nothing fair about this process making this phrase meaningless. A fair day's wage is defined as the minimum amount that could be paid to induce the worker to give the defined level of effort. 4.7 Summary ● The

Without this scientific management does not exist. Basically Taylor's Scientific Management theory tried to remove the disorder and chaotic situation and thus it augmented the rise of industrial revolution. In many ways Taylor's concept has been relevant today. His framework for organization had its emphasis on clear delineation of authority, responsibility, separation of planning from operations, incentive schemes for workers, training of worker, promotion of working condition and task specialization. Instead of the rule of thumb method, he was in favour of greater autonomy for workers, who would decide the work methods among themselves and select their tools accordingly. Despite number of limitations Taylor's concept of Scientific Management highly influenced the management discourse in the following decades. From socialist country to capitalist country no one ignore the contribution of the Scientific Management. By 1913, V.I. Lenin wrote that the '' most widely discussed topic today in Europe, and to some extent in Russia, is the system of American engineer Frederick Taylor. In the erstwhile Soviet Union, Taylorism was advocated by Aleksei Gastev in (the movement for the scientific organization of labour). It founded faith in both V.I.Lenin and Leon Trotsky. Not only in Soviet Union in the 1950s, Scientific Management theory had impacted on the growth in East Germany. Taylorism was one of the first attempts to systematically treats management and process improvement as a scientific problem and Taylor is considered as the father of modern industrial engineering. All the fields of management as well as public administration never forget the contribution of F.W Taylor.

Peter Drucker regarded Taylor as the creator of knowledge management, because the aim of scientific management was to produce knowledge about how to improve work process. It is very clear to say that ,Scientific Management eventually resulted to evolve modern management. Taylor introduced science of problem solving in productivity maximisation. This drift from an ancient, rigid and adhoc system has gradually, been modified by involving Industrial psychology and Behavioural sciences. It paved the way to evolve contemporary management and performance measurement research. While retaining core concepts of Scientific Management, the contemporary high performance management system, reduces employee-owner status distinctions and prioritises the employee initiatives, 5.3 Significance of Scientific Management Theory

Taylorism, has provided new insights into modern day project management of the booming era of science and technology helping, the individual within any organisation and rank to realise that, implications of human factor and its contribution together with systematic execution of processes is inevitable for output maximization. Significance of Scientific Management: Taylor's theory has the following positive attributes. 1. Better management. This theory gained wide popularity in the managerial world, inboth business and non-business organisations. It introduced better management through scientific methods such as work study, incentive plans, rest hours etc. 2. Optimum allocation of resources: Scientific management eliminates wasteful time and motions in performing various activities. It introduced time and motion studies to increase contribution to organisational goals. He discovered workers' true capacity and provided 'a fair day's work for a fair day's wage'. 3. Scientific approach. It emphasised on scientific selection, education and development of workers so that problem-solving is not based on random decision making. It advocated selection on the basis of job requirements. Selection of right person for the right job is the basis of this theory. Training methods are also scientifically designed to develop workers to perform the jobs they are best suited for. 4. Work specialisation: He identified planning and execution as two distinct jobs. People responsible for planning and execution belong to separate departments Instructions are given by foremen specialised in their areas. This results in smooth business operations. 5. Mental revolution: He advocated mental revolution on the part of both employers and employees. This revolution changed the attitude of management and workers towards their work. 6. Productivity: Better management and optimum allocation of resources result in high productivity, high profits and high wages. It, thus, improves economic performance of both management and workers. 7. Harmonious relationships: Since management and workers cooperate with each other, relationship between the two tends to be harmonious. It reduces interpersonal conflicts and promotes unity of action. 8. Improved standards of living: Improved profits and wages improve the living standards of managers and workers. 9. Industrial prosperity: High productivity, profits and wages promote industrial peace. This promotes industrial prosperity and image in international markets. 10. Incentive for high production: Rather than treating all workers at par, the theory rewards efficient workers (those who produce more than the standard output) by paying them a higher rate and lower rate to inefficient workers (those who produce less than the standard output). This motivates workers to increase efficiency in order

Job satisfaction: Scientific methods, order in the areas of production planning. analysis of costs, wage systems, rest pauses etc. are used to promote job satisfaction amongst workers. 5.4 Importance of Scientific Management in Organisation Most companies in the 21st century have adopted the use scientific management in their operations. A good example is the American fast food restaurant that is known worldwide because of its advanced management skills. In his book, Thomas (2007). quoted Ford as the author of the assembly line for car manufacturing This American company has adopted the management style by Ford who furthered Taylor's ideas. Ford said believed that the profitability of the business organization could be improved by having every employee working according to an assembly line. Ford implemented this in a car manufacturing industry after Taylor invented the idea of division of labour. Sigmund (2007) believes the American company has adopted a design for the various branches of the food chain in its operations. This style reduces the number of steps the employees would take to complete a certain duty. In his study on motion, Bell brought the idea of avoiding unnecessary tasks in the organization. This has been adopted by the American fast food restaurant in order to avoid wastage of time. Again, in this same organization Taylor's ideas have also been adopted. Taylor's main aim of scientific management was to ensure specialization and division of labour amongst the employees. The American fast foods restaurant uses this idea to create hamburger. In his article, Bell says this business organization simplified the hamburger in to a number of steps. This was done as follows; grilling the burger, put in lettuce and tomatoes add sauce then put into rolls and wrap. This has improved efficiency and as well creates specialization because every task required a different employee. Although scientific management has been of great significance in this restaurant, it has had some limitations. It limits the employees with advanced skills. This is because the skills are just wasted in the highly simplified job operations. This not only denies the opportunity for skill presentation but also their human rights as individuals. Scientific management has also been applied today in supermarkets. Supermarkets make use of Taylor's idea of division of labour and specialization to achieve their goals. This is because supermarkets employ different people due to the different tasks like stacking shelves, scanning products sold in supermarkets and handling of queries. Another area that uses scientific management is the centre for calls which initially used the rule of thumb. This was replaced by scientific management in order to make services from employees efficient and appropriate, as explained by Bell As discussed by Ritzer (2010), scientific management encourages control of the senior management to the employees. This

NSOU ● CC-PA-02 94 was used in these call centre's where the senior managers recorded the conversations of the employees hence this kept the employees under the control of their employers. Airport is another industry that has adopted the use of scientific management in its daily operations. A good example of this is in tagging with a barcode the luggage and bags as they are carried through sensors in the conveyor belt. This applies Ford's principle of the assembly line. This improves efficiency in the industry. Again, in car manufacturing industries, there is also application of the scientific management These industries make use of Ford's principle of assembly line. Car manufacturing industries like Toyota make use of this principle in making their products. The process is broken down to various steps. This increases efficiency and improves the quality of the products hence increasing productivity. Another organization using scientific management is the hospitals, which have a reception office. Some of the criticism of this theory are as follows: 1) Considered as pro capitalist, i.e. only favouring the rich and ruling class society and not the workers. 2) Trade unions criticised it as a theory to destroy collective bargaining with the ruling class by the workers for their benefits. 3) Very mechanical and thought of workers as nothing more than mere cogs in a wheel. Not humanistic as it only concerned itself with efficiency and production and managerial problems not the psychological and emotional problems of workers like the routine and monotony of their work and uncertainty of employment etc. Humanistic approach scholars advocated that workers also needed justice and status as well as opportunities and not just a rise in wages. 4) managers also opposed Taylor as they felt he was putting unnecessary burden on them and equating them with workers through his principles of equal division of work and responsibility and training for managers. 5) His opposers stated that he made the workers nothing more than robots who were dependent only on orders of management and were not to use their own heads from the experience and skills they had and doing the job physically he knew much more than management. 6) They opposed his idea of functional foremanship by saying that the worker would fail as he would not be able to please so many supervisors every time. 7) Psychologists stated that simply following rules makes workers depersonalised and they would develop a dislike to their work and this would lead to robotising of workers with no ideas of their own.

characteristics of bureaucracy identified by Karl Marx ● Marx's view on the role of bureaucracy in Capitalist Democratic State ● The significance of Marx's view on bureaucracy ● Lenin's modification of Marxian concept of bureaucracy 1.2 Introduction In common parlance, bureaucracy is a part of the executive organ of the government. It is an institution for achieving efficiency in governance. Bureaucracy is, in fact, a reservoir of facts, skill and expertise required for policy formulation and policy execution. Marx and his associate, Engels and other adhereing to classical Marxism in particular, however, had expressed a different view towards bureaucracy. The Marxian standpoint is based upon his praxis known as dialectical and historical matrerialism. According to this 'world outlook', the production relations of any particular society constitute the'base' of that society and upon the base is built the entire range of 'superstructure'. This superstructure defends the society and ensures its endurance in the face of all crises arising particularly from the forces which are the victims but potential to reshape and change the existing society yielding qualitatively a new one in its place. Marx argues that 'normally' the superstructure does not have autonomy of its own apart from the interests, orientation and objectives of the base and the superstructure.

From his dialectical materialist approach to history Marx opines that bureaucracy is an important part of the state which is the principal part of the superstructure. In a class divided society, based on the institution of private property, bureaucracy is an apparatus of the state that exerts class exploitation and class domination in order to consolidate the power and the all–pervading authority of the state. This state is commited primarily to strengthen the system of the private ownership of the means of production and of exchange upon which is built the edifice of the institution of private property. In an exploitative class society, bureaucracy, as a constituent organ of the state, plays the role and performs the functions that are assigned by the state. The will, power and role of the state, Marx argues, are reflected in and materialized by the bureaucracy. Deeply observing the nature and style of functioning of bureaucracy in Prussia, Marx held the view that bureaucracy is the epitome of knowledge that justifies class domination. Bureaucratic phenomenon rationalizes the status quo in a class divided society and resists change in the economic structure and in the sphere of politics. In modern capitalist state, bureaucracy as part of the superstructure, serves the interest of the modern capitalist class. Marx held the view that with the abolition of the capitalist state after the successful socialst revolution and after attainment of developed socialist society bureaucracy will cease to exist and the people themselves will guide themselves for their development and for their ever expanding freedom. Like Marx, Lenin also believes that bureaucracy in modern bourgeois state works as a machine used by the bourgeoisie to exploit the common people. But as a state executive responsible to build socialism in (the erstwhile) Soviet Union, Lenin could not altogether deny the importance of the existence of bureaucracy. He, however, sought to use this machine for the development of the prolaterian state and to expand the scope of people's participation in the sphere of making and executing socialist policies, thereby hindering the growth of bureaucratization in the Soviet state. 1.3 Karl Marx on Bureaucracy The term bureaucracy was coined just before the French Revolution of 1789. Jean Claude Marie Vincent de Gournay proclaimed that there was an illness in France which could be identified as 'bureaumania'. The strong protagonist of bureaucracy was Max Weber presented a systematic theory of bureaucracy; according to him the ideal of bureaucracy was a means for achieving maximum efficiency. In the Eighteenth Broumaire of Louis Bonaparte, Marx said, 'the executive power with its enormous bureaucratic and military organization, with its ingenious state machinery, embracing wide strata, with a host of officials numbering half a million, besides an army of another half a million, this appalling parasite body, which enmeshes the body of French society like a net and chokes all its pores, sprang up in the days of absolute monarchy'.

Marx viewed bureaucracy not as a mode of administration but an aparatus of class exploitation. According to Marx, bureaucracy never operates in the interest of the ordinary people; rather it is used to oppress them in the vested interest of the economically dominant class, so as to secure their own narrow self interest and to move fast upward in the career ladder. Throughout the civilised world the teachings of Marx evoke the utmost hostility and hatred of all bourgeois science (both official and liberal), which regards Marxism as a kind of "pernicious sect". And no other attitude is to be expected, for there can be no "impartial" social science in a society based on class struggle. In one way or another, all official and liberal science defends wage-slavery, whereas Marxism has declared relentless war on that slavery. To expect science to be impartial in a wage-slave society is as foolishly naïve as to expect impartiality from manufacturers on the question of whether workers' wages ought not to be increased by decreasing the profits of capital. The genius of Marx consists precisely in his having furnished answers to questions already raised by the foremost minds of mankind. His doctrine emerged as the direct and immediate continuation of the teachings of the greatest representatives of philosophy, political economy and socialism. The Marxist doctrine is omnipotent because it is true. It is comprehensive and harmonious, and provides men with an integral world outlook irreconcilable with any form of superstition, reaction, or defense of bourgeois oppression. It is the legitimate successor to the best that man produced in the nineteenth century, as represented by German philosophy, English political economy and French socialism. Inherent philosophy of Marxism is materialism. At the end of the eighteenth century, Europe witnessed a vibrant struggle which was mounted against every kind of medieval narrowness, against feudal institutions and ideas and this was best exhibited through the revolution of eighteenth century France. Materialism could prove itself to be the only consistent philosophy conducive to the growth of democratic values and perceptions during this period of turmoil. Marx and Engels defended philosophical materialism in the most determined manner and profoundly explained that materialism could be the basis of modern state theories. Their views were most clearly expounded in the works of Engels, Ludwig Feuerbach and Anti- Dühring, which, like the Communist Manifesto, are handbooks for every class-conscious analyst. Marx enriched his thoughts in the light of German classical philosophy; he was indebted to Hegel's thought on dialectics, as well as to the perspective of materialism as conceived by Feuerbach. His historical materialism was imbibed in scientific thinking. Views on history and politics became strikingly integral and harmonious and the scientific theory of capitalism, upheld a different mode of analysis. The economic structure was conceived as a structure on which the political superstructure, i.e., the political institutions, was supposed to erect its edifice. The state apparatus was meant to serve the interests of the economically dominant class. Marx explained that political institutions were designed and used to strengthen the domination of the bourgeoisie over the proletariat. Marx's principal work, Capital, was devoted to a study of the modern, i.e., capitalist economic system. The doctrine of surplus-value was the basic foundation of Marx's economic and political theory. In 1843, on the basis of the above stated premises, Karl Marx theorized about the role and function of bureaucracy in his Critique of Hegel's Philosophy of Right. In Philosophy of Right, Hegel highlighted and glorified the role of specialized officials in public administration, although he never used the term "bureaucracy" himself. Hegel gave an empirical description of the bureaucracy. Hegel proceeded from the presuppositon of the corporations; Hegel never developed any systematic or integated content on bureaucracy, but presented some general indications of its formal organisation. Karl Marx contended about the state formalism of civil society. According to Marx, the state's consciousness, will,

power, and the state's role as a corporation are materialised by bureaucracy. Thus to him bureaucracy was a particular, closed society within the state. Bureaucracy, according to Marx, effectively represented state's interest and the particular private aim, which in turn could convert state's interest into particular private goal as brought into forth by the economically dominant capitalist class. Ultimately it reduced the corporation to mere appearance, or at least took every possible attempt to do so, with an aim to maintain status quo; thus bureaucracy as the manifestation of state formalism was criticised by Marx and by the followers of Marxism. Bureaucratic hierarchy is actually a hierarchy of knowledge.
The mind of the bureaucracy is the formal mind or the real mindlessness of the state. It is, therefore, a categorical imperative, which induees bureaucracy to assert itself as the final end of the state. The formal aims of the bureaucracy come into conflict everywhere with the real aims.
The aims of the state then are transformed into aims of bureaus, or the vice versa. Thus bureaucracy is a circle from which no one can escape.

The bureaucracy is taken as the being of the state, the spiritual being of society; it is its private property.
The general spirit of the bureaucracy is its secrecy, mystery of delicate performance as the possession of state, preserved inwardly work mode, which it performs by means of the hierarchy, though externally bureaucracy
NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 101 functions as a closed corporation. Treasure of knowledge possessed by bureaucracy gives it authority, which it retains by the means of passive obedience, loyalty in authority, the mechanism of formalistic behaviour, allegiance to existing fixed principles, conceptions and traditions. In course of time bureaucracy turns this spiritualism into crass materialism; for the individual, the end of the state becomes his private end which he nurtures for pursuit of higher posts in career ladder. This notion about bureaucracy was criticised by Marx. According to Marx, bureaucracy helps concentrating the ownership of surplus in the hands of the capitalist class and is interested in retaining the existing exploitative capitalist system for its own vested interest and career aspirations. Marx argued that bureaucracy uses the state apparatus to maintain the status quo in class divided society, and functions in the interest of the dominant capitalist ruling class, which in turn helps retaining and extending its own narrow vested interest. Marx thus was critical about the role of bureaucracy. Marx felt that "The corporation is civil society's attempt to become state; but the bureaucracy is the state which has really made itself into civil society." Karl Marx concentrated on three basic concepts: i. the development of capitalism, ii. the magnitude or extent of its exploitation of working class and iii. the emancipation of working class While doing this, Marx focused almost on all the major economic, political and sociological issues. In course of
analysis, he strongly criticised the concept of bureaucracy, in terms of its role and function in sustenance of bourgeois economy, bourgeois polity and bourgeois society as a collectively designed mechanism of exploitation of the weaker class. Marx did not develop a comprehensive theory of bureaucracy like Weber. In course of his studies in some major capitalist countries of Western Europe regarding functioning of the state in those countries, he noted that bureaucracy, to the capitalists, was not simply a mode of public administration but also an instrument of exploitation of the working class. To Marx, the state is simply "the executive committee of the ruling class." Sometimes, however, he characterized the state itself as the exploiting agent.
In the Manifesto of Communist Party Marx and Engels wrote: "The executive of the modern state is a committee for making the common affairs of the whole bourgeoisie". There was no direct reference to the concept of bureaucracy in this respect, but Marx and Engels observed that in a bourgeois state the army, police, bureaucracy, clergy and legislature were meant for serving the interests of the modern capitalist state; the executive power was vested in the hands of a group of administrators, namely the bureaucrats and these persons represented the interests of the economically dominant capitalist class. Bureaucracy devoted itself for securing the interest of the existing class rule and simultaneously the capitalist class used it to establish its dominance and supremacy in all sections of society and state.
NSOU ● CC-PA-02 102 According to Marx, the bureaucracy always regarded itself as the custodian or in other term, private owner of public resources, taking every possible effort to conserve a substantial degree of control over these resources and for using them for their own purpose. Marx never considered bureaucracy as neutral and as indispensable part of administration; contrarily he held that bureaucrats flag the political color of bourgeoisie. As conceived by Marx, 'bureaucracy constitutes an imaginary state beside the real state and is the spiritualism of the state.
Thus every object has a dual meaning, a real and a bureaucratic one, just as knowledge is dual, a real and a bureaucratic. Bureaucracy holds in its possession
essence of the state, the spiritual essence of society, it is its private property.

The principle of its knowledge is therefore authority, and its mentality is the idolatry of authority. But within bureaucracy the spiritualism turns into a crass materialism, the materialism of passive obedience, faith in authority, the mechanism of fixed and formal behavior, fixed principles, attitudes, traditions. As far as the individual bureaucrat is concerned, the aim of the state becomes its private aim, in the form of a race for higher posts, of careerism [Critique of Hegel's Philosophy of Right (1843) Karl Marx: Selected Works, p. 31]. According to Marx, bureaucrats are the conservative allies of existing economic and social elites and they devote themselves for protecting the existing social and economic structures of society for their own class interests. Marx believed that the rise of bureaucracy was closely associated with the rise of state. "
The aims of the state are transformed into the aims of the bureaucracy and the aims of the bureaucracy into the aims of the state.
Its hierarchy
is a hierarchy of knowledge. The apex entrusts the lower circles with the insight into the individual while the lower circles leave insight into the universal to the apex, so they deceive each other reciprocally". He concluded that bureaucracy would disappear with the disappearance of the state, i.e., its withering away. If the modern state wished to do away with the impotence of its administration, it would have to do away with the contemporary private sphere for it only exists in contrast to the private sphere. While drawing an image on future communist society Marx distinctly mentioned that purification of the political facets of public power would be possible with the abolition of its bureaucratic element. He strongly criticized Hegel's view on bureaucracy as a mediator between the state and the civil society and saw the solution of the problem in the abolition of bureaucracy along with the abolition of the state itself, which to Marx was obvious in a classless society.
Marx
formed his theory of bureaucracy on the basis of his personal experience of the malfunctioning of the state administration.
He observed that Louis Bonaparte was gradually accumulating more and more dictatorial power with the help of bureaucracy and military. Particularly the former helped to make and execute laws and to strengthen the base of despotism, even making the legislature and other organs of the government crippled. The bureaucracy became rather an NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 103 indispensable part of Bonaparte's administration and despotism. He observed that in France and several other states of Europe the entire state administration was run by the bureaucrats and these state officers were dictated by the king or any type of dictator.
The bureaucracy was so common in his time that he very frequently used the phrase bureaucratic phenomenon, by which he hinted that the entire administration was under the full control of few officers known as bureaucrats. Following the Industrial Revolution and consequent changes in the political, economic and social structures of society, state bureaucracy established its inevitability everywhere. Even in parliamentary system there was great need for state bureaucracy. In Marx's Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte it was being stated that in France there was an enormous bureaucratic and military organisation; in France, bureaucracy was only the means of preparing and sustaining the class rule of the bourgeoisie. Marx treated bureaucracy as an instrument of ruling class—the most powerful class of society. He deduced the notion of bureaucracy from the bureaucratic relationship existing between the power-holding institutions and the social groups subordinated to them. According to Marx, the bureaucracy is an "appalling parasitic body". He also called it dreadful parasitic substance. He vehemently criticised the bureaucratic system of all capitalist structures of his time.
The bureaucratic system that prevailed in the contemporary states was not neutral at all, but as a powerful instrument of class rule and class exploitation, which was inseparable part of the state system with all monopoly of public resourses. In explaining 'the history of all the hitherto existing class societies' with a materialist perception Marx tried to show that the idea of bureaucracy emerged from the womb of capitalism. To him, neither in primitive and slave societies, nor in the feudal societies, there was any trace of bureaucracy. According to Marx and Engels, the emergence of the capitalist state and rise of bureaucracy are, in fact, inseparable from each other, as the capitalists in their attempts to safeguard its objective of profit maximization subsequently found it convenient to construct an apparatus that would help them exploiting their absolute rights over material and human property and wealth. Bureaucracy, in Marx's opinion, helped the bourgeois state in its activities of exploiting the working class.

According to Marx, in course of development, with the abolition of class distinctions and with the concentration of production in the hands of a vast association of the whole nation, the public power would have no option but to lose its political character; hereafter, it would not be designated as the organised power of one class for oppressing the other. He held that in such a situation bureaucracy would disappear, as the unproductive class of rulers.

Bureaucracy in capitalist democratic state Ralph Miliband, a noted Marxist thinker, in his The State in Capitalist Society: The Analysis of Western System of Power (1969)
while analysing bureaucracy (the Servants of the State) and its role in advanced capitalism, said that the political leaders of advanced capitalism have clear party colour, whereas the bureaucrats have no such colour—they are neutral or are supposed to be neutral. Actually the top leaders of the party, after coming to power, recruit and depute their own men in important posts; still these bureaucrats are expected to be politically neutral and to be loyal to the chairs in the ministry, irrespective of the colour of the party in power; their exclusive concern is to fulfil the purpose of the state administration under the direction of their political masters; but in performing their administrative functions in an impartial manner, neutrality is the major motto and challenge for these bureaucrats. Miliband contended this generalised notion regarding the myth of neutrality of bureaucrats in capitalist countries. According to Miliband these bureaucrats are the indispensable parts of administration as they play a crucial part in the process of governmental decision-making and as a trained and effective force take part in the configuration of political power in their respective societies. Though they are bound to carry the orders of their political masters, they make this political colour to be in tune with running trends of politics. Bureaucrats come from a particular ladder of the society, mostly upper ladder and therefore naturally prefer to maintain status quo, so that their authoritarian position in the social stratification remains unaltered. Thus, politically though they claim to be neutral at least in policy implementing affairs, their neutrality may be placed beneath the scanner of doubt. These bureaucrats mostly come from the power elite groups, either political or socio-economic; most of them hail from policy making elite groups or at least from upper layer of academic strata and mostly are the the students of top academic institutions, bearing an upper class stigma. Their grooming and socialization are in tune with existing capitalist socio-economic and political system; they have their own political ideas and inclination and family background that come in the way of their supposedly neutral role. Consequently, whenever a government decides to introduce “reforms” for the general benefit of the mass, these civil servants often fail to come out from their conservative values. Their conservatism and their own orthodox values and vested class interest come in the way of their impersonality and impartiality; their intentional or unintentional alliance with the existing economic and social elitism and nexus with political power blocs help retaining and maintaining the existing social and economic structures of society. In most of the cases the civil servants are the protectors and propagators of private capitalism and the advancement of globalisation has added additional importance to its role. Ralph Miliband has said that bureaucracy is a great supporter of corporate capitalism and especially after the World War II a close nexus has developed between top civil servants and corporate capitalism.

There is a nexus between the bureaucrats and politicians; bureaucrats play a crucial role in implementation of policy as well as in policy framing, thus often intervene in the functional domain of a democratically elected government. On behalf of the politicians the top bureaucrats interact and even negotiate with the magnates of private capitalism. This job is also done by the top bureaucrats. Miliband noticed that 'the world of administration' and 'the world of large scale enterprise' are now increasingly linked in terms of an almost interchanging personnel and this has become more obvious in the post industrial era or better to say in the advanced stage of globalization. This type of interchangeability between top civil servants and important leaders of corporate or private capitalism has created obstruction in the path of non-political identity of bureaucracy. Bureaucratic neutrality has become buzzword, according to the Marxist critiques. Marx, bureaucracy is nothing but a machine used by the bourgeois class to exploit the proletariat class. 1.5 Lenin on bureaucracy and his modification of Marxian connotation of bureaucracy The October Revolution ruthlessly had overthrown the old Tsarist state, but it left behind the conditions of chronic economic and cultural backwardness. Engels explained that in every capitalist society art, science and government are in the exclusive possession of a privileged minority and this minority always uses and abuses its positions in its own interests; the vast majority of the people in these societies are forced to toil for long hours in industry and agriculture for the bare necessities of life . After the revolution, in a condition of ruined economy, the workers were required to render more service, to work for a longer period of time, not for minority privileged, but for the mass, for the nation.Under the circumstances, in tune with Trotsky, Lenin proposed the New Economic Policy (NEP), which essentially suggested that the peasants must be convinced to voluntarily increase their production and also for consolidating the worker-peasant alliance. By 1921-1922, the situation was quite distinctive for a society wishing to build socialism under a working class leadership. In this context Lenin in his The State and Revolution (1918) elaborately discussed bureaucracy. Like Marx and Engels, Lenin believed that bureaucracy was a machine
used by the bourgeoisie to exploit the common people, particularly the working class. But to him in this affair both the bureaucracy and the military help bourgeois rulers to exploit the proletariat. But according to him each of these instruments is essential and indespensible for proletarian rule also; however he suggested that they must be utilised to satisfy proletarian interests. Instead of destroying the bureaucratic system from its root, NSOU ● CC-PA-02 106 1.6 Conclusion
The term bureaucracy was coined by Jean Claude Marie Vincent de Gournay to denote a negative role of government officials. Max Weber presented a systematic theory of bureaucracy. In the Eighteenth Broumaire of Louis Bonaparte, Marx said, this bureaucracy is an appalling parasite body. Marx viewed bureaucracy not as a mode of administration but an aparatus of class exploitation. In Philosophy of Right, Hegel highlighted and glorified the role of specialized officials in public administration. In a critique, Marx said that bureaucracy effectively represented state's interest and the particular private aim, the economically dominant capitalist class. Bureaucratic hierarchy is actually a hierarchy of knowledge. The bureaucracy asserts itself as the final end of the state. He strongly criticized Hegel's view on bureaucracy as a mediator between the state and the civil society and saw the solution of the problem in the abolition of bureaucracy along with the abolition of the state itself. Marx and Engels observed that the emergence of the capitalist state and rise of bureaucracy are inseparable from each other and together they operate to safeguard its objective of profit maximization. Ralph Miliband said that the political leaders of advanced capitalism have clear party colour and to be politically neutral, is a major challenge for the bureaucrats, as often they are the recruits of the ruling party. Social origin of these bureaucrats influences their role. According to Miliband, there is a nexus between the bureaucrats and politicians. Lenin believed that bureaucracy was a machine used by the bourgeoisie to exploit the common people, particularly the working class. But
to him each of these instruments is essential and indespensible for running the state by the proletariat. Lenin favoured to use.
Lenin favoured to use them for the development of the proletarian state, though Marx contended that both bureaucracy and military are the arms of capitalist government and the chief aim of the revolutionaries would be to smash it.
Marx proposed this in the context of the French Revolution. In the same tune Lenin in his The State and Revolution said that the real aim of all revolutionaries would be to smash or destroy the military and bureaucratic alliance prevailing in the present form to restrain them from exploiting the working class. Lenin characterised the bureaucracy as a parasitic, bourgeois growth on the workers' state, and an expression of the petty-bourgeois outlook which penetrated the state and even the Party.

In a class divided society and state based on class exploitation and class domination bureaucracy is used to accumulate more and more power for the rulers of the state, who work in the interest of the dominant economic class. Historically, the rise of the bureaucracy is closely associated with the rise of the state.

But modern bureaucracy is an outgrowth of the development of nation state as well as capitalism. In capitalist state, bureaucracy is constituted by the officials at the upper echelon of administration. These officials are appointed by the state and they are loyal to the state which, as the principal part of the superstructure, preserves, protects and defends the existing mode of production. Under capitalism, the officials constituting bureaucracy use to control and exploit the workers on behalf of the capitalists who establish overwhelming control over the economic structure of the society and pervading domination over politics in collaboration with the ruling class of the state. Marx is of opinion that state is not an universal organization. It is not an organic part of human society. It is developed with the development of private ownership of the means of production and of class division in society. Both these the private ownership of the means of production and the class division are the logical corollaries of the institution of private property. Marx argues that with the abolition of this institution of private property under the formidable pressure of the socialist forces, the state will wither away. And with this withering away of the state, bureaucracy, as an organic part of it, will cease to exist. Following the essence of the Marxist connotation on bureaucracy, it is argued that bureaucracy is a parasite body of society. In a class divided society, it is essentially a social class associated with the capitalists and the political elites who control the economy and rules the state either singly or on the basis of partnership. Bureaucracy is anti-people in orientation and it retards the process of participation of the people in and their inclusion into the sphere of administration of state. It, thus, alienates people from the affairs of the state. In underdeveloped and developing society, where democratic constituents or the democratic entities like press and civil society etc. are weak and lack integrity, bureaucracy tends to become irresponsive and plays an irresponsible public role and helps degenerate and turn a legal and constitutional democracy into a bureaucratic state. Marx had criticized the class character and class content of bureaucracy. He advocated its abolition in future society to be evolved out of socialist revolution. But the fact that follows is that neither in the former Soviet Union nor in the People's Republic in China, both

evolved out of socialist revolution, bureaucracy had/has not been obliterated, rather it had/has acquired a phenomenal strength and power in every sphere of both public and private life. The socialist state and their all organs are overburdened with pervasive bureaucratic phenomenon and the functions of the respective communist party considered as the vanguard of the working class, is overshadowed by the overwhelming growth of bureaucracy. The critics of the Marxist contention of bureaucracy express the view that Marx had no particular scheme for removing the dysfunction of bureaucracy. Nor did he offer any alternative pattern of administration which is absolutely compatible to one satisfying the needs and requirements of the disadvantaged, underprivileged and the marginal. Almost everywhere the political masters are increasingly becoming devoid of mastery over the knowledge, skill and expertise relevant to modern statecraft and this tendency is responsible for the incessant growth of bureaucracy.

Emergence and Role of Bureaucracy: Marxian Contentions Marx pointed out that bureaucracy arose with capitalism and the nation state in Western Europe around the sixteenth century. The concentration of wealth and power in the hands of merchant capitalists and absolute monarchs led to the need of an instrument for the management of wealth and the exercise of power. This instrument was the bureaucracy. With its help capitalists competed accumulated all the power of state in their hands. In medieval society trade was local. The invention of steamships made it possible to trade with distant places. The merchant adventurers, who had to go to

distant places needed to be insured by state power. This need of far-flung trade gave rise to the nation state. The rulers had to centralise the power of the state through unified state crafts, instead of decentralized administration of the feudal era. This could not be done except through a large number of officials. These officials constituted the bureaucracy. Hence the bureaucracy was associated with capitalism and the nation state. According to Marx, value is produced by human labour. Workers receive only a portion of the value produced by them in the form of wages. The other portion, which is retained by the capitalists, is constituted through their exploitation. Hence exp1oitation, which can be measured in this way, is always present in capitalist relations of production. The huge profits of capitalists are derived from the exploitation of a large number of workers. A capitalist cannot manage so many workers alone. He has to employ managers for this purpose. These managers, and officials associated with them, constitute the bureaucracy. Hence, according to Marx, bureaucracy consists of officials who control the workers on behalf of the owners or rulers. Its function is to get wealth out of the workers' effort to build wealth under the exploitative system of capitalism. Marx held that the governmental bureaucracy would have a similar function in regard to workers employed by the government. Large numbers of workers are employed by the government in non-industrial occupations also, such as postmen, nurses, teachers, mechanics, and so on, placed in a horizontal positions or in hierarchical layers. This workforce or wage laboureres include engineers, doctors, teachers, architects and scientists etc. who are also involved in productive activity. The bureaucracy keeps control over all of them on behalf of the government, politically elected rulers, coming from or backed by the capitalist class. Thus, for example, members of the Indian Administrative Service and also those of State Administrative Services advise ministers and in consultation with them, direct, supervise and control the workers involved in productive activity. Another function of the governmental bureaucracy is to help in maintaining capitalist relations of production in the wider society. The government bureaucracy implements labour laws so as to keep the wheels of industry moving and maintain NSOU ● CC-PA-02 112 the profits of the capitalists. Thus the governmental bureaucracy performs the important function of maintaining, nurturing and developing capitalism. According to Marx, the path to socialism lies mostly through capitalism. Hence, while on the one hand the development of capitalism accentuates exploitation, on the other hand it prepares the way to socialism. Marx held that if capitalism and the nation state could be superseded bureaucracy would also become obsolete. The emergence and growth of bureaucracy, the controversial role of this non-political officialdom, with the growth of capitalist state systems have been the subjects of considerable discussion among social scientists. Conventional protagonists of bourgeois socio-political system argue that bureaucratic hierarchies are indispensible in modern societies. The book in which the observation of Marx and Engles is most comprehensively presented is Marx and Engels: Collected Works.The Selected Works of Marx and Engels also narrated some basic views regarding State and its bureaucracy. Marx's criticisms of the state and its bureaucracy are scattered throughout his prolific writings. However, his most articulate position on bureaucracy is found in Contribution to the Critique of Hegel's Philosophy of Right (in Collected Works, vol.3) The Civil War in France, The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonarparte, and The Class Struggle in France are some of the literary contributions where Marx outlined his revolutionary views on the bureaucracy and the state and provided justification for their elimination.

According to Marx, the rise of bureaucracy is closely associated with the rise of state and Marx and Engels had thrown light on this issue in The German Ideology, where they narrated that as a class, the bourgeoisie is forced to organise itself no longer locally, but nationally, and to give a general form to its average interests. Through the emancipation of private property from the community the state has become a separate entity, alongside and outside civil society, but it is nothing more than the form of organisation which the bourgeois are compelled to adopt, both for internal and external purposes, for the mutual guarantee of their property and interest.
Marx in The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte acclaimed that the executive power with its enormous bureaucratic and military organisation, with its ingenious state machinery emerged as a support system to protect the interest and private property of the bourgeoisie. However, Marx criticised bureaucracy as an appalling parasite body, which 'enmeshes the body of French society like a net and chokes all its pores, sprang up in the days of absolute monarchy.' From these observations it is now clear what Marx actually thought about bureaucracy and felt that the rise of bureaucracy and growth of bourgeoisie were inextricably connected. He concluded that bureaucracy was not simply a mode of administration but an instrument of exploitation.

NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 113 holding institutions and the social groups subordinated to them. To a greater extent, Engels helped to expand the negative notion of bureaucracy in his The Origin of the Family, Private Property and the State. Lenin's State and Revolution echoed many of the Marxist themes of bureaucratic organization: its use as an instrument of class domination, as a bourgeois apparatus, and the withering away of the state. Marx's conception of the bureaucracy represents its alienated character standing above society, alienated from society and working in favour of economically dominant class. The characteristic detachment in official relationship to the mass of the people makes bureaucracy undesirable and self-destructive. In the course of functioning as the instrument of maintaining status quo, Marx noted that the bureaucracy acquires power of its own and gets alienated from the rest of the society. Ministers are busy with political affairs and have to depend upon the bureaucracy 'for information and advice. Thus, the bureaucracy comes to serve an important role in policy formulation also. If unions and association of the people, and political parties are weak, they are unable to communicate the needs and grievances of the people to the government, i.e., in a situation of political underdevelopment, the bureaucracy becomes the main channel of communication between the government and the people and whatever be their role, positive or negative, in a weak democracy they are the only instrument for running the business of the state. In developed countries also there is no alternative mechanism for implementation of public policies, which Lenin realized as a practical administrator. Marx also attacked incompetence in the bureaucracy. Under the existing circumstances, the bureaucracy identifies the interest of the state and its own private goals as identical. Political power is used to safeguard the economic power of the propertied class. According to Marx, as the coercive and repressive functions of the bureaucracy become more prominent, the intensity of class conflict increases and with it the possibility of revolution gets momentum. Therefore, according to Marx and Engels, the abolition of the state involves three steps: the overthrow of the bourgeois state by revolution, the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat and the "withering away" of the bureaucracy. 2.4 Critical Assessment of Marxist Notion of Bureaucracy Marx hardly wrote anything explicitly on bureaucracy. But in Critique of Hegel's Philosophy of Right (1844), The German Ideology, Civil War in France and in some other writings Marx expressed his views on bureaucracy and examined its role in the capitalist system.
He
deduced the notion of bureaucracy from the bureaucratic relationship existing between the power-holding institutions and the social groups subordinated to them. In course of expressing his concern about the development of capitalism, the magnitude of its ruthless exploitation of working NSOU ● CC-PA-02 114 class and the emancipation of working class, he covered almost all the major issues of economics, politics and sociology, amongst which bureaucracy found its place as a condemned parasitic body. Marx viewed bureaucracy as a class with particular vested interests, based on property relations. He considered bureaucracy a part of state mechanism and on the basis of his personal experience of the malfunctioning of the state administration
he attacked the so called characteristics of bureaucracy such as superior knowledge, merit principle, rule mindedness, impartiality etc.
It is important to note that the foregoing analysis is based on the writings of the young Marx of 1843, with his theory of historical materialism not yet fully developed. Marx then allowed the bureaucracy more autonomy than he did later. The significance of Marx's analysis of bureaucracy lies in his insistence that bureaucratic structures do not automatically reflect prevailing social power relations but pervert and disfigure them. Bureaucracy is thus the image of prevailing social power distorted by its claim of universality. In his manuscript for the fourth volume of 'Capital' Marx approached the role of bureaucracy from the economic side, which was criticized by the anti-Marxist thinkers and was modified by Marxist thinkers. But Marx could not provide clear ideological framework to reform or remove the bourgeois bureaucracy. He seemed confused regarding formation of an administrative set up in a socialist state. The classical Marxist discussion of the labour bureaucracy began as an attempt to explain the growth of reformism within the mass socialist parties of the early twentieth century. The leaders of the revolutionary left-wing of European socialism criticized the theory and practice of the mainstream of social-democracy. After the practical revolutionary success of the Bolsheviks, Marxist discussions of the labour bureaucracy became more relevant.

Lenin took the responsibility to explain how the bureaucracy can be dismantled or reformed to suit the requirements of social democracy. Lenin insisted for regulation and discipline. Rosa Luxemburg went to the extent of criticising Lenin for enslaving the labour moment to the bureaucracy. Karl Kautsky suggested acceptance of the inevitability of bureaucracy and to reorganise it in the interest of workers. Lenin answered his critics and espoused his views on bureaucracy in his book "The State and the Revolution" (1917), wherein he expressed the need to dismantle the old state bureaucracy and advocated the rule of the proletariat with strong central control till the withering away of the state. He also advocated
continuation of representative institutions. There would be officials, he stated, but not bureaucrats.

In reality what Lenin visualised is not the bureaucracy but a proletarian administrative apparatus. Lenin conceded during Eleventh Party Congress that the old bureaucratic apparatus could not be removed. While accepting the continuation of pre-revolutionary bureaucracy Stalin expressed the doubt that the Party may lose control of the state apparatus. During Sixteenth Congress of the Communist Party in 1930 Stalin accepted that there could be a new communist bureaucrat who could work against the interest of working class. The commitments of successive leaders could not make much headway in smashing bureaucracy in the Soviet Union. Trotsky who called for dismantling of bureaucracy, had a difference of opinion with Lenin and Stalin.

He wrote in The Revolution Betrayed (1937) that instead of smashing of bureaucracy in the Soviet Union he noticed the emergence of a privileged and commanding bureaucracy in the Soviet Union. In spite of theoretical commitment to dismantle the bureaucracy in the Soviet Union, bureaucracy continued as a new class and appropriated the surplus produced by the working class. It all reveals that bureaucracy as an inevitable institution survived every type of system.

Thus Marx opposed the bureaucratic structure in the political state and stated that such a structure
in
ultimately jeopardising the process of development and in its attempt to maintain the status quo of the capitalist system, would destroy the equilibrium in the polity. However, Marx has failed to suggest the alternative mode of administrative structure, which would help the Proletariat in running administration.

We find no evidence of any form of Communist administrative structure in the writings of Marx, though the Marxian approach was most explicit and optimistic in the elimination of the state and its bureaucracy. Experience shows that the Marxian version of bureaucracy is perhaps most deficient in its practical vision as far as the bureaucratization of society is concerned.

evident from the incidents of administrative transformation in erstwhile Soviet Union and China. Practically, it failed to take into account few basic aspects: ● The socialist states could not wipe out the bureaucratic legacies left by the previous imperial regimes. ● The organizational size and complicated administrative functions of Tzarist Russia and Imperial China required the sustenance of the existing bureaucratic structure mostly with older attitude and mode of governance. Class bias, recruitments based on ascription and kinship, corruption, inefficiency, ineffectiveness, isolation from the common men and so forth were found to be some of the major inherited problems. Even after the socialist revolutions bureaucracy was to be tolerated because of the lack of experts and professionals capable of dealing with the changing requirements of administrative and technical effectiveness which industrialization demanded. Therefore, pre-revolutionary bureaucracy continued with all its dysfunctional characteristics and primordial level of skills. But their attitude was not adaptable to the new order; the new regimes viewed them as parasites and unreliable burden on the society and economy. The new generation socialist rulers surrounded them with cadres and other officials, for which neither the old bureaucracy could function properly nor they could bring in the required change in the administration Moreover, it caused huge financial burden in the state. This bureaucracy was more a reactionary work force, than a progressive one under the supervision and control of the Proletariat. Marx's vision embodied in real states was hampered by the penetration of the party-bureaucratic–state machinery into every level of society in the Communist states, as in the case of the Soviet Union and China. Ernest Mandel provides a powerful Marxian alternative to the Stalinist, social-democratic and bourgeois theories that deny the possibility of democratically organized workers' struggles and workers' power in the modern world. in a series of work. Mandel's theory of bureaucracy is one of the central scientific foundations of our revolutionary socialist political project in the late twentieth century. Mandel presented a complex, coherent and empirically well-grounded response to the notion that the absorbtion of power by a minority of officials and experts is the “inevitable” result of complex, large-scale, modern social organization. Mandel argued that bureaucracy is the product of specific, historically limited relations among human beings and between human beings and the natural world as well; it is a product of specific social relations and material forces of production. Mandel's theory of bureaucracy provides a contemporary defense, extension and indepth exploration of the classical Marxist discussion of bureaucracy, in particular the works of Rosa Luxemburg and Leon Trotsky. Mandel's analysis of the material roots and development of the Soviet bureaucracy in Power and Money closely follows that of Trotsky in The Revolution Betrayed. Mandel provided a very powerful reply to various social-democrats and former Stalinists who claim that Stalin merely implemented Trotsky's economic proposals, though in a "barbaric form", in the late 1920s and 1930s. Mandel demonstrated that Trotsky continued, until his death in 1940, to advocate a democratically controlled economy that combined a dominant state-owned, planned sector with market mechanisms. Through his theory of bureaucracy and his investigations into the dynamics of capitalist accumulation in the twentieth century he attempted to defend the necessity of self-emancipation working class as the only basis for human liberation and survival. The notions that the labour bureaucrats could defend the gains of workers under capitalism or that the ruling bureaucracies could construct a viable alternative to capitalism had proven to be thoroughly utopian, as Mandel claimed According to Mandel, the material position and self-interest of the reformist bureaucracies in the west were evidences of this fact. Hegel's Philosophy of Right occupies a central place in the development of Marx's theory of the modern state. As Shlomo Avineri points out, despite its disorganised nature, Marx's 1843 Critique of the Philosophy of Right (hereafter 1843 Critique) is his most systematic work on political theory. While Marx had not yet fully developed a theory of the self-emancipation of the working class, without the official assistance of bureaucracy, his method remained consistent to penetrate beneath the abstract categories of political economy in terms of bureaucratic activity.

Later followers of Marx also felt that domination has always been there and will never end. Marx's notion has been criticized for its economic determinism. Another utopian thought is regarding withering away or abolition of state; under the circumstance, existence of bureaucracy is unavoidable to manage the administration of a large scale organization, like nation state, management of wich requires expertise, knowledge and training. New technological revolution may reduce the size of bureaucracy, may increase dependence on the technocrats, but cannot afford to abolish the structure altogether and this is evident from the course of history throughout the world. Dependance on bureaucratic administration makes equality a myth, as along with relations of production, there will be a strong power relations. Marxists have focused mainly on the origin, development, need or nuisance of bureaucracy as a structure, but the entire discourse appears to be misleading in the sense that bureaucracy is absolutely an indestructible trait that constitutes the core of the phenomenon, whatever be its side effects. In the governance of large nation states and its aspirational populations which dominate the present political landscape, hegemonic bureaucracies find a new space to operate and often inject their private gains into public sphere. For this they thrive, multiply and perpetuate their hold over the common citizens. Abolition of hegemonic bureaucracy or in other word, complete de-bureaucratisation or reform of this characteristic hegemony appears to be utopian. Robert Michels also ventured into the phenomena of the bureaucratic phenomena and he realized that the modern State needs a large bureaucracy because through it the politically dominant classes secure their domination. Gramsci saw hegemony as the supremacy of a social group or groups as ideological domination. Gramsci's thought on hegemony pointed towards an order in which a certain way of life and thought are dominant. Though Gramsci's concern was primarily with the Communist Party and not with the bureaucracy as a socio- political phenomenon, his thought is relevant to focus on bureaucratic dominance which is inevitable. The hindrance to bureaucracy is usually traced to the role and dysfunctions of public officials. These officials are enjoying too much power as politicians are often very casual regarding governance and rulers are short termed power lovers. There is need for the delimitation of bureaucratic autocracy, which is again a myth in immature democracies; this makes the ever-growing power of bureaucracy unavoidable. 2.5 Conclusion Like Weber, Marx did not build up a comprehensive theory of bureaucracy.

Western Europe and their mode of administration. In course of his study, Max observed that bureaucracy under capitalism does not offer simply a mode of public administration but it is also an instrument of exploitation of the working class. In the “Manifesto of the Communist Party”(1848) Marx and Engels stated that the executive of the modern state was a committee for making the common affairs of the whole bourgeoisie, by which they hinted towards the role of bureaucracy in managing the administration of the bourgeois state, though there they did not directly refer to the institution of bureaucracy. In The German Ideology, it was mentioned that the rise of bureaucracy was closely associated with the rise of state.
In The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte, they contended that the rise of bureaucracy and growth of bourgeoisie were inextricably connected and said that the bureaucracy was an instrument of exploitation and condemned it as a parasitic body. In Marx's view the rise and growth of bureaucracy must be viewed in the light of capitalism.
Marx observed that Louis Bonaparte was gradually accumulating more and more power and dictatorial power with the help of
However, Lenin realised the importance of bureaucracy in administration. He thought that the abolition of the bureaucracy of capitalist regime will lead to great anarchy or turmoil and this he did not prefer.
To him,
the function and character of bureaucracy were to be changed for the benefit of the working class and for building socialism, keeping its role subordinate to the proletariat. Mandel's theory of bureaucracy is one of the central scientific foundations of the revolutionary political project of working class self-activity, self-organization and self-emancipation. He stated that the development of the bureaucracy does not enhance the "efficiency" and effectivity of mass workers organizations under capitalism. He felt that instead, the officialdom's monopoly of power undermines the ability of the working class to either defend its most immediate interests under capitalism or to build a viable alternative to capitalism. Mandel's analysis of the origins and role of the labour bureaucracy in the capitalist social formations, and his theory of the revolutionary workers' organization were the alternatives to bureaucratic reformism. Mandel attempted to explain why, contrary to the expectation of revolutionary Marxists, no truly mass revolutionary parties emerged in the advanced capitalist countries since the 1920s. He attempted to update and refine Trotsky's analysis of the bureaucracy in the post- capitalist societies. He tried to focus on the issue of the possible relationship of the bureaucracy with the working class, constituting a new mode of production and probability of emergence of "workers' states" in any meaningful, Marxian sense. Marx provided a serious criticism of Marx Weber's ideal type of bureaucracy. His explaiation of bureaucracy and its characteristics provided an alternative perspective on the nature of bureaucracy.

It has been said that Marx's hope of ending class domination is unrealistic since domination has always been there. Marx is sometimes criticised for supporting dictatorship. However, Marx stood for self-goveminent of the workers. The short-lived dictatorship of the proletariat was needed only to deal with the prevailing dictatorship of the capitalist class. Gramsci talked of cultural hegemony, which was a realistic expansion of Marxist notion of bureaucracy, developed on the basis of Marx's concentration on economic determinism. 2.7 Glossary City-State , Commune , Trotskyism , Proletarian administrative apparatus, ascription and kinship, Reactionary Radicalism, Hegemonic bureaucracy, Utopia City State : It is a Political system consisting of an independent city having sovereignty over contiguous territory and servicing as a culture and leader of Political, economic and cultural life. Objectives After studying this unit the learners will understand ● the principles and theories of bureaucratic management, designed by Max Weber ● the definition and the theoretical construct on bureaucracy, ● the bureaucratic form and principles in Max Weber's bureaucratic theory. 3.2 Introduction The increasing complexities of social life, and the multiplying effect of the extension of the state's regulating functions have made the bureaucracy an epitome of institutionalised social power in capitalist, even in socialist societies or in modern times in people's democracies. Liberal democracies nurture bureaucracy as professionalised administration and its hierarchy of appointed officials makes society and polity thoroughly dependent upon it in some form or other. Therefore it has automatically become one of the most scrutinised concepts in academic social science. Sociologists, political scientists and psychologists raise series of debates on the bureaucratic phenomenon all over the world. On the one hand, the institution has defenders who justify its existence keeping in view that their expertise can only help politicians run the state smoothly. On the other hand, it faces enormous criticism from social scientists who foresee with the growth of bureaucracy a corresponding growth of anti democratic dehumanization process. Etymologically, 'bureaucracy' represents an addition to the Greek classification of governments, i.e; monarchy, aristocracy and democracy. But Max NSOU ● CC-PA-02 122 Weber was a Renaissance man in a changing world of newly constructed democratic nation states, as he could present a comprehensive theory on bureaucracy. He had knowledge in Law, History, Philosophy and Economics and with that knowledge he became one of the founders of the modern science of Sociology – the study of society and its institutions. Weber defined bureaucracy as a highly structured, formalized, and impersonal organization. He also instituted the belief that an organization must have a defined hierarchical structure and clear rules, regulations, and lines of authority which govern it. Weber's concept of bureaucracy originated while exploring the basics of authority. Main turning point in this respect was the growth of legal rational basis of authority in liberal democracies. Specialization of labour, a formal set of rules and regulations, well-defined hierarchies, recruitment on merit basis, impersonality and neutrality make bureaucracy specially institutionalised for running state administration. Bureaucrats take their jobs as career and functions in a way to suit their aspirations to climb up in the career ladder. Weber defined modern bureaucracies as goal-oriented organizations that shared certain characteristics. All were hierarchies with written rules and a specialized division of labour, where advancement was based on achievement, resulting in an efficient and impersonal organization. Weber utilised the ideal type construct on bureaucracy in multidimensional ways. When he viewed it as a social organisation he intended to oversee it from a purely technical point of view – ' capable of attaining the highest degree of efficiency and is in this sense formally the most rational known means of carrying out imperative control over human beings'.

Max Weber's analysis of bureaucracy, unlike Marx's, is more systematic, consistent and coherent. It can be found in his Economy and Society (1921- original in Germany and translation in English in 1978), Part I, Chapter III : "The Types of Legitimate Domination," Part II , Chapter XI: "Bureaucracy," and Appendix II , "Parliament and Government in Reconstructed Germany." In these essays, Weber outlined the basic characteristics of bureaucracy and its effects on social development. The word bureaucracy has its origin in the French word 'bureau' meaning a 'post' or an 'office'. The 'bureaux' or public office in some form or the other existed in the world. Even in China in 186 B.C. public officials were recruited through competitive public examinations. The word 'Bureaucracy' was first coined by Vincent dc Gournay (1712-1759), an Economist of France. His observation against the excesses of 'bureauania' in France was a introductory source for thinking about bureaucracy. In 1765, the Baron de Grimm, the French philosopher, focussed on the role of the bureaucracy and considered it as 'the real spirit of the laws of France'; to him, here the offices, clerks, secretaries, inspectors and intendants were not appointed to benefit the public interest, indeed appeared to have been established for the sake of existence of the offices themselves.

But it was in the nineteenth century, under conditions of increasing state intervention that the term came into regular use among European writers. In England, John Stuart Mill's concept of 'limited state' seemed to be an eye opener in this respect; it became current in the 1830s during resistance to the centralization of poor relief and public health. Bureaucracy became so fundamental and indespensible in the governance of great empires that critics started classifying between feudal or bureaucratic political systems. Bureaucracy means, simply a 'desk government'. For John A. Vieg, the term 'bureaucracy' implied bungling, arbitrariness, waste fullness, officiousness and regimentation. However, at times the term is used with approbation and a bureaucrat symbolizes a man eminent for experience, for knowledge and for responsibility. The word 'bureaucracy had an undisguisedly negative image even at the very time of its origin. Bureaucracy lends if self to two usages; it being used as a collective word for a body of administrative officials. Frequently it also stands for inefficiency and an improper exercise of power on the part of officials, and thus has become a term of abuse and wasteful excesses. However, bureaucracy is described as the systematic organization of tasks and individuals into a pattern, which can most effectively achieve the ends of collective efforts by John Pfiffner and as a regulated administrative system organized as a series of interrelated offices by E.N. Gladden. It was, however, Max Weber (1864-1920), having founded the modern sociological study of bureaucracy, freed the term from pejorative connotation and implied its indispensability for the rational attainment of the goal of an organization. Indeed, his name is indissolubly associated with any study of bureaucracy, so much so that it is considered to be rather imprudent as well as impudent on the part of a student of modern bureaucracy not to show acquaintance with Weber's writings on this subject. 3.3 Max Weber's Concept of Bureaucracy Max Weber developed a typology of authority and distinguished three 'pure' types – 'traditional' 'charismatic' and 'legal'. He regarded bureaucracy, sustained and sanctified by the purest type of exercise of legal authority, as the most efficient form of organization,

a formal, rationally organized social structure involving clearly defined patterns of activity in which, ideally, every series of actions is functionally related to the purposes of the organization. In such an organization there is integrated a series of offices, of hierarchized statuses, in which inhere a number of obligations and privileges closely defined by limited and specific rules. Each of these offices contains an area of imputed competence and responsibility.

Authority, the power of control which derives from a legitimately acknowledged status, inheres in the office and

NSOU ● CC-PA-02 124 Official action ordinarily occurs within the framework of preexisting rules of the organization. The system of prescribed relations between various offices involves a considerable degree of formality and clearly defined social distance between the occupants of these positions. Formality is manifested by means of a more or less complicated social rule. Such formality, which is integrated with the distribution of authority within the system, serves to minimize friction, as well as facilitates the interaction of the occupants of offices despite their (possibly hostile) private attitudes toward one another. In this way, the subordinate is protected from the arbitrary action of his superior, since the actions of both are constrained by a mutually recognized set of rules. Specific procedural devices foster objectivity and restrain the "quick passage of impulse into action." The purest type of exercise of legal authority is that which employs a bureaucratic administrative staff. Only the supreme chief of the organization occupies his position of authority by virtue of appropriation, of election or of having been designated for the succession. But even his authority consists in a sphere of legal competence. The whole administrative set up under the supreme authority then consists, in the purest type, of individual officials who are appointed and function according to the following criteria: 1) The officials are personally free and subject to authority only with respect to their impersonal official obligations. 2) They are organized in a clearly defined hierarchy of offices. 3) Each office has a clearly defined sphere of competence in the legal sense. 4) The office is filled by a free contractual relationship. Thus, in principle, there is free selection. 5) Candidates are selected on the basis of technical qualifications. In the most rational case, this is tested by examination or guaranteed by diplomas certifying technical training, or both. They are appointed, not elected. 6) Fixed salaries in money remunerate them, for the most part with a right to pensions. Only under certain circumstances does the employing authority, in private organizations, have a right to terminate the appointment, but the official is always free to resign. The salary scale is primarily graded according to rank in the hierarchy but in addition to this criterion, the responsibility of the position and the requirements of the incumbent's social status may be taken into account. 7) The office is treated as sale or at least the primary, occupation of the incumbent. 8) It constitutes a career. There is a system of promotion according to seniority or to achievement promotion is dependent on the judgment of superiors. 9) The official
entirely spared from ownership of the means of administration and without appropriation as his/her position. 10) He is subject to strict and systematic discipline and control in the conduct of the office.

Bureaucracy as enunciated by Weber is based on the nation of rational legal authority - that is, an authority that employees recognized as legitimate being inherent in the administrators in the hierarchical structure. Included in the rational legal authority are written rules and procedures and their primary. Each position in the bureaucracy has its duties and rights, which are all clearly defined. Bureaucracy promises a stable organization, despite the fact that its incumbents come and go. Its functioning does not necessarily depend on the know how of individuals working in it, know how is instead embodied in rules, regulations, procedures and other written records which always remain within the organization – in contrast to individuals who could join and leave. Other attributes of bureaucracy are hierarchy, division of labour, functional specializations etc. At the hands of Weber bureaucracy emerged as neutral, hierarchically organized, efficient and inevitable in contemporary society. This was the ideal type bureaucracy. In fact the ideal type is never actualized. The characteristics of bureaucracy were: precision, continuity discipline, strictness, and reliability. These characteristics made it technically the most efficient form of organization. Max Weber defined bureaucracy in terms of its structural characteristics. In Weber's ideal type construct, authority rests in the bureaucratic organization

happens to be the office holder at any given period of time. This stress on depersonalization of office is reflected in the bureaucrat's trained impersonality since functionaries are supposed to immunize personal relations and resort to detached work procedures. Thus the concept of an impersonal order has within it the seeds of latent conflict between the officials and the public. In fact, it is greatly dysfunctional to the emerging concept of human relations oriented administration and harmful to the interests of a developing nation. In this model the organization of official functions is bound by rules. In achieving developmental tasks very often new rules have to be framed or old ones modified to suit the changed conditions of society. In the changing set-up of developing societies rule application should be rational and dynamic, which requires special training on the part of bureaucrats. Division of labour, systematic and disciplined performance, control in the conduct of office are also marked as the features of the bureaucratic structure and functions. Bureaucracy operates on the basis of a consistent structure of laws and rules, without being judgemental and within the purview of its hierarchical jurisdiction. Its selection on the basis of technical qualification, impersonality and neutrality, and its efficiency make it
professional organisation equipped to handle all odds in politics and to transform social actions into rationally organised actions. Weber maintained that the survival of bureaucracy depends very much on its superiority, which in turn rests upon its formal rationality over other forms of organization. From this starting point, various efforts have been made to approach
bureaucracy in terms of the organization's basic structural characteristics. There are minor variations in structural dimensions of bureaucracy, may be also in content and method, but on substantial issues there are major similarities. Even there are gross agreement among the theorists and writers on bureaucracy as regards the substantial characteristics, with insignificant level of disagreements in their formulations. The writers and scholars since Weber, same as Friedrch, Litwak, Merton, Udy, Heady, Berger, and Parsons have agreed that bureaucracy is a systematic entity with following major characteristics: i. A well defined hierarchy of authority:
In a bureaucratic organization, each level controls the level below it. Also, the level above it controls it. A formal hierarchy is the basis of central planning and centralized decision-making.
In bureaucratic organisation, offices also follow
the principle of hierarchy that is each lower office is subject to control and supervision by higher office. This hierarchy serves as lines of communication and delegation of authority. It implies that communication coming down or going up must pass through each position. Similarly, a subordinate will get authority from his immediate superior. However, this hierarchy is net unitary but sub-pyramids of officials within the large organisation corresponding to functional divisions. Thus, there are offices with the same amount of authority but with different kinds of functions operating in different areas of competence. ii. A division of labour based on functional specialisation: Specialists are entrusted to do the work with utmost professionalism.
Also, the organization divides employees into units based on the type of work they do or the skills they possess, required for completion of the job with maximum possible expertise.
Selection as well as the promotion of employees is based on technical qualifications and skills.
Thus, division of labour try to ensure that each office has a clearly-defined area of competence within the organisation and each official knows the areas in which he operates and the areas in which he must abstain from action so that he does not overstep the boundary between his role and those of others. Further, division of labour also tries to ensure that no work is left uncovered. The duties and responsibilities of each job are clearly defined there is no question of overlapping or conflicting job duties. The division of labour assists workers in becoming experts in their jobs. The performance of employees improves considerably. iii. A system of rules covering the rights and duties of positional incumbents:
The organization uses rules to exert control. Therefore, the lower levels seamlessly execute the decisions made at higher levels.

A rational approach to organisation calls for a system of maintaining rules to ensure twin requirements of uniformity and coordination of efforts by individual members in the organisation. Rules provide the benefits of stability, continuity, and predictability and each official knows precisely the outcome of his behaviour in a particular matter. The rules and procedures are decided for every work it leads to consistency in employee behaviour. Since employees are bound to follow the rules etc., the management process becomes easy. iv. A system of procedures for keeping records for future reference: Rules of procedure are exhaustive, stable, and employees can learn them easily from previous records. Further, the organization records them in permanent files that help to maintain continuity of the working procedure. Bureaucratic organisation is characterised by maintenance of proper official records. The decisions and activities of the organisation are formally recorded and preserved for future reference. This is made possible by extensive use of filling system in the organisation. An official record is almost regarded as encyclopedia of various activities performed by the people in the organisation. v. Impersonality of inter personal relationship: Bureaucratic organizations treat all employees equally. They also treat all customers equally and do not allow individual differences to influence them.

Instead of personal relationship, bureaucrats act as portfolio holders as abstract entities. Thus, decisions are governed by rational factors rather than personal factors. This impersonality concept is used in dealing with organisational relations as well as relations between the organisation and outsiders. vi. Selection for employment and promotion based on seniority and or competence: The selection of officials is based on technical qualification and appointment and not an election. The selection process and promotion procedures are based on merit and expertise. It assists in putting right persons on right jobs. There is optimum utilisation of human resources. Further, officials receive a salary as compensation for their work. The official is taken in for a trial period and then offered a permanent position with the organization. This protects him from arbitrary dismissal. These features were structured to portray the bureaucracy as the most efficient form of organization and as the means for assimilating diverse needs of capitalist nation state, so that both economy and polity could be favourably managed in a large magnitude. Weber noticed a phenomenal growth in organizational size of the state which prompted him to think about rational-legal bureaucratic authority, with its expertise to mange the administrative affairs of the state as a continuous process. The rationalization of bureaucracy, the separation of church and the state that led to secularization of politics and the gradual institutionalization of parliamentarianism-all form integral elements of the developmental model. At the same time, the growth of bureaucratization, too, has helped in the modernization of the new states . The rules and procedures ensure consistency in employee behaviour. The duties and responsibilities of each job are clearly defined and there is no question of overlapping or conflicting job duties. The selection process and promotion procedures are based on merit and expertise. It assists in putting right persons on right jobs. There is optimum utilisation of human resources. For division of labour workers become experts in their jobs and their performance improves considerably. However, Weberian bureaucracy suffers from some serious deification: 1. Excessive red-tapism and paper work make the system dysfunctional. 2. Impersonality generates a sense of alienation from human relations. There is neglect of human factor. 3. Excessive reliance on rules and regulations and adherence to these policies creates mechanical approach. 4. The employees become so used to the system, they resist to any change and introduction of new techniques of operations. 5. Excessive concentration of official power in the hands of bureaucrats makes a democracy run by the undemocratically selected executives. The characteristics of bureaucracy have been explained by Peter Blau in terms of its execution of regular activities in a fixed way as official duties. In the opinion of P.M. Blau and M.W. Meyer, bureaucracy refers to those large-scale organizations which seek to accomplish large scale administrative tasks by way of coordinating the works of many persons. They pointed out that although bureaucracy is based on principles which are congenial to the improvement of efficiency, bureaucratization to the contrary quite often produces inefficiency. Still Weber is credited for attempting to develop a consistent and coherent Bureaucratic model for the first time. It has been termed as rational and ideal leading to efficiency. The efficiency in bureaucratic organisation comes through rationality and predictability of behaviour because everyone knows the consequence of his action become actually the action is undertaken. Weber's model has some drawbacks. It has rigidity, impersonality, excessive rule boundedness, excessive cost of control, excessive dependence on superiors, tendency to ignore organisational goals etc. Inspite of these limitations this model is still the only solution for managing the affairs of a large organisation like state. 3.4 Conclusion

The bureaucratic theory of Max Weber was a unique representative model of ideal type bureaucracy, which was conceived as the basis for the systematic formation of any organisation and was designed to ensure efficiency and economic effectiveness in administration of a state. This ideal model for administration was meant to serve the requirement of the capitalist class to form a strong centralised power structure, which would be a support system for the capitalist market expansion. Bureaucracy is inseparably linked with the emergence of the modern state that was defined by its development. Hierarchical authority, job specialization, and formalized rules were the main principles of Weberian bureaucracy. Weber

a perennial structure consisting of persons having rigorous training, experience and technical superiority. This structure is known as bureaucracy that will run the government which has assumed greater responsibility in the face of industrial growth. Weber has elaborated, rather for the first time, how this bureaucracy will be organized, upon which rationale it will function to which end, what will be its pattern of behaviour and etc. Taking these consideration together, Weber prescribes and builds an ideal type of bureaucracy to be workable in all socio- political and administrative settings. Critics, however, have considered this ideal typical notion of bureaucracy as advanced by Weber as inconsistent and mechanical in view of vast ecological asymmetry, difference and diversity found in various socio-political settings. Weberian bureaucracy does not take personal will, perception and idiosyncratic

The cross-cultural and historical surveys of bureaucracies reveal several characteristics that distinguish the form of bureaucratic organization and its primary social function. As societies become more complex major social problems demand solutions that favour bureaucratic organization over more traditional forms of social organization. An exhaustive treatment of the concept came in 1895 in Getano Moscas 'Element di scienza Politica', translated in 1939 as 'The Ruling Class' where the author regarded bureaucracy as being so fundamental to the governing of the great empires that all political systems could be classified as either feudal or bureaucratic. Nomenclatures such as "bureaucrat","bureaucratic," and "bureaucracy" are often critically used and have negative connotations, like that of Thomas Carlile, who labelled it as 'continental nuisance'. Bureaucrats are the government personnel, and the term 'bureaucratic' gives an idea in the minds of common men that rigid rule adherence is more important than efficiency and actual implementation of the work. The bureaucratic process lends itself to criticism as dehumanised instrument of government. Critics point out that bureaucracy lays stress on excessive rule boundedness, regulations, and encourages unnecessary paperwork; these foster inter-agency and intra-agency conflicts and contradictions; duplication and overlapping by various horizontal and vertical layers involve waste and unchecked growth. Bureaucratic power syndrome raises questions on their accountability, especially in an immature democracy. There are many dysfunctional aspects of bureaucracy which is referred as bureaucratic pathology. Looking into the needs of modern organisations, bureaucracy has many shortcomings. The major problems of bureaucracy are invalidity of bureaucratic assumptions, goal displacement etc. The source of bureau pathology lies in the invalidity of various assumptions of ideal bureaucracy. Many authors have questioned the utility of bureaucracy. Bureaucracy includes certain negative behavioural traits. ● A high degree of division of labour can reduce staff initiative. As jobs become narrower in scope and specified and well defined by procedures, individuals sacrifice creativity, autonomy and independence. On the one hand, specialization can lead to increased productivity and efficiency, on the other, it can also initiate conflict between specialized units, whereby the overall goals of the organisation suffers. If specialization impedes communication between units, it may be harmful for the interest of the organisation in the long run. Moreover, over-specialization may result in monotony, dissatisfaction and absenteeism; it may affect quality also.

NSOU ● CC-PA-02 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 133 Continuous routine work may frustrate the performer leading to low productivity. ● Excessive reliance on rules creates a disciplined work environment, but rigidity in this respect can be detrimental to the larger interest of the organisation and of society as a whole. It can make the staff reluctant or unable to cope with unique cases, going beyond normal expected situations. Moreover, excessive emphasis on rules and procedures can produce excessive red tape, leading to slow performance. Rules are normally provided for guidelines but often they become the source of inefficiency because of excessive emphasis misuse and people's apathy to them. ● Hierarchy should have both downward and upward communication flow for smoother and uninterrupted administrative work and transparent interpersonal relationship. In practice, it usually indicates only a downward directive mode. Thus, the necessity of upward communication is almost ignored at the cost of quality of job and a feeling of isolation is generated leading to goal displacement in the entire administrative set up. There is no formal recognition of horizontal communication too; this stifles individual initiative and participation in decision making. Rigid organisational hierarchy works against effective performance of responsibilities and leads to loss of motivation. It overemphasizes superior-subordinate relationships unnecessarily, which is detrimental to congenial organisational climate and creates stress. ● As per rule promotions and salary increments are done on the basis of seniority and loyalty, rarely on actual skill and performance. Thus, the idea of having the most competent people in strategic positions within the organization is sacrificed. Loyalty is obtained, but this loyalty is toward the protection of one's position, not to the effectiveness of the organization. Often politicking gets priority over effective performance for some over ambitious post holders, which may have demoralising impact on other performers. Further, in turn the freshers lose energy and skill, when they see that the fate of star performers and of non-performers is
same career wise. ● The impersonal nature of bureaucracy is probably its most serious drawback. Bureaucracy is criticised for overemphasizing rigid, control-oriented structures, consequently giving greater priority to rule than performance. It makes the entire system incompatible with the requirement of the current professional ground level realities. In dealing with people, total impersonal approach is impossible to be followed because people have feelings, emotions and sentiments which affect decision making ; it is not desirable also in developing nations, where people are is far away from asserting themselves for their common good. Thus, strict adherence to rules and regulations and impersonal attitude in performance is neither possible nor desirable. Subsequent sociologists have taken Weber's concept as a mere ideal type devoid of reality and inappropriate in most of the countries, specially newly

bureaucracy is responsible for all sorts of inefficiencies and incompetence. Few of the critics have mentioned that there are pathological defects, making it dysfunctional and for removed from the attainment of organizational goals. Robert Merton has shown his concern about the fact that the very elements which conduce toward efficiency in general produce inefficiency in specific instances, and also lead to an over concern with strict adherence to regulations which induces timidity, conservation and technical complexities. Weber's ideal bureaucracy and Taylor's scientific management are, to a great extent, similar in ideological essence. Both emphasize rationality, predictability, impersonality, technical competence and authoritarianism as basic elements. Though Weber's principles are said to be less operational as compared to Taylor, still Weber's 'principles of ideal bureaucracy' has become the model for many organizations and its rules are more or less rigidly followed even in modern times. The dysfunctional, contradictory or self-defeating features and the paradoxes of the Weberian model of bureaucracy have always been under critical review. To criticism, the positive attainments and functions of bureaucratic organization are over emphasized and the internal stresses and strains of such structures are almost wholly neglected. Despite its technical effectiveness and efficiency the Weberian model contains many undemocratic traits, as it has the tendency to supercede the democratic process and democratic values. Carl Fredrich in "Some Observations on Weber's Analysis of Bureaucracy" (1952) reaffirms the key concept of rationalization and de-mystification in relation to power in all social relationships, which opens up a different scope of analysis. It is said that Weber has created a political space for these selected group of hired officials, who due to their administrative expertise and technical knowledge become advisors of the political executives and gradually trespass into their political domain. The modern society, therefore, is found to be ruled not only by the legal- rational type of authority, but it also uses the charismatic and traditional types of authority, because of the over-powered bureaucrats and inefficient elected rulers. Periodic tenure of the political rulers and continuity of service of the bureaucrats make the bureaucrats exercise power in traditional form. Michel Crozier(1964) described in The Bureaucratic Phenomenon used a scientific attempt to understand the "malady of bureaucracy". He used the term 'maladoption' regarding the bureaucratic phenomenon. Merton's expression that the 'dysfunction which necessarily develops within human organization' indicates that he was critical about the role of bureaucracy in its existing structure. He further pointed out that many of the characteristics of bureaucracy should be considered as dysfunctional. Merton, in his famous essay "Bureaucratic Structure and Personality", developed a hypothesis concerning the structural sources of the occupational personality of the bureaucrats and of major types of conflict between the bureaucrats and the clientele. Anthony Giddens 'Capitalism and Modern Social Theory' highlighted these points which were complementary to those of Merton.

Giddens
pointed out that Weber did not conceive the possibility of the transformation of the bureaucratization of social life through the occurrence of socialist revolution. Instead, the socialized economy would increasingly be subjected to bureaucratic administration in view of the fact that economic operations are taken up by the state. Rapid changes in organizations in the twelfth century have brought about changes in the meaning of bureaucracy and while the term retains its usefulness in indicating a broad set of related functional ities, actually it has become more a separate power group within a state with its own special vested interests, values and power basis. Weber's conceptualization of bureaucracy in terms of rational-legal- authority and formal rationality fails to take account of the existence and use of power within and outside of organizations and of the persistence of patrimonial features. Weber conceptualised that the organizational hierarchy would involve a simple hierarchical flow of directives from top to the bottom. But the exercise of objective responsibility should be taken as far more complex and dynamic. The apparently fixed subordinate-superior relationships would be more fluid because of the need for consultation and sharing information up and down the hierarchical ladder. Superiors in any bureaucratic organization are highly dependant on the specialized knowledge and experience of subordinates. Subordinates, in turn, need to consult regularly with those above them about legal requirements, clarification of agency regulation and political considerations. Weber was aware of the fact that as bureaucratisation is strengthened, the power of bureaucracy will increase to the extent of dictating terms to democratic rulers; but at the same time he stated the indispensibility of bureaucracy in running the government with legal-rational authority for fixed tenure. The bureaucratic officials are indispensable for their practical effectiveness, their expertise and technical knowledge. Their ethics

to maintain "administrative secrets" make them repositories of all administrative information and this makes the politicians dependent on them, which in turn enhances the power of the bureaucrats and make them unbeatable. Weber was aware of the negative consequences of bureaucratization —the tendency of officials to ignore questions of substantive justice in the name of adherence to formal rules, the impersonality of organizational relationships etc. Thus Weber recognized a dichotomy between the polity and the administration and wanted to draw a sharp distinction between the roles of the politicians and the bureaucrats; but he also noted that administrative problems, no matter how technical they might seem, are in many ways influenced by political considerations. Such ambiguity in Weber's treatment of bureaucratic interest and

NSOU ● CC-PA-02 136 public-policy reflects a dualism in Weber's thinking (Diamant, 1962). On the one hand, legal-rationality of Weber's ideal-type led him to consider bureaucracy as a neutral tool and on the other hand, his own political experiences taught him that the power interests of the bureaucracy may threaten the authority of political leadership. 4.4 Comparative Perspectives on Bureaucracy: Karl Marx and Max Weber A comparative study on Marxian and Weberian views on bureaucracy will help to analyse and explore the inherent contradictions and approximations in both the paradigms. By analyzing and comparing the basic elements of the theories of bureaucracy as conceived by Marx and Weber

one can understand the essence of both the theories and can attempt to discuss then with critical observations.

The

Marxian protagonists criticised bureaucratic organization for its incompetence, unprofessionalism, alienation

rigidities etc. and these were evident in its role even in proletarian dictatorship. But the Marxists could not afford to deny the importance and inevitability of bureaucracy for future development of the nation. The Weberian model in this respect resembled the Marxian observation. Marx pointed to the dysfunctional aspects of bureaucracy as the ideological justification for distinctiveness of state and civil society. The Weberians argued that the bureaucratic efficiency, specialized knowledge and technical skill would help them overcome the negative phenomena and characteristics. Weber, using his ideal- type construction, rationalized the bureaucratic order. According to Marx and Engels, bureaucracy was nothing but the apparatus in the hands of the bourgeois rulers for oppressing the have-nots in the interest of the property owners; therefore, according to the Marxist protagonists, proletarian rulers should learn to use this apparatus for settlement of the dictatorship of the proletariat and thus to expedite the process of evolution to socialism. The Marxists meant that the bureaucratic organisation should be placed under the proletarian rule and their status should be made equivalent to those of the wage earners. Marxists have generally continued to focus on the dynamics and contradictions of capitalist society in the light of a total system. They paid little attention to the organizational dynamics of the state as an administrative system. In his earlier writings Marx showed deep interest in the internal organization of the state and later analysed briefly the role of the bureaucracy in the corpus of state organization. Marx's later writings did not devote much space for detailed discussions on bureaucracy or state administration. Therefore, the study of Public administration as a discipline hardly has cared much for Marx's views on bureaucracy. However, Marx's view on bureaucracy should be studied in the light of macro theorisation of the capitalist state and the concept of relative autonomy.

Yet he did not take much effort in conceptualising the functional aspects of the state. In his works he was not found devoting much time for detail discussion of the role, structure and working of public organizations. His writings presented a scattered observation on 'administration' over numerous books, monographs, letters, and editorial comments. In the beginning of his journey to build up theories the state Marx was concerned with the relationship between the state and bureaucracy. There was no explicit or systematic focus on the theories of public administration, though much before Weber, Marx wrote on the bureaucratic structure and behaviour and the relationship of bureaucracy with the state and the society. However, his superficial treatment regarding its organizational aspects in an inconsistent way could not lay any literary impact on the later thinkers. Marx's ideas on bureaucracy and administration are to be found out within the purview of sociology of politics. Scientific and comprehensive study of bureaucracy is generally attributed to Max Weber. In his Critique of Hegel's Philosophy of Right, Marx highlighted on bureaucratic incompetence and self-centredness.

stated that the bureaucracy as a whole had a corporate vested interest to defend against classes in society; therefore, the external relations of bureaucracy are of a conflictual and 'private' nature. Bureaucracy, as Marx saw it in the feudal – capitalist Prussian situation, was a form of society dominated by the state, and its tendency was to separate itself from the conflict, arising out of class stratification. Marx criticized bureaucracy's assumed 'formalism' and superior 'consciousness'. Thus Marx's view in sharp contrast to the Weberian conception of bureaucracy never treated it as a rationalized organization. Contrarily, Marx held that the bureaucracy intervenes between the state and public opinion.The bureaucratic attitude is totally inclined towards political authority; it is passively loyal only to the next higher rank in the hierarchy. There are certain dysfunctional aspects of bureaucracy and unanticipated consequence in the Weberian model as visualised in the context of building socialism. There are some practical dilemma, in the theoretical frameworks of two seemingly opposite approaches on capitalism and socialism, despite having some primary similarities in terms of statecrafts. Bengt Abrahamsson in a work entitled Bureaucracy or Participation: The Logic of Organization (1977) has outlined the basic differences and similarities between Marx's and Weber's positions on bureaucracy. Abrahamsson claims that Weber differs from Marx on at least three points : (a) unlike Marx, Weber did not see bureaucracy as a specific bourgeois pheonomenon tied to capitalism. Instead,Weber saw the possibility of the autonomy of bureaucracy and the growth of bureaucracy as inevitable; (b) Weber did not see bureaucracy as a class organ but viewed it as an element of modern democracy. Weber, however also viewed it as a threat to the democratic process. At the same NSOU ● CC-PA-02 138 time, Weber argued that among the accelerators of bureaucracy, the economic system is more important than the democratic political system. Thus, socialism is viewed as a great stimulus, and (c) for Weber, the elimination of bureaucracy is not possible in an increasingly complex society which requires more and more professionalism and specialization. At the same time, Abrahamsson pointed out the similarities of Marx's and Weber's models. The way Weber's theory connected the development of bureaucracy with the issue of the long-run material and political development of society, with a focus on the capitalist production system and economy, may be found almost identical with the Marxian analysis of the role of bureaucracy in up keeping the capitalist mode of production and in nurturing the capitalist model of statecraft (1977). Despite many similarities in their view points and the common agreement on the characteristization of liberalism as bourgeois ideology, Marx and Weber held opposing views on social structure, development and the bureaucratic order. This dichotomous classification put these two theories in almost contrasting poles. At the first instance, Weber in the context of large democracies maintained the superiority of bureaucratic organizations and the inevitability of the bureaucratization process in social development; later he realised that the inhumanitarian and undemocratic functioning by bureaucracy needs to be checked and controlled. Marx, on the other hand, rejected the legitimacy of bureaucracy in the politcal system altogether, and viewed it as an instrument of political oppression and economic gratification of the propertied. Thus the two paradigms held conflicting and contrasting views on bureaucracy and belonged to the opposite ends of the continuum, though both had and still have their realm of influence on later theoretical drives. Both the Marxian and Weberian models of bureaucracy face a dilemma and certain contradictions between theory and practice in different dimensions and extent. The Marxists, such as Lenin and Mao, vigorously attacked bureaucratic organization as a despotic autocracy of civil servants and as an instrument for class exploitation; in different tune the Weberian thinkers were found self–critical and in a mode to deconstruct certain basic premises of Weber's ideal type of bureaucracy as impractical and dysfunctional. The Weberian camp

sought to identify the "malady of bureaucracy" in the Weberian model. Weber's anticipation that bureaucracy would triumph historically because it was more efficient and powerful than patrimonial administration and more permanent than charismatic leadership led him to present historical change as an evolutionary process of adaptation which, if not teleological, was at least universal, inevitable, and accessible to human understanding and explanation.

Weber's contention of bureaucracy suffers from various defects. Sociologists, political scientists, psychologists and the specialists in Public Administration have criticized Weber from various standpoints and from the context of diversified social and political settings. Weber's ideal type of bureaucratic model is too formal, mechanistic and parochial. But despite serious limitations the scheme Weber had formulated and prescribed on the structure and mode of operation of bureaucracy and, again, on the need and requirement of continuity and discipline are to be maintained and preserved in administration and cannot altogether be denied. 4.7 Glossary Patrimonialism , Alienation, Formalism, Patrimonialism: Form of Political organization where authority is based on the personal power exercised by the ruler. No other thinker on bureaucracy is as particular and systematic as Weber is. He attempted to theorize on bureaucracy faced on the experience of the functioning of this institution in Britain, France and Germany. His approach to bureaucracy is, thus, empirical, objective and free from speculation. He sought to evolve a permanent formal administrative structure which in his words, is superior to any other form in precision, in stability, in the stringency of its discipline and in reliability.

This structure is capable to handle the challenges of new developments as evolved out of the burgeoning growth of modern industrial society, state and culture. He considered modern bureaucracy as representing the legal-rational authority as the most efficient organization to cope with the political and administrative organizational intricacies of modern industrial state. For the purpose of systematizing the internal structure and functions of state administration Weber prescribed some specific behavioural norms, rules and formal guidelines particularly for bureaucracy to follow and to reflect in its functioning. But the model
NSOU ● CC-PA-02 142 bureaucracy is far from being responsive to the needs of the people and distant from those who dislike rigidity, inflexibility, delay, lust for power, political alienation.
It is also distant for and like to these who seek to overcome these maladies, to effect social transformation and build a system of democrtic administration based on freedom and a 'human face'. In the following pages we will refer to some scholars who have critiqued Weber's thesis from various standpoints. Some of them have sought to provide thoughtful analyses of bureaucracy in the context of underdeveloped and developing countries and, again, in the context of the economy, society and polity that have undergone significant change in the recent years. 5.3 Weberian conceptualization of bureaucracy and its problems Max Weber argued in favour of bureaucratic precision; this rule-bound precision prescribed by Weberian bureaucratic model has been criticised as a 'closed system' which takes little account of organizational interactions with the environment. It has been criticized for pioneering "machine theory model'. The Weberian model, the critics point out, results in germinating the dysfunctional consequences, in failing to consider the individual or behavioural aspects of the people in organization and to take into account the basic human factors. The Weberian bureaucratic design can at best function in a stable environment. According to the critics, the structural features of his bureaucracy might be suitable for routine and repetitive tasks, are not always available in an unstable environmental situation. In the unstable or newly formed democracies innovation and creativity are necessary; otherwise these would produce the dysfunctional consequences. And innovation, as we know, often requires overcoming the existing stability. American sociologist Robert K. Merton has expanded on Weber's theories of bureaucracy in his work Social Theory and Social Structure, published in 1957. Merton, points out that it accounts for lack of flexibility. Merton has noted that red tapism, rigidity, excessive impersonality, reluctance to exercise discretion are some of the major constants associated with
pathological and self-defeating traits of bureaucracy. Such behavioral orientations are typical of the "trained incapacity" of the bureaucrats, which are conflictual to the potrayed ideal rationality of bureaucratic organizations. Merton further maintains in his essay "Bureaucratic Structure and Personality" that the "displacement of goals" has made the bureaucracy to adhere to rules and thus become very rigid. In Merton's term, this is a process whereby "an instrumental value becomes a terminal value". He argues that "trained incapacity" resulting from "over conformity" eventually causes many bureaucracies to become dysfunctional. He also observes that bureaucrats are more likely to put forth their own interests and needs instead of those that would benefit the organization. Merton calls this phenomenon "goal displacement." He observes that this occurred when formalistic goals become more important than the main substantive goal of an organization. Thus, Merton concludes that while the development of bureaucratic functions, following Weber, can be positively assessed for promoting an effective division of labour and for supporting the efficient operation of social organizations, it is equally likely to cause dysfunctions, harming the institutional effectivity. Merton of Weber's analysis, but at

he believes that bureaucrats are more keen to defend and promote their own vested interests than to operate and use their expertise and skill for the greater benefit of the organization as a whole. Merton notes that pride in their craft is responsible for overpowering the bureaucratic organisation and it creates resistance to accept changes in established routines. He also states that bureaucrats emphasize formality over interpersonal relationships, and have been trained to ignore the special circumstances of particular cases, causing them to come across as "arrogant" and "haughty".
P.
Selznick (1949), on the other hand, emphasizes the delegation of authority which would bring about a series of unanticipated consequences. Like Merton, Selznick shows how these consequences stem from the problems of maintaining highly interrelated systems of inter personal relations. Gouldner (1954), likewise, concerns himself with the consequence of bureaucratic rules for the maintenance of organizational structure. Selznick conceives the control dilemma in bureaucracy as arising out of the need for delegation of power to organizational sub-systems. The increasing complexity of organizational tasks compels decentralization and delegation of responsibility to intermediaries. Such a measure brings forth the organizational paradox of goal displacement, the bi-furcation of interest between the central system and its decentralized sub units. Selznick also finds that bureaucracy tends to be conservative and overly in support of status qu. Alvin Gouldner examined aspects of Weber's theory of bureaucracy in relation to strikes, management and control, and his focus stuck to dysfunctional part of the bureaucracy, especially its excessive adhearance to rules and regulations. According to Gouldner, as a control mechanism, rigid organizational rules produce unintended consequences; the employees become focused on strictness of rules and regulations on their performance in terms of organisational goals. This, in turn, increases closeness of supervision leading to
Morstein Marx in his The Administrative State: An Introduction to Bureaucracy (1957) has labelled bureaucracy as 'ailments of organization'. Michel Crozier in his The Bureaucratic Phenomenon: An Examination of Bureauracy in Modern Organizations and Its Cultural Setting in France has focussed on "malady of bureaucracy ", while carrying out two case studies of NSOU ● CC-PA-02 144 bureaucracy (in a public and in a relatively private setting) to examine the pathological aspect of their nature; he highlighted the vicious cycle of centralization and impersonality in large modern organizations. Crozier argues that organizations act as the site for conflict and politics and argues against theWeberian account of efficient organizations and their largely rational spaces. Instead, he sees them as sites for negotiation of complex power relations. To him, this can lead to decisions being made based on factors distinct from the overall goals of the organization. Crozier is critical regarding the vagueness of this concept and the resultant confusion the term inculcates. He reflects on three different dimensions the term 'bureaucracy' in social sciences lays stress on. He categorically points out that in the first sense, bureaucracy is government by bureaus, that is, by departments of the state staffed by appointed and hierarchically organized functionaries, who are ultimately subservient to a sovereign authority. The second dimension on which he focuses, directs the sociologists to consider bureaucracy as a developed form of organization based on impersonal rules aiming at rationalization of collective activities.

the third dimension, he takes note of is regarding the derogatory use of the term 'bureaucracy' in common parlance. It stands for ponderousness of the structure, slowness and routinisation of operations, complication of procedures, incongruity between the needs which bureaucracy should meet and the actual bureaucratic functioning, and the frustration of the officials and the clients. In Crozier's analysis of the different meanings of 'bureaucracy', there is a happy blending of the etymological definition of the term (being commonly used in Political Science and Public Administration) and the sociological and popular usages of the term. Anthony Downs in Human Behavior Inside and Outside Bureaucracy: Lessons from Psychology has pointed out that that public officials, like other human beings, vary in their psychological needs and motivations and therefore, behave differently in similar situations. Downs presents an agenda for a behavioral Public Administration that takes key issues in cognitive psychology and personality psychology into account; there will be certain biases when the bureaucrats exercise their authority. The renowned organization theorist, Warren Bennis, strongly criticises bureaucratic structuring in organizations and exposes the hidden obstacles in our organizations and in society at large – that conspire against good leadership. According to Bennis, within any organization an entrenched bureaucracy with a commitment to the status quo undermines the unwary leader. This creates an unconscious conspiracy in contemporary society, one that prevents leaders – from taking charge and making changes. More than four decades ago, he forecasted the demise of bureaucracy. Warren Bennis, a social scientist, predicts that bureaucracy is likely to be replaced with the new system better suited to the 20th century demands of industrialization. According to him, the forecast is based on the evolutionary principle that every age develops an organizational form appropriate to its genius. The vacuum created by eclipse of bureaucracy, according to Bennis, will be filled up by temporary work systems which will be more adaptive to rapid social change. Lloyd Rudolph and Susane Rudolph have challenged the central theme of the Weberain model of bureaucracy as the most rational construct in terms of production of organizational efficiency.

They raised doubt about formal rationality which may contribute to organizational efficiency, but

organizational ineffectiveness by building up the sources of alienation and resistance and of inflaming the struggle for power against authority may also be taken into account. Fred W. Riggs devoted almost his entire literary effort to explore how the administrative systems in developing nations are considerably shaped by their contexts of politics, economy, and culture and to establish that the Western models are relatively dysfunctional in such unique contexts. In this endeavor, Riggs began with an analytical framework known as the 'agraria-industria model', which highlighted the contextual distinction of public administration between the traditional agrarian societies and modern industrial nations. According to Riggs, the agraria is characterized by self-contained and agriculture-based economy, family- or clan-based organization, divine authority source and communalistic value. He believed that the industria possesses interdependent market economy, achievement- oriented organization, secular authority, individualistic value, and so on. Thus the administrative system in the agraria is characterized by politics-administration fusion, lack of specialization, and ritualistic action; contrarily in the industria, it is based on politics-administration division, specialization, impersonal human relation, and functional action. With this reliance on contextual determinants, Riggs continued to emphasize on the special conditions of the transitional nations. A society in which there is a mixture of traditional and modern structures is recognized as prismatic. The prismatic model was developed by Riggs to explain the administrative systems of the developing World. Weber believed in a more formalized, rigid structure of organization known as a bureaucracy. A formal structure

influence of family and community on ocial decisions, prevalence of both ascriptive and achievement criteria leading to NSOU ● CC-PA-02 146 the 'attainment' norms in public oces etc., which demands a departure from Weberian model of bureaucracy. A sub-field of Public Choice theory is the study of bureaucracy. Public Choice theorists protest against highly disaggregable conservative attitude, the corrupt behaviour of public officials (bureaucrats), and the difficulty of altering inefficient policy tools. Public Choice theorists like Vincent Ostrom opposes bureaucracy, declaring it as anti-democratic, favours decentralization and propounds the idea of the participation of the masses in the Public Administration. The Public Choice Approach believes in the concept of 'Institutional Pluralism' and in democratic decision making and this theory condemns politics-administration dichotomy, hierarchical ordering of the employees in the organisation and 'Mono centric Administration'. Public choice theory attempts to look at governments from the perspective of the bureaucrats and politicians who compose them and makes the assumption that they act based on budget-maximizing model in a self-interested way for the purpose of maximizing their own economic benefits (e.g. their personal wealth). The theory aims to apply economic analysis (usually Decision Theory and Game Theory) to the political decision-making process in order to reveal certain systematic trends towards inefficient government policies. There are also Austrian variants of public choice theory (suggested by Mises, Hayek, Kirzner, and Boettke) in which it is assumed that bureaucrats and politicians are benevolent but have access to limited information. Public Choice theorists feel that bureaucrats are 'Generalists', that is, they are experts in managing things and hence can not be expected to handle well specific technical jobs. Further the centralisation of power in the hands of the bureaucracy tends to make them self-centred. Hegemony of bureaucracy seeks to promote self aggrandizement and unnecessarily inflate government and enhance cost, leading to minimisation of profit. So according to Public Choice theory, market forces must be allowed to operate freely, as they can contribute higher efficiency than the government in the economic domain. Presence of market forces will downsize the government/bureaucracy and will make the delivery of goods and services to the customers more transparent, cost-effective, simpler and economical. In 1972, German political sociologist Claus Offe, published a book on the Structural Problems of Late Capitalism where, a very in-depth study on the Weberian model has been made by Offe. The bureaucratic administration, as Offe points out, is that improbable and conditional from of organization of social action that precludes the 'thematization of its own premises'. The rule-bound bureaucracy means that the premises of action are not at the disposal of the actors themselves. Offe observes that under conditions of developed, welfare state capitalism, the rationality of bureaucratic action does not guarantee, but rather perhaps conflicts with, the functional rationality of the political system. What appears to be emerging to replace bureaucracy is a hierarchical model of organization capable of performing collective activities toward the achievement of school goals. Leadership in these heterarchical organizations will need to be considerably different. Demands for enhanced levels of efficiency and effectiveness have caused many to question traditional bureaucratic forms in public sector organizations. Team-based structures have been cited as an attractive alternative, perceived as facilitating the necessary levels of flexibility, innovation and responsiveness. But most of the post-colonial societies are drowned in the dilemma as to whether any alternative to the Weberian model will be useful to deal with administrative complexities, especially in newly formed democracies; moreover, every attempt to innovate new modes of administration is often frustrated by bureaucratic dominance. In a period of increasing demands for accountability, demographic changes within the organisations and economic crisis, bureaucracy is being forced to examine their fundamental structural assumptions. According to the critics, Bureaucracy is ill-suited to the demands of our post-industrial demographically diverse information society; it is said that bureaucratic characteristics not only are useless, but they are harmful too. However, despite all these negative notions, it cannot be denied that even in so-called communist or socialist states also Weberian bureaucracy has proved itself inevitable as an apparatus of administration. However, the expanded size of a bureaucratic organisation leads to even more elaborated and complicated hierarchial structure, making the deciosion making process cumbersome and often unmanageable. A huge bureaucracy beyond manageable extent and justifiable dimensions get disassociated from professionalsm and loose expertise. Existence of such bureaucracy becomes detrimental to the larger societal interest as they hardly works with their bureaucratic attributes of specialised knowledge, formality, neutrality, impersonality and rule boundedness etc.Bureaucracy should be uniquely apolitical, or instrumental. 5.4 Conclusion Max Weber's contention of bureaucracy is the most systematic attempt of theorization of bureaucracy. By this attempt he tried to remove the organizational inconsistencies of administration and to resolve the problems of governing a state. But bureaucracy as a perennial administrative structure elsewhere has reflected unresponsiveness, undue formalism, self-aggrndizement, conservatism and bias towards dominant economic and political classes. This administrative organization responds to the call neither of man nor of the market. Despite scathing criticism from various standpoints and corners, the compelling fact about Weberian bureaucracy is that his is a model altogether denied by those who intend to get the government in mess and to run it by people lacking in knowledge, training, competence, expertise and prudence relevant to statecraft. In fact, bureaucratization of administration is appeared as a persisting force working in modern state system, and Weber is in no way responsible for it. This bureaucratization is required to be checked by the most deliberate and conscious process of more and more democratization of society and state and of humanization of its administration. 5.6 Glossary Displacement of goals, Trained incapacity, Over conformity, Dysfunction, Delegation.

Objectives 1.2 Introduction
Reading the materials of this unit the learners will understand ● the basic issue in human Relations theory, ● the impact of human behaviour upon the overall productivity of an organization, ● the cardinal features of human relations theory and its importance in the study of public administration and ● limitations of Human Relations theory The Human Relations theory, elevates the human factor to the centre stage of organization. Instead of reifying institutions, like the classical mechanistic theories of organization, this theory considers workforce of an organization as human beings equipped with social and cultural traits. Drawing heavily on the insights of Behavioural Revolution in Political Science this school refuses to relegate employee into mere component of an organization. 'Human problem requires a human solution' this adage perhaps captures the essence of Human Relations theory. Demonstrating the futility of the traditional approach, the theory has shown how formal organization resorts to non-human data to sort out human problem. Human Relations school believes that the success of any organization is contingent upon the happiness quotient of its workers. Hence, an organization has to keep its workers in good humour. However, in a bid to empowering human elements in organization, the said approach did not celebrate the 'Economic Man' as eulogized by the traditional and mechanistic theory. The construction of the 'economic man' was the epitome of insatiable capitalist aspiration of time. The Human Relations theory has crowned the 'Social Man'. According to this theory, an organization cannot hire an employee without his social, cultural and psychological context as individual employees are the product of cultural and social context. Hence, any attempt to denude an employee of his social ties in the name of scientific approach would reduce him to a mere machine and demotivate him to do his work with enthusiasm. In sum, the essence of Human Relations theory may be encapsulated in the following four points: first, organization is conceptualized as a social system; secondly, unlike the mechanistic theories of organization,

theory did not consider workers as the mere appendage of the organization driven by material incentives. In fact, they are viewed as human beings endowed with all the humanly qualities. Thirdly, the theory lays a lot of emphasis on the informal elements of organization that plays an important role in organizational output. Fourthly,
the theory views organization from the vantage point of social ethics. 1.3 Hawthorne Experiment-The Birth of Human Relations Theory The roots of Human Relations theory can be traced back to the famous Hawthorne experiments. With an objective of addressing the recurring problem
of moderate industrial productivity, the scholars, subsequently known as Human Relations theorists, have identified the centrality of human relations especially informal relations in shaping the organizational output. Hawthorne plant of the General Electrical Company at Chicago was otherwise known for its progressive nature in terms of better pay structure, congenial work environment, liberal working hours, better living conditions, and cordial employer-employee relationship. Hence, the problem of stagnant growth at Hawthorne was no less a puzzle. The management had tried everything from Taylorism or Fayolism to overcome the crisis, but with no avail. Eventually, the management had solicited the expert advice from Harvard Business School. Elton Mayo and his research team were entrusted with duty of finding a solution to the problem. The said team had carried out a number of experiments during 1920s and 1930s which include among them were the Great Illumination Experiment (1924–27), the Human Attitudes and Sentiments (1928–31), the Bank Writing Experiment (1931–32).The findings of study were literally startling from the point of view of traditional mechanistic theories of organization: Firstly it concludes that the worker's productivity in an organization is not determined by his physical ability alone. In fact it is very much determined on his capacity as a social being.Secondly, it has repudiated the claim of centrality of economic factor in the overall productivity and demonstrated how non-economic rewards and sanctions have substantially affected the worker's behaviour.Thirdly, it has floated the concept of 'Social Man' rooted in society and group, instead of elevating the popular concept of the 'Economic Man' as a discrete rational chooser. Fourthly, it has also come out with a startling human behaviour as a social animal. The study uncovers that workers' tend to form informal groups within themselves, which have substantially shaped their behaviour towards production and management. Hence,in a nutshell sum the Human Relations theory has the following redeeming features: first, unlike the mechanistic theory of organization, it has adopted a holistic social perspective of organization. Secondly, it lays emphasis on the uniqueness of each individual by treating workers as human being with all the humanly traits. Thirdly, the theory has identified informality in the form of informal groups in organization Fourthly, it gives primacy to social thesis instead of . individual ethics. Finally,

theory has introduced a new type of management concept known as participatory management. 1.4 Elton Mayo Elton Mayo is known for his lifelong advocacy of human element of organization. He was not only instrumental in bringing in human relations approach to organization theory but also acted as the forerunner of the motivation theory, team building and group approaches of modern organizational management. Throughout his illustrious career as a Professor of Industrial Research at Harvard University, Mayo had carried out several innovative researches including the path-breaking Hawthorne studies. Mayo's proclivity to study organization from the vantage point of human psychology is largely attributable to his training in medicine, psychology and philosophy. Mayo had documented his lifelong experiences in the following books:

The Human Problems of an Industrial Civilization (1933), The Social Problems of an Industrial Civilization (1945), and The Political Problem of Industrial Civilization (1947). Despite Mayo's association with the path-breaking findings of the Hawthorne Studies and the resultant birth of human relations approach to organization, any cursory glance at his earlier works would reveal that Mayo was well versed with human elements much before his Hawthorne experiment. The Hawthorne studies, in fact, was the empirical validation of his ideas. The central argument on which Mayo put his idea of human relations was that employees unlike the environmental or economic factors are more likely to be motivated by the human especially relational factors like recognition, appreciation, attention, and camaraderie. Hence, Mayo's contribution to the organization theory, especially his observation in Hawthorne studies, had a consistency. Mayo throughout his life had been concerned about the social disorganization and the resultant fragmentation in industrial societies. If one starts revisiting Mayo's earlier works which were drafted in the context of Australia carried the same concern for industrial societies. With a profound understanding of the malaises of the industrial society, Mayo had approached the problem of Hawthorne plant. According to him, conflict in human society, especially political conflict indicatives deeply entrenched social diseases. Drawing on a communitarian perspective, Mayo had called for 'spontaneous cooperation' among all the stakeholders to get rid of persistent organizational discord and to restore harmony. To him individual's sense of 'social function' only has the potential to arrest the civilizational decay. He had criticized the social scientists, businessmen and politicians for neglecting the centrality of human cooperation in the smooth functioning of organization. 1.5 Critique of the Human Relations Theory Though the Human Relations theory has opened up new horizons in organization theory it could not escape critical scrutiny. In fact, critics were rather apprehensive of leaving organization to the whims of the workers. For example Urwick's satire on this deserves some attention here. He believes that any attempt to reformulate organization in accordance with the individual idiosyncrasies is as foolish a attempt of designing an engine in accordance with the whims of one's maiden aunt rather than with the laws of mechanical science. There is no denying that above statement is indicative of a deep-seated mistrust regarding the human elements of administration. The major criticism lebelled against human relations theory are as follows: ● First, major objection with the Human Relations theory is the reductionist approach it adopts. That is, the theorists have a propensity to reduce all sorts of organizational malfunctioning to the typical managerial apathy towards human relations. ● Secondly, some critics have uncovered the hidden interest of capital behind the birth of human relations approach via Hawthorne experimentation. With an objective of meeting the growing demands of labour during and after the Second World War, it was argued, that the human relations was brought into being. ● Thirdly, the Human Relations theory has also become the subject of criticism for its abstract psychological leaning. Caiden has picked up rightly that the theory is infected by 'vagueness, psychological jargon, distortion of the organizational environment, and unwillingness to distinguish the . administrative aspects'. ● Fourthly, the human relations theory is also subject to criticism for glorifying the human elements of organization at the cost of basic structure. Despite the above criticisms it is hard to deny the contribution of human relations approach to the organization theory. It has foregrounded the centrality of social environment in the overall output of the workers. Further it stresses on the appropriate communication between the workers and the management. Another redeeming feature of this school to organizational management is that it has discovered the criticality of informal organization in the overall performance of an organization. 1.6 Conclusion The human relations method finished extraordinary involvement to the organization theory. The tests led by the scholars of this school ensued in the appearance of a new concept that an

in it. Their experiments established that the person in an organizationis not a simple tool but a multifaceted personality interrelating in a group condition which is difficult to recognise. In totality, the human relation school was mainly accountable for a chief move in the organization theory and this move caused in appearance of a new concept known as organizational humanism which became a major field in the social science disciplines. The results of the Hawthorne experiment were published in 1941 The results have led to an increase in knowledge and understanding of workers and their work. The Hawthorne study provides a landmark to the evolution of management thought and made a significant contribution to the process of humanizing organization and management. The major contributions of Hawthorne studies can be presented as follows. ● Employees are not motivated solely by money Personal and social factors are also important to motivate employee's attitudes towards their works. ● Informal leaders play an important role in setting and enforcing group norms. ● Management must understand and recognize interpersonal and group relationson the job. ● The importance of recognizing the concept of "social man" becomes unavoidable. ● Effective supervision plays an important role in maintaining employee's morale and productivity.

The human relations approach lacks adequate focus on work. It lays all emphasis on interpersonal relations and informal groups. Human relations tend to neglect the economic dimensions of work satisfaction. 1.7

introduce Human Relations theory, especially how it originates via elaborate experimentations at the Hawthorne plant of General Electrical Company. ● With an objective of exploring the reasons behind the moderate productivity despite the application of all the known methods of incentivization, a group of theorists led by Elton Mayo had stumbled upon an unexplored terrain of organization i.e. human element. ● In the context of Hawthorne experimentation, they have identified the relative apathy of the organization theory towards human elements of organization. Mostly preoccupied with the mechanized theory of organization, mangers usually ignored the role of human factors in the overall performance of an organization. Consequently the status of employees in organization had been relegated to a mere cog or appendage of the organization. Human Relations theory considers organization as human organization which requires human solution. 1.8 Glossary Mechanistic theory of organization, Behaviourial revolution in social science, Employer-employee relations, Concepts of social man and Economic

Learning Objectives After studying the material of this unit the learners will understand ● importance of decision-making in Public Administration ● the act of decision-making as meant and propounded by Herbert Simon ● role of rationality in decision-making ● limitations of Simon's theory of decision-making 2.2 Introduction Decision making lies at the heart of any organization. Herbert Simon is known for his pioneering contribution to decision making, especially for deciphering the intricacies of decision making, so long remained relatively unexplored. Unlike the traditional approaches which equate decision making with a specialized activities associated with seasoned mandarin, Simon considers it as an indispensible part of policy making in an organization. Every part of organization, Simon, argued is associated with decision making. It depends upon the sagacity of the administrator to spot the area of an organization that deserves a new decision. However, it would be wrong to consider decision making as 'the' task of the administrator. Rather, it is a complete team work starting from chief executive officer (CEO) down to
rank and file of the organization. Hence, it has no starting point or finishing point as such. It would better to be understand it as a continuum involving a series of steps including feedback and follow up actions. Apart from Simon's rational decision making approach, three more approaches like Bargaining approach, Participative approach, and Public Choice approach are also recognized under the rubric of decision making. 2.3 Simon's Rational Decision Making Approach Simon considers organization as a structure solely concerned with decision- making. Throughout his career, Simon's intellectual pursuit of decision making was to explore human nature. In the introduction of his book Reason in Human Affairs he had noted it in the following words: "the nature of human reason-its mechanisms, its effects, and its consequences for the human condition- has been my central preoccupation for nearly fifty years". To him decision making, unlike the popular perception, is not confined to any particular part of organization or any specific section of personnel. In fact, 'decisions are made at every level of organization'. Simon had tried to lay bare the complex inner dynamics of decision making in an organization by identifying several value premises that are embedded in a given decision. For example, Simon has recognized several such value premises like decision maker's preferences, social conditioning and so on, which have substantially determined the decision making process. In order to make the complex process of decision making intelligible to the common people, Simon has divided the decision making process into three successive phases, viz, intelligence activity, design activity and choice activity.

Whereas, intelligence activity refers to a kind of alertness on the part of the decision maker regarding the environment, especially locating the portion of an organization calls for immediate intervention in terms of decision; design activity on the other hand, stands for spelling out of possible alternative options to be deliberated upon; and finally the choice activity, signifies settling down for a particular option out of the available alternatives. However, the above categorization by Simon is only meant for analytical purposes. In fact, in real situation they are mostly intertwined in nature. Hence, decision making entails selection among the alternative plan of actions by logically coordinating between fact and value propositions.The distinctiveness of Simon's decision making approach is the rationality criteria, which clearly gives him an edge over other proponents of the decision making theory. As a pragmatic theorist, Simon was quite vigilant about a common tendency among the decision makers to get carried away by lofty ideals and to set unreachable goals. Hence, actual decision making behavior falls short of the ideal of objective rationality. To him the rational-objective position is an abstraction from the messy world of real politics which depicts the world of decision makers is a rosy world, containing the following conditions: "a well-defined problem, a full array of alternatives to consider, full baseline information, full information about consequences of each alternatives, full information about consequences of each alternative, full information about values and preferences of citizens, and fully
adequate time, skill, and resources."However, the actual situation is far more complicated than it is assumed in comprehensive rational decision. James March and Herbert Simon, in Organizations have shown that actual decision making situation is marked by the following conditions: "ambiguity and poorly defined problem, incomplete information about alternatives, incomplete information about baseline, the background of the problem, incomplete information about the consequences of supposed alternatives, incomplete information about the range and content of values, preferences and interests, and limited time, limited skills and limited resources". Hence, the absolutely objective rational decision is a contradiction of term. Charles Perrow has nicely encapsulated the concept of bounded rationality: 'Given the limits on rationality, what does the individual in fact do when confronted with a choice situation?' He constructs a simplified model of the real situation. This "definition of the situation," as sociologists call it, is built out of past experience (it includes prejudices and stereotypes) and highly particularized, selective views of present stimuli. Most of his responses are "routine"; he invokes solutions he has used before. Sometimes he must engage in problem solving. When he does so, he conducts a limited search for alternatives along familiar and well- worn paths, selecting the first satisfactory one that comes along. He does not examine all possible alternatives nor does he keep searching for the optimum one. He "satisfices" instead of "optimizes." That is, he selects the first satisfactory solution, rather than search for the optimum. His very standards for satisfactory solutions are a part of the definition of the situation. They go up and down with positive and negative experience. As solutions are easier to find, the standards are raised; as they are harder to find, the standards fall. The organization can control these standards and it defines the situation; only to a limited extent are they up to the individual.' He has prescribed a moderate level of rationality (bounded rationality) based on a practical level of satisfaction. At least four types of constraints or 'bounds' can be identified in making a rational decisions, viz cognitive limits in case of bounded rationality I, social differentiation in case of bounded rationality II, pluralistic conflict in case of bounded rationality III, and structural distortion in case bounded rationality IV. The salient features of Simon's decision making approach may be summarized as follows: ● Fact–Value proposition in decision making: According to Simon decision making in an organization is solely contingent upon the proper coordination between fact and value proposition. ● Rationality criteria in decision making: The decision making approach propounded by Herbert Simon is also known as rational decision making approach for its purported rationality criteria. However, unlike the economists, who have been using the rationality criteria in terms of economic parameters, Simon used it in terms of the means–end construct.

Simon had ruled out the possibility of attaining total rationality in administrative dispensations. To him, total rationality in a real administrative context is a near impossibility. Since, the search for rationality is a seemingly endless process, Simon advised administrators to draw a line somewhere. In other words, administrators have to be contented with a moderate level of rationality or what is coined by Simon as 'bounded rationality', based on a point of adequate satisfaction or 'satisfycing'. With an intention of capturing the moderate or satisfactory state of mind of an ad- minister, Simon has introduced the term 'satisfycing', combining two English words—satisfactory and sufficing. Hence, Simon's decision-maker is not merely an utility 'maximizing' man, rather a satisfying man. The essence of Simon's usage of the word 'satisfycing' can be better understood if we draw on Herbert Simon only:"While Economic man maximizes, selects the best alternative from among all those available to him-
his cousin, whom we shall call Administrative Man, satisfices-looks for a course of action that is satisfactory or good enough." While economic man maximizes, selects the best alternatives from among all those available to him-his cousin, whom we shall call Administrative Man, satisfices- looks for a course of action that is satisfactory or good enough. 2.4 Major Criticisms However, Simon's rational decision making approach is not free criticism. His efforts to construct a value-free science of administration have been subjected to scratching criticism. For example, Selznick argued that in Simon's decision making 48 approach there was a clear-cut divorce between the means and the ends . Similarly his concept of rationality has been criticized for grossly overlooking the role of intuition, tradition, and faith in decision-making.
For Argyris, institutions, traditions, and faith have a pivotal role in the decision making process, which Simon seemed to have ignored in quest of achieving status quo in organization. In addition to that, Simon had also coined the term 'satisfycing' to rationalize incompetence in organization. Some critics have argued that Simon's notion of rationality had an instrumental rationality, designed to rationalize the capitalist immorality. Above criticism notwithstanding, Simon's contributions not only considered as a major breakthrough in the evolution of administrative theory, but also has necessitated the use of various management techniques in public policy-making. 2.5 Conclusion In sum,
the decision making theory, its criticism notwithstanding, has uncovered the nuances of decision making in an organization. Though, Simon
introduced a rational theory of decision making, he was not unaware of the limitations a manager has to work under. Hence, Simon wants his manager to draw a line in his pursuit of absolute rational decision since the absolute rational decision is no less a mirage. 2.6 Summary ● Decision making substantially constitutes the very core of administration, be it public or private. ● Simon's theory of decision-making argues that every aspect of administration revolves around decision making. ● As Simon contends, decision making requires rationality. But as the decision makers do not know in advance all the consequences of decisions to be taken and as they have inadequate information relevant to proper decision making, they look for a satisfying course of action in the arena of decision making using bounded rationality in the place of absolute rationality. 2.7 Glossary Bargaining approach, Public Choice approach, Participative approach, Human nature in decision-making, Bounded Rationality, Instrumental Rationality.
Bargaining approach : Characterized by the interaction of actors who have a common interest in reaching an agreement but strive to maximize their individual gains. Public Choice approach : The public choice approach answers that public servants are always motivated by the wauls to maximize the welfare of society. Participative approach : In the approach the person in charge of solving a problems or designing an innovation involves people who are directly concerned by the result of his or her work. Human nature in decision-making : Decisions are made explicitly wherever one consciously combines beliefs and values in order to chose a course of action. Bounded Rationality : It is the idea that rationality is limited when individuals make decisions and under these limitations, rational individuals will select a decision that is satisfactory rather than optimal. Instrumental Rationality : Behaving in the world so that you get exactly what you most waul, given the resources available to you.

Objectives After studying the materials of this unit the learners will understand ● the central idea of Maslow's Theory of Motivation ● the points of criticism labeled against his theory ● significance of his theory Theory of Motivation 3.2 Introduction The socio-psycholgical approach/theory introduces a fresh perspective to the theory of organization by exploring psychological roots of human behaviour. In order to understand the variability of the organizational output, this new approach borrows liberally from the works of sociologists and psychologists. This new theory relates human behaviour with organizational productivity. Thanks to its preoccupation with human behaviour, this group of theories is also known as behavioural theory. The rigorous scientific study of human behaviour in diverse social environments was the basic objective of this school. Several conceptual dimensions of organizational behaviour like motivation, leadership, communication, organizational conflict, organizational change, organizational development, and group dynamics have been discussed under this school. Scholars like Abraham Maslow, Frederick Herzberg, Douglas McGregor, Rensis Likert, Chris Argyris, were among the few who have contributed to the development of this school. The origin of behavioural school can be traced back to the famous

Hawthorne experiment and the consequent rise of the Human Relations theory. Hence, behavioural approach can be regarded as a continuation of human relations approach. However, a subtle distinction is present between the Behavioural approach and its precursor Human Relations approach. Whereas, the Human Relations approach is too much preoccupied with workers' satisfaction, Behavioural approach, on the other hand, seeks to gauge human psyche to make sense of the puzzle as to why people behave the way they do. 3.3 Motivational theory of Maslow Dr. Abraham Maslow was one of the famous behaviouralists and social psychologists. In 1943, he published a paper entitled 'A Theory of Human Motivation". His book, "Motivation and Personality" was published in 1954. In these two works he developed his theory of motivation, a unique addition to the theory of organization. His theory of motivation is known as Hierarchy of Human Needs theory. In this theory, Maslow explains how the motivation of the workers and the employees is built through fulfillment and gratification of the rising and developing needs and expectations. For this reason, his theory of motivation is also regarded as the Satisfaction of Needs theory. Maslow constitutes a few hypotheses regarding how motivation of workers can be built and grown. These hypotheses relate to the following considerations. 1) Generally man uses to search for satisfaction of his needs or desires. As he becomes satisfied with fulfillment of some primary needs he becomes anxious to have other set of qualitatively better and improved needs to get them fulfilled and to have greater and better satisfaction in a comparatively better way. So the more a man becomes satisfied the more he becomes desirous of having greater and better satisfaction from fulfillment of greater and better needs and expectations. 2) Attention and commitment to work are always preceded and dictated by firmbelief and objective of achieving success in need-fulfillment and by strong will to have full satisfaction in need-fulfillment. 3) Dissatisfaction instead of satisfaction accrued from need-fulfillment is the source or cause of motivation. It implies that needs are of various types and of varying qualities and also they are stratified. After fulfillment of some needs having particular forms and qualities some other higher needs having relatively better qualities are grown to become fulfilled. These latter needs which are of higher and better qualities than the former or the preceding needs motivate a man to do things in a better way with strong will, enhanced promptitude and greater enthusiasm. Maslow has mentioned of five kinds of needs and expectations which belong to five upward stratums. The needs and expectations belonging to lowest stratum are the 'physiological needs'. These physiological needs relate to hunger, thirst, food, clothes and shelter etc. These needs are thus the most primary or basic and these are

related to the basic biological needs for an individual. Satisfaction of these basic or primary needs, Maslow argues, is required by the individual for his survival which is a basic requirement for him. After this need-fulfillment, an individual expects security of life or life free from fear of insecurity. At this developed second stage, he or she tries to have satisfaction out of fulfilling the needs and expectations related to security of life. The expectations of organized life condition bereft of danger and insecurity motivate and induce him or her to work. The needs and expectations of this second stage are called 'safety needs', according to Maslow. In the next upper third stage, the individual expects to acquire the status of social being after gaining love, affection, co-operation and fellowship from others in his or her surroundings. He or she at this stage expects to make an agreeable and loving social environment. In the earlier two stages, the expectations and needs were exclusively personal and self-centric. In this third stage, he or she requires these needs and expectations to become fulfilled for his or her individual self. But, as Maslow observes, these needs and expectations are deeply associated with the sense of sociability and with its constituents. The needs and expectations of this third stage are, according to Maslow, 'love needs' or 'social needs'. In the fourth stage, the individual, as Maslow contends, expects self-respect, social dignity and social recognition to acquire and then to become satisfied after fulfilling these expectations. Self-respect is called to be a personal need of an individual but social dignity and social recognition are not easy to achieve. They are achieved from the society, but the individual is resolute to strive to achieve them too. The needs and expectations of this stage are 'esteem needs', according to Maslow. The needs and expectations of the fifth and final stage are called by Maslow as the 'self-actualization needs' or the 'growth needs'. After accruing satisfaction achieved through fulfillment of the former four types of needs and expectations, the individual in this stage tries to become satisfied with full enjoyment of whatever considered important and essential for being a complete human being with full ability and potentiality. As Maslow observes, the satisfaction of individual reaches its peak or gets full if he or she actualizes his or her cherished needs and expectations in real life. Maslow opines that when an individual becomes a superior individual after fulfilling various needs and expectations at various stages or at various levels, he or she seeks to move forward to achieve the highest and perfect goals of life and with the attainment of these goals he or she becomes a perfect individual. For this reason, Maslow has called the needs of this fifth stage as also being the 'growth needs'. An individual seeking fullness in life becomes fully satisfied when he or she gets highest and fullest satisfaction of the highest needs and the highest expectations. As Maslow points out, the types of needs and expectations that a person intends to get them satisfied as well as the corresponding stages are both ascending. They are moving upward, from relatively lower to higher state. Both they are directed to qualitative growth and development. The nature and standard of human needs and expectations are, according to Maslow, are primarily low but they move upward as soon as they get fulfilled by the satisfying person. The diagram, drawn below, expreses vividly the hierarchy of needs as explained by Maslow.

The Hierarchy of Needs

theory as propounded by Maslow is sourced from viewpoint of human relations. This theory has depicted the limitations of bureaucratic organization that relies on stratification, specialization and particularization of work, formalism, anonymity, impartiality and rigid adherence to rules, etc. Bureaucratic organization promptly rejects the importance and relevance of intention, will, expectations, and satisfaction either of the role performer or of those for whom the role performer performs. In the theoretical scheme of Maslow an organization is essentially human and social organization, and a person is not one conforming to a machine. He or she does have his or her own intention and will, desire and expectation and these intention and will, desire and expectation motivate and drive him or her to work or not to work for definite goal or goals to achieve. _____5_____

Maslow's exposition, however, is not examined by experience. Maslow has not provided empirical evidences in favour of his arguments. For methodological reasons, therefore, his theory is not a complete one. Secondly, the way Maslow has stratified the needs and expectations of persons is either oversimplified or arbitrary. His projection of the sequences of needs seems to be baffling for many who do not feel about needs and expectations in the same way and same direction. A very ambitious person can desperately set his or her higher objectives to pursue or to achieve discarding love, assistance and co- operation of other fellows around him or her. He or she again can go for fulfilling the higher needs requirements leaving the needs and requirements of the interim stage to halt for sometimes. So the needs and requirements of persons do not follow any uni-linear direction in setting their needs and requirements according to any fixed sequence. So Maslow's theory is far from being a right projection of human needs and requirements. Thirdly, the concept of self-actualization of the highest and superior quality needs and expectations is not distinct. Because of various constraints all persons cannot always become the persons as they desire to be. In fact, no organization can have such resources at its disposal as it enables all its members to attain whatever they like to pursue and to achieve in life. Maslow's theory has not thus given due attention to the constraints of need fulfillment. Fourthly, Maslow's theory, as some critics argue, denies the importance of structure, principles and work environment of organization. It conceals the hidden interest and motive of profit-making in organizational functioning emphasizing only human element as a factor in production. 3.5 Conclusion Although Maslow's theory has been subjected to criticism, his ideas have greatly influenced the other behavioural scientists such as Chris Argyris, Douglas McGregor Renis Likert and Fredrick Herzberg. Maslow's theory of human motivation based on satisfaction of basic and other higher needs can hardly be denied as it involves enormous implications for the administrators who need to motivate large number of employees and workers for optimum performance for yielding optimum output in their respective organizations. In fact, there are several parallels in our daily life, which validate the centrality of Maslow's arguments. In an organization too, if an administrator understands the ascending needs of the employees and workers, he creates there conditions accordingly for the satisfaction of their needs and expectations. Also, if the employees and workers find condition conducive to the satisfaction of their ascending needs and expectations they work for the organization with increasing enthusiasm. 3.6 Summary · Maslow has given a fresh perspective to the theory of organization exploring the psychological roots of human behaviour. · Maslow is of opinion that man is always in pursuit of satisfaction of varying needs and it motivates him or her to do his or her work. · Maslow

From the perspective of socio-psychological analysis we can appreciate why people work or do not work satisfactorily in their respective organization. Socio-psychological analysis seeks to unearth the intricate human nature and to find out the several multi-dimensional trends implicit in human behaviour, which together induces human being to do or not to do work for the formal organization to which he or she belongs. We have a few management theorists who from the socio-psychological standpoint have tried to explain human nature and human behaviour of persons associated and engaged in organizations producing goods and services for the community. In this unit, the learners will be offered a very important discussion on the theory of motivation propounded by Douglas McGregor, a noted psychiatrist, who put together some negative and positive trends implicit in the nature and behaviour of people that get them averse or eager towards work in organization. 4.3 McGregor's Theory X Douglas McGregor is an American socio-psychologist who is known for his famous Theory X and Theory Y. He was one of the protagonists of behavioural movement of the post-Second World War period. He did have extensive research works in the field of social psychology and behavioural science. In his great work, 'The Human Side of Enterprise', published in 1960, he had illuminated the theory of motivation which is very important in organization and management. 'The Professional Manager' is hi another important work which was published in 1964. In these two works, McGregor discussed on the attitudes of both the workers or employees and the managers in organization and emphasized the need for correcting the negative attitudes and negative behaviour and for utilizing the positive attitudes and positive behaviour in the accomplishment of the productive purposes of the organization. According to McGregor, the negative assumptions and attitudes of the workers and the employees are the constituent parts of Theory X. The main assumptions of this Theory X are: 1. Man is generally lazy and does not want to work. He is averse to work and he does not like work and hence he tries to avoid work. 2.

Because of this human characteristic of dislike of work, most people are coerced or threatened and controlled with punishment to get them put forth adequate effort towards the achievement of organizational objectives. 3. The average human being prefers to be directed and he wishes to avoid responsibility. 4. The average human being is less ambitious and he expects the security of his job and earning. 5. He again does lack creativity and he is indifferent to the demands and requirements of his organization. 6. Normally the average individual is averse to and he resists change. These negative assumptions belonging to the contention of Theory X, according to McGregor, too disheartening. The workers or employees here are opposed to work and got prey to insecurity, fear and punishment. Management itself, on the other hand, shoulders the responsibility for assembling all the factors of production and the managers here are required to control their workers or employees, manage their efforts, motivate them and modify their behaviour to accomplish the purposes of organization. Also, in order to get their organization to run in the productive direction, the managers intervene to get either employees or workers persuaded,
are

rewarded and motivated. But in the place of this soft management strategy if the managers adopted hard strategy involving coercion, control, punishment and threat, the organization may soon face militant unionism, sabotage and antagonism which may defeat the purpose of management and jeopardize even the existence of organization. But soft management strategy, as McGregor opines, is not a sane one and it is limiting because it overburdens the managers with excessive works which are not their own and which retards them in becoming innovative and creative agents of management in organization. Theory Y does not explain how workers or employees get motivated and thus it does not illuminate the total texture of human attitude and behaviour. McGregor, hence, had proposed an alternative theory called Theory Y which will be discussed in the following part of this study unit. 4.4

Y In comparison to those of Theory X, the assumptions belonging to Theory Y are positive seemed largely adequate in realizing human potentialities. This Theory Y represents altogether a reverse explanation of the relationship human being and management. The assumptions in Theory Y are helpful in co-ordinating the functions of organizations oriented to the prompt achievement of cherished goals Under Theory Y the assumptions about human behavior are: 1. In a sound and healthy organizational environment, an average man's love for work is as natural as play and rest. He is not inherently averse to work and he gains and enjoys satisfaction in work performance and this satisfaction acts as a source of pleasure and enthusiasm inducing him to perform more and more work. 2. Most people are governed by their own sense of self-control and self- direction while performing work. 3. Under proper conditions, most people are ambitious. They learn to accept responsibility and perform duty towards organizational achievement. 4. Most people can have the capacity and potentiality to generate and apply creativity in case the organization faces crisis or critical problems. 5. Most people do have imagination, ingenuity and innovativeness, which enhance the capacity of the organization to cope with new challenges of future growth and development 6. People perform in organization not because of threat of coercion and punishment. They work for rewards which are associated with satisfaction of the organizational goal achievement and this achievement actualizes the dream of workers inculcating positive attitudes and developing values. As McGregor contends, the assumptions implicit in Theory Y are immensely helpful for the management of an organization to motivate workers towards goal achievement. As compared to Theory X, Theory Y casts light on the positive nature

and creative and hopeful image of the workers or employees. Self-controlled and self-directed man feels himself as an integral part of the organization. In this respect, Theory Y is conducive to evolve and successfully activates the concept of participative management of organization. As the workers or employees in Theory Y are eager to take responsibility, as they possess creativity, ingenuity and innovative skill and faculty, they do not wait for the direction to come from management and, instead, they themselves become the leaders of the organization. It reduces the extra workload of the manager in the form of directing the workers on regular basis. Again, the managers have not to take any extra effort to integrate the workers with the organization or to integrate the goals of organization with the goals of the workers or employees. So Theory Y of McGregor is a tool for solving the problem of integration in organization. Theory Y is consistent with solving the problem of delegation and decentralization of power, authority and responsibility in an organization. As the workers are themselves positive, responsible, self-controlled and self-restrained power and authority of the organization can easily be shared with them. This process or scheme of power sharing get them more responsible in respect of achieving the optimum output of organization on the one hand and creating a human and social environment within the organization on the other. This act of creating a human and social environment is considered as a far more important work than the instant achievement of optimum result for the present. Apart from it, the assumptions inherent in Theory Y concede space and opportunity for the managers of an organization to evaluate and review their own performance and to become more and more innovative and creative and let them make new road map for future growth of their organization. Theory Y, above all, recognizes the wisdom, self-knowledge, self-initiative and entrepreneurship of both the workers or employees and the managers. It also gives and extends freedom for them in organization and all these advantages and opportunities create an environment there where both the parties, i.e., the workers or employees and the managers work together and work in tune with the aims and objectives of the organization. 4.5 Critical Evaluation But the socio-psychological theory of McGregor is not free from flaws. The way he had bifurcated the workers or employees with either their negative or their positive tendencies is either oversimplified or deterministic. He did not discuss the circumstances and conditions when an worker becomes lazy, irresponsible and apathetic in organization. Again, self-driving, responsible and diligent worker may be forced, for a number of reasons, to succumb to the forces of negativism at any point of time. Besides it, human nature and human behaviour, in fact, are composed of diverse and even mutually opposing inclinations about which no particularization is absolutely possible and practicable. McGregor did not take these considerations seriously. So his theoretical exposition is not adequate. How the management or administration will consider its workers or employees useful for and consistent to organizational goal achievement is left unanswered in the theoretical projection given by McGregor. 4.6 Conclusion Despite inherent limitations, McGregor's exposition of Theory Y and Theory Y is an important addition to the theory of motivation in management and administration The assumptions of both Theory X and Theory Y involve practical relevance. They resemble to the practical behaviour of workers or employees and common people as well and this practical behaviour governs and conditions their action or inaction in real life situations. So the effort of discovering and theorizing of the tendencies and human attitude of persons in organizations is enormous and, for this reason, McGregor is considered to be very important in management science. The way he had illuminated the behavioural role of the workers or employees in the organizational growth and development or in the removal of problems of management and organization has made the path for and given direction to future researches on man-organization relationships. 4.7 Summary · McGregor presents a socio-psychological analysis regarding how man works or does not work in an organization · He introduces Theory X and Theory Y in the domain of management and organization. · His theory X contains negative assumptions associated with human behaviour that retards motivation towards work. · But his Theory Y involves positive assumptions that promptly induce the workers or employees to attaining organizational goals. · Despite some limitations, McGregor's work is significant in managing organization and in providing direction to future research as well. 4.8 Glossary Motivation, Theory X, Theory Y

Fred Riggs was perhaps the first who had attempted to conceptualize the interactions between administrative systems and its environment. With an objective of assessing the cumulative impact of social, cultural, historical, and political environment on administrative system, he had introduced ecological approach to administration. However, the ecology-administration relationship is not the one way traffic. In fact, Riggs had acknowledged the supposed impact of administrative system on society as well. His views pertaining to the ecology of administration are found in two of his publications viz. 'The Ecology of Public Administration' (1961) and 'Administration in Developing Countries: The Theory of Prismatic Society' (1964). Drawing on the ecological perspective, Riggs had developed two important models to make sense of the nature of political development in both developed and developing societies. The first model i.e. 'agraria-industria', constructed by Riggs in 1956 sought to classify societies on the basis of development. Taking development as a continuous linear process, the said model considered development and underdevelopment are the two axes, while agrarian societies are placed in the underdeveloped axis; the industrial societies are placed in the developed axis. The categorization in this model, however, failed to capture the nature of the transitional societies which have started their journey towards development but ended up in mid of the course. Considering this lacuna Riggs had added another element to this model in 1957, known as transitia, encapsulating the essence of the transformational societies. However, his later attempt to rectify the lacuna of the said model by incorporating the nature of the administrative systems in the developing countries could not satisfy his critics. In fact, on the face of severe criticism, Riggs was forced to introduce another model solely dedicated to the developing societies, entitled fused-prismatic-diffracted model. Based on the structural functional analysis, Riggs categorized societies into two, fused and diffracted, types with an intention to foreground the very nature of developing societies or what he called as prismatic society. For Riggs, fused society is a structurally unified society where one unified structure performs all the functions. It refers to typically agrarian societies, where source of authority is traditional in nature based on deference to the ruler. The economic system is also rudimentary in nature based on barter system. Riggs has cited the examples of Imperial China and Siamese Thailand as the examples of fused society. The diffracted society, on the other hand, is a structurally diversified society, where each function is carried out by specific designated structure. In the sections that follow a discussion will be made to demonstrate how Riggs has analyzed the ecological approach to administration in the following models viz prismatic model, administrative subsystem, which he calls sala model and market as bazaar-canteen model. 5.3 Prismatic Model Among the three-fold categorization put forward by Riggs, prismatic model attracts most of the attention. He was too much preoccupied with the social structures of prismatic society and their interactions with the administrative sub-system in a society. Riggs has identified three important characteristics features of the prismatic society, namely:

Heterogeneity: Heterogeneity is the distinguishing feature of this kind of societies. Typically indicative of a transitional society, prismatic society represents the simultaneous presence of diverse kinds of sub-systems, practices, and viewpoints. Co-existence of modern administrative structure in urban areas with traditional administrative structure in rural areas is the hallmark of transitional society. 2. Formalism: Formalism in common parlance means strict adherence to norms, laws, and principles. In prismatic society, however, formalism does not always mean adherence to norms, laws and principles. Adherence to formalism in these societies is restricted to the constitutional provisions, but in actual situation they are not properly followed. The discrepancy between the prescription of laws, rules and their actual implementation may be better understood if we take a look at the administrative systems in those societies. Though constitution has empowered the legislators in these societies to deliberate upon policies, in reality, they rarely engage in any serious act of policy making. In fact, they remain busy mostly in power politics, leaving bureaucracy to take vital decision on their behalf. Such taking over of the responsibility of decision making by the bureaucracy often lead to official corruption. 3. Overlapping: The prismatic society is also known for its structural overlapping. Here differ-entiated structures of diffracted society usually co- exist with undifferentiated structures of a fused type. The modern social structures are not rare in these societies. In fact, there is substantial number of such structures present in those societies, but they are fairly outnumbered by the presence of strong undifferentiated structures of primordial social system. Riggs has demonstrated that the prismatic society is marked by several types of social, economic, political, and administrative sub-systems. For example, Riggs called the administrative sub-system as the sala model and economic subsystems as the bazaar-canteen model. In the following sections an attempt will be made to give an overview of the said subsystems. 5.4 Administrative Subsystem: The Sala Model Riggs has coined the term sala to describe the administrative sub-systems of the prismatic society. Derived from the Spanish lexicon, the word sala represents something akin to government or bureau. Unlike the two extreme types of administrative sub-systems (viz, chamber and bureau) he has identified for the fused and diffracted societies respectively, sala model is marked by several mixed features like nepotism and favouritism, poly-communalism (hostile interaction 179 2nd proof 12.09.2022 3rd proof 14-10-2022 Dummy proof 19/10/2022 among diverse groups), and the existence of elects (interest group having communal membership). A. Nepotism and Favouritism: The administrative system of the prismatic society is marked by nepotism and favouritism, whereby appointments, promotions to different governmental positions are made on the basis of family lineage or kinship. Interestingly, prismatic society or its administrative sub-system, unlike its counterpart in the fused society, has never acknowledged the any patrimonial feature or spoil system in the recruitment process. But in practice, patrimonialism and favouritism were the driving forces of the administrative system of the prismatic society. The sala officials rampantly flouted the constitutional provision of free and fair administrative practices to serve their narrow self-interest. B. Poly-communalism: In order to capture the essence of socio-cultural diversity of the prismatic society manifested in terms of numerous ethnic, religious and racial groups, Riggs has coined the term poly-communalism. Riggs has mentioned that these ethnic, religious and racial groups are often locked into hostile exchanges among themselves that have serious implications for the administration. Ideally speaking, administrative officials are supposed to go by the law and discharge their duties impartially. But in a prismatic society, thanks to poly-communalism, the possibility of partial treatment by the administrative officials in favour of his/her own community may not be entirely ruled out. Hence, poly-communalism not only creates problems for the administration, but also threatens to destroy social equality as one group may get disproportionate advantage over other. C. Poly-Normativism: Another important feature of the administrative system of the prismatic society is the existence of multiple values and norms. People in these societies usually subscribe to multiple norms and values, leading to serious problem of decision making. The problem of poly-normativism is clearly discernible if we draw on the administrative system of the prismatic society. In the sala model, bureaucrats, normally get into the service through competitive examination, but eventually rely upon several inscriptive criterions to get plum posting or desired promotion. D. Formation of 'clect': The administrative system of the prismatic society is also known for its typical group formation. Riggs has christened these groups as clects. However, the uniqueness of these groups is that it does not qualify to be an association of the modern sense of the term. It carries the characteristics of both the pre-modern and modern societies as Riggs, has shown that clect

It forms a close-knit group based on any primary identity and acts as a pressure group vis-à-vis other groups and government. These groups especially the affiliation to these groups virtually determines the administrative sub-culture of the prismatic society. E. Blurring of authority structure and control mechanism: The sala system is also marked by a queer mixture of authority structure, which is out and out centralized and concentrated in nature, with that of an overlapping control mechanism which is highly localized and dispersed. This blurring of authority structure and control mechanism has resulted in an unbalanced polity with bureaucracy, as it were, takes the hindmost. The political system of the prismatic society, which is supposed to control the entire politico-administrative system gets weakened in the process, leading to disproportionate rise of bureaucracy with resultant blues like favouritism and nepotism in recruitment, institutionalized cor- ruption, and inefficiency in handling the administration of laws. 5.5 The Bazaar Canteen Model The economy, another important subsystem of the prismatic society, has been identified by Riggs as the Bazaar Canteen Model.

True to the spirit of the prismatic society, the economy of it also carries the mixed characters of both the traditional and modern societies. In this model, market a very modern mechanism of economy based on spontaneous dynamism of demand and supply is coincided with the traditional economic systems based on barter or exchange system. This model has the following distinguishing features: first, favouritism, a common feature of prismatic society, also prevails in its economic system. Secondly, unlike the diffracted society where prices of commodity are determined by the markets forces, the prices of commodity in the prismatic society vary from situation to situation, person to person and place to place. Interestingly, no rational standardization in pricing is available. Several non–economic factors like family contacts, bargaining power, individual equations, and politics are held responsible for the variability of prices of goods and services in these societies. Thirdly, unlike any sound economic logic, the wage relations in these societies are mostly determined by family ties or kinship considerations. Fourthly, in the said model a gross economic discrepancy can be noticed where a small section of people enjoy all the benefit at the cost of a sizable section of the society.

Critical evaluation Riggs' ecological theory and its various constituent concepts have been criticized by both the western and non-western scholars. Some of them are of opinion that 'fused-prismatic diffracted model' of Riggs is too abstract and too confusing. His structural functional studies which include several ecological factors such as economic, social and political, are too difficult to follow. His prescription and concept of formalism is not satisfactory. They point out that research scholars often face numerous difficulties when they attempt to use his model to study empirically the administrative systems of alien countries. These critics argue that when Riggs himself requires scholars to take historical background, political structure, territorial size, social ideologies, role of military, etc., of the countries under investigation into account he himself negates the uniqueness immanent in history, culture, psyche and behaviour of each nation. His approach is thus deductive leading his theory to base on logical speculation and assumptions. Apparently his is an approach seemed too broad but inherently it is reductionist and sceptical too. Riggs has neglected the psychological and cognitive base or aspects of different societies. His 'fused-prismatic-diffracted model' uses too much discrete terminology and got overweight with specialized linguistic jargon. The critics also observe that the concept of social change and transformation as explained in 'fused-prismatic-diffracted model' is uni-dimensional. They are of opinion that the factors causing or propelling social change and transformation may be latent, varied, unstable, indefinite and unprecedented. In many cases, again, social change may result from powerful external forces. For proper and adequate explanation and understanding of the administrative systems of these varied countries resulting from varied forms of social change and transformation, the analytical tool of 'fused-prismatic-diffracted model' is appeared to be too simplified and irrelevant to facts. In delineating the varied tendencies, nature and characteristics either of the diffracted or of the prismatic societies, Riggs has applied western epistemology and colonial cultural standards and mindset. This attitude, the critics opine, is improper, prejudiced, pessimistic and dangerous. The critics again bring out the fact that Riggs has deliberately avoided the discussion relating to the fundamental issues and problems of administration as prevalent in the developing countries. Riggs' model provides no answer to the problems which pertain to reconstruction of agriculture, industrialization, poverty elimination, employment generation, public health and sanitation, education, import reduction and export promotion, search for appropriate technology, ensuring food security and clean environment for all, etc., Riggs' model does have nothing to solve the general problems of administration in developing societies, nor it has any intention to be a guide to action for the practitioners in administration there.

The critics, again, mention that Riggs only has explained how ecology influences administration. But in reality the individuals too in administration and also the individuals for whom the administration is carried out, exert tremendous influence upon creating, changing and modifying the ecology, So Riggs has overemphasized ecology and undermined the will, intention, and capability of animate being in administration and thought the latter being the passive force in the sphere of administration. 5.7 Conclusion Ecological approach to administration has uncovered the subtle interaction between administration and its environment. Riggs was the first to have applied macro level approaches to the study of the administrative systems in the developing societies along with devising several conceptual tools of analysis on the subject. He is also known for his pioneering contribution to the cross cultural administrative studies. His work had spearheaded many empirical studies on administrative systems of the developing societies. 5.8 Summary · Ecological approach of Fred W. Riggs focuses attention on the dynamic relationship between administration and its total environment which conditions the content, direction and consequences of policy-making and policy-execution. · Drawing on the ecological perspective Riggs developed three important models applicable to the analysis of political and administrative development of developed, developing and transitional societies. · In the face of critical observations Riggs in the later days developed 'fused- prismatic-diffracted model' for the purpose of analysis of the nature of administration only of the developing societies. · He characterized prismatic society as having some particular traits. · Riggs had coined the term 'sala' to describe the administrative sub-system of prismatic society and had noted characteristics of sala administration. · He introduced bazaar canteen model to analyse the economy of the prismatic society. · Despite several critical notes labelled against his ecological analysis of administration Riggs had admittedly opened up a new mode of explanation and analysis of administrative systems which respond to and are largely conditioned by ecology or by ecological forces.

A number of agitations by the labour organisations and their representations to the American Congress, led the House in 1912 to appoint a Special Committee of the House of Representatives to investigate into Taylorism. Although the report of the committee favoured neither the labour nor Taylor, the trade unions in 1915 succeeded in getting an amendment to Army Appropriation Act, forbidding the use of stop watches or the payment of premiums or bonuses in Army Arsenals. Trade Union's opposition to Taylorism also led to an investigation conducted by Robert Hoxie for the United States Commission on Industrial Relations. Professor Hoxie in his report criticised Taylor's scientific management and Taylor's approaches as they were concerned only with mechanical aspects and not with the human aspects of production. Thirdly, Taylor's division of work into planning and executive divisions has severely been criticised. It is argued that in such situations it is difficult to develop proper team spirit, and if planning is totally divorced from execution it is difficult to secure the participation of the workers in the progress of-the firm. It has also been argued that Taylor: overlooked the fact that the principle of division and sub- division of work into minutest parts is subject to the law of diminishing returns. Thus, Taylor's philosophy was summarised in the following words: "First, he confuses the principle of analysis with the principle of action .... Second, planning anti doing are separate parts of the same job; they cannot be totally divorced". Behaviouralists charged that Taylor's methods of scientific management sacrifices the initiative of the worker, his individual freedom and-the use of his intelligence and responsibility. Herbert Simon and March have described the scientific management as the 'physiological organisation theory'. Braveman characterised Taylorism: (a) as abstracting the craft skill from the worker and housing it in a system of control, and (b) using this knowledge so gained to legitimise control of the worker. The second point about legitimizing the managerial control of the worker has been expanded by Whiteaker. He asserted that it is an effort by capitalist philosophy to'resolve the contrast between representative political

PREFACE In a bid to standardize higher education in the country, the University Grants Commission (UGC) has introduced Choice Based Credit System (CBCS) based on five types of courses viz. core, discipline specific, generic elective, ability and skill enhancement for graduate students of all programmes at Honours level. This brings in the semester pattern, which finds efficacy in sync with credit system, credit tranafer, comprehensive continuous assessments and a graded pattern of evaluation. The objective is to offer learners ample flexibility to choose from a wide gamut of courses, as also to provide them lateral mobility between various educational institutions in the country where they can carry their acquired credits. I am happy to note that the University has been recently accredited by National Assessment and Accreditation Council of India (NAAC) with grade "A". UGC (Open and Distance Learning Programmes and Online Programmes) Regulations, 2020 have mandated compliance with CBCS for U. G. programmes for all the HEIs in this mode. Welcoming this paradigm shift in higher education, Netaji Subhas Open University (NSOU) has resolved to adopt CBCS from the academic session 2021-22 at the Under Graduate Degree Programme level. The present syllabus, framed in the spirit of syllabi recommended by UGC, lays due stress on all aspects envisaged in the curricular framework of the apex body on higher education. It will be imparted to learners over the six semesters of the Programme. Self Learning Materials (SLMs) are the mainstay of Student Support Services (SSS) of an Open University. From a logistic point of view, NSOU has embarked upon CBCS presently with SLMs in English/ Bengali. Eventually, the English version SLMs will be translated into Bengali too, for the benefit of learners. As always, all of our teaching faculties contributed in this process. In addition to this we have also requisitioned the services of best academics in each domain in preparation of the new SLMs. I am sure they will be of commendable academic support. We look forward to practive feedback from all stake- holders who will participate in the teaching-learning based on these study materials. It has been a very challenging task well executed by the teachers, officers & staff of the University and I heartily congratulate all concerned in the preparation of these SLMs. I wish you all a grand success. For a long time the Administration has been accepted as an art and skill to ensure the subordinization as well as subjection of Subjects (later Citizen) to the laws and rules of the Supreme Law-Making Authority. India has got a long list of her traditional rulers like Mourya's. Gupta's and Mughal's who had thaeir own administrative skill, and were hailed as greatest artists in their own field by an admiring world.

Indian Administration : The Evolution Indian administration can be traced to the Indus Valley Civilization which is about 5000 years old forms the basis of our civilization and culture. The available evidence shows that though for a long time the state in ancient India confined itself only to the constituent functions. The sphere of the state activity was very extensively extended between the vedic and Mauryan age.

In the long history of Indian administration, a number of administrative organisations rose and fell. However, there are two basic features of the Indian administrative system which continued right down the ages the importance of the villages as a primary unit and co-ordination between the two opposite trends of centralisation and decentralisation. To put it in a nutshell the present administration is developed since from Vedic period. Abundant sources are available to get a clear picture of the history of Indian administrative system. A lot of information regarding the organisation and functions of Indian administration is obtained from Vedic literature, Buddhist treatises, Jain literature, Dharmasastras, Indian Puranas, Ramayanas, Mahabharata, Manu Smriti, SukraNiti and Arthashastra.

The powers of administering the states were centralised in the hands of the king during the ancient period in India. During the Vedic period the king was assisted in his work by many officers. He was surrounded by a circle of his friends and principal officers. There is a reference regarding this in the two epics of Ramayana and Mahabharata. A similar reference is also to be found in Manu Smriti and SukraNiti. Kautilya'sArthashastra, a political treatise on ancient Indian political institutions, written sometime from 321 to 296 B.C., examines statecraft, gives an account of State administration, and reflects the rule of the Mauryan kings. The decentralisation process had started in ancient India. As a result of this, empires were administratively divided into provinces, provinces into districts and districts into urban and rural centers. During the ancient period state administration was divided into numerous departments. In Vedic times the number of such departments was limited. Gradually, the number of such departments increased and their jurisdiction extended. For this we get many references which can be obtained from Vedic literatures and subsequent sources. In ancient Indian administration there is also found a description of the principles of public administration. Thus, the principle of hierarchy had been given a practical shape, and seeds of co-ordination were present between different departments. Such a full-fledged administrative system existed in the reigns of Chandragupta Maurya and Ashoka. Great emphasis was placed on observation and inspection along with the principle of hierarchy.

The first form of the 'State' in India can be traced back to the times of Manu (original name Satyavrata) the first King and progenitor of mankind according to mythological record. People were fed up with anarchy as there was no neutral judge/ arbitrator in between to solve issues of society, and so they appointed Manu as King and paid service fees as taxes for looking after them and ensuring mutual benefit and justice to everyone in society owing to his wisdom and philosophical attitude the King was divine and regarded as descended from God.

Ramayana and Mahabharata. Later Vedic times it goes to portray the role of the King as the sole of administration are being helped by his principal officers who were the Purohit and Senani where the Purohit (Priest) wielded much more authority than the kshatriya (Warrior clan) kings. Other figures of administration were Treasurer, Steward, Spies and Messengers, Charioteer, Superintendent of Dices. This is also mentioned in Manu Smriti and SukraNiti. 1.3

Indian Administration : Maurya and Gupta Period The Mauryan period was the era of major development in Indian Administration. Decentralisation was prevalent, as the village units played a very important role as the base of administration since ancient times. Empires were divided into provinces, provinces into districts, districts into rural and urban centers for efficient administration. Kautilya's Arthashastra is a work on Varta (Science Of Economics) &Dandaniti (statecraft/Management Of State Administration) existing in the Mauryan rule. It was written sometime between 321 and 300 BC. It was retrieved in 1904 AD and published in 1909 AD by R. Shamasastry. It touches upon topics like functions of the chief executive, hierarchy, bureaucracy, corruption, local administration, supervisory management, motivation, morale and Job description. The most noticeable aspect of the Arthashastra is its emphasis on Public Welfare even in an autocratic agrarian State. That is where its timelessness lies. It is composed in the form of brief statements called Sutras and is compiled in 15 books (Adhikarnas), 150 sections,180 chapters (prakarnas), 6000 verses (sutras). Administration and Modern Personnel Administration and Public Administration. (1) Personnel Administration : A system of recruitment was there and job description as well. Salaries were clearly spelled out of ministers and government officials. It also stated a view of job permanency and increment in salary or position (promotion) if the official concerned provided extraordinary service. Personnel were to be 12 transferred from time to time as per Kautilya, because it would avoid corruption and misappropriation of government funds. Removal and tenure of officials and ministers were at the pleasure of the King just like the Governor and Attorney General, etc. hold office at a term that specifies 'pleasure of the President'. (2) Public Administration : The King is the sole source of authority and appoints and dismisses personnel and divides the work of govt. into different ministries under several ministers and officials. Kautilya stresses on the need for specialist and generalist personnel at different levels of administration with full accountability to the King, thus talks about division of labour and coordination between them for efficient administration.

is more about political science that is how to conduct State affairs rather than focusing on the philosophy that underlies it. He is very practical in his approach with a strict focus on morality so that the King's rule and administration are neutral without offending anyone, and also on rationality and an organized as well as efficient way of running a system with a great deal of focus on accountability and honesty and vigilance. In the Mauryan administration, the State had to perform two types of functions. The constituent (component) functions related to maintenance of law and order, security of person and property and defence against aggression. The ministrant (welfare) functions had to do with provision of welfare services. All these functions were carried out by highly organised and elaborate governmental machinery. The empire was divided into a Home Province under the direct control of the central government and 4 to 5 outlying provinces, each under a Viceroy who was responsible to the Central Government. The provinces had considerable autonomy in this "feudal- federal type" of organisation. Provinces were divided into districts and districts into villages with a whole lot of officials in charge at various levels..

An outstanding features of Mauryan administration was that the State, through a new class of officials, known as 'dharma –mahamantras' carried out the policy of moral regeneration of the people. Ashokan state carried out the policy of moral regeneration of his subjects through a new class of officials known as 'Dharm-mahamatras'. Today almost every country of the world has recognised the necessity of religious education in the broader sense of the term to be imparted in schools in order that the civilians of tomorrow would grow with a non-sectarian attitude and non-bias view towards all religions. Many educational institutions in the modern world have started the branch of religious study. Ashoka, the great Mauryan King, set up a new department of the 'ministry

12 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 13 of morals' which is an innovative measure in the field of administration unparalled elsewhere. What is worthy of note is that they have been authorised not only to set right the violation of justice but also provide solicitude for the welfare of prisoners. His attitude can be compared with Kautilya's solicitude for the welfare of prisoners') which is almost modern in spirit.) The vision of being 'ChakravarthiDharmika Dharmaraja' guided his activities. The integral and synthetical development of life as the aim of administration was put' forward by Ashoka for the coming generations by his own example. The Guptas sustained the legacy of the Mauryans in several respects. The divine character of the king was upheld and the king controlled all the stages of the administrative machinery. The empire was divided, like the Mauryan, for administrative purposes into units styled as 'Bhukti', 'Desa', 'Rashtra', and 'Mandala'. Villages had their own headmen and assemblies and towns and cities had special officers described 'nagarapatis' and even town councils. The king had the help of several functionaries to share the burden of administration. Separately from the confidential adviser, there were civil and military officials, feudatories, district officers and several others. The 2nd century AD king Rudradaman is also found to follow the footsteps of Ashoka and Kharavela and performing the functions of public benevolence. The Allahabad pillar inscription or 'Samudraguptaprasasti' is really the synthesis of the ideals of Hindu monarch, which reads..." where mind busied itself with the support of the initiation, etc, of the miserable, the poor, the helpless and afflicted who was the glorified personification of kindness to mankind. So the welfare of the people was always considered as the paramount principle which guided the rulers. 1.4 Indian Administration : The Mughal Period The Mughals upheld the earlier traditions in political and administrative matters. The Mughal emperor was a perfect autocrat and the administration was 'a centralized autocrey'. The king symbolised the state and was the source and centre of all power agencies. The Mughuls did succeed in building up a 'monolithic administration'. When compared to the Mauryas, the Mughals moved in the direction of greater centralisation. They did not pay much attention to social services of health and welfare as also morals which were areas of special concern for the Mauryan kings. But the Mughals had an efficient civil service They recognised merit and accepted Hindu intelligentsia in the higher civil service. Its only drawback was that 14 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 15 it was 'land-based'. It means it was mainly concerned with revenue functions and was a 'highly urbanised institutions'.

The sovereign was the king who was paternalistic and he had supreme authority over everything. He did have a number of ministers to help, advise and assist him in the discharge of his functions, out of which the more important working executive were four-Diwan who was in charge of revenue and finance, Mir Bakshi at the head of the military department, Mir Saman in charge offactories and stores, and Sadr-us-Sudur who was the head of the ecclesiastical and judicial department.Administration was based on coercion in the name of the King by the officials. • Role of the King – Administration was personalized. It has aptly been described as paternalistic. The whole administrative machinery revolved around the king who was viewed as a 'father figure' or a 'despot' to his people subjects. Mainly during the time the king was seen as a benevolent despot who worked for the welfare of his subjects. The theory upheld the concept of absolute monarchy based on the divine right to rule. The king was everything to his people. He was the source of all authority and the fountain-head of justice. The administrative system was highly centralized and personalized. • Bureaucracy – Organisation of the administrative machinery was unstable. It depended on the whims and fancies of the king. Recruitment was on the basis of caste, kin, heredity, and personal loyalty to the king. Administration was based on fear of force. In the name of the king, the officials struck terror in the hearts of people. They wielded much awe and respect in the middle of the people.

Mughal army was

The soldiers did not owe direct allegiance to the Emperor but were more attached to their immediate recruiters or bosses and as such were busy with their bitter rivalries and jealousies. • Police – In the rural areas, policing was undertaken through the village headman and his subordinate watchmen. This system sustained well into the 19th century. In the cities and towns police duties were entrusted to Kotwals. In the middle of their several duties Kotwals had to arrest burglars, undertake watch and ward duties, regulate prices and check weights and measures. 1.5 Structure of the Mughal Administrative System • Central Administration - Central administration, like administration in general, was personal and paternal. The system operated with a fair degree of efficiency as long as the king

was able to exercise control from above. As soon as his grip loosened, thesystem fell to pieces, as seen in the reigns of Shahjahan and Aurangzeb.

The two highest officials were the 'Vakil' and the 'Wazir'. The Vakil, in fact, washigher of the two. He functioned as regent of State and was in over all charge of the State. The 'Wazir' or high diwan was the highest officer of the revenue department. He was actually recognized as. 'Wazir' when he acted as Prime Minister.

The Chief Diwan supervised revenue collection and expenditure. He was head of the administrative wing of Government. He supervised the work of all the high officials. He controlled and guided provincial diwans who beside with their subordinates were in touch with him. He signed all types of documents and put his seal authenticating government transactions. • Provincial Administration - Given the centralized and personalized character of Maghal administration, provincial authorities were only administrative agencies of the Centre. The Empire was divided into 'subas' or provinces. At the head of the province was the 'Subedar' or Governor. He was appointed through imperial order and was given the insignia of office and instrument of instructions which defined his powers, functions and responsibilities. As executive head, he was in charge of the provincial administrative staff and ensured law and order in the province. He tackled local civil and intelligence of staff with a firm hand and realized tributes from the local chiefs under him. The diwan also exercised functions of an auditor and exercised full control over public expenditure. His establishment incorporated the office superintendent, the head accountant, the treasurer, and clerks. The provincial 'bakshi' performed a role similar to that of the 'bakshi' at the Centre.

District and Local Administration - The 'Suba' or province was divided into 'Sarkars' which were of two kinds. There were those ruled through officers appointed through the emperor and those under the tributary rajas. At the head of each sarkar was the Faujdarwho he was the executive head. Separately from the 'Faujdar', the other head of the 'sarkar' was the'amalguzar'. He was in charge of revenue. Each of them had their own set of subordinate officials. The 'kotwal' did policing of the town and its suburbs. A'sarkar' was divided into 'parganas'. Each 'pargana' had a 'shiqqdar', and 'amin' and a 'qazi'. The 'shiqqdar' was executive head and combined in himself the functions of the 'Faujdar' and 'kotwal' of the 'sarkar'. He took care of law and order, criminal justice and general administration. The 'amin's'duties were similar to those of the amalguzar and the 'quazis' were judicial head. The 'parganas' were further divided into 'Chaklas', which were created to facilitate and improve the realization and assessment of revenue and had their own set of local officials like the 'Chakladars'. Each of the officials was responsible and accountable to those higher authorities. 1.6 Revenue Administration I. Land Revenue as the Primary Source of Income : The Revenue system needs to be closely studied because land revenue has been traditionally, the primary source of income of the State. The State and the cultivator were two parties to the contract. The right of the State to a share ofthe produce was recognized as a principle of political economy from times immemorial. What was disputed and had to be determined periodically was the fixing of the share of each. In ancient times, the State's share was defined through lawgivers as one-twelfth, one- eighth or even one-fourth. Though, about one-sixth was realized. While in the 14th century, the State took half, Akbar made it at one-third. II. Significant Revenue Reforms : Significant revenue reforms were introduced throughout the reign of Akbar when Todar Mal was appointed the Diwan-e- Ashraf. Todar Mal recognized

and fixation of rates. Hence, the overall success or failure of the revenue system depended on the king and the quality and nature of the centralized administration. Akbar is credited with having scientifically organized his land revenue system. Itsustained till the 18th century though it slowly lost its vigor and was injurious to the interests of the peasants. III. Modus Operandi of Revenue Collection : Mention has been made of the modus 16 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 17 operandi of revenue collection. The Empire was divided' into 'subas', which were subdivided into 'sarkars' and 'sarkars' into 'parganas'. The 'amalguzar' was the chief revenue collector in charge of a district and was assisted through a large subordinate staff. In the middle of other officials, it is necessary to mention the designation of the 'Qanungo' who kept revenue records, the 'Bitikchi' or accountant and the 'Potdar' or district treasurer. 1.7 Administration of Justice Administration of Civil Justice- The Moghul State, being a Muslim State was based on Quranic law. The judges followed the Quranic precepts, the 'Fatwas' or previous interpretations of the Holy' Law through eminent jurists and the ordinances of the Emperors. They did not disregard customary laws and sought to follow principles of equity. The Emperor's interpretations prevailed, provided they did not run counter to the sacred laws. For the dispensation of justice, there were two kinds of tribunals. There was the Chief 'Qazi' with subordinate 'Qazi' who followed the Islamic law, both civil and criminal. Qazi was responsible for the administration of law in the land, and beside that was the chief judge in criminal suit which he tried according to Muslim law. The Sadar was the head of the depatement of religions affairs. He was the guaradian of Islamic law and the spokeman of the ulama. The other was the 'mir'adl', a secular officer who took care of suits not specifically provided for through the religious laws of the two communities. The king was the supreme court of both original and appellate jurisdiction. 1.8 Conclusion

The principles the Public Administration throughout the Moghul period could be listed as: Centralisation; personalized administration; civil service; dissimilar stages of administration; division of work; bureaucracy having military character; revenue administration based on well laid down principles; administration based on fear of force; administration based on regulations, traditions, and practices; and inadequate unity of command (one could find gaps through illustrations like the position of provincial Diwan, who was directly under the Imperial Diwan and not under the Governor, and the position of Faujdars, who were though under the Governors, yet could have direct communication with the imperial government).

At
18 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 19 the advent of British rule, -the administrative system was paternalistic, centralised and personalised. There was an elaborate network of officials at the centre constituting the central secretariat which was repeated at the provincial and local levels. The emperor had the total control of the state. Land revenue was the principal source of income and land tenures were complex, elaborate and a mix of rules, regulations, customs and traditions. The judicial system was under executive dominance and was poorly structured. Society was feudal, with the toiling masses often given a raw deal. 1.9 Summary Thus in short, the basic traditional features of Indian Administration were:- • Centralized. • Primarily based on transfer of hereditary power and privileges. • Legitimised by Military power. • Bureaucracy had a Military character. 1.10 Glossary Arthasastra : An unfading work of Koutilya, deals with Social Economy and Administrative management of the State. 1.11 Model Questions • Analyse the features of the administrative set up in Mauryan period. • Explain in detail the importance of Kautilya'sArthashastra. • Discuss administrative set up in Mughal period. • Elaborate the functioning of revenue system in Mughal administration. • Analyse the role of the king in Mauryan administration. • What are the implications of administrative system in Ancient India. • Point out the role of Ministry of Morals. • Write a note on administration of justice during Mughal period. • Mention features of Gupta period administration in India.

Politics was mainly the concern, of small elite and educated middle Class. The sub altern groups of the society were happy to remain at the receiving end of political administration, rather than at the participating end. When the typical Indian tradition came in touch with the modernity, it was found that the modernity to Rajni kothari in his “Politics in India” (Boston, Houghton Mifflin Co., 1970, pp.85- 87) has put it in different expression, that “Modernity has made India assert its ‘Indianness’, reformulate this ‘Indianness’ and gave it a new ot modern character”. 2.2 British Administration in India : Beginning Though many of Indian administrative and political features evolved during period 1947 period but there still are certain features that we can see as a legacy of the British times continuing for the sake of its efficient practices and or finding no other better alternative to the same till now. The Council had executive and legislative powers with the Governor or the Governor-General having the casting vote. With the acquisition of more territorial sovereignty and the need to take prompt decisions, more power came to be concentrated in the head or Chairman of the Council, but the fundamental principle of collective rule and responsibility remained. It was also a government by Boards. After the Board of trade, the next in importance was the Military boand.

But the Board of Revenue had the longest history and the most distinguished record of work. Later, there was also the Railway Board. The Board made possible counselling, discussion, deliberation and even legislative and judicial activities. Questions of policy and principle, conduct and action were settled in the Board. It was a government by record. When transactions were commercial, records were brief and manageable. But political dealings made record keeping cumbersome and voluminous. Notes, minutes, despatches and reports became an integral part of British administration. All this was in a way necessary because only through written reports and records could control

But this resulted in exploitation of the worst kind on the subjects (Indians) as maximum revenue was extracted from them. Though it was done in the name of the Company, which got a bad name on this account, the Nawab and his men pocketed a good portion of revenue and grew rich at the cost of the Company.

So, in short the British East India Company paved the way for the British government to enter. 2.3 British Administration in India : The

First Phase (1757-1858) •

The Regulating Act of 1773 – This Act deserves special mention because it was the first action on the part of the British Government to regulate the affairs of the Company in India. The Company, through a Charter, had only been given trading rights through the British Crown. When it acquired territories in India and slowly but surely converted itself into a ruling body, the Parliament could not accept and regularize this development.

Moreover, it was whispered that whatever lands the Company acquired were in the name of and on behalf of the King. So, the administration of these territories had to be controlled through the Crown. Thus British Parliament took the administrative charge and sent one as Governor General of Bengal.
The Governor of Bengal was now designated as the Governor-General of Bengal, and Governors of other provinces in India were subordinate to him. The Governor-General was assisted by a council of four members sent from England. Decisions were to be taken by majority vote, and the Governor-General Warren Hastings had a casting vote.

The Regulating Act laid the foundation of a Central administration and instituted a system Parliamentary control. It marked the beginning of the Company's transformation from a trading body to a Corporation of a new kind, entirely administrative in its object and subordinated to Parliament. • The Amending Act of 1781 – This Act amended the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. It was deprived of its right to action arising in the collection of revenue. Landholders, farmers or other persons connected in land revenue work were not covered by the Supreme Court. In the same way, no person, just by virtue of being the Company's employee,could be subjected to the Court's jurisdiction. Even though the Court's jurisdiction extended over all the inhabitants of Calcutta, the Court had to take into account personal its laws of Hindus in case of Hindus and Quranic law in case of Muslims.The Amending Act recognised the appellate jurisdiction of the Governor- General and Council and confirmed their judicial authority to entertain all such pleas and appeals as they had done all along as a Court of record. The Governor General and Council were further invested with 'power and authority, from time to time, to frame regulations for the provincial courts and councils'. Their legislation under this 22

Act, was not to be subject to registration inthe Supreme Court of Judicature, but was required to be finally approved by the Crown. The shortcomings of the Amending Act soon became manifest.

The urge for a change was very strong and it could not be suppressed for long.

Pitt's India Act provided for a body of six commissioners popularly known as the Board of Control. It consisted of one Secretary of State, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and four Privy Councillors appointed by the king and holding office during his pleasure. Three of the six formed a quorum and the President possessed a casting vote in case opinion was equally divided. The Secretary of State was to preside over the meetings of the Board, which in his absence, done was by the Chancellor of the Exchequer or a Senior Commissioner.

The Amending Act of 1786 took care of the problem related to the Councils of the Governor-General and Governors. The Act invested the Governor-General or Governor with power to override the decision of his Council and act without its concurrence in extraordinary cases involving in his judgment the interests of the Company or the safety and tranquillity of British India. If the Governor-General or Governor had to use this extraordinary power, to overrule the majority, both sides had to put in writing their respective positions on the issue under dispute. If the Governor- General or Governor finally chose to act in his own way, he was personally to bear the responsibility of the measure adopted without the concurrence of the Council. In 1784, the Central Secretariat had three main branches: General, Revenue and Commercial. Judicial branch was later recognized in 1793. •

Reconstruction of Departments in 1815 – The organisation of the Secretariat was again revised in 1815 in conventionality with a plan proposed through the Governor-General. This was partly in conventionality with the necessities of the Charter Act of 1813 which had directed that separate accounts to be maintained of the Company sterritorial and commercial revenues. This separation had also been ordered through the Court of Directors and was necessitated through the policy laid down through the Parliament and the home authorities. Accordingly, a new Territorial Department was created. The office of the Commissioner and sectional arrangement in the Secretariat saw the light of the day under Lord Bentick's rule. Under the CharterAct of 1833 the Governor General of Bengal was appointed as the Governor General of India and policy formulation was centralized for all territories under the company at the council of the Governor General Of India (Head of the British Administration In India). Also there was an establishment of communication between the Governor General's office which was the head quarter and its various field units and formal units of organisation was established like in 1844 established 4 24 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 25 departments of Finance, Home, Foreign and Military. In continuation of that process Lord Dalhousie established Post and Telegraph services. Railway Department, Public Works Department etc. Administration in India til1 1858 was in the hands of the EastIndia Company which was then a monopoly trading body. During this time British Parliament two major Acts to manage the Indian affairs. The RegulatingAct and Pitt's India Act. Subsequently, Acts of 1793, 1833 and 1853 were passed by which the Company was steadily deprived of its authority and power in India and its privileges curtailed. Finally, the Act for the better Government of India, 1858 passed after the Sepoy Mutiny, brought the governance of India directly under the Crown. 2.4 British Administration in India : The Second Phase (1859-1947) The Revolt of 1857 then shook up this system and that led to the end of the British East India Company's rule in India. The government of India Act 1858 passed in the British Parliament led to the company's dissolution and all powers transferred to the British Crown which then created an India Office in a number of non- official members in the Executive Council of the Governor-General. The Governor General's executive council consisted of five members. And for the purpose of legislation, the council was reinforced through six to twelve nominated members for a two-year term. Half of these were to be non-officials, both European and Indian not in the service of the Crown. There were similar councils at the provinces. The powers of the Governor-General increased more in the field of legislation. The Council was presided over through the Governor-General. His prior approval was necessary to introduce measures affecting public finance, religion, discipline and maintenance of military and naval forces and relations of the Government with foreign princes and States. • The Indian Councils Act 1892 – The Indian Councils Act 1861 naturally could not satisfy the progressive public opinion in India.

In its very first session the Indian National Congress passed resolution to create these councils broad based,

24 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 25 Lord Dalhousie's policy of providing for legislation on the basis of petitions from individuals and their associations contributed to the organisation of opinion for reforms. Constitutionalism and consultative machinery therefore moved towards a government based on popular representation. Lord Dufferin's Egyptian experience in the establishment of elected provincial councils was encouraging. He wanted to experiment the same in India. The main recommendations of the Dufferin Committee (1888) were: I. The expansion of Presidency councils and enlarging their functions; II. Providing representation to significant interest; III. Representation to Muslims in proportion to their population; 2.5

The Morley Minto Reforms 1909 • The Main Provisions – The Indian Councils Act (1909) considerably increased the strength of legislative councils - the Imperial and provincial. For the Imperial benefit, the Supreme Council, added the number of additional members. It was raised from 16 to 60. For major provincial councils, the number was raised to 50 and for minor provinces it was fixed to 30. The additional members were both nominated and elected. The principle of election was functional representation. In the Supreme Legislative Council, the official majority was maintained through the provincial councils, the non-officials shaped the majority. The Act definitely expanded the functions of the legislative councils. They were concerned in discussions on the budget (The Annual Financial statement), discussion on any matter of general public interest and thirdly the power of asking questions. The Act also increased the number of Executive Councillors in the three major Presidencies - Bombay, Madras and Bengal. Indians were now appointed as members of the Secretary of States' Council (1907) and members of the Governor-Generals' Council (1909). 2.6

The Administrative Structure • Reorganization of Departments –

Constitutional reforms were reflected in the changing structure of the governmental machinery as the government moved towards the federal form. Creation of new departments, their reorganization and setting procedures for smooth conduct of department business naturally became inevitable. Departmental organisation not only creates administration smooth but also streamlines its processes and secures economy in its operation. In the beginning, administration was grouped under two broad segments one covering General, Foreign and Finance and the second covering Secret, Revenue and Judicial departments. 26

NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 27 • Financial Administration –

A centralized financial system was introduced in 1833 as the earlier structure was too diffused for effective control and economy. Lord Ellenborough created the post of a Finance Secretary at the Central stage and brought all financial operations under the review of the Government of India.It realized effective control and economy but ended in delay in final approval. Ellenborough really wanted to have a Finance Member on his council. For Central control the office of the Comptroller General of Accounts was createdand he remained in charge of appropriation audit. •

Police Administration – The law and order was previously maintained by the community function and was administered through a non-official force controlled through individual zamindars. Lord Cornwallis introduced the daroga system in 1792, replacing zamindari thanedars, under the direct control of the district head and on its payroll. At the village stage, village patels performed, both revenue and police functions. With the experiment in Sindh through Sir Charles Napier, a separate self contained expert police force came into subsistence. • Local Administration –

existed in India with a village headman performing both civil and judicial functions. But the present system of local government is entirely a British creation. The principle of election and the concept of representativeness were foreign to the old local government system. The Mayo resolution of 1870 stressed the need for introducing self government in local areas to raise local possessions to administer locally significant services and also to give local interest and care in the management of their funds

The Govt. Of India Act in 1919, created the All India Services replacing the imperial civil services format. This act also advocated the setting up of Public Service Commissions in India. The provincial civil services were under the control of the provincial governments. Lee Commission and the Royal Commission on superior civil services specially recommended for the establishment of central services. Subordinate services were advocated for removal from the classification of civil services and transferred to the regional levels for conducting examination and filling up of positions only by Indians. So, basically it was a system to prevent Indians from entering the higher civil services as everybody could not afford to go to England for training and examination purpose and the lower levels were more approachable and attainable by the Indians. The Montague Chelmsford reform in 1919 made it a transferred subject under the dyarchy that led to the establishment of a number of panchayats in all villages to have a proper and efficient local self government or administration as well as revenue collection for the British but was still under the total 26 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 27 control of the District collector and red tapism and corruption plagued it. Constant funds crunch was always there as a deliberate attempt by the British to stranglehold the provincial Indian governments from having control over them and so had to depend on the centre/British government for everything. •

Machinery of Dyarchy at the Provinces - The division of subjects into Central and Provincial (Federalism) and the further division at the provincial stage flanked by Reserved and Transferred subjects was a novel characteristic of the Mont-Ford Reforms. Dyarchy means double government at the provinces. The 'Reserved' subjects in charge of councilors, 'nominated' through the Governor and transferred subjects incharge of councilors – Ministers were 'appointed' through him. The reserved subjects were really 'key'

departments while transferred subjects were feltsafe' even if placed in the Indian hands. The councilor in charge of reserved subject was not responsible to the Secretary of State and the British Parliament. The ministers in charge of transferred subjects were responsible to the provincial legislature. • The Simon Commission (1927) – The Commission was appointed in 1927 with Sir John Simon as its Chairman. The Simon report recommended the discontinuation of the dyarchy and leave provincial government in the hands of ministers responsible to provincial legislatures. Some safeguards, though, were retained in the interest of minorities in the grant of special powers to the Governor. It recommended a Federation like structure at the Centre — a Council of Greater India'representing' both the interests of the British India and the princely States. 2.7 The Government of India Act 1935 The Government of India Act 1935 was introduced in provinces. It was expected that the All India Federation would follow and provinces would get status of Federal units. But the All India Federation did ultimately not materialize; the Governor General Council exercised the executive authority on behalf of His Majesty. Even though the Federation did not come into subsistence, Federal Court, Federal Public Service Commission and Federal Railway Authority started functioning. Unilateral decision on the part of the British Government of India's participation in the Second World War on behalf of the Allies provoked Congress. It wanted the British Government to declare that India would be free after the war. The Government declared that it would undertake the review of 1935 Act immediately after consulting with several representatives of communities and Princely States. Participation in the Advisory Consultative Group although suggested through the Governor- General but it was felt 28 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 29 inadequate because the Governor-General would accept its advice at his will. Under these circumstances, Congress ministries by adopting the resolution in the Working Committee, resigned from their offices in October 1939 creating a political deadlock. Declaration of constitutional breakdown through the Governors was no solution to this situation. 2.8 Conclusion Indian administration till 1858 was in the hands of the East India Company which is a monopoly trading body. To regulate it's management of Indian affairs,

the British parliament passed two major Acts, the regulating Act and Pitt's India Act.

The act for better government of India, 1858 passed after Sepoy Munity brought the governance of India directly under the crown. British government was trying to reconcile between the interests of the empire and national interests of the Indian people. The constitutional experiments beginning with the Indian council Acts which tried therefore to obstruct the transfer of effective power to the Indian people by making the governor General autocratic and Legislative Council dominated by official element and divided in it. The Round Table Conferences indicated the nature of the new constitutional reforms. The 1935 Act is not only acted as an interim constitution but also provided a basis of the Constitution of free India. The Acts along with earlier constitutional reforms gave direction to the process of change as well as influence its contents. 2.9 Summary •
The British administration was district-centered. It was headed through a generalist head with an overriding authority. •

The year 1773 was a landmark in the growth of Indian Administration. Before 1773 there was no central authority in the country. The 1773 Act restricted the powers of the presidencies from making war or treaties without the sanction of the Governor-General in Council. • This confirmed the British Parliament's control over East India Company's affairs. The Pitt's India Act of 1784 placed Indian Affairs under the direct control of the British Government, by establishing a Board of Control representing the British Cabinet, over the court of Directors. •

This system with some modifications remained in operation till 1858. •

For that the external political change, does immediately not effect the habit of contitnuity in the Administrative Institution.

30 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 31 This is an universal truth, and Indian Administration is not an exception. Normally the basic function of the Administration is to act as an instrument, designed by the Constitution, following the social character, to give an effective and economic objectification of the decision of the Government. The framers of the Constituion were the believer in 'consensual' style of decision making as well as implementation. There is no doubt that the British rulers in India, in the course of their rule primarily designed the Administration in harmony with their Colonial purpose and interest. But "We the people in India" elevates a new status of citizenship in place of subjetship. This obviously demands a new developmental and egalitarian values, which bring the Administrator to the status of "public servant" in place of "rulling executive". As Rulling Executive, the Administrators were neither subordinate nor responsible to the legislature. ActuallyAdminster under British hegemony did never bear the social resposibility. Their prime functions were to maintain law and order, collection of Taxes and dispensation of justice. But that has completely got topsy-turby, after Independence. So the prime target fixed for the Administration, after Independence, is to adjust and accommodate the changing pattern of socio-political context. 3.2 Indian Administration : The Nationalist Spirit There has been continuity in the Indian Administration after 1947 from the pattern that existed before independence. At the same time the political background and the psychological atmosphere and the objectives of administration have changed completely after independence. Mainly of the cadres in Administration got depleted as mainly of the Muslims and European Civil Servants resigned and left the country. So there were neither the possessions nor the people to set up new administrative machinery. A stable and well-founded administrative organisation comprising departments and civil services was the critical need of the hour. So, the then existing administrative framework sustained after independence. Though, free India adopted its own Constitution within three years after Independence. The objectives and nature of this Constitution are altogether dissimilar from those of the constitutional Acts prevailing under the British rule. Corrobroated with Free India's has been a democratic constitution - free periodic elections to the national Parliament and the State legislatures, adoption of laws, amendments of the Constitution, control over the executive and expression of popular opinion The Constitution contains the ideal of welfare, socialist State. A federal political system based on the Union (Central) Government and State Governments, set up by the Constitution. Local Governments, urban and rural, looking after the civic and also developmental functions, as are 32 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 33 provided for by the Constitution. Public Service Commission's at the Union and the State levels ensuring the selection of meritorious public services are established by the Constitution. These and other provisions of the Constitution have increased the responsibilities of Public Administration in the country. Moreover, the public services are accountable to the Parliament and State legislatures. They also have to be sensitive to the aspirations and grievances of the people who elect the government in the country.

The pre-independence era saw the administrative organisations of the Central and the State (then called 'Provincial') governments intact. This was a factor contributing to the undisturbed transfer of power from the British to the Indian hands. The administration of the country's security, law and order, finances, communication system, educational organisation and other elements of the infrastructure after 1947 continued as before. At independence on 15 August 1947, the following eighteen departments (re-designated as 'Ministries') functioned under the Government of India: (1) External Affairs and Commonwealth Relations, (2) Defence, (3) Finance, (4) Home, (5) States, (6) Legislative (Law), (7) Commerce, (8) Industries and Supplies, (9) Railways, (10) Transport, (11) Communications, (12) Labour, (13) Agriculture, (14) Food, (15) Education, (16) Health, (17) Information and Broadcasting, (18) Works, Mines and Power. From five departments in 1858, at the time of transfer of the government in India from the charge of the East India Company to the control of the British Parliament (actually handled through British Government), to eighteen in 1947 indicated an enormous augment in the administrative activity.

In terms of internal organisation and relationships within the departments, the working of the Departments has not changed much after independence. Hierarchy and impose of written word and communication have continued. Red-tapism laid the issue pending still haunted the administration. Pre-independence manuals, prepared during the colonial rule, still remain in most of the older departments with slight modification here and there. The Chief Secretary of provincial administration before 1947 continues today; but at the Centre, the Cabinet Secretary, de facto head of administration, is an innovation. Another recent development is the growth of independent regulatory agencies like TRAI in telecommunication, SEBI in shares and stock exchanges, etc. These agencies have been set up to lend a degree of independence, away from normal executive departments, to quasi-judicial arbitration, rate-fixation and conflict resolution functions of the government.

public services which were in office before independence. The Indian Civil Service and the Indian Police Service were the two All India Services that helped the country to hold together. The other All India Services included the medical, engineering, forest, educational and others. The Indian Civil Services was the most pivotal and prized of these services. Its members occupied positions in the executive councils of the Governor General of India and the provincial Governors. Most of the posts of Secretaries to the departments in the Central and provincial governments and of heads of executive departments were held by them. ICS men were district collectors- and magistrates deputy commissioners. Before independence, the officers of the ICS and other All India Services were appointed by the Secretary of State for India. After independence, under the India Independence Act, 1947, the ICS and other officers in All India Services, who continued in office, became officers in the service of the Government of India. At independence about two hundred and fifty (250) European ICS officers retired, while about fifty (50)of them opted to be in office here. Vallabhbhai Patel, India's Home Minister realised the dire need of the Indian members of the ICS continuing in service here after 1947. He assured to honour the existing terms and security of their tenure. They did contribute to the stability and continuity of the Indian administration. After independence the Indian Civil Services was replaced by the Indian Administrative services. A larger number of the officers in the IAS and the Indian Police Service (that replaced the Imperial Police Service) were required to replace, the former services. They had to man the posts in the recently merged princely states. Much more than that, the character of these All India Services had changed after independence. India became a democracy after independence. The services had now to serve the people of the country, and not the imperial masters. The ICS men were not only officials; they were a part of the colonial government. The officials is independent India

After Independence, the welfare and development content of the administration has become very prominent. It might be said that this content has become predominant over the law and order and regulatory content. It does not happen that throughout the British rule the development and welfare characteristic did not exist at all. It was there, but it was subordinated to the chief motivation of the foreigners to rule over this country and its people. Health and medical facilities at an elementary stage 34 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 35 were started. Agricultural research was commenced. After the First World War, fiscal incentives were given for industrial development through individual initiative. But the Public Administration under the British was not deeply involved in the development of the country and welfare of the people. The Preamble of the Constitution seeks to secure to all citizens social and economic justice and equality of status and of opportunity. This object is further elaborated in Part IV of the Constitution which deals with Directive Principles of the state policy. These principles provide guidance to the government in creation laws and administering them. Therefore, the following are mainly significant in the middle of these Directive Principles. The State is to strive to minimize the inequalities in income and to eliminate inequalities in status, facilities and opportunities among the individuals and groups - territorial and vocational. Both men and women have an equal right to an adequate means of livelihood values among people. Equal pay for equal work is another Directive given through the Constitution. The moral and material health of children and youth is protected. Equal justice and free legal aid are assured. Within the limits of the economic capability and development of the state, the right to work, education and public assistance in old age, unemployment, etc., is secured. Humane circumstances of work and maternity relief are provided for. A living wage and a decent standard of life would be sought to attain. Workers' participation in industrial management would be promoted.

years would be provided. The welfare of the scheduled caste and scheduled tribes and other weaker sections would be advanced. Though, these directives cannot be enforced through resort to courts or law but it paved the way for new public testing for state. The pressures of the people in a democratic set up have brought the welfare state. Planning has guided the economic development of the country since the beginning of the first five year plan from 1st April 1951. Plans formulated through the Planning Commission set up in March 1950, aimed at the rapid all round economic development of the possessions of the country. The progress achieved in development is also checked from time to time and remedial measures are adopted. Planning evokes public cooperation for its success. Plans set the targets of development in different sectors including industry, agriculture, electricity, minerals, transport and communication, education, health, etc. The administration at different stages, Central, State and local, is geared to the realization of the goals of the plans. It also furnishes data and statistics to the Planning Commission to enable it to frame the plans and check the progress in their implementation. The development administration in the rural areas has been faced with much more hard tasks than the administration of the public enterprises. Rising agricultural 34 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 35 production, helping to raise the quality of milk, yield of the much cattle, promoting the public health and medical standards, spreading education as well as taking care of its quality, provision of civic amenities - all these and other tasks in the rural areas had to be realized through breaking the walls of illiteracy and prejudice and providing needed economic means, technical tools and inputs. Involvement of the rural people in the process of transformation was sought through entrusting some of these tasks or their characteristics to their political and administrative institutions. Fruits of development have also to reach the poor farmers and rural laborers. 3.4 Indian Administration : The Federal Decentralisation The Constitution has divided the country's administration into two spheres, administration of the Union, that is, national and of the States. The Union administration looks after the subjects in list 1 of the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution and the States administer the subjects enumerated in list 2. List 3 is the Concurrent list this consists with subjects on which both the Union and the States are competent to legislate and, so, to administer, but a Union law takes precedence over a State law on a matter incorporated in this list. The administration of the States covers the matters which are easier to tackle from a closer aloofness and those which conduce in better way to the welfare and development of the people of the state. Police, jails, land tenure and revenue, public works (except national, that is, inter-state highways, and river valleys, etc.), local government, etc., are examples of the former. Agriculture and animal husbandry, Health and medicine, social welfare, are illustration of the latter. The States administer (that is, levy,- collect and use) the taxes on agricultural income, estate and succession duties in respect of agricultural land, taxes on land and structures, electricity duties, vehicle and profession taxes, etc. Some of these, for instance, octroi, property tax, etc., are given over to the local bodies for levy collection and use through the State governments through legislation. The Union administers those subjects which are essential for national security and integrity, for the maintenance and growth of a nationwide infrastructure, and for national economic development. Defence, foreign affairs, atomic energy, citizenship, etc., ensure national security and integrity. Railways, airways, maritime and Inter-State transport and communications, etc., maintain the national infrastructure. Currency and coinage, foreign and Inter-State trade and commerce, industries of national interest, banking, insurance and national finance, facilitate economic development of the 36 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 37 country as a whole. The Union is vested with expanding financial, possessions. These possession are taxes on income other than agricultural income, customs, excise duties on manufactured and produced commodities (with some exception), succession and estate duties on properties other than agricultural land, etc. The common subjects in the Concurrent list enable both the Union and the States to legislate and administer matters of special and economic significance and of legal nature implying concern to both economic and social planning, transfer of property and contracts relating to other than agricultural land, population control and family planning, trade unions and industrial labour, employment and unemployment, etc. Civil and criminal laws are of concern to both, hence, are vested in both the administrations. Education, forests, protection of wild life, birds have been recently transferred from the State to the Concurrent list due to rising national importance and concern in them. The departments in State or State Ministry of Govt. of India headed by Ministry states are engaged in coordinating the work of the States, research, pilot projects, training and advice to the States on the concerned subjects. The remaining ('residuary') subjects are vested in the Union Government, President of India appoints Governors in evry states, by warrant under his head and seat. Governor shall not be the member of Parliamentory House of Legislative. Governor enjoys power according toward 160 and 161

Before independence under the colonial rule, the involvement of the political parties, groups and workers in the administrative processes was very limited. This was because, at that time democratic political system did not exist in the country. It was through and large a rule of the bureaucracy. Under the Dyarchy laid down through the 1919 Act, the influence of the ministers who were political heads of the transferred subjects only was confined to these subjects and that too, subject to the exercise of discretionary powers and financial veto through the Governors of the provinces. The major, that is, dominant political party in the country, the Indian National Congress, had kept aloof from the administration for most of the time throughout 1920-47 except a brief interludes of 1937-39 and 1946-47. Under the provincial autonomy laid down through the 1935 Act, the political parties had some scope of influencing the administration. The term 'political involvement' is used here to refer to the extra-governmental influence of the political parties, groups and workers on the administration. The Central administration was kept absent from the sphere of political accountability even under the 1919 and 1935 Act. Whatever

36 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 37 political influence was cast on it was through the debates in the Central legislature, that too was little. Secondly, as the functions of the State were limited to law and order and regulation, the people did not have several occasions for get in touch with the governments. Popular participation in administrative processes has assumed prominent proportions after Independence. Before independence, it was confined to the role of the popular representatives in the local self-governing bodies. After Independence, specifically from the late fifties, panchayati raj has been the main important channel of the participation of the rural people in the rural development administration. Community development was the earlier stage of this popular participation. But it was dominated through the officials, so it could not evoke adequate participation of villagers in rural development. So, panchayati raj was introduced in late fifties by a few State governments, like Rajasthan, Andhra, Maharashtra and Gujarat. But its progress was uneven in other States. Lately, West Bengal, Tripura, Andhra Pradesh and Karnataka introduced progressive measures relating to the panchayati raj. The 73rd constitutional amendment has given a further boost to popular participation in rural areas. Much still needs to be done to create it more meaningful and beneficial in conditions of rising agricultural production and improving the standard of life of the rural people. Cooperatives are another channel of popular participation in development. 3.5 Conclusion The important factors of change in Indian administration after Independence in comparison with that during British rule are the advent of democracy and the compulsions of development extension and a. welfare state. The elements of stability are found in the continuity of some of the departments and the smooth induction of new public services with the characteristics of political impartiality, selection on merit, integrity and commitment to the Constitutional objectives The Constitutional directives seek to promote the ideals of a just social and economic order and of a welfare state. Planning sets the targets of development to the administration in both the Union and the States. Now, besides national planning, State and District planning has also come into being. A large public sector to bring about rapid, all-round and self-sufficient industrial development has posed great challenge for efficient

38 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 39 managerial and administrative personnel in the public enterprises. The development administration in rural areas has to fulfil much more difficult tasks. Before 1947, the administration was centralised, though in reality administration at provincial level exercised a good deal of autonomy. The Constitution has created a federal political system. Popular participation in administration, particularly of development, occurs through the panchayati raj institutions, municipal governments, cooperatives and voluntary organisations. 3.6 Summary • Advent of democracy in 'State Character' inwardly change the focus and attitude of the Administration as well as of Administrator. • The adoption of 'Welfare State' concept, has made a huge compulsion to the administration. • Instead of being survived as a 'Social Force' of maintaining law and order, the Administrators become the chief functionery to speed up 'National Development'. • Administration, during post-Independence era, has to set a new socio- political and economic goal before its administrative activities. • Setting parliamentary Democracy, the makers of the Constitution bring the administrative structure under the direct control of Legislature and temporary political Executive. • Hither to centralized Administration has to adopt decentralized structure, since Independence. 3.7 Glossary • Nationalism and Administration. • Post Independent structure of Administration • Administration within Federal Structure. • Post-Independent innovation in Public Administration • Federal Decentralization and Administrative Structure.

When Indian Society seeks 40 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 41 to meet the challenge of socio-economic inequality by its legislation and with the assistance of the rule of Law; it seeks to achieve economic justice without any violent conflict. The Idea of welfare state is that the claims of social justice must be treated as cardinal and paramount. Social justice is not a blind concept. It seeks to do justice to all the citizen of the state. Social justice must be achieved by adopting necessary and reasonable measures. Thus the term Social Justice is a blanket term so as to include both Social Justice and Economic Justice. The concept of social-economic justice is a living concept and gives substance to the rule of law and meaning and significance to the ideal of a welfare State. The Indian constitution is an illustration of the forces at work in socio-economic jurisprudence. It sets out the Directive Principles of State Policy fundamental to the governance of the country and spells out a social order in which Justice, Social, Economic and Political, shall inform all the Institutions of National life.

Social justice takes within its sweep the objective of removing all inequalities and affording equal opportunities to all citizens in social affairs as well as economic activities. When the civil society developed into an administrative unit, the rules of conduct acquired a political sanction and a Breach of them was made to culpable through the legislative sanctions. 4.2 Indian Administration and Society: The Relationship The administration during the British colonial rule in India was coercive suppressive and insensitive to the sentiments and needs of the Indian people. The British rulers paralyzed the peace and prosperity of Indian by dividing Indians on the basis of caste creed, religion, language and occupation so as to conflicts between different communities to meet their selfish ends. There exist Jajmani System a system of traditional occupational obligations. Castes in early India were economically interdependent on one another. Thus Jajmani System as a system governed by relationship based on reciprocity in inter caste relations in villages. It is believed the Jajmani System to be the Chief Instruments of coercion, control and legitimating wielded by high caste landowning Hindus. Similarly, Lewis and Barnoww (1956) are in the opinion that the vast difference in power between the rich and the influential Jajmans and the poor and landless Kamins leads to the exploitation of Kamins and coercing them into sustaining the power of those who have the higher rank and the

42 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 43 upper hand. Norms and Values : The traditional method of payments almost in all religions in the country is that. It has relation with the harvest time when each landowning farmer family hands over a some newly produced food grains to various Kamins; however, these harvest payments are only part of what the Kamin family receives. The kamin may be dependent on the Jajmani for his house site for places where animals may graze, for wood and cow dung fuel, for loan of tools, In addition, the Jajman may give him clothes and gifts on ceremonial occasion and may also help him with loans of money in emergencies Caste is the social concept specially patent of India. This deep-rooted and wide- spread practices divides society vertically and horizontally into several Castes. Caste system was described by sociologists as a major social evil in India. Wherever no human child is born with any religious and Caste characteristics, these are put into the minds of children subsequent to their birth by elders. The Caste system is generally accepted as one of the most complexly stratified of all the social systems on the earth and it is the most striking feature of the Indian society. In fact, it cuts across the religious boundaries and encompasses the rest of the religious communities in some measure in India. As it may further he said that every Hindu is born into a Caste and his Caste determines his religious, social, economic and domestic life from the cradle to the grave. The Caste system is a complicated one, both theoretically and practically, it is an institution that portends tremendous consequences for all concerned. It is a national problem capable of wide social tension; for as long as Caste in India does exist, the Hindus will hardly do inter-marry or have any social intercourse with outsiders; and if Caste-minded Hindus migrate to other regions on the earth, the Indian Caste would become a world problem. Dr. Ambedkar was of a firm view that unless Indian Suppressed Classes do not get political power, nobody can ameliorate their miserable condition, therefore, he advocated for proportionate representation in the formation of Government at Centre and State level. Article 330 to 342 provided for special provisions relating to Depressed Classes. Reservation of seats for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes in Lok Sabha as well as in State Assemblies and also been made under the Constitution. According to Article 325 there shall be one general electoral roll and no person is ineligible for inclusion in it on grounds of only religion, race Caste, etc. Article 340, however, empowers the President to appoint a commission to investigate conditions of socially and educationally Backward Classes. Dr. Ambedkar believed that the establishment of a real democratic society in India would be possible only when Untouchables and

42 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 43 other weaker sections of society would be given the equal opportunity to enjoy the basic Human Right. He had not only wanted political democracy but also thought it is necessary, for the establishment of social democracy in India. With the independence of India, a new Constitution was adopted for the country embodying the social philosophy and economic values towards attainment of an egalitarian welfare State. A separate chapter on fundamental rights including individual rights and freedoms and a chapter on directive principles of State policy comprising social rights has been incorporated in the Constitution of India and the Judges have endeavored to harmonies the individual rights with the social interests of the community through their judicial decisions. The function of law is now to resolve the conflict between right of individual and the interests of the society. There is, therefore, no conflict between fundamental rights and directive principles of State policy as both are aimed at ushering an egalitarian society for the welfare of the nation as a whole. The legal philosophy enshrined in the Preamble and chapters on fundamental rights, directive principles, fundamental duties, provisions relating to powers and functions of the judiciary and amendment of the Constitution amply demonstrate the entire focus is on the welfare of the Indian masses and making law responsive to the social needs. The welfare legislations enacted during the post- independence era, and its aim was to establish an equetable society A picture of the constitution will give us the right perspective for appreciation of the scope and place of Social Justice as an aspiration of the Nation The former chief Justice of India, P.N. Bhagwati Inter-alia observed: 'Today a vast social revolution is taking place in the judicial process, the law is fast changing and the problems of the poor are coming to the forefront.' The Court has to innovate new methods and device new strategies for providing access to justice to large masses of the people who are denied their basic human rights and to whom freedom and liberty has no meaning. Mr. Justice K. Ramaswamy has expounded the concept of social justice. In Consumer Education Research Centre v. Union of India case it was observed: The Preamble and Article. 38 of the Constitution of India are the supreme law envisages social justice as its arch to ensure life to be meaningful and livable with human dignity. The concept of social justice which the Constitution of India engrafted in the concept of diverse principles essential for orderly growth and development of personality of every citizen. Social justice' is thus an integral part of justice in a generic sense. Justice is genus, of which social justice is one of its species. Social justice is a dynamic device to mitigate the sufferings of the poor, weak Dalits, tribal's and deprived sections of the society and to elevate them to the level of equality to live a life of dignity of person. Social justice is an essential part of complex of social change to relieve poor etc. From handicaps, and to make their life livable for greater good of the society at large.

44 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 45 4.3 Indian Administration and Social Change : The Implications Implication of social changes refers to a significant change or alternation of behaviourial pattern and cultural values over a period of time. By "significant alteration", sociologists mean changes yielding profound social consequences. Examples of significant social changes having long-term effects include the industial revolution, the abolition of slavery, and the feminist movement and here in our case, transfer of power from imperialist rule to democratic and Constitutional rule or in popular word, "political Independence". After Independence, our Constitutional forefeathers envisaged and Indian Democracy with an ambience of opportunities, and would try to sustain a strong effective democratic leadership. Its goal was to create hope among the citizens who were so far being called as 'subjects'. India's democracy was at the centre of governance architecture. Its attempt was to creates opportunities, sustains leadership and generates hope. Good governance being central to the Indian democratic experience could be seen more clearly when we look at what was happening in our part of the world. The major shifts in India's national value system made impact both on the nitty and gritty of administration as well as the intellectual build up of the civil service, the police and the judiciary. This is not the occasion to analyse how it came in the way of India's successes and failures in the social, economic and political domains, but whenever there is a major shift in political discourse governance gets affected both in its content and emphasis. The major challenge was to put in place institutional arrangements for service dilivery that would be workable in a particular district or a region and should be made to function in a manner that would intelligible to the local people and that also encouraged them to participate. Such institutions would be responsive to the citizenry and reasonably efficient in the delivery of public services. The concept and practice of good governance in a country demands that there should be constructive mechanisms and procedures that would enable the three principal actors – government, market and civil society – to play in concert and to supplement each other's capability. Women are key to good governance. Their increasing representation in democratic institutions have provided stability to Indian polity. Women can bring constructie, creative and sustaniable solutions to the table. Women participation

44 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 45 in economic programmes needs to be augmented for in women we get expendable providers, educators, caretakers and leaders. Scholars as well as administrators argee that participation of civil society in decision-making, public sector capacity building and rule of law are essential for quality and timely delivery of services. It is being widely appreciated that good governance is dependant not merely upon good policy advises but more importantly on the processes and incentives to design and implement good policies. The aim of our Constitution makers was to established an Organization to implement the policies of the Government neutrally and effectively. They primarily followed foot-print of Imperial Power to built up the Administrative structure, and then to work on that structure, they initiated a new training programme for them to change their colonial outlook, which once taught them to view the people as "subjects', and to adopt the culture of viewing not merely as an administrators but as 'public servants'. So new training schedule developed to augment a new trend of behaviour of Officials. The main intention of our Constitution makers was to re-create a new Public Administration which would play an important role in democracy, not only as an instrument of governce but also as a mechanism for social change and progress in the country. To their views the role of Public Administration should not only to protect its citizen from internal and external damages, but would take and active role in the social, political, economic and cultural development of future India. Our Constitution Makers wanted to form a 'Welfare State' where the democratic State would expand its functions to the welfare of the society. Our Constitution, which is the supreme document of the land, emphasized the need of establishing such goverance and Governmental system which should look for 'good governace' but their aim would be to materialize a 'Pro people governance'. The constitution in its Part IV has laid down some of the principles which are expected to be followed by the state as fundamental in the governance of the country. These principles enunciated the 'rights of community', which are to be secured by the government as per its capacity. The well being of the community is becoming increasingly dependent on efficient governmental management i.e. the public administration rather tha on the separate efforts of individual.

46 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 47 4.4 Indian Administration and Social Justice : The Implications Social inequality assumes a particular reprehensible form in relation to the backward classes and communities which are treated as untouchable, and so the problem of social justice is as urgent and important in India. In a comprehensive sense social justic is also include economic justices. The concept of social justice thus takes within its sweep the objective of removing all inequalities and affording equal opportunities to all citizens in social affairs as well as economic activities The constitution of India is a basic document which provides for women empowerment within the framework of the plenary provision of article 14,15(3)21 39a 51a and preamble. The courts always try to interpret the cases which are detriment to women within the area of social justice with these articles. The right to elimination of gender based discrimination so as to attain, economic empowerment, from part of universal human rights reservation for women in government jobs and private institutions would amount to positive discrimination. Reservation for women would become a populist tool at the hands of women powers of providing opportunities to in male dominated society is equally strong. The parliament has succeed in its efforts to provide for reservation seat in election to the Panchayats and municipalities. These have provided in article 243a to 243t of the constitution of part 9 and part 9a which have been added to the constitution by 73rd 74th amendment acts with article 243a to243d and article 243p to 243z.At present 33% reservation has been provided for women in Panchayats and Municipalities local bodies. As per to article 243d, only few states have provided 50% reservation of which prominent seats are in Bihar.

Article 243t of the constitution provides similar provision for reservation seats for women in direct election in every municipality. Therefore holding of 33% of seats for women candidates and perform all public function at the panchayat and municipality level are the constitutional mandate. Our Constitution aims at equality of status and opportunity for all citizens including those who are socially, economically and educationally backward. The claims of members of backward classes require adequate representation in legislative and executive bodies. If members of Scheduled Castes and Tribes who are said by this Court to be backward classes, posses minimum necessary requirement of 46 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 47 administrative efficiency not only representation but also preference may be given to them to enforce equality and to eliminate inequality. Articles 15(4) and 16 (4) bring out the position of backward classes to merit equality. Special provisions are made for the advancement of backward classes and reservations of appointments and posts for them to secure adequate representation. These provisions will bring out the content of equality guaranteed by Articles 14, 15 (1) and 16 (1) the concept of equality because equality means equality to all and not merely to the advanced and educated sections of the society. It follows, therefore, that in order to provide equality of opportunity to all citizens of our country, every class of citizens must have a sense of equal participation in building up an egalitarian society, where there is peace and plenty, where there is complete economic freedom and there is no pestilence or poverty, no discrimination and oppression, where there is equal opportunity to education, to work, to earn their livelihood so that the goal of social justice is achieved. The Constitution of India has solemnly promised of the nation. The Constitution has attempted to attune the apparently conflicting claims of socio-economic justice and of individual liberty and fundamental rights by putting some relevant provisions. The Indian Constitution is first and foremost a social document and the core of the commitment to the social revolution lays in Part III and IV in the Fundamental Rights and Directive Principles of State Policy which Ambedkar described as 'The conscience of the constitution.' The manner in which social revolution should be brought about is contained in the 'directives' incorporated in Articles 38 to 48 of the constitution. The 'directives' cover a wide area of economic and social activity, even taking within their fold matters like free legal aid to the indigent and the need to have a uniform Civil Code. Directives like equal pay for equal work for both men and women, distribution

Article 43 holds before the working population the ideal of the living wage and Article 46 emphasizes the importance of the promotion of educational and economic interests of schedule castes, schedule tribes and other weaker sections It must also be remembered that the mandate of Article 38 of our Constitution, which reads as under: 'The State shall strive

the national life. The constitution (44th amendment) act 1978 inserted a new directive principle in article 38 of the constitution provides that the state shall in particular, strive to minimize inequalities in income and Endeavour to eliminate inequalities in status, facilities and opportunities, not only among individuals but also among the group of people residing n different area or engaged in different vocations. The new clause aims at wages to eliminates inequalitiy in various spheres of life. 4.5 Conclusion The welfare legislations has been enacted during the post-independence era. The establishment of Human Rights Commission, Women's Commission, Family Courts, Industrial tribunals, Administrative Tribunals, Ombudsman, Panchayati Raj, and Lok Adalats etc are only a few illustrations to suggest that the sole objective is to make justice available to a common man and ameliorate the sufferings of masses including women, children and other neglected and weaker sections of the society. The laws relating to consumers protection, dowry prohibition, abolition of bonded labour, control of environmental pollution etc. have been enacted to provide social justice. The Civil Rights Act, 1955; The immoral Traffic (Prevention) Act, 1956; The Probation of Offenders Act, 1958; The Medical Termination of Pregnancy Act, 1971; The Equal Remuneration Act, 1976; The Family Courts Act, 1984; The Child Labour (Prohibition & Regulation) Act, 1986 The Legal Services Authorities Act, 1987; The Environment (Protection) Act, 1986; The SC & ST (Prevention of Atrocities) Act, 1989; The Child Marriage Restraint (Amendment) Act, 1978; The National Commission for Women Act, 1990; The Public Liability Insurance Rights Act, 1991; The Protection of Human Rights Act, 1993; Pre-Natal Diagnostic Techniques Act, 1994; The (Extension to Scheduled Areas) Act, 1996. These socio-economic measures are meant to protect the dignity of human personality and to ensure prosperity of people as also the State. It is 48 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 49 the duty of all tiers of Indian Administration to duly abide by all these laws including the Domestic Violence Act and Right to Information Act passed in mid 2000s and also use forces like Lokpal and Lokayukta and Ombudsman to provide social justice and bring social change to the people of India. 4.6 Summary • The forefathers of our Constitution has made for us a Welfare state. The administration is responsible to keep on that spirit of our Constitution makers. • The Constitution has not only gave some fundamental rights, but also mentioned certain duties with necessary directions to the State to materialise those, using the competency of the Administration. • These duties have been categorised as 'Services' of the Government to the society. • The Administration have given the duties to implement them under their direct interference and guidence. • The prime beneficiaries of those 'services' are Child, Mother, Family, Senior Citizens, and other social groups, specially belong to Backward classes in the society. • Post Independet administration is not only a machinery for maintaining law and order, but also a leading force of development. • Administration is also a part of the Governmental mechinery to augment social justice and political equality. 4.7 Glossary • Kamin : Bonded Landless Agricultural Labour. • Caste Minded Hindus : Orthodox upper Caste people. • Welfare State : The State whose primary focus is to extend her services for the welfare of the society. • Jagmani : The traditional practice or custom (Especially related with Priest) in Indian village, where one family works on behalf of other's family. • Egalitarian : A proposition or hypothesis for equal society. • Caste : A social isntitution of tradional Indian society. Because fundamentally the prime function of the administration is to solve social problems, and to find out the public 'choice' (both economic and social) of the 52 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 53 common people. In view of this normative point of view, the success of administrators depends on their accuracies of identifying the choice/ demand of the people and to steer the economy and social problem to the end of augmenting the satisfaction. Because on their satisfaction, the stability of the Government and State gets a status quo platform. The globazation has snatched the larger input function of the administration with its large paw of economic dominance. As an obvious consequence, the administration has gone through a new phase of changing perspective. Even the age old job-sensibility as well as security has quickly become a historical cliché to the newly appointed professional. Incresing role of private economy comes through globalization, and quick spread of Multinational Cor[oration push back the existing 'State administration' to those days when administration was merely an instrument of maintaining law and order of the society. Their egalitarian role immediately went back to the vanishing point of their social utility. There is no doubt that a tremendous impact has fallen on the administrative function. This impact again, inturn, has affected the major economic sectors and the initiative of their 'nation building' role. 5.2 Adminstration and Economic Development : Theoretical Outline Public administration is concerned with prescription – the identification of normative rules for decision makers that would lead them to make decisions that are optimal from the standpoint of the citizenry as a whole. Economics is concerned with prediction – the identification of rules decision makers are likely to follow, given their incentives. Bluntly put, public administrators solve problems; economists explain choices. Economic theory is useful to public administrators when it provides them with concepts they can use to diagnose problems accurately and to prescribe effective solutions to those problems – i.e., concepts like opportunity costs, incentives, or capitalization that can be profitably applied to an array of problems frequently encountered by public administrators. But real-world problem solving also frequently raises questions of value and of right and wrong. Economic logic often recognizes no good but efficiency, no evil aside from inefficiency. Morality, what James March calls the logic of appropriateness, ought to play an important role in the conduct of

52 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 53 the public's business; economists often have trouble accounting for this simple fact The "new public management" has also influenced public administration in the United States. The new public management emphasizes "performance appraisal and efficiency; the disaggregation of public bureaucracies into agencies which deal with each other on a user-pay basis; the use of quasi-markets and contracting out to foster competition; cost-cutting; and a style of management which emphasizes amongst other things, output targets, limited term contracts, monetary targets and incentives, and freedom to manage borrowing from the business-management. Literature is nothing new for the discipline of public administration. Business administration and public administration are both prescriptive, pragmatic disciplines. Moreover, business schools and schools of public administration once shared the same proverbs of administration, just as we shared the Weberian bureaucratic paradigm and a common intellectual foundation in the works of Chester Barnard, Henri Fayol, Mary Parker Follett, Luther Gulick, Phillip Selznick, Frederick Taylor, and others. Public choice theory has changed the way we think about government and how it works. Moreover, in explaining the rules that voters, elected officials, and bureaucrats are likely to follow given their incentives, public choice theory has given public administrators some useful new normative information. Nevertheless, when public administrators look to advances in economic science for help, it is not primarily to the public choice literature that they turn to, or even the new macroeconomics, but to the new economics of organization. 5.3 Indian Administration : The Era of Globalization Globalisation means linking the national economy with world economy as an outcome of new economic policy which has been adopted in 1991, to accelerate the rate of economic growth .The globalization emphasized the removal of restrictions of licensing, quota and tariffs on the export and import of goods across the country. It has brought with it new technologies, quality and quantity of goods, improved and advanced methods of production and increased scope of private sectors, especially the multinational corporations in the country, competitive environment in the national economy as a mean to improve the productivity and efficiency of the system. It has encouraged free mobility of the capital and labour with increase in the openness, growing economic interdependence, deepening economic integration in the world

54 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 55 economy. As an outcome of globalization, the Government of India has to minimize the controls over the flow of foreign goods, services, capital, and technology investments and has to adopt liberal policies for adjustment of investment. The governmental interference in economic activities has been declining. The integration of the world market and rapid technological change led to efficiency gains and growth. These in turn increased competition through lower cost and higher market efficiency, higher productivity, lower barriers to entry and new investment opportunities in public sector. Modern management processes to increase the efficiency of the administration have been emphasized. The principle of hierarchy has been losing its length and got flattened and downsized, and has been eliminating the need for levels of bureaucracy and long chain of commands. The number of employees has been reducing. Traditional administrative processes of file keeping and pushing, secrecy in official work, long durations for completion of work, delays, lengthy processes have been replaced with data processing, automation, transparency, speedy services with the use of data communication networks. Easy access of information about administration helps the people to express their views and opinions. Excessive controls on administrative activities have been replaced with self controls and deregulations. In Haryana, steps have been taken to make the administration and its functions transparent to the people, many functions of the administration have been updated like PDS and ration card preparation, implementation of National rural employment guarantee, registration of land records, driving license, pension, national insurance schemes etc. Technological advancement has influenced the process in the administration and has introduced efficiency, time boundness and cost effectiveness. Indian administration has undergone sea-change in response to new inputs from the contemporary socio-economic and political scene and under the impact of globalization. Now the competition with private sector has increased. The public sector has to compete with private sectors in case of cost, quality, and span of production otherwise it has to face elimination. Financial matters of our country, may it be related to banks, inflation, share prices, monetary and fiscal policy, budget are being finalized according to international financial market. The scope of public sector is becoming limited. So the powers and functions of bureaucracy have been reducing, due to the entry of foreign investors in telecommunication, roads, posts, airports, insurance, health, education and IT sectors.

54 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 55 Job security, one of the major features of Indian administration is being replaced with downsized, reduced number of employees by removing dysfunctional and sick units. The principles of new public management are tightening its grip on Indian administration to make it fit to face the challenges of globalization. The principle of quality management is being emphasized with liberalisation to cope with world economy to maintain stability in domestic economy. The advancements in IT sector have been changing the working environment of each organization. Traditional methods of work have been replaced with modern and advanced one. The system of secrecy in governmental work has loosened its grip. Due to globalization the use of advanced means of communication, print media and electronic media, have encouraged the common masses to put their opinions and views before the government and administration ,which have in turn helped in bringing transparency and exposure of hidden faces of administration. Efforts have been made by the different departments to improve the structural, financial, personnel and managerial positions by introducing structural and policy changes to attract foreign investments, to bring stability in their organizations. Indian administration is playing the role of motivator and developer to face globalization. It is motivating the unemployed, untrained, and illiterate at the grassroots by encouraging local level organization, NGOs and SHGs to participate in developmental and welfare programmes. Liberalisation in Indian administration helps to perform the functions in transparent, efficient and in cost effective manner to fulfil the demands of multiplicity of organizations and to compete with them. Globalisation has been increasing efficiency, productivity and customer orientation in Indian administration and liberalisation has enforced for transparency, ethical values and responsiveness. Globalisation has encouraged market oriented policies and structure of administration and liberalisation has encouraged flattening of hierarchy, downsizing of bureaucracy, and decentralization of policy formulation. Globalisation has emphasized on reducing restrictions and controls on economic activities of administration and liberalisation has emphasized self –controls in administration. Globalisation has brought advanced technologies, IT advancements in administration and liberalisation has brought right to information, e-governance and transparency in administration. Globalisation has applied cost and time bound techniques to increase the production and liberalisation has facilitated easy access to information and services to citizens. Globalisation has introduced competition with private sector for quality and price and liberalisation has introduced administrative effectiveness and 56 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 57 efficiency in administration. Globalisation has paved the way for interaction of Indian administration with international economic system and policies and liberalisation has paved the way for coordination and relation of Indian administration with multiplicity of organizations. Globalisation is posing problems for national democracy because collective decisions are made in context beyond government control and liberalisation is making administration adaptable to different conditions and varied situations. The global meltdown has also been badly affected Indian market and economy. The political reality is that globalization is not just stalled. It is on the retreat. In an economic downturn of this magnitude, every country is going to give priority to its own economy. But the interaction and coping of public and private sector has been increasing, which has been proving beneficial to public sector to make it efficient, accountable, transparent and competitive. Negative impacts of globalization on Indian administration 1. Reduction in number of jobs. 2. Negative impact of global meltdown on Indian industry. 3. Numbers of frauds are increasing. 4. Numbers of cyber crimes are increasing. 5. Both internal and external security problems have been increasing. 5.4 Indian Administration and Economic Development Issues A new chapter has dawned for India and its billion plus population in July 1991 when India initiated reforms. This period of economic transition has had a tremendous impact on the overall economic development of almost all the major sectors of the economy, and its effects over looked besides, it also marks the advent of the real integration of the Indian economy into the global economy. In the Uruguay round of negotiations of GATT 1994, India signed the agreement on trade related investment measures that has forced India to do away with protection of Indian industry from severe global competition within five years. Of the 13 investment measures that were identified to distort global trade, India has been using as many as eleven of them to meet the needs of social and economic development of the country. Signing of this agreement is bound to remove these much-needed measures. In the meantime, the custom duties on imports have been steadily brought down as per the Industrial

56 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 57 Licensing Policy 1991. In January 1995 being a founder member of GATT; India joined WTO and agreed to stand by the regulatory framework of free global trade and competition. India initiated the process of integrating in domestic economy with the global economy from the early 1990s due to severely of balance of payments crisis, high fiscal deficit and high inflation rate. The main goal of globalization was making the economy more market oriented through increasing competitiveness and reducing government interventions. The establishment of World Trade Organization (WTO) in1995 has further intensified the degree of competition across domestic and global markets through removing of restrictions on foreign direct investment. Because of its wide coverage, globalization, liberalization, and privatization in general, have affected the entire Indian economy i.e., both the public and private sectors. As an outcome of these polices, the Government of India has to minimize the controls over the flow of foreign goods, services, capital, and technology investments and has to adopt liberal policies for adjustment of investment. E-Governance is the application of IT to the process of government functioning to bring Simple, Moral, Accountable, Responsive and Transparent (SMART) governance. The speed and transparency associated with E-Governance have the potential to make public administration responsive and efficient. Recognizing the increasing importance of electronics, the Government of India established the Department of Electronics in 1970. The subsequent establishment of National Informatics Centre (NIC) in 1977 was the first major step towards e-governance in India as it brought information and communication in focus. In the early 1980s, use of computers was confined to very few organizations. The advent of personal computers brought the storage, retrieval and processing capacities of computers to government offices. A National Task Force on Information Technology and Software Development was constituted in May 20, 1998. While recognizing Information Technology as a frontier area of knowledge per se, it focused on utilizing it as an enabling tool for assimilating and processing all other spheres of knowledge. It recommended the launching of an 'Operation Knowledge' aimed at universalizing computer literacy and spreading the use of computers and IT in education. In 1999, the Union Ministry of Information Technology was created. By 2000, a 12-point minimum agenda for e-Governance was identified by Government of India for implementation in all the Union Government Ministries/Departments. Furthermore, this process of integration of government services by internet technology increased in last decade with rapid growth. Almost every department and every Ministry now a can be accessed with just a click on interment on your desktop. Indeed the process of

58 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 59 transformation from governance to e-governance has improved the quality of services with proper accountability, essay accessibility, accurate storage and transparency in the system. 5.5 Conclusion Attempts to improve the economic conditions through globalization have been made in our country and liberalisation has also paved the way to achieve maximum output, quality and value products but regionalism, communalism and political discretion are the main obstacles in the way to good governance. So the world politics is thinking about globalization retreat. The principles of liberalisation need to be observed by Indian administration to face the challenges of globalization and to maintain its status and significance in our society. In India the real economic development took place in a neo-liberal global market economy scenario in post 1991 period which has affected the way Indian administration functioned the most notably among which is how the administration grapples with Special Economic Zone and associated displacement issue in the contemporary period. 5.6 Summary • The primary focus of administration was to meet up the optimal social need. • Administration was a part, as well as, the media of implementing socio-economic development • The role of administration was to become an effective mechinery to the State, to materialise the basic tenets of 'welfare State' concept. • Advent of globalization very rapidly change the hitherto role and function of the State Administration. • Globalization brings new technologies, quality and quantity of goods. Multi- national takes the leading role. • New type of competitive commodities and service production by the Corporate Houses, pushed back our indigenous production houses to a large extent. • The character of competition gradually takes its larger steps through change of efficiency, lower cost, higher market efficiency. • It was really a big challenge to our indigenous production units.

The Constitution makers of India, made the President head of a Republican Country. To quote Article 52 of the Indian Constitution, "There shall be a President of India". The Constituent Assembly of India accepted the Parliamentary form of Government based on British Constitution. In accordance with this government, the formal powers are vested in the Union Executive consisting of the President, the Vice-President, the Prime Minister, the Council of Ministers and the Attorney General of India. The President is the head of the Indian State and he is the first citizen of India. He is elected by the members of an electoral college for 5 years. Article 58 has prescribed the essential qualoification, to be a President of India. Article 58 reads: "No person shall be eligible for elction as President unless he:- (

a) is a citizen of India; (b) has completed the age of thirty-five, and (c) is qualified for election as member of the

No particular reason has been stated for fixing the age at 35. All the executive powers are vested in him and he also takes a crucial role in the other wings of the government, Legislature and Judiciary. But he is not the actual executive, he is the nominal head of the Union. 1.2 Qualifications According to Constitution
a presidential candidate

a member of the Lok Sabha; iv. He should not hold any office of profit under the Central government or any state government or any local or public authority.

Apart from these, the presidential candidate must need at least 50 electors as proposers and 50 electors as seconders. Every candidate has to deposit security money of 15,000 in the Reserve Bank of India. 1.3 Impeachment According to article 56, "(a) The President may, by wrting under his hand address to the Vice President, resign his Office; (b) the President , for violation of the Constitution, be removed from the Office by impeachment in the manner provided in article 61; (c) the President shall, notwithstanding the expiration of his termd, shall investigation, if the other House passes the resolution by two-thirds majority of the total membership, the President has to resign from his office from the date on which the resolution is so passed.

In other cases if the Office of President is vacant due to sudden death, the Vice President will continue the office. In of the absence of Vice President, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court will act as the President. Even that has also too possible, the Parliament will decide as, to whom the responsibility of the Office of the President should be given. One thing may be mentioned here, that American Constitution provides a list of Eleven successor to the American Presidency. 1.4 Manner of election of President The President is not elected by the people of India directly, but indirectly. According to article 54, the President shall be

Regarding the election of the President, V.D. Kulshrestha in his book: Landmarks in Indian legal and Constitutional History, (Lucknow: Eastern, 1969), stated that, Nehru during his Prime Ministership, moved a Bil in the Parliament and got it passed as 11th. Amendment Act, according to which elected member of the Legislative Assembly of a State shall have as many votes as there are multiples of one thousand in the quotient obtained by dividing the population of the State by the total number of the elected members of the Assembly; (

b) If, after taking the said multiples of one thousand, the remainder is not less than five hundred, then the vote of each member referred to in sub-clause (a) shall be further increased by one; (c)

Each elected member of either House of Parliament shall have such number of votes as may be obtained by dividing the total number of votes assigned to the members of the Legislative Assemblies of the States under sub-clauses (a) and (b) by the total number of the elected members of both Houses of Parliament, fractions exceeding onehalf being counted as one and other fractions being disregarded. During the election of President, every elector can inform their preferences through casting their votes. The voter will have as many preference votes as the number of candidates. But the voters have to inform their first preference. After completing the vote, the first preference valid votes are counted. A candidate will be declared elected after getting the 'quota of votes'. The quota is fixed by dividing the total number of valid first preference votes into two and adding one to it. 1.5 or emergency time. There are 68 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 69 three types of emergency powers of the President in the constitution of India. Such as – (a) National Emergency (Article 352):- " authority of the State. (c)

Financial Emergency (Article 360);- It reads,"

If the President is satisfied that a situation has arisen whereby the financial stability or credit of India or of any part of the territory thereof is threatened", he may, by proclamation make declaration to the effect Financial Emergency. One thing is very relevant specially in the case of Financial Emergency. President, as per Constitution, may proclaim Financial Emergency, only when he is satisfied that the Financial situation of the Contry or any part of it is grave. But in reality, the satisfaction only raised when the prime Minister desire to make. So if the will proves as false or bad, then total eclipse of all human rights would be nothing but sort of a catastrophy. 1.6 Position of the Indian President The president is the head of the state of India and he is the symbol of unity and integrity of the nation. He enjoys enormous powers as discussed above. According to Article 53 of our constitution, "All executive power of the Union shall be vested in President and shall be exercised by him either directly or through officers subordinate to him in accordance with this Constitution."

But in fact, he is a nominal head of the state. Even the architects of the Indian Constitution wanted to make the President a nominal head of the state. Here, we can remind the statement of Dr. B R Ambedkar: "Under the Indian Constitution, the President occupies the same position as the King under the English Constitution. He is the head of the state but not of the Executive.

He represents the nation but does not 70 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 71 rule the nation. He is the symbol of the nation. His place in administration is that of a ceremonial device on a seal by which the nation's decisions are made known. He is generally bound by the advice of his ministers. He can do nothing contrary to their advice nor can he do anything without their advice. The President of the United States can dismiss any secretary at any time. The President of the Indian Union has no power to do so, so long as his ministers command a majority in Parliament." Echoing this, Article 74 envisages that

there shall be a Council of Ministers with the Prime Minister at the head to aid and advise the President who 'shall', in the exercise of his functions, act in accordance with such advice.

He is bound to listen
the advice of the council of ministers headed by the Prime Minister. He only can request to rethink the advice to the council of ministers headed by the Prime Minister.

Lastly, it can be said that the President is the constitutional head of the state and a symbol of the nation. In critical situations he takes a crucial role. Such as – (a) He can appoint the Prime Minister with his own decision when no party has a clear majority in the Lok Sabha. (b)

the council of Ministers if it cannot prove the confidence of the Lok Sabha. (c) The President can dissolve the Lok Sabha before the completing its full tenure of five years. The position of the President depends on his personality, capability, efficiency and political sagacity. A President with above mentioned qualities can play very useful role as a respected "umpire in constitutional politics of India". 1.7 Conclusion The President of India is the head of the state under the parliamentary form of government. He is elected by the members of an electoral college consisting of all elected

MPs and MLAs for five years. He can re-elect also. He can resign from the post before the expiry of the term or he may be removed from his post for the violation of the Constitution by impeachment. He enjoys executive, legislative, financial, judicial and emergency powers.

head of the state. He

He represents the nation but does not rule the nation. He is generally bound by the advice of his ministers with the Prime Minister at the head. He can do nothing contrary to their advice nor can he do anything without their advice. At last it is true that the position of the President depends on his personality, capability, efficiency and political sagacity. 1.8 Summary The post and position of President raised some grave points of its importances. The Constitution is not clear, that what President is actually doing or what he supposed to do. Because: • The law has given him immence power, but at the same time, has made up a barrier of tradition, which forces him to stay as nominal head of the State. • Constitution does clarified, what would be happened if the President starts to use his right to exercise his power, as per the Constitution, then what will happen? • In fact the harmonious corelation between Constitutional Artcle and use of those Articles have led to a successful working of the Constitution. • S.S.Khera in his book : "The Central Executive" (Delhi: Orient Longman, 1975) make a significant comment: the president often

the Indian Constitution)

74 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 75 Prime Minister is the actual executive authority (de facto executive) and head of the government under the Parliamentary form of government in India. He is the key stone of the Union administration. He is the advisor of the President, leader of the Cabinet and majority party in the House of Peoples. Now-a-days the office of the Prime Minister has become very powerful and that is why many scholars says that India has neither a parliamentary nor a Cabinet but a Prime ministerial system of government. The power and position of the Prime Minister gradually grown up as a powerful unit in the Parliamentary System. The begins with Mrs. Indira Gandhi. during her time of rule the Office of P.M's Secretariat started to touch the "dizzy heights of power and authority". 2.2 Appointment and term of the Prime Minister The intention of our founding father of Constitution was to make the position of Prime Minister in the Parliament, the supreme political leader of his Cabinet. Thus the power of the Prime Minister lying hidden in the Cabinet. So they frame Article 74, which reads,"

position of Prime Minister in the Parliamentary system, the maker of Constitution further stated in the Prime Minister shall be appointed by the President and the other Ministers shall be appointed by the President on the advice of the Prime Minister". In fact, the President has hardly any choice. He is to appointment the leader of the majority party in the Lok Sabha as the Prime Minister.

But when any political party does not get the majority in the Lok Sabha, the President can select and appoint the Prime Minister according to his personal discretion. The term of the Prime Minister is 5 years. However, if he loses the confidence of the Lok Sabha before completing the term, he must resign or the President can dismiss him. 2.3 Powers and Functions of the Prime Minister Article 78 of the Constitution specified the power of the Prime Minister. He enjoys enormous powers. He has a number of functions to perform. We can discuss the powers and functions of the Prime Minister by dividing into the following heads: •

The Prime Minister and the President : The President is the nominal head of the state and the Prime Minister is the actual head of the state under the

parliamentary form of government in India. According to Constitution the President can appoint
the Prime Minister and the article 74 says us

Council of Ministers with the Prime Minister at the head.

But, if he wants to know anything regarding administration or any decision of Council of Ministers, the Prime Minister must inform him.
According to article 78, "

It shall be the duty of the Prime Minister – A. to communicate to the President all decisions of the Council of Ministers relating to the administration of the affairs of the Union and proposals for legislation; B. to furnish such information relating to the administration of the affairs of the Union and proposals for legislation as the President may call for.

In fact

the Prime Minister is the principal channel of communication between the President and the Council of Ministers. With the consent of Prime Minister, the President can appoint the other ministers of the Council of Ministers,

Attorney- General, Comptroller and Auditor-General, Governors of all States, Administrators of the Union Territories,

Council of Ministers : The Prime Minister is the head of the Council of Ministers. With the consent of him, the President can appoint the other ministers of the Council of Ministers.

He can constitute, reconstitute or reshuffle the ministry and allocates portfolios to other ministers.

He presides over the meeting of Council of Ministers and influences the decisions of the council. He can force to resign to any ministers at any time. He is the main pillar of relating to disintegrat the body of Council of Ministers. Thus, he is "inter stellas luna minors" (a moon among lesser stars) as Sir William Vernor Harcourt said. But, sometimes the Prime Minister has to give a place to the leaders of his own political party. That is why he is also called "primus inter pares" (first among equals). • The Prime Minister and Parliament : The Prime Minister is the leader of the Parliament. He can decide the dates of meetings, programme of its session etc in consultation with the consultation of the speaker of Lok Sabha. The President can summon and adjourn the Lok Sabha with 76 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 77 the consent of the Prime Minister. He can also decide when the Lok Sabha will be dissolved. It is his onus to introduce and pass any bill including controversial bill in the Parliament. Article 74 of the Constitution, confers special power to the Prime Minister and declared that the Prime Ministershall be "at the head of the Council of Ministers which shall aid and advice the President in the discharge of his

executive function." In reply to question raised by Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel, on the issue of "Prime Minister is the first among the equals", the then Prime Minister aptly replied that, "
The Prime Minister is the Prime Minister. He can only lay down the policy of the Government; the Prime Minister is the linchpin of the Government." In fact the attempt of our Constitution maker was to make the Prime Minister the most powerful and important leader of the nation as well as of his Cabinet in the Parliament. But this also limitted by the personality of the occupier of the office, and the strength of his Party in the Parliament. • Prime Minister as Head of the Government : The Prime Minister is key to form the Cabinet, and in reality he stays with his Cabinet and falls with his Cabinet. In fact his leadership stems from his Party mandate and Leadership. He holds the key to appoint or eliminate the members of his Cabinet. He does it not only as leader of the House but also as Leader of his Party. In fact as a leader of the Party and Government, Prime Minister enjoys uninterrupted freedom in chossing the Cabinet colleagues When any Prime Minister enjoys the absolute party supremacy in the Parliament, Prime Minster's recommendation power for the post of Ministry becomes free from any constraints. Although the decisions are taken by the Cabinet Ministers, but that comes into fore in the name of Prime Minister. • The Prime Minister and his Political Party : In a parliamentary democratic state like India political parties take main role to make Prime Minister. In fact,

fact that the Party makes its leader. But once the leader is elected or selected by the Party, the Party members support is very essential to continue the Leadership. To remain in the power, he has to improve the image of his political party in front of the people of India. It is the onus of the Prime Minister to pass the examination of election of his own party. So, he has to give time and pay attention to the affairs of her/his own party. • The Prime Minister as a leader of Nation : The Prime Minister is not only a leader of the majority political party in the legislature, he is the leader of the people of India. He is the symbol of hope and desire

76 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 77 of the whole nation. So, Prime Minister always tries to communicate with the people through electronic media to make a good image in front of the nation. On the other hand, elections are fought in his/her name and people cast their votes for the Prime Minister, not for the party. • Prime Minister and the Media : The Prime Minister is chief spokesman of the Party and Government. It is he who personifies the Government not only as spokesman in the Parliament and at International forum but also in the interviews with the Media persons as well. Clever appearance of the Prime Minister to the Media, the Prime Minister can project himself and his Government, a dignified National Governemtn. • The Prime Minister as an International leader : The Prime Minister takes a crucial role as an international leader of our country in the age of globalisation. He represents the national, regional and international conferences. Jawaharlal Nehru, Indira Gandhi, Rajeev Gandhi and Atal Bihari Vajpayee left their mark on such conferences and meets. Such as, Jawaharlal Nehru took an important role in non-alignment movement (NAM). Rajeev Gandhi's contribution in SAARC also appreciable. 2.4

is the key stone of the arena of both executive and legislative bodies. He is the real head of the government. He enjoys all powers of the President enshrined in the constitution of India. The entire structure of Council of Ministers and Cabinet are built according to his opinion. He presides over all meetings of Council of Ministers and Cabinet, he instructs, encourages and even admonishes individual ministers. He is the life and death of the union government. Ivor Jennings described him as "The Sun round which the planets revolve". He 'is the keystone of cabinet arch,' as Gladstone said. The position of the Prime Minister determines the nature of the government, his/ her efficiency, personality and political sagacity. We can end this discussion with the statement of Jawaharlal Nehru. He said, "The Prime Minister is the Prime Minister. He can lay down the policy of Government.....in the Constitution; the Prime Minister is the linchpin of Government." Practically the position of the Prime Minister, largely depends on the style, experience, determination, and the strength of the Prime Minister. These directly or indirectly add aura of the office of the Prime Minister.

in the House. According to the constitution, the total number of Ministers, including the Prime Minister, in the Council of Ministers shall not exceed fifteen per cent. of the total number of members of the House of the People. Anyway, the Council of Ministers consists of the three categories of ministers, such as – (a) Cabinet Ministers, (b) Ministers of States and (c) Deputy Ministers.

A. Cabinet Ministers : The Cabinet ministers are the prominent leaders of the majority party in the parliament and the senior most ministers of the government. They take responsibility most important departments of the union administration. That's why they enjoy more power, prestige and privilege than any other members of the Council of the Ministers. B. Ministers of States : The rank, power, prestige and privilege of Ministers of states are after the cabinet Ministers.Theirmain functions are to assist the senior ministers to execute their duties. Sometimes they get chance to act as an independent charge of ministries/departments. They are not the member of the Cabinet. C.

78 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 79 Now,the main powers and functions of the cabinet are described below:- • The cabinet can make national, regional and international policies for the approval of the parliament. • The cabinet enjoys legislative powers. It is the main link between the Union government and the parliament. The cabinet prepares different bill, introduces them and pilots them through the two Houses of parliament. • The

that no money bill can be introduced without the prior consent of the President.

The President has to take the written concurrence before the imposing of national emergency (Article-352). • Last but not least,

the cabinet is the main coordinator among all ministries and departments of

for their activities. So, the cabinet, as a most important part of the council of ministers, are also responsible to their 80 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 81 activities to the House of the People. Anyway, after discussing the above mentioned powers and functions of the cabinet, we can say that the cabinet enjoys powers both the making and implementation of the internal and external policies of the country. So, echoing the words of Ramsay Muir can be said, "The cabinet is the steering wheel of the ship of the state." But,

Introduction The Constituent Assembly of India accepted the parliamentary form of government for new India on the basis of British Constitution. In accordance with the
NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 85 form of government, the President is the nominal
head of the state of India and the Prime Minister is the actual head of the state and the head of the government. As a real executive authority, the Prime Minister plays a very significance and crucial role in administrative and legislative system of the state of India. To fulfil these activities the Prime Minister has some helping hands since independence, such as – the Cabinet Secretaries, Cabinet Committees and the Prime Minister's Office (PMO). In this unit, we are going to discuss about the Prime Minister's Office (PMO). Prime Minister's Office (PMO) is a staff of agency which provides institutional support to the Prime Minister in his official and policy making functions. It is located in the South Block of the Secretariat Building. It does not have any constitutional base. It is an extra-constitutional body.

But, it has a status

It is an official link between the Prime Minister and his Ministers, the President, Governors, Chief Ministers and foreign representatives. The

PMO is headed by the Principal Secretary, currently Pramod Kumar Misra. 3.2 Evolution of Prime Minister's Office in India (PMO) Before independence of India, the PMO was called as the Secretary to the Governor General. After independence, the first Prime Minister of India, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru established a personal secretariat known as the Prime Minister's Secretariat (PMS) to help him to develop new India by good governance on 15th. August 1947. Till June 1977, the PMO was called as the Prime Minister's Secretariat. During the Prime Ministership of Morarji Desai, the Prime Minister's Secretariat became Prime Minister's Office, which was headed by the Secretary to the Prime Minister. Thus the name of Prime Minister's Secretariat was changed into the name of Prime Minister's Office (PMO). At present the nomenclature of P.M's secretary has chaged to "Principal Secretary" to the Prime Minister. The Secratry has a long genesis, starts from pre-Independent period. Previously, the executive head of British Government was Governor General. A position/post was then created as Secretary to the Governor General. After independence that chain of tradition was adopted by the Executive. Here one thing is to be mentioned. The secretary or the Secretariat of Prime Minister's Office was the creation of Prime Minister, for the purpose of his convenience. There has no mention fo the Post or Office in the Constitution. From this point of view, the Secretariat of prime Minister is an extra Constituional body. For this the power and position of P.M's Secreatariat has emanate informal proximity with the

84 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 85 Prime Minister. The major source of its power and influence have also emited from his closeness with the most powerful executive head of the Central Ministries. The unique phenomenon of this Office, which we need to know, was that during the time of our first prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru, the Secretary to Prime Minister was not al all a significant face in the administration. Only Mr. O.P. Mathai, the Private Secretary of Pandit Nehru, was the most significant in the loby of the Parliament. The Secretariate of the Prime Minister was then only a bunch of Bureaucrats, used to help Nehru to manage the official work. Nehru as a Prime Minister never relied upon them heavily, rather he was comfortable to work with the Cabinet Secretary. The reason of this behaviour was later explained by Probhu Chawla, in his Article published in "India Today" on 8th. March 2010. The title of his write up was "The Power Point Men". To quote directly from assessmental writings:- "India's first PM was not a great believer in a kitchen cabinet or in a Secretariat of experts for the reason that nehru himself was such a formidable brain that he hardly needed to borrow ones. His personal staff never enjoyed super bureauratic powers." Later after Nehru's era, Lal Bahadur Sastri assumed the power of Prime Ministership. So far the Secreatariat of Prime Minister was placed under the position of Cabinet Secreatriat. Prime Minister Sastri appointed L.K. Jha as his Secretary. Mr. L.K. Jha was a brilliant bureaucrat. He initially sucummed the authority under the place of Cabinet Secretariat. But Mr. Jha has a tremendous personality. So under his influence P.M's Secreatriat got a special boost, inspite of his "low profile" existence in the Executive office. Gradually under the forceful personality of Mr. Jha, the P.M's secretariat has become a major power center in all India politics. The P.M's Secretariat got its full swing power and tremendous influence during the time of Mrs. Indira Gandhi. Since then instead of decresing the position of P.M's Secretariat, it is now continously increasing. Indira Gandhi's personal Secretary, P.C. Alexander in his memoirs (My Years with Indira Gandhi) mentioned that, when he was the Principal Secretary of Mrs Gandhi, he was very closely associated with every sort of Governmental affiairs and decisions. Even he recapitulated that, he was not only very close to mrs Gandhi, he as Principal Secretary, used to assist the Prime Minister in preparing replies to Parliament and was in charge of collecting information from Parliamentary work for preparing any supplementary questions. It indicates that, he remained always on his toes when the Parliament is in session. Even he remembered his role during the time when the prime Minister decided to suffle her Cabinet of Ministries. Actually from this time onward the power and position of P.M's Secretary stated to rise above the Cabinet Secretary and all other Secretariat.

86 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 87 We have experienced an absolute new dimention in P'M. Office and its position specially during the time when any qualition Government holds the Office. Because in qualition Government the Prime Minister mainly concentrate his function as a chairman of the qualition Cabinet than as a leader of his party which owes undivided loyalty to their leader, Prime Minister. Because in case qualition ministry, there are many ministers with different loyalty. A predetermined (based on, either post-election or pre-elction understanding) quota system does play a binding role on the qualition, and the Prime Minister thus finds himself operating within all these constraints imposed by this divided loyalties of the Cabinet as well as of the Ministries. Each constituent parties choose its representatives in the Ministry , and the Prime Minister has very little option in making his own Ministry. 3.3 Composition of the Prime Minister's Office in India Politically Prime Minister is the head of the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) and administratively the Principal Secretary. Additionally it consists of one or two Additional Secretaries, three to five Joint Secretaries, a number of Directors/Deputy Secretaries and Under Secretaries. There are also other officers like Officer on Special Duty, Private Secretaries, Social Secretaries, Research Officer, Hindi Officer and so on. The personnel are generally drawn from the Civil Service.

Prabhu Chawla, in his article India Today described, "Every PMO mirrors the personality of the incumbent PM – not only his priority as a policy maker but his fears, paronia and of course his dream." Quantitatively the total strength of of PM Office is approximately 400 to 450. A common question sometimes raises by the people, that whether this numerical strength of P.M office is sufficient or not? Generally the number in PMO depends on the function that it requires to do to provide administrative protection specially to the less experienced Ministries. When any key assignment is given to any less experienced Minister, then there is a way to come out successfully with the work done, is providing a strong PMO. PMO initially coordinating the activities of the Ministry, and activate the project with herculean responsibility. Generally no Prime Minister can do it on his own. Sometimes Prime Minister is rstricted to expand his Cabinet due to Constitutional restriction. Here the Prime Minister obviously depends on it specialised PMO. To function decisively, the Prime Minister needs a small group of officials, who think like him and can serve him with dedication and competence. It is said that during the Primiership of Sme. Indira Gandhi and Rajib Gandhi, the talent and efficiencies of PMO was in the hightest form.

86 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 87 3.4 Functions of the Prime Minister's Office in India The PMO is the most important part of the Government of India. It plays an crucial role and performs different functions, such as – • The PMO assists the Prime Minister in respect of his all responsibility as the head of the union government.
Such as–maintaining liaison with central ministries/departments and the state governments. •

66% MATCHING BLOCK 150/369 SA 180E3620_ Indian Administration.docx (D165106916)

It helps the Prime Minister in regard to his responsibility as the chairman of the

NITI Aayog (National Institution for Transforming India) and the National Development Council. •
Dealing with the public relations of the Prime Minister is one prime important functions of the "Prime Minister's Office (PMO)". Such as – the press, public etc. •
It plays
an important role in the process of decision-making at the top level of the Government of India. • The PMO deals with all references that have, under the Rules of Business, come to the Prime Minister. • The PMO also helps the Prime Minister in the examination of cases submitted to him for orders under prescribed rules. •
It maintains the connection with the President, Governors and Foreign Representatives in the country. •
It also prepares answers of difference questions raised in the Parliament on general subjects. • The PMO acts as the 'think-tank' of the Prime Minister. • The PMO works as the main advisor on all important domestic and international matters. However, the Prime Minister's Office is not responsible for his functions, except for matters of personal correspondence between him and individual ministers. 3.5 Changing role of the

After discussing the above mentioned powers and functions of the PMO, we can say that the PMO takes a very crucial role and has grown into a high profile body of the Union Government. But, the role of the PMO is not static. It varies from Prime 88 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 89 Minister to Prime Minister. At the beginning it was a modest and slim organization, but now it is not only big but important also. The size and role of the Prime Minister's Secretariat (PMS) was limited under the government of Jawaharlal Nehru (the Prime Minister's Secretariat is also known as the Prime Minister's Office). He emphasized and relied more on the Ministers. But, Lal Bahadur Sastri established a powerful Secretariat. He appointed L. K. Jha as the secretary to the Prime Minister and he became the head of the Secretariat. The dignity of the Prime Minister's Secretariat was raised by L. K. Jha's powerful and dynamic personality. Under the government of Lal Bahadur Sastri, L. K. Jha was called a 'super secretary'. During the prime ministership of Indira Gandhi, the Prime Minister's Secretariat (PMS) had been a high profile organ in the government of India. In 1977, the Janata Government changed the name from Prime Minister's Secretariat (PMS) to Prime Minister's Office (PMO) and the dominant role of the PMO was reduced under this government. However, after returning to power in Centre, Indira Gandhi emphasised the PMO and it was strengthened again. This trend has been continuing till now since the government of Indira Gandhi and his son Rajiv Gandhi. The primary role and responsibility of PMO is to help and assist the Prime Minister in dealing with all references that come under the purview of the Rules of Business. It also help the Prime Minister to discharge his assigned responsibility as head of the Government as well as the leader spokesman of the House. He is the key person who makes and frames new policies for his party in the parliament as well as for the Nation as Prime Minister. Mr Arijit Barman in an article in "Outlook" on 9th. April 2001, described theis chaniging role as, The Prime Minister is the person whose role is related with "assembling ideas, collection of relevant inputs from diverse sources, formulation of issues and working out alternatives regarding matters coming upto the Prime Minister for decision"(p.36). In this regard the main function of the PMO is to assist the Prime Minister in whatever he does. This role of the prime Minister may narrated in different way, where we can understand the core reasons of Prime Minister when he takes the chair. A Political party expresses during elction campaign, its preferences, degine and use of administration for the greater purpose of the electorates. Even they includes those all in their Election Manufesto, to make it a written document of their proposed plan of action, provided they get mandate from the people. After election the leader of the winning party takes the Chair of power in the Parliament. Then the task of converting those commitment, given in the election campaign as well in manifesto, 88 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 89 as a written document, into hard policies and to find out the way of implementing those through established Government administration come under responsibility of the Prime Minister. Actually this is the point where the Prime Minister's office plays a crucal through intangible role. It is said intangible because as per the Rule of Business, Cabinet is the only body who will be the final decision making body, where the Prime Minister is only the leader. So practicaaly the role of the Prime Minister is only to give suggestion and necessary assitence, but not directly indulging in decision making. Here the comment made by Arijit Barman is very pertinent. He says," The PMO si only a transmission belt for the ideas which contribute a part of the inputs that go into policy formulation." The PMO always stay very close to the Prime Minister and that's why this office is more powerful than any other secretariat. In this regard we can say with B. G. Deshmukh that over the years, the PMO has grown into a high profile body. Quite often, it has exceeded the powers of the Cabinet Secretariat and actively interfered with the working of various ministries and departments. People who constitute the PMO have acquired power and authority of their own in the name of the Prime Minister. Sometimes even the PMO comes to assume much more authority and power than the Prime Minister originally intended (Deshmukh 1997). Therefore, some critics have described the PMO as 'Super Cabinet', the Government of the Government of India' and so on. But it is true that the role and the position of the PMO depend on the Prime Minister. 3.6 Prime Minister's Secretary / Principal Secretary

The principal secretary to the Prime Minister is the administrative head of the Prime Minister's Office (PMO). The principal secretary is one of the most influential post and rank in the Indian civil services. He is the senior most bureaucrat and generally from the Indian Administrative Service. Pramod Kumar Misra is the present principal secretary to the Prime Minister of India. The principal secretary to the Prime Minister plays an important role and executes the following functions:- • He assists the Prime Minister in the performance of his all work including Political, Parliamentary and Public responsibilities. • He deals with all the important governmental files in the PMO according to the direction of Prime Minister. • As the administrative head of the Prime Minister's Office, he coordinates the activities of the different personnel in his office.

90 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 91 • If the Prime Minister hands over any type of work relating to different ministries and departments, he has to execute that work. • He prepares various notes for the Prime Minister to discuss with important dignitaries. 3.7 Conclusion As the actual head of the state of India, the Prime Minister has to fulfil a lot of responsibilities. In this regard, he is assisted by the Prime Minister's Office (PMO). The PMO is a staff of

the President is the nominal head of the state and the
the real executive of the state
under the Parliamentary system of government. The Council of Ministers with the Prime Minister is responsible for their activities to the people of India through the parliament specially the lower house, Lok Sabha. So, the Council of Ministers has to fulfil its responsibilities and duties for the welfare of the people.

But, the ministers cannot fulfil alone these responsibilities and they need assistance. Therefore, for administrative convenience, the Central Government of India is divided into Ministries and Departments. The Ministries and Departments both constitute the 'Central Secretariat
92 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 93 of India'. In other words, the Central Secretariat is a combination of all ministries and departments of the Central Government. The secretariat is a staff agency. In the beginning, it was the office of the Governor General of India.The word 'Secretariat' literally means the office of the Secretaries.

But there is no mention about the word 'Secretariat' in our Constitution. In article 77(3) of the Constitution of India has been said that the President shall make rules for the more convenient transaction of the business of the Government of India, and for the allocation among Ministers of the said business. The Central Secretariat is required for the more convenient transaction of the

In fact, the Central Secretariat assists Ministers of the Central Government of India to fulfil their responsibilities and duties. At present, the ministers/departments of the Central Government are governed by the Government of India (Allocation of Business) Rules, 1961.

It has a long past. British Government initially in 1756 established the post of a President and Council at Fort Willium, to transact their administrative work. Actually at the initial stage British Government formed one general department with the help of a Secretary and a few member for doing their purpose. The main instruction was coming to India from Englan as a "Pakage". The Secretary laid those instruction before the Council for their instruction to execute the "Pakage". Council used to issue instruction and conveyed them to different department. The department with their given authority execute them. Later Lord Cornwallis and Lord Wellesley first staryed to think on organizing the Secretariat. In the year 1919 Montague Chelmsford made a radical rform in the functioning process. They made division of functions and alotted them between Central and Provincial government. From that time onward the functions and responsibility of Secretariat began to change from a policy formulating, supervising and coordinative agency to that of an executive agency. 4.2

Organizational Structure of the Secretariat Ther is no special terminology to describe the various segment of the Administrative structure of the Central Government. Generally we call, there is a Central Secretariat, which is a collection of various Ministries and their departments. The Central Government functions with the help of this Central Secretariat. It indicates that the Central Government acts through this Secretariat. Central Secretariat in a sense a nodal agency for administrative functioning of the Central Government. Secretariat

But the Cabinet Secretariat, which is a Ministry comprising more than one Department, is still known as the Secretariat.

The Secretary is the administrative head of a ministry/department and he also the chief advisor to the Minister.

He represents his ministry/department before the committees of parliament. So, he takes an important role in his ministry/ department. According to Gopalaswami Ayyangar, "A secretary should not be immersed in files and burdened with routine. It is essential that he should have time to grasp the overall picture, size up problems facing Government in the field allotted to his charge, and think and plan ahead. All these are his proper functions and must be efficiently performed. Failure to make adequate provision in this respect cannot be compensated by mere increase in the establishment under the control." (

B) Additional/Joint Secretary: Every department is divided into wings headed by Additional Secretary or Joint Secretary. Where the ministry/ department is too large, the Secretary may be assisted by a Joint Secretary or Additional Secretary. An Additional Secretary may acts as the in charge of either a department or a wing. On the other hand, a Joint Secretary is always in charge of a wing of a department.

But there is no difference between the functions of a Joint Secretary and Additional Secretary while they work in the wing of a department. Sir Richard Tottenham had warned:

in the Section. An Assistant generally works according to the orders of the Section Officer and his main function is to collect the precedents, examine relevant rules and orders on the case and make suggestions for sending to Section Officer. The function of the Upper Division Clerk is to handle simple cases and assists in their disposal. On the other hand, the Lower Division Clerk performs purely routine duties such as collection of previous papers, files maintenance, despatching mails etc. One more thing we should remind in this regard that the recruitment of Lower Division Clerk post has been taken directly by competitive examinations organised by Staff Selection Commission since 1976. The post of the Upper Division Clerk is recruited by promotion from Lower Division Clerks. The posts of the Section Officer and Assistant Section Officer are appointed partly by competitive examinations and partly by promotion. 4.3 Tenure System In the tenure system, the officers of higher post in the Central Secretariat are filled from the states (and also from certain Central services) for a definite period and after serving their 'tenure', they have to revert back to their respective states or services. According to S. R. Maheshwari, "The superior positions in the secretariat are manned by officers who come from the states (and also from certain central Services) for a specified period and who after serving their 'tenure' would (or, should) revert to 98 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 99 their respective states or services. In official parlance, this arrangement is known as the tenure system." This system was introduced in India in 1905 the then Governor General of India Lord Curzon. He is regarded as 'the father of the tenure system'. According to this system, every official has to work in the Central Secretariat for a specified period

in accordance with their grade. Such as: a. Secretary and Joint-Secretary 5 Years b. Deputy Secretary 4 Years c. Under secretary 3 Years There are lots of debates about this Tenure System in the Indian Administration. Even this system is not as strong as it was before the independence of India. The arguments both in favour and against of this system are described below: (A) Arguments in favour of the Tenure System : • It strengthens the Indian federal polity by a regular rotation system of the services of civil servants between the Central government and States governments. • The tenure system benefits the states also. It provides the State governments officers having a wide range of experience and familiar with national approach to problems. • The tenure system coordinates the both administrations the central government and the states governments. Thus, it strengthens the administrative unity of the entire country. • It strengthens the independence of the civil service. • In the tenure system, every civil servant works in the central secretariat for a specified period and after serving their 'tenure', they have to revert back to their respective states or services. As a result, they do not feel monotony in their service. • It provides equal opportunities to all the civil servants. Because no civil servant can stay in the Central Secretariat for life time, according to this system,

every official has to work in the Central Secretariat for a specified period

in accordance with their grade. (B) Arguments against the Tenure System : • The tenure system does not ensure specialization in the administration. But now-a-days the specialised civil servant is required in different ministries.

98 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 99 • In the tenure system every civil servant has to work under both governments central and states. But in fact, the experience of district administration does not really help in the Central administration. • This tenure system has strengthened the Office at the expense of the officer. A new officer depends too much on the office. As a result, the 'office-dominated administration' is created. • The tenure system was used when India had a unitary administration under the British colonial rule. Now India is a federal state. So, it is said that the tenure system is not so important in the Indian administration like before. As said by Avasthi and Avasthi, "The tenure system does not fit quite well in a federal polity with autonomous states. Amateur ministers at both, the Central and the state levels need services of permanent advisors in the Secretariat; mere 'birds of passage' will not do." Now-a-days it is seen that the tenure system does not apply to all the departments of the governments due to the requirement of specialized officers. The departments like the Indian Audit Accounts, Posts and Telegraphs, Foreign Services etc mostly depend on their own specialized officers. But it is also true that the tenure system has also some significance in the administration. Keeping this significance the tenure system still remains a part of the staffing pattern of the Central Secretariat. 4.4 Conclusion Secretariat is an apolitical part of the Indian administration. The word 'Secretariat' literally means the office of the Secretaries. The Central Secretariat assists Ministers of the Central Government of India to fulfil their responsibilities and duties The Ministries and Departments both constitute the 'Central Secretariat of India'. In other words, the Central Secretariat is a combination of all ministries and departments of the Central Government. A ministry may have some departments. A department is an organizational unit of Ministry headed by a Secretary or Additional Secretary or Special Secretary. Every department is divided into wings headed by Additional Secretary or Joint Secretary. Every wing also is divided into divisions. Director or Deputy Secretary is the head of a division. Division is divided into branches headed by Under Secretary. A branch is also divided into Sections. It is the lowest and smallest organisational unit of ministry/department. Section Officer is the head of a section.

with the dawn of her independence, formed a Coucil of Minister headed by the Prime Minister. Immediately the Governing system required the secretarial service to the Council of Minister. But there was acute shortage of Administrative ofiicers. Because most of ICS left India for U.K. So India had initially no other way but to combine the Council with Prime Minister's Secretariat. But soon it was seperated and a new Cabinet Secretariat was formed. Mr. N.R. Pillai first took the charge of Cabinet Secretary. Mr Pillai for taking a first hand knowledge about the functioning of Cabinet Secretary, gave a visit to London, and reached to the opinion that the British pattern of organization, with suitable modification could be adopted in India. In 1948

Cabinet Secretary to secure relevant data from different Ministrial department set up another unit called Economic and Statiscal Unit for coordination. Until 1950, the Cabinet Secretary used to handle the issues relating with the developmental scheme of the Country. Finally after formation of Planning Commssion the Cabinet Secretay transferred the work of Developmental Planning to the Planning Commission. Again in August 1970 in pursuance with the recommendation made by the First Administrative Reform Commission, the Department of Personnel was set up in the Cabinet Secretariat. But later in 1977 Department of Personnel and Administrative Reform was taken away from the Cabinet Secretariat, and placed its link with the Ministry of Home Affairs. Later again this Department of Personnel placed seperately with independent status as Department of Personnel Public Grievances and Pension under the Prime Minister and Minister of State. In the process of reorientation and restructuring the Cabinet Secretariat, the National Authority for Chemical Weapon Convention (NACWC) in 1997 and the Performance Management Division, in 2009 have included with the Cabinet Secretariat. Reorhanization has thus been the Character of Cabinet Secretariat evern since its inception. In a parliamentary form of government like India,

the
is the real executive head of the state. The Council of Ministers are responsible for their entire activities regarding administration to the people of India through the parliament. So, some specialized and experienced administrators are required to assist the council of ministers to execute their responsibilities and duties. For this reason, the Central Secretariat has been established to help the

it.

In this unit, at first we will discuss about the Cabinet Secretariat and then Central Secretariat. 5.2 Meaning of the Cabinet Secretariat The Cabinet Secretariat is the most important administrative agency for the assistance to the Union Cabinet of India in their works. The business allocated to Cabinet Secretariat under Government of India (Allocation of Business) Rules, 1961 includes (i) Secretarial assistance to the Cabinet and Cabinet Committees; and (ii) Rules of Business. We all know that, now-a-days

the Cabinet headed by the Prime Minister is the actual executive authority of the state of India

instead of the Council of Ministers. So, the cabinet has to fulfil a lot of responsibilities and duties for the entire administration of the Government of India. In this regard, the Cabinet Secretariat assists the Cabinet headed by the Prime Minister. The Cabinet Secretariat works under the direction and leadership of the Prime Minister of India. It takes a crucial role in the process of policy making of the Union Government. The Cabinet Secretariat

the Cabinet Secretariat took birth in 1947 by replacing the Secretariat of the Governor-General's Executive Council. 5.3 Composition of the Cabinet Secretariat

The Cabinet Secretariat is one of the most important administrative organs of the Union Government of India. At present, the Cabinet Secretariat consists of three wings:- (i) Civil Wing: it is the most important wing of the Cabinet Secretariat. The main functions of this wing are to provide aid, advice and assistance to the Union Cabinet. (ii) Military Wing: It also takes an important role in the Cabinet Secretariat. It assists the activities of the defence related committees, such as – Defence Committee of the Cabinet, the Military Affairs Committee, the National Defence Council etc. (iii) Intelligence Wing: It deals with matters relating to the Joint Intelligence Committee of the Union Cabinet. 104

NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 105 Apart from the above mentioned main Wings, the Cabinet Secretariat has some more organizations, such as – a. National Authority for Chemical Weapons Convention, b. Research and Analysis Wing (RAW), c. Special Protection Group, d. Joint Intelligence Committee, e. Aviation Research Centre, f. Special Frontier Force, g. Directorate of public Grievances. 5.4 Role and Functions of the Cabinet Secretariat The Prime function of the Cabinet Secretariat is to provide secretarial assistence to the Ministers of the Cabinet and in performing their responsibility as a member of various committees. Its role related with preparation of Agenda for meeting of the Cabinet, providing information for easy discussion in the Cabinet, keeping records of the proceedings, and circulation of memoranda on those issues which are waiting for Cabinet decision.The Cabinet Secretariat takes an important role in the Central Administration under the direction and leadership of the Prime Minister of India.

This Secretariat provides Secretarial assistance to the Cabinet and its Committees, and also assists in decision-making in Government. Apart from these formal role of the Cabinet Secretariat, the Cabinet Secretariat play a vital role as coordinating agency of Government of India. First of all, it assits the Minister in the process of decision making by ensuring the coordination among inter-ministrerial coordination, with the primary aim of evolving consensus through the instrumentality of the standing/ ad-hoc Committee of the Secrearіat. Sometimes the inter-ministerial differences or problem thrashed out during the meeting of the committees of the Secretariat. These COS (committees of Secretariat) are mainly formed for discussing any specific important matter of national importance. Here proposals from various Secretaries come to the Government. The meeting of Committee Of Secretaries are held under the chairmanship of Cabinet Secretary. Here principa Departments are asked to present their observation in writing. Departments naturally discuss and give emphasis on different point of views which they count as important for the success of the purpose. The primary effort in the Committee meeting is given on the adoption of unanimous decisions. It assure that the matter which will 106 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 107 raise in the Cabinet meeting, would be backed by a coherent and particular reporting. This naturally help inter-ministerial discussion on any important issue. But in any case if it is found that any two or more ministers are not complying with the report submitted by the COS, then matter is placed as an agenda before the Cabinet for taking final decision. Some important functions of the Cabinet Secretariat are given below : a. The Cabinet Secretariat prepares Cabinet agenda for its meetings and provides required information and material for the consideration of the Cabinet. b. It can Convene

The administrative head of the Secretariat is the Cabinet Secretary who is also the ex- officio Chairman of the Civil Services Board.

He is the senior most civil servant in India. This post was created in India in 1950 instead of the Secretary to the Governor- General's Executive Council. The first Cabinet Secretary was N. R. Pillai and Shri Rajiv Gauba is the present Cabinet Secretary of India. For better understanding of role and the importance of Cabinet Secretary in Indian Administration, one should remember that Cabinet Secretary is seniormost Officer in Indian Administration. A few words regarding his quality may be added from the description given by R. Dwarkada in his book, Role of Higher Civil Service (Bombay : Popular 1958) :
108 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 109 • "He (the Cabinet Secretary) should be an administrative officer of the highest rank, selected for the office for his special qualities of tack, energy, initiative, and efficiency, and he should be entrusted as head of the Cabinet Secretariat with the positive function of securing coordination as well as timely and effective action by all departments of the Government of India in all matters in which the Cabinet as a whole or the Prime Minister is interested.

He should be a person commanding the respect and confidence of all ranks of the permanent services." (p.41) The Cabinet Secretary is the chief coordinator of the central administration.

He acts as a link between the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) and various administrative agencies.

Above all, he acts as a link between the civil service and the political system. S. S. Khera, a former Cabinet Secretary told about the role of a Cabinet Secretary in his book, 'The Central Executive' (New Delhi: Orient Longman, 1975) that, • " he keeps a close touch with other secretaries in charge of different

Ministries and departments. In this regard S.S. Khare described his role, in his afore stated book that: • "In a rather general and loose way, he keeps an eye upon the smooth working of the system of communication and consultation amongst the ministers and department of the Central Government. He does not have a supervisory function over any of the ministers or departments." Thus it is normally expected that the Cabinet Secretary will act as a leader of the Cabinet Secretariat. It is his natural responsibility to put up the morale of the Civil Servant high and professional. He acts as a buffer between politicians and Administrative officers, and always his primary attempt is to protect the interest of Civil Servants in any conflicting situation with the Ministers. S.S. Khare in his Book The Central Executive again described the senario in the following manner:

108 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 109 • "From account of his relationship with the permanent officials, it would appear hat

of the Central Secretariat The Central Secretariat is a total form of all ministers and departments of the Central Government.

The ministers and departments are politically headed by the ministers and the Secretaries are the administrative head of the ministers and departments. It is the highest office of the Central Government. It occupies a crucial role in Indian administration. • The Central Secretariat assists the Ministers in the policy making process of the Central Government. The Secretariat provides different data and information to the Ministers and the Ministers make policies with the help of this data. • It also assists the Ministers in their legislative work to frame rules and regulations. The Secretariat makes legislative drafts for the Ministers to be introduced in the Parliament. • It helps the Central Ministers in the financial management and budgeting. • The Central Secretariat takes an important role as the main channel of communication between the government and other concerned agencies, such as - NITI Aayog (National Institution for Transforming India), Finance Commission etc. It also keeps contact with the State Government. • It can help to evaluate the work done by executive departments or agencies. •

The Central Secretariat acts as a think tank of the Central Government by providing authentic information in respect of governmental policies and activities.
So, the Central Secretariat is an essential organ of the Central Government. As a student of Political Science we can end this discussion by echoing the statement of the first Administrative Reforms Commission: • "It has lent balance, consistency and continuity to the administration, and serves as a nucleus for the total machinery of ministry. It has facilitated 110 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 111 inter-ministry coordination and accountability to the Parliament at the ministerial level. As an institutionalized system, it is indispensable for the proper functioning of the Government."

A common believe among the civilian and general people that the quality of leadership are tested, during the tenure of Cabinet secretaryship. Perhaps for this the final posting of Cabnet Secretaryship, is a dream posting for any IAS. Here a professional Bureaucrat can unravels his quality and capacity to his optimum level of skill. It si no wonder, that inner character and intrinsic personality of a Cabinet Secretary are reflected through the dream he sees and Cabiney Secretary, quality of influencing other as leader and also his gapacity to become a successful motivator. It is almost compulsory for a Cabinet Secretary to attain all the meetings of the cabinet. Very rare, any Seniormost member of the Cabinet Secretariat, takes his place in the meeting. Cahinet Secretary takes the detail notes on the Proceedings of the meeting, and finally draws up the minutes containing the resolution of decision of the Meeting. After the Cabinet decisions are taken, it is the duty of the Cabinet Secretary, to make planning for its proper implementations. Cabinet Secreatary also maintains a good and constant relation with the Prime Minister. Although the Prime Minster maintains a seperate office under his control, even then the prime Minister also tries to keep close eye on the functions and decisions of the Cabinet Secretariat. Because Constitutionally Cabiney Secretary is also placed under his control. To make this bridye between Cabinet Secretary and Prime Minister, an additional committee has been formed, called "Committee of Secretaries on Administration". The Cabinet Secreatary also acts as a chairman in this Committee. Through this committee Cabinet Secretary can get information required for any state and transmit it to the Prime Minister, when require. S.S. Khera in his book "Central Executinve", elaborated the matter in the folwoing way: " of the Home Ministry. 1.1 Introduction The inception of the Home Ministry may be traced back to 1843, when the Secretary of the “Supreme Government” was seperated from the Government of Bengal. The Home Department was then formed with a Secretary. The Department further was divided into six branches : (a) General Branch; (b) Revenue Branch; (c) Marine Branch; (d) Judicial Branch; (e) Legislative Branch; and (f) Ecclesiastical Branch. The newly formed department was not a residuary part of any other department. It did not have any legatee in the Government. So naturally the department 116 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 117 did not belong to any other department which was inhered in Home Department. The department was mainly made to perform various heterogenous responsibility. The number of those responsibility was not only heterogenous, but also numerous. Ascertain list of its responsibility includes 'personal matters' in law and order including 'political matter'; 'jail'; 'polish' ; 'factories' ; 'explosive'; 'petrolium'; 'education'; 'public health' ; 'hospitals' ; 'municipality', etc. Gradually when importance of any of the specific field of responsibility increased, new department began to form, keeping its relation with Home Department as a part of administrative hive. First of such incident happened in 1855 when a separate 'Public Works Department' was created. Later in 1970, independent Indian Government set up 'Department of Personnel'. This took upon a good number of responsibility from Home Department. Further in 1973 functions and responsibilitiess of Departmental Adminstration was admixed with the Department of Personnel in the Cabinet Secretariat. This was done mainly on the basis of the recommendation of Administrative Reform Committee, set up in 1964. However, even this bifurcation, still the Ministry of Home Affairs are called "Mother Ministry" in the Indian Parliament. 1.2 Ministry of Home Affairs : The Evolution

The Ministry of Home Affairs has always been in the nature of mother ministry in the Government of India.

It has attained unique prestige among the other ministries as it holds pivotal position in the administration of the country. The Ministry of Home Affairs enjoys key position and is considered 'sanctum sanctorum' of the Government of India. However, it no longer is the envy of the top civil services as they are more allured by the ministries dealing with economic affairs. The ministry has lost a few of its functions during the past years. For instance a separate ministry to deal with personnel, public grievances and pension was created. Likewise in 1985 the welfare of scheduled castes and scheduled tribes was entrusted to

Ministry of Welfare. The Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA) has multifarious responsibilities, important among them being internal security, management of para-military forces, border management, Centre-State relations, administration of Union territories, disaster management, etc. Though in terms of Entries 1 and 2 of List II – 'State List' – in the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution of India, 'public order' and 'police' are the responsibilities of States, Article 355 of the Constitution enjoins

the Union to protect every State against external aggression and internal disturbance and to ensure that the government of every State is carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. In pursuance of these obligations, the Ministry of Home Affairs extends manpower and financial support, guidance and expertise to the State Governments for maintenance of security, peace and harmony without encroaching upon the constitutional rights of the States. 1.3

(24) The deal with the terrorists menace who constitute potential danger to our security. Evidently the functions of the Home Ministry are enormous and clearly indicate its pivotal position in the country. As per Second Schedule of Allocation of Business Rules, Ministry of Home Affairs is mandated to look after the matters relating to loss of human life and property due to all natural and man-made calamities, other than drought or epidemics. The Disaster Management (DM) Division is the nodal division in Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA) for disaster management. Government of India enacted the Disaster Management Act 2005, which provided a legal and institutional framework at national, state and district levels for the creation of specialized disasters management institutions. In pursuance of the Act, the Ministry created national level institutions like National Institute of Disaster Management (NIDM), National Disaster Management Authority (NDMA), National Disaster Response Force (NDRF) and National Executive Committee (NEC) in 2006.
124 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 125 1.5 Conclusion The Ministry of Home Affairs is one of the key ministries in the administrative set up of Government of India. The organizational structure of this ministry is very vast and complex as per the requirements of the ambit of its functional sphere which range from broad internal security of the entire country to specific state wise requirements of dealing with sub-national ethnic groups. The Ministry of Home Affairs is the nodal ministry dealing with the security, safety and well-being of all the citizen of the country. 1.6 Summary • The Ministry of Home Affairs enjoys a special respect traditionally. In 1810 the Supreme Government of India first set up a separate Department. Although till 1864 it did not 128 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 129 have any permanent full time Secretary. In 1863 the post of Joint-Secretary of the Supreme Government was abolished. With the abolishion of the post of Joint Secretary, the Government of Bengal was also abolished. After that the Finance Department came under the direct supervision of a newly framed Secretariat. After Independence in 1947, the Indian Government continued with the Finance Department, only changing its denomination as Ministry of Finance. India Government at the time of reorganizing the Ministry of Finance, included three wings with it : (1) Expenditure; (2) Economic Affairs; (3) Revenue. Again in 1949, Ministry of Finance was reorganized. Two specific Departments were made : (1) Department of Revenue; (2) Department of Economic Affairs.

Again in 2000, a new Departmental reorientation was made. Three Departments were made in Finance Ministry: (1) Deoartment of Economic Affairs; (2) Department of Revenue; (3) Department of Expenditure. These three departments were put under three different full-fledged Secretary. Of them one was empowered to look after and coordinate among the functions of three Departments. He was given the status of 'first among the equals'. And that status was given to the Secretary of the Department of Economic Affairs. For some obvious reasons, the Ministry Finance claims an important status in Central or State Cabinet of Ministers. The Halden Committee in 1918 observed that the Finance Ministry should have a vital position among other Ministries and Department. India Governemnt since 1947 fully show her compliance with the observation made by the Halden Committee in 1918. 2.2 Ministry of Finance : The Evolution The origin of the Finance Ministry in India goes back to the year 1810 when a separate Finance Department was created out of the Public Department. But a separate Secretary for the Finance Department was appointed only in 1843. From 1810 to 1816 it remained under the charge of the Secretary of Public Department, from 1816 to 1830 under the Secretary of the Territorial Department, and from 1830 to 1843 under the Secretary of the General Department. In 1879 the Finance Department was re-designated as the Department of Finance and Commerce which designation continued up to 1905 when it was renamed as the Department of Finance. With the constitutional changes brought about by the Government of India Act, 1919, the Finance Department was organised into seven Branches, viz., General Finance, Revenue, Currency and Banking, Salaries and Allowances, Civil Accounts, Army Finance and Military Accounts. The Auditor-General was assigned a statutory status. Though the Finance Department was given a measure of control over the Indian 128 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 129 finances, yet the Secretary of State for India had full power to exercise control over the entire revenue and expenditure of the Government of India. He was assisted at the India Office by a full-fledged Finance Department. The Haldane Committee (1918) has very well explained the pivotal position of the finance ministry vis-a-vis other state departments in the words, "The Department of Finance must necessarily have an exceptional position among all the State Departments. The service which it has to perform- that of supervising and controlling all operations of Government in so far as they affect the financial position... involves not only the direct administration of taxation and other branches of revenue but also the control of all forms of expenditure." The Government of India Act, 1935, did not relax the control of the Secretary of State over Indian financial matters. The Act also increased the powers of the provincial governments. The powers of the Finance Depart-ment were greatly restricted. On the attainment of Independence, the office of the Secretary of State for India was abolished. In 1947 the Department of

Finance was now designated as the Ministry of Finance. It was organised into three wings, viz., Expenditure, Economic Affairs and Revenue. In 1949 it was organised into two Departments of Revenue and Expenditure and of Economic Affairs. In 1955 it was reorganized into four Departments: (i) Department of Economic Affairs. (ii) Department of Revenue; (

iii) Department of Expenditure; (
iv) Department of Company Law Administration. In September, 1963, a new Department of Co-ordination was added to the Finance Ministry. In November, 1964, the Department of Company Affairs and Insurance was set up which took over the work relating to 'Company Law Administration'. In January, 1966, the Department of Company Affairs and Insurance was abolished. In June, 1967, the Department of Coordination was abolished. Now there remained only three Departments under the Ministry of Finance, viz., the Department of Revenue and Insurance, Department of Expenditure and the Department of Economic Affairs. In August, 1969, a Department of Banking was added in the Ministry of Finance. 2.3 Ministry of Finance : The Organizational Structure The Ministry of Finance is under the charge of a Minister

Functions The Ministry of Finance is responsible for the following functions: • The administration of the finances of the Central Government and dealing with financial matters affecting the country as a whole like inflation and recession. • Raising the necessary revenues for carrying on the administration and regulating the taxation and borrowing policies of the Government. • The administration of problems relating to banking and currency, and in consultation with the Ministries concerned arranging for the proper utilization of the country's foreign exchange resources. • Controlling the entire expenditure of the Government in co-operation with the Administrative Ministries and departments concerned. These functions of the Finance Ministry reveal that it is a very powerful organ of the Government of India. Hence its political head happens to be a senior minister in the govern-ment who is known for unimpeachable integrity and maintenance of financial meticulousness. The Department of Economic Affairs is the nodal agency of the Union Government to formulate and monitor country's economic policies and programmes having a bearing on domestic and international aspects of economic management. A principal responsibility of this Department is the preparation and presentation of the Union Budget to the parliament and budget for the state Governments under President's Rule and union territory administrations. Other main functions include:
136 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 137 The Department of Expenditure is the nodal Department for overseeing the public financial management system (PFMS) in the Central Government and matters connected with the finances. The principal activities of the Department include pre-sanction appraisal of major schemes/projects (both Plan and non-Plan expenditure), handling the bulk of the Central budgetary resources transferred to States, implementation of the recommendations of the Finance and Central Pay Commissions, overseeing the expenditure management in the Central Ministries/ Departments through the interface with the Financial Advisors and the administration of the Financial Rules / Regulations /Orders through monitoring of Audit comments/ observations, preparation of Central Government Accounts, managing the financial aspects of personnel management in the Central Government, assisting Central Ministries/Departments in controlling the costs and prices of public services, assisting organisational re-engineering through review of staffing patterns and O&M studies and reviewing systems and procedures to optimize outputs and outcomes of public expenditure. The Department is also coordinating matters concerning the Ministry of Finance including Parliament-related work of the Ministry. The Department has under its administrative control the National Institute of Financial Management (NIFM), Faridabad. The Foreign Investment Promotion Board (FIPB), housed in the Department of Economic Affairs, Ministry of Finance, was an inter-ministerial body, responsible for processing of FDI proposals and making recommendations for Government approval. FIPB is now abolished as announced by Finance Minister Arun Jaitley during 2017- 2018 budget speech in Lok Sabha. The Department of Revenue functions under the overall direction and control of the Secretary (Revenue). It exercises control in respect of matters relating to all the Direct and Indirect Union Taxes through two statutory Boards namely, the Central Board of Direct Taxes (

CBDT) and the Central Board of Indirect Taxes and Customs (CBIC). Each Board is headed by a Chairman who is also ex officio Special Secretary to the Government of India (Secretary level). Matters relating to the levy and collection of all Direct taxes are looked after by the CBDT whereas those relating to levy and collection of Customs and Central Excise duties and other Indirect taxes fall within the purview of the CBIC. The two Boards were constituted under the Central Board of Revenue Act, 1963. At present, the CBDT has six Members and the CBIC has five Members. The Members are also ex officio Secretaries to the Government of India. Members of CBDT are as follows:
136 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 137 1. Member (Income Tax) 2. Member (Legislation and Computerisation) 3. Member (Revenue) 4. Member (Personnel & Vigilance) 5. Member (Investigation) 6. Member (Audit & Judicial) 7. The Department of Financial Services covers Banks, Insurance and Financial Services provided by various government agencies and private corporations. It also covers pension reforms and Industrial Finance and Micro, Small and Medium Enterprise. It started the Pradhan Mantri Jan Dhan Yojana. 8. PFRDA, Pension Fund Regulatory and Development Authority (PFRDA) is a statutory body which also works under this department The Department of Disinvestment has been renamed as Department of Investment and Public Asset Management or 'DIPAM', a decision aimed at the proper management of Centre's investments in equity including its disinvestment in central public sector undertakings. Finance Minister Arun Jaitley had announced the renaming of the Department of Disinvestment in his budget speech for 2016-17. Initially set up as an independent ministry (The Ministry of Disinvestment) in December 1999, the Department of Disinvestments came into existence in May 2004 when the ministry was turned into a department of the Ministry of Finance. The department took up all the functions of the erstwhile ministry which broadly was responsible for a systematic policy approach to disinvestment and privatisation of Public Sector Units. The institution of Financial Adviser holds an unique position in the functioning of Government of India. The role of Financial Adviser is now akin to the Chief Financial Officer in a corporate structure with specific responsibilities for ensuring fiscal prudence and sound financial management. Budget formation, Outcome Budget, Performance Budget, Fiscal Responsibility and Budget Management related tasks, Expenditure and Cash Management, Project/programme formulation, appraisal, monitoring and evaluation, Screening of proposals, Leveraging of non-Budgetary Resources for Sectoral Development, Non-Tax Receipts, Tax Expenditure, Monitoring of Assets and Liabilities, Accounts and Audit, Procurement and Contacts, Financial Management Systems, Nominee Director on Board of Public Sector Undertaking, Use of Technology are the major tasks entrusted upon the Financial Adviser. In addition
138 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 139 they are also required to prepare Annual Finance Report. The scheme of Integrated Financial Adviser, the Financial Adviser will be responsible both to the administrative and financial ministry. 2.5 Conclusion The Ministry of Finance is the cornerstone of the economic development, direction of economic resource distribution and the prosperity of the country. The Ministry of Finance has a very complex organizational structure in tune with the broad range of functions it has to perform dealing with the nitty-gritty's of management of economy and economic services from the centre to the local level of Indian administrative set up. The Ministry of Finance is solely responsible for any new economic policies like demonetisation and its effects on Indian economy and society. 2.6 Summary • Finance Department is responsible for Financial Administration of both Central and State Government. • The primary function of Finance Ministry is to bear the responsibility economic and financial matter. • Finance Ministry works in a Federal Structure, where the financial affairs are maintained through decentralized structure. • Central Finance Ministry carries the responsibility of regulating the expenditure of the Central Government. • In reality Finance Ministry is a 'spending' unit, rather than a controlling unit of impure expenditure. 2.7 Glossary • Budget : Statement of yearly Expenditure and Income of the State • Revenue : The fund primarily created by the payment of Indirect taxes. • PFMS : Public Finance Management System. • Grants : Financial assistence given by the Central Government to the State Government. • CBIT : Central Board of Income Tax' • CBIC : Central Board of Indirect Taxes and custom.

Thus the emergence of this department or Ministry or part of Government, is as old as the first initiation of the issue of Governance in the history. Traditional practice of all Governments are to maintain the portfolio, more or less secretly to other foreign governments. But the soverreignty of any country largely depends on the successful performance of the Ministry and its department. So the Minister carries a special position in the Cabinet and also to other members of the Parliament. The main function of this department is to play the key role in

140 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 141 maintaining relation with foreign countries. This generally conducted secretly or unilaterally with any particular State or bilaterally or multilaterraly with more than one or two countries, or number of countries. The technique of maintaining relation depends primarily upon the national interest. The second consideration is determined on the basis of global situation. During the regime of East India Company, this part used to act as a secret department of the 'Supreme Government'. In 1783 the Foreign Department was first set up to take up this function. India after her independence in 1947, the debut of this Ministry happened. Prior to 1947, there were two departments: the External Affair Department and the Commonwealth Relation Department. After independence, these two departments merged to form a new Department. The name of that Department became 'Department of External Affairs and Commonwealth Relation'. Later in 1949, appendage portion: "Commonwealth Relation" was dropped, and it got a new nomenclature : External Affairs". 3.2 Ministry of External Affairs : Evolution Ministry of External Affairs (MEA) is the primary institution of Foreign Policy Decision Making in India. It is one of the oldest and important departments of Government and primarily responsible to look after the matters related to external affairs of the country. Since its formation, it has been successfully dealing with spectrum of activities related to foreign affairs of India. Though a variety of agencies and actors have been involved in Foreign Policy decision making process, it is the MEA which takes the final call on any of the issues and determine the course of Foreign Policy officially. Besides decision making, the Ministry of External affairs also plays a significant role in information gathering, processing and analyzing through its foreign missions for effective policy making. The ministry issues passports, gives consular services to Indian citizens visiting abroad and ensures their safety and security. It is also responsible for the issuance of visas to foreign tourists visiting India. Above all, the ministry plays a larger role in the planning and formulation of Indian's foreign policy. The ministry manages and coordinates the efforts of other stake holder of foreignpolicy decision making and channelizes their efforts to materialise India's foreign policy objects. The present Ministry of External Affairs, at its earlier form was established by the British East India Company on the year 1783 to handle the company's emerging foreign relations with South Asia, Southeast Asia and Frontier Nations

142 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 143 (Persia, Afghanistan and Tibet). Until 1833, the agency was handling both Internal and external administration of these nations for the East India Company. However, the Charter Act of 1833 has segregated the internal and external matters for the first time by setting up four different departments under the Secretariat of the Government of India. Following the act, a separate 'Foreign Department' has been established and three different branches namely, Political, Foreign and Secret Branch have been attached to it. In the year 1859, when the portfolio system was introduced, the members of Executive Council of the Governor General of India were authorized to lead these departments. Since the Foreign Department is considered very important, it remains under the supervision of the Governor General himself. Following the administrative reforms in 1914, the Secret Branch' was taken away from the Foreign Department' and the department was renamed as Foreign and Political Department'. The new department had two branches, the Political Branch' and the Foreign Branch' headed by two separate secretaries. While the Political Branch was assigned to look after the matter related to Princely States and other such administrative areas outside British India, the Foreign Branch was put in charge to deal with the issues arising from the frontiers States. The expansion of the British Frontiers and the increasing administrative burden forced the British India Government to separate the two branches. As a result, the parental department was dismantled in the year 1937and two different departments namely, Political Department and the External Affairs Department'were created. Though the new department was created to oversee all matters of foreign affairs, some of the related subjects remained outside its preview. The matter of Overseas Indians Affair for instance, was first attached to the Education Department' and later placed under the Composite Department of Education, Health and Lands'. Subsequently, the Division of Overseas Indians was transformed into a new department called Commonwealth Relations Department and assigned with additional task to manage British India's external relations with Burma (the present Myanmar), Ceylon (Sri Lanka) and Malaysia, as well as to handle British High Commission at South Africa and Australia. Similarly, the Indian High Commission at London was brought under the control of Department of Commerce andauthorized to deal with the matters related to India's international trade. Until 1947, India's foreign relations were taken care by the two corresponding departments: Department of External Affairs and Departments of Common wealth Relations. While the former was authorized to take care of India's overall external relations, the latter was set up to manage India's relations with Commonwealth Countries. This parallel system of 142 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 143 external relations was creating unnecessary confusion and quarrels among the policy makers and caused unnecessary bureaucratic delay in the planning and execution of foreign policy. Hence, the two departments were merged together in the year 1947 and renamed as Department of External Affairs and Commonwealth Relations'. In 1948, the External Publicity Division'was taken away from the Ministry of Information and Broadcasting (MIB) and attached with the Ministry of External Affairs for optimum result. The ministry was again renamed as Ministry of External Affairs by dropping the appendage Commonwealth Relations. Since then the ministry has never undergone under any major structural change, though some new divisions have been created with the expansion of its functions. 3.3 Ministry of External Affairs : Organizational Structure Being one of the important portfolios, the Ministry of External Affairs is led by one of the senior and experienced Cabinet Ministers along with one or two Ministers of State (MoS) or Deputy Ministers to assist him. Presently, the Ministry is headed by a Cabinet Minister besides two Ministers of State. As the supreme head of the ministry, Minister for External Affairs is authorized to conduct and coordinate all the works of the ministry, whereas, the junior ministers are put in charge to look after some administrative and divisional works. From independence to 1964, except a brief break in 1952, the Secretary General used to be the administrative head of the ministry. He happened to be the prime advisor to the Prime Minister Nehru, who was also leading the Ministry of External Affairs, in the decision making on foreign affairs. To assist him the foreign secretary and two other secretaries were appointed and assigned with different works. During Nehru period the Secretary General was the supreme authority of the administrative activities and all major administrative and policy making activities functioned under his command. In the year 1964 when Shastri became the Prime Minister, Sardar Swaran Singh was appointed as the full time Foreign Minister. With the appointment of full time Foreign Minister, the task of the policy making was transferred to the Foreign Minister and the burden of the Secretary General was drastically reduced. Therefore, the post was abolished and the Foreign Secretary was assigned to lead the administrative work of the ministry. Since then, the MEA continued to be led by Foreign Minister and Foreign secretary and the system is still in practice today. At Present 129, including Foreign Secretary, the ministry consists of eight secretaries namely, Secretary (East), Secretary (Special Assignment), Secretary (DPA & ER), Secretary (West), Special Secretary (Americas & CPV). Below the Secretaries, there are five Additional

The missions are led by Ambassadors and High Commissioners, who work under the control of Ministry of External Affairs. These missions are generally situated at the capital of the respective country and in most of the cases maintain several consulates at different parts of the country. The Consulate General normally heads the consulate supported by a large number of supporting staff. 3.4 Ministry of External Affairs : Functions With the emergence of India as one of the aspiring global power and transformation of Indian economy, the role and function of MEA has been multiplied gradually. To deal with these emerging challenges, the role and function of the ministry has undergone numerous changes to facilitate India's emerging role in the international sphere. Like any other foreign office, the prime function of MEA is to plan, formulate and manage India's external relations with other nations as well as protect and promote India's national interest at the global stage. Besides, the ministry is also responsible to setup and manage India's foreign missions and diplomatic institutions and extend consular activities to Indian and foreign nationals. Similarly, matters related to India's representatives at UN and other specialized agencies, Issues and cancellation passports and visas and protection of Indian nationals and institutions abode also come under the jurisdiction of MEA. The ministry receives reports from its foreign missions and gives the necessary inputs to the government during the Foreign Policy making. Since the attachment of External Publicity Division (XP) to the MEA, in 1948, the ministry also is responsible to publicise India's positive image among world communities. The detail functions of the MEA have been stated below: Planning and Formulation of Foreign Policy : Until 1663 there was no such dedicated foreign policy planning section in India under the Ministry of External Affairs. After the military disaster of 1962 war, the East Asia Research and Coordination Division was created in 1963 to conduct research and planning on China, which was later institutionalised as the Current Research Division in 1965.

146 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 147 Since then, the Policy Planning and Research Division (as it is called now) is engaged in planning and formulation of India's foreign and strategic policy. Managing India's External Relations : The prime and foremost duty of MEA is to manage India's External Relations with foreign States and international entity, such as United Nations, regional and international institutions and transnational actors. It selects and sends Indian representatives to these international entities to conduct India's external policy with the respective institutions and to report the political developments of the region. Besides, it also takes necessary steps to maintain good relations with States which have signed Special Treaty with India like Bhutan, and Nepal and handles the issues related to France and Portugal over their former colonies Pondicherry, Goa, Daman and Diu. Diplomatic and Consular Activities : The ministry is responsible to setup and manage India's foreign missions, posts and consulates abroad and appoints India's representatives to run these missions. Using these diplomatic channels it reaches out to foreign states and conveys India's positions and concerns on significant international events. Through these missions, it provides necessary information and guidance to Indian and foreign nationals. Likewise, all matters related to the power, privileges and functioning of Indian and foreign representatives, diplomats and U.N. Officials also come under the supervision of MEA. In case of necessity, the ministry can give or deny clearance to any non-scheduled chartered flights of foreign diplomats. Matters related to VISA, Immigration and Pilgrims : Besides managing India's external relations, MEA is also responsible for the issuance and cancelation of Passports to the Indian nationals and granting visas and travel documents to the foreign visitors. Apart from immigration, the MEA facilitates travel arrangements for traders and pilgrims from India to holly places outside India such as, Tibet and Pakistan and vice versa. The Ministry manages the administration of Port Haj Committee Act, 1959 and the Indian Pilgrim Ship Rules, 1933,

Management of India's Foreign Assistance Programme : Economic aid and foreign developmental assistance has been the important tool of foreign policy. Despite being a developing country, India has been running a foreign aid programme since 1960s and its aid budget has been continuously increasing since the economic reforms period that started in 1991.. In addition, grants of Scholarship to foreign students, excluding scholarship to Non-Resident Indians NRIs) and Political pensions paid to foreign refugees and descendants of those who rendered services abroad also come under the functions of MEA.

148 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 149 Matters of Detention and Extradition : The trend of international crime has been constantly upward since the rise of globalization. Often, criminals migrate to other countries to escape from the legal action and prosecution. Being situated in the present epicentre of terrorism, India is one of the uncommon victims of international crimes such as terrorism. To curb the menace of transnational crime, the Ministry of External Affairs has been authorized to initiate the diplomatic negotiations with other states for the Detention and Extradition of criminals and accused persons from India to foreign and Commonwealth countries and vice versa. The ministry also deals with the general administration of the Extradition Act, 1962 and handles matters related to preventive detention in India for reasons of States connected with External and Commonwealth affairs. Matter Related to United Nations : The coordination and implementation of all matter related to United Nations, Specialized Agencies and other International Organisations is also one of the primary responsibilities of Ministry of External Affairs. It sends the Indian representatives to the UN and to the specialized agencies and presents India's voice at the international forum. It also takes steps to Implement the reporting obligations, in coordination with the concerned Ministries, required under the United Nations and international conventions, to which India is a State party, including the protection of Human Rights. Matter Related to Indian Foreign Services : Being the primary institution for conducting Foreign Policy, the Ministry of ExternalAffairs is also responsible to manage all matter related to Indian Foreign Service (IFS) including Indian Foreign Service Board. It also deals with issues associated with theappointment and regulation of diplomats and other foreign officers working under the ministry and the management of Foreign Service Training Institute (FPI). External Publicity and Cultural Activities : External publicity has been one of the important elements contemporary to international politics. Looking at the importance of the External Publicity, the External Publicity (XP) Division was set up and subsequently attached to the MEA in the year 1948. The ministry also setup the Public Diplomacy Division in 2006 to update the policy decision of the Indian foreign policy on daily basis and to reach out to the scholars, thinks tanks, and media through its outreach activities. Similarly, the Indian Council for Cultural Relations (ICCR) was also set up in 1950 to promote India's cultural heritage abroad by organising a large number of exhibitions, conferences, seminars, cultural events and lecture-demonstrations abroad. With the help of these two divisions the MEA works to develop India's positive image abroad. 148 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 149 Matter Related to Sea and Land Borders : It is the responsibility of the ministry to administer the matters related to Law of the Sea, including the Indian Territorial Waters, Contiguous Zone, Continental Shelf and Exclusive Economic Zones (EEZ), questions of international law arising on the high seas including fishery rights; piracies and crimes committed on the High Seas or in the air, offences against the Law of Sovereign States committed on land or the High seas or in the air, legal matters concerning the International Seabed Area and Authority etc. Besides sea border, demarcation of the land frontiers of India and matter related to border raids and incidents also come under the jurisdiction of the MEA. Protocol and Ceremonial Functions : Along with all other administrative activities, the MEA is also responsible to facilitate the foreign visit of the Indian ministers, diplomats and official delegations and arranges to offer necessary protocols during the visit. The ministry also extends necessary protocols and conducts the ceremonial activities for foreign and Commonwealth Visitors and Diplomatic and Consular Representatives to India. It also deals with matters associated with the Hospitality Grant of the Government of India 3.5 Conclusion Development Partnership Administration (DPA) is an agency under the Ministry of External Affairs formed in 2013 to increase its strategic footprint and for the effective execution of projects with professionals from diverse backgrounds. The model of Finance Commission was first framed by British rulers during last part 152 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 153 of 1660. Their primary aim was to find out the way appropriation of large amount of wealth from India. Later in 1920, British ruler with the consent of British parliament framed a definite act for Finance Commission in the year 1920. British ruler had two specific purpose of framing the act of Finance Commission. First, to make a Finance Commision whose primary intention would be eliminate all kinds of probable business rivalries of other European Countries from India. Second, The intention of the act was to assure a prolong rule of British Monarch in Indian Subcontinent. Later after Independence Indian Government framed the act again in 1951. The act was known as "Finance Commission (Miscellanious Provision) Act 1951. Following matters were narrated in that act : (a) The qualification of Appointment; (b) Disqualification; (c) Terms of selection in the Commission; (d) Eligibility of Member; (e) Service condition of the Members; (f) Salaries; and (g) Power of the members of Finance Commission. 4.2 Finance Commission : Historical Background The Indian states like all other federations are also ridden by the problems of vertical and horizontal imbalances. Explaining vertical Imbalances result because states are assigned responsibilities and in the process of fulfilling those that they incur expenditures disproportionate to their sources of revenue, of India. This is because the states are able to gauge the needs and concerns of their people more effectively and hence, are more efficient in addressing them. Factors like historical backgrounds, differences in resources endowments etc. lead to the widening horizontal imbalances. Thus, as he has enshrined in the constitution of India, the recognition of these two problems Dr. Ambedkar has made several provisions to bridge the gap of finance between the centre and the states. These includes various articles in the constitution like article 268, which facilitates levy of duties by the centre but equips the state to collect and retain the same. Similarly there are article 269, 270, 275, 282 and 293 all of which specify ways and means of sharing resources between union and states. Also Act 280 as a whole speak of finance commission.

The finance commission of India came into existence in 1951. It was established under Article 280 of the Indian constitution

Since the institution of the first finance commission, stack changes have occurred in the Indian economy causing changes in the microeconomic scenario. This has led to major changes in the finance commission recommendations over the years. Till date 14 finance commission have submitted their reports. The object of the Finance Commission as mentioned in the Article 280(3) 1 and 2 is to correct financial dis-equilibrium periodically through (1) obligatory sharing of income tax and agreeable sharing of union excise duties under Articles 270 and 272 of the Constitution. The implementation year is 2015-2020. The latest report that was submitted was on 24th February 2015. It is in two volumes. The first volumes in of 279 pages while the second volume is of2015 pages. Following are the Highlights of the Report of the 14th Finance Commission : • Devolution to states : States share in not proceeds from tax collection be 42 per cent a huge jump from 32 per cent recommended by the 13th Finance commission, and the largest change ever in the percentage of devolution. • Big Jump in tax share : Compared with 2014-2015, the total devolution to state in 2015-16 will increase over 45 per cent. • Resource transfer : Tax devolution be the primary route resource transfer to states. • NITI connect : The government has accepted the recommendation in view of the spirit of the National Institute for Transforming India. Grants should be distributed to states for local bodies on the basis of 2011 population data; the grants can be divided into two broad categories on the basis of rural and urban population - constituting gram panchayat and constituting municipal bodies.

156 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 157 • Types of grants : A basic grant and a performance grant. The ratio of basic grant to performance grant be 90:10, with respect to panchayats and 80:20 in case of municipalities. • Total grants : Rs. 2,87,436/- crore for a five year period from April 1, 2015 to March 3, 2020; of this Rs. 2,00,292.20 crore to be given to panchayats and Rs. 87,143.80 crore to municipalities. • Grant transfer : For 2015-16 transfers will be to the tune of Rs. 29,988 crore. • Disasters relief : The percentage share of states to continue as before and follow the current mechanism to the tune of Rs. 55,097 crore. After implementation of GST, disaster reliefwill be given according to the recommendations of the • Post devolution revenue deficit grants : A total of Rs. 1,94,821 crore an account of expenditure requirements of states tax devolution and revenue mobilisation capacity of the state. These will be given to states. • Declining of schemes : Eight centrally sponsored schemes (cesses) will be delinked from support from the centre, various ceses will now see a change in sharing pattern, with states sharing a higher fiscal responsibility. • Co-operative federalism : There are recommendation on co-operative federalism, GST fiscal consolidation road map, pricing of pubic utilities and PSU's too. 4.5 Finance Commission : Functions The finance commission regarded collection as sufficient test for distribution. The first finance commission states that it will be perfectly justifiable in our view to give a moderate weight in the scheme of distribution to the factor of contribution. But Lakdwala suggested a moderate weight for the same because of the core of incomes of local origin a moderate weight to collection would be justifiable, he third Finance commission6 supported in favour of contribution, industrial states have larger collection having problems of their own However, it was contended its support with an agreement The Fifth finance commission advanced a novel justification for the criteria of collection, instrument was while agricultural states could tax on agricultural income and fie revenue thereof was not shareable with the Catre the indusbial states need to be compensated on the accounts.
156 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 157 Distribution of Income tax : The Eleventh Finance Commissions so far appointed have adopted population collection cocktail formula in the distribution of income tax proceeds. criterion based on population. Almost all the Finance Commissions have preferred population - collection cocktail formula by giving different weightages to these two factors. The population factor played a dominant role in the distribution of income tax revenue to the States in almost all the Finance Commissions. The First Finance Commission laid down 80:20 as the weights to be given to population and collection, respectively. The Second Finance Commission took a more extreme position, and opined that the whole income tax divisible pool should be distributed on the basis of need according to Population. The Third Finance Commission reversed this decision partly because of the changed definition of the personal income - tax which did not now include my tax paid by companies but largely because it believed that industrialization and urbanization were financial liabilities not compensated by increased tax potential. The Chairman of the Finance Commission realized the wisdom of sticking to the old formulae as changing it even according to the personal whims of five eminent people was not salutary. This is a description of the wording of the earlier Finance Commission Two core criteria which have been used by previously finance commission for providing higher per capita devolution to lower per capita income states are distance and inverse income formula. In the case the 8th finance commission the combined weight given to their two criteria was 75 per cent. In the case of 9th finance commission the combined weight was 62.5 per cent for income tax and somewhat lower for union excise duties. The 10th finance commission had decided to use only one out of the two formula namely the distance formulae, descending the inverse income states have to the implicit conveniently in it. The middle income states have to bean a relatively higher burden of this adjustment. This position holds time even name may states have favored these formulae. Union Excise Duties : Under Article 272 of the Constitution, Union Excise duties may be divided between the Union and the States Parliament by law so provides. The Finance Commissions found it necessary to include sharing of such duties in varying degrees. The First Commission fixed the Share of the States at 40 percent of the net proceeds of duty on tobacco, matches and vegetable products. Gradually the number of articles considered for the Purpose of the divisible pool was increased to 36 and the Third Finance Commission fixed the share of the States at 20 percent. The Seventh Commission made the Population hverse of per capital State Domestic

158 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 159 Product. 0 Population below the poverty line and A formula of revenue equalization. The Eight Finance Commission raised the share of the States of 45 percent; 40 percent to be distributed among all the States and the reclaiming 5 percent to be distributed among those States which have deficits after taking into account their share from all taxes' and duties including their share in the 40 percent of the proceeds of excise duties. The Ninth Finance Commission also recommended that the share of the States in the proceeds of Union excise duties should be 45 percent. The Ninth Finance Commission recommended a separate formula for The distribution of State's share in Union excise duties. Commission and way contained by the ninth and tenth finance commission. The share kept aside for this purpose was also gradually increased. The eleventh finance commission no such criterion was adopted for the distribution of union excise duties. The percentage related to setting a part of a portion of the union excise duties for distribution to fivestates on the basis of 'assessed deficits'. Other Duties : Under Article 269 of the Constitution providing for the assignment of certain types of taxes levied and collected by the Union to be distributed among the States, Estate duty on property other than agricultural land has been levied since 1953. The distribution of the tax proceeds from the estate duty on non-agricultural property and the tax on passenger fares or the compensatory grant in lieu thereof was referred to the Second Third and Fourth Finance Commissions. In both these cases the question of the States share as a whole did not arise, as the entire net tax proceeds were to be distributed among the States. Each State should receive broadly the amounts which it would have raised if it had the power to levy and collect these taxes. The ideal principle could not be applied in the case of the movable property part of the estate the population basis was recommended in the case of immovable property, however, the proceeds were to be allotted among the States on the basis of the gross value of immovable property assessed within their section. Grants- in - aid in the Finance Commission : Grants specified under article 275 of the constitution are to bridge the States non- -plan budgetary gaps. The finance commissions has to try to measure the fiscal capacity and needs two of the states, with an aim to get fiscal equity, Grants provided under this article on the recommendations of the finance commissions. The first Finance Commission was in favour of enlarging the scope of these grants The tenth finance commission was specifically asked t6 consider the requirements of the states for upgradation in non-developmental sectors. It recommended upgradtion grants for those states that were assessed by it to be in pre-devolution deficit on revenue account. The sectors covered by it for these grants
158 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 159 were nondevelopmental as well as developmental. It also provided special problem grants to all the states.. 4.6 Conclusion The Finance Commissions in India have not given much thought to the methods of estimating the fiscal needs of the States and recommending the federal fiscal transfers accordingly. A State's need depends on its populations and age distribution, particularly, the proportion of school-going population in respect of which the Constitution of India expects each State to ensure compulsory primary education within certain specified period. Density of population, Distribution of incomes and Local costs and similar other factors. Besides suggesting the mechanism to share tax revenues the commission also lays down the principles for giving out grant-in- aid to states and other local bodies. The commission has to take on itself the job of addressing the imbalances that often arise between the taxation power and expenditure responsibilities of the centre and the state, respectively. Primarily, it has to ensure a sense of equality in public services across the states. 4.7 Summary • The recommendation of the Finance Commission is not mandatory to the Government. Its recommendation is only advisory in nature. • Government on receiving the advice of Finance Commission, judge its feasibility • The main recommendation of the Finance Committee is regarding the distribution money appropriated through different Taxes • Dr, P. It is an independent body. Its decision on holding election or any

162 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 163 other related directly or indirectly with the process and procedure of election are mandatory to the Government. Government officially or formally cannot infringe the decision taken by the Election Commission, for the sake of free and fair holding of Central and State election. The Election Commission by its authority issued nation- wide 'Voter Identity Card' which one elctorate needs to show at time of casting vote in the Polling Booth. Failure of which may cause abstaining from voting right (which is a Fundamental Right of a Citizen). The Indian Constitution, in its Article 324 confered the power and responsibility of holding election peacefully and neutrally to the Election Commission. In view of this power and responsibility the Election Commission, holds the power of requisiting the service of any Administrative and Police personnel, during election, as per the choice of Election Commissioner. The Election Commission, barring from others, is also empowered to hold the election of President, Vice-President and members of Upper houses of Central abd State Legislature. 5.2 Election Commission of India : Evolution After independence from British imperial rule, free India chose to adopt the system of parliamentary democracy and democratic practices are sustained as well as strengthened through elections. Elections were also conducted during British rule. These elections to the Provincial and Central Legislatures did not fulfil the aspirations of the people of India and were anything but fair and democratic. Undoubtedly, the foremost task of the founding fathers of the Constitution was to make the elections free, besides contemplating to constitute an institution which could carry out electoral process impartially and independently, so that the democratic character of the country could be preserved. The framers of the Constitution, keeping in view the complexity, caused by the diversities of the country, resolved that the authority vested with the conduct of elections should be competent, effective, apolitical, independent and neutral. The foresight of the Constitution makers, virtually, has paid rich dividend to the people of India. Despite whatever has happened to politics and political practices in the country, the prospect of a free and fair election survives as the election machinery remains apolitical, impartial and independent. This authority vested with the conduct of election is none, but a constitutional body, that is, the Election Commission of India. D.D. Basu writes : "In order to supervise the entire procedure and machinery for election and for some other ancillary matters, the Constitution provides for an independent body, namely, the Election Commission (Article 324)

162 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 163 One of the prominent problems that was faced by the members of the Constituent Assembly was whether to have a Centralised Election Commission as in Britain or allow the states to have their own Election Commission as present in United States of America. The members of the Constituent Assembly did discuss this matter at length. In this connection, says that there shall be a Chief Election Commissioner and such other Election Commissioners as the President may, from time to time, appoint. There were two alternatives before the Drafting Committee, namely, either to have a permanent body consisting of four or five members of the Election Commission who would continue in office throughout without any break, or to permit the President to have an adhoc body appointed at time when there is an election on the anvil. The Committee has steered a middle course. What the Drafting Committee proposes by clause (2) is to have permanently in office one man called the Chief Election Commissioner, so that the skeleton machinery would always be available. Elections no doubt will generally take place at the end of five years; but there is this question, namely that a by-election may take place at any time. The Assembly may be dissolved before its period of five years has expired. Consequently, the electoral rolls will have to be kept up-to-date all the time so that the new election may take place without any difficulty. It was, therefore, felt that having regard to these exigencies, it would be sufficient if there was permanently in session one officer to be called the Chief Election Commissioner, while when the elections are coming up, the President may further, add to the machinery by appointing other members to the Election Commission The object of the framers of the Constitution was, indeed, to ensure the impartiality and independence of Election Commission. That is why after much discussion and long debates on 'just, pure, honest and impartial' elections in the ConstituentAssembly they made provisions for a common centralised body for election purposes for both Central and State Legislatures. Thus, Article 324 of the Constitution of India provides for creation of the Election Commission which should be an authority to deal with all matters related to elections under the Constitution. The Article also provides that the conduct of elections of the President, the Vice President, Members of Parliament and Members of State Legislatures must be vested in the Election Commission. Nevertheless, it would be the obligation of this authority to maintain the sanctity of election. 5.3 Election Commission of India : Composition and Organization Article 324 clause (2) provides : "

On October 1, 1993 the Election Commission was enlarged through a Presidential Ordinance. Two Election Commissioners Dr. M.S. Gill and Mr. G.V.G. Krishnamurthy were appointed and given position and status at par to the office of Chief Election Commissioners. On October 27, 1993 the Chief Election Commissioner Mr. T.N. Seshan, challenged the ordinance of October 1, 1993 in the Supreme Court, urging to declare the Ordinance arbitrary, unconstitutional and void. Mr. Seshan's main contention was that the framers of the Constitution did not intend to equate the office of the Chief Election Commissioner with those of the other Election Commissioners. Therefore, Section 9 and Section 10 of the Ordinance is wholly ultra vires of the Constitution, as well as spirit of the Article 324 of the Constitution of India as envisaged by the Constitution makers. The aggrieved Chief Election Commissioner in his petition, submitted that the entire independence of the Election Commission can be fractured by the decision arrived at by two Election Commissioners who are appointed and removed at the will of the government.46 The Supreme Court, passed an interim order on November 15, 1993 and ruled that the Chief Election Commissioner shall other Commissioners but these will not be binding on him. Again, the Supreme Court confirmed on December 15, 1993, in its interim order of November 15, 1993. But at the same time the Court referred the Chief Election Commissioner's plea challenging the Ordinance equating the status of the newly appointed Election Commissioners to him, to a Constitutional bench. The Judges, in their brief order said that since the points raised in the petition were related to the interpretation of Article 324 of the Constitution, it was their view that matter be referred to the Constitutional bench for authoritative opinion The Lok Sabha, on December 13, 1993, passed an amendment bill, "

The Chief Election Commissioner and other Election Commissioners (Conditions of service)

Amendment Bill 1993 replacing the Ordinance issued on October 1, 1993 in this regard, making the Election Commission a multi-member body and equating the Chief Election Commissioner and other Election Commissioners." The Bill was passed by the Rajya Sabha and after the assent of the President it became Law. There was, virtually, an outcry to convert the Election Commission into a multi member body for quite a long time. Many political parties were persistently demanding conversion of the Election Commission into a multimember Commission. Joint Parliamentary Committee on amendment to Election Law gave unanimous

164 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 165 recommendation in its report in 1972 that the Commission should be a multi-member body. The view expressed by the Committee was that "an enlarged Commission will be able to discharge more effectively the responsibilities related to elections and in exercise of its quasi-judicial functions, a broad based Commission is likely to reach generally acceptable decision and command respect." This report sought support of subsequent committees and Commissions appointed to suggest electoral reforms. Tarkunde Committee on Electoral Reforms held the same view and recommended that, "A Commission consisting of a body of the three members can arrive at a consensus on major controversial problems of organising elections which is decidedly a superior method of ensuring impartially to the individual decision of a single Chief Election Commissioner." Goswami Committee also recommended in its Report in 1990 for the conversion of the Election Commission into a multi-member body. Gadgil Commission on electoral reforms also favoured a multi-member Election Commission Most of the Chief Election Commissioners have opposed the idea of a multi-member Election Commission, since the talk of its conversion began. But Mr. Seshan, as we have already seen, went to the extreme while opposing induction of two additional Commissioners in the Election Commission. 5.4 Election Commission of India : Functions Election Commission of India is vested with manifold functions in the form of duties and powers of different nature which evidently express the role of the Commission in dealing with elections effectively. Article 324, Clause (1) of the Constitution of India vests extensive functions in the Election Commission, that is, "Superintendence, direction and control", for the conduct of elections. These powers of the Commission are prompted by supplementation of the Representation of the People Act, 1950, the Representation of the People Act, 1951 and Rules and Orders made there under. In the case of Mohindra Singh Gill, the Supreme Court held that the words "Superintendence, direction and control" as used in Clause (1) of Article 324 are of wide amplitude and would include the powers to make all provisions necessary for smooth conduct of elections, subject, however, to any Law made by Parliament or State Legislatures under Article 327 and Article, 328 of the Constitution respectively. In the words of the Apex Court, Article 324 is "a reservoir of powers" for the Election Commission. If it is silent on any electoral matter or is not sufficient to deal with a particular situation 'the Election Commission has the inherent and plenary power to act in such a vacuous area within its allowed domain without looking to any outside 166 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 167 authority for conferment of powers.' Thus, the powers of the Election Commission, as observed by the Supreme Court, 'are essentially administrative and to some extent adjudicative or Legislative.' The Court also held that the power under Clause (1) of Article 324 of the Constitution is in the nature of residuary power to deal with any situation which is not dealt with a law of Parliament or State Legislature. The primary function of the Election Commission, under the provisions of the Constitution and the Representation of the People Act, 1950, the Representation of the People Act, 1951 and Rules as well as Orders made there under is ' the superintendence, direction and control of the preparation of the electoral roll of all elections to Parliament and the State Legislatures and office of the President and Vice- President.'

It is the foremost duty of the Election Commission to prepare the electoral rolls in accordance with the provision of the Representation of the People Act, 1950 and the Registration of Electors Rules, 1960. 'Registration of voters in the Registers of the constituencies, in advance of the poll, is mandatory in almost all democratic countries, with a difference in registration system and procedure adopted. It is the solemn duty of the Commission to conduct elections in a free, fair and peaceful manner. In order to achieve this end, the Election Commission discharges multiple functions. The function of the Commission regarding conduct of elections begins from the day of the notification of election and runs upto declaration of results and during the entire process of elections the Commission remains vigilant and sees that the conduct of election is going on according to rules. Accordingly, the Election Commission is empowered to issue certain notification. But for the elections to the Lok Sabha and State-Legislature and Councils of Union Territories, the notification is issued by the President, or Governors or Administrators respectively. These notifications are issued accordingly to the recommendation by the Election Commission. In case of by- election, the Commission has the power to issue notification. The Model Code of Conduct is an effective measure in conducting free and fair election, but the power of cancellation of an election on the ground of violation of the model code of conduct needs a legislation to be passed by Parliament empowering the Election Commission to do so while performing its Constitutional duty to ensure free and fair election. In the recent past, the Election Commission remained adamant to rid of violation of the model code of conduct to ensure free and fair elections. The political parties and the governments also responded positively. The Election Commission, from the very beginning of the Lok-Sabha Election 2004, tightened its screw on the issue of model code of conduct. The Commission asked the government

166 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 167 to pull down all government hoardings and advertisements, including those of, "India Shining" Campaign. The Election Commission has always made efforts to halt the malpractices of booth capturing, rigging and violence during polls. However, sometimes under grave situations the Commission had no option but to resort to use its constitutional and legal powers and countermanded elections in the entire constituency in the interest of free, fair and peaceful polls as well to ascertain correct verdict of the people. Another important power of the Election Commission, that reflects its role, is with regard to Registration of political parties and Allotment of Symbol. Earlier, the Election Commission was registering and recognising the political parties only for the purpose of Allotment and reservation of symbols. But, in 1988 Section 29A was added to the Representation of the People Act of 1951 which makes provisions for the compulsory registration of the political parties. Thus, the Election Commission has been empowered to register political parties. The sub-section(8) of Section 29A of the Representation of the People Act, 1951 expressly provides that the decision of the Election Commission shall be final with regard to the Registration of political parties In the recent past, a controversy has cropped up pertaining to the jurisdiction of the Election Commission, as to whether the Commission is empowered to derecognise a political party and freez its Poll Symbol, already registered and recognised by it under Section, 29A of Representation of People Act, 1951 Keeping in view the necessity of express power in this regard, the Election Commission has amended the Election Symbol order on February 17, 1994 and 'inserted para 16A which empowered the Commission to suspend or withdraw the recognition of a political party if it fails to adhere to the model code of conduct or did not follow or carryout directions and instructions of the Commission. By virtue of this amendment, the Commission sought the authority to suspend or derecognise a political 'party'. Provision of expenditure of the Election Commission from the Consolidated Fund of India - The Function of the Delimitation of constituencies should be handed over to the Election Commission , Change in the method of appointment of the members of Election Commission, No appointment on political offices after retirement. Besides the above, the Election Commission discharges some more significant functions. The power of preparation of electoral rolls and revision is vested in the Election Commission. The Election Commission superintends, directs and controls the machinery for preparation, revision and maintenance of electoral rolls. The Chief Electoral Officers, District Election Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and

168 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 169 Assistant Electoral Registration Officers work under the Commission. Recording of votes, appointment and revocation of the appointment of counting agents, inspection of accounts, custody of ballot boxes and Electronic voting machines as well as production and inspection of election papers and disposal of election papers under the Rules of the Conduct of Election Rules, 1961. Under the provisions of the Representation of the People Act, 1951 the Commission is charged with making arrangements for polling Stations for polling constituencies, preparation of nomination papers, publication of election results and making rules. 5.5 Conclusion It is worth satisfying and praiseworthy that the Election Commission has started using powers vested in it and has begun taking active part not only at the time of elections but throughout the election process of the country. Thus, the role of the Election Commission has become as much eminent as the framers of the Constitution wanted it to be. 5.6 Summary • Election Commission is a Constitutional Body. Which the Constitution formed to supervise the entire procedure and mechinery for election. • To materialised this proposition, the Constitution has made an independent and authoritative body for conducting election. • Election Commission is a centralised body for both Central and State Legislature. • As per the Amendment, "The Chief election Commssioner and Other Election Commissioners" on October 1993, the election Commission has become multi-membered body. The Chief election Commissioner and other Election Commissioners are equal in Status. • The Election Commission has the inherent and planerypower to act within its domain, without looking to any outside authority for conferment of power. • The Election Commission is guided by the "Representation of People's act" 1950/1951.

The Department is called "Department of Administrative Reform and Public Grienvances". The Department has brought under an Additional Secretary. In fact the Department has been set up to cover up the inadequacies, ineffectiveness and inefficiencies of existing structure of the Government. That actually increased the imminency of establishing an institution like "Ombudsman" following the Scandenavian example. The demand of such Institution was first echoed in the Parliament in April 1963. In 1977 Janata Government promised to the House to initiate the process for setting up an Institution like "Lokpal", to end the corruption in the Public life of the Country. In view of that echoed voice, the Parliament following the suggestion of the "Administrative Reform Committee, in 1966", proceeded to establish an 'Ombudsman' type of Institution to reduce and check the propensity of corruption, and to settle down the grievances of peolple against Temporary Political Leaders in parliament as well as permanent Government personnel. In the year 1971, Lokpal Bill was formally placed in the Parliiament. But this was done even after vaccilation of number of Parliamentarians. Janata Government again in 1977, reintroduced the Bill in the Legislature. The then Government din 1971 drafted the Bill, keeping the Prime Minister outside the orbit of the Bill. But in 1977, Janata Government apatlybrought the Prime Minister within the orbit of the draft Bill. Secondly, the bill suggested that the Lokpal, for the sake of its neutral stand, should have it s own Administrativemechinery and would not be dependent upon the regular Governmental mechinery. It was further decided that any complain, may be pertained to the period of five years from the date of complain, against any temporary Political Leader or against any personnel of any Governmental Department or Secretariat would be counted.
174 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 175 1.2 Lokpal : Genesis The word 'Lokpal' etymologically means 'protector of people'. The term was coined as an Indian variant of the concept of 'Ombudsman', which has Scandinavian origin and refers to an official who is appointed to investigate complaints of citizens against the administration.

in 1809. Other countries followed the Swedish model almost after a century. Finland (1919), Denmark (1953), Norway and New Zealand (1962), Britain (1967), Israel, Zambia, Portugal, Spain, South Africa in 1970s, Iceland, Ireland, Netherlands and Poland in 1980s, Slovenia (1993), Burkina Faso (1994), Belgium (1995) are some of the countries which have the institution of Ombudsman. The genesis of the concept in India can be dated back to the 1960s. On 3rd April 1963, Late Dr. L.M. Singhvi while participating in the discussion of Demands for Grants of the Ministry of Law and Justice, in the Lok Sabha, stressed the need for setting up of a Parliamentary Commission on the pattern of Ombudsman for tackling corruption and redressal of public grievances. The terms Lokpal and Lokayuktawere also coined by him. In 1966, the first Administrative Reforms Commission (ARC) recommended a two tier machinery to redress the grievances of public i.e. Lokpal and Lokayukta. The Lokpal would deal with complaints against Ministers and Secretaries of Central Government as well as in the states. The Lokayukta, one for the Centre and one in each State, would attend complaints against rest of the bureaucracy.

Apart from the first ARC and the Parliamentary Committees, second ARC

The Lokpal and Lokayuktas Act, 2013 has had a long chequered history. It took almost forty-five years to enact this important piece of legislation. The institution of Lokpal was first contemplated way back in early 1960

In view of the repeated postponement to enact this legislation, a campaign was launched by civil society organisations in 2011. They brought out their own version of the Bill titled 'The Jan Lokpal Bill'. The Government subsequently introduced a new Lokpal Bill on 4 August 2011, which was referred to the Department-related Parliamentary Standing Committee for examination on 8 August 2011. There is no restriction on who can make such a complaint. When a complaint is received, the Lokpal may order a preliminary inquiry by its Inquiry Wing or any other agency, or refer it for investigation by any agency, including the CBI, if there is a prima facie case.

72%	MATCHING BLOCK 299/369	SA	Monika - Criminal Law.pdf (D77732588)

the Lokpal shall call for an explanation from the public servant to determine whether a prima facie case

This provision, the Act says, will not interfere with any search and seizure that may be undertaken by the investigating agency. The Lokpal, with respect to Central government servants, shall refer the complaints to the Central Vigilance Commission (CVC). The CVC will send a report to the Lokpal regarding officials falling under Groups A and B; and proceed as per the CVC Act against those in Groups C and D.

The Inquiry Wing or any other agency will have to complete its preliminary inquiry and submit a report to the Lokpal within 60 days. It has to seek comments from both the public servant and "the competent authority" before submitting its report. There will be a "competent authority" for each category of public servant as defined under the Act. For instance, for the Prime Minister, it is the Lok Sabha, and for other Ministers, it will be the Prime Minister. And for department officials, it will be the Minister concerned. A Lokpal Bench consisting of no less than three members shall consider the preliminary inquiry report, and after giving an opportunity to the public servant accused of corruption for his/her defence, decide whether it should proceed with the investigation. It can order a full investigation, or direct to start departmental proceedings or close the proceedings. It may also proceed against the complainant if the allegation is false. The preliminary inquiry should normally be completed within 90 days of receipt of the complaint. Previously, the authority vested with the power to appoint or dismiss a public servant was the one to grant sanction under Section 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and Section 19 of the Prevention of Corruption Act.

Now this power will be exercised by the Lokpal, a judicial body. In any case, the Lokpal will have to seek the comments of the 'competent authority' as well as the public servant's comments before granting such sanction.

and Lokayuktas (Amendment) Act, 2016 and Controversies The Lokpal Act, 2013 required a public servant to declare his assets and liabilities, and that of his spouse and dependent children. Such declarations must have been made to the competent authority within 30 days of entering office. Further, the public servant must have filed an annual return of such assets and liabilities by July 31st of every year. The Lokpal Act also mandated statements of such declarations be published on the website of the relevant Ministry by August 31 of that year. In this backdrop The Lokpal and Lokayuktas (Amendment) Bill, 2016 was introduced in Lok Sabha on July 27, 2016 by the Minister for Personnel, Public Grievances and Pensions, Dr. Jitendra Singh. The Bill amends the Lokpal and Lokayuktas Act, 2013 in relation to declaration of assets and liabilities by public servants. The provisions of the Bill would apply retrospectively from the date of the coming into force of the 2013 Act. In 2016 amendment to the Lokpal Act has excluded spouses and dependent children of public servant from disclosure of assets and liabilities. It also said the form and manner of disclosure by public servants would be decided by the government. This amendment was termed by civil society activists as 'regressive'. Anjali Bhardwaj, a noted activist criticized the amendment on the ground that in view of the seeming impossibility of catching people red-handed taking bribes, the only sensible way 180 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 181 is through monitoring of assets disproportionate to their known sources of income which are in the names of spouses and dependent children. The 2016 amendment has effectively provided immunity to the errant bureaucrat. 1.8 Conclusion The Act provides for selection of chairperson and members of Lokpal by a committee consisting of the Prime Minister, Lok Sabha Speaker, Leader of Opposition in Lok Sabha, Chief Justice of India or a sitting SC judge nominated by the him, and an eminent jurist to be nominated by President of India on the basis of recommendations of first four members of selection panel. Shri Mukul Rohatgi, former Attorney General of India was appointed as the first "Eminent Jurist" Member of the Selection Committee. However, the post of Leader of Opposition could not be filled, owning to the election results of the national election of 2014. As the largest opposition party (Congress) could not secure at least 10 percent seats (55) in the Lok Sabha in that election, it could not stake a formal claim to the post of Leader of Opposition. This unforeseen situation resulted in a deadlock and delayed the appointment of the Lokpal. Meanwhile the Supreme Court on January 17, 2018 had set up a February-end, 2018 deadline for the Lokpal search committee to send a panel of names who could be considered for the appointment as its chairman and members. A search committee headed by former apex court Judge Ranjana Prakash Desai had recommended three panels of names to the selection committee for appointment of chairperson, judicial and non-judicial members in the anti-graft body. A Selection Committee led by Prime Minister Narendra Modi and comprising Chief Justice Ranjan Gogoi, Lok Sabha Speaker Sumitra Mahajan and eminent jurist Mukul Rohatgi deliberated on the recommendations of the search committee. Mallikarjun Kharge, the Leader of Opposition in Loksabha by default, did not attend the deliberations after he was invited as "special invitee". Mr. Kharge had refused to attend earlier meetings also, protesting at being invited as "special invitee". Eventually, the President nominated former

They demand that their attempt is to keep the administration free from any corruption. • But in reality, whenever the Lokpal makes attempt to take any Governemtn personnel or Leader in its custody for detail enquire, the Political head specially comes as the shield between alleged personnel and Lokpal Diretorate. The attept is to protect the alleged inlcident of corruption or mis-use of Power. • Even then Lokpal is the only substitute to reform the Administrative process. • The effort of activizing Lokpal is then only possible, when the administrative efficiencies and efficacies of the administrator would be high. 1.10 Glossary • Redressal Cell for Public grievances. • Lokpal, a mechinery to reduce corruption. • Lokpal , Constitutional Act 2013 and 2016. 1.11 Model Question • Discuss the reasons for the formation of Lokpal Institution. 184 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 185 2.1 Introduction The Administrative Reform Commission, set up in 1966, was given one vital terms of reference for discussion. The terms of reference was to investigate the propensity of corruption of Public Servants, and the Public grievances thereon.The committee was also asked to suggest the process of finding out the ways of public redressal against those compliants. The primary suggestion of the Committee was very meaningful. It suggested, that the Government should introduce and form a new machinery or special Institution or Department for redressal of public grievances. Reform commission submitted interim report, giving importance to those specific terms and condition by which was mentioned as reference of their one vital responsibility. The interim report recommended a two tier mechinery viz. Lokpal and Lokayukta. The former will deal with the complaints against Ministers and Secretary to the Government at the Centre as well as States. The latter would look after the complians against other official of Centre as well as State of Secretariat and Department. In reply to a question, Chairman of the Reform Committee (Morarji Desai) stated, "We have brought both ministers and Secretaries in the same fold of Lokpal and Lokayukta, because at that level of the Government, it becomes difficult to identify the source of Corruption". It is also difficult to find out the role of one functionery ends and that of others begins. Commission further suggested Lokpal and Lokayukta should have certain critarian, which would uniquely help these Institution to act impartially and independently, like, (1) Both should be independent and neutral from he existing Governmental mechinery; (2) Investigation and detection should be made in private; (3) The appoinment should be from Non-Political orbit; (4) Status of these Institution must be judicial; (5) These two Institution will deal with those issues, which are related with injustice, corruption or favouritism; (6) The Lokpal and Lokayukta will be authorised by law, to collect information relevant to their job and duties; (7)These two vital Institution of Unit of Government, do special interim report on "Problems of Redressal of Citizen's Grievances" published in 1966. It recommended the creation of two independent authorities - the Lokpal at the centre and the Lokayuktas in the states. The first Lokpal Bill was introduced in Parliament in 1968 but it lapsed with the dissolution of Lok Sabha. Later Bills also met a similar fate. Though the Lokpal could not be created as a national institution, the interest generated led to the enactment of various state legislations. Some states have had Lokayukta even before the Lokpal Act. Maharashtra was the first state to enact a law for it in 1971. Rajasthan followed suit in 1973, Uttar Pradesh in 1975, Madhya Pradesh in 1981, Andhra Pradesh and Himachal Pradesh in 1983 and Karnataka in 1984. There is a widely held perception that Lokayuktas are not empowered enough and the State governments have not provided adequate logistical support to the Lokayukts and thus rendered them less useful. Lokayuktas in

For instance, though the Maharashtra Lokayukta is the first Lokayukt in the country, it does not have a police wing under it to investigate graft complaints, unlike in Karnataka. 2.3 Karnataka as Model The Karnataka Lokayukta is believed to be among the most effective Lokayuktas.

The Karnataka Lokayukta Act was recently amended by the state government following the resignation of the Lokayukta, Justice Santosh Hegde. Justice Hegde had been demanding additional powers for the Lokayukta - especially the power to investigate suo-motu. Following the amendment, the Lokayukta has been given the suo motu powers to investigate all public servants except the Chief Minister, Ministers, Legislators and those nominated by the government. Following are the main provisions of the Karnataka Lokayukta Act: • The public servants who are covered by the Act include the Chief Minister, Ministers, Legislators and all officers of the state government including the heads of bodies and corporations established by any law of the state legislature. • The body is constituted for a term of five years and consists of one Lokayukta and one or more Upalokayuktas. All members must have been judges, with either the Supreme Court or some High Court. • Members are appointed on the advice of the Chief Minister in consultation with the Chief Justice of the Karnataka High Court, the Chairman of the Karnataka Legislative Council, the Speaker of the Karnataka Legislative Assembly, and the Leader of Opposition in both Houses. • Investigations involving the Chief Minister, Ministers, Legislators and those nominated by the government must be based on written complaints. Other public servants can be investigated suo-motu. • Reports of the Section 63 of the Lokpal and Lokayuktas Act 2013 envisages that every State shall establish a body to be known as the Lokayukta within a period of one year from the date of commencement of the Act. Unfortunately many States did not comply with this section in the stipulated timeframe. Just as the Centre has dragged its feet on appointing a Lokpal, several states have done the same with the Lokayukta, with the Supreme Court asking them to expedite the process. Jammu and Kashmir and Uttarakhand even questioned the need for a Lokayukta. Tamil Nadu government took a lot of time to pass its Lokayukta Bill. Odisha, Nagaland and Manipur also delayed their process. The West Bengal Lokayukta law has reportedly been amended to exclude the Chief Minister from its purview for bureaucratic and police appointments. An organization named Transparency International India had published a survey report titled "Performance of Lokayuktas (State level Ombudsman Institutions) in Indian States: Snippet" in December, 2018 and had projected an alarming picture. They found that most of state's laws on Lokayukta are not drafted by taking the Union law i.e. the Lokpal and Lokayuktas Act 2013 as model legislation. Out of 29 States and 1 Union Territory (Delhi) under survey, 23 States had a functional office set up/ establishment for Lokayukta office after enacting the Lokayukta Act whereas three states- Arunachal Pradesh, Nagaland and Tamil Nadu had enacted the act but were yet to make necessary arrangement for anti-corruption institution. Out of these 23 states which had the institution of Lokayukta in them, only 18 of them had the post of Hon'ble Lokayukta filled. Out of the 23 states, only 11 had provided a post for the UpaLokayukta. Out of these 23 states, only 14 states had an official website and 9 Lokayuktas were without dedicated websites. Out of these 23 States, only 7 States did not require any amount of fees for the submission of the corruption complaints. Other states had varied rates respectively, ranging from Rs. 3/- in Himachal Pradesh to Rs. 2000/- in Uttar Pradesh and Gujarat. Out of the 23 States, only one state, Maharashtra, had provided the facility of Online Filing of Complaint.

188 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 189 2.5 Conclusion The Lokpal and Lokayuktas Act 2013 should have acted as a model legislation to inspire the state governments to appoint a strong ombudsman like body, with wide- ranging powers. However, those states which had a Lokayukt predating the 2013 Act, found it convenient to continue with their existing arrangements and did not choose to form a new and more powerful body. Other states, which clearly had the mandate to form a Lokayukt as per the 2013 Act, delayed the process inordinately until the Supreme Court had to intervene on the basis of a public interest litigation. Even then, the Lokayukts thus formed suffer from fund crunch, lack of manpower, and other resources. There is a distinct inactive status of website of many such state Lokayukts, and online filing of complaints have not been provided in a broad based manner. Publicity drive by the Lokayuktsare also non-existent in many cases, as the funds for such publicity drive are contingent on the support rendered by the state government. Lack of uniformity in the power structure of Lokayukts is an undoubted cause for concern, though the same can be somewhat traced back to the 2013 Act itself, which did not specify any details of the manner of appointment and powers of the Lokayukt in as much detail as those pertaining to the Lokpal. As a result, the Lokayukts that have been created are often a reflection of the wishes of the political functionaries of the state. Moreover, the efficacy of Lokayuktas in tackling corruption has been questioned in the context of very few complaints being filed in the first place. Commonwealth Human Rights Initiative (CHRI) researchers say most complaints made to the Lokayukta are to do with maladministration and non-availability of government services rather than corruption. The institutional framework envisaged to tackle the menace of corruption can only be successful when due diligence is exercised to conform to the letter and spirit of well-meaning Acts. 2.6 Summary • In some States in India, Lokayukta Institution is functioning since last three/ four decades. They are empowered to inquire into complaints related with mal-administration, corruption, indulgence etc. • Lokayukta mainly investigate the corrupt practice of the Government Officials and Ministries.. • In a few States, their jurisdiction has been extended to complaints against the Chief Minister.
188 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 189 • In some specific cases, the Lokyukta placed their findings against any Minister or Official before the Legislature. Thus it becomes public. As a result of it, the matter comes to regime of Public knowledge, and they create pressure on the Ministry for appropriate steps against that. In such cases, it become impossible for the Ministrial authority to resist or ignore or condone the corrupt practices of the alleged Official or Minister. • So the Lokayukta has some positive role to resist the corruption and negligence of duties. • In this connection, the achievements of State of Maharastra should be mentioned specially. The State has not only established Lokayukta in the State Administration, but also established Upa-Lokayukta act 1971. • This Act established that (a) lokayukta is appointed by the Governor after consultation with the Chief Justice of the High Court, and the leader of the Opposition in Legislature' • The

five years. • Some condition have also been imposed on the apporintment of Lokayukta. Those are i) he cannot be the member of Parliament or any State Legislature; ii) he will not be permitted to hold any office of profit; iii) He should not be directly with any Political Party; iv) he will not be allowed to engage any Office of profit after retirement. • He cannot be removed by the State government on the charge of "misbehaviour" or "incapacity". • The lokayukta can only be removed by the State Legislature, if a resolution to that effect is passed in the Legislature by Two-Third majority of the members present and voting (which is tantamount to absolute majority, then the decision of initiating inquire will be held. The inquire will be conducted either by the Judge of Supreme Court or Chief Justice of State High Court. • The most disappointing matter is that, the function and effectiveness of Lokayukta varies from State to State. In most cases Lokayukta is not allowed to act successfully and effectively. • It is due to plotitical "will" that has kmade this Institution almost a "name- sake" Institution. • One of the reasonbehing it, the widespread Ministrial corruption, and evil 190 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 191 interference of Political Parties and their Leaders do not want to place their misdeeds under the magnifying glass of the Society. • In 1986 the all India Conference of Lokayuktas made several recommendation to get back their powerr and to make them strengthen. Their suggestions include (a) strict Constitutional status is to be given to the Institution; (b) a particular time limit should be given to submit the report to the Legislature; (c) there should an independent agency under the control of Lokayukta having the suo-motopower of investigation. • But unfortunately no recommendations were accepted. 2.7 Glossary • Administrative Reform Commission. • Redressal of Grievances. • Mutatis mutandis (with necessary changes having been made or with consideration of the respective differences). 2.8 Model Questions • On what important issue, that the Administrative Reform Commission proceeds to establish an Institution for the sake of redressal of Citizens' Grievances? 192 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 193 3.1 Introduction The Central Vigilance Committee was established on September, 2003. This was as per the resolution adopted by the Government of India on 2nd. February 1964. Initially on 25th, August, 1998, Central Legislature promulgated an ordinance. The purpose was to set up an institution for vigilance and advising the planning, execution of planning, reviewing and reforming the vigilance work. The Central Legislature, after passing the Bill, sent the ordinance to the President for his assent . The Bill was passed on 11th. September 2003. After the approval of President by giving his signature on September 2003, the proposed bill came into action on September 2003. The Act was designated as Act 25. Later in April, 2004 Central legislation by its resolution on "Public Interest Disclosure and Protection of Informer" authorised the Central Vigilance Commission to receive complaint for allegation of corruption. Delhi Special Police Establishment, under the supervision of Central Vigilance Commission, help the body in investigating the complain. In this case Delhi Special Police Establishment act as per the Act, "Prevention of Corruption" 1988. The Civil Vigilance Commission exercise its power and privileges of function, independly. It enjoys autonomy like U.P.S.C. A cursory glance at the solutions being prescribed by various scholars gives the sense that combating corruption needs a holistic and all-pervasive approach. Citizens, government, private enterprises, technology tycoons, political functionaries, banks, legal functionaries – all need to pool in their expertise to prevent corrupt behaviour. 3.2 Genesis The Central Vigilance Commission (CVC) is conceived to be

The Chief Vigilance Officers are considerably higher level officers who are appointed in each and every Department/Organization to assist the Head of the Department/Organization in all vigilance matters. The following procedures have been laid down/evolved in the matter of appointment of CVOs: • Prior approval of the CVC is necessary for appointment of an officer as CVO; • As far as possible, the Chief Vigilance Officers should be from outside the Organization in which he is to be appointed. The initial tenure of full- time CVO in PSUs is for three years extendable by two years in the same organisation with the approval of the Commission or upto a further period of three years on transfer to another PSU on completion of initial tenure of three years in the previous PSU. • In cases where the scale of operation of a particular organization does 196 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 197 not justify creation of a full-time post, an officer within the organization sufficiently senior in rank to be able to report directly to the Chief Executive or vigilance matters may be considered for such appointments; • The officer to be given additional charge of the post of CVO should not be one whose normal duties involve dealing with matters sensitive from vigilance point of view (like recruitment, purchase, etc.); • Once an officer has worked as CVO in an organization, he should not go back as CVO to the same organization again; • An officer who is appointed from outside as CVO in Central Public Undertaking shall not be permanently absorbed in the same organization on expiry or in continuation of his tenure as CVO in that organization; • The "Vigilance" and "Security" function in an organization should be separated as both the activities are equally demanding and the discharge of "security" functions by a Chief Vigilance Officer only leads to dilution of supervision on vigilance matters. However, an exception has been made in respect of the hotel industry. 3.6 Role and Functions of Chief Vigilance Officer (CVO) Even though detection and punishment of corruption and other malpractices are certainly important, what is more important is taking preventive measures instead of hunting for the guilty in the post corruption stage. Therefore, the role and functions of CVOs can be broadly divided in to two parts, which are (i) Preventive and (ii) Punitive. On the preventive side the CVOs undertake various measures, which include: Examining in detail the existing Rules and procedures of the Organization with a view to eliminate or minimize the scope for corruption or malpractices; identifying the sensitive/corruption prone spots in the Organization; plan and enforce surprise inspections and regular inspections to detect the system failures; maintain proper surveillance on officers of doubtful integrity; ensure prompt observance of Conduct Rules relating to integrity of the officers, like Annual Property Returns, gifts accepted by the officials, benami transactions, relatives employed in private firms or doing private business etc. On the punitive side the CVOs undertake various measures, which include: ensuring speedy processing of vigilance cases at all stages; ensuring that charge-sheet,

198 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 199 statement of imputations, lists of witness and documents etc. are carefully prepared; eliminating delay in the appointment of the Inquiring Officer, and ensuring that no dilatory tactics are adopted by the accused officer or the Presenting Officer; to see that proper assistance is given to the C.B.I. in the investigation of cases entrusted to them or started by them; ensuring that cases against the public servants on the verge of retirement do not lapse due to time-limit; take proper and adequate action with regard to writ petitions filed by accused officers. 3.7 Complaint Handling Process of Central Vigilance Commission Complaints can be lodged to the CVC by addressing the written communication/ letter directly to the Commission or on Commission's portal www.portal.cvc.gov.in or through the Commission's website www.cvc.gov.in. Only those complaints which are against officials and organizations within the jurisdiction of the CVC and contain allegations of corruption will be got investigated by the Commission through CBI or CVO of the organization concerned. The CVC may also get a complaint inquired through its own officer under clause (d) of sub section (1) of Section (8) of CVC Act, 2003. The CVC does not entertain anonymous/pseudonymous complaints. However, if a complainant while exposing a case of corruption wants his identity to be kept secret, he/she can lodge a complaint under Public Interest Disclosure and Protection of Informers Resolution (PIDPIR) – popularly known as Whistle Blower Provision. The CVC is mandated not only to maintain the secrecy of the complainant's identity but also provide protection to the complainant against any physical threat, harassment or victimization. Complaint under "Public Interest Disclosure and Protection of Informer" Resolution can be made only by post. The envelope should be super- scribed "PIDPI" or "Whistle Blower" and the complainant should refrain from giving his name on the body of the letter. However, the CVC does not entertain or inquire into any disclosure in respect of which a formal and public inquiry has been ordered under the Public Servants Inquiries Act, 1850, or a matter that has been referred for inquiry under the Commissions of Inquiry Act, 1952. 3.8 Other Significant Measures Undertaken or Commissioned by Central Vigilance Commission CVC has recently commissioned a project to Indian Institute of Management Ahmedabad (IIM-A) to develop an Integrity Index for Central Public Sector 198 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 199 Undertakings (CPSUs). The scope of the project is to: (a) develop a conceptual understanding of integrity index, (b) develop a methodology to construct an integrity index, (c) implement the same in select twenty five CPSUs / Government agencies, and (d) recommend an ecosystem in CVC to institutionalize the Integrity Index development and implementation. According to CVC, the development of Integrity Index is an important step towards enhancing transparency in public organizations. Organizations tend to correct deviant behavior on ethical values by developing a legal compliance program. This is based on the premises —if it is legal it is ethical. However, legal compliance does not motivate or ensure commitment to moral and ethical values in an organization. An alternative approach is to use integrity as a governing ethics of the organization. Accordingly, a strategy based on the integrity aligns organizations to a more robust standard. Integrity, long term sustainability and profitability are all closely linked and can help public organizations create islands of excellence in the medium to long term while achieving all the objectives. 3.9 Conclusion The Central Vigilance Commission has issued a directive that all Govt. organizations over which the Commission has jurisdiction should publish their tenders and complete bid documents along with the application forms on the website. This is the first step towards e-procurement and would help in curbing malpractices prevailing in various Govt. organizations where competition is sought to be restricted. The directive of the Central Vigilance Commission for introducing e-payment is to leverage technological advances in banking sector for the benefit of rest of the governmental set up. In view of the alarming rise in Bank frauds, the CVC has undertaken a review and analysis of top 100 Banks Frauds, as on 31.03.2017. The findings have been shared with RBI and Department of Financial Services (Ministry of Finance). The Department of Financial Services has circulated the analysis done by CVC amongst all Public Sector Banks and understandably it has benefitted them in developing a rule-based prudent financial structure. 3.10 Summary • Central Vigilence Commission was established on 2nd. 202 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 203 4.1 Introduction Central Bureau of Investigation is basically a Principal investigating agency mainly under the control of Central Government. It has an added responsibiliy of assisting the inquiry of the C.V.C. In 1941 the Government of India by an excutive order, first created a Special Police Establishment. Its major function was to investigate alleged bribery and corruption in War Supply Department. Then it was called DefenceDepartment In 1942 the investigating jurisdiction of Special Police Establishemnt extended to Railway Department. Finally in 1946, it included with Home Department. In 1963 Special Police Establishment became a part of the newly created investigating authority, called Central Bureau of Investigation, which established in 1st. April 1963, as an attached part of the Ministry of Home Affairs. At present it is attached with Ministry of Persnnel, Public Grivances and pension. Its prime duty is to prepare a report, and to make programme for implementing a comprehensive plan of action for vigilent and anti-corruption activities. It has altoghter Eight Divisions; One Unit; One prosecution Directorate and One Laboratories. Name of Eight Divisions are : (a) Anti-corruption Division; (b) Special Crime Divisions; (c) Economic Offence Division; (d) Policy Division; (e) Administrative Division; (f) System Division; (g) co-ordination Division; (h) Training division. Name of the unit is Technical Advisory unit. The Name of the prosecution Directorate is Directorate of Prosecution.The name of the Laboratory is Central Forensiclaboratory. 4.2 Genesis The Central traces its origin to the Special Police Establishment (SPE) which was set up in 1941 by the Government of India. The functions of the SPE then were to investigate cases of bribery and corruption in transactions with the War and Supply Department of India during World War-

Superintendence of the SPE was vested with the responsibility of War Department.

Even after the end of the War, the need for a Central Government agency to investigate cases of bribery and corruption by Central Government employees was felt. The Delhi Special Police Establishment (DPSE) Act was therefore brought into force in 1946 with a view to investigate serious crimes related to defense of India, corruption in high places, serious fraud, cheating and embezzlement and social crime, DSPE acquired its popular current name, Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI), through a Home Ministry resolution dated 01.04.1963.

Initially the offences that were notified by the Central Government related only to corruption by Central Govt. servants was investigated by CBI. In due course, with the setting up of a large number of public sector undertakings, the employees of these undertakings were also brought under CBI purview. Similarly, with the nationalization of the banks in 1969, the Public Sector Banks and their employees also came within the ambit of the CBI. From 1965 onwards, the CBI has also been entrusted with the investigation of economic offences and important conventional crimes on a selective basis. The SPE initially had two Wings. They were the General Offences Wing (GOW) and Economic Offences Wing (EOW). The GOW dealt with cases of bribery and corruption involving the employees of Central Government and Public Sector Undertakings. The EOW dealt with cases of violation of various economic/fiscal laws. Under this set up, the GOW had at least one Branch in each State and the EOW in the four metropolitan cities, i.e, Delhi, Madras, Bombay and Calcutta. These EOW Branches dealt with offences reported from the Regions, i.e, each Branch had jurisdiction over several States. As the CBI, over the years, established a reputation for impartiality and competence, demands were made on it to take up investigation of more cases of conventional crime. Apart from this, even the Supreme Court and the various High Courts of the country also started entrusting such cases for investigation to the CBI on petitions filed by aggrieved parties. It was therefore decided in 1987 to constitute two investigation divisions in the CBI, namely, Anti-Corruption Division and Special Crimes Division, the latter dealing with cases of conventional crime, besides economic offences. 4.3 Jurisdiction The CBI is not a statutory body.

The legal powers of investigation of the CBI are derived from the DSPE Act 1946, which confers powers, duties, privileges and liabilities on the Delhi Special Police Establishment (CBI) and officers of the Union Territories. The central government may extend to any area (except Union Territories) the powers and jurisdiction of the CBI for investigation, subject to the consent of 204

NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 205 the government of the concerned state.
Law and order being a state responsibility as “police” is a State subject, the jurisdiction to investigate crime lies with the state police exclusively. However, the High Courts and the Supreme Court have the jurisdiction to order a CBI investigation into an offence alleged to have been committed in a state without the state's consent, according to a five-judge constitutional bench of the Supreme Court (in Civil Appeals 6249 and 6250 of 2001) on 17 Feb 2010. The CBI being a Union subject may investigate: I. Offences against central-government employees, or concerning affairs of the central government and employees of central public-sector undertakings and public-sector banks. II. Cases involving the financial interests of the central government. III. Breaches of central laws enforceable by the Government of India. IV. Major fraud or embezzlement; multi-state organized crime. V. Multi-agency or international cases.

CBI can take over the investigation of a criminal case registered by the State Police in the following situations (i) The concerned State Government makes a request to that effect and the Central Government agrees to it (Central Government generally seeks comment of CBI before deciding upon the request of the State) (ii) The State Government issues notification of consent under section 6 of the DSPE Act and the Central Government issues notification under section 5 of the DSPE Act (iii) The Supreme Court or High Courts orders CBI to take up such investigations. As per section 2 of the DSPE Act, CBI can suo-moto take up investigation of offences notified in section 3 only in the Union Territories. Taking up investigation by CBI in the boundaries of a State requires prior consent of that State as per Section 6 of the DSPE Act.
206 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 207 Recently, much controversy had been created over the withdrawal of 'general consent' for CBI investigation by the states of Andhra Pradesh and West Bengal, and the streets of Kolkata had witnessed confrontation between state police and CBI officials over jurisdictional issues. Though the matter of a federal crisis reached the Supreme Court and a working truce was achieved between the two units, drawing of jurisdictional boundaries between CBI and state police remain an unfinished agenda. While the premier investigation agency have been deeply mired in political controversy as a result, it is desirable that all anti-corruption and law enforcement agencies work in tandem to tackle the menace of corruption effectively. The International Police Criminal Organization (ICPO or Interpol) has emerged as an important institution for strengthening cooperation amongst law enforcement agencies of various countries. As Interpol of India, CBI acts as an interface between the law enforcement agencies of India and other countries to ensure such cooperation. It facilitates exchange and sharing of information by these agencies. It also gets the red notices of the fugitive criminals, wanted in India, published. Besides above it also plays a role in negotiation and finalization of Mutual Legal Assistance Treaties (MLATs) and Extradition Treaties between India and other countries. CBI also facilitates execution of Letter of Requests for Investigation in India and out of India. 4.4 Divisions of Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) CBI has grown into a multidisciplinary investigation agency over a period of time. Today it has the following three divisions for investigation of crime. (i) Anti-Corruption Division - for investigation of cases under the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1988 against Public officials and the employees of Central Government, Public Sector Undertakings, Corporations or Bodies owned or controlled by the Government of India - it is the largest division having presence almost in all the States. (ii) Economic Offences Division - for investigation of major financial scams and serious economic frauds, including crimes relating to fake Indian currency notes, Bank frauds and cyber-crime. (iii) Special Crimes Division - for investigation of serious, sensational and organized crime under the Indian Penal Code and other laws on the requests of State Governments or on the orders of the Supreme Court and High Courts.

The laws under which CBI can investigate Crime are notified by the Central Government under section 3 of the DSPE Act.

The Director of CBI has been provided security of two-year tenure in office by the CVC Act, 2003 (Vineet Narain Case). In Vineet Narain&Othrs v Union of India AIR 1996 SC 3386, the Supreme Court ruled that the Central Vigilance Commission should have a supervisory role over the CBI. The Court agreed that the CBI had failed in its responsibility to investigate allegations of public corruption. It laid down guidelines to ensure independence and autonomy of the CBI and ordered that the CBI be placed under the supervision of the Central Vigilance Commission (CVC), an independent governmental agency intended to be free from executive control or interference. This directive removed the CBI from the supervision of the Central Governmentthought to be partly responsible for the inertia that contributed to the CBI's previous lack of urgency with respect to the investigation of high-ranking officials. The Court in this case had struck down the validity of a directive issued by the Ministries and Departments in the Central Government that required the CBI to seek approval of the Central Government before pursuing investigation against bureaucrats of the level of Joint Secretary and above on grounds that it violated the independence of the investigative process. However, the Central Vigilance Commissioner Act, 2003, reinstated this requirement. This directive was again struck down by the Supreme Court in the course of another judgment in 2014 on the basis that it violated the right to equality guaranteed by the Constitution. Before the Lokpal Act was legislated, the CVC Act, 2003 used to provide the mechanism for the selection of the Director of CBI and other officers of the rank of SP and above in the CBI. Now, the Lokpal Act, 2013 governs the appointment of the CBI director. The amended Delhi Special Police Establishment Act 1946 (as amended through The Lokpal and Lokayuktas

Caged Parrot The Supreme Court had raised questions on the CBI's independence while hearing the Coalgate scam case, and had called it a "caged parrot speaking in its master's voice". It was revealed before the Court that a classified enquiry report of the CBI in the Court-monitored investigation had an unauthorized accessed by a Union Minister. The Supreme Court had then asked the Centre to make the CBI impartial and said it needs to be ensured that the CBI functions free of all external pressures. In response, the Central Government had filed an affidavit saying that the CBI director would be appointed by a collegium comprising

of the Prime Minister, Chief Justice of India and Leader of the Opposition. The CBI director cannot be appointed or removed without the consent of this collegium, it assured the Supreme Court. As per the affidavit, the CBI director can be removed before expiry of fixed tenure of minimum two years on the ground of misbehaviour only. But the President can issue such an order only after an inquiry. It also stated that there will be an accountability commission headed by three retired Supreme Court or High Court judges which will look into cases of grievances against the CBI director. Eventually the Lokpal and Lokayukta Act, 2013 has incorporated the conditions stated in the said affidavit and indeed a collegium comprising

has exercised its power to appoint the Director of the CBI in the subsequent period. However, the debates around the independence (or the lack of it) of the CBI has refused to die in popular nomenclature, and the 'caged parrot' remark has returned to create a political furore over every high- profile investigation by the CBI involving political personalities in the subsequent

208 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 209 years. As a result, the image of the CBI as an impartial agency has been damaged irreversibly and the main anti-corruption agenda has somewhat been lost in the political conundrum. 4.7 Infighting in the Central Bureau of Investigation or CBI vs. CBI Murky and ugly details of an embattled CBI came out in the open in July, 2018 when the CBI told the Central Vigilance Commission (CVC) that special director Rakesh Asthana was not authorized to represent director Alok Verma in the search committee meetings. The fight became a full blown war by mid-October, 2018 when the CBI lodged an FIR against special director Rakesh Asthana on charges of bribery. A week later, the government intervened through a midnight order on October 23, 2018 appointing M. Nageshwar Rao as interim director of the CBI. Director Alok Verma and special director Rakesh Asthana were sent on forced leave. This unprecedented situation certainly revealed that all is not well in the top echelons of the CBI and it was known to authorities under whose jurisdiction the agency functions. In-house mechanisms to probe complaints against CBI personnel accused of bribery in pursuit of cases was put under severe scrutiny which eventually threatened to engulf the very credibility of the CBI. Former head of Bureau of Police Research, N.R. Wassan, who had a stint in the CBI, termed the quagmire as a "culminated result of decline in its overall functioning and standards of probity that started few years ago. The successive Directors, some of whom have been under a cloud, failed to stem the rot so much so that some insiders believe that the corruption in the organization at various levels has reached alarming proportions and will require a massive purge and overhaul to restore its original glory." 4.8 Conclusion While anti-corruption activism in India has seen both upswing and downswing in the past decade, the CBI vs. CBI infighting has bared the filth hiding beneath the facade. An agency battling to recover lost reputation in a politically charged milieu has no graver danger than an infighting which exposes its very credibility. The purge by the government may have diverted the popular attention, but the stain on CBI has become permanent. Sadly, this has potential for far-reaching consequences in the fight against corruption in India. 210 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 211 4.9 Summary • Central Bureau of Investigation, is given the charge of number of cases for investigation. The Act is important because it helps to ensure the transparency, accountability of the Representative Government to the people. This act actually synthesise the Democratic administration and effective performance of the Government. This synthesisation is important because it creats an ambiance of good Governance. To enhancement of efficiencies and competencies of the Government, is considered as the basic focus of New Public Management. In modern age people who are interested to establish and activate their right in decision making process, always require proper information regarding functioning of the Government. Thus they use information regarding governmental activities. With this they participate in the process at least indirectly. Logically therefore, "People's governance emerges, only when the Representatives assured the good governance". 5.2 Genesis In 1982 the Supreme Court of India, hearing a matter relating to the transfer of judges, held that the right to information was a fundamental right under the Indian Constitution. The judges stated that : the functioning of Government must be the rule, and secrecy an exception justified only where the strictest requirement of public interest so demands.

The approach of the Court must be to attenuate the area of secrecy as much as possible consistently with the requirement of public interest, bearing in mind all the time that disclosure also serves an important aspect of public interest," (SP Gupta & others vs The President of India and others, 1982, AIR (SC) 149, p. 234). From the early 1990s, the Mazdoor Kisan Shakti Sangathan (MKSS) started a grassroots movement in the villages of Rajasthan, demanding access to government information on behalf of the wage workers and small farmers who were often deprived of their rightful wages or their just benefits under government schemes. The MKSS transformed what was till then mainly an urban idea pushed by a few activists and academics, into a mass movement that quickly spread not only across the state of Rajasthan but also to other parts of the country. It was mainly as a result of this rapid spread of the demand for transparency that the need to have a national body, that coordinated and oversaw the formulation of a national RTI legislation, began to be felt. In August, 1996, a meeting was convened at the Gandhi Peace Foundation in New Delhi where

formed. The NCPRI and the Press Council of India formulated the initial draft, under the guidance of Justice P.B. Sawant, retired judge of the Supreme Court of India and Chairman of the Press Council. The draft was then presented to the Government of India which set up another committee. This committee came up with a somewhat watered down version of the act in 1997. This draft was further amended and introduced in Parliament, in 2000, as the Freedom of Information Bill. Soon after, the Freedom of Information Bill was introduced in Parliament, in 2000, it was referred to a select committee of Parliament, which invited comments from the public. In the National Democratic Alliance (NDA) regime, the Bill was passed by Parliament, with almost no amendments or changes, in December 2002. Essentially, the five indicators of a strong transparency law can be seen to be minimum exclusions, mandatory 214 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 215 and reasonable timelines, independent appeals, stringent penalties and universal accessibility. The 2002 Act failed on most of these counts. It excluded a large number of intelligence and security agencies from the ambit of the Act, it had no mechanism for independent appeals and prescribed no penalties for violation of the Act. Soon after the United Progressive Alliance (UPA) government, came to power in 2004. The National Advisory Council was formed. The National Advisory Council (NAC) of this regime had, a good number of members, many who had either been central to the RTI movement or were sympathetic to its demands. This led to the NAC recommending to the Government of India the enactment of an RTI Bill that had been drafted by civil society groups and adopted by the NAC. The passage of the Bill was not smooth and there were many ups and downs, but finally in May 2005 the Indian Parliament passed the RTI Act, which got the assent of the President of India in June 2005. 5.3 Global Agenda UNESCO has been designated by the UN General Assembly as the custodian agency for global monitoring of part of the Sustainable Development Goal target 16.10.2 in terms of which all countries should ensure ''public access to information and protect fundamental freedoms, in accordance with national legislation and international agreements. Since 2016 UNESCO marks 28 September as the "International Day for Universal Access to Information" (IDUAI), following adoption of the 38 C/Resolution 57 declaring 28 September of every year as International Day for Universal Access to Information (IDUAI). As per Transparency International, globally approximately 120 countries have right to information laws. In some countries these laws are appreciable, while in others, the laws either don't exist or need significant improvements. 5.4 Meaning of 'Information' and 'Matter of Right's' The basic object of the Right to Information Act is to empower the citizens, to promote transparency and accountability in the working of the Government, to contain corruption, and to enhance people's participation in democratic process thereby making our democracy work for the people in a real sense. It goes without saying that 216 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 217 an informed citizen is better equipped to keep necessary vigil on the instruments of governance and make the government more accountable to the governed. Section 2 (f) of the RTI Act treats information as any material in any form, including records, documents, memos, e-mails, opinions, advices, press releases, circulars, orders, log book, contracts, reports, papers, samples, models, data material held in any electronic form and information relating to any private body which can be accessed by a public authority under any other law for the time being in force. A "public authority" is defined as any authority or body or institution of self- government established or constituted by or under the Constitution; or by any other

or order made by the Central Government or a State Government. The bodies owned, controlled or substantially financed by the Central Government or a State Government are also public authorities. Non-Government organizations substantially financed by the Central Government or a State Government also fall within the definition of public authority. The Act does not define substantial financing. Public authorities have designated some of its officers as Public Information Officers. They are responsible to give information to a person who seeks information under the RTI Act. A citizen has a right to seek such information from a public authority which is held by the public authority or which is held under its control. This right includes inspection of work, documents and records; taking notes, extracts or certified copies of documents or records; and taking certified samples of material held by the public authority or held under the control of the public authority. It is important to note that only such information can be supplied under the Act that is available and existing and is held by the public authority or is held under the control of the public authority. The Public Information Officer is not supposed to create information that is not a part of the record of the public authority. The Public Information Officer is also not required to furnish information which require drawing of inference and/or making of assumptions; or to interpret information; or to solve the problems raised by the applicants; or to furnish replies to hypothetical questions. The Act does not require the Public Information Officer to deduce some conclusion from the 'material' and supply the 'conclusion' so deduced to the applicant. It means that the Public Information Officer is required to supply the 'material' in the form as held by the public authority, but not to do research on behalf of the citizen to deduce anything from the material and then supply it to him.
216 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 217 5.5 Information Exempt from Disclosure The RTI Act has over-riding effect vis-à-vis other laws. It implies that if any of the provisions of the RTI Act are not consistent with any other law for the time being in force including the Official Secrets Act, 1923, the provisions of the RTI Act would have effect. Sub-section (1) of section 8 and section 9 of the Act enumerate the types of information which is exempt from disclosure. Sub-section (2) of section 8, however, provides that information exempted under sub-section (1)

or exempted under the Official Secrets Act, 1923 can be disclosed if public interest in disclosure overweighs the harm to the protected interests. The information

would cease to be exempted if 20 years have lapsed after occurrence of the incident to which the information relates.

However, the following types of information would continue to be exempt and there would be no obligation, even after lapse of 20 years, to give any citizen- (i) Information, disclosure of which would prejudicially affect the sovereignty and integrity of India, the security, strategic, scientific or economic interest of the State, relation with foreign state or lead to incitement of an offence; (ii) Information, the disclosure of which would cause a breach of privilege of Parliament or State Legislature; (iii) Cabinet papers including records of deliberations of the Council of Ministers, Secretaries and other Officers subject to the conditions given in proviso to clause (i) of sub-section (1) of Section 8 of the Act. Third party information including commercial confidence, trade secrets or intellectual property, the disclosure of which would harm the competitive position of a third party, is exempt from disclosure. Third party in relation to the Act means a person other than the citizen making a request for information. Such information should not be disclosed unless the competent authority is satisfied that larger public interest warrants the disclosure of such information. If third party has treated that information as confidential then third party should be given full opportunity to put his case for non-disclosure if he desires that the information should not be disclosed. If an

218 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 219 appeal has been filed by the third party against the decision of the Public Information Officer to disclose the third party information, the information should not be disclosed till the appeal is decided. Intelligence and security organizations specified in the Second Schedule to the RTI Act, 2005 are exempt from furnishing information under the Act. However, this exemption does not apply if the requested information pertains to the allegations of corruption and human rights violations. 5.6 Working Mechanisms of the RTI Regime Public authorities are the repository of information which the citizens have a right to access under the Right to Information Act, 2005. The Act casts important obligations on public authorities so as to facilitate the citizens of the country to access the information held under their control. Government may prescribe categories of information to be published by any public authority. It need be stressed that publication of the information as referred to above is not optional. It is a statutory requirement which every public authority is bound to meet. The mandate for suo motu or voluntary disclosure of information through website and other medium is contained in Section 4(1)(b) of the Act. This section has now emerged as the focal point at which most disclosure related efforts of the Public Authorities converge. As per the mandate of the Act, every public authority is required to designate Public Information Officers (PIOs) and Assistant Public Information Officers in all the administrative units or offices under it. All public authorities with more than one PIO should create a RTI Cell within the organization to receive all the RTI applications and first appeals and to route them to the concerned PIOs/First Appellate Authority (FAAs). The first Appellate Authority has a very important role under the RTI Act, 2005. The independent and judicious examination of appeals by the First Appellate Authorities (FAAs) would lead to higher satisfaction to the appellants. This would, in turn, result in less number of second appeals to the Information Commission. A citizen, who desires to obtain any information under the Act, should make an application to the Public Information Officer of the concerned public authority in writing in English or Hindi or in the official language of the area in which the application is made. He should make payment of application fee at the time of submitting the application as prescribed in the RTI Rules, 2012.
218 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 219 Sub-section (8) of Section 7 of the RTI Act provides that where a request for information is rejected, the Public Information Officer shall, inter-alia, communicate the particulars of the Appellate Authority to the person making the request. If the applicant does not receive information or decision about rejection of request or communication about payment of additional fee within the specified time, he can make an appeal to the First Appellate Authority. Appeal can also be made if the applicant is aggrieved by the decision of the Public Information Officer regarding supply of information or the quantum of fee decided by the Public Information Officer. The applicant may prefer the first appeal within thirty days from the expiry of such period or from the receipt of such a decision of the Public Information Officer. The first appellate authority should dispose off the appeal within 30 days of receipt of the appeal. If the first appellate authority fails to pass an order on the appeal within the prescribed period or if the appellant is not satisfied with the order of the first appellate authority, he may prefer a second appeal with the Information Commission within ninety days from the date on which the decision should have been made by the first appellate authority or was actually received by the appellant.

Where the Information Commission at the time of deciding any complaint or second appeal is of the opinion that the PIO has without any reasonable cause, refused to receive an application for information or has not furnished information within the time specified or malafidely denied the request for information or knowingly given incorrect, incomplete or misleading information or destroyed information which was the subject of the request or obstructed in any manner in furnishing the information, it shall impose a penalty of two hundred and fifty rupees each day till application is received or information is furnished subject to the condition that the total amount of such penalty shall not exceed twenty-five thousand rupees. The Public Information Officer shall, however, be given a reasonable opportunity of being heard before any penalty is imposed on him. While the clause of monetary penalty does make RTI a potent law, section 21 of the Act does provide some immunity cover to PIOs and FAAs in stating that no suit, prosecution or other legal proceeding shall lie against any person for anything which is in good faith

220 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 221 5.7 Composition of Central Information Commission (CIC) and Tenure of Office Under the provision of Section-12 of RTI Act, 2005 the Central Government shall, by notification in the Official Gazette, constitute a body to be known as the Central Information Commission. Commission shall consist of the Chief Information Commissioner (CIC) and such number of

Central Information Commissioners not exceeding 10 as may be deemed necessary. Section 12(5) of the RTI Act 2005 provides that the Chief Information Commissioner and Information Commissioners shall be persons of eminence in public life with wide knowledge and experience in law, science and technology, social service, management, journalism, mass media or administration and governance.

Section 12(6) of the RTI Act 2005 provides that Chief Information Commissioner or an Information Commissioner

shall hold office for a term of five years from the date on which he enters upon his office and

shall not be eligible for reappointment as such Information Commissioners provided. However, the Right to Information (Amendment) Act, 2019 has modified the terms of office for CIC and IC. The original Act allowed a five year term or until the age of 65, whichever is earlier. The amendment proposes that the appointment will be "

In the original Act, the Chief Information Commissioner (CIC) was paid as much salary as the Chief Election Commissioner and the Information Commissioners were paid as much salary as Election Commissioners. The amendment provides for salaries to be "prescribed by the Centre". The Central Information Commission has been constituted with effect from 12- 10-2005 under the Right to Information Act, 2005. The jurisdiction of the Commission 220 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 221 extends over all Central Public Authorities. The Commission has certain powers and functions mentioned in sections 18, 19, 20 and 25 of the RTI Act, 2005.These broadly relate to adjudication in second appeal for giving information; direction for record keeping, suo-motu disclosures receiving and enquiring into a complaint on inability to file RTI etc., imposition of penalties and Monitoring and Reporting including preparation of an Annual Report. The decisions of the Commission are final and binding. 5.8 Jurisdiction and Powers of Central Information Commission (CIC) As Second Appellate Authority, the Commission has jurisdiction over all public authorities under Government of India which are established, constituted, owned, controlled and substantially financed by funds provided directly or indirectly by the Central Government or the Union territory administration including NCT of Delhi. These include all Ministries/Departments, Public Sector Undertakings under the Government of India. Central Information Commission does not have jurisdiction over a State Information Commission nor a complaint or appeal can be filed in this Commission against an order of a State Information Commission. A second appeal under section 19 (3) of the RTI Act, 2005 is filed against an order of the FAA in a public authority or when the FAA does not make a decision within the specified time. A complaint under section 18 of the Act may be filed directly on the grounds mentioned in sub-section (1) of this section. The main difference between a complaint and a second appeal is that in the case of an appeal, this Commission may pass orders directing the CPIO to provide the requested information to the appellant in appropriate cases whereas such orders cannot be passed while dealing with a complaint. In any appeal proceedings, the onus to prove that a denial of a request was justified shall be on the Central Public Information Officer or State Public Information Officer,

as the case may be, who denied the request. In its decision, the Central Information Commission or State Information Commission, as the case may be, has the power to— (a) require the public authority to take any such steps as may be necessary to secure compliance with the provisions of this Act, including—222 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 223 • by providing access to information, if so requested, in a particular form; • by appointing

as the case may be; • by publishing certain information or categories of information; • by making necessary changes to its practices in relation to the maintenance, management and destruction of records; • by enhancing the provision of training on the right to information for its officials; • by providing it with an annual report in compliance with clause (b) of sub-section (1) of section 4; (b) require the public authority to compensate the complainant for any loss or other detriment suffered; (c) impose any of the penalties provided under this Act; (d) reject the application. Where the Central Information Commission or State Information Commission, is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to inquire into the matter, it may initiate an inquiry in respect thereof. The Central Information Commission or State Information Commission, shall, while inquiring into any matter under this section, have the same powers as are vested in a civil court while trying a suit under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908. Notwithstanding anything inconsistent contained in any other Act of Parliament or State Legislature, as the case may be, the Central Information Commission or the State Information Commission may, during the inquiry of any complaint under RTI Act, examine any record to which the RTI Act, 2005 applies which is under the control of the public authority, and no such record may be withheld from it on any grounds. 5.9 Conclusion While the initial premise of the RTI regime seemed groundbreaking, there has to be some frank and honest assessment of the dispensation in has entailed. Many stumbling blocks have emerged in the operational aspect that were hitherto not envisaged, as a result of which the RTI story is not shining anymore.
222 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 223 Studies conducted by RTI Assessment and Advocacy Group (RAAG) and Samya-Centre for Equity Studies (CES)exhibit some startling pictures. Their research finds there is poor awareness about the RTI Act, worse in rural areas than in urban areas. In 64% of the rural Focus Group Discussions (FGDs) and 62% of urban FGDs, no participant had heard of the RTI Act. The participation of women in the RTI process, especially as applicants, has been minimal, with a national average of 8%. Except for first appeals filed with the central government or Delhi government, there is less than 4% chance of getting any information by filing a first appeal. Applicants, especially from the weaker segments of society, are often intimidated, threatened and even physically attacked when they go to submit an RTI application, or as a consequence of their submitting such an application. In some cases there is resentment among PIOs as they have to deal with a large number of RTI applications in addition to their normal work. One major constraint faced by PIOs is the poor state of record management in most public authorities. Nearly 45% of the PIOs have not received any training on the RTI Act. There are huge and growing delays in the disposal of cases in many of the information commissions, with pendency of cases growing every month. The main reasons behind the delays seem to be the paucity of commissioners in some of the commissions. A Commonwealth Human Rights Initiative (CHRI) report titled "State of Information Commissions and the Use of RTI Laws in India" (March, 2018) concurs on the above findings and offers some negative perspectives. By 2018 a total of 153 posts of Information Commissioners (including the Chief Information Commissioners) had been created across the country (including the JKSIC). The report finds that there are 146 posts of Chief Information Commissioners and Information Commissioners created across the country of which more than 25% of the posts (Chief ICs and ICs) are lying vacant. Almost 90% of the Information Commissions (25 of 28) are headed by retired civil servants and more than half (53.6%) of the Chief Information Commissioners are retired IAS officers. While the volume of RTI applications received by all reporting jurisdictions between 2005-2017 has gone up to 2.23 crores, the report also notes that despite the Central RTI Act being in existence for more than 13 years and the J&K RTI Act being in existence for more than 9 years, the proportion of RTI users has not risen to even 0.5% of the population or even 1% of the electorate.

224 NSOU CC-PA-03 NSOU CC-PA-03 225 The blame for mixed results of the RTI regime should not be put to awareness issues or structural constraints alone. Government offices/Public Authorities have failed the system. A Transparency Audit of Disclosures u/s 4 of the Right to Information Act, commissioned by the Central Information Commission, reveals that certain vital information is not voluntarily disclosed on the official websites of the different government departments. The missing information falls in the following categories: • Decision-making process, the delegation of powers, duties, and responsibilities of officials and the system of compensation paid to them; • Information relating to consultation with public on the proposed major policy decisions, as required, are not available; • Minutes of meetings of various committees and boards, details of the relevant Acts, rules, instruments, manuals, office orders, custodians of various categories of documents held by the organization; • Policy on transfer and posting of senior officers deployed at important and sensitive places; • RTI applications and appeals received and their responses, details of Public Information Officers, Appellate Authority, Nodal Officer and other facilities available to citizens for obtaining information; • Details of domestic and foreign visits undertaken by the senior officials; • Details of the mechanism to redress grievances of affected persons, mainly employees, clients, and customers; • Discretionary and Non-discretionary Grants and details of the beneficiaries of subsidy; • Criteria/for allocation and utilization of CSR funds by the Public Sector Enterprises; • Sources and methods of funding political parties or identification of donors; and,Details about Public-Private Partnerships and outcomes of sucventures

The Morley Minto Reforms 1909 • The Main Provisions – The Indian Councils Act (1909) considerably increased the strength of legislative councils - the Imperial and provincial. For the Imperial benefit, the Supreme Council, added the number of additional members. It was raised from 16 to 60. For major provincial councils, the number was raised to 50 and for minor provinces it was fixed to 30. The additional members were both nominated and elected. The principle of election was functional representation. In the Supreme Legislative Council, the official majority was maintained through the provincial councils, the non-officials shaped the majority. The Act definitely expanded the functions of the legislative councils. They were concerned in discussions on the budget (The Annual Financial statement), discussion on any matter of general public interest and thirdly the power of asking questions. The Act also increased the number of Executive Councillors in the three major Presidencies - Bombay, Madras and Bengal. Indians were now appointed as members of the Secretary of States' Council (1907) and members of the Governor-Generals' Council (1909). 2.6

public services which were in office before independence. The Indian Civil Service and the Indian Police Service were the two All India Services that helped the country to hold together. The other All India Services included the medical, engineering, forest, educational and others. The Indian Civil Services was the most pivotal and prized of these services. Its members occupied positions in the executive councils of the Governor General of India and the provincial Governors. Most of the posts of Secretaries to the departments in the Central and provincial governments and of heads of executive departments were held by them. ICS men were district collectors- and magistrates deputy commissioners. Before independence, the officers of the ICS and other All India Services were appointed by the Secretary of State for India. After independence, under the India Independence Act, 1947, the ICS and other officers in All India Services, who continued in office, became officers in the service of the Government of India. At independence about two hundred and fifty (250) European ICS officers retired, while about fifty (50)of them opted to be in office here. Vallabhbhai Patel, India's Home Minister realised the dire need of the Indian members of the ICS continuing in service here after 1947. He assured to honour the existing terms and security of their tenure. They did contribute to the stability and continuity of the Indian administration. After independence the Indian Civil Services was replaced by the Indian Administrative services. A larger number of the officers in the IAS and the Indian Police Service (that replaced the Imperial Police Service) were required to replace, the former services. They had to man the posts in the recently merged princely states. Much more than that, the character of these All India Services had changed after independence. India became a democracy after independence. The services had now to serve the people of the country, and not the imperial masters. of India. This is because the states are able to gauge the needs and concerns of their people more effectively and hence, are more efficient in addressing them. Factors like historical backgrounds, differences in resources endowments etc. lead to the widening horizontal imbalances. Thus, as he has enshrined in the constitution of India, the recognition of these two problems Dr. Ambedkar has made several provisions to bridge the gap of finance between the centre and the states. These includes various articles in the constitution like article 268, which facilitates levy of duties by the centre but equips the state to collect and retain the same. Similarly there are article 269, 270, 275, 282 and 293 all of which specify ways and means of sharing resources between union and states. Also Act 280 as a whole speak of finance commission.

The Karnataka Lokayukta Act was recently amended by the state government following the resignation of the Lokayukta, Justice Santosh Hegde. Justice Hegde had been demanding additional powers for the Lokayukta - especially the power to investigate suo-motu. Following the amendment, the Lokayukta has been given the suo motu powers to investigate all public servants except the Chief Minister, Ministers, Legislators and those nominated by the government. Following are the main provisions of the Karnataka Lokayukta Act: • The public servants who are covered by the Act include the Chief Minister, Ministers, Legislators and all officers of the state government including the heads of bodies and corporations established by any law of the state legislature. • The body is constituted for a term of five years and consists of one Lokayukta and one or more Upalokayuktas. All members must have been judges, with either the Supreme Court or some High Court. • Members are appointed on the advice of the Chief Minister in consultation with the Chief Justice of the Karnataka High Court, the Chairman of the Karnataka Legislative Council, the Speaker of the Karnataka Legislative Assembly, and the Leader of Opposition in both Houses. • Investigations involving the Chief Minister, Ministers, Legislators and those nominated by the government must be based on written complaints. Other public servants can be investigated suo-motu. • Reports of the

PREFACE In a bid to standardize higher education in the country, the University Grants Commission (UGC) has introduced Choice Based Credit System (CBCS) based on five types of courses viz. core, generic, discipline specific elective, ability and skill enhancement for graduate students of all programmes at Honours level. This brings in the semester pattern which finds efficacy in sync with credit system, credit transfer, comprehensive continuous assessments and a graded pattern of evaluation. The objective is to offer learners ample flexibility to choose from a wide gamut of courses, as also to provide them lateral mobility between various educational institutions in the country where they can carry their acquired credits. I am happy to note that the university has been recently accredited by National Assessment and Accreditation Council of India (NAAC) with grade "A". UGC (Open and Distance Learning Programmes and Online Programmes) Regulations, 2020 have mandated compliance with CBCS for U.G. programmes for all the HEIs in this mode. Welcoming this paradigm shift in higher education, Netaji Subhas Open University (NSOU) has resolved to adopt CBCS from the academic session 2021-22 at the Under Graduate Degree Programme level. The present syllabus, framed in the spirit of syllabi recommended by UGC, lays due stress on all aspects envisaged in the curricular framework of the apex body on higher education. It will be imparted to learners over the six semesters of the Programme. Self Learning Material (SLMs) are the mainstay of Student Support Services (SSS) of an Open University. From a logistic point of view, NSOU has embarked upon CBCS presently with SLMs in English / Bengali. Eventually, the English version SLMs will be translated into Bengali too, for the benefit of learners. As always, all of our teaching faculties contributed in this process. In addition to this we have also requisioned the services of best academics in each domain in preparation of the new SLMs. I am sure they will be of commendable academic support. We look forward to proactive feedback from all stakeholders who will participate in the teaching-learning based on these study materials. It has been a very challenging task well executed by the teachers, officers & staff of the university, and I heartily congratulate all concerned in the preparation of these SLMs. I wish you all a grand success. Professor (Dr.) Ranjan Chakrabarti Vice-Chancellor

Introduction The provincial government or the state government is the constituent part of the federal structure of India. India is governed by the different layers of government namely- union or central, provincial or state government, union territories and national capital territory, although 73 rd and 74 th constitution amendment made the provision of local 10 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 government below the state government. Nationalist leaders resolved to form state governments keeping administrative and identity issues in mind. During the initial phase of post-independence, policy makers were apprehensive about the fissiparous tendency of linguistic provinces. Gradually, Indian federalism learned to cope up with the ethnic and linguistic demands; administrative boundary of each province reflects the cultural, linguistic and ethnic considerations. There are 29 states, 7 union territories and one national capital territory apart from numerous Panchayat and Municipal bodies. Chapter II of the Part VI of the constitution (Art.152-Art.167) deals with the structure and functions of the state government. There shall be a governor appointed by the President of India at the helm of the state government. He/she will be the State Legislature -comprising of Governor and one house or two houses.

States like Bihar, Andhra Pradesh, Karnataka, Madhya Pradesh have bi-cameral legislature and rest of the states do have single cameral legislature. The state legislature is responsible for making laws, rules and regulations for the state. Chapter V of the Part VI (Art.214-Art.231) makes provisions for High Court and Chapter VI (Art. 233A-Art.237) for the sub-divisional courts. The judges (Chief and other judges) are appointed by the President of India and the judges of the lower courts are appointed by the Governor. High courts adjudicate all the civil and criminal cases arising within the territorial boundary of the state. Apart from the political aspect of state government, there are several supporting offices manned by the permanent executive. Every department or ministry is headed by a political executive namely a minister and the administrative head

Minister has to depend on the advice of the secretary of his department. Coordination with the union administration and various departments of the state government is another important function of the secretariat. In addition to that policy implementation is supervised by it; even it helps the minister to prepare answer to the questions raised in legislative assembly. 1.2

Powers of the State government The Union government and the state government derive their powers, directly from the Constitution. The Constitution has adopted a three-fold distribution of legislative powers between the Union and states (Article 246). Schedule VII of the Constitution enumerates the subjects into three lists. List I or the Union List consists of the items over which the Union has exclusive powers of legislation. Similarly, List II or the State List comprises items over which the state has exclusive powers of legislation. There is yet another List (List III) known as the Concurrent List that comprises subjects over which both the Union and the states have powers to legislate. The residual powers are vested in the Union. We would now briefly discuss List II and List III, which enumerate the subjects over which the states have jurisdiction either exclusively or concurrently with the Union. i) State List The State List contains 59 items (originally 66 items in the Schedule VII) over which states have exclusive jurisdiction. Some of the important ones are- Public Order, Police, Agriculture, Public Health and Sanitation, Local Government, etc. These are subjects of maximum concern to the people, which can be better dealt with at the state level. These subjects are generally under the exclusive jurisdiction of the states, but under the following circumstances, the Parliament can legislate on these matters. a) In national interest, Council of States by a resolution of 2/3rd of its members present and voting may authorise the Parliament to legislate on a state subject. 12 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 Such authorisation may be for one year at a time, but can be renewed by a fresh resolution; b) Under a proclamation of emergency, the Parliament may legislate on a state subject; c) With the consent of two or more states, the Parliament may legislate on a state subject with respect to the consenting states; d) Parliament has powers to legislate with reference to any subject (including a state subject) for the purpose of implementing treaties or international agreements and conventions; and e) When a proclamation is issued by the President on the failure of Constitutional machinery in any state, s/he may declare that the powers of the state legislature shall be exercised by or under the authority of Parliament. ii) Concurrent List The Concurrent List, originally comprises 52 items (though the last item is numbered 47) over which the Union and state legislatures have concurrent jurisdiction. The important ones are- Criminal Law, Criminal Procedure, Marriage, Education, Civil Procedure, Insurance, Economic and Social Planning etc. While the Union and states can legislate on any of the subjects in the Concurrent List, predominance is given to the Union Legislature. It means that in case of repugnancy between the Union and a state law relating to the same subject, the former prevails. If, however, the state law was reserved for the assent of the President and has received such assent, the state law may prevail not withstanding such repugnancy, but it would still be competent for the Parliament to override such state law by subsequent legislation. Any dispute about the interpretation of the entries in the three lists is to be decided by the Courts. Following principles have been followed in such interpretation: a) In case of overlapping of a subject between the three lists, predominance is to be given to the Union Legislature; b) Each entry is given the widest importance that its words are capable of, without rendering another entry nugatory; and c) In order to determine whether a particular enactment falls under one entry or another, it's "pith and substance" is considered.

Legislation provides the framework for policy formulation, and arms the government with powers to implement the policies. At the state level, the function of providing the necessary legislative framework is performed by State Legislature. There is no uniformity in the organisation of State Legislatures in India. In this regard, a sizeable number of states have unicameral system and remaining like Andhra Pradesh, Bihar, Maharashtra, Karnataka etc. have bicameral system, that is, both Legislative Assembly and Legislative Council. Our Constitution provides that every state shall have at least one house, viz., the Legislative Assembly comprising 60 to 500 members (except Sikkim, Goa, Mizoram etc.) chosen by direct election on the basis of universal adult franchise from territorial constituencies. In addition, any state can create a second house, viz., Legislative Council if it so desires. This can be done by a resolution of the Assembly passed by a special majority (i.e., a majority of total membership of the Assembly not being less than two- thirds of the members actually present and voting) followed by an Act of Parliament. By the same process, an existing Legislative Council can be abolished also. The members of Legislative Council are indirectly elected. The election is to be in accordance with the principle of proportional representation by means of the single transferable vote. Duration of the Assembly is five years unless dissolved earlier by the Governor. Its term may be extended by Parliament during an Emergency up to a period of six months beyond the expiry of the proclamation of an Emergency by the President. Legislative Procedure i) Regarding a Money Bill a) A Money Bill can originate only in the Legislative Assembly and not in the Council. b) The Council cannot reject or modify this Bill passed by the Assembly. It can only make recommendations, which may or may not be accepted by the Assembly. The Bill as passed by the Assembly with or without modification is presented to the Governor for assent. If the Council does not return the Bill within 14 days, it can straightaway be presented to the Governor for her/his assent. Thus, the will of the Assembly ultimately prevails. The Council can at best delay its passage. 14 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ii) Regarding any Bill other than a Money Bill a) Such a Bill can originate in either House. b) If a Bill is passed by the Assembly, the Council may reject the Bill, modify it or may not pass it for three months. If the Bill is again passed by the Assembly with or without modification, the Council, on its second journey, may only delay it by one month. c) If a Bill originates in the Council and is rejected by theAssembly, the matter ends. d) Thus, in every way, the supremacy of the Assembly is established; more so, in case of Money Bills. The dispute between two houses is always resolved according to the will of the Assembly. This is in contrast to the Union Legislature where a dispute between the two Houses is resolved by a joint sitting. This is probably in recognition of the fact that the Upper House in Union Legislature is representative of the state. 1.3.2 Legislative control over administration Apart from providing necessary legislative support to the executive, the Legislature also acts as an instrument of popular control over administration. In a Parliamentary democracy like ours, this control is exercised in following forms: i) Assembly Questions The members of the Assembly have a right to ask questions from the government. They can also ask supplementary questions. This device keeps the government on its toes. Whenever weaknesses are noticed, the government is compelled to promise and take corrective action. ii) Discussions Apart from asking questions, the members may ask for discussions over important matters. They may also bring forward Call Attention Motions and Adjournment Motions on important public matters. Even if such motions are not allowed, a lot of information has to be supplied by the government and some discussion does take place. Here again the government is kept on a tight leash and has to answer the representatives of the people.

NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 15 iii)
Financial Control by Budget

No money can be raised and no expenditure can be incurred without a vote by the Legislature. By controlling the purse strings, the Legislature controls the programmes and activities of the government. It is true that by virtue of its majority in the Legislature, the government may ultimately get the money it wants, but during the process a lot of discussion takes place. This keeps the government in touch with the needs of the people. The discussion also highlights the weaknesses of the administration in the implementation of the voted programmes. iv) Post-expenditure Control The State Legislature also scrutinises the expenditure incurred by the government through the device of audit. Our Constitution provides for an integrated accounts and audit system. The Comptroller and Auditor General of India (CAG) gets the account of the state government audited and sends her/his report to the Assembly through the Governor. The Public Accounts Committee of the State Legislature goes through this report, examines and finally reports to the Legislature. Any instances of unauthorised, improper, or imprudent expenditure are, thus, discussed in detail and brought to the notice of the Legislature, which can then keep a vigilant eye on the government. v) Control through Legislative Committees Apart from the Public Accounts Committee mentioned earlier, there are several other committees, viz., Estimates Committee, Committee on Public Undertakings, Committee on Government Assurances, etc. These committees examine the various aspects of the working of the government and make useful suggestions. They also criticise the government for its failures and bring these failures to the notice of the Legislature and the people. This is a good device of exercising control over the government, as the Assembly is too unwieldy a body to examine the working of the government in detail. vi) Ministerial Responsibility The most potent function of the Legislature is to enforce the ministerial responsibility. In a parliamentary form of government, the political executive is a part of the Legislature and is responsible to it all the time. The government can be thrown out at any time by a vote of no-confidence or even on being rejected on its budget or any of the substantive legislative measures. As the political executive is always responsible to the legislature,

State and District Administration

16 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 become indirectly responsible to it through the ministers. In spite of these controls, it is often felt that the administration is not responsive enough. On the other hand, it is argued that the legislative control, especially the one through audit is too tight and takes away the initiative of the administrators. 1.4 State Council of Ministers As already mentioned, the executive power of the state is exercised in the name of the Governor, who is the Constitutional Head of the state. But, the Governor has to have a Council of Ministers with the Chief Minister as its Head to aid and advise her/him. However, for a few discretionary functions, the Governor has to act on the advice of the Council of Ministers. It means that the real executive power is exercised by the Council of Ministers. The Council of Ministers is appointed by the Governor on the advice of the Chief Minister and hold Office during her/his pleasure. It means that a Minister can also be dismissed by the Governor on the advice of the Chief Minister. On the pattern of the Union government, ministers in the state governments are of the following categories: i) Cabinet Ministers ii) Ministers of State iii) Deputy Ministers In a State, total number of Ministers, including the Chief Minister, in the council shall not exceed fifteen percent of the total number of members of the Legislative Assembly of that State. The system of Cabinet Committees is not so popular in the state governments as in the Central government. i) Powers and Functions of the Council of Ministers The Council of Ministers is the highest policy-making body of the state government. It lays down policy in respect to all matters within the legislative and administrative competence of the state government. The Council also reviews the implementation of the policy laid down by it and can revise any policy in view of the feedback received during implementation. Since the Governor has to exercise her/his executive powers on the advice of the Council of Ministers and all the executive power is exercised in the name of the Governor, there is no limitation on the powers of the Council except the following: NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 17 a) The limits imposed by the Constitution and the laws passed by the Union and State Legislature. b) Self-imposed limits to exclude consideration of less important matters of State and District Administration ii) Division of Work into Departments at the State Level According to the doctrine of Ministerial Responsibility, the Council of Ministers is collectively responsible to the StateAssembly. It is, however, impossible for the Council to take all the decisions collectively. During the early British period, the administration of the state was carried on by the Governor-in-Council.At that time, most of the decisions were taken collectively, because the number of decisions to be taken was not very large. With the passage of time, the scope of governmental activity increased and the matters that came up for the decision of the Council also proliferated. This led to the development of “portfolio system” in which the Councillors were placed in charge of certain specified subjects leaving only a few important matters to be placed before the whole Council. The same system has continued after Independence. Under our Constitution, the Governor has to make rules for the efficient conduct of business [Article 166(3)]. The state governments have framed “Allocation of Business Rules”, according to which the work is divided among different ministers. This division of work can be done on the basis of functions, or on the basis of clientele, or on geographical basis or on the basis of the combination of these factors. Very often, the division of work is decided on personal considerations rather than rational criteria. Most of the work in respect of subjects allotted to a Minister is disposed of by the Minister. However, according to the rules of business, some matters have to be reserved by the Minister for: a) Consideration of the Chief Minister These are called coordination cases, in these cases the Minister in charge of a portfolio records her/his recommendations and submits the file to the Chief Minister for her/his orders. Rules of business give a list of such cases. The Chief Minister may also reserve some cases or classes of cases for her/his orders. b) Presentation before the Cabinet These are important policy matters, which have wide repercussions. Important cases of disagreement between two or more ministers are also brought before the Cabinet for its decision. A list of such cases is given in the rules of business. In addition, the Chief Minister may require any particular case of any department 18 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 to be placed before the Cabinet. Afew of the typical Cabinet cases are given below: – Annual Financial Statement to be laid before the Legislature, and demands for supplementary grants. – Proposals affecting state finance, not approved by the Finance Minister. – Exemption of important matters from the purview of State Public Service Commission. – Proposals for imposition of new taxes, etc. The size and composition of the Council of Ministers is important for effective public administration. The Ministry and Cabinet come into existence for running the administration efficiently and impartially. In view of above, it needs to be compact and homogenous, its size being determined by administrative needs. It will depend on various factors such as the area of state, its population, level of economic development and specific problems. However, the present size of Council of Ministers in the states especially in larger ones appears to be disproportionate. In this context, an attempt was made by the 91st Constitutional Amendment introduced with effect from 1st January 2004 by restricting the size of Council of Ministers to a maximum of 15 per cent of the strength of the respective State LegislativeAssembly, but the problem still persists. In bigger states of India (for example, U.P. where the Assembly has a strength of 404 legislators), even this restriction has not prevented formation of jumbo sized Ministries. Hence, there is growing realisation that there is an urgent need to reduce the size of Council of Ministers in the states. The SARC has recommended that the maximum size of the Council of Ministers may be fixed in a range of 10% to 15% of the strength of their Legislative Assemblies. 1.5

constitution makers prepared the lay out of the state government as per the parliamentary system of government. It is the proto-type of union government. Each state government (like the union government) comprises of the nominal or the constitutional 22 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 head and the real head. The nominal head of the state government is known as the Governor. Constitutionally the functions of the state government are done in his name. Usually each state has separate Governor. According to Article 153 there shall be Governor for each state. Constitution has made provision for appointing the same governor for two or more states and union territories (Article 155). 2.2 Governor: Appointment, tenure, removal, privileges Governor is appointed by the President for 5 years. Article 155 of our constitution says

He or she may remain in the office during the pleasure of the President. The tenure of the governor is 5 years but may be removed from his post at any time if the President pleases to do so. The decisions of the President in this regard is not justiciable. Constitution lays down certain qualifications for the appointment of Governor. According to Article 157 to be Governor one needs to have the following qualifications: 1) He / she attains minimum 35 years of age, 2) An Indian citizen, 3) Cannot be the member of Parliament or state legislature. If he or she is the member of Parliament or state legislature at the time of appointment, he or she must resign from that membership at the time of assuming the charge of Governor's office., 4) He/she cannot hold any other office of profit. The Governor is entitled to official residence and other emoluments as determined by the Parliament through law. Before assuming office, the governor has to take the oath to protect, preserve and defend the constitution and the laws of the land. Special privileges: Once appointed the Governor enjoys some special privileges like : 1) He/she is not answerable before the court for discharging his/ her official activities, 2) No criminal charges can be brought against him/her during official tenure, 3) He cannot be arrested or issued arrest warrant during his/her tenure.

Powers and functions of the Governor Generally, as is earlier mentioned that

she discharges his/her official duties. In normal situation, the Governor acts as the ritual head of the state. But in certain cases, he/she uses his/her discretionary powers. So it can be safely said that the Governor enjoys some ritual or nominal powers and some discretionary powers. Under nominal heads, Governor has legislative, executive, financial and judicial functions to perform. Legislative functions 1) The governor is the integral part of the state legislature; he/she can summon the session, prorogue or dissolve the lower chamber of the state legislature i.e. Bidhan Sabha with the advice of the Chief Minister. 2) In the first session of the year or the new session after election, he/she delivers speech in front of the members of the Bidhan Sabha (where the state legislature is uni-cameral) or in the joint session (where the state legislature is bi-cameral) or he/she may send his/her message to the state legislature. 3) No bill will become law if it does not receive the consent of the Governor. The governor may give his/her consent on or sign the bill except the money bill. He/ she may send the bill to the concerned chamber of the state legislature for reconsideration. If the state legislaturere sends the bill after accommodating the suggestions or proposals given by the governor, then he/she is bound to assent on the bill. Point to be noted The governor on two occasions is bound to give his consent on the bill duly prepared by the state legislature. ? In case of money bill, the governor is bound to give his/her consent because the money bill is introduced in the state legislature with his prior approval; ? In case of reconsideration of the ordinary bill by the state legislature.
24 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 4) The governor can issue ordinance if he/ she thinks essential when the state legislature is not in session. If the state legislature passes the ordinance in the next session, then the ordinance will transform into law; otherwise it will be repealed. 5) He/ she can nominate one representative from the Anglo-Indian community in the Bidhan Sabha if he is satisfied that they are not adequately represented and few noted personalities from the sectors like art, literature, science, social service etc in the upper chamber of the state legislature (where the state legislature is bi-cameral). Executive power All the executive functions are carried out in the name of Governor because the executive power of any convicted person against any law enacted by the state legislature (Art. 161). e) The President may consult the Governor in case of appointing the judges of the High Court of the concerned state. Discretionary power The Governor enjoys certain discretionary powers. The constitution has laid down certain provisions by which the Governor acts independently or he does require to consult his council of ministers. While discharging his responsibilities under the discretionary provisions, his decision will be final, and validity of his decisions will not be called into question. a) Art. 239 states that the President may entrust additional responsibility of administraton of adjoining union territories to the Governor and in this respect, he shall exercise his powers independently or without the aid or advice of his council of ministers. b) Para 9(2) of the 6 th Schedule empowers the Governor of Assam to determine

The Governor has the power to grant pardons, reprieves, respites or remission of punishments

minerals. c) Under the special responsibility provisions of the constitution, the Governor exercises the power independently. He may consult his council of ministers, but final decision will be taken by him/her. These special responsibilities are as follows: i) The President may direct that the Governors of Maharastra and Gujrat shall have to endeavor special initiatives to develop certain areas like 26 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 Vidarbha and Saurastra by forming separate development boards, the management of which will be taken care of by the Governors. ii) The Governor of Nagaland enjoys the special responsibility in case of law and order of the state so long the activities of the hostile Nagas continue. The same is applicable for the law and order situation of Arunachal Pradesh under the 55 th Amendment of the constitution (1986). iii) Likewise, the Governor of Manipur, under the direction of the President, shall take special initiative regarding the Hill Areas of that state. iv) Under the Art. 371F(g) of the constitution, the Governor of Sikkim is entrusted to take special initiatives for peace and equitable arrangement so that the socio-economic advancement of the different sections of the state of Sikkim can be ensured. In certain other matters the Governor may act independently even these are not mentioned in the constitution. Like: a) The making of a report to the President regarding the situation of the concerned state that the government can not be carried on in accordance with the provisions of the constitution is

prerogative of the Governor and it is highly unlikely that he/she will consult with the council of ministers because the report will go against the functioning the state government. It is natural that the preparation of report regarding the failure of the constitutional machinery in the state is the discretionary power of the Governor. b) The proclamation of the President' s rule under the Art.356 in a state requires the Governor acts as the agent of the President.

c) The Governor may send certain bills to the President for consent without ministerial advice (Art.200). 2.4 Exercise of Discretion by Governor: Few cases

Exercise of Discretion by the Governor : It has already been pointed out that the Governor has to exercise his powers on the advice of the Council of Ministers. He does not, therefore, have much discretion in the exercise of his powers as long as a stable Ministry enjoying the confidence of the Assembly is in office. However, this is not always the case. The Governor may then be called upon NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 27 to exercise his discretion. It is this exercise of discretion that has made the Governor's office the most controversial constitutional office of the country. Major controversies have arisen in the following types of cases in the past: i) Appointment of Chief Minister The Governor appoints the Chief Minister and on his advice the Council of Ministers. When a party with absolute majority elects a leader, the Governor has no choice but to appoint him the Chief Minister and invite him to form the government. Problems arise when no political party has an absolute majority in the legislature. Here the discretion of the Governor comes into play. For example, in 1952 the Congress Party was the largest single party in Madras legislature, but did not have an absolute majority. Still the Governor Mr. Sri Prakash invited Mr. C. Rajgopalachari to form the government as the leader of the largest single party. This principle was, however, not followed in West Bengal in 1970. The CPM led by Mr. Jyoti Basu was the largest single party in the West Bengal Assembly. The Governor Mr. S.S. Dhavan asked Mr. Basu to prove his majority. Mr. Basu insisted on calling the Legislative Assembly and proving his majority on the floor of the House. The Governor ultimately did not invite him to form the government. The opponents of Congress criticised this on the ground that this was done at the behest of the Congress government which was in office at the Centre at that time. Thus different criteria have been followed by different Governors even in similar circumstances. ii) Dismissal of a Ministry A Chief Minister and his Ministry hold office during the pleasure of the Governor, which is not subject to any scrutiny. However, the Governor has to exercise his discretion judiciously. There is a general feeling that the Governors have not done so. For example, the Governor of West Bengal, Mr. Dharma Veera dismissed the Ajoy Mukherjee Ministry in 1967 on the grounds that he did not call a meeting of the Assembly within the time specified by the Governor for proving the majority. The action was severely criticised by many jurists who felt that it was a wrong convention to establish. It would have been much better to establish the convention that a Governor can call a meeting of the Assembly to test the majority of the government, in case the Chief Minister refuses to do so. The opposition interpreted it as a deliberate attempt on the Governor's pleasure is subject to the Ministry enjoying the confidence of the Assembly, which alone should decide the fate of a Ministry. iii) Dissolution of the Assembly In British Parliamentary Democracy, the king is guided by the advice of the Prime Minister in the matter of dissolution of the House of Commons. Likewise, the Governor should be guided by the advice of the Chief Minister in the matter of dissolution of the Assembly. Unfortunately, such a convention has not been established in India. For example, in 1967 the Chief Minister of Punjab, Mr. Gurnam Singh advised the Governor to dissolve the Assembly. His advice was not accepted by the Governor on the grounds that as long as it is possible to form a government, the Assembly should not be dissolved. Same thing happened to the advice of Mr. Charan Singh when he advised the Governor of U.P. in 1968 to dissolve the Assembly. In 2003, the Chief Minister of U.P. Ms. Mayawati advised the Governor to dissolve the Assembly but the Governor did not accept the advice on the ground that the party in power had lost the majority. The opposition parties have alleged that here again the Governor have tended to act according to the wishes of the Central Government. iv) Use of Emergency Powers It has also been alleged that the Governors have not used their discretion judiciously in advising the President for using his emergency powers under Article 356 of the Constitution. In 1959 itself, the Governor of Kerala reported to the President that due to failure of law and order, the government of the state could not be carried on according to the provisions of the Constitution. The first non- Congress state government of the country was thrown out by the President on the basis of this report, which was severely criticised by all sections of the opposition. In 1984, the Governors of J&K and Andhra Pradesh verified the numerical support of the ruling (non-Congress) parties in the Assembly and hurriedly advised the dismissal of the state governments on the ground that in the absence of stable majorities, the governments of these states could not be carried on according to the Constitution. In either case, the majority of the government was not tested on the floor of the Assembly. Moreover, in case of Andhra Pradesh even the arithmetic of numbers proved to be incorrect. In these cases, there were open allegations also that the Governors had tried to reduce the state governments to a minority. NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 29 2.5 Conclusion Thus, it appears that our Constitution envisages a dual role for the Governor. He is a Constitutional head of the state government as well as a representative of the President. The mode of appointment of the Governor and his holding office during the pleasure of the President have tended to emphasise the second role of the Governor, i.e., his role as a representative of the President. Since the President has to act on the advice of the Council of Ministers headed by the Prime Minister, the Governor has to indirectly act according to the wishes of the leader of the ruling party at the Centre. This has been resented by the opposition parties and has also been criticised by eminent jurists. It has been argued that provisions regarding the appointment and termination of the Governor have made him a tool of the ruling party at the Centre and not an impartial head of the state. On the other side, it has been argued that the mode of appointment and termination of the Governor was deliberately adopted by the framers of Constitution, after a good deal of debate, with a view to guard against the fissiparous tendencies present in our polity. 2.6

NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 31 Unit III Governor's Role as Representative of the Centre Structure 3.0 Objectives 3.1 Introduction 3.2 Governor's role as the nominated representative of the centre 3.3 Recurring controversies about Governor's role 3.4 Conclusion 3.5 Summary 3.6 Glossary 3.7 Model Questions 3.8 References 3.0 Objectives ? To understand the nominated representative character of the Governor. ? To focus on the recurring controversies surrounding the Governor's role 3.1 Introduction Of late the post of the Governor is shrouded by controversy. It is alleged that the ruling dispensation at the centre uses the office of the Governor keeping the political dividends in mind. Critics will cite examples from the pages of the post-independent Indian history to substantiate the claims that the office of the Governor has been misused to gain the political mileage. The controversial role of the governors in some states attracted the public criticism. Even the active politicians are appointed to the post of Governor which obviously adds to the doubt about his/her standard constitutional behaviour. There is another version of the story. The constitution experts are of the view that the post of Governor is crafted in such a manner that the coordination between the centre and the state can be strengthened. The aspirations of the nationalist leaders to reconstruct

32 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 the newly independent country in a uniform manner can be fulfilled if there is better coordination between the centre and the provincial governments; at the time of the making of the constitution priority was the national integration and the fulfilling the basic needs of the countrymen. Centre-guided planned economy would promote national development and, in that exercise, the role of the provincial governments assumes significance. It was expected that the provincial governments would follow the central policy framework. Enough scopes litter in the constitution in different provisions that the centre can direct the provincial government. The office of the governor is created, experts are of the opinion, to ensure that the constitutional provisions and the union government's direction can be faithfully observed. Governor has to maintain coordination between the two governments. He observes the politico-economic situation of the state and is to send regular reports to the office of the President on the prevailing situation of the state. Again, some experts like K Subha Rao, M. M. Ismail, L.P. Massey claim that the constitution makes elaborate arrangement where power between the centre and the states are distributed and, in that context, there is hardly any scope left for the Governor to act according to the intentions of the centre. He is required to discharge the constitutional responsibility, they believe, and the constitution makers did not mention anything in support of the argument that the office of the Governor is the agent of the union government. In this context the role of the Governor as the agent of the centre assumes significance. Is the office of the Governor a mere agent of the centre? Is the Governor an effective link between the centre and the state in order to create a positive federal environment? Is he the constitutional head of the state? Multiple roles of the office of the Governor leave enough scope of speculation. 3.2 Governor's role as the nominated representative of the centre The state government is an example of

Art. 163(1) makes it explicitly clear that aid and advise the Governor in the discharge of his/her functions except the discretionary powers. Again, the essence of the Art.167, where it is said that the Chief Minister will communicate the administrative decisions taken by the state cabinet to the Governor, proves that it is the council of ministers is real executive while the Governor is the nominal head of the state. It is worth noting that the Governor will act as a real executive in cases of discretionary powers and if the state comes under the NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 33 President's rule. By and large, we are accustomed to see the Governor acting as the constitutional head of the state. The Governor, as nominated by the centre, is likely to play the role of eyes and ears of the union government. After much heated debate in the Constituent Assembly, the nomination by the President was resolved in view of the apprehension of disintegration of the country. "Also, nominated Governor instead of elected Governor, was also favored to not to fuel separatist provincial tendencies as also to ensure no extra election expenses". Pandit Nehru favoured nomination to get rid of the separatist tendency. But apprehensions were aired by the members of the Constituent Assembly that the nomination might be parochially utilized by the ruling dispensation at the centre. He is the link between the state and the central government. It was felt that reconstruction of the newly independent country would be possible if the coordinated effort by the centre and the state could be put into effect. It was the prevailing situation that made the constitution makers to support the nomination of the Governor by the President in order to act a coordinator of the national government. That's why the President appoints the Governor and removes at any time; even can send him to another state. The fathers of the constitution made some provisions which require that the Governor keep a liaison with the centre. The Governor keeps the union government apprised of the situation of the state, can send certain bills for Presidential assent. If the President rule is imposed under Art.356, he enjoys the enormous executive power of the state. Apart from these constitutional responsibilities, Governor can play a very positive role to promote the interest of the state. As the Governor enjoys the confidence of the centre, he can utilize this to safeguard the interests of the state. It is believed that the former Governor of Andhra Pradesh played instrumental role for Nagarjun Sagar project in that state. But the post-colonial Indian parliamentary politics shows the chequered history in regard to the expectations of the founding fathers. The Congress regime up to mid-1960 did not flare up political controversy except in one occasion (Kerala). But the consolidation of the opposition forces at the state levels and the formation of the government by the regional parties brought the politics of the nomination of the Governor into the surface. The appointment and his role did add salt to the confrontational federalism since mid- 1960. The image of impartiality of the office of the Governor gets blurred if the appointment made purely on the political consideration. Deviation from the standard constitutional behaviour of the Governor earns the wrath from the political opposition. Even recent instances substantiate the apprehension expressed in the Constituent Assembly. Supreme Court (B.P. Singhal v. Union of India) took strong exception of the controversy flared up

34 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 when in 2004 the newly elected central government removed the Governors of several states.
3.3 Recurring controversies about Governor's role The office of Governor in India is meant to be an independent and apolitical institution under the Constitution of India. However, be it the Rajasthan political crisis of 2020 or the recently concluded West Bengal elections, the Governor has been in news for all the political reasons. It is due to the innumerable instances of misuse of the gubernatorial powers that the Governor has attracted infamous nicknames like 'Puppet', 'rubber stamp', and the 'agent of the Centre'. In recent past, some of the Chief Ministers have even advocated for the abolition of the post of Governor. Seen in this context, attempts are made to analyse the issues plaguing the office of Governor, after giving a brief overview of the office of Governor, and reviews of the Constituent Assembly debates on the subject to understand the intent of the framers of the Constitution regarding the creation of the post. Thereafter, the controversies relating to gubernatorial discretion along with Supreme Court's judgments on the same are discussed. Some possible reforms are also discussed. The negative image of the state Governors as above all "an agent of the centre" has proved difficult to erase. After about quarter of a century (1990-2014) of relative calm, the Governor's role and powers have again become a controversial issue in Indian politics. This of course coincides with the appearance of a single party with a comfortable majority at the centre. During the last few years, the Governors of Karnataka, Madhya Pradesh, Kerala, Maharashtra and, of course, West Bengal have played their roles in such a way as to make them highly controversial without necessarily adding to the glory of the office. If we had thought that the sharp controversies around the constitutionality of governors' actions on many occasions during the 1960s and 1970s had unobtrusively created certain healthy conventions for Governors in later decades to follow, we have been proved wrong. The negative image of the state Governors as above all "an agent of the centre" has proved difficult to erase. The present controversies have been around the issues of selecting the Chief Minister, determining the timing for proving legislative majority, demanding information about day-to-day administration, taking apparently long time in giving assent to bills or reserving bills for the President, commenting adversely on specific policies of the state government and exercising powers of the Governor as the chancellor of state universities.
NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 35 Various important and well-intentioned attempts were made both to understand the role of the Governor in our federal democratic set up and to recommend ways to make this institution conducive to strengthening center-state relations; for instance, the Administrative Reforms Commission of 1968, the Rajamanar Committee of 1969, Committee of Governors of 1971, Bangalore Seminar of Experts of 1983 and finally, the Sarkaria Commission of 1988. All of them more or less agreed on one point, that the image of the Governor as merely an agent of the centre sitting in state capitals and desperately seeking an opportunity to run down the state government when it is in the hands of a party opposed to the party ruling at the centre or trying to bring about a government of the same party as at the centre will deform our federalism and destroy our democracy. And all of them made extremely valuable recommendations to make the office of the Governor the "linchpin of the constitutional apparatus of the state." It is necessary to remember that the office of the Governor under the constitution of independent India is altogether different from the provincial Governors of the Maurya, Mughal or British empires. Governor's role and functions had been widely debated by some of the best minds in the Constituent Assembly like Dr. P.S. Deshmukh, T.T. Krishnamachari, H.V. Kamath, Pt. H.N. Kunzru, Alladi Krishnaswamy Ayyar, Rohini Kumar Chaudhury, Shibban Lal Sakshena, K.M. Munshi and of course, Dr. Ambedkar. Their understanding was that the proposed constitution was creating 'responsible government' in the states as much as at the centre — that is, responsible alone to the respective legislatures, that the states were indeed sovereign within their own domain, that the discretionary power, beyond the specific situations mentioned in the constitution, does not enable a Governor to override the state government. As Dr. Ambedkar had said, "I have no doubt in my mind that discretionary power is in no sense a negation of responsible government. It is not a general clause giving the Governor power to disregard the advice of his ministers in any matter in which he finds he ought to disregard." Therefore, selecting a chief minister of his choice or creating/utilising opportunities for defections to change the party in power cannot be a Governor's job. As the Sarkaria Commission succinctly put it, his task "is to see that a government is formed and not to try to form a government," which most Governors are seen be doing even to this day. Many undesirable actions, from the standpoint of federal and democratic constitutional system that governors often at times engage in, could be the result of uncertainty of tenure that they suffer from. That is why many of the committees and commissions mentioned above examining the institution of the governor suggested fixed tenure in office.

36 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 They also recommended that chief ministers of concerned states should be consulted before appointing a governor. To end the monopoly of the centre in selecting its 'own man' as governor, the BJP, along with the left front government of West Bengal, had in the 1980s, even gone forward to suggest that the appointment should be made from a panel prepared by the state legislature and actual appointing authority should be the Inter- state Council, not the central government. The constitution empowers the governor to reserve a bill for the President's consideration. This is an important 'discretionary power' which is necessary for the governor to make sure that state's laws fall within the framework of the constitution. But such gubernatorial interference would be necessary only very rarely and the expectation, contrary to the reality, is that its procedure should not be misused to 'cold storage' a bill fairly passed by the state legislature. The centre's interference with state legislative process was so much disliked by the BJP that in its submission to the Sarkaria Commission, it suggested that the centre before passing a bill even on an item in the Concurrent List should consult the states. The constitution empowers the governor to ask for information on administrative matters from the chief minister. This provision was hotly debated in the constituent assembly with some members even calling it "very dangerous," for it would likely open the door for gubernatorial intervention in day-to-day state politics. Dr. Ambedkar forthrightly made his position clear on this: "The governor under the constitution has no functions which he can discharge by himself, no function at all." While the article "does not confer upon the governor the power to overrule the ministry on any particular matter," he has certain duties to perform, the most important of which is that he has "to advise the ministry, to warn the ministry, to suggest to the ministry an alternative and ask for reconsideration." "Good and pure administration" requires the governor to perform such duties, said Dr. Ambedkar. Good and pure administration, that is what Dr. Ambedkar might have felt unnecessary to mention, was that the effective performance of these duties had a prerequisite, that the governor must, in the first place, help create a perception about himself within the government as well as among the citizens of the state that he cares for good and pure administration, and not for promoting the interests of the party ruling at the centre. Governor as the chancellor of state universities is technically free to act on his own within, of course, the limitations imposed by the university statute. But then, as in principle,

NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 37 the governor is an outsider to the state, he would not be conversant with local dynamics to handle the affairs of state universities. Hence, he will have to seek advice from local sources. It will be both inappropriate and unwise for the governor to lend his ears covertly to the local members of the party ruling at the centre rather than transparently seeking advice of the chief minister and other concerned ministers, as the Sarkaria Commission suggests. It is indeed true that the insightful and responsible recommendations made by the committees and commissions examining centre-state relations have created widespread public sensitivity and opinion regarding various wrong doings of the centre through the office of the governor which have proved to be damaging for the essential federal structure in India. The landmark judgment by the Supreme Court in S.R. Bommai vs. the Union of India (1994) effectively cautioned against the frequent use of Article 356 for removing state governments run by opposition parties. This drastically reduced the incidence of President's rule from 63 during 1971-1990 to 27 between 1991 and 2010 and this indeed has strengthened the federal structure to an extent. But there is no certainty that similar judgments would follow on other controversial issues in future. None of the numerous reports and recommendations by the committees and commissions mentioned above has been taken for implementation by any government at the centre. The BJP being comfortably in power at the centre can indeed act upon its own demands for strengthening federalism made earlier, as mentioned above, but possibly change of location in power structure prevents it from doing so. Rather than using the governor's office as an instrument for controlling state politics by exploiting his tenurial insecurity, party loyalty or through pandering his ambition it is better for the country in the long run to respect such public opinion and to let the governor act on his sagacity and sound judgment. Whether informed public opinion would be able to organise itself to have a desirable impact on the politics of the day remains to be seen. 3.4 Conclusion Faithful observation of the dual role – representative of the centre and the constitutional head of the state- can prove to be beneficial for the interest of the federal structure. The office of the governor can be a game-changer.There is no conflict between the two role expectations if 'He is thus a servant of the State but a representative of the centre (Sri 38 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 Prakasa, Hon'ble former governor of Maharastra)'. For the healthy federal democratic polity in India demands in the post of governor on the one hand politically neutral personality and on the other, an active personality to act as a liaison between the centre and the state. 3.5 Summary ? central level. One can get a glimpse of the image of the Prime Minister if he studies closely the Chief Minister in his state. It is he around whom the state administration revolves. He is the real executive of the state leading the state administration, forming his council of ministers, distributing the portfolios, advising the Governor, playing the role of the leader of the Bidhan Sabha

NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 41 and most importantly shouldering the responsibilities of his party in electoral politics. The multifarious role Chief Minister plays in the state politics assumes significance for future also. Even some Chief Ministers performed so significant role that succeeded to portray their images larger than life. It is seen that a number of Chief Ministers in different states kept a lasting impact on the state politics. Sometimes the development trajectory and consequently the politics of the state took a sharp turn due to their performance. History will keep reminding us some of the powerful and popular Chief Ministers of different states like Dr.Bidhan Chandra Roy, Sri. Jyoti Basu, and Smt. Mamata Banerjee of West Bengal, Biju Pattanaik of Orissa, N T Rama Rao and N.Chandra Babu Naidu of Andhra Pradesh, M. K. Karuna Nidhi and Jayalalalithaa of Tamil Nadu to name a few. The comfortable majority in the Bidhan Sabha provides an opportunity to the Chief Minister to play a handsome role for the development of the state. But the cobbling up of the support of different parties erects hindrances before him as he has to keep himself busy to satisfy every supporting coalition partners. So the Chief Minister of a coalition government faces difficulty in his performance than the single majority party. 4.2 Chief Minister: Appointment, tenure, removal, privileges As earlier mentioned, that the Chief Minister is the prototype of the Prime Minister at the centre. As per the art. 164 of our constitution, the Governor appoints the Chief Minister. He/she must be the member of the State Legislature. The Governor can appoint any person who is not the member of the State Legislature as Chief Minister if he enjoys the majority support, but he has to be the member of the same within 6 months of his/her appointment. As the constitution is silent about the qualifications of the Chief Minister it leaves enough scope of manipulation regarding the appointment of the Chief Minister. Normally, the Governor is guided by

Even the consensus leader of the coalition of parties (pre-or post) is also appointed as the Chief Minister. But the problem arises when no party is in position to form government on its own and also fails to muster the support of the other parties. Even the situation becomes more complicated when two or more leaders stake claim to form the ministry. In this case the Governor seeks the advice of the Advocate General and waits for some time thereby giving the parties to thrash out the matter. If no party is in a position to form the ministry, then the Governor

42 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 President's rule (three times) in this regard from 1968 to 1971. The tenure of the Chief Minister is generally 5 years, but it depends upon the support of the majority members of Bidhan Sabha (lower house of the state legislature). He may tender his resignation before the Governor. His resignation implies the removal of entire council of ministers. 4.3 Chief Minister: Power the council of ministers The Chief Minister is the leader of the council of ministers. He

regarded as the primus inter-pares – first among equals. Upon his advice, the Governor appoints other ministers. It implies that the Chief Minister finally prepares the list of the ministers after wide consultation. In reality he has to ensure the representation of the various sections of the society in the council of ministers. He has to give the younger leaders an opportunity to get prepared for future alongside the older leaders of the party. He is the sole authority to allocate or re-allocate the ministries or department among the ministers. Even he may ask any minister to resign or he may request the Governor to remove the minister from the post. As he is regarded as the keystone of the cabinet arch, he decides schedule and the issues to discuss in the cabinet meeting. He presides over the meeting of the cabinet. Although the convention of the parliamentary form of government expects that every decision is to be taken by the majority support but that does not diminish the influence of Chief Minister. Rather it is the Chief Minister who sets the tone of the meeting and upon his command the fate of every agenda depends. Moreover, he communicates

NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 43 As the leader of the Bidhan Sabha As the Chief Minister is regarded as the leader of the house, he is required to perform certain function in this capacity. Being the sole spokesperson of the government, he defends all the decisions and policies of the government, he rescues the ministers from the onslaught of the opposition if situation arises, he selects the chief whip of his party to maintain discipline and conventions of the house, maintains a good rapport with the opposition for smooth functioning of the house. As the chief adviser of the Governor It is established parliamentary norm that the Governor will act according to the advice tendered by the Chief Minister. Upon his advice the Governor appoints other ministers, allocates the responsibility and removes any minister and dissolves the Bidhan Sabha. The Governor appoints certain officials like so he has to ensure the unity and integrity of the party or coalition both inside and outside of the house. He has to take care of the party discipline for the stability of the government. He has to supervise and take appropriate measures to formulate policies according to the party ideals or coalitions. Upon his personality and leadership, the party sails smooth in the election. He utilizes different public platforms to reach out to the people of the state, makes them understand about his government's policies. The people of the state depend upon the Chief Minister for their wellbeing. 4.4 Position of the Chief Minister Chief Minister is regarded as the head or the real executive in the state. The framers of the constitution intended that the state government should be led by the Chief Minister. His role and performance uplift him to the position of real ruler of the state. But the 44 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 experience of different situations tells different stories about the position of the Chief Minister. His position becomes stronger when his party enjoys absolute majority in the State Legislature and the same political party rules at the centre also. But the leader of the majority party enjoys not so stronger position if his party is in opposition at the centre. The Chief Minister appears to be weak when his party does not enjoy majority singly in the Bidhan Sabha and his government depends upon the support of the coalition partners more. All the situations are enumerated below to understand the different positions of a Chief Minister Stronger Chief Minister The Chief Minister of a state appears to be stronger if his party holds majority in the state legislature and at same time his party is in power at the centre. Normally, the Chief Minister in this situation is the trusted lieutenant of the Prime Minister or the high command. Moreover, as history shows that the Governor of a state is selected by the ruling party from the party members or sympathizers, so it is expected that he will not create any hindrance before the Chief Minister, rather his purpose will be to cooperate with the state government. Chief Minister hence enjoys enormous power, the support of the MLAs is taken for granted, the opposition is hardly given due respect. Since independence, the people of India saw a number of powerful Chief Ministers having the blessings of the high command of his party. Dr.B.C.Roy and S.S.Roy of West Bengal, G.B. Pant and C.B. Gupta of U.P, can be mentioned as examples. The formations of council of ministers, allotment of ministry, even removal reflect his sole intention and supreme control. The functioning of the government bears the marks of his authority. His authority within the state prevails without any murmur of protest. Strong Chief Minister The position of the Chief Minister having the majority support in the Bidhan Sabha is strong enough. But as his party or coalition is not in power at the centre, so there may be hindrances created by the centre before the functioning of the state government. The Governor may not cooperate with the Chief Minister, even centre may create hurdle before the state administration. The Governor may be seen as hyper active in this context while in the first situation he plays at the hand of the Chief Minister. The threat may not come from the Bidhan Sabha but the expected cooperation from the centre and the Governor may not be available to the state government at the right moment. Tug of wars between both the governments is regular scene in Indian politics. In that case the Chief Minister is strong enough but compared to the earlier one, he is not so.

NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 45 Weak Chief Minister In the third situation, where the Chief Minister leads a coalition, he appears to be weak in formulating stable policies because of the fear of the losing the support of the alliance partners. He is seen more busy to keep the house together rather making any stable strong policies. On the other hand the centre may do the same treatment like in the second context. The Chief Minister works under the threat of dual swords- his own alliance partners and the centre. Ajoy Mukherjee in West Bengal in mid-1960s is the glaring example in this regard. 4.5 Chief Minister's role as Real Head

The Chief Minister is the leader of the Council of Ministers. With the passage of time, the position of Chief Minister has strengthened vis-a-vis his Council of Ministers. He has to assign portfolios among his ministers and can change such portfolios when he likes. He plays a coordinating role in the functioning of his Council of Ministers. He has to see that the decisions of the various departments are coherent. He has to lead and defend his Council of Ministers in the Assembly. In short, he has to ensure the collective responsibility of the Council of Ministers to the State Assembly. The Chief Minister sets the agenda for the Cabinet and greatly influences its decisions. He takes decisions on important matters of coordination even though these are allotted to individual ministers. Moreover, the Governor appoints the Council of Ministers on the advice of the Chief Minister and the ministers hold Office during the pleasure of the Governor. As a result of these provisions, the Minister, in fact, holds office during the pleasure of the Chief Minister. This power of dismissing the ministers at will and the power to change their portfolios has greatly strengthened the power of the Chief Minister in relation to his ministers and ultimately the Council of Ministers. It must also be realised that the power of the Chief Minister in relation to his Council of Ministers also depends on political conditions prevailing in the state. If a cohesive party has an absolute majority in the Assembly, the Chief Minister becomes very powerful and the ministers are afraid of him. His power is further enhanced in case of a statewide regional party for, in that case he is not subject to the discipline of the national leadership. The position of a Chief Minister gets weakened if he heads a coalition government or a faction-ridden party. In either case, he or she has to effect compromises to keep a balance among the coalition partners or various factions within the party. 46 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 Powers of the Governor : The powers of Chief Minister in relation to the Governor have not been mentioned anywhere in the Constitution. A convention was sought to be established whereby the Chief Minister could be consulted regarding the appointment of the Governor in his state. Even this has not been followed by the Union government in many cases. The only other power, which can be indirectly inferred from the Constitution is the power to exercise executive power of the state in the name of the Governor. All the public appearances of the Governor and the speeches delivered by him on such occasions have to be in accordance with policy laid down by the Council of Ministers headed by the Chief Minister; the speeches of the Governor on ceremonial occasions and the annual speech before the Assembly have to be approved by the Cabinet. Powers of the Chief Minister in relation to the Legislature The Chief Minister is also the leader of the House. Apart from this formal position, the Chief Minister provides real legislative leadership to the House in the sense that -he sets the legislative agenda. The legislative measures are brought before the Assembly after the approval of the Council of Ministers headed by the Chief Minister. It is true that private members may also bring a Bill before the Assembly. But, that has a limited chance of success. Apart from the fact that it has backing of the majority party, the private members do not have the wealth of information that is available to the government. Apart from setting up the legislative agenda, the Chief Minister has to keep the Assembly informed about the various activities of the government by answering questions, making statements, intervening in the debates, etc. Powers of the Chief Minister in relation to the Executive By virtue of being the head of the political executive, the Chief Minister controls the entire bureaucracy of the state. In this function, he is assisted by the Secretariat headed by the Chief Secretary. He approves all senior appointments like those of Secretaries, Additional/Joint/Deputy Secretaries, Heads of the Departments, Chairpersons and Managing Directors of Public Sector Undertakings, etc. Through his Cabinet, he controls their service conditions and disciplinary matters. He provides them leadership to ensure good performance and good morale. At the same time, he has to keep a watch on their performance through administrative channels as well as through his own sources like party workers, complaints fiom aggrieved persons and actual observation during tours.

NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 47 4.6 Conclusion The Chief Minister plays a very important and critical role in State administration. He advises the Governor on the summoning and proroguing of the State legislative's sessions. He has the authority to recommend to the Governor the dissolution of the legislative assembly at any time. Position of the Speaker 5.1 Introduction In India the chairman or the presiding officer of the union legislature or the lower chamber of state legislature i.e. Bidhan Sabha is popularly known as Speaker following the British tradition of parliamentary democracy. The constitution makers did not think of alternative name for the post of the presiding officer other than the 'Speaker'. So the 50 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 chairman of the Bidhan Sabha is the Speaker of that state. Unlike the British tradition of the post of the Speaker emerging out of the well-established convention, ours is not based on the convention; rather the constitution makers of our country made explicit arrangements in the constitution about the appointment, tenure, removal and powers and functions etc. Article 178 of our constitution provides for a Speaker to preside over the sessions of the Legislative Assembly of an Indian state. 5.2 Speaker: Appointment, tenure and removal The newly elected Bidhan Sabha members in the first session elect one member among themselves as the Speaker and another as Deputy Speaker. Speaker must be the member of the Bidhan Sabha. The tenure of the post of the Speaker is equivalent to that of the Bidhan Sabha. Generally the tenure is 5 years unless it is dissolved before the scheduled period. The post of the Speaker may be vacant if he resigns or dies. He may be removed if the majority members of the Bidhan Sabha ratify the no-confidence motion brought against him. Such motion can be initiated 14 days before the discussion. 5.3 The post of Speaker: Neutrality and impartiality The post of Speaker demands impartiality for the quality debate and discussion with regard to the strengthening of parliamentary democracy. But it is no denying a fact that India struggles to establish the requisite norms of neutrality for the post of speaker like its counterpart of Britain. Realising the importance of impartiality of the Speaker the constitution makers made some constitutional arrangements in this direction. 1) The speaker does not take part in any debate or discussion or any voting procedure of the Bidhan Sabha except casting ballot. It is expected that the speaker will maintain political neutrality in the house. Out of that expectation, the speaker remains aloof from such proceedings. But if there is deadlock by way of equal number of votes (for and against) on any proposal or motion, the speaker is required to end the deadlock by way of casting his vote. This is known as casting ballot. 2) His pay and allowance is made from the Consolidated Fund of the state for which no permission is required from the Bidhan Sabha; 3) His ruling is kept outside the jurisdiction of the courts; NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 51 4) If the majority members want to remove him, 14 days prior notification is required before the actual discussion for his removal. 5.4 Speaker: Power and Functions As the presiding officer of the Bidhan Sabha, the speaker has to perform certain functions like: a) Discipline and decorum maintenance in the house, b) preserving and promoting the privileges of the members, c) termination of the house membership, d) appointment of different committees e) certifitying money bill, e) communication with the governor. a) Discipline and decorum maintenance in the house: Being the chairman of the house, the speaker looks into matter of smooth running of the session. He is the person to determine the daily agenda of the house i.e. the bills, proposals, questions, amendment and motions to be taken up for discussion in the house. His ruling in this regard is final and no question of legitimacy can be raised in any court. It is his discretionary power to review the earlier ruling. He orders the concerned minister to answer the questions raised by the members. House proceedings may be suspended for lack of quorum. ? Quorum : Minimum number of members required for legitimate discussion in the legislature. In India it is one-tenth of the total members of the house. It is his primary responsibility to maintain tranquillity and discipline while session is on. Starting from sitting arrangement of the members to the closure of the session, he is to ensure discipline and decorum of the members. It is a well established norm for every member of the house to seek permission from the chair if anything to say before the members. The speaker prepares the sequence of the members along with the duration of their speech. If any derogatory remarks made in his or her speech, the concerned member will be asked to withdraw the same or the speaker orders to strike the remarks out from

52 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 that day's proceedings. Moreover, if any member creates nuisance in the house, the speaker takes several measures to maintain discipline. It is also a convention that if the speaker stands on his feet, all the members are required to take their seats. If this measure does not yield result, then he may call upon the names of the unruly member(s) in the house which implies that the security staff will take him away from the house. He may suspend the house proceedings for sometime if it seems impossible to continue smoothly. b) Preserving and promoting the privileges of the members Members of the house enjoy certain privileges like freedom of speech in the house. He/she will not be indicted in any court for the remarks made in the house or any committee of the house. No member of the house can be arrested or issued arrest warrant without the prior approval of the speaker. If any breaches of the privileges of the members or the dignity of the house hampered, the speaker takes appropriate measures to restore the same. c) Termination of the house membership Defection is a regular phenomenon in Indian politics; the very parliamentary ethos gets eroded by this disease. To arrest the wanton defection, an amendment (52 nd) has been made in the representation act in 1985 and the speakers are empowered to determine whether the concerned member(s) ceases to be the member of the house. The Supreme Court in 1991 held that it can verify the ruling of the speaker in this regard. d) Appointment of different committees Committees are an integral part of the legislature. Lack of time, innumerable issues to discuss and resolve and large number of members create hindrance before the legislature to do justice to every single issue. To come out of the crisis, the legislature innovates committee system comprising the members of the house. The speaker appoints several committees, even selects the chairman of those committees. e) Certifying the money bill The speaker certifies the money bill. Art.199 (3) empowers him to resolve the dispute arisen in the nomenclature of a bill. In other words, if there is any controversy arisen whether a bill is money bill or not, it is the speaker to settle. His certificate is to be attached with the money bill when it will be sent to the other chamber or the Governor for consent.
NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 53 f) Communication with the Governor He maintains communication between the head of the provincial government i.e. the Governor and the house. He presents before the house the messages or any advice of the Governor. He communicates any proposal or information of the house to the Governor. Besides, he is the executive head of his office. It is his responsibility to look into the problems of the employees. He conveys the message of the house to the concerned person on occasions like remarkable achievement, demise of great personality, or any unprecedented event. He represents his state in the national level speakers' conference. 5.5 Position of the Speaker The post of speaker is very important in respect of parliamentary democracy. His ruling and the behaviour within the house transcend its boundary and make a rippling effect in party politics. The speaker is the embodiment of neutrality and integrity. A balance between the role expectation and the actual behaviour is needed for the protection of democratic ethos. But unfortunate examples of partisan political behaviour on the part of the speaker hampered the evolution of the parliamentary procedure within the state. Partiality in dealing with the political situation within the house does create political turmoil within the state politics. In some situations, the speaker was seen playing pivotal role in creating ruckus, in another situation he became a mere prey of party politics. In March 1968, Punjab speaker Sri Yogindar Singh Mann suspended the session for 2 months to avoid the no-confidence motion brought about against him. This created an unprecedented constitutional crisis in Punjab because it was the budget session and the state government would fall into financial crisis. Similarly, the speakers' ruling in West Bengal in 1967, in Tamil Nadu in 1971, in Kerala in 1982, in Andhra Pradesh in 1984, in UP in 1997 are the examples of partisan politics of the speakers. In those states speakers were seen to be playing at the hands of the political parties or any faction of the party. The stiff competition for capturing power leads to the maligning of the post of speaker. For the healthy parliamentary democracy, neutral role of the speaker assumes significance. The sooner the realization comes within the political circle the better will be the performance of the parliamentary democracy.
54 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 5.6 The Anti-Defection Act, 1985 and the Role of the Speaker With the deteriorating political situation in the country the trend of political defections has once again acquired new dimensions in our federal set up and it brought to the limelight the loopholes in the Anti-DefectionLaw, 1985, enacted by the then Rajiv Government with a view to strengthening our political institutions. The political scenario further confirmed the misgivings and doubts expressed at the time of its passage about the utility of legislation and the role of the Speaker in dealing with the cases concerning the scope of the above-mentioned Act. It is now admitted that the Act has failed to achieve its purpose, viz-a-viz checking the unprincipled floor-crossing by our legislators and ensuring governmental stability both

The old game of the 'Aya Ram and Gaya Ram' has once again made a mockery of our democracy and even of the enactment of the 52nd Constitutional Amendment Act, 1985, because retail defections had been outlawed in it while wholesale defections have been legalized under this Act. For example, Mr. Chandra Shekhar with a group of 61 MPs left the Janata Dal, in a bid to oust the V. P. Singh Government and then formed the Janata Dal (S) Government but it did not attract the penalty laid down under the Anti- defection Law. The game of wholesale defection was termed as a 'split' in the Janata Dal and not political defections because of 1/3 strength of the original party in the Lok Sabha. The operation of 1/3 principle of the Act resulted into the ridiculous formation of a minority Government of the Janata Dal (S) backed by the Congress (I). Speaker's Role Under the Anti-Defection Law : The political scenario of instability as was obtained in country afte the split of the Janata Dal in November, 1989 also called in question the impartiality and neutrality attached with the office of Speaker. Doubts were raised that the Indian Speakers, while handling the situation arising out of the dissident activities amongst the elected members and the 'split' caused in the Janata Dal, did not act judiciously and impartially. It was alleged by the opposition parties that the role of the Speaker of the Lok Sabha and the Speakers of Rajasthan, Gujarat, Uttar Pradesh and Bihar, in granting official recognition to the rebels of the break away group of the legislators was not a sign of impartiality, especially when they (defectors) had openly flouted the party whip. Their voting behaviour, contrary to the party whip, virtually incurred the disqualification as laid down in the Anti-Defection Law in 1985. The voice was raised that the Lok Sabha Speaker should have declared
NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 55 them disqualified according to the spirit of the provisions of the Act. Different legislative parties moved their petitions lodging the complaints against the behaviour of the defectors and urged the Speaker to declare them as disqualified under the Anti-Defection Act, 1985. Our recent experience has shown that Indian Speakers have not acted in an impartial and independent manner in dealing with the disputers of disqualifications of the legislators arising out of the 'split' of a party or violation of the party-whip on Confidence Motion and other cases of floor-crossings. The way in which the members of Legislatures changed their party-affiliations with a desire to grab power, has dragged the august body into fresh controversies. They have been alleged to have misused their powers entrusted to them under the Anti-Defection Act, 1985 and they have totally frustrated the very purpose of the Act, while excercising the powers under Para 3 of Tenth Schedule of the Act that recognizes the 'split' in the party caused by 1/3 members of that party and Para 4 that recognizes an elected member as the party-member. They were further alleged to have perverted the spirit of the Act, rendering it so obsolete in our federeal polity, because their role has weakened the party loyalty as well as party discipline. The manner is which the Lok Sabha Speaker, Mr. Rabi Ray, delivered his rulings relating to the issue of disqualification of the members of the Janata Dal (S), also shocked many. Serious concerns have been expressed and the voice was raised that the Act should be reviewed again in the light of its inherent weaknesses and flaws, providing checks on Speaker's powers to strengthen the political system of India. It was realised that those weaknesses have reduced it to a mockery in our set-up. The Anti-Defection Law was conceived as a measure of electoral reform with explicit purpose of putting a stop to political defections of over-ambitious members of legislatures from one party to another and eradication of the 'Aya Ram Gaya Ram' phase from our political system. The political turn-out that followed with the exit of the V. P. Singh Government at the Centre brought to the lime light new technicalities of the Act, especially when the issue of status of the break-away group from the Janata Dal was to be determined by the Speaker, as these members had been expelled from the party in two batches. It was noted with disgust how the spirit of the Anti-Defection Law was conveniently ignored by all concerned of the Lok Shbha to suit their convenience of power and how they failed to honour the law of Parliament which had enated it in 1985. Instead, the game undermined our democratic institutions and rendered the second experiment of the National Front Government a failure in our political system.

State Legislature. The business of a State Government is allocated to the Ministers. For the sake of administrative convenience and assistance to the Ministers every state has a 'Secretariat'. It is mainly located in the state capital where the offices of the Ministers are situated. 1.2 Meaning and Philosophy of Secretariat The Secretariat is a staff agency of a state administration. It takes a crucial role to assist the Ministers in the fulfilment of their responsibility.

The administrative philosophy to which the secretariat system owes its existence is that policy making must be kept separate from policy execution. Several advantages claimed in favour of such an arrangement: i) Freedom from operational involvement makes the policy making apparatus forward looking and allows it to think in terms of overall goals of government rather than narrow, sectional interests of individual departments. ii) Policy making receives the time and attention it deserves, if different set of persons are charged with the functions of policy making as well as its execution. This is because, policy making, is a serious exercise in drawing up what would be a future course of action. It should not be treated as less urgent than policy execution, which involves routine, day-to-day administration. iii) Secretariat serves as a disinterested adviser to the minister. It is important to remember that the secretary is the secretary to the government and not to the minister concerned, which ensures objective examination of the proposals coming from the executive departments. It enables a more balanced scrutiny of proposals. iv) Policy making must be separated from current administration and day-to-day implementation should be left to a different agency with executive freedom, which ensures delegation of authority.

This has many aspects. First, the secretary supplies to the minister all the data and information needed for policy formulation. Second, the secretaries sometimes provide the programmes, with content by working out their details, on whose strength ministers are voted to power. Third, the Secretariat assists ministers in their legislative work. Drafts of legislations to be introduced in the legislature by ministers are prepared by the secretaries. Besides, to answer questions in the Legislature, the minister needs relevant information; the secretary supplies this information to the minister. Secretary also collects information required with respect to the legislative committees. Fourth, the Secretariat functions as an institutionalised memory. This means that the emerging problems require an examination in the light of precedents. Records and files maintained in the Secretariat serve as an institutional memory and ensure continuity and consistency in the disposal of cases. Fifth, the Secretariat is a channel of communication between one government and another, and between the government and such agencies as the Planning Commission and Finance Commission. Finally, the Secretariat evaluates and keeps track of execution of policies by the field agencies 1.3 Structure of State Secretariat The secretariat is the nerve centre of a state administration. So, we need to know the structure of State Secretariat. The structure of all states-secretariat is not same in India. The number of secretariat departments differs from state to state. Generally their number varies from 10 to 40. But there are some common departments in most of the states' administration.

The Secretary, Additional/Special Secretary, Joint Secretary, Deputy Secretary, Under Secretary and Assistant Secretary are called Officers in a department. The secretary is the head of a department. Usually, each Secretary has to take charge of more than one department. As a result, the number of secretariat department would be more than the number of Secretaries. On the other hand, the Office staff comprises the superintendent (or section officer), assistants, upper division clerks NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 65 (UDCs), lower division clerks (LDCs), steno-typists and typists. They are also the permanent element in the Secretariat system. The secretariat department is divided into divisions, divisions into branches and branches into sections. The hierarchy of the Secretariat is given below: Chief Secretary ? Principal Secretary/Secretary ? Special Secretary ? Deputy Secretary ? Under Secretary ? Assistant Secretary ? Section Officer Here one thing should be mentioned that apart from the Chief Secretary, all the Secretariat officers are subject to the well known tenure system. They are appointed in the Secretariat for only a fixed term. 1.4 Organisational Structure of the State Secretariat of West Bengal Like other states of India, West Bengal has a State Secretariat to help the Ministers in the fulfilment to their roles. The state secretariat of West Bengal consists of several departments. Every department is headed politically by a Minister and administratively by a Secretary. Pattern of Departmentalization in State Secretariat Each secretary is normally in charge of more than one department. The number of secretariat departments would therefore be larger than the number of secretaries. The number of secretariat departments, quite naturally, varies from state to state. Their number broadly ranges between 10 and 40 in different states. The number of departments in a particular state is not necessarily related to its size in terms of population. For instance, a small state like Mizoram had as many as 36 secretariat departments in 1987, the corresponding figure for Andhra Pradesh (which is a much larger state), was 19 in 1982

Larger number of departments, in particular states, would result from restricting the scope of the functions and charges of those which may be created. Partly, such increase in the number of departments may arise from the peculiar problems a particular state may face. There is a lot of criticisms about the work allocation existing in the secretariat departments, which are: First, work allocation is lop-sided in that some departments are burdened with more work than others. Second, allocation is far from rational even in terms of homogeneity of work. Not only are the subjects handled by a particular department too numerous and therefore unmanageable but these are also too heterogeneous, causing problems of coordination. These are further aggravated when charges of particular departments are incomplete in scope. 1.6

The number of secretariat departments is not same in all states. It differs from state to state. Generally their number varies from 10 to 40. Each department is divided into two, such as- Officers and Office Staff. Functions of the State Secretariat The State Secretariat is the apex organization of a state administration, therefore it takes an important role in the state government under the direction and leadership of the Chief Minister of

It
provides Secretarial assistance to the Ministers and also represents its departments before the committees of the Legislature. According to first Administrative Reforms Commission (ARC) of India (1966-70), the State Secretariat

acts "as a memory and a clearing house preparatory to certain types of decisions and as a general supervisor of executive action." Some important functions of the State Secretariat are given below:- First, The Secretariat assists

the Ministers in policy making and in modifying policies from time to time.

The Secretariat provides different data, information and advices to the Ministers and the Ministers make policies with the help of these data. Second, It also assists the Ministers in their legislative work to frame rules and regulations. The Secretariat makes legislative drafts for the Ministers to be introduced in the state Legislative. Third, It helps to prepare the budget in consultation with the Finance Department. Fourth, The secretariat makes policies and on the other hand, the directorate and other field agencies implement the policies. Here the function of the secretariat is to supervise the implementation of government policies by the Directorate and other field agencies. Fifth, The secretariat not only supervises the implementation of various policies but evaluates the performance of different field agencies also.

After evaluation it can suggest proper action, if required. Sixth, It can impose control on public expenditure.
76 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 Seventh,
One of the most important roles of the State Secretariat is to provide secretarial assistance to the different Ministers' Committees according to their need. Eighth, It helps the Ministers in discharging their responsibilities to the State Legislature. Such as – answering Assembly questions. Ninth, The State Secretariat acts as a think-tank of the state government by providing authentic information in respect of governmental policies and activities.
Tenth, It initiates measures to develop greater organizational competence. Eleventh, State government has different departments. So, the secretariat has to coordinate the policies and programmes of the different departments. So, we can say that it acts as the chief coordinating agency in the State Government. Twelfth, The State Secretariat appoints Heads of Departments and consequently establishes the work, salary, leave etc. of these officers. Last but not least, the secretariat

In this regard, the Rajasthan Administrative Reforms Committee, 1963 can be mentioned. Under the chairmanship of Harish Chandra Mathur the Committee had prescribed the following functions which should be performed by the secretariat. General: 1. All matters of general policy; 2. Inter-departmental co-ordination; 3. Matters involving the framing of new legal enactments or rules or amendments in the existing ones. Cases involving interpretation or relaxation of existing rules or government orders; 4. Correspondence with the Government of India and other governments; 5. All matters relating to the preparations or adoption of new plan schemes and important modifications in the existing schemes; 6. Financial sanctions not within the competence of the Heads of Departments; 4. Sanction of expenditure from

cases beyond powers of Heads of Departments and audit objections regarding the offices of Heads of Department, etc. Service Matters: 1. Approval of service rules and amendments thereto; 2. Papers relating to senior appointments/promotions/transfers of the Deputy Heads of Departments and above and cases of disciplinary proceedings against these officers; 3. Initial appointment of officers belonging to the state service and infliction of major punishments upon them; 4. Creation of posts, their extension and continuance, reemployment, resignation, special pay, allowances and pensions not within the powers of

the Departments. 2.3 Criticism of State Secretariat The general complaint against the Secretariat is that it has been concentrating most of the powers. The executive heads of departments generally complain that even for a small matter they have to approach the Secretary for getting sanction. The reason for this 78 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 tendency is inherent in the Parliamentary form of Government. The Minister is responsible to the Parliament or the state legislature for omissions and commissions of the department under his charge. Hence, he has to keep himself informed of all the developments of his department. This leads to the concentration of functions in the Secretariat. Certain human and psychological factors are also responsible for this monopolization of power. But this type of concentration leads to inefficiency in the working of the Government. Second, the Secretariat being far away from the field are not aware of the problems in the

Third, the postings in the Secretariat these days are important and attractive and the condition in the field is difficult. The field officers have to face political pressures and have greater chance of coming into conflict with the political masters, while the Secretariat officers have a very good existence. They work close to the centre of power and are able to develop better equation with them. Moreover, the Secretariat posts carry additional remuneration which make them more attractive to the officers; have better educational and medical facilities and other amenities. Therefore, most of the officers wish to remain in the Secretariat. By staying for a long period in the Secretariat these officers lose touch with the field and do not realise the field problems. It is, therefore, essential to have a balance between the field level and Secretariat level experience of the officers. 2.4 ARC Recommendations The first Administrative Reforms Commission (ARC) of India (1966-70) in its Report on State Administration, Chapter III, suggested the following recommendations to develop the quality of the functions of the State Secretariat. i. The distribution of subjects as between different Secretariat departments should be so effected that such departments would deal with a particular segment of administrative activities. Such activities should be inter related and be more or less of homogenous character. ii. The number of the State departments should, in general, not exceed 13. iii. The basic scheme of grouping of subjects into departments should not be changed to provide for an increase in the number of ministers' portfolios. A change should be made only on the basis of proven administrative needs and after a thorough study. The situation in which the number of members in the Council of Ministers NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 79 exceeds the number of departments fixed on the basis of a rational plan should be met by putting in charge of some departments, Ministers of State and Deputy Ministers in addition to the Cabinet Ministers. iv. Executive functions which are at present performed by the Secretariat and

organisations. v. In departments dealing with specific subjects, there should be set up two “staff” cells, namely, (i) a combined cell on planning and policy; and (ii) a finance cell. vi. The new Department of personnel should be under the charge of the Chief Secretary and be placed under the Chief Minister. vii. There should be set up in each administrative department a Policy Advisory Committee with the Secretary of the department as its Chairman and the heads of all major executive departments as its members. The existing Secretariat personnel should be suitably oriented in the preparation of self-contained papers or memoranda setting out the problems, its different alternative solutions and the merits and demerits of each alternative. 2.5 Personnel and Administrative Reforms in West Bengal The Personnel and Administrative Reforms Department is entrusted with the task of providing human resources to the various establishments of the Government of West Bengal from the Secretariat to the block level in appropriate positions as well as spearheading all E-Governance related activities in West Bengal. ? In consonance with the above major task, it also carries the onerous responsibility of managing the IAS, WBCS (Exe.) and West Bengal Secretariat Service cadres in all respects. Apart from placement of officers and staff, this department is also concerned with service matters and career prospects of the members of the aforesaid cadres in a holistic manner. The department discharges its functions through its eleven cells or branches. ? It is also the administrative department of important organizations such as the (i) Administrative Training Institute at Bidhannagar, (ii) the Vigilance Commission, (iii) the West Bengal Information Commission, (iv) the Lokayukta and (v) the Resident Commissioner’s office in New Delhi. The Administrative Training Institute 80 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 conducts regular training programmes for the officers and staff for capacity building and performance enhancement. ? As the nodal department for the implementation
machinery at various levels of the State administration. It also coordinates with other departments for speedy redressal of public grievances. ? Build core information infrastructure to support E-Governance in terms of State Data Center and State Wide Area Network; support infrastructure namely State Portal, e-Form and State Service Delivery Gateway (SSDG) and all other platforms and infrastructure for facilitating the realization of the vision of the State. ? Facilitate coordination among Government Departments, Academic Institutions and Industry for achieving E-Governance. ? In service training of officers and Staff of the Government at ATI and other reputed institutes. ? Implementation of administrative reforms as per decision of the State Government. ? Keeping Vigilance over the functioning of the officials. ? Maintenance of service records and accounts ? Disposal of public grievance petitions. ? Facilitate coordination among Government Departments for achieving excellence in IT and related sectors. ? Support the State Government Departments in adopting best practices, guidelines, policies and standards vis-a-vis implementation and use of ICT. 2.6 Conclusion The Secretariat is the top layer of the State administration. Differentiate the Directorate from the Secretariat 3.1 Introduction Directorate or Executive Department is one of the most important parts of state administration. It is the executive arm of a state government. A Secretariat is concerned with the policy-making while a Directorate is concerned with policy execution. According to the Secretariat, which reaches its apex, usually, in a single officer like the Inspector- General of Police or the Chief Conservator of Forests, outside the Secretariat altogether. Such a head of department will usually be concerned principally with a single secretary to Government and a single.....Minister, for his orders and the funds which he has to spend."

The Directorate works under the supervision of Secretariat. So, the Directorates are different from the department of

Secretariat. Excepting few cases, each secretariat department has a corresponding executive department or Directorate. The secretariat departments of finance and law do not have executive departments. 3.2 Structure of Directorate The structure of Directorates depends upon the number of important subjects administered by the state. The heads of the departments are generally called Directors. For their assistance there are Additional Directors, Joint Directors, Deputy Directors and Assistant Directors. For smooth working of the departments they have been divided into headquarters, divisions and districts. Here one point should be kept in mind that the head of a Directorate may also be known as Commissioner, Director-General, Inspector-General, Registrar, Chief Engineer, Controller, and so on.

The name of the Directorates and their Heads are mentioned in the following table. Directorates and their Heads: Sl. Directorates or Executive Designation of the Heads No. Departments 1. Agriculture Department Director of Agriculture. 2. Accounts of Treasuries Directorate Director of Accounts and Treasuries 3. Animal Husbandry Department Director of Animal Husbandry 4. Cooperative Department Registrar of Cooperative Societies 5. Education Department Director of Education 6. Employment Directorate Director of Employment 7. Excise Department Commissioner of Excise. 8. Forest Department Chief Conservator of Forests 9. Housing Department Commissioner of Housing.
NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 85 10. Jail Department Inspector-General of Prisons 11. Police Department Inspector-General of Police. 12. Sales Tax Department Commissioner of Sales Tax. 13. Irrigation Department Chief Engineer (Irrigation). 17. Printing and Stationery Department Controller of Printing and Stationery. 18. Fisheries Department Director of Fisheries. 19. Information and Publicity Director of Information and Publicity. 20. Land Record Office Director of Land Records 3.3 Functions of the Directorate The Directorate is an executive arm. As an executive arm of a state government the Directorate performs the following functions: a. To formulate the departmental budget. b. To act as a technical advisor to the Ministry. c.

To inspect the execution of work of departmental district staff. d. To allocate grants as per rules, making budget re-appropriation within prescribed limits. e. To organise in-service training programme for the department's officers to improve their quality. f. To carry out the research and experiment programme to improve the Department's techniques of work. g. Making within approved rules all appointments, confirmations, postings, transfers, promotions of all subordinate officers including sanctioning of leave and making officiating arrangements. h. To exercise disciplinary power over all subordinate officers according to rules.

86 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 i. To advise Public Service Commission concerning promotions and disciplinary actions. j. To sanction the attendance of officers at conferences, other than inter-state or Government of India conferences. 3.4 Relations between the Secretariat and the Directorate Every state government has three main components to run the state administration smoothly. The three components are – the Minister, the Secretary and the Executive or Directorate. The Minister and the Secretary both constitute the Secretariat. In the secretariat the Ministers are the political heads and the Secretaries are the administrative heads. On the other hand, the Directorate is the executive head. The main function of the Secretariat is to make policies while the Directorate translates into action those policies. The Directorates have to perform their functions under the State Secretariat. So, we can say that the Secretariat and the Directorate are not the same component of the state administration. The Directorate or

The Director

is a specialist and the Secretary is the generalist civil servant, normally a member of the Indian Civil Service. The Directorates are the executive instrument of the Ministers and the Secretariat is the administrative advisers and assistants. In the interest of good administration the both departments should work in the closest touch with each other. Their ideal relationship should be maintained during all times. But, in times of emergency and crisis, the relationship is naturally disturbed and with the centralization of authority the secretariat tends to become powerful. As a result, like the Centre the relationship between the Secretary and the Head of the Department has been a matter of debate and even controversy. The relationship should be based on the following general principles: i. Policy making should be main duty of the Secretariat and implementation of the policy should be done by the Directorate. ii. The secretariat should not interfere in the work of the Directorate unnecessarily. iii. The Directorate also should accomplish its responsibility according to the rules. iv. The Directorate should be given adequate powers and discretion to act effectively.

NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 87 3.5 Distinction between the Secretariat and the Directorate

The Secretariat Department must be distinguished from the executive department. The Secretariat has the function of aiding, assisting and advising the political executive in arriving at policy choices. The heads of executive departments -who are known as director (although other nomenclature

are

also used to refer to them) -have the responsibility of implementing policies formulated by the political executive. Therefore, the secretaries assist in policy formulation whereas the directors' role lies in executing policy. Long ago, the Simon Commission had observed, that executive department 'is an administrative unit separate from the Secretariat, which reaches its apex, usually, in a single officer like the Inspector General of Police, or the Chief Conservator of Forests, outside the Secretariat altogether. Such a head of a department will usually be concerned principally with a single secretary to Government and a single . .. minister of his orders and the funds which he has to spend.' Each secretariat department is in charge of a number of executive departments. This number varies over a wide range with some departments taking charge of a much larger number of executive heads than others. There is an average of 6 to 7 executive departments in relation to one secretariat department. However, it must be carefully noted that not all secretariat departments have executive departments attached to them. Some of the secretariat departments are engaged in advisory and controlling functions and therefore do not have executive departments reporting to them. Examples are Departments of Law, Finance, etc. The Secretariat and executive departments organisationally express the policy formulation and policy execution processes involved in the functioning of the government; the two may be looked upon as extensions of the personality of the Council of Ministers. The former is a policy-making organ, the latter a policy executing organ. The secretariat department is normally headed by a generalist civil servant (drawn from the IAS), the executive department by a specialist. The specialist (the head of the executive department) functions under the supervision of the generalist (the secretary or the head of the secretariat department). This can be illustrated with some examples, Director of Agriculture, who is a specialist, in that he is trained in and holds a formal degree in agricultural sciences, would function under the supervision of the Secretary, Agriculture (a generalist, an IAS). The latter represents agriculture department at the secretariat level, whereas the Director of Agriculture represents agriculture department at the executive level. The director is the executive head of the agriculture department - the Directorate of Agriculture. Likewise, the home department in the Secretariat has the Director-General of 88 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 Police as its executive head of the department. Similar correlation exists between education secretary and education director, industries secretary and industries director, social welfare secretary and social welfare director, and so on. We have emphasised the distinctness of the roles of the Secretariat and the Directorate by saying that, while the former is concerned with policy formulation, the latter is concerned with policy execution (or with administering policy or to put it yet more simply, the administration). The question which may, therefore, be asked is whether policy and administration are discrete processes. The answer is that at a conceptual level, the two are distinct; it is possible to identify, and define them as two clearly distinguishable phenomena. But at a ' practical plane, the two are inextricably interlinked, even tend to become indistinguishable and therefore, it is difficult to say where the policy ends and administration begins. Policy is concerned with political choices and involves questions of broader values, whereas administration is concerned with implementing programmes emanating from particular policy decisions. Administration, therefore, involves such details of execution as framing organisational structures, staffing of organisations, coordinating activities, directing, controlling, motivating the personnel and so on. That the two are dichotomous is the traditional view, which owes its origin to Woodrow Wilson's essay of 1887, 'The Study of Administration'. Politics, he said, is the proper activity of Legislature and other policy-making groups (e.g., political parties, cabinet, etc.). Administration is the sphere of administrators who carry out the policies stated in the laws. The context of the dichotomy was the civil service reform movement of the 1880s in the United States, which aimed to eliminate political interference in civil service. It was argued that civil service recruitment should, in the interest of administrative efficiency, be based on considerations of merit and fitness rather than partisan politics. In other words, politics should be kept out of administration. Max Weber further justified separation of policy from administration by arguing that the attributes of politicians are exactly the opposite of those of the civil servants. The essence of politics is to take a stand, to take personal responsibility for the policies decided on, and to admit the transitory nature of the political role. The essence of administration is to execute conscientiously the order of the political authority, even if it appears wrong to the administrator. The administrator is politically neutral. He simply does what he is asked to do and assumes no personal responsibility. However, the complexities of governmental operations have increasingly required administrators to become involved in policy making or political decisions. As a result of

to draw a clear boundary separating policy and administration, or to say where policy ends and administration begins. Sources of Administrative Expertise. There are several sources from which the modem day administrators have obtained a kind of 'expertise', which the politicians need to use when formulating policies as: (i) The administrators stay in office longer, (they are career civil servants) than the politicians, who come and go with elections, the former have opportunities of giving sustained attention to problems. From this, they gain an invaluable kind of practical knowledge that comes from the experience of handling these very problems day in and day out. This knowledge is conserved in records and transmitted to new generations of civil servants through training programmes. This monopoly of experience and practical knowledge coupled with continuity in office gives them a decisive edge over politicians in framing policies. (ii) The administrators are in possession of facts, figures, information and intelligence regarding the specific areas in which policies are to be framed. Politicians would need these data and statistics in formulating policies. (iii) Administrative expertise also comes pre-eminently from the fact that the governments of today employ a large variety of professionals (doctors, engineers, scientists, economists, etc.). They possess technical knowledge, which forms a vital, input in policy making. (iv) The advent of merit system has also helped to build up administrative expertise by attracting better talent in civil service and loosening the grip of politicians on civil service. Administrators' Role in Policy Making The increase in civil service expertise, together with the growth in the functions of government and growing complexity of administration, has resulted in an increasing dependence of politicians on administrators in the task of policy making. This is reflected in the following: i) Policy making exercise is done on the basis of facts, figures, information and data, which are supplied by the bureaucracy. In other words, politicians, in order to enhance the credibility of the policies, depend on the administrators' data support to their policies. ii) Civil servants based on their long administrative experience, tender advice to the lay politicians on the administrative, technical and financial feasibility of the various policy options under consideration. iii) Civil servants prepare the draft legislations (bills), which after ministerial approval, are placed before the legislature for its consideration. In other words, 90 ?

administrators initiate the process of public policy formulation, which in its final form assumes the shape of an Act passed by the Legislature.

Administrators formulate policy through the exercise of administrative discretion. When an administrator is required to choose between alternative courses of action within a policy frame, he is said to exercise discretion. In this sense, administrators are described as supplementaty lawmakers. The actual content of policy becomes entirely a matter for bureaucratic determination. Here administrators actually decide how the power of the State shall be used in specific cases. In modern times, there has come about a tremendous increase in administrative discretion by virtue of an incessant increase in the volume of legislation to be enacted. Legislature is under the circumstances, compelled to confine itself to indicating broad framework of law, leaving details to be filled up by the administrative agencies. The growing variety and complexity of laws to be enacted has further circumscribed the Legislature's competence. The legislators do not have the technical know-how and training to venture into the details of particular legislations. This further necessitates exercise of administrative discretion. And, at any rate, if the Legislature delves into the details of each law, this would be at the cost of other important duties and functions of the legislators and therefore an undesirable thing to happen. This, coupled with the assurance that it has the necessary means available to hold administration accountable to itself has, in fact, encouraged the Legislature in its attitude of not delving too deeply into the details of the enactments it formulates. And, it is not possible to work out the details of the enactments for another reason too. Ultimately, the policy is to be executed in the field where an administrator must necessarily face a bewildering variety of situations as he sets himself to the task of policy execution. For the law making agency, it is clearly not possible to visualise, at the point of legislation, the different variety of situations that may arise in the field. For this reason, once again, the policy makers must do no more than provide only broad guidelines in the legislations they frame. 3.6

Conclusion Directorate or Executive Department is one of the most important parts of a state administration. It is an executive arm of the state government. It is separate from the Secretariat. The main function of the Secretariat is to make policy and on the other hand, a Directorate is concerned with policy execution. A Secretariat is a line agency while a Directorate is a staff agency. The Directorate is a specialist and the Secretary is the NSOU ? CC-PA-04 ? 91 generalist civil servant, normally a member of the Indian Administrative Service. The structure of Directorates depends upon the number of important subjects administered by the state. The heads of the departments are generally called Directors. For their assistance there are Additional Directors, Joint Directors, Deputy Directors and Assistant Directors. Directorates are the executive instrument of the Ministers and the Secretariat is the administrative advisers and assistants. It is said that the Directorates are the 'Hands' of the Ministers and the Secretaries are Ministers' "ears and eyes". But, like the Centre the relationship between the Secretary and the Head of the Department has been a matter of debate and even controversy. In the interest of good administration the both departments should work in the closest touch with each other. 3.7 Summary ? In this unit the structure and functions of the directorate have been explained. ? The relationship and the differences between the secretariat and the directorate have been discussed. 3.8 Glossary ? Directorate: a section of a government department in charge of a particular activity. ? the Chief Secretary from the senior IAS officers of the state cadre. But the Chief Minister keeps in his mind mainly three things before the selection of the Chief Secretary: seniority of the officer, service record and his trust on the officer. In this regard, the recommendation of the first Administrative Reforms Commission of India (1966-70) should be mentioned: " the State Government." The office of the Chief Secretary is an institution unique to the states; it is without a parallel in the administrative landscape of the entire country. The Chief Secretary's office has, for instance, no parallel in the Central government. The work he performs in relation to the state government is, at the Union level, shared by three high-ranking functionaries of more or less an equal status, i.e., Cabinet Secretary, Home Secretary, and Finance Secretary, This is a vivid reflection on the wide scope of the duties and powers of the Chief Secretary. 4.2 Fuctions of the Chief Secretary

He deals with all matters regarding appointment, transfer and promotion of the senior civil servants. Thus, the entire staff of all the departments is under his control. As Philip Woodruff says: "The Chief Secretary was the channel through whom the orders of the governments were conveyed to their officers. He was traditionally the source of postings and transfers; to most district officers he was in fact the government." (iv) As the

In considering the position of the Chief Secretary, another fact needs to be taken note of. The incumbent of this office is not necessarily the seniormost civil servant of the state. This was at any rate the situation till 1973 when, for instance, in U.P., the Chief Secretary was junior in rank and seniority to the members of the Board of Revenue. Same was the case in Punjab, where he was junior to the Financial Commissioner. Since 1973, however, the office of the Chief Secretary has been standardised; its incumbent 96 ? NSOU ? CC-PA-04 since then has begun to hold the rank of the Secretary to Government of India and receives emoluments admissible to the latter. How does the imposition of the Presidents' rule on a state affect the Chief Secretary's Office? Where the Centre does not appoint advisers during the President's rule, the Chief Secretary becomes clothed with the powers belonging to the Chief Minister. When, however, central advisers are appointed, it tends to inhibit the Chief Secretary in his administrative capacity because the former are drawn from the ranks of senior civil servants (senior to the state's Chief Secretary) as a result of which a hierarchical relationship becomes operative.

In conclusion, it may be noted that a host of personnel matters and many other minute and unimportant administrative details consume a sizeable chunk of the Chief Secretary's time. TheAdministrative Reforms Commission is constrained to agree with the following observations of the Maharashtra Reorganisation Commission (1962- 68) on the manner in which the Chief Secretary has become burdened with trivial details: ". .. it seems unfortunate that the highest official in the state has to sign gazette notifications of appointments, promotions, transfers leave; etc., that he has to spend time on minutiae of protocol, passports, etc." To rectify this situation, the ARC has recommended that this functionary be relieved of the work of routine nature as well as be provided with appropriate staff assistance. That alone will ensure speedy implementation of decisions and effective coordination of policies and programmes of the state government.
